[5] brave it most Dress extravagantly.

Tell zeal it wants° devotion; lacks
Tell love it is but lust;
Tell time it is but motion;
Tell flesh it is but dust.
And wish them not reply,
For thou must give the lie.

Tell age it daily wasteth;° fades, diminishes
Tell honour how it alters;
Tell beauty how she blasteth;
Tell favour how it falters.
And as they shall reply,
Give every one the lie.

Tell wit° how much it wrangles intelligence, understanding
In tickle points of niceness;[1]
Tell wisdom she entangles
Herself in overwiseness.
And when they do reply,
Straight give them both the lie.

Tell physic° of her boldness;° medicine / presumption
Tell skill it is pretension;
Tell charity of coldness;
Tell law it is contention.
And as they do reply,
So give them still the lie.

Tell fortune of her blindness;
Tell nature of decay;
Tell friendship of unkindness;
Tell justice of delay.
And if they will reply,
Then give them all the lie.

Tell arts they have no soundness,[2]
But vary by esteeming;[3]
Tell schools[4] they want profoundness,
And stand too much on seeming.
If arts and schools reply,
Give arts and schools the lie.

Tell faith it's fled the city;
Tell how the country erreth;
Tell manhood shakes off pity
And virtue least preferreth.[5]
And if they do reply,
Spare not to give the lie.

So when thou hast, as I
Commanded thee, done blabbing—
Although to give the lie
Deserves no less than stabbing—[6]
Stab at thee he that will,
No stab the soul can kill.

[1] wrangles … niceness To waste time with trivial, or overly subtle matters.

[2] arts The seven liberal arts: grammar, rhetoric, logic, arithmetic, geometry, astronomy, and music; soundness Freedom from weakness, based on fact.

[3] they have … esteeming They have no basis in solid and unchanging fact; they are subject to opinion.

[4] schools Systems of philosophy.

[5] Tell manhood … virtue least preferreth Tell humanity that it refuses to feel pity, and that it prefers virtue less than all other things.

[6] Deserves no less than stabbing To accuse someone of lying would likely cause a duel.

[7] Instead of earth The Bible recounts the creation of Adam out of the dust of the earth. See Genesis 2.7.

[8] To please love's fancy out of those At the request of love, Nature attempted to make a mistress out of snow and silk.

At love's entreaty, such a one
Nature made, but with her beauty
She hath framed a heart of stone,
So as love by ill destiny
Must die for her whom nature gave him
Because her darling would not save him.

But time, which nature doth despise,
And rudely gives her love the lie,[1]
Makes hope a fool, and sorrow wise,
His hands doth neither wash nor dry,
But being made of steel and rust,
Turns snow, and silk, and milk to dust.

The light, the belly, lips, and breath
He dims, discolors, and destroys,
With those he feeds, but fills not death,
Which sometimes were the food of joys;
Yea, time doth dull each lively wit
And dries all wantonness with it.

Oh cruel time which takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
And pays us but with age and dust,
Who in the dark and silent grave,
When we have wandered all our ways,
Shuts up the story of our days.

[The Author's Epitaph, Made by Himself][2]

Even such is time, which takes in trust
Our youth, our joys, and all we have,
And pays us but with age and dust,
Who in the dark and silent grave
When we have wandered all our ways
Shuts up the story of our days.
And from which earth, and grave, and dust
The Lord will raise me up, I trust.

from The Discovery of the Large, Rich, and Beautiful Empire of Guiana;[3] with a relation of the great and golden City of Manoa,[4] which the Spaniards call El Dorado …

To the Right Honourable my singular good Lord and kinsman Charles Howard,[5] Knight of the Garter, Baron, and Councillor, and of the Admirals of England the most renowned; and to the Right Honourable Sir Robert Cecil,[6] Knight, Councillor in her Highness's Privy Councils.

Part 1, Preface

For your Honours' many honourable and friendly parts, I have hitherto only returned promises; and now, for answer of both your adventures,[7] I have sent you a bundle of papers, which I have divided between your Lordship and Sir Robert Cecil, in these two respects chiefly; first, for that it is reason that wasteful factors,[8] when they have consumed such stocks as they had in trust, do yield some colour[1] for the same in their account; secondly, for that I am assured that whatsoever shall be done, or written, by me, shall need a double protection and defence. The trial that I had of both your loves, when I was left of all but of malice and revenge, makes me still presume that you will be pleased (knowing what little power I had to perform aught,[2] and the great advantage of forewarned enemies) to answer that out of knowledge, which others shall but object out of malice. In my more happy times as I did especially honour you both, so I found that your loves sought me out in the darkest shadow of adversity, and the same affection which accompanied my better fortune soared not away from me in my many miseries; all which though I cannot requite, yet I shall ever acknowledge; and the great debt which I have no power to pay, I can do no more for a time but confess to be due. It is true that as my errors were great, so they have yielded very grievous effects; and if aught might have been deserved in former times, to have counterpoised[3] any part of offences, the fruit thereof, as it seemeth, was long before fallen from the tree, and the dead stock only remained. I did therefore, even in the winter of my life, undertake these travails,[4] fitter for bodies less blasted with misfortunes, for men of greater ability, and for minds of better encouragement, that thereby, if it were possible, I might recover but the moderation of excess, and the least taste of the greatest plenty formerly possessed. If I had known other way to win, if I had imagined how greater adventures might have regained, if I could conceive what farther means I might yet use but even to appease so powerful displeasure,[5] I would not doubt but for one year more to hold fast my soul in my teeth till it were performed. Of that little remain I had, I have wasted in effect all herein. I have undergone many constructions;[6] I have been accompanied with many sorrows, with labour, hunger, heat, sickness, and peril; it appeareth, notwithstanding, that I made no other bravado of going to the sea, than was meant, and that I was never hidden in Cornwall, or elsewhere, as was supposed. They have grossly belied me that forejudged that I would rather become a servant to the Spanish king than return; and the rest were much mistaken, who would have persuaded that I was too easeful and sensual to undertake a journey of so great travail. But if what I have done receive the gracious construction of a painful pilgrimage, and purchase the least remission,[7] I shall think all too little, and that there were wanting to the rest many miseries. But if both the times past, the present, and what may be in the future, do all by one grain of gall[8] continue in eternal distaste, I do not then know whether I should bewail myself, either for my too much travail and expense, or condemn myself for doing less than that which can deserve nothing. From myself I have deserved no thanks, for I am returned a beggar, and withered; but that I might have bettered my poor estate, it shall appear from the following discourse, if I had not only respected her Majesty's future honour and riches. …

[1] gives … the lie Offers a challenge; in this period, to a duel.

[2] The Author's … Himself This short poem is variously titled in different manuscript sources; "Sir Walter Raleigh's Epitaph on his Own Death" is one variant. The poem is an expanded and slightly revised version of the final stanza of "Nature that Washed Her Hands in Milk" (see above). Ralegh is said to have written it in his Bible on the night before he died.

[3] Empire of Guiana Ralegh's Guiana is located predominately in the Orinoco basin of present-day eastern Venezuela.

[4] Manoa The European myth of El Dorado, "the gilded one," resulted from conflated reports of several indigenous peoples' practices. Once a year, a king, or a chief, was anointed with gold dust and paddled to the center of a lake, believed to be in an upland area beside the golden city of Manoa, where he would make gold offerings. The location of El Dorado, or Manoa, was variously held to be in Colombia, Surinam, Guyana, and Venezuela.

[5] Charles Howard Baron Howard of Effingham (1536–1624), Earl of Nottingham, Lord High Admiral, Commander-in-chief of the English fleet against the Spanish Armada in 1588. Howard contributed a ship, the Lion's Whelp, to Ralegh's expedition.

[6] Sir Robert Cecil Earl of Salisbury (1563–1612), Secretary of State. Although an ally of Ralegh's at the time of the Guiana expedition, Cecil would later turn James I against Ralegh by suggesting his involvement in the plot to place Arabella Stuart on the throne.

[7] adventures Commercial investments in Ralegh's voyage.

[8] factors Those who buy or sell for others, agents.

from Part 5

… To speak of what passed homeward were tedious, either to describe or name any of the rivers, islands, or villages of the Tivitivas, which dwell on trees; we will leave all those to the general map. And to be short, when we were arrived at the sea-side, then grew our greatest doubt, and the bitterest of all our journey forepassed; for I protest before God, that we were in a most desperate estate. For the same night which we anchored in the mouth of the river of Capuri, where it falleth into the sea, there arose a mighty storm, and the river's mouth was at least a league broad, so as we ran before night close under the land with our small boats, and brought the galley as near as we could. But she had as much ado to live as could be, and there wanted little of her sinking, and all those in her; for mine own part, I confess I was very doubtful which way to take, either to go over in the pestered[9] galley, there being but six foot water over the sands for two leagues together, and that also in the channel, and she drew five; or to adventure in so great a billow, and in so doubtful weather, to cross the seas in my barge. The longer we tarried the worse it was, and therefore I took Captain Gifford, Captain Caulfield, and my cousin Greenvile into my barge; and after it cleared up about midnight we put ourselves to God's keeping, and thrust out into the sea, leaving the galley at anchor, who durst not adventure but by daylight. And so, being all very sober and melancholy, one faintly cheering another to shew courage, it pleased God that the next day about nine o'clock, we descried[1] the island of Trinidad; and steering for the nearest part of it, we kept the shore till we came to Curiapan, where we found our ships at anchor, than which there was never to us a more joyful sight.

[1] colour Specious or plausible reason, pretext.

[2] aught Anything.

[3] counterpoised Bring to or keep in a state of balance.

[4] travails Labor.

[5] powerful displeasure Ralegh's secret marriage to Elizabeth Throckmorton in 1592 incurred Queen Elizabeth's wrath; he was imprisoned in the Tower of London for several months and did not regain the queen's favor for some years.

[6] constructions Trials.

[7] remission Pardon.

[8] gall Bitterness, rancor.

Now that it hath pleased God to send us safe to our ships, it is time to leave Guiana to the sun, whom they worship, and steer away towards the north. I will, therefore, in a few words finish the discovery thereof. Of the several nations which we found upon this discovery I will once again make repetition, and how they are affected. At our first entrance into Amana, which is one of the outlets of the Orinoco, we left on the right hand of us in the bottom of the bay, lying directly against Trinidad, a nation of inhuman Cannibals, which inhabit the rivers of Guanipa and Berbeese.[2] In the same bay there is also a third river, which is called Areo, which riseth on Paria side towards Cumana, and that river is inhabited with the Wikiri, whose chief town upon the said river is Sayma. In this bay there are no more rivers but these three before rehearsed and the four branches of Amana, all which in the winter thrust so great abundance of water into the sea, as the same is taken up fresh two or three leagues from the land. In the passages towards Guiana, that is, in all those lands which the eight branches of the Orinoco fashion into islands, there are but one sort of people, called Tivitivas, but of two castes, as they term them, the one called Ciawani, the other Waraweeti,[3] and those war one with another.

On the hithermost[4] part of the Orinoco, as at Toparimaca and Winicapora, those are of a nation called Nepoios, and are the followers of Carapana, lord of Emeria. Between Winicapora and the port of Morequito, which standeth in Aromaia, and all those in the valley of Amariocapana are called Orenoqueponi, and did obey Morequito and are now followers of Topiawari. Upon the river of Caroli are the Canuri, which are governed by a woman who is inheritrix[5] of that province; who came far off to see our nation, and asked me divers questions of her Majesty, being much delighted with the discourse of her Majesty's greatness, and wondering at such reports as we truly made of her Highness' many virtues. And upon the head of Caroli and on the lake of Cassipa are the three strong nations of the Cassipagotos. Right south into the land are the Capurepani and Emparepani, and beyond those, adjoining to Macureguarai, the first city of Inca, are the Iwarawakeri. All these are professed enemies to the Spaniards, and to the rich Epuremei also. To the west of Caroli are divers nations of Cannibals and of those Ewaipanoma without heads. Directly west are the Amapaias and Anebas, which are also marvellous rich in gold. The rest towards Peru we will omit. On the north of the Orinoco, between it and the West Indies, are the Wikiri, Saymi, and the rest before spoken of, all mortal enemies to the Spaniards. On the south side of the main mouth of the Orinoco are the Arawaks; and beyond them, the Cannibals; and to the south of them, the Amazons.

To make mention of the several beasts, birds, fishes, fruits, flowers, gums, sweet woods, and of their several religions and customs, would for the first require as many volumes as those of Gesnerus,[6] and for the next another bundle of Decades.[7] The religion of the Epuremei is the same which the Incas, emperors of Peru, used, which may be read in Cieza[1] and other Spanish stories; how they believe the immortality of the soul, worship the sun, and bury with them alive their best beloved wives and treasure, as they likewise do in Pegu[2] in the East Indies, and other places. The poni bury not their wives with them, but their jewels, hoping to enjoy them again. The Arawaks dry the bones of their lords, and their wives and friends drink them in powder. In the graves of the Peruvians the Spaniards found their greatest abundance of treasure. The like, also, is to be found among these people in every province. They have all many wives, and the lords five-fold to the common sort. Their wives never eat with their husbands, nor among the men, but serve their husbands at meals and afterwards feed by themselves. Those that are past their younger years make all their bread and drink, and work their cotton-beds, and do all else of service and labour; for the men do nothing but hunt, fish, play, and drink, when they are out of the wars.

[2] Berbeese Berbice River in eastern Guyana.

[3] Ciawani … Waraweeti Warao sub-groups, now called Siawani and Waraowitu.

[4] hithermost Nearest.

[5] inheritrix Female heiress.

[6] Gesnerus Conrad Gesner (1516–65), Swiss zoologist, author of Historia animalium (1551), a compilation of information, both ancient and contemporary, concerning animals.

[7] bundle of Decades Richard Eden's The Decades of the Newe World of West India (1555), was a translation of Pietro Martire d'Anghiera's De Orbe Novo (1511–30); the first printed book to use the name "America" is the anonymous Of the newe landes (1520).

I will enter no further into discourse of their manners, laws, and customs. And because I have not myself seen the cities of Inca I cannot avow on my credit what I have heard, although it be very likely that the emperor Inca hath built and erected as magnificent palaces in Guiana as his ancestors did in Peru; which were for their riches and rareness most marvellous, and exceeding all in Europe, and, I think, of the world, China excepted, which also the Spaniards, which I had, assured me to be true, as also the nations of the borderers, who, being but savages to those of the inland, do cause much treasure to be buried with them. For I was informed of one of the caciques of the valley of Amariocapana which had buried with him a little before our arrival a chair of gold most curiously wrought, which was made either in Macureguarai adjoining or in Manoa. But if we should have grieved them in their religion at the first, before they had been taught better, and have digged up their graves, we had lost them all. And therefore I held my first resolution, that her Majesty should either accept or refuse the enterprise before anything should be done that might in any sort hinder the same. And if Peru had so many heaps of gold, whereof those Incas were princes, and that they delighted so much therein, no doubt but this which now liveth and reigneth in Manoa hath the same humour,[3] and, I am assured, hath more abundance of gold within his territory than all Peru and the West Indies.

For the rest, which myself have seen, I will promise these things that follow, which I know to be true. Those that are desirous to discover and to see many nations may be satisfied within this river, which bringeth forth so many arms and branches leading to several countries and provinces, above 2,000 miles east and west and 800 miles south and north, and of these the most either rich in gold or in other merchandises. The common soldier shall here fight for gold, and pay himself, instead of pence, with plates of half-a-foot broad, whereas he breaketh his bones in other wars for provant[4] and penury. Those commanders and chieftains that shoot at honour and abundance shall find there more rich and beautiful cities, more temples adorned with golden images, more sepulchres[5] filled with treasure, than either Cortés[6] found in Mexico or Pizarro[7] in Peru. And the shining glory of this conquest will eclipse all those so far-extended beams of the Spanish nation. There is no country which yieldeth more pleasure to the inhabitants, either for those common delights of hunting, hawking, fishing, fowling, and the rest, than Guiana doth; it hath so many plains, clear rivers, and abundance of pheasants, partridges, quails, rails, cranes, herons, and all other fowl; deer of all sorts, porks, hares, lions, tigers, leopards, and divers other sorts of beasts, either for chase or food. It hath a kind of beast called cama or anta,[8] as big as an English beef, and in great plenty. To speak of the several sorts of every kind I fear would be troublesome to the reader, and therefore I will omit them, and conclude that both for health, good air, pleasure, and riches, I am resolved it cannot be equalled by any region either in the east or west. Moreover the country is so healthful, as of an hundred persons and more, which lay without shift most sluttishly, and were every day almost melted with heat in rowing and marching, and suddenly wet again with great showers, and did eat of all sorts of corrupt fruits, and made meals of fresh fish without seasoning, of tortugas,[1] of lagartos or crocodiles, and of all sorts good and bad, without either order or measure, and besides lodged in the open air every night, we lost not any one, nor had one ill-disposed to my knowledge; nor found any calentura[2] or other of those pestilent diseases which dwell in all hot regions, and so near the equinoctial line.

Where there is store of gold it is in effect needless to remember other commodities for trade. But it hath, towards the south part of the river, great quantities of brazil-wood,[3] and divers berries that dye a most perfect crimson and carnation; and for painting, all France, Italy, or the East Indies yield none such. For the more the skin is washed, the fairer the colour appeareth, and with which even those brown and tawny women spot themselves and colour their cheeks. All places yield abundance of cotton, of silk, of balsamum,[4] and of those kinds most excellent and never known in Europe, of all sorts of gums, of Indian pepper; and what else the countries may afford within the land we know not, neither had we time to abide the trial and search. The soil besides is so excellent and so full of rivers, as it will carry sugar, ginger, and all those other commodities which the West Indies have.

The navigation is short, for it may be sailed with an ordinary wind in six weeks, and in the like time back again; and by the way neither lee-shore,[5] enemies' coast, rocks, nor sands. All which in the voyages to the West Indies and all other places we are subject unto; as the channel of Bahama, coming from the West Indies, cannot well be passed in the winter, and when it is at the best, it is a perilous and a fearful place; the rest of the Indies for calms and diseases very troublesome, and the sea about the Bermudas a hellish sea for thunder, lightning, and storms.

This very year (1595) there were seventeen sail of Spanish ships lost in the channel of Bahama, and the great Philip, like to have sunk at the Bermudas, was put back to St. Juan de Puerto Rico; and so it falleth out in that navigation every year for the most part. Which in this voyage are not to be feared; for the time of year to leave England is best in July, and the summer in Guiana is in October, November, December, January, February, and March, and then the ships may depart thence in April, and so return again into England in June. So as they shall never be subject to winter weather, either coming, going, or staying there: which, for my part, I take to be one of the greatest comforts and encouragements that can be thought on, having, as I have done, tasted in this voyage by the West Indies so many calms, so much heat, such outrageous gusts, such weather, and contrary winds.

To conclude, Guiana is a country that hath yet her maidenhead,[6] never sacked, turned, nor wrought;[7] the face of the earth hath not been torn, nor the virtue and salt of the soil spent by manurance. The graves have not been opened for gold, the mines not broken with sledges, nor their images pulled down out of their temples. It hath never been entered by any army of strength, and never conquered or possessed by any Christian prince. It is besides so defensible, that if two forts be builded in one of the provinces which I have seen, the flood setteth in so near the bank, where the channel also lieth, that no ship can pass up but within a pike's length of the artillery, first of the one, and afterwards of the other. Which two forts will be a sufficient guard both to the empire of Inca, and to an hundred other several kingdoms, lying within the said river, even to the city of Quito in Peru.

There is therefore great difference between the easiness of the conquest of Guiana, and the defence of it being conquered, and the West or East Indies. Guiana hath but one entrance by the sea, if it hath that, for any vessels of burden. So as whosoever shall first possess it, it shall be found unaccessible for any enemy, except he come in wherries, barges, or canoes, or else in flat-bottomed boats; and if he do offer to enter it in that manner, the woods are so thick 200 miles together upon the rivers of such entrance, as a mouse cannot sit in a boat unhit from the bank. By land it is more impossible to approach; for it hath the strongest situation of any region under the sun, and it is so environed with impassable mountains on every side, as it is impossible to victual any company in the passage. Which hath been well proved by the Spanish nation, who since the conquest of Peru have never left five years free from attempting this empire, or discovering some way into it; and yet of three-and-twenty several gentlemen, knights, and noblemen, there was never any that knew which way to lead an army by land, or to conduct ships by sea, anything near the said country. Orellana,[1] of whom the river of the Amazon taketh name, was the first, and Don Antonio de Berreo, whom we displanted, the last: and I doubt much whether he himself or any of his yet know the best way into the said empire. It can therefore hardly be regained, if any strength be formerly set down, but in one or two places, and but two or three crumsters[2] or galleys built and furnished upon the river within. The West Indies have many ports, watering places, and landings; and nearer than 300 miles to Guiana, no man can harbour a ship, except he know one only place, which is not learned in haste, and which I will undertake there is not any one of my companies that knoweth, whosoever hearkened most after it.

Besides, by keeping one good fort, or building one town of strength, the whole empire is guarded; and whatsoever companies shall be afterwards planted within the land, although in twenty several provinces, those shall be able all to reunite themselves upon any occasion either by the way of one river, or be able to march by land without either wood, bog, or mountain. Whereas in the West Indies there are few towns or provinces that can succour or relieve one the other by land or sea. By land the countries are either desert, mountainous, or strong enemies. By sea, if any man invade to the eastward, those to the west cannot in many months turn against the breeze and eastern wind. Besides, the Spaniards are therein so dispersed as they are nowhere strong, but in Nueva Espana only; the sharp mountains, the thorns, and poisoned prickles, the sandy and deep ways in the valleys, the smothering heat and air, and want of water in other places are their only and best defence; which, because those nations that invade them are not victualled or provided to stay, neither have any place to friend adjoining, do serve them instead of good arms and great multitudes.

The West Indies were first offered her Majesty's grandfather[3] by Columbus, a stranger, in whom there might be doubt of deceit; and besides it was then thought incredible that there were such and so many lands and regions never written of before. This Empire is made known to her Majesty by her own vassal,[4] and by him that oweth to her more duty than an ordinary subject; so that it shall ill sort with the many graces and benefits which I have received to abuse her Highness, either with fables or imaginations. The country is already discovered, many nations won to her Majesty's love and obedience, and those Spaniards which have latest and longest laboured about the conquest, beaten out, discouraged, and disgraced, which among these nations were thought invincible. Her Majesty may in this enterprise employ all those soldiers and gentlemen that are younger brethren, and all captains and chieftains that want employment, and the charge will be only the first setting out in victualling and arming them; for after the first or second year I doubt not but to see in London a Contractation-House[5] of more receipt for Guiana than there is now in Seville for the West Indies.

And I am resolved that if there were but a small army afoot in Guiana, marching towards Manoa, the chief city of Inca, he would yield to her Majesty by composition so many hundred thousand pounds yearly as should both defend all enemies abroad, and defray all expenses at home; and that he would besides pay a garrison of three or four thousand soldiers very royally to defend him against other nations. For he cannot but know how his predecessors, yea, how his own great uncles, Guascar and Atabalipa,[1] sons to Guiana-Capac, emperor of Peru, were, while they contended for the empire, beaten out by the Spaniards, and that both of late years and ever since the said conquest, the Spaniards have sought the passages and entry of his country; and of their cruelties used to the borderers he cannot be ignorant. In which respects no doubt but he will be brought to tribute with great gladness; if not, he hath neither shot nor iron weapon in all his empire, and therefore may easily be conquered.

And I further remember that Berreo confessed to me and others, which I protest before the Majesty of God to be true, that there was found among the prophecies in Peru, at such time as the empire was reduced to the Spanish obedience, in their chiefest temples, amongst divers others which foreshadowed the loss of the said empire, that from Inglatierra[2] those Incas should be again in time to come restored, and delivered from the servitude of the said conquerors. And I hope, as we with these few hands have displanted the first garrison, and driven them out of the said country, so her Majesty will give order for the rest, and either defend it, and hold it as tributary,[3] or conquer and keep it as empress of the same. For whatsoever prince shall possess it, shall be greatest; and if the King of Spain enjoy it, he will become unresistible. Her Majesty hereby shall confirm and strengthen the opinions of all nations as touching her great and princely actions. And where the south border of Guiana reacheth to the dominion and empire of the Amazons, those women shall hereby hear the name of a virgin, which is not only able to defend her own territories and her neighbours, but also to invade and conquer so great empires and so far removed.

To speak more at this time I fear would be but troublesome: I trust in God, this being true, will suffice, and that he which is King of all Kings, and Lord of Lords, will put it into her heart which is Lady of Ladies to possess it. If not, I will judge those men worthy to be kings thereof, that by her grace and leave will undertake it of themselves.

Letter to His Wife[4]

original spelling

You shall now receive (my deare wife) my last words in these last lines. My love I send you that you may keep it when I am dead, and my councell that you may remember it when I am no more. I would not by my will present you with sorrowes (dear Besse) let them go to the grave with me and be buried in the dust. And seeing that it is not Gods will that I should see you any more in this life, beare it patiently, and with a heart like thy selfe.

First, I send you all the thankes which my heart can conceive, or my words can rehearse for your many travailes, and care taken for me, which though they have not taken effect as you wished, yet my debt to you is not the lesse: but I pay it I never shall in this world.

Secondly, I beseech you for the love you beare me living, do not hide your selfe many dayes, but by your travailes seeke to helpe your miserable fortunes and the right of your poor childe. Thy mourning cannot availe me, I am but dust.

Thirdly, you shall understand, that my land was conveyed bona fide[5] to my childe; the writings were drawne[6] at midsumer was twelve months, my honest cosen Brett can testify so much, and Dolberry too, can remember somewhat therein. And I trust my blood will quench their malice that have cruelly murthered me: and that they will not seek also to kill thee and thine with extreme poverty.

To what friend to direct thee I know not, for all mine have left me in the true time of tryall. And I perceive that my death was determined from the first day. Most sorry I am God knowes that being thus surprised with death I can leave you in no better estate. God is my witnesse I meant you all my office of wines or all that I could have purchased by selling it, halfe of my stuffe, and all my jewels, but some one for the boy, original spelling

Love God, and begin betimes to repose your selfe upon him, have travailed and wearied your thoughts over all sorts of worldly cogitations, you shall but sit downe by sorrowe in the end.

Teach your son also to love and feare God while he is yet young, that the feare of God may grow with him, and then God will be a husband to you, and a father to him; a husband and a father which cannot be taken from you.

Baily oweth me 200 pounds, and Adrian Gilbert 600. In Jersey I also have much owing me besides. The arrearages of the wines will pay my debts. And howsoever you do, solues sake,[1] pay all poore men. When I am gone, no doubt you shall be sought for my many, for the world thinkes that I was very rich. But take heed of the pretences of men, and their affections, for they last not but in honest and worthy men, and no greater misery can befall you in this life, than to become a prey, and afterwards to be despised. I speake not this (God knowes) to dissuade you from marriage, for it will be best for you, both in respect of the world and of God. As for me, I am no more yours, nor you mine, death hath cut us asunder: and God hath divided me from the world, and your from me.

Remember your poor childe for his father's sake, who chose you, and loved you in his happiest times. Get those letters (if it be possible) which I write to the Lords, wherein I sued for my life: God is my witnesse it was for you and yours that I desired life, but it is true that I disdained my self for begging of it: for know it (my deare wife) that your son is the son of a true man, and one who in his owne respect despiseth death and all his misshapen & ugly formes.

I cannot write much, God he knows how hardly I steale time while others sleep, and it is also time that I should separate my thoughts from the world. Begg my dead body which living was denied thee; and either lay it at Sherburne (and if the land continue) or in Exeter-Church, by my Father and Mother; I can say no more, time and death call me away.

The everlasting God, powerfull, infinite, and omnipotent God, That Almighty God, who is goodnesse it selfe, the true life and true light keep thee and thine: have mercy on me, and teach me to forgive my persecutors and false accusers, and send us to meet in his glorious Kingdome. My deare wife farewell. Blesse my poore boy. Pray for me, and let my good God hold you both in his arms.

OTHER LANDS, OTHER CULTURES

CONTEXTS

Trade and exploration eastward was a preoccupation of many in mid-sixteenth century England; the Muscovy Company was formed in 1555 for the purposes of trading with Russia, and Elizabeth I's Act for the Corporation of Merchant Adventurers for the Discovery of New Trades (1566) makes reference far more frequently to dealings with Russia and eastern Europe than it does to trade or exploration in other parts of the world. Among the most readable of the narratives of discovery in Hakluyt's Voyages are the accounts by Anthony Jenkinson of his various expeditions to Russia, central Asia, and Persia, excerpts from which are included here. Jenkinson's comments on the cultures of the "Mohammedans" may be of particular interest.

One of the most interesting and influential pieces of late sixteenth-century writing about distant cultures is the essay "Of Cannibals" by Michel de Montaigne. Montaigne's essay was prompted by published accounts of French travelers to Brazil, who had reported that some native peoples practiced cannibalism. The Montagne essay is accompanied here by relevant excerpts from Shakespeare's The Tempest.

The first permanent English settlement in North America was established at Annapolis Royal in what is now Nova Scotia, in 1605. Two years later the East India Company established a post on the west coast of India, and colonists landed in Virginia, on the east coast of America. The Virginia colony was central to English presence in North America, and certain episodes connected with its establishment—notably the story of John Smith and Pocahontas—remain a central part of American legend. The documents below present a variety of different points of view of the Virginia colony, including that of Pocahontas as she looked back on the events years later in London.

The portrayal of distant lands as forms of Paradise was a common theme in the literature of exploration—particularly when the intent was to interest potential settlers in leaving the British Isles. A striking example is Richard Whitbourne's A Discourse and Discovery of Newfoundland (1620), from which it would be impossible to divine that "the Rock" (as Newfoundland came to be known) is a place of bleak landscapes, poor farming conditions, and harsh winters. Robert Hayman's amusing poem on the same subject is not quite so disingenuous as to the "wild, savage" aspect of the land, but holds out the hope that "good husbandry" will make the place far more attractive.

Exploration and colonization continued to be carried out through Royal Charter following the Restoration, with the Royal Charter of the Hudson's Bay Company the most important case in point. Excerpts from the charter, which granted a variety of rights and privileges to the Governor and Company of Adventurers of England trading into Hudson Bay, are reprinted below.

The captivity narrative is coming to be recognized as an important sub-genre of English literature. Perhaps the best known of late seventeenth-century accounts of life in captivity is that of Mary Rowlandson, a Puritan English woman who spent several weeks among the Pequot Indians of Massachusetts in 1675.

from Sir John Hawkins, Account of His third voyage, in Richard Hakluyt's, Principal Navigations, Traffics, and Discoveries of the English Nation (1568)

Although English efforts to establish a substantial slave trade were not fully realized in the sixteenth century, English venturers did endeavor to make their mark as slave traders. Notable among them was Sir John Hawkins (1532–95); on his third voyage he traveled with Sir Francis Drake to West Africa, bought or captured several hundred slaves, which he then attempted to sell to Spanish colonizers in South America. In the end the mission was not a success with many of Hawkins' men lost to Spanish attacks, disease, and starvation.

The third troublesome voyage made with the Jesus of Lubeck, the Minion, and four other ships, to the parts of Guinea and the West Indies, in the years 1567 and 1568, by Master John Hawkins.

The ships departed from Plymouth, the second day of October, Anno 1567, and had reasonable weather until the seventh day. At which time, 40 leagues north from Cape Finisterre, there arose an extreme storm, which continued four days, in such sort, that the fleet was dispersed, and all our great boats lost; and the Jesus, our chief ship, in such case as not thought able to serve the voyage. Whereupon in the same storm we set our course homeward, determining to give over the voyage. But the 11th day of the same month, the wind changed, with fair weather; whereby we were animated to follow our enterprise, and so did, directing our course with the islands of the Canaries, where, according to an order before prescribed, all our ships before dispersed met at one of those islands, called Gomera, where we took water, and departed from thence the fourth day of November, towards the coast of Guinea, and arrived at Cape Verde, the 18th of November; where we landed 150 men, hoping to obtain some negroes, where we got but few, and those with great hurt and damage to our men, which chiefly proceeded of their envenomed arrows. And although in the beginning they seemed to be but small hurts, yet there hardly escaped any that had blood drawn of them, but died in strange sort,[1] with their mouths shut some ten days before they died, and after their wounds were whole;[2] where I myself had one of the greatest wounds, yet, thanks be to God, escaped.

From thence we passed the time upon the coast of Guinea, searching with all diligence the rivers from Rio Grande unto Sierra Leona, till the 12th of January; in which time we had not gotten together 150 negroes. Yet notwithstanding, the sickness of our men and the late time of the year commanded us away: and thus having nothing wherewith to seek the coast of the West Indies, I was with the rest of our company in consultation to go to the coast of the Mine,[3] hoping there to have obtained some gold for our wares, and thereby to have defrayed our charge. But even in that present instant, there came to us a negro, sent from a king, oppressed by other kings his neighbours, desiring our aid, with promise that as many negroes as by these wars might be obtained, as well of his part as of ours, should be at our pleasure. Whereupon we concluded to give aid, and sent 120 of our men, which the 15th of January assaulted a town of the negroes of our ally's adversaries, which had in it 8,000 inhabitants, being very strongly impaled and fenced after their manner. But it was so well defended, that our men prevailed not, but lost six men and 40 hurt: so that our men sent forthwith to me for more help. Whereupon, considering that the good success of this enterprise might highly further the commodity of our voyage, I went myself, and with the help of the king of our side, assaulted the town, both by land and sea, and very hardly with fire (their houses being covered with dry palm leaves); obtained the town; and put the inhabitants to flight. Where we took 250 persons, men, women, and children; and by our friend the king of our side, there were taken 600 prisoners, whereof we hoped to have had our choice. But the negro, in which nation is seldom or never found truth, meant nothing less: for that night he removed his camp and prisoners, so that we were fain to content us with those few which we had gotten ourselves.

[1] yet … sort I.e., almost all who were wounded died in a strange fashion.

[2] whole Healed.

[3] Mine Elmina. Situated on the south coast of Ghana, Elmina was an important provisioning site for ships.

Now had we obtained between 400 and 500 negroes, wherewith we thought it somewhat reasonable to seek the coast of the West Indies; and there, for our negroes, and other our merchandise, we hoped to obtain whereof to countervail our charges with some gains. Whereunto we proceeded with all diligence, furnished our watering, took fuel, and departed the coast of Guinea the third of February, continuing at the sea with a passage more hard than before hath been accustomed till the 27th day of March, which day we had sight of an island, called Dominica, upon the coast of the West Indies, in 14 degrees. From thence we coasted from place to place, making our traffic with the Spaniards as we might, somewhat hardly, because the king had straightly commanded all his governors in those parts by no means to suffer any trade to be made with us. Notwithstanding, we had reasonable trade, and courteous entertainment, from the isle of Margarita unto Cartagena, without anything greatly worth the noting, saving at Capo de la Vela, in a town called Rio de la Hacha, from whence come all the pearls. The Treasurer, who had the charge there, would by no means agree to any trade, or suffer us to take water. He had fortified his town with divers[1] bulwarks in all places where it might be entered, and furnished himself with 100 arquebusiers,[2] so that he thought by famine to have enforced to have put a-land our negroes. Of which purpose he had not greatly failed, unless we had by force entered the town; which, after we could by no means obtain his favour, we were enforced to do, and so with 200 men broke in upon their bulwarks, and entered the town with the loss only of two men of our parts, and no hurt done to the Spaniards, because after their volley of shot discharged, they all fled. Thus having the town, with some circumstance, as partly by the Spaniards' desire of negroes, and partly by friendship of the Treasurer, we obtained a secret trade: whereupon the Spaniards resorted to us by night, and bought of us to the number of 200 negroes. In all other places where we traded, the Spaniards' inhabitants were glad of us and traded willingly.

If all the miseries and troublesome affairs of this sorrowful voyage should be perfectly and thoroughly written, there should need a painful man with his pen, and as great a time as he had that wrote the lives and deaths of the martyrs.[3]

from Anthony Jenkinson, "The Voyage of Master Anthony Jenkinson, made from the city of Moscow in Russia, to the city of Boghar in Bactria, in the year 1558: written by himself to the Merchants of London of the Moscovy Company," as printed in Richard Hakluyt, Principal Navigations, Voyages, Traffics and Discoveries of the English Nation (1589–90)

The excerpts below chiefly concern various encounters with other peoples during Jenkinson's 1558 expedition to central Asia. The trip was not a great success in terms of opening up potential trading connections, and after Jenkinson's trip no other Englishman traveled to central Asia for more than 200 years.

The 23rd day of April, in the year 1558. (Having obtained the Emperor of Russia his letters, directed unto sundry kings and princes, by whose dominions I should pass) I departed from Moscow by water, having with me two of your servants, namely, Richard Johnson, and Robert Johnson, and a Tartar Tolmach, with diverse parcels of wares, as by the inventory appeareth: and the 28th day we came to a town called Collom, distant from Moscow 20 leagues, and passing one league beyond the said Collom, we came unto a river called Occa, into the which the river Moscow falleth, and loseth his name....

Thus proceeding on our journey the 25th day of May aforesaid, we came to another castle called Sabowshare, which we left on our right hand, distant from Vasiliagorod 16 leagues. The country hereabout is called Mordouits, and the habitants did profess the law of the Gentiles. But now, being conquered by this Emperor of Russia, most of them are christened, but lie in the woods and wilderness, without town or habitation....

[The river of Cama.]

Thus proceeding forward the 14th day, we passed by a goodly[1] river called Cama, which we left on our left hand. The river falleth out of the country of Permia into the river of Volga, and is from Cazan 15 leagues, and the country lying betwixt the said Cazan and the said river Cama on the left hand of Volga is called Vachen, and the inhabitants be Gentiles, and live in the wilderness without house or habitation. And the country on the other side of Volga over against the said river Cama is called the land of Cheremizes, half Gentiles, half Tartars, and all the land on the left hand of the said Volga from the said river unto Astracan, and so following the North and Northeast side of the Caspian sea, to a land of the Tartars called Turkemen, is called the country of Magnat or Nagay, whose inhabitants are of the law of Mahomet, and were all destroyed in the year 1558, at my being at Astracan, through civil wars among them, accompanied with famine, pestilence, and such plagues, in such sort that in the said year there were consumed of the people, in one sort and another, above one hundred thousand. The like plague was never seen in those parts, so that the said country of Nagay, being a country of great pasture, remaineth now unreplenished to the great contentation of the Russes,[2] who have had cruel wars a long time together.

The Nagayans, when they flourished, lived in this manner: they were divided into diverse companies called hordes, and every horde had a ruler, whom they obeyed as their king, and was called a Murse. Town or house they had none, but lived in the open fields, every Murse or King having his hordes or people about him, with their wives, children and cattle, who having consumed the pasture in one place, removed unto another; and when they remove they have houses like tents set upon wagons or carts, which are drawn from place to place with camels, and therein their wives, children, and all their riches, which is very little, is carried about, and every man hath at the least four or five wives, besides concubines. Use of money they have none, but do barter their cattle for apparel and other necessaries. They delight in no art nor science, except the wars, wherein they are expert, but for the most part they be pasturing people, and have great store of cattle, which is all their riches. They eat much flesh, and especially the horse, and they drink mare's milk, wherewith they be oftentimes drunk. They are seditious and inclined to theft and murder. Corn they sow not, neither do eat any bread, mocking the Christians for the same, and disabling our strengths, saying we live by eating the top of a weed, and drink a drink made out of the same, allowing their great devouring of flesh and drinking of milk to be the increase of their strength. But now to proceed forward to my journey.

[The Crimean Tartars.]

All the country upon our right hand the river Volga, from over against the river Cama, unto the town of Astracan, is the land of Crimme,[3] whose inhabitants be also of the law of Mahomet, and live for the most part according to the fashions of the Nagayes, having continual wars with the Emperor of Russia, and are valiant in the field, having countenance, and support from the great Turke....

The 14th day of July passing by an old castle, which was Old Astracan, and leaving it upon our right hand, we arrived at New Astracan, which this Emperor of Russia conquered six years past, in the year 1552. It is from the Moscow unto Astracan six hundred leagues, or thereabout. The town of Astracan is situated in an Island upon a hillside, having a castle within the same, walled about with earth and timber, neither fair nor strong: The town is also walled about with earth; the buildings and houses (except[4] it be the captain's lodging, and certain other gentlemen's) most base and simple. The island is most destitute and barren of wood and pasture, and the ground will bear no corn; the air is there most infected, by reason (as I suppose) of much fish, and specially sturgeon, by which only the inhabitants live, having great scarcity of flesh and bread. They hang up their fish in their streets and houses to dry for their provision, which causeth such abundance of flies to increase there, as the like was never seen in any land, to their great plague. And at my being at the said Astracan, there was a great famine and plague among the people, and specially among the Tartars called Nagayans, who the same time came thither in great numbers to render themselves to the Russes their enemies, and to seek succor at their hands, their country being destroyed, as I said before. But they were but ill entertained or relieved, for there died a great number of them for hunger, which lay all the island through in heaps dead and like to beasts unburied, very pitiful to behold. Many of them were also sold by the Russes, and the rest were banished from the island. At that time it had been an easy thing to have converted that wicked nation to the Christian faith, if the Russes themselves had been good Christians; but how should they shew compassion unto other nations, when they are not merciful unto their own? At my being there I could have bought many goodly Tartars' children, if I would have had a thousand, of their own fathers and mothers, to say a boy or a wench for a loaf of bread worth sixpence in England, but we had more need of victuals at that time then of any such merchandise....

[1] goodly Large.

[2] Russes Russians.

[4] except Unless.

This Astracan is the furthest hold that this Emperor of Russia has conquered of the Tartars towards the Caspian Sea, which he keepeth very strong, sending thither every year provision of men and victuals, and timber to build the castle.... There is a certain trade of merchandise there used, but as yet so small and beggarly, that it is not worth the making mention, and yet there come merchants thither from diverse places. The chiefest commodities that the Russes bring thither are red hides, red sheep's skins, wooden vessels, bridles, and saddles, knives, and other trifles, with corn, bacon, and other victuals. The Tartars bring thither diverse kinds of wares made of cotton wool, with diverse kinds of wrought silks: and they that come out of Persia, namely from Shamacki do bring sewing silk, which is the coarsest that they use in Russeland, Crasco, diverse kinds of pied silks for girdles, shirts of mail, bows, swords, and such like things; and some years corn, and walnuts, but all such things in such small quantity, the merchants being so beggarly and poor that bring the same, that it is not worth the writing, neither is there any hope of trade in all those parts worth the following....

[Urgence.]
The 14th day of the month we departed from this Castle of Sellizure, and the 16th of the same we arrived at a city called Urgence, where we paid custom as well for our own heads, as for our camels and horses.... This city or town of Urgence standeth in a plain ground, with walls of the earth, by estimation four miles about it. The buildings within it are also of earth, but ruined and out of good order: it hath one long street that is covered above, which is the place of their market. It hath been won and lost four times within seven years by civil wars, by means whereof there are but few merchants in it, and they very poor, and in all that town I could not sell about four. The chiefest commodities there sold are such wares as come from Boghar, and out of Persia, but in most small quantity not worth the writing.

[The country of Turkeman.]
All the land from the Caspian Sea to this City of Urgence is called the land of Turkeman, and is subject to the said Azim Can, and his brethren which be five in number, and one of them hath the name of the chief king called Can, but he is little obeyed saving in his own Dominion, and where he dwelleth: for every one will be King of his own portion, and one brother seeketh always to destroy another, having no natural love among them, by reason that they are begotten of diverse women, and commonly they are the children of slaves, either Christians or Gentiles, which the father doth keep as concubines, and every Can or Sultan hath at least four or five wives, besides young maidens and boys, living most viciously. And when there are wars betwixt these brethren (as they are seldom without), he that is overcome if he be not slain, flieth to the field with such company of men as will follow him, and there liveth in the wilderness resorting to watering places, and so robbeth and spoileth as many Caravans of Merchants and others as they be able to overcome, continuing in this sort his wicked life, until such time as he may get power and aid to invade some of his brethren again. From the Caspian Sea unto the Castle of Sellizure aforesaid, and all the countries about the said sea, the people live without town or habitation in the wild fields, removing from one place to another in great companies with their cattle, whereof they have great store, as camels, horses, and sheep both tame and wild. Their sheep are of great stature with great buttocks, weighing 60 or 80 pounds. There are many wild horses which the Tartars do many times kill with their hawks, and that in this order: the hawks are lured to seize upon the beasts' necks or heads, which with chafing of themselves and sore beating of the hawks are tired; then the hunter, following his game, doth slay the horse with his arrow or sword. In all this land there groweth no grass, but a certain brush or heath, whereon the cattle feeding become very fat.

The Tartars never ride without their bow, arrows, and sword, although it be on hawking, or at any other pleasure, and they are good archers both on horseback, and on foot also. These people have not the use of gold, silver, or any other coin, but when they lack apparel or other necessaries, they barter their cattle for the same. Bread they have none, for they neither till nor sow. They be great devourers of flesh, which they cut in small pieces, and eat it by handfuls most greedily, and especially the horseflesh. Their chiefest drink is mare's milk soured, as I have said before of the Nagayans, and they will be drunk with the same. They have no rivers nor places of water in this country, until you come to the aforesaid gulf, distant from the place of our landing 20 day's journey, except it be[1] in wells, the water whereof is saltish, and yet distant the one from the other two days' journey and more. They eat their meat upon the ground, sitting with their legs double under them, and so also when they pray. Art or science they have none, but live most idly, sitting round in great companies in the fields, devising, and talking most vainly....

> In keeping with his concept of "essays" (or "attempts"), Montaigne returned to this piece several times, publishing versions in 1580, 1588, and 1595. The first English translation, by John Florio, was published in 1603, and appears to have been quite influential in England; Shakespeare's The Tempest is the best known of the many works that were influenced by "Of Cannibals."

When King Pyrrhus invaded Italy,[2] having viewed and considered the order of the army the Romans sent out to meet him; "I know not," said he, "what kind of barbarians" (for so the Greeks called all other nations), "these may be; but the disposition of this army, that I see, has nothing of barbarism in it." As much said the Greeks of that which Flaminius[3] brought into their country; and Philip, beholding from an eminence the order and distribution of the Roman camp formed in his kingdom by Publius Sulpicius Galba,[4] spake to the same effect. By which it appears how cautious men ought to be of taking things upon trust from vulgar opinion, and that we are to judge by the eye of reason, and not from common report.

I long had a man in my house that lived ten or twelve years in the New World, discovered in these latter days, and in that part of it where Villegaignon landed,[5] which he called Antarctic France. This discovery of so vast a country seems to be of very great consideration. I cannot be sure that hereafter there may not be another, so many wiser men than we having been deceived in this. I am afraid our eyes are bigger than our bellies, and that we have more curiosity than capacity, for we grasp at all, but catch nothing but wind.

... I find that there is nothing barbarous and savage in this nation, by anything that I can gather, excepting, that everyone gives the title of barbarism to everything that is not in use in his own country. As, indeed, we have no other level of truth and reason, than the example and idea of the opinions and customs of the place wherein we live; there is always the perfect religion, there the perfect government, there the most exact and accomplished usage of all things. They are savages at the same rate that we say fruit are wild, which nature produces of herself and by her own ordinary progress, whereas in truth, we ought rather to call those wild, whose natures we have changed by our artifice, and diverted from the common order.

These nations then seem to me to be so far barbarous, as having received but very little form and fashion from art and human invention, and consequently to be not much remote from their original simplicity. The laws of nature, however, govern them still, not as yet much vitiated with any mixture of ours; but 'tis in such purity that I am sometimes troubled we were not sooner acquainted with these people, and that they were not discovered in those better times, when there were men much more able to judge of them than we are. I am sorry that Lycurgus[1] and Plato had no knowledge of them, for to my apprehension, what we now see in those nations does not only surpass all the pictures with which the poets have adorned the golden age, and all their inventions in feigning a happy state of man, but, moreover, the fancy and even the wish and desire of philosophy itself; so native and so pure a simplicity, as we by experience see to be in them, could never enter into their imagination, nor could they ever believe that human society could have been maintained with so little artifice and human patchwork....

This is a people amongst whom there is no commerce; no knowledge of letters; no science of numbers; no judges or politicians; no habit of service; no riches and no poverty; no contracts, no inheritance; no property; no employments, except those of leisure; no respect for authority except within the family; no clothing; no agriculture; no metal; no use of wheat or of wine. The very words that signify lying, treachery, dissimulation, avarice, envy, detraction, pardon, are all unknown. How far short do imaginary republics fall from such perfection!...

They have I know not what kind of priests and prophets, who very rarely present themselves to the people, having their abode in the mountains. At their arrival, there is a great feast, and solemn assembly of many villages. Each house, as I have described, makes a village, and they are about a French league distant from one another. This prophet declaims to them in public, exhorting them to virtue and their duty; but all their ethics are comprised in these two articles, resolution in war, and affection to their wives. He also prophesies to them events to come, and the issues they are to expect from their enterprises, and prompts them to or diverts them from war. But let him look to't; for if he fail in his divination, and anything happen otherwise than he has foretold, he is cut into a thousand pieces, if he be caught, and condemned for a false prophet. For that reason, if any of them has been mistaken, he is no more heard of....

They have continual war with the nations that live further within the mainland, beyond their mountains, to which they go naked, and without other arms than their bows and wooden swords, fashioned at one end like the heads of our javelins. The obstinacy of their battles is wonderful, and they never end without great effusion of blood: for as to running away, they know not what it is. Everyone for a trophy brings home the head of an enemy he has killed, which he fixes over the door of his house. After having a long time treated their prisoners very well, and given them all the regales they can think of, he to whom the prisoner belongs, invites a great assembly of his friends. They being come, he ties a rope to one of the arms of the prisoner, of which, at a distance, out of his reach, he holds the one end himself, and gives to the friend he loves best the other arm to hold after the same manner; which being done, they two, in the presence of all the assembly, despatch him with their swords. After that they roast him, eat him among them, and send some chops to their absent friends. They do not do this, as some think, for nourishment, as the Scythians anciently did, but as a representation of an extreme revenge, as will appear by this: that having observed the Portuguese, who were in league with their enemies, to inflict another sort of death upon any of them they took prisoners, which was to set them up to the girdle in the earth, to shoot at the remaining part till it was stuck full of arrows, and then to hang them, they thought those people of the other world (as being men who had sown the knowledge of a great many vices among their neighbors, and who were much greater masters in all sorts of mischief than they) did not exercise this sort of revenge without a meaning, and that it must needs be more painful than theirs, they began to leave their old way, and to follow this.

I am not sorry that we should here take notice of the barbarous horror of so cruel an action; but, seeing so clearly into their faults, we should not be so blind to our own. I conceive there is more barbarity in eating a man alive, than when he is dead; in tearing the body limb from limb by racks and torments while the person remains conscious; in roasting it by degrees; in causing it to be bitten and worried by dogs and swine (as we have not only read, but lately seen, not among inveterate and mortal enemies, but among neighbors and fellow citizens, and, which is worse, under color of piety and religion); than there is barbarity in roasting and eating a person after he is dead....

We may then call these people barbarous, in respect to the rules of reason, but not in respect to ourselves, who in all sorts of barbarity exceed them. Their wars are throughout noble and generous, and are fought for reasons as good as that human malady is capable of; having with them no other foundation than the urge to valour. Their disputes are not for the conquest of new lands, for those they already possess are sufficiently fruitful by nature to supply their needs in such abundance that they have no need to enlarge their borders. And they are, moreover, happy in this, that they wish for only so much as their natural necessities require; all beyond that is superfluous to them; men of the same age call one another generally brothers, those who are younger, children; and the old men are fathers to all. These leave to their heirs in common the full possession of goods, without any manner of division, or other title than what nature bestows upon her creatures, in bringing them into the world. If their neighbors pass over the mountains to assault them, and obtain a victory, all the victors gain by it is glory, and the advantage of having proved themselves the better in valor and virtue, for they never meddle with the goods of the conquered, but presently return into their own country, where they have no want of anything necessary, nor of this greatest of all goods, to know happily how to enjoy their condition and to be content....

from William Shakespeare, The Tempest (1612–13)

In Shakespeare's The Tempest, Alonzo, King of Naples and Antonio, Duke of Milan, together with others of their party, are shipwrecked on a mysterious island controlled by Prospero, a magician who turns out to be of royal Milanese blood as well. Also on the island is Caliban (whose name is an anagram of "cannibal"), a native of the island who has been enslaved by Prospero. Excerpts from two passages that draw on Montaigne are included below. In the first, Caliban and Prospero exchange words over the reality of Caliban's situation; in the second Gonzalo, "an honest old councillor," jests about an imagined ideal society as he banters with Antonio and Sebastian.

... PROSPERO. Thou poisonous slave, got° by the devil himself begotten
Upon thy wicked dam,° come forth! mother

(Enter Caliban.)

CALIBAN. As wicked dew as e'er my mother brushed
With raven's feather from unwholesome fen
Drop on you both! A southwest° blow on ye unhealthy wind
And blister you all o'er!
PROSPERO. For this, be sure, to-night thou shalt have cramps,
Side-stitches that shall pen thy breath up; urchins
Shall, forth at vast of night that they may work,
All exercise on thee;[1] thou shalt be pinched
As thick as honeycomb, each pinch more stinging
Than bees that made 'em.
CALIBAN. I must eat my dinner.

[1] urchins ... on thee Goblins shall go out in the dead of night to work evil on you.

This island's mine, by Sycorax my mother,
Which thou takest from me. When thou cam'st first,
Thou strok'st me and madest much of me, wouldst give me
Water with berries in't, and teach me how
To name the bigger light, and how the less,
That burn by day and night. And then I loved thee
And showed thee all the qualities° o' the isle, features
The fresh springs, brine-pits, barren place and fertile:
Cursed be I that did so! All the charms° spells
Of Sycorax, toads, beetles, bats, light on you!
For I am all the subjects[1] that you have,
Which first was mine own king: and here you stay° me keep
In this hard rock, whiles you do keep from me
The rest o' the island.
PROSPERO. Thou most lying slave,
Whom stripes° may move, not kindness! I have used thee, lashes
Filth as thou art, with human care, and lodged thee
In mine own cell, till thou didst seek to violate
The honour of my child.
CALIBAN. O ho, O ho! Would't had been done!
Thou didst prevent me; I had peopled else[2]
This isle with Calibans.
MIRANDA. Abhorrèd slave,
Which any print° of goodness wilt not take, imprint
Being capable of all ill! I pitied thee,
Took pains to make thee speak, taught thee each hour
One thing or other: when thou didst not, savage,
Know thine own meaning, but wouldst gabble like
A thing most brutish, I endowed thy purposes
With words[3] that made them known. But thy vile race,° nature
Though thou didst learn, had that in't which good natures
Could not abide to be with; therefore wast thou
Deservedly confined into this rock,
Who hadst deserved more than a prison.[4]
CALIBAN. You taught me language; and my profit on't
Is, I know how to curse. The red plague rid° you get rid of
For learning me your language!
PROSPERO. Hag-seed, hence!
Fetch us in fuel; and be quick, thou'rt best,[5]
To answer other business. Shrug'st thou, malice?
If thou neglect'st or dost unwillingly
What I command, I'll rack thee with old cramps,
Fill all thy bones with aches, make thee roar
That beasts shall tremble at thy din.
CALIBAN. No, pray thee.
(Aside.) I must obey: His art is of such power,
It would control my dam's god, Setebos,[6]
And make a vassal° of him. servant, slave
PROSPERO. So, slave, hence!

(Exit Caliban.)...

from ACT 2, SCENE 1

... GONZOLO. Had I plantation of this isle,[7] my lord—
ANTONIO. (To Sebastian.) He'd sow't with nettle-seed.
SEBASTIAN. Or docks, or mallows.[8]
GONZOLO. And were I th'king on't, what would I do?
SEBASTIAN. 'Scape being drunk for want of wine.[9]
GONZOLO. I' the commonwealth I would by contraries
Execute all things;[10] for no kind of traffic° trade
Would I admit; no name of magistrate;
Letters ° should not be known; riches, poverty learning
And use of service,° none; contract, succession,° servants inheritance
Bourn,° bound of land, tilth,° vineyard, none; borders / tilled land
No use of metal, corn,° or wine, or oil; grain
No occupation; all men idle, all;

[1] all the subjects The only subject.

[2] had peopled else Would otherwise have populated.

[3] endowed thy purposes With words I was able to express what you meant in words.

[4] Abhorrèd slave ... a prison These lines have frequently been assigned by editors to Prospero rather than to his daughter.

[5] thou'rt best You would be best advised.

[6] Setebos God of a South American native people.

[7] Had I plantation of this isle Were I able to colonize this island.

[8] docks Coarse wildflowers; mallows Wildflowers typically found in waste places.

[9] 'Scape being drunk ... wine Escape drunkenness only because you would lack wine.

[10] I would ... all things I would have everything done in the opposite way from the way it is.

And women too, but innocent and pure;
No sovereignty—
SEBASTIAN. Yet he would be king on't.
ANTONIO. The latter end of his commonwealth forgets the beginning.
GONZOLO. All things in common nature should produce
Without sweat or endeavour: treason, felony,
Sword, pike,° knife, gun, or need of any engine,° pikestaff weapon
Would I not have; but nature should bring forth,
Of its own kind, all foison,° all abundance, plenty
To feed my innocent people.
SEBASTIAN. No marrying 'mong his subjects?
ANTONIO. None, man, all idle: whores and knaves.
GONZOLO. I would with such perfection govern, sir,
T' excel the golden age.[1]
SEBASTIAN. God save his majesty!
ANTONIO. Long live Gonzolo!
GONZOLO. And,—do you mark° me, sir? pay attention to
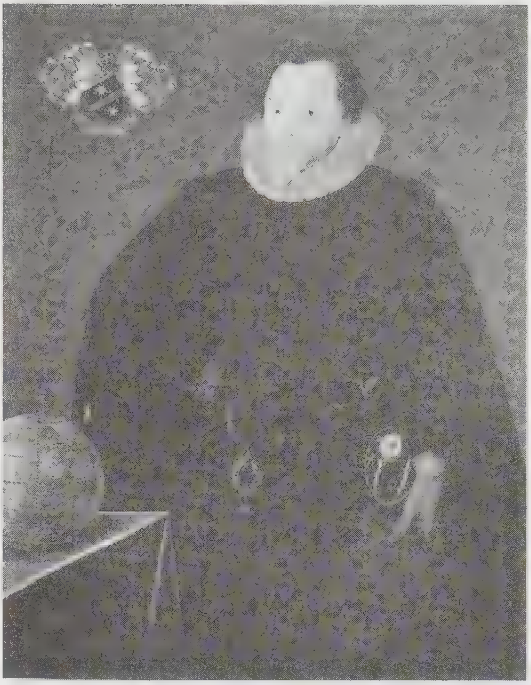
ALONZO. Prithee, no more: thou dost talk nothing to me.

GONZOLO. I do well believe your highness; and did it to minister occasion[2] to these gentlemen, who are of such sensible and nimble[3] lungs that they always use to laugh at nothing.

ANTONIO. 'Twas you we laughed at.

GONZOLO. Who in this kind of merry fooling am nothing to you: so you may continue and laugh at nothing still. …

Elizabethan Adventurers



Sir Francis Drake (1542–96). Drake first took to sea with his cousin, Sir John Hawkins, in the 1560s, on Hawkins's pirating and slave trading voyages. His ship and that of Hawkins were the only English vessels to escape when the Spanish caught an English fleet by surprise at San Juan de Ulua in 1568. In the 1570s Drake became England's most successful sea-pirate, capturing vast hoards of treasure for himself and for his sovereign. From 1577–81 he circumnavigated the globe (becoming the first Englishman to do so) and his ships again returned laden with stolen treasure. At the Queen's behest, he raided several Spanish settlements in the Caribbean in the 1580s. In the battle against the Spanish Armada in 1588 he was Vice-Admiral of the fleet, captaining the Revenge. Both he and Hawkins died during an ill-fated 1595–96 voyage to South America.

[1] T' excel the golden age I would govern so well that my rule would excel the Golden Age of the world, i.e., the first and best age of the world, according to the Greek and Roman poets.

[3] sensible and nimble Easily affected by the urge to laugh.

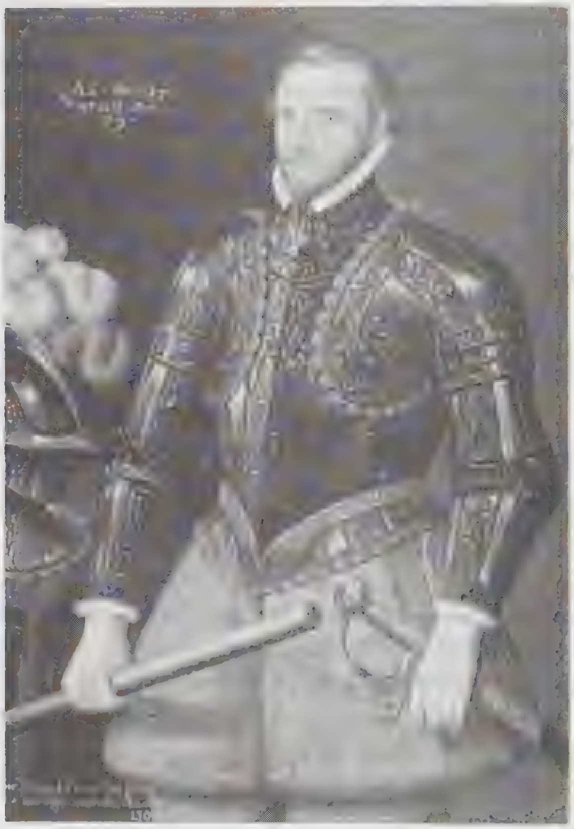
Sir Martin Frobisher (1535–94). A seaman from an early age, Frobisher was captured by a native chief in Guinea at age 18. He spent much of his twenties and thirties engaged in piracy against Spanish ships. In 1576 he sailed in search of the Northwest Passage; he returned with samples of ore that he believed contained gold, and with optimistic reports suggesting that the body of Arctic water he had discovered (now known as Frobisher Bay) might lead to the Orient. He formed the Cathay Company and made two other North American voyages (during which he claimed Labrador for the English), but the ore was not gold and Frobisher Bay did not lead to Cathay. Frobisher took up piracy again in the 1580s (including on one very successful voyage with Drake in 1586), and was Captain of the Triumph in the battle against the Spanish Armada in 1588. He died of wounds suffered during a battle with the French as he was attempting to facilitate the emigration of French Protestants (Huguenots).



Sir Richard Grenville (1541–91). An experienced and headstrong sailor, Grenville also fought in Ireland against rebel forces, and was for a time a Member of Parliament. In 1591 he commanded The Revenge in an action against the Spaniards off the Azores in 1591. The ship was one of a squadron that sought (with the blessing of Queen Elizabeth) to intercept Spanish ships returning from the West Indies laden with treasure. On this occasion the English were outnumbered; Grenville died when his ship was lost.

Sir John Hawkins (c. 1532–95). The most enduring of Elizabeth's pirates, Hawkins made a name for himself in the 1560s, both by attacking Spanish ships and stealing the treasure they were carrying, and by initiating the trade in African slaves. In the 1570s he became a shipbuilder and treasurer of the Navy, and in the 1580s played a key role in rebuilding the English fleet with smaller, more maneuverable ships. Hawkins was Rear-Admiral of the fleet during the victory over the Spanish Armada. He died aboard ship in 1595, on a voyage to South America with his cousin and old friend Sir Francis Drake.

The English in Virginia, the Powhatans in London

Perhaps the most significant English colonization initiatives of the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries were those involving the territory that had been named "Virginia" in honor of the virgin queen, Elizabeth. Arthur Barlow, together with Philip Amadas, was commissioned in 1585 by Sir Walter Ralegh to explore the territory in order to ascertain the prospects for settlement. Barlow's account of that voyage is excerpted below; it provided a range of interesting comments on the native peoples of the territory, as well as an optimistic assessment of the chances English settlers would have of flourishing in these environs. The first effort at settlement began the next year at Roanoke, but ended badly, with all the settlers either dead or unaccounted for.

In 1606 efforts for settlement were renewed when the Virginia Company was established as a joint stock company under the auspices of James I with a new mandate to colonize "Virginia"—defined as all the territory between Florida and Massachusetts, together with the Bermuda Islands. As may be inferred from the tone of Drayton's poem "To the Virginian Voyage," the endeavor was attended by considerable fanfare—and this time the colonization effort succeeded, albeit with enormous hardship, as Captain John Smith recorded in his History of Virginia and the Summer Isles (1623). Smith himself was at the center of the most famous incident of the colony's early history, in which his life was reportedly saved by a young native woman, Pocahontas.[1] He was then released, on the understanding that he and the colony would relocate from their initial settlement place, Jamestown, to a location known as Tsenacommacah, and would turn over to the Powhatans "two great guns, and a grindstone." The English colonists did neither of those things, and hostilities commenced that ended only many years later with the forced subjugation of the Native peoples of the territory. During this period, however, there were frequently times of guarded friendliness between the Jamestown colony and Powhatans—as, for example, the 1609 feast described below at which Smith and Chief Powhatan discuss the English intentions in America.

Pocahontas herself became a captive of the English in 1613. While being held by them, she met John Rolfe, the farmer who had introduced the Caribbean variety of tobacco to the colony (which eventually became its staple crop). The two fell in love and in 1614 were married; Rolfe's letter to Sir Thomas Dale (excerpted below) describes the effect of the marriage on the community, while rejecting any suggestion that he entered into matrimony for primarily lustful motives. In 1616 Rolfe and his wife sailed for England in a party that included Uttamatomakkin, a Powhatan councilor who had been instructed by his chief to report on the number and condition of the English people, as well as on the whereabouts of John Smith (who had himself left Virginia for England in 1609). For a time they all moved in high circles of London society (among those Pocahontas met were the Bishop of London and Ben Jonson, and Uttamatomakkin is known to have met King James). Smith's description of meeting Pocahontas again is included below. Pocahontas became seriously ill in England, however; she died shortly after she and Rolfe sailed again for Virginia in 1617, and was buried in Gravesend, just east of London.

[1] Smith himself… Pocahontas Beginning in the nineteenth century there have been various suggestions that Smith might have invented key parts of this story. Most present-day historians accept that Smith's story is not completely invented—but the degree to which Smith was in danger is unclear. As historians such as Frederic Gleach have pointed out, the events as described by Smith are entirely consistent with the ceremonial sequence of many Native adoption rituals; the Powhatans may have intended the extraordinary (to European eyes) sequence as a ceremonial adoption of Smith and of the English colony as a whole.

from Arthur Barlow, "The first voyage made to the coasts of America, with two barks,[1] wherein were Captains M. Philip Amadas, and M. Arthur Barlow, who discovered part of the country now called Virginia, Anno[2] 1584. Written by one of the said Captains, and sent to Sir Walter Raleigh, Knight, at whose charge and direction the said voyage was set forth" (1584)

The second of July, we found shoal water, where we smelled so sweet, and so strong a smell, as if we had been in the midst of some delicate garden abounding with all kind of odoriferous flowers, by which we were assured, that the land could not be far distant; and keeping good watch, and bearing but slack sail, the fourth of the same month we arrived upon the coast, which we supposed to be a continent and firm land, and we sailed along the same a hundred and twenty English miles before we could find any entrance, or river issuing into the sea. The first that appeared unto us, we entered, though not without some difficulty, and cast anchor about three harquebus-shot[3] within the haven's mouth, on the left hand of the same. And after thanks given to God for our safe arrival thither, we manned our boats, and went to view the land next adjoining, and to take possession of the same, in the right of the Queen's most excellent Majesty, as rightful Queen, and Princess of the same, and after delivered the same over to your use, according to her Majesty's grant, and letters patents, under her Highness's great seal. Which being performed, according to the ceremonies used in such enterprises, we viewed the land about us, being, whereas we first landed, very sandy and low towards the water's side, but so full of grapes, as the very beating and surge of the sea overflowed them, of which we found such plenty, as well there as in all places else, both on the sand and on the green soil on the hills, as in the plains, as well on every little shrub, as also climbing towards the tops of high cedars, that I think in all the world the like abundance is not to be found....

This island had many goodly woods full of deer, hares, and fowl, even in the midst of summer in incredible abundance. The woods are not such as you find in Bohemia, Muscovia, or Hercynia, barren and fruitless, but rather having the highest and reddest cedars[4] of the world, far bettering the cedars of the Azores, of the Indies.... We remained by the side of this island two whole days before we saw any people of the country: the third day we spied one small boat rowing towards us having in it three persons....

The next day there came unto us diverse boats, and in one of them the King's brother, accompanied with forty or fifty men, very handsome and goodly people, and in their behaviour as mannerly and civil as any of Europe. His name was Granganimeo, and the King is called Wingina, the country Wingandacoa, and now by her Majesty Virginia. The manner of his coming was in this sort: he left his boats altogether as the first man did a little from the ships by the shore, and came along to the place over against the ships, followed with forty men. When he came to the place, his servants spread a long mat upon the ground, on which he sat down, and at the other end of the mat four others of his company did the like, the rest of his men stood round about him, somewhat afar off. When we came to the shore to him with our weapons, he never moved from his place, nor any of the other four, nor never mistrusted any harm to be offered from us, but sitting still he beckoned us to come and sit by him, which we performed; and being set he made all signs of joy and welcome, striking on his head and his breast and afterwards on ours, to show we were all one, smiling and making show the best he could of all love, and familiarity. After he had made a long speech unto us, we presented him with diverse things, which he received very joyfully, and thankfully. None of the company dared speak one word all the time; only the four which were at the other end, spoke one in the other's ear very softly....

[2] Anno Latin: In the year.

[3] harquebus-shot The distance a harquebus, an early portable gun, could fire.

We exchanged our tin dish for twenty skins, worth twenty crowns,... and a copper kettle for fifty skins worth fifty crowns. They offered us good exchange for our hatchets, and axes, and for knives, and would have given anything for swords, but we would not part with any. After two or three days the King's brother came aboard the ships, and drank wine, and ate of our meat and of our bread, and liked exceedingly thereof; and after a few days overpassed, he brought his wife with him to the ships, his daughter and two or three children. His wife was very well favoured, of mean stature and very bashful; she had on her back a long cloak of leather, with the fur side next to her body, and before her a piece of the same. About her forehead she had a band of white coral, and so had her husband many times. In her ears she had bracelets of pearls hanging down to her middle (whereof we delivered your worship a little bracelet), and those were of the bigness of good peas. The rest of her women of the better sort had pendants of copper hanging in either ear, and some of the children of the King's brother and other noblemen, have five or six in either ear. He himself had upon his head a broad plate of gold or copper for being unpolished we knew not what metal it should be, neither would he by any means suffer[1] us to take it off his head, but feeling it, would bow very easily. His apparel was as that of his wives, only the women wear their hair long on both sides, and the men but on one. They are of colour yellowish, and their hair black for the most part, and yet we saw children that had very fine auburn and chestnut coloured hair.

After that these women had been there, there came down from all parts great store of people, bringing with them leather, coral, diverse kinds of dyes very excellent, and exchanged with us. But when Granganimeo the King's brother was present, none dared trade but himself except such as wear red pieces of copper on their heads like himself; for that is the difference between the noblemen and the governors of the countries, and you have understood since by these men, which we brought home, that no people in the world carry more respect to their King, nobility, and governors, than these do. The King's brother's wife, when she came to us (as she did many times) was followed with forty or fifty women always; and when she came into the ship, she left them all on land, saving[2] her two daughters, her nurse, and one or two more. The King's brother always kept this order, as many boats as he would come withal to the ships, so many fires would he make on the shore afar off, to the end[3] we might understand with what strength and company he approached. Their boats are made of one tree, either of pine or of pitch trees, a wood not commonly known to our people, nor found growing in England. They have no edge-tools to make them withal; if they have any they are very few, and those it seems they had twenty years since, which, as those two men declared, was out of a wreck which happened upon their coast of some Christian ship, being beaten that way by some storm and outrageous weather, whereof none of the people were saved, but only the ship, or some part of her being cast upon the sand, out of whose sides they drew the nails and the spikes, and with those they made their best instruments. The manner of making their boats is thus: they burn down some great tree, or take such as are wind fallen, and putting gum and rosin upon one side thereof, they set fire into it, and when it had burnt it hollow, they cut out the coal with their shells, and ever where they would burn it deeper or wider they lay on gums, which burn away the timber, and by these means they fashion very fine boats, and such as will transport twenty men. Their oars are like scoops, and many times they set with long poles, as the depth serveth....

After they had been diverse times aboard our ships, myself, with seven more, went twenty miles into the river that runs toward the city of Skicoak, which river they call Occam; and the evening following, we came to an island, which they call Roanoke, distant from the harbour by which we entered, seven leagues; and at the north end thereof was a village of nine houses, built of cedar, and fortified round about with sharp trees, to keep out their enemies, and the entrance into it made like a turnpike very artificially;[1] when we came towards it, standing near unto the water's side, the wife of Granganimo, the King's brother, came running out to meet us very cheerfully and friendly. Her husband was not then in the village; some of her people she commanded to draw our boat on shore…; others she appointed to carry us on their backs to the dry ground, and others to bring our oars into the house for fear of stealing. When we were come into the other room, having five rooms in her house, she caused us to sit down by a great fire, and after took off our clothes and washed them, and dried them again. Some of the women plucked off our stockings and washed them, some washed our feet in warm water, and she herself took great pains to see all things ordered in the best manner she could, making great haste to dress some meat for us to eat.

[1] suffer Allow.

After we had thus dried ourselves, she brought us into the inner room, where she set on the board standing along the house, some venison, and roasted fish … and melons raw, and sodden roots of diverse kinds. Their drink is commonly water, but while the grape lasts, they drink wine, and for want of casks to keep it, all the year after they drink water, but it is sodden with ginger in it, and black cinnamon, and sometimes sassafras, and diverse other wholesome and medicinable herbs and trees. We were entertained with all love and kindness, and with as much bounty (after their manner) as they could possibly devise. We found the people most gentle, loving, and faithful, void of all guile and treason, and such as live after the manner of the golden age. The people only care how to defend themselves from the cold in their short winter, and to feed themselves with such meat as the soil affords.…

Within the place where they feed was their lodging, and within that their Idol, which they worship, of whom they speak incredible things. While we were at meat, there came in at the gates two or three men with their bows and arrows from hunting, whom when we spied, we began to look one towards another, and offered to reach our weapons; but as soon as the wife of Granganimo, the King's brother spied our mistrust, she was very much moved, and caused some of her men to run out, and take away their bows and arrows and break them, and withal beat the poor fellows out of the gate again. When we departed in the evening and would not tarry all night, she was very sorry, and gave us into our boat our supper half dressed, pots and all, and brought us to our boatside, in which we lay all night, removing the same a pretty distance from the shore. She perceiving our situation was much grieved, and sent diverse men and thirty women to sit all night on the bank side by us, and sent us into our boats five mats to cover us from the rain, using very many words to entreat us to rest in their houses. But because we were few men, and if we had miscarried, the voyage had been in very great danger, we dared not adventure[2] anything, though there was no cause of doubt; for a more kind and loving people there can not be found in the world, as far as we have hitherto had trial.

Michael Drayton, "To the Virginian Voyage" (1606)

You brave heroic minds,
Worthy your country's name,
That honour still pursue,
Go, and subdue,
Whilst loit'ring hinds[3]
Lurk here at home, with shame.

Britons, you stay too long,
Quickly aboard bestow you,
And with a merry gale
Swell your stretch'd sail,
With vows as strong,
As the winds that blow you.

Your course securely steer,
West and by south forth keep,
Rocks, lee shores, nor shoals,

So absolute the deep.[2]

And cheerfully at sea,
Success you still entice,
To get the pearl and gold,
And ours to hold,

Earth's only paradise.

Where nature hath in store,
Fowl, venison, and fish,
And the fruitfull'st soil,
Without your toil,
Three harvests more,
All greater then you wish.

And the ambitious vine
Crowns with his purple mass,
The Cedar reaching high
To kiss the sky,
The Cypress, pine
And useful Sassafras.[3]

To whose, the golden age
Still nature's laws doth give,
No other cares that tend,
But them to defend
From winter's age,
That long there doth not live.

Of that delicious land,
Above the seas that flows,
The clear wind throws,
Your hearts to swell
Approaching the dear strand.° coast

In kenning° of the shore seeing
(Thanks to God first given,)
O you the happy'st men,
Be frolic then,
Let cannons roar,
Frighting the wide heaven.

And in regions far
Such heroes bring ye forth,
As those from whom we came,
And plant our name,
Under that star
Not known unto our north.

And as there plenty grows
Of laurel everywhere,
Apollo's sacred tree,[4]
You it may see,
A poet's brows
To crown, that may sing there.

Thy voyages attend,
Industrious Hakluyt,[5]
Whose reading shall inflame
Men to seek fame,
And much commend
To after-times thy wit.° intelligence, far-sightedness

from John Smith, General History of Virginia and the Summer Isles (1623)

Throughout his history of the colony, Smith writes of all individuals, including himself, in the third person. His use of direct speech for the words of Chief Powhatan has excited considerable discussion; it is known that Smith did learn to speak the language, but the extent to which Smith may be a mediating voice in the speeches of Powhatan is impossible to establish. (See also the Smith and Powhatan materials in the online component of this anthology.)

[5] Industrious Hakluyt Richard Hakluyt (c. 1552/3–1616), compiler of a widely read collection of accounts of English voyages of discovery, was also one of the investors in the 1606 Virginian voyage.

And now [in December 1607], the winter approaching, the rivers became so covered with swans, geese, ducks, and cranes, that we daily feasted with good bread, Virginia peas, pumpkins, … fish, fowl, and diverse sorts of wild beasts as fat as we could eat them; so that none of our tuftaffaty[1] humorists desired to go for England.…

But our comedies never endured long without a tragedy [while Captain Smith was in search of the head of the Chickahamania River], when his barge could pass no farther, he left her in a broad bay out of danger of shot, commanding none should go ashore till his return. Himself with two English and two savages went up higher in a canoe; but he was not long absent but his men went ashore, whose want of government gave both occasion and opportunity to the savages to surprise one George Cassen, whom they slew, and much failed not to have cut off the boat and all the rest.

Smith, little dreaming of that accident, being got to the marshes at the river's head,… finding he was beset with 200 savages, two of them he slew, still defending himself with the aid of a savage his guide, whom he bound to his arm with his garters, and used him as a buckler,[2] yet he was shot in his thigh a little, and had many arrows that stuck in his clothes; but no great hurt, till at last they took him prisoner. When this news came to Jamestown, much was their sorrow for his loss, few expecting what ensued.

Six or seven weeks those barbarians kept him prisoner, many strange triumphs and conjurations[3] they made of him, yet he so demeaned[4] himself amongst them, as he not only diverted them from surprising the fort but procured his own liberty, and got himself and his company such estimation amongst them that those savages admired him more than their own Quiyouckosucks.

He demanding for their captain, they showed him Opechankanough, King of Pamaunkee, to whom he gave a round ivory double compass dial. Much they marveled at the playing of the fly and needle, which they could see so plainly and yet not touch it because of the glass that covered them. But when he demonstrated by that globe-like jewel the roundness of the earth and skies, the sphere of the sun, moon, and stars, and how the sun did chase the night round about the world continually; the greatness of the land and sea, the diversity of nations, variety of complexions, and how we were to them antipodes, and many other such like matters, they all stood as amazed with admiration. Notwithstanding, within an hour after they tied him to a tree, and as many as could stand about him prepared to shoot him; but the King, holding up the compass in his hand, they all laid down their bows and arrows, and in a triumphant manner led him to Orapaks, where he was after their manner kindly feasted, and well used.[5]

At last they brought him to Werowocomoco, where was Powhatan, their emperor. Here more than two hundred of those grim courtiers stood wondering at him, as[6] he had been a monster, till Powhatan and his train had put themselves in their greatest braveries.[7] Before a fire, upon a seat like a bedstead, he sat covered with a great robe, made of raccoon skins, and all the tails hanging by. On either hand did sit a young wench[8] of sixteen or eighteen years, and along on each side the house, two rows of men, and behind them as many women, with all their heads and shoulders painted red, many of their heads bedecked with the white down of birds, but every one with something, and a great chain of white beads about their necks. At his entrance before the King, all the people gave a great shout. The Queen of Appamatuck was appointed to bring him water to wash his hands, and another brought him a bunch of feathers, instead of a towel to dry them. Having feasted him after the best barbarous manner they could, a long consultation was held, but the conclusion was, two great stones were brought before Powhatan. Then as many as could laid hands on him dragged him to them, and thereon laid his head, and being ready with their clubs to beat out his brains, Pocahontas, the King's dearest daughter, when no entreaty could prevail, got his head in her arms, and laid her own upon his to save his from death: whereat the Emperor was contented he should live to make him hatchets, and her bells, beads, and copper; for they thought him as well of all occupations as themselves. For the King himself will make his own robes, shoes, bows, arrows, pots; plant, hunt, or do anything so well as the rest.

Two days after, Powhatan having disguised himself in the most fearfulest manner he could, caused Captain Smith to be brought forth to a great house in the woods, and there upon a mat by the fire to be left alone. Not long after, from behind a mat that divided the house was made the most dolefullest[1] noise he ever heard; then Powhatan, more like a devil than a man, with some two hundred more as black as himself, came unto him and told him now they were friends, and presently he should go to Jamestown, to send him two great guns, and a grindstone, for which he would give him the county of Capahowosick, and for ever esteem him as his son Nantaquoud....

The next day [13 January, 1609], having feasted us after his ordinary manner, Chief Powhatan began to ask us when we would be gone, feigning he sent not for us, neither had he any corn, and his people much less—yet for forty swords he would procure us forty baskets. The president of the Jamestown colony, showing him the men there present that brought him the message and conditions, asked Powhatan how it chanced he became so forgetful. Thereat the King concluded the matter with a merry laughter, asking for our commodities. But none he liked without guns and swords, valuing a basket of corn more precious than a basket of copper, saying he could rate his corn but not the copper.

Captain Smith, seeing the intent of this subtle[2] savage, began to deal with him after this manner: "Powhatan, though I had many courses to have made my provision, yet believing your promises to supply my wants, I neglected all to satisfy your desire. And to testify my love, I send you my men for your building, neglecting mine own. What your people had you have engrossed, forbidding them our trade; and now you think by consuming the time we shall consume for want, not having to fulfill your strange demands. As for swords and guns, I told you long ago I had none to spare. And you must know those I have can keep me from want. Yet steal or wrong you I will not, nor dissolve that friendship we have mutually promised, except you constrain me by our bad usage."[3]

The King, having attentively listened to this discourse, promised that both he and his country would spare him what he could, the which within two days they should receive.

"Yet Captain Smith," saith the King, "some doubt I have of your coming hither that makes me not so kindly seek to relieve you as I would. For many do inform me your coming hither is not for trade but to invade my people and possess my country, who dare not come to bring you corn, seeing you thus armed with your men. To free us of this fear, leave aboard your weapons, for here they are needless, we being all friends and forever Powhatans."

With many such discourses they spent the day, quartering that night in the King's houses....

The bruit[1] of this proposed marriage came soon to Powhatan's knowledge, a thing acceptable to him, as appeared by his sudden consent thereunto, who some ten days after sent an old uncle of hers, named Opachisco, to give her as his deputy in the Church, and two of his sons to see the marriage solemnized, which was accordingly done about the fifth of April, and ever since we have had friendly commerce and trade, not only with Powhatan himself, but also with his subjects round about us; so as now I see no reason why the colony should not thrive apace....

Now if the vulgar sort, who square all men's actions by the base rule of their own filthiness, shall tax or taunt me in this my godly labour; let them know, it is not any hungry appetite, to gorge myself with incontinency;[2] sure (if I would, and were so sensually inclined) I might satisfy such desire, though not without a seared conscience, yet with Christians more pleasing to the eye, and less fearful in the offence unlawfully committed. Nor am I in so desperate an estate that I regard not what becometh of me; nor am I out of hope but one day to see my country, nor so void of friends, nor mean in birth, but there to obtain a match to my great content; nor have I ignorantly passed over my hopes there, or regardlessly seek to lose the love of my friends, by taking this course: I know them all, and have not rashly overslipped any....

from John Smith, General History of Virginia and the Summer Isles (1623)

Hearing that Pocahontas was at Branford with diverse of my friends, I went to see her. After a modest salutation, without any word, she turned about, obscured her face, as not seeming well contented; and in that humour her husband, with diverse others, we all left her two or three hours, repenting myself to have writ she could speak English. But not long after, she began to talk, and remembered me well what courtesies she had done, saying, "you did promise Powhatan what was yours should be his, and he the like to you; you called him father being in his land a stranger, and by the same reason so must I do you;" which though I would have excused, I durst not allow of that title, because she was a King's daughter. With a well-set countenance she said, "were you not afraid to come into my father's country, and did you not cause fear in him and all his people (but me); and fear you here that I should call you father. I tell you then I will, and you shall call me child, and so I will be for ever and ever your countryman. They did tell us always you were dead, and I knew no other till I came to Plymouth; yet Powhatan did command Uttamatomakkin to seek you, and know the truth, because your countrymen will lie much."...

Newfoundland "With Good Clothes On"

Richard Whitbourne first visited Newfoundland in 1580, and had maintained a connection with the island once it had been established as a colony (beginning in 1583). In 1618 he was appointed Governor of Newfoundland. The Hayman poem was published in his book Quodlibets, in which he promotes the settlement of Newfoundland. Interestingly, the frontispiece depicts an iguana, or what is here called "the West-Indian Guane."

from Richard Whitbourne, A Discourse and Discovery of Newfoundland (1620)

Most dread Sovereign, it is to be seen by the cosmographers' maps, and well approved, that the Newfoundland is an island, bordering upon the continent of America, from which it is divided by sea: so far distant as England is from the nearest part of France, and lieth between 46 and 53 degrees north latitude. It is as spacious as Ireland, and lies near the course that ships usually hold in their return from the West Indies, and near half the way between Ireland and Virginia.

I shall not much need to commend the wholesome temperature of that country, seeing the greatest part thereof lieth about four degrees nearer the south than any part of England doth. And it hath been well approved by some of our nation, who have lived there many years, that in the winter season it is as pleasant and healthful as England is. And although the example of one summer be no certain rule for other years, yet thus much also can I truly affirm, that in the year 1615 of the many thousands of English, French, Portugals, and others, that were then upon that coast (amongst whom I sailed to and fro more than one hundred and fifty leagues), I neither saw nor heard in all that travel, of any man or boy of either of these nations that died there during the whole voyage; neither was there so much as any one of them sick....

The soil of this country is so fruitful as that in any diverse places; there the summer naturally produces out of the fruitful womb of the earth, without the labour of man's hand, great plenty of green peas and vetches, fair, round, full and wholesome as our vetches are in England; of which I have there fed on many times. The hawmes[1] of them are good fodder for cattle and other beasts in the winter, with the help of hay, of which there may be made great store with little labour, in divers places of the country. Then have you there fair strawberries, red and white, and fair raspberries, and gooseberries, as there be in England, as also multitudes of bilberries, which are called by some, worts, and many other delicate berries (which I cannot name) in great abundance. There are also many other fruits, as small pears, cherries, filberts, etc. And of these berries and fruits the store is there so great that the mariners of my ship and barque's company have gathered at once more than half a hogshead would hold of which diverse times, eating their fill, I never heard of any man whose health was thereby any way impaired.

There are also herbs, for salads and broth, as[2] parsley, alexander, sorrel, etc. And also flowers, as the red and white damask rose, with other kinds; which are most beautiful and delightful, both to the sight and smell. And questionless the country is stored with many physical herbs and roots, albeit their virtues are not known, because not sought after; yet within these few years, many of our nation finding themselves ill, have bruised some of the herbs and strained the juice into beer, wine or aqua-vitae, and by God's assistance, after a few drinkings, it hath restored them to their former health. The like virtue it hath to cure a wound, or any swelling, either by washing the grieved places with some of the herbs boiled, or by applying them so thereunto (plaster-wise) which I have seen by often experience.

This being the natural fruitfulness of the earth, producing such variety of things fit for food without the labour of man, I might in reason hence infer that if the same were manured and husbanded in some places, as our grounds are, it would be apt to bear corn no less fertile than the English soil. But I need not confine myself to probabilities therein: seeing our men that have wintered there diverse years did for a trial and experiment thereof sow some small quantity of corn which I saw growing very fair; and they found the increase to be great, and the grain very good; and it is well known to me and diverse that trade there yearly, how that cabbage, turnips, lettuce, parsley, and such like, prove so well there as elsewhere.…

from "The Royal Charter for Incorporating the Hudson's Bay Company" (1670)

Hudson Bay was initially valued as a potential entrance to a Northwest Passage to the Orient; with this end in mind it was explored by Martin Frobisher in 1576, by Henry Hudson in 1610–11, and by many others. It was not until much later in the seventeenth century that the English began to realize that the value of the wilderness adjacent to Hudson Bay might lie in its natural resources as well as in its proximity to the Orient. But it took a squabble among the French in Canada to spark action on the part of the English. Pierre-Esprit Radisson and Médart Chouart, Sieur des Groseilliers, had explored vast tracts of territory northwest of the Great Lakes, and had confirmed that the area was rich in furs. But they were refused a licence to trade in furs both by the Governor of New France and, on appeal, by the authorities in France. In response they made contacts among the English with a view to obtaining permission from the English to trade in furs via Hudson Bay rather than by the French-controlled Great Lakes. An Englishman, Colonel George Cartwright, eventually took up their cause and presented them to King Charles II. In due course Prince Rupert, cousin of the King, became involved in the project. Radisson and Groseilliers set out on an initial voyage with two ships, the Eaglet and the Nonsuch; the Eaglet suffered storm damage and was forced to return early, but the Nonsuch returned to England in 1669 laden with furs, and the following year a charter for the Hudson's Bay Company was granted; the charter is of as much interest for what it says about other peoples as for what it says about territory and trade. At one time the territory controlled by the Company encompassed much of what is now the United States and Canada.

Charles the Second, By the Grace of God King of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland. Defender of the Faith &c.

To all to whom these presents shall come, greeting.

Whereas our dear and entirely beloved cousin Prince Rupert Count Paladin of the Rhine, Duke of Bavaria and Cumberland &c, Christopher Duke of Albemarle, William Earle of Craven, Henry Lord Arlington, Anthony Lord Ashley,… Sir John Robinson, and Sir Robert Viner; Knights and Baronets Sir Peter Colliton Baronet, Sir Edward Hungerford Knight of the Bath, Sir Paul Neele Knight, Sir John Griffith and Sir Phillip Carteret Knights, James Hayes, John Kirke, Francis Millington, William Prettyman, John Fenn Esquire and John Portman Citizen and Goldsmith of London, have at their own great cost and charge undertaken an expedition for Hudson's Bay in the northwest part of America for the discovery of a new passage into the South Sea and for the finding some trade for furs, minerals, and other considerable commodities and by such their undertaking have already made such discoveries as do encourage them to proceed further in pursuance of their said design by means whereof there may probably arise very great advantage to us and our kingdom;

And whereas the said undertakers for their further encouragement in the said design have humbly besought us to incorporate them and grant unto them and their successors the sole trade and commerce of all those seas, straits, bays, rivers, lakes, creeks, and sounds in whatsoever latitude they shall be that lie within the the entrance of the straits commonly called Hudson's

Straits, together with all the lands, countries, and territories upon the coasts and confines of the seas, straits, bays, rivers, lakes, creeks, and sounds aforesaid which are not now actually possessed by any of our subjects or by the subjects of any other Christian prince or state;

Now know ye that we … do give, grant, ratify and confirm unto our said cousin Prince Rupert, [same names as above repeated] that they and such others as shall be admitted into the said society as is hereafter expressed shall be one body corporate and politic in deed and in name by the name of the Governor and Company of Adventurers of England trading into Hudson's Bay, … really and fully forever, for us, our heirs and successors; do make, ordain, constitute, establish, confirm, and declare by these presents and that by the same name of Governor and Company of Adventurers of England Trading into Hudson's Bay they shall have perpetual succession.

We do assign, nominate, constitute, and make our said cousin Prince Rupert to be the first and present governor of the said Company and to continue in the said office from the date of these presents until the tenth of November next. Then following if he the said Prince Rupert shall so long live and so until a new Governor be chosen by the said Company in form hereafter expressed.…

We have given, granted, and confirmed, and by these presents for us, our heirs and successors, do give, grant, and confirm unto the said Governor and Company and their successors the sole trade and commerce of all those seas, straits, bays, rivers, lakes, creeks, and sounds in whatsoever latitude they shall be that lie within the entrance of the straits commonly called Hudson's Straits, together with all the lands and territories upon the countries, coasts, and confines of the seas, bays, lakes, rivers, creeks, and sounds aforesaid that are not already actually possessed by or granted to any of our subjects or possessed by the subjects of any other Christian prince or state.

With the fishing of all sorts of fish, whales, sturgeons, and all other royal fishes in the seas, bays, inlets, and rivers within the premises and the fish therein, taken together with the royalty of the sea upon the coasts with the limits aforesaid, and all mines royal as well discovered as not discovered of gold, silver, gems, and precious stones to be found or discovered within the territories, limits, and places aforesaid. And that the said land be from henceforth reckoned and reputed as one of our plantations or colonies in America, called Rupert's Land.

And further we do by these presents for us our heirs and successors make, create and constitute the said Governor and Company for the time being and their successors the true and absolute lords and proprietors of the same territory limits and places aforesaid.…

Saving the faith and allegiance due to be performed to us our heirs and successors as aforesaid and that the said Governor and Company shall have liberty full power and authority to appoint and establish governors and all other officers to govern them. And that the Governor and his council of the several and respective places where the said Company shall have plantations, forts, factories,[1] colonies, or places of trade within any the countries, lands or territories hereby granted may have power to judge all persons belonging to the said Governor and Company or that shall live under them in all causes, whether civil or criminal, according to the laws of this kingdom, and to execute justice accordingly.

And by these presents for us our heirs and successors we do give and grant unto the said Governor and Company and their successors free liberty and licence in case they conceive it necessary to send either ships of war, men, or ammunition unto any of their plantations, forts, factories, or places of trade aforesaid for the security and defence of the same, and to choose commanders and officers over them, and to give them power and authority by commission under their common seal, or otherwise to continue or make peace or war with any prince or people whatsoever that are not Christians in any places where the said company shall have any plantations, forts, or factories or adjacent thereunto as shall be most for the advantage and benefit of the said Governor and Company and of their trade and also to right and recompense themselves upon the goods, estates, or people of those parts by whom the said Governor and Company shall sustain any injury, loss, or damage, or upon any other people whatsoever that shall any way contrary to the intent of these presents interrupt, wrong, or injure them in their said trade within the said places, territories, and limits granted by this Charter.

from Mary Rowlandson, A Narrative of the Captivity and Restoration of Mrs. Mary Rowlandson (1682)

> Like other English settlers, the Puritans had few qualms about taking land from the native North American peoples and calling it their own. Puritan colonizers arrived in what became the Massachusetts Bay Colony in 1629, and numerous groups followed in the decades between then and the 1675 attack during which Rowlandson was captured. The English intruders faced stiffer and more persistent resistance than did English colonizers in many other areas along the east coast of North America, but by the 1670s the English had for the most part gained the upper hand. The Pequot attacks on English settlements of 1675 were among the last such episodes; the English sold many Pequot (primarily women and children) into slavery in Bermuda, and killed many more. Pequot reservations were finally established in the nineteenth century; today approximately one thousand Pequot survive. Rowlandson, for her part, was ransomed after seven weeks of captivity, and lived well into her eighties; she died in 1711.

On the tenth of February, 1675, came the Indians with great number upon Lancaster. Their first coming was about sun-rising. Hearing the noise of some guns, we looked out; several houses were burning, and the smoke ascending to Heaven. There were five persons taken in one house, the father and the mother, and a sucking child, they knocked on the head; the other two they took, and carried away alive. There were two others, who, being out of their garrison upon some occasion, were set upon; one was knocked on the head, the other escaped. Another there was, who, running along, was shot and wounded, and fell down; he begged of them his life, promising them money (as they told me), but they would not hearken to him, but knocked him on the head, stripped him naked, and split open his bowels. Another, seeing many of the Indians about his barn, ventured and went out, but was quickly shot down. There were three others belonging to the same garrison who were killed. The Indians, getting up upon the roof of the barn, had advantage to shoot down upon them over their fortification. Thus these murderous wretches went on, burning and destroying before them.

At length they came and beset our own house, and quickly it was the dolefullest[1] day that ever mine eyes saw. The house stood upon the edge of a hill; some of the Indians got behind the hill, others into the barn, and others behind any thing that would shelter them; from all which places they shot against the house, so that the bullets seemed to fly like hail; and quickly they wounded one man among us, then another, and then a third. About two hours (according to my observation in that amazing time) they had been about the house before they could prevail to fire it (which they did with flax and hemp, which they brought out of the barn, and there being no defense about the house, only two flankers, at two opposite corners, and one of them not finished). They fired it once, and one ventured out and quenched it; but they quickly fired it again, and that took. Now is that dreadful hour come that I have often heard of (in the time of the war, as it was the case of others) but now mine eyes see it. Some in our house were fighting for their lives, others wallowing in their blood; the house on fire over our heads, and the bloody heathen ready to knock us on the head if we stirred out. Now might we hear mothers and children crying out for themselves and one another, Lord, what shall we do? Then I took my children (and one of my sister's, hers) to go forth and leave the house; but as soon as we came to the door and appeared, the Indians shot so thick that the bullets rattled against the house as if one had taken an handful of stones and threw them; so that we were fain to give back.... The bullets flying thick, one went through my side, and the same (as would seem) through the bowels and hand of my dear child in my arms. One of my eldest sister's children (named William) had then his leg broken, which the Indians perceiving, they knocked him on the head. Thus were we butchered by those merciless heathen, standing amazed, with the blood running down to our heels.

My elder sister, being yet in the house, and seeing those woeful sights, the infidels hauling mothers one way and children another, and some wallowing in their blood, and her elder son telling her that (her son) William was dead, and myself was wounded; she said, Lord, let me die with them!, which was no sooner said but she was struck with a bullet, and fell down dead over the threshold. I hope she is reaping the fruit of her good labours, being faithful to the service of God in her place. In her younger years she lay under much trouble upon spiritual accounts, till it pleased God to make that precious Scripture take hold of her heart, 2 Cor. 12.9, And he said unto me, My grace is sufficient for thee. More than twenty years after, I have heard her tell how sweet and comfortable that place was to her.

But to return: the Indians laid hold of us, pulling me one way and the children another, and said, Come, go along with us. I told them they would kill me. They answered, If I were willing to go along with them, they would not hurt me. I had often before this said, that if the Indians should come, I should choose rather to be killed by them than taken alive; but when it came to the trial my mind changed; their glittering weapons so daunted my spirit, that I chose rather to go along with those (as I may say) ravenous bears, than that moment to end my days. And that I may the better declare what happened to me during that grievous captivity, I shall particularly speak of the several removes we had up and down the wilderness.

The first remove: Now away we must go with those barbarous creatures, with our bodies wounded and bleeding, and our hearts no less than our bodies. About a mile we went that night; up upon a hill, within sight of the town, where they intended to lodge. There was hard by[1] a vacant house (deserted by the English before, for fear of the Indians) I asked them whether I might not lodge in the house that night to which they answered, What, will you love English-men still? This was the dolefullest night that ever my eyes saw: oh the roaring, and singing, and dancing, and yelling of those black creatures in the night, which made the place a lively resemblance of hell! And as miserable was the waste that was there made of horses, cattle, sheep, swine, calves, lambs, roasting pigs, and fowls (which they had plundered in the town), some roasting, some lying and burning, and some boiling, to feed our merciless enemies; who were joyful enough, though we were disconsolate....

There remained nothing to me but one poor wounded babe, and it seemed at present worse than death that it was in such a pitiful condition, bespeaking compassion, and I had no refreshing for it, nor suitable things to revive it. Little do many think what is the savageness and brutishness of this barbarous enemy, even those that seem to profess more than others among them, when the English have fallen into their hands....

The second remove: But now (the next morning) I must turn my back upon the town, and travel with them into the vast and desolate wilderness, I know not whither. It is not my tongue or pen can express the sorrows of my heart and bitterness of my spirit that I had at this departure. But God was with me in a wonderful manner, carrying me along, and bearing up my spirit, that it did not quite fail. One of the Indians carried my poor wounded babe upon a horse: it went moaning all along, I shall die, I shall die! I went on foot after it, with sorrow that cannot be expressed. At length I took it off the horse, and carried it in my arms, till my strength failed, and I fell down with it. Then they set me upon a horse, with my wounded child in my lap; and there being no furniture[2] upon the horseback; as we were going down a steep hill, we both fell over the horse's head, at which they, like inhuman creatures, laughed, and rejoiced to see it, though I thought we should there have ended our days, as overcome with so many difficulties. But the Lord renewed my strength still, and carried me along, that I might see more of his power, yea, so much that I could never have thought of, had I not experienced it.

After this it quickly began to snow; and when night came on they stopped; and now down I must sit in the snow (by a little fire and a few boughs behind me), with my sick child in my lap; and calling much for water, being now (through the wound) fallen into a violent fever (my own wound also growing so stiff that I could scarce sit down or rise up). Yet so it must be, that I must sit all this cold winter night upon the cold snowy ground, with my sick child in my arms, looking that every hour would be the last of its life; and having no Christian friend near me, either to comfort or help me. Oh, I may see the wonderful power of God, that my spirit did not utterly sink under my affliction! Still the Lord upheld me with his gracious and merciful Spirit, and we were both alive to see the light of the next morning....

[2] furniture Covering (such as a saddle).

The fourth remove: And now must I part with that little company that I had. Here I parted from my daughter Mary (whom I never saw again till I saw her in Dorchester, returned from captivity), and from four little cousins and neighbours, some of which I never saw afterward; the Lord only knows the end of them. Amongst them also was that poor woman before mentioned, who came to a sad end, as some of the company told me in my travel: she having much grief upon her spirit about her miserable condition, being so near her time, she would be often asking the Indians to let her go home; they, not being willing to that, and yet vexed with her importunity, gathered a great company together about her, and stripped her naked, and set her in the midst of them; and when they had sung and danced about her (in their hellish manner) as long as they pleased; they knocked her on the head, and the child in her arms with her. When they had done that they made a fire, and put them both into it; and told the other children that were with them, that if they attempted to go home, they would serve them in like manner. The children said she did not shed one tear, but prayed all the while. But, to return to my own journey: we travelled about half a day, or a little more, and came to a desolate place in the wilderness, where there were no wigwams or inhabitants before. We came about the middle of the afternoon to this place; cold, and wet, and snowy, and hungry, and weary, and no refreshing (for man) but the cold ground to sit on, and our poor Indian cheer....

The fifth remove: The occasion (as I thought) of their moving at this time was the English army, its being near and following them; for they went as if they had gone for their lives for some considerable way; and then they made a stop, and chose out some of their stoutest men, and sent them back to hold the English army in play whilst the rest escaped; and then, like Jehu,[1] they marched on furiously, with their old and with their young: some carried their old decrepit mothers, some carried one and some another. Four of them carried a great Indian upon a bier; but going through a thick wood with him they were hindered, and could make no haste; whereupon they took him upon their backs, and carried him, one at a time, till we came to Bacquaug River....

The first week of my being among them I hardly ate anything; the second week I found my stomach grow very faint for want of something; and yet 'twas very hard to get down their filthy trash; but the third week (though I could think how formerly my stomach would turn against this or that, and I could starve and die before I could eat such things, yet) they were pleasant and savory to my taste. I was at this time knitting a pair of white cotton stockings for my mistress; and I had not yet wrought[2] upon the Sabbath-day. When the Sabbath came, they bade me go to work; I told them it was Sabbath-day, and desired them to let me rest, and told them I would do as much more tomorrow; to which they answered me, they would break my face.

And here I cannot but take notice of the strange providence of God in preserving the heathen. They were many hundreds, old and young, some sick and some lame; many had papooses[3] at their backs, the greatest number (at this time with us) were squaws;[4] and they travelled with all they had, bag and baggage, and yet they got over this river aforesaid; and on Monday they set their wigwams on fire, and away they went: on that very day came the English army after them to this river, and saw the smoke of their wigwams; and yet this river put a stop to them. God did not give them courage or activity to go after us; we were not ready for so great a mercy as victory and deliverance; if we had been, God would have found out a way for the English to have passed this river, as well as for the Indians, with their squaws and children, and all their luggage. Oh that my people had harkened to me, and Israel had walked in my ways, I should soon have subdued their enemies, and turned my hand against their adversaries, Psalm 81 13, 14....

[1] like Jehu Extremely fast. The allusion is to 2 Kings 9.20: "the driving is like the driving of Jehu, the son of Nimshi, for he driveth furiously."

[2] wrought Made anything.

[3] papooses Native North American babies (now generally regarded as an offensive term).

[4] squaws Native North American women; specifically wives (now acknowledged to be a derogatory term).

The sixth remove: On Monday (as I said) they set their wigwams on fire and went away. It was a cold morning, and before us there was a great brook with ice on it; some waded through it, up to the knees and higher, but others went till they came to a beaver dam, and I amongst them, where through the good providence of God, I did not wet my foot. I went along that day, mourning and lamenting, leaving farther my own country, and traveling into a vast and howling wilderness, and I understood something of Lot's wife's temptation, when she looked back.[1]

We came that day to a great swamp, by the side of which we took up our lodging that night. When I came to the brow of the hill, that looked toward the swamp, I thought we had come to a great Indian town (though there were none but our own company). The Indians were as thick as the trees: it seemed as if there had been a thousand hatchets going at once. If one looked before one there was nothing but Indians, and behind one, nothing but Indians, and so on either hand, I myself in the midst, and no Christian soul near me, and yet how hath the Lord preserved me in safety? Oh the experience that I have had of the goodness of God, to me and mine!...

The nineteenth remove: My master had three squaws; living sometimes with one, and sometimes with another. One was this old squaw at whose wigwam I was, and with whom my master had been those three weeks. Another was Wettimore, with whom I had lived and served all this while. A severe and proud dame she was, bestowing every day in dressing herself near as much time as any of the gentry of the land; powdering her hair and painting her face, going with her necklaces, with jewels in her ears, and bracelets upon her hands. When she had dressed herself, her work was to make girdles of wampum[2] and beads. The third squaw was a younger one, by whom he had two papooses. By that time I was refreshed by the old squaw, with whom my master was, Wettimore's maid came to call me home, at which I fell a weeping; then the old squaw told me, to encourage me, that if I wanted victuals I should come to her, and that I should lie there in her wigwam. Then I went with the maid, and quickly came again and lodged there. The squaw laid a mat under me and a good rug over me; the first time I had any such kindness showed me. I understood that Wettimore thought that if she should let me go and serve with the old squaw she would be in danger to lose not only my service, but the redemption-pay also. And I was not a little glad to hear this; being by it raised in my hopes that in God's due time there would be an end of this sorrowful hour. Then came an Indian, and asked me to knit him three pair of stockings, for which I had a hat and a silk handkerchief. Then another asked me to make her a shift, for which she gave me an apron.

Then came Tom and Peter, with the second letter from the council about the captives. Though they were Indians, I got them by the hand, and burst out into tears; my heart was so full that I could not speak to them. But recovering myself, I asked them how my husband did, and all my friends and acquaintance. They said, they were well, but very melancholy. They brought me two biscuits and a pound of tobacco. The tobacco I quickly gave away; when it was all gone, one asked me to give him a pipe of tobacco; I told him all was gone; then began he to rant and to threaten; I told him when my husband came I would give him some. "Hang him, rogue," (says he), "I will knock out his brains if he comes here." And then again, in the same breath, they would say, that if there should come an hundred without guns they would do them no hurt. So unstable and like madmen they were, so that, fearing the worst, I durst not send to my husband, though there were some thoughts of his coming to redeem and fetch me, not knowing what might follow; for there was little more to trust them than to the master they served.

[1] Lot's wife's temptation ... looked back According to the story recounted in Genesis 19.15–23, God allowed Lot and his family to escape from Sodom and Gomorrah as those cities were being destroyed, saying, "'Escape for thy life; look not behind thee, neither stay thou in all the plain; escape to the mountain, lest thou be consumed.'... But his wife looked back from behind him, and she became a pillar of salt."

[2] wampum Beads made from shells, used as currency by various North American Native peoples.

When the letter was come, the Saggamores met to consult about the captives, and called me to them to enquire how much my husband would give to redeem me. When I came, I sat down among them, as I was wont to do, as their manner is. Then they bade me stand up, and said, they were the general court. They bid me speak what I thought he would give. Now, knowing that all we had was destroyed by the Indians, I was in a great strait. I thought if I should speak of but little it would be slighted, and hinder the matter; if of a great sum, I knew not where it would be procured; yet at a venture, I said twenty pounds, yet desired them to take less. But they would not hear of that, but sent that message to Boston, that for twenty pounds I should be redeemed....

But to return again to my going home, where we may see a remarkable change of Providence. At first they were all against it, except my husband would come for me; but afterwards they assented to it, and seemed much to rejoice in it; some asking me to send them some bread, others some tobacco, others shaking me by the hand, offering me a hood and scarf to ride in; not one moving hand or tongue against it. Thus hath the Lord answered my poor desires, and the many requests of others put up unto God for me. In my travels an Indian came to me, and told me, if I were willing, he and his squaw would run away, and go home along with me. I told him, no, I was not willing to run away, but desired to wait God's time, that I might go home quietly, and without fear. And now God hath granted me my desire. Oh the wonderful power of God that I have seen, and the experiences that I have had! I have been in the midst of those roaring lions and savage bears, that feared neither God nor man, nor the Devil, by night and day, alone and in company, sleeping all sorts together; and yet not one of them ever offered the least abuse or unchastity to me in word or action....

The twenty pounds, the price of my redemption, was raised by some Boston gentlewomen, and M. Usher, whose bounty and religious charity I would not forget to make mention of. Then Mr. Thomas Shepherd of Charlestown received us into his house, where we continued eleven weeks; and a father and mother they were unto us. And many more tender-hearted friends we met with in that place. We were now in the midst of love, yet not without much and frequent heaviness of heart for our poor children and other relations who were still in affliction.

The week following, after my coming in, the governor and council sent forth to the Indians again, and that not without success; for they brought in my sister and Goodwife Kettle; their not knowing where our children were was a sore trial to us still, and yet we were not without secret hopes that we should see them again.... About this time the council had ordered a day of public thanksgiving; though I thought I had still cause of mourning; and being unsettled in our minds, we thought we would ride toward the eastward, to see if we could hear anything concerning our children. And as we were riding along (God is the wise disposer of all things) between Ipswich and Rowly we met with Mr. William Hubbard, who told us our son Joseph was come in to Major Waldrens, and another with him, which was my sister's son.... Now we were between them, the one on the east, and the other on the west; our son being nearest we went to him first, to Portsmouth; where we met with him, and with the Major also, who told us he had done what he could, but could not redeem him under seven pounds, which the good people thereabouts were pleased to pay. The Lord reward the Major and all the rest, though unknown to me, for their labour of love. My sister's son was redeemed for four pounds, which the Council gave order for the payment of. Having now received one of our children, we hastened towards the other; going back through Newbury, my husband preached there on the Sabbath-day, for which they rewarded him manifold....

Our family being now gathered together (those of us that were living), the South Church in Boston hired an house for us; then we removed from Mr. Shepherd's (those cordial friends) and went to Boston, where we continued about three quarters of a year; still the Lord went along with us, and provided graciously for us. I thought it somewhat strange to set up housekeeping with bare walls; but, as Solomon says, Money answers all things, and that we had, through the benevolence of Christian friends, some in this town and some in that, and others, and some from England, that in a little time we might look and see the house furnished with love....

THOMAS KYD

Thomas Kyd left a distinct imprint on the early modern theater, but centuries after his life he remains a mysterious figure. The popularity in his own time of his best-known play, The Spanish Tragedy, is well established, but scholars still struggle to establish which other works may fairly be attributed to him and what details of his relatively short life can be inferred with any confidence from the few historical records available. Scholars have found firmer ground when they have explored the impact of his best-known work on Kyd's contemporaries: The Spanish Tragedy brought to the stage expressions of violent emotion—and of outright violence—unlike anything previously seen on the English stage.

The earliest known record of Kyd's life is of his baptism at the church of St. Mary Woolnoth in London, 6 November 1558. His father, Francis, was a scrivener and his mother is thought to have been named Agnes or Anna. Young Kyd, along with his parents, sister Ann, and brother William, likely lived a comfortable life; Francis was successful at his trade, eventually becoming Warden of the Scriveners' Company, and their home was situated in one of London's more prosperous neighborhoods. Kyd received an education at the Merchant Taylors' School, where his fellow students likely included two others who would become well known writers, Edmund Spenser and Thomas Lodge. Richard Mulcaster, headmaster during the time Kyd attended, was known for his forward-thinking educational ideas; he promoted physical education and the study of languages as well as of the arts. It is possible that Kyd gained his first experience participating in theater through his schooling; a group of student actors under Mulcaster's tutelage performed at court between 1573 and 1575.

There is no indication that Kyd attended university, but his written works display his interest in languages and in classical literature. It is believed that he followed his father's profession and was apprenticed to be a scrivener; the high quality of his handwriting is evident in the few letters of his that survive.

Many details of Kyd's working life also remain obscure, but some facts can be pieced together from references in the writings of others. We know he was employed in the 1580s in the service of a lord who was patron of a troop of players—though the lord's identity is unknown. Sometime during this period of his life Kyd also began writing his own poems and plays; most of this early work, however, has not survived.

Highly influenced by the writings of Roman playwright Seneca, Kyd's dramas depart from the Senecan model in their handling of character development and in their presentation of vivid, often violent material onstage. Unlike earlier English dramatists in the Senecan tradition, Kyd wrote for a popular audience; he appears to have had some connection with the theatrical group known as the Queen's Company, but beyond that we know little. The contemporaneous writer Thomas Nashe refers to Kyd as a sort of "English Seneca" who could write "whole Hamlets, I should say handfuls of tragical speeches," from which it has often been inferred that Kyd was the author of a now-lost play (commonly called the Ur-Hamlet) on which Shakespeare based his Hamlet. The only extant play officially inscribed with Kyd's name is Cornelia (1594), his adaptation of the French writer Robert Garnier's Cornélie (which was in turn influenced by the writings of Seneca). Kyd is also thought to have written Soliman and Perseda, another play printed in 1592 (a conjecture based largely on the similarities in that play to the play-within-a-play that appears in the fourth act of The Spanish Tragedy). Some have suggested he might be the author of the anonymous Arden of Feversham, a play that depicts violence in everyday domestic life rather than a courtly setting. A prequel to The Spanish

Tragedy, the first part of Jeronimo, was printed in 1605; it has often been attributed to Kyd, but could also have been written by someone else capitalizing on the popular and well-known character. Two works of prose have been more reliably attributed to Kyd: The Householder's Philosophie (1588), a pamphlet adapted from Italian writer Tasso's Padre di Famiglia, and The Most Wicked and Secret Murdering of John Brewer, Goldsmith, printed in 1592.

Kyd's career was interrupted when he became embroiled in a legal case arising from his association with fellow playwright Christopher Marlowe. He likely met Marlowe during his employment with the noble lord, and by 1591 the two had become roommates. On 13 May 1593, Kyd was arrested. Initially he was charged with posting anti-foreigner messages on the wall of the Dutch church; once a search had been performed of his living quarters, however, the charge was amended to treason. The supposedly damning evidence, papers interpreted to be promoting atheism, had not been written in Kyd's hand; he suggested that they belonged to Marlowe and had gotten mixed in with his own belongings during the period when the two had roomed together. Kyd remained imprisoned at Bridewell, however, at least until Marlowe's death on 1 June. In all likelihood he was subjected to torture during this period; he was also forced to pay bribes to his captors, thereby accumulating a substantial debt.

After his release Kyd experienced further misfortune when he was unable to return to the service of his previous employer. In poor health and with his estate depleted, Kyd died 15 August 1594. He is known to have been buried at St. Mary's Colchurch, though no grave marker remains.

The Spanish Tragedy exerted a tremendous impact on Kyd's contemporaries and successors. Not only was it among the most frequently performed plays of the era; it was also widely imitated and widely parodied in the decades following his death. In the later seventeenth century, however, Kyd's life and works faded into obscurity. Not until the late eighteenth century did a recognition of Kyd's contributions to early modern theater begin to develop among scholars—and it was not until the twentieth century that The Spanish Tragedy began to be recognized as not merely a pioneering work, but also as one of very substantial literary and theatrical merit.

The Spanish Tragedy

The Spanish Tragedy is associated with many firsts—first early modern revenge tragedy, first appearance of a play-within-the-play, first Elizabethan play to combine tragic and comic tones—but there is no certainty as to the date of its first performance, or the date of its composition. It was entered into the Stationers' Register on 6 October 1592 and the first record of a performance (by Lord Strange's Men, a company led by Philip Henslowe that performed at the Rose Theatre) is 14 March 1592. Most scholars have concluded that the play dates from some years before that—probably no later than 1589. (Since the play mentions the 1582 Battle of Terceira, it is presumed to have been completed no earlier than 1582.)

The conflict between Spain and Portugal that had begun in 1580 forms an obviously important part of the background to the play. More important for Kyd's audience, however, would have been the growing tension between Spain and England—tension that led to open conflict when the Spanish Armada attempted to invade England in 1588. The play was evidently capable of rousing sentiment against England's great rival, Spain; was it also a vehicle for rousing anti-Catholic sentiment, and/or for stirring up feeling against the injustices of hierarchical societies, Protestant as much as Catholic? Such questions are the subject of continuing debate.

Like a number of earlier Elizabethan dramatists, Kyd was clearly influenced by classical drama—most notably the work of the Roman dramatist Seneca, whose tragedies often feature bloody violence and revenge. Kyd also drew on various formal and stylistic elements of Senecan drama, including a multi-act structure, the inclusion of long, set-piece speeches, and—in the other direction—the rhetorical device known as stichomythia (single line repartee between characters). As well, the exchanges between the acts involving Revenge and the ghost of Andrea echo the way in which, in Seneca's tragedies, a Chorus comments on the action at the end of each act. But unlike the tragedies of Seneca—or of English predecessors such as Gorboduc (1561), an early Elizabethan tragedy in the Senecan tradition by Thomas Norton and Thomas Sackville, in which the main action is reported by the characters in long speeches but actually occurs offstage—Kyd has his characters perform most of the actions in front of the audience. And, whereas Gorboduc and other early Elizabethan tragedies in the Senecan tradition were generally performed at court, at the Inns of Court (center of the legal community), or at universities, Kyd's play was written for the decidedly mixed audiences that frequented playhouses such as the Rose (and, later, the Globe).

The main story of The Spanish Tragedy is believed to have been of Kyd's own invention—although, in addition to Senecan drama, he may well have drawn inspiration from contemporary influences such as the Italian prose stories of Matteo Bandello, from the figure of the Machiavellian villain, and from real life occurrences such as the infamous mistreatment of servants practiced by the Earl of Leicester (thought to be the inspiration for Pedrigano's fate).

Kyd's play remained extraordinarily popular for many decades. According to the diary of Philip Henslowe, the play was staged twenty-nine times between 1592 and 1597—more than all but two other plays over the same period. In the early seventeenth century it continued to be performed frequently in London, and became popular in parts of continental Europe as well; several adaptations into German and Dutch were staged in the seventeenth century. The Spanish Tragedy also exerted great influence on Elizabethan and Jacobean drama; the sub-genre of revenge tragedy may be said to have been founded by Kyd. Such plays typically feature a wronged revenge-seeker as the central character, and include elements such as ghosts, madness, a play-within-the-play, and multiple murders—typically depicted violently onstage. The list of plays influenced by The Spanish Tragedy includes William Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus (c. 1590) and Hamlet (c. 1602), John Marston's Antonio's Revenge, (c. 1600), John Middleton's The Revenger's Tragedy (1606), Cyril Tourneur's The Atheist's Tragedy (1611), George Chapman's The Revenge of Bussy D'Ambois (1613), and John Webster's The Duchess of Malfi (1613).

(Enter the Ghost of Andrea, and with him Revenge.)[2]

ANDREA. When this eternal substance of my soul
Did live imprisoned in my wanton flesh,
Each[3] in their function serving other's need,
I was a courtier in the Spanish court.
My name was Don Andrea, my descent,
Though not ignoble, yet inferior far
To gracious fortunes of my tender youth:
For there in prime and pride[4] of all my years,
By duteous service and deserving love,
In secret I possessed[5] a worthy dame,° high-born lady
Which hight[6] sweet Bel-Imperia by name.

[1] The Spanish Tragedy Like all modern editions, the present text is based on the edition entitled The Spanish Tragedy, or Hieronimo Is Mad Again, printed by Edward White in 1592. We may infer from the 1592 title page that at least one earlier version had existed, since White declares that his text is "newly corrected, and amended of such gross faults as passed in the first impression." Of later editions, the most significant is that printed in 1602 by Thomas Pavier, which includes several passages of new material; Pavier's title page announces the edition as "enlarged with new additions" and declares that the play is presented "as it hath been of late divers times acted." The present text includes the 1602 additions, as they form an interesting part of the play's history; these additions are marked, however, and accompanied by footnotes indicating where each such passage begins and ends.

[2] Enter … Revenge Some scholars suggest Andrea and Revenge may enter the stage from a trapdoor, as was customary for characters emerging from the underworld, though the direction "Enter" was ordinarily used to signal an entrance from one of the three stage doors. It is unclear whether or not they appear continuously onstage throughout the first three acts, as they are given sporadic "Enter" and "Exit" directions; they are clearly meant to act as spectators onstage for at least a portion of the action.

[3] Each I.e., both body and soul.

[4] pride Self esteem, but also sexual potency.

[5] possessed I.e., possessed sexually.

[6] Which hight Who was called.

But in the harvest of my summer joys
Death's winter nipped the blossoms of my bliss,
Forcing divorce betwixt my love and me.
For in the late° conflict with Portingale[1] recent
My valour drew me into danger's mouth,
Till life to death made passage through my wounds.
When I was slain, my soul descended straight
To pass the flowing stream of Acheron:[2]
But churlish Charon,[3] only boatman there,
Said that my rites of burial not performed,
I might not sit amongst his passengers.
Ere Sol° had slept three nights in Thetis'[4] lap, sun
And slaked his smoking chariot in her flood,
By Don Horatio, our Knight Marshal's[5] son,
My funerals and obsequies° were done. rituals
Then was the ferryman of hell content
To pass me over to the slimy strond,° shore
That leads to fell° Avernus'[6] ugly waves: ferocious
There, pleasing Cerberus[7] with honeyed speech,
I passed the perils of the foremost porch.
Not far from hence, amidst ten thousand souls,
Sat Minos, Aeacus, and Rhadamanth,[8]
To whom no sooner 'gan° I make approach, began
To crave a passport[9] for my wandering ghost,
But Minos, in graven leaves of lottery,[10]
Drew forth the manner of my life and death.
"This knight," quoth he, "both lived and died in love,
And for his love tried fortune of the wars,
And by war's fortune lost both love and life."
"Why then," said Aeacus, "convey him hence,
To walk with lovers in our fields of love,
And spend the course of everlasting time
Under green myrtle trees and cypress shades."
"No, no," said Rhadamanth, "it were not well
With loving souls to place a martialist:° soldier
He died in war, and must to martial fields,
Where wounded Hector[11] lives in lasting pain,
And Achilles' Myrmidons do scour the plain."
Then Minos, mildest censor° of the three, judge
Made this device to end the difference:
"Send him," quoth he, "to our infernal king,
To doom[12] him as best seems his majesty."
To this effect my passport straight was drawn.
In keeping on my way to Pluto's[13] court,
Through dreadful shades of ever-glooming night,
I saw more sights than thousand tongues can tell,
Or pens can write, or mortal hearts can think.
Three ways there were: that on the right-hand side
Was ready way unto the foresaid fields,
Where lovers live and bloody martialists,° warriors
But either sort contained within his bounds.
The left-hand path, declining fearfully,
Was ready downfall to the deepest hell,
Where bloody Furies[14] shakes their whips of steel,
And poor Ixion[15] turns an endless wheel;
Where usurers are choked with melting gold,
And wantons[16] are embraced with ugly snakes,
And murderers groan with never-killing wounds,
And perjured wights° scalded in boiling lead, persons
And all foul sins with torments overwhelmed.

[8] Minos … Rhadamanth Underworld judges responsible for determining a ghost's final resting place.

[9] passport Document guaranteeing safety while traveling through dangerous lands.

[10] graven … lottery Slips of paper which revealed the resolution to Andrea's story (and fate).

[12] doom Determine the fate of.

[13] Pluto God in command of the underworld.

[14] Furies Female mythical beings responsible for vengeance.

[15] Ixion Mythical king attached to a fiery, perpetually revolving wheel as punishment for attempting to have sex with Hera, Zeus's wife.

[16] wantons Persons prone to excessive sexual indulgences.

'Twixt these two ways I trod the middle path,[1]
Which brought me to the fair Elysian green,[2]
In midst whereof there stands a stately tower,
The walls of brass, the gates of adamant.[3]
Here finding Pluto with his Proserpine,[4]
I showed my passport, humbled on my knee;
Whereat fair Proserpine began to smile,
And begged that only she might give my doom.
Pluto was pleased, and sealed it with a kiss.
Forthwith, Revenge, she rounded° thee in th'ear, whispered
And bade thee lead me through the gates of horn,[5]
Where dreams have passage in the silent night.
No sooner had she spoke but we were here,
I wot° not how, in twinkling of an eye.[6] know
REVENGE. Then know, Andrea, that thou art arrived
Where thou shalt see the author of thy death,
Don Balthazar, the prince of Portingale,
Deprived of life by Bel-Imperia.
Here sit we down to see the mystery,
And serve for Chorus in this tragedy.

ACT 1, SCENE 2

(Enter Spanish King, General, Castile, Hieronimo.)

KING. Now say, Lord General, how fares our camp?[7]
GENERAL. All well, my sovereign liege, except some few
That are deceased by fortune of the war.
KING. But what portends thy cheerful countenance,
And posting to our presence thus in haste?
Speak man, hath fortune given us victory?
GENERAL. Victory, my liege, and that with little loss.
KING. Our Portingals° will pay us tribute[8] then? Portuguese
GENERAL. Tribute and wonted° homage therewithal. conventional KING. Then blest be heaven, and guider of the heavens,
From whose fair influence such justice flows.
CASTILE. O multum dilecte Deo, tibi militat aether,
Et conjuratae curvato poplito gentes
Succumbunt: recti soror est victoria juris.[9]
KING. Thanks to my loving brother of Castile.
But General, unfold in brief discourse
Your form of battle and your war's success,
That adding all the pleasure of thy news
Unto the height of former happiness,
With deeper wage and greater dignity
We may reward thy blissful chivalry.
GENERAL. Where Spain and Portingale do jointly knit
Their frontiers, leaning on each other's bound,° boundary
There met our armies in their proud array:
Both furnished° well, both full of hope and fear, outfitted
Both menacing alike with daring shows,
Both vaunting° sundry colours of device,[10] flaunting
Both cheerly sounding trumpets, drums and fifes,
Both raising dreadful clamours to the sky,
That valleys, hills, and rivers made rebound,
And heaven itself was frighted with the sound.
Our battles[11] both were pitched in squadron° form, square
Each corner strongly fenced with wings of shot;[12]
But ere we joined and came to push of pike,[13]
I brought a squadron of our readiest shot
From out our rearward to begin the fight:

[1] the middle path This central path to Elysium does not appear in Virgil.

[2] Elysian green Fields of Elysium, mythical place of repose for souls of the blessed.

[3] adamant Hard stone, often diamond.

[4] Proserpine Roman underworld goddess (and counterpart of Greek Persephone, also known as Proserpina), abducted from her mother Ceres by Pluto.

[5] gates of horn In classical literature, dreams that pass through gates of horn are truthful; dreams that pass through gates of ivory are false or deceiving.

[6] twinkling ... eye The phrase echoes 1 Corinthians 15.52: "In a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the last trump: for the trumpet shall sound, and the dead shall be raised incorruptible, and we shall be changed."

[7] how fares our camp What is the condition of the troops camped at the battlefield?

[8] tribute Money paid to Spain by Portugal as part of the terms of its surrender.

[9] O multum ... juris Latin: O beloved of God, for you the heavens battle, / And the people, united, fall on bended knee / Victory is the sister of true justice.

[10] colours of device Heraldic streamers.

[11] battles Units of troops.

[12] shot Soldiers wielding firearms.

[13] push of pike Close, hand-to-hand combat with long, pointed weapons.

They brought another wing t'encounter us.
Meanwhile, our ordnance° played on either side, artillery
And captains strove to have their valours tried.
Don Pedro, their chief horsemen's colonel,[1]
Did with his cornet[2] bravely make attempt
To break the order of our battle ranks:
But Don Rogero, worthy man of war,
Marched forth against him with our musketeers,
And stopped the malice of his fell approach.
While they maintain hot skirmish to and fro,
Both battles join and fall to handy° blows, hand-to-hand
Their violent shot resembling th'ocean's rage,
When, roaring loud, and with a swelling tide,
It beats upon the rampiers[3] of huge rocks,
And gapes to swallow neighbour-bounding lands.
Now while Bellona[4] rageth here and there,
Thick storms of bullets rain like winter's hail,
And shivered lances dark the troubled air.
Pede pes et cuspide cuspis;
Arma sonant armis, vir petiturque viro.[5]
On every side drop captains to the ground,
And soldiers, some ill-maimed, some slain outright:
Here falls a body scindered° from his head, split
There legs and arms lie bleeding on the grass,
Mingled with weapons and unbowelled steeds,
That scattering overspread the purple° plain. bloody
In all this turmoil, three long hours and more,
The victory to neither part inclined,
Till Don Andrea with his brave lancers
In their main battle made so great a breach
That, half dismayed, the multitude retired:
But Balthazar, the Portingales' young prince,
Brought rescue, and encouraged them to stay.
Here-hence[6] the fight was eagerly renewed,
And in that conflict was Andrea slain—
Brave man at arms, but weak to Balthazar.
Yet while the prince, insulting over him,
Breathed out proud vaunts, sounding to our reproach,
Friendship and hardy valour joined in one
Pricked forth Horatio, our Knight Marshal's son,
To challenge forth that prince in single fight.
Not long between these twain the fight endured,
But straight the prince was beaten from his horse,
And forced to yield him prisoner to his foe:
When he was taken, all the rest they fled,
And our carbines° pursued them to the death, armed cavalry
Till, Phoebus[7] waning to the western deep,
Our trumpeters were charged° to sound retreat. ordered
King. Thanks good Lord General for these good news;
And for some argument° of more to come, summary
Take this and wear it for thy sovereign's sake.

(Gives him his chain.)

But tell me now, hast thou confirmed a peace?
General. No peace, my liege, but peace conditional,
That if with homage tribute be well paid,
The fury of your forces will be stayed:
And to this peace their viceroy hath subscribed,[8]

(Gives the King a paper.)

And made a solemn vow that, during life,
His tribute shall be truly paid to Spain.
King. These words, these deeds, become thy person well.
But now, Knight Marshal, frolic with thy king,
For 'tis thy son that wins this battle's prize.
Hieronimo. Long may he live to serve my sovereign liege,
And soon decay unless he serve my liege.

(A tucket° afar off.) trumpet

King. Nor thou, nor he, shall die without reward—
What means this warning of this trumpet's sound?
General. This tells me that your grace's men of war—

[1] colonel Spoken in three syllables.

[2] cornet Cavalry division directed by a low ranking officer.

[3] rampiers Ramparts, or fortifications against battle.

[4] Bellona Roman goddess of war.

[5] Pede … viro Latin: Foot against foot and lance against lance, / Arms sound against arms, and man is assailed by man.

[6] Here-hence As a result.

[7] Phoebus Apollo, god of the sun.

[8] subscribed Endorsed with his signature.

Such as war's fortune hath reserved from death—[1]
Come marching on towards your royal seat,
To show themselves before your majesty,
For so I gave in charge at my depart.[2]
Whereby by demonstration shall appear,
That all (except three hundred or few more)
Are safe returned and by their foes enriched.

(The Army enters; Balthazar, between Lorenzo and Horatio, captive.)

KING. A gladsome sight! I long to see them here.

(They enter and pass by.)[3]

Was that the warlike prince of Portingale,
That by our nephew was in triumph led?
GENERAL. It was, my liege, the prince of Portingale.
KING. But what° was he that on the other side who Held him by th'arm, as partner of the prize?
HIERONIMO. That was my son, my gracious sovereign,
Of whom, though from his tender infancy
My loving thoughts did never hope but well,
He never pleased his father's eyes till now,
Nor filled my heart with over-cloying joys.[4]
KING. Go let them march once more about these walls,
That staying° them we may confer and talk stopping
With our brave prisoner and his double guard.
Hieronimo, it greatly pleaseth us,
That in our victory thou have a share,
By virtue of thy worthy son's exploit.

(Enter [the army] again.)

Bring hither the young prince of Portingale:
The rest march on, but ere they be dismissed,
We will bestow on every soldier two
Ducats,° and on every leader ten, gold coins
That they may know our largess welcomes them.

(Exeunt all [the army] but Balthazar, Lorenzo, and Horatio.)

Welcome, Don Balthazar, welcome, nephew,
And thou, Horatio, thou art welcome too.
Young prince, although thy father's hard misdeeds,
Deserve but evil measure at our hands,
Yet shalt thou know that Spain is honourable.
BALTHAZAR. The trespass that my father made in peace
Is now controlled by fortune of the wars;[5]
And cards once dealt, it boots not[6] ask why so.
His men are slain, a weakening to his realm,
His colours seized, a blot unto his name,
His son distressed, a corsive° to his heart: corrosive
These punishments may clear his late offence.
KING. Ay, Balthazar, if he observe this truce,
Our peace will grow the stronger for these wars.
Meanwhile live thou, though not in liberty,
Yet free from bearing any servile yoke;
For in our hearing thy deserts were great,
And in our sight thyself art gracious.
BALTHAZAR. And I shall study to deserve this grace.
KING. But tell me, for their holding makes me doubt,[7]
To which of these twain art thou prisoner?
LORENZO. To me, my liege.
HORATIO. To me, my sovereign.
LORENZO. This hand first took his courser[8] by the reins.
HORATIO. But first my lance did put him from his horse.
LORENZO. I seized his weapon, and enjoyed it first.
HORATIO. But first I forced him lay his weapons down.
KING. Let go his arm, upon our privilege.[9]

([They] let him go.)

Say, worthy prince, to whether° didst thou yield? which

---

[1] Such ... death Those of them that the fortunes of war have spared from death.

[2] gave ... depart Ordered when I left.

[3] They ... by The soldiers pass the King for review, and exit on the other side.

[4] over-cloying joys Excessive sentiment.

[5] The trespass ... wars The fortune of the wars has now rebuked my father for the wrong he committed in peace time.

[6] boots not Is of no benefit to.

[7] for their ... me doubt Because the fact they are both holding you makes me uncertain.

[8] courser Swift horse used in combat.

[9] upon our privilege On my authority.

BALTHAZAR. To him in courtesy, to this perforce:[1]
He spake me fair, this other gave me strokes;
He promised life, this other threatened death;
He won my love, this other conquered me:
And truth to say I yield myself to both.
HIERONIMO. But that I know your grace for just and wise,
And might seem partial in this difference,
Enforced by nature and by law of arms
My tongue should plead for young Horatio's right.
He hunted well that was a lion's death,
Not he that in a garment wore his skin:
So hares may pull dead lions by the beard.[2]
KING. Content thee, Marshal, thou shalt have no wrong;
And for thy sake thy son shall want no right.
Will both abide the censure of my doom?[3]
LORENZO. I crave no better than your grace awards.
HORATIO. Nor I, although I sit beside my right.[4]
KING. Then by my judgment thus your strife shall end:
You both deserve, and both shall have reward.
Nephew,° thou took'st his weapon and his horse, Lorenzo
His weapons and his horse are thy reward.
Horatio, thou didst force him first to yield,
His ransom therefore is thy valour's fee:° reward
Appoint the sum as you shall both agree.
But nephew, thou shalt have the prince in guard,
For thine estate° best fitteth such a guest: standing
Horatio's house were small for all his train.
Yet in regard thy substance passeth his,
And that just guerdon° may befall desert,[5] reward
To him° we yield the armour of the prince. Horatio
How likes Don Balthazar of this device?° arrangement
BALTHAZAR. Right well my liege, if this proviso were,
That Don Horatio bear us company,
Whom I admire and love for chivalry.
KING. Horatio, leave him not that loves thee so.
Now let us hence to see our soldiers paid,
And feast our prisoner as our friendly guest.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 1, SCENE 3[6]

(Enter Viceroy, Alexandro, Villuppo.)

VICEROY. Is our ambassador dispatched for Spain?
ALEXANDRO. Two days, my liege, are passed since his depart.
VICEROY. And tribute payment gone along with him?
ALEXANDRO. Ay my good lord.
VICEROY. Then rest we here awhile in our unrest,
And feed our sorrows with some inward sighs,
For deepest cares break never into tears.[7]
But wherefore sit I in a regal throne?
This better fits a wretch's endless moan.
Yet this is higher than my fortunes reach,
And therefore better than my state deserves.

(Falls to the ground.)[8]

Ay, ay, this earth, image of melancholy,[9]
Seeks him whom fates adjudge to misery:
Here let me lie, now am I at the lowest.
Qui jacet in terra, non habet unde cadat.
In me consumpsit vires fortuna nocendo,

[1] To him ... perforce To him [Lorenzo], out of politeness; to him [Horatio], out of necessity. Balthazar gestures to Lorenzo and Horatio alternately in this, and the following three, lines: in each line Lorenzo is referred to first, Horatio second.

[2] He hunted ... beard Proverb: A good hunter kills the lion, anyone can wear the skin. Even a hare is brave before a dead lion. Hieronimo is likening Horatio to the good hunter.

[3] Content thee ... doom Rest assured, Hieronimo, no wrong shall be done you, and for your sake your son [Horatio] shall lack no consideration. Will you both accept my judgment?

[4] although I ... right Although [in agreeing to respect the King's judgment], I set aside my rightful claim.

[5] Horatio's house ... desert Horatio's house would be too small to hold Balthazar and all his attendants. But you [Lorenzo] are a man of greater substance and for that reason deserve to have the prize [of Balthazar's presence] come to you.

[6] ACT 1, SCENE 3 At the court of the Portuguese Viceroy.

[7] And feed ... tears Proverb: Grief, when given voice, does not run so deep as that which makes no sound.

[8] Falls ... ground The image of the ruler on the ground recalls the Wheel of Fortune, the popular Elizabethan image of the rising and falling circumstances of all men.

[9] earth ... melancholy One of the four humors thought to govern human temperaments, melancholy was associated with earth.

Nil superest ut jam possit obesse magis.[1]
Yes, Fortune may bereave me of my crown:
Here, take it now; let Fortune do her worst,
She will not rob me of this sable weed:[2]
O no, she envies none but pleasant things.
Such is the folly of despiteful° chance! malicious
Fortune is blind and sees not my deserts,
So is she deaf and hears not my laments:
And could she hear, yet is she wilful mad,
And therefore will not pity my distress.
Suppose that she could pity me, what then?
What help can be expected at her hands,
Whose foot is standing on a rolling stone,
And mind more mutable than fickle winds?[3]
Why wail I then, where's hope of no redress?
O yes, complaining makes my grief seem less.
My late ambition hath distained my faith,[4]
My breach of faith occasioned bloody wars,
Those bloody wars have spent my treasure,
And with my treasure my people's blood,
And with their blood, my joy and best beloved,
My best beloved, my sweet and only son.
O wherefore went I not to war myself?
The cause was mine, I might have died for both:
My years were mellow, his but young and green,
My death were natural, but his was forced.
ALEXANDRO. No doubt, my liege, but still the prince survives.
VICEROY. Survives! ay, where?
ALEXANDRO. In Spain, a prisoner by mischance of war.
VICEROY. Then they have slain him for his father's fault.[5]
ALEXANDRO. That were[6] a breach to common law of arms.
VICEROY. They reck° no laws that meditate revenge. heed
ALEXANDRO. His ransom's worth will stay from foul revenge.[7]
VICEROY. No, if he lived the news would soon be here.
ALEXANDRO. Nay, evil news fly faster still than good.
VICEROY. Tell me no more of news, for he is dead.
VILLUPPO. My sovereign, pardon the author of ill news,
And I'll bewray° the fortune of thy son. reveal
VICEROY. Speak on, I'll guerdon° thee whate'er it be: reward
Mine ear is ready to receive ill news,
My heart grown hard 'gainst mischief's battery;
Stand up I say, and tell thy tale at large.[8]
VILLUPPO. Then hear that truth which these mine eyes have seen.
When both the armies were in battle joined,
Don Balthazar, amidst the thickest troops,
To win renown did wondrous feats of arms:
Amongst the rest I saw him hand to hand
In single fight with their Lord General;
Till Alexandro, that here counterfeits
Under the colour of a duteous friend,
Discharged his pistol at the prince's back,
As though he would have slain their general.
But therewithal Don Balthazar fell down,
And when he fell, then we began to fly:° flee
But had he lived, the day had sure been ours.
ALEXANDRO. O wicked forgery! O traitorous miscreant!
VICEROY. Hold thou thy peace! But now, Villuppo, say,
Where then became the carcass of my son?
VILLUPPO. I saw them drag it to the Spanish tents.
VICEROY. Ay, ay, my nightly dreams have told me this.
Thou false, unkind,° unthankful, traitorous beast, unnatural
Wherein had Balthazar offended thee,
That thou shouldst thus betray him to our foes?
Was't Spanish gold that bleared so thine eyes
That thou couldst see no part of our deserts?
Perchance because thou art Terceira's[9] lord,
Thou hadst some hope to wear this diadem,° crown

---

[1] Qui … magis Latin: One who throws himself to the ground has no further to fall. / Fortune no longer has any power to harm me, / Nothing more can hurt me.

[2] sable weed Black clothes worn in mourning.

[3] Fortune … winds Unsympathetic to the concerns of humans, Fortune was portrayed as blind and deaf, perched atop a rolling sphere, changing lives at random.

[4] hath distained my faith Has tarnished my trustworthiness.

[5] fault I.e., for the Viceroy's breach of faith.

[6] were Would have been.

[7] stay from foul revenge Prevent him from becoming a victim of revenge.

[8] tell thy tale at large Tell the story in full and without fear.

[9] Terceira Island, site of the capital city of the Azores, a strong center of opposition to the Spanish conquest of Portugal.

If first my son and then myself were slain:
But thy ambitious thought shall break thy neck.
Ay, this was it that made thee spill his blood,

(Take[s] the crown and put[s] it on again.)

But I'll now wear it till thy blood be spilt.
ALEXANDRO. Vouchsafe, dread sovereign, to hear me speak.
VICEROY. Away with him, his sight is second hell;
Keep him till we determine of his death.

[Exeunt Attendants and Alexandro.]

If Balthazar be dead, he shall not live.
Villuppo, follow us for thy reward.

(Exit Viceroy.)

VILLUPPO. Thus have I with an envious, forged tale
Deceived the king, betrayed mine enemy,
And hope for guerdon of my villainy.

(Exit.)

ACT 1, SCENE 4

(Enter Horatio and Bel-Imperia.)

BEL-IMPERIA. Signior Horatio, this is the place and hour
Wherein I must entreat thee to relate
The circumstance of Don Andrea's death,
Who, living, was my garland's sweetest flower,
And in his death hath buried my delights.
HORATIO. For love of him and service to yourself,
I nill[1] refuse this heavy doleful charge.
Yet tears and sighs, I fear will hinder me.
When both our armies were enjoined in fight,
Your worthy chevalier amidst the thick'st,
For glorious cause still aiming at the fairest,
Was at the last by young Don Balthazar
Encountered hand to hand: their fight was long,
Their hearts were great, their clamours menacing,
Their strength alike, their strokes both dangerous.
But wrathful Nemesis,[2] that wicked power,
Envying at Andrea's praise and worth,
Cut short his life, to end his praise and worth.
She, she herself, disguised in armour's mask,
(As Pallas[3] was before proud Pergamus)° Troy
Brought in a fresh supply of halberdiers,[4]
Which paunched° his horse, and dinged° him to the ground. disemboweled knocked
Then young Don Balthazar with ruthless rage,
Taking advantage of his foe's distress,
Did finish what his halberdiers begun,
And left not till Andrea's life was done.
Then, though too late, incensed with just remorse,° pity
I with my band set forth against the prince,
And brought him prisoner from his halberdiers.
BEL-IMPERIA. Would thou hadst slain him that so slew my love.
But then was Don Andrea's carcass lost?
HORATIO. No, that was it for which I chiefly strove,
Nor stepped I back till I recovered him:
I took him up, and wound him in mine arms,
And wielding° him unto my private tent, carrying
There laid him down, and dewed him with my tears,
And sighed and sorrowed as became a friend.
But neither friendly sorrow, sighs nor tears
Could win pale death from his usurped right.
Yet this I did, and less I could not do:
I saw him honoured with due funeral.
This scarf[5] I plucked from off his lifeless arm,
And wear it in remembrance of my friend.
BEL-IMPERIA. I know the scarf, would he had kept it still,
For had he lived he would have kept it still,
And worn it for his Bel-Imperia's sake:
For 'twas my favour[6] at his last depart.
But now wear thou it both for him and me,
For after him thou hast deserved it best.

[1] nill Will not.

[2] Nemesis Classical goddess of vengeance.

[3] Pallas Also known as Athena, the goddess who assisted the Greek army during the Trojan war.

[4] halberdiers Soldiers carrying halberds, spear-like weapons topped with crescent-shaped battle-axe blades.

[5] This scarf A gift from Bel-Imperia to be worn in battle.

[6] favour Parting gift, a token of love.

But, for thy kindness in his life and death,
Be sure while Bel-Imperia's life endures,
She will be Don Horatio's thankful friend.
HORATIO. And, madam, Don Horatio will not slack
Humbly to serve fair Bel-Imperia.
But now, if your good liking stand thereto,
I'll crave your pardon to go seek the prince,
For so the duke your father gave me charge.

(Exit.)

BEL-IMPERIA. Ay, go Horatio, leave me here alone,
For solitude best fits my cheerless mood.
Yet what avails to wail Andrea's death,
From whence Horatio proves my second love?
Had he not loved Andrea as he did,
He could not sit in Bel-Imperia's thoughts.
But how can love find harbour in my breast,
Till I revenge the death of my beloved?
Yes, second love shall further my revenge.
I'll love Horatio, my Andrea's friend,
The more to spite the prince that wrought his end.
And where Don Balthazar, that slew my love,
Himself now pleads for favour at my hands,
He shall in rigour of my just disdain
Reap long repentance for his murderous deed.
For what was't else but murderous cowardice,
So many to oppress one valiant knight,
Without respect of honour in the fight?
And here he comes that murdered my delight.

(Enter Lorenzo and Balthazar.)

LORENZO. Sister, what means this melancholy walk?
BEL-IMPERIA. That for a while I wish no company.
LORENZO. But here the prince is come to visit you.
BEL-IMPERIA. That argues that he lives in liberty.
BALTHAZAR. No madam, but in pleasing servitude.
BEL-IMPERIA. Your prison then belike is your conceit.[1]
BALTHAZAR. Ay, by conceit[2] my freedom is enthralled.° captivated
BEL-IMPERIA. Then with conceit° imagination enlarge° yourself again. liberate
BALTHAZAR. What if conceit have laid my heart to gage?[3]
BEL-IMPERIA. Pay that you borrowed and recover it.
BALTHAZAR. I die if it return from whence it lies.
BEL-IMPERIA. A heartless man, and live? A miracle!
BALTHAZAR. Ay lady, love can work such miracles.
LORENZO. Tush, tush, my lord, let go these ambages,[4]
And in plain terms acquaint her with your love.
BEL-IMPERIA. What boots complaint,[5] when there's no remedy?
BALTHAZAR. Yes, to your gracious self must I complain,
In whose fair answer lies my remedy,
On whose perfection all my thoughts attend,
On whose aspect° mine eyes find beauty's appearance bower,° arbor
In whose translucent breast my heart is lodged.
BEL-IMPERIA. Alas, my lord, these are but words[6] of course,
And but device to drive me from this place.

(She, in going in, lets fall her glove, which Horatio, coming out, takes up.)

HORATIO. Madam, your glove.
BEL-IMPERIA. Thanks good Horatio, take it for thy pains.
BALTHAZAR. Signior Horatio stooped° in fortuitous happy time.
HORATIO. I reaped more grace than I deserved or hoped.
LORENZO. My lord, be not dismayed for what is past,
You know that women oft are humorous:[7]
These clouds will overblow with little wind;
Let me alone, I'll scatter them myself.
Meanwhile let us devise to spend the time
In some delightful sports and revelling.° festivities
HORATIO. The king, my lords, is coming hither straight,
To feast the Portingale ambassador:
Things were in readiness before I came.

[1] conceit Play on words.

[2] by conceit In your imagination.

[3] What if … gage? What if a fanciful notion has given my heart as a deposit?

[4] ambages Ambiguous manners of speaking.

[5] boots complaint What is the point of complaining?

[6] words Conventional words.

[7] humorous Subject to the instability of shifting humors.

BALTHAZAR. Then here it fits us to attend the king,
To welcome hither our ambassador,
And learn my father and my country's health.

(Enter the banquet[1] Trumpets,° the King, and Ambassador.) trumpeters

KING. See Lord Ambassador, how Spain entreats
Their prisoner Balthazar, thy viceroy's son:
We pleasure more in kindness than in wars.
AMBASSADOR. Sad is our king, and Portingale laments,
Supposing that Don Balthazar is slain.
BALTHAZAR. [Aside.] So am I slain by beauty's tyranny.
[To the Ambassador.] You see, my lord, how Balthazar is slain:
I frolic with the Duke of Castile's son,
Wrapped every hour in pleasures of the court,
And graced with favours of his majesty.
KING. Put off your greetings till our feast be done;
Now come and sit with us and taste our cheer.

(Sit to the banquet.)

Sit down young prince, you are our second guest;
Brother sit down and nephew take your place;
Signior Horatio, wait thou upon our cup,[2]
For well them hast deserved to be honoured.
Now, lordings, fall to; Spain is Portugal,
And Portugal is Spain, we both are friends,
Tribute is paid, and we enjoy our right.
But where is old Hieronimo, our marshal?
He promised us, in honour of our guest,
To grace our banquet with some pompous jest.[3]

(Enter Hieronimo with a drum, three knights, each [with] his scutcheon: then he fetches three kings, [the Knights] take their crowns and them captive.)[4]

Hieronimo, this masque contents mine eye,
Although I sound not well the mystery.[5]
HIERONIMO. The first armed knight, that hung his scutcheon up,

(He takes the scutcheon and gives it to the King.)

Was English Robert, Earl of Gloucester,
Who when King Stephen bore sway in Albion,° England
Arrived with five and twenty thousand men
In Portingale, and by success of war
Enforced the king, then but a Saracen,[6]
To bear the yoke of the English monarchy.
KING. My lord of Portingale, by this you see
That which may comfort both your king and you,
And make your late discomfort seem the less.
But say, Hieronimo, what was the next?
HIERONIMO. The second knight, that hung his scutcheon up,

(He doth as he did before.)

Was Edmond, Earl of Kent in Albion,
When English Richard wore the diadem;
He came likewise, and razed Lisbon walls,
And took the King of Portingale in fight:
For which, and other suchlike service done
He after was created Duke of York.
KING. This is another special argument,° example
That Portingale may deign to bear our yoke,
When it by little England hath been yoked.
But now Hieronimo, what were the last?
HIERONIMO. The third and last, not least in our account,

(Doing as before.)

Was as the rest a valiant Englishman,
Brave John of Gaunt, the Duke of Lancaster,
As by his scutcheon plainly may appear.
He with a puissant° army came to Spain, strong
And took our King of Castile prisoner.

[1] Enter the banquet A table covered in dishes, with stools or benches, is carried onstage.

[2] wait … cup Attend to the king's cup. This was a great honour in European courts.

[3] pompous jest Entertainment befitting the court.

[4] Enter … captive This dumb show depicts a capture of royals by their social inferiors. This is significant for both Hieronimo and Horatio; scutcheon Shield displaying a heraldic emblem, here, the arms of Kent, Lancaster, and Gloucester.

[5] I sound … mystery I do not fully understand the underlying meaning of this performance.

[6] Saracen Term used by medieval Christians to refer to Arabs, Turks, and/or Muslims.

AMBASSADOR. This is an argument for our viceroy,
That Spain may not insult° for her success, gloat
Since English warriors likewise conquered Spain,
And made them bow their knees to Albion.
KING. Hieronimo, I drink to thee for this device,
Which hath pleased both the ambassador and me;
Pledge me[1] Hieronimo, if thou love the king.

([Hieronimo] Takes the cup of Horatio.)

My lord, I fear we sit but over-long,
Unless our dainties were more delicate:[2]
But welcome are you to the best we have.
Now let us in, that you may be dispatched,[3]
I think our council is already set.

(Exeunt omnes.)

ACT 1, SCENE 5[4]

ANDREA. Come we for this from depth of underground,
To see him feast that gave me my death's wound?
These pleasant sights are sorrow to my soul,
Nothing but league, and love, and banqueting!
REVENGE. Be still Andrea, ere we go from hence,[5]
I'll turn their friendship into fell despite,[6]
Their love to mortal hate, their day to night,
Their hope into despair, their peace to war,
Their joys to pain, their bliss to misery.

ACT 2, SCENE 1

(Enter Lorenzo and Balthazar.)

LORENZO. My lord, though Bel-Imperia seem thus coy,
Let reason hold you in your wonted joy:
"In time the savage bull sustains the yoke,
In time all haggard hawks will stoop to lure,[7]
In time small wedges cleave the hardest oak,
In time the flint is pierced with softest shower"—
And she in time will fall from her disdain,
And rue the suff'rance of your friendly pain.
BALTHAZAR. "No, she is wilder, and more hard withal,° as well
Than beast, or bird, or tree, or stony wall."
But wherefore blot I Bel-Imperia's name?
It is my fault, not she, that merits blame.
My feature° is not to content her sight, appearance
My words are rude° and work her no delight. crude
The lines I send her are but harsh and ill,
Such as do drop from Pan and Marsyas' quill.[8]
My presents are not of sufficient cost,
And being worthless all my labour's lost.
Yet might she love me for my valiancy—
Ay, but that's slandered by captivity.
Yet might she love me to content her sire—
Ay, but her reason masters his desire.
Yet might she love me as her brother's friend—
Ay, but her hopes aim at some other end.
Yet might she love me to uprear her state—[9]
Ay, but perhaps she hopes some nobler mate.
Yet might she love me as her beauty's thrall—
Ay, but I fear she cannot love at all.
LORENZO. My lord, for my sake leave these ecstasies,
And doubt not but we'll find some remedy.
Some cause there is that lets you not be loved:
First that must needs be known, and then removed.
What if my sister love some other knight?

[1] Pledge me Drink to me.

[2] Unless … delicate Unless our delicacies were so delightful (that we should continue to eat).

[3] that … dispatched So we may resolve the issue and allow you to return to your king with our message.

[4] [Andrea's Ghost and Revenge have remained onstage since Act 1, Scene 1.]

[5] from hence Before we leave.

[6] fell despite Fierce contempt.

[7] haggard … lure Wild birds of prey will eventually take their trainer's bait.

[8] Pan and Marsyas Pan, classical god of the shepherds, and Marsyas, who is portrayed as a satyr or as a simple peasant, both initiated flute-playing competitions with Apollo; quill Pen or musical instrument.

[9] uprear her state Gain a greater social rank.

BALTHAZAR. My summer's day will turn to winter's night.
LORENZO. I have already found a stratagem,
To sound the bottom[1] of this doubtful theme.
My lord, for once you shall be ruled by me:
Hinder me not whate'er you hear or see.
By force or fair means will I cast about
To find the truth of all this question out.
Ho, Pedringano!
PEDRINGANO. [Within] Signior!
LORENZO. Vien qui presto.[2]

(Enter Pedringano.)

PEDRINGANO. Hath your lordship any service to command me?
LORENZO. Ay, Pedringano, service of import.° importance
And not to spend the time in trifling words,
Thus stands the case: it is not long thou know'st,
Since I did shield thee from my father's wrath,
For thy conveyance[3] in Andrea's love,
For which thou wert adjudged° to punishment. condemned
I stood betwixt thee and thy punishment;
And since, thou know'st how I have favoured thee.
Now to these favours will I add reward,
Not with fair words, but store° of golden coin, plenty
And lands and living joined with dignities,° dignitaries
If thou but satisfy my just demand.
Tell truth and have me for thy lasting friend.
PEDRINGANO. Whate'er it be your lordship shall demand,
My bounden duty bids me tell the truth,
If case it lie in me[4] to tell the truth.
LORENZO. Then, Pedringano, this is my demand:
Whom loves my sister Bel-Imperia?
For she reposeth° all her trust in thee— places
Speak man, and gain both friendship and reward:
I mean, whom loves she in Andrea's place?
PEDRINGANO. Alas, my lord, since Don Andrea's
death,
I have no credit with her as before,
And therefore know not if she love or no.
LORENZO. Nay, if thou dally then I am thy foe,
[Draws his sword.]
And fear shall force what friendship cannot win.
Thy death shall bury what thy life conceals.
Thou diest for more esteeming her[5] than me.
PEDRINGANO. O, stay,° my lord. stop
LORENZO. Yet speak the truth and I will guerdon thee,
And shield thee from whatever can ensue,
And will conceal whate'er proceeds from thee:
But if thou dally once again, thou diest.
PEDRINGANO. If Madam Bel-Imperia be in love—LORENZO. What, villain, ifs and ands? [Threatens to kill him.]
PEDRINGANO. O stay my lord, she loves Horatio.

[Balthazar starts back.]

LORENZO. What, Don Horatio our Knight Marshal's son?
PEDRINGANO. Even him my lord.
LORENZO. Now say but how know'st thou he is her love,
And thou shalt find me kind and liberal:
Stand up, I say, and fearless tell the truth.
PEDRINGANO. She sent him letters which myself perused,
Full-fraught with lines and arguments of love,
Preferring him before Prince Balthazar.
LORENZO. Swear on this cross[6] that what thou say'st is true,
And that thou wilt conceal what thou hast told.
PEDRINGANO. I swear to both by him that made us all.
LORENZO. In hope thine oath is true, here's thy reward,
But if I prove thee perjured and unjust,° untruthful
This very sword whereon thou took'st thine oath,
Shall be the worker of thy tragedy.
PEDRINGANO. What I have said is true, and shall for me
Be still concealed from Bel-Imperia.
Besides, your honour's liberality
Deserves my duteous service even till death.

[1] To sound the bottom To explore the deepest levels of this situation.

[2] Vien qui presto Italian: Come here at once.

[3] For thy conveyance For your covert dealings.

[4] If … me If it is within my ability.

[5] for more … her For regarding her more highly.

[6] on this cross On my sword. This was a common gesture when making oaths.

LORENZO. Let this be all that thou shall do for me:
Be watchful when, and where, these lovers meet,
And give me notice in some secret sort.[1]
PEDRINGANO. I will my lord.
LORENZO. Then shalt thou find that I am liberal.
Thou know'st that I can more advance thy state
Than she, be therefore wise and fail me not.
Go and attend her as thy custom is,
Lest absence make her think thou dost amiss.

(Exit Pedringano.)

Why so: tam armis quam ingenio:[2]
Where words prevail not, violence prevails;
But gold doth more than either of them both.
How likes Prince Balthazar this stratagem?
BALTHAZAR. Both well, and ill: it makes me glad and sad:
Glad, that I know the hinderer of my love,
Sad, that I fear she hates me whom I love.
Glad, that I know on whom to be revenged,
Sad, that she'll fly me if I take revenge.
Yet must I take revenge or die myself,
For love resisted grows impatient.
I think Horatio be my destined plague:
First, in his hand he brandished a sword,
And with that sword he fiercely waged war,
And in that war he gave me dangerous wounds,
And by those wounds he forced me to yield,
And by my yielding I became his slave.
Now in his mouth he carries pleasing words,
Which pleasing words do harbour sweet conceits,° pleasurable thoughts
Which sweet conceits are limed[3] with sly deceits,
Which sly deceits smooth° Bel-Imperia's ears, pacify
And through her ears dive down into her heart,
And in her heart set him where I should stand.
Thus hath he ta'en my body by his force,
And now by sleight would captivate my soul:
But in his fall I'll tempt the destinies,
And either lose my life, or win my love.
LORENZO. Let's go, my lord, your staying stays revenge.[4]
Do you but follow me and gain your love:
Her favour must be won by his remove.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 2, SCENE 2

(Enter Horatio and Bel-Imperia.)

HORATIO. Now, madam, since by favour of your love
Our hidden smoke is turned to open flame,
And that with looks and words we feed our thoughts
(Two chief contents,[5] where more cannot be had),
Thus in the midst of love's fair blandishments,[6]
Why show you sign of inward languishments?

(Pedringano showeth all to the Prince and Lorenzo, placing them in secret [above.])[7]

BEL-IMPERIA. My heart, sweet friend,° is like a ship at sea: lover
She wisheth port, where riding all at ease,
She may repair what stormy times have worn,
And leaning on the shore, may sing with joy
That pleasure follows pain, and bliss annoy.[8]
Possession of thy love is th'only port,
Wherein my heart, with fears and hopes long tossed,
Each hour doth wish and long to make resort;
There to repair the joys that it hath lost,
And sitting safe, to sing in Cupid's choir
That sweetest bliss is crown of love's desire.
BALTHAZAR. O sleep mine eyes, see not my love profaned;
Be deaf, my ears, hear not my discontent;
Die, heart, another joys° what thou deservest. enjoys

[1] secret sort Ploy or ruse.

[2] tam ... ingenio Latin: as much by arms as by intelligence.

[3] limed Turned into traps, as when tree branches were covered with birdlime, a substance that would stick to birds' feet.

[4] your ... revenge Your persistent discussion of the matter prevents our taking action.

[5] contents Reasons for being content.

[6] blandishments Cajoling speeches.

[7] in secret [above] On the gallery or balcony, meaning that their conversation will not be overheard by those on the main stage.

[8] bliss annoy That bliss follows annoyance.

LORENZO. Watch still mine eyes, to see this love disjoined;
Hear still mine ears, to hear them both lament;
Live, heart, to joy at fond° Horatio's fall. unwise
BEL-IMPERIA. Why stands Horatio speechless all this while?
HORATIO. The less I speak, the more I meditate.
BEL-IMPERIA. But whereon dost thou chiefly meditate?
HORATIO. On dangers past, and pleasures to ensue.
BALTHAZAR. On pleasures past, and dangers to ensue.
BEL-IMPERIA. What dangers and what pleasures dost thou mean?
HORATIO. Dangers of war and pleasures of our love.
LORENZO. Dangers of death, but pleasures none at all.
BEL-IMPERIA. Let dangers go, thy war shall be with me,
But such a war as breaks no bond of peace.
Speak thou fair words, I'll cross° them with fair words; counteract
Send thou sweet looks, I'll meet[1] them with sweet looks;
Write loving lines, I'll answer loving lines;
Give me a kiss, I'll countercheck thy kiss:
Be this our warring peace, or peaceful war.
HORATIO. But gracious madam, then appoint the field
Where trial of this war shall first be made.
BALTHAZAR. Ambitious villain, how his boldness grows!
BEL-IMPERIA. Then be thy father's pleasant bower[2] the field,
Where first we vowed a mutual amity:
The court were dangerous, that place is safe.
Our hour shall be when Vesper[3] gins to rise,
That summons home distressful° travellers. tired
There none shall hear us but the harmless birds:
Happily° the gentle nightingale possibly Shall carol us asleep ere we be ware,° aware
And singing with the prickle at her breast,[4]
Tell our delight and mirthful dalliance.
Till then each hour will seem a year and more.
HORATIO. But, honey sweet, and honourable love,
Return we now into your father's sight:
Dangerous suspicion waits on our delight.
LORENZO. Ay, danger mixed with jealious[5] despite Shall send thy soul into eternal night.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 2, SCENE 3

(Enter King of Spain, Portingale Ambassador, Don Cyprian [Duke of Castile], etc.)

KING. Brother of Castile, to the prince's love
What says your daughter Bel-Imperia?
CASTILE. Although she coy it[6] as becomes her kind,
And yet dissemble that[7] she loves the prince,
I doubt not, I, but she will stoop in time.
And were she froward,° which she will not be, unmanageable
Yet herein shall she follow my advice,
Which is to love him or forgo my love.
KING. Then, Lord Ambassador of Portingale,
Advise thy king to make this marriage up,
For strengthening of our late-confirmed league,
I know no better means to make us friends.
Her dowry shall be large and liberal:
Besides that she is daughter and half-heir
Unto our brother here, Don Cyprian,
And shall enjoy the moiety° of his land, half share
I'll grace her marriage with an uncle's gift.
And this it is: in case the match go forward,
The tribute which you pay shall be released,
And if by Balthazar she have a son,
He shall enjoy the kingdom[8] after us.
AMBASSADOR. I'll make the motion to my sovereign liege,
And work it if my counsel may prevail.
KING. Do so, my lord, and if he give consent,
I hope his presence here will honour us
In celebration of the nuptial day—
And let himself determine of the time.

[1] meet I.e., in combat.

[2] bower Also called arbor, a branch-covered alcove found in a garden.

[3] Vesper The evening star, also called Venus.

[4] singing ... breast It was believed that the nightingale sang its sad songs with its breast pressed to a thorn.

[5] jealious Variant of "jealous." The word must be pronounced with three syllables, in order to maintain the meter.

[6] coy it Feigns shyness.

[7] dissemble that Denies that.

[8] the kingdom I.e., the unified kingdom of Spain and Portugal.

AMBASSADOR. Will't please your grace command me aught beside?
KING. Commend me to the king,[1] and so farewell.
But where's Prince Balthazar to take his leave?
AMBASSADOR. That is performed already, my good lord.
KING. Amongst the rest of what you have in charge,
The prince's ransom must not be forgot;
That's none of mine, but his that took him prisoner,
And well his forwardness deserves reward:
It was Horatio, our Knight Marshal's son.
AMBASSADOR. Between us there's a price already pitched,° established
And shall be sent with all convenient speed.
KING. Then once again farewell, my lord.
AMBASSADOR. Farewell, my Lord of Castile and the rest.

(Exit.)

KING. Now, brother, you must take some little pains
To win fair Bel-Imperia from her will:[2]
Young virgins must be ruled by their friends.
The prince is amiable, and loves her well,
If she neglect him and forgo his love,
She both will wrong her own estate and ours.
Therefore, whiles I do entertain the prince
With greatest pleasure that our court affords,
Endeavour you to win your daughter's thought:
If she give back,[3] all this will come to naught.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 2, SCENE 4

(Enter Horatio, Bel-Imperia, and Pedringano.)

HORATIO. Now that the night begins with sable° wings black
To overcloud the brightness of the sun,
And that in darkness pleasures may be done,
Come Bel-Imperia, let us to the bower,
And there in safety pass a pleasant hour.
BEL-IMPERIA. I follow thee my love, and will not back,° withdraw
Although my fainting heart controls° my soul. overtakes
HORATIO. Why, make you doubt of Pedringano's faith?
BEL-IMPERIA. No, he is as trusty as my second self.
Go Pedringano, watch without° the gate, outside
And let us know if any make approach.
PEDRINGANO. [Aside] Instead of watching, I'll deserve more gold
By fetching Don Lorenzo to this match.

(Exit Pedringano.)

HORATIO. What means my love?
BEL-IMPERIA. I know not what myself.
And yet my heart foretells me some mischance.
HORATIO. Sweet say not so, fair fortune is our friend,
And heavens have shut up day to pleasure us.
The stars thou[4] see'st hold back their twinkling shine,
And Luna° hides herself to pleasure us. the moon
BEL-IMPERIA. Thou hast prevailed, I'll conquer my misdoubt,
And in thy love and counsel drown my fear.
I fear no more, love now is all my thoughts.
Why sit we not? for pleasure asketh ease.
HORATIO. The more thou sit'st within these leafy bowers,
The more will Flora[5] deck it with her flowers.
BEL-IMPERIA. Ay, but if Flora spy Horatio here,
Her jealous eye will think I sit too near.
HORATIO. Hark, madam, how the birds record° by night, sing
For joy that Bel-Imperia sits in sight.
BEL-IMPERIA. No, Cupid[6] counterfeits the nightingale,
To frame sweet music to Horatio's tale.
HORATIO. If Cupid sing, then Venus is not far:
Ay, thou art Venus or some fairer star.

[1] king I.e., Viceroy.

[2] will Willfulness or stubbornness. Also carries a sexual suggestion of eagerness.

[3] give back Turns away from us and refuses our deal.

[4] thou A more intimate form of address than "you."

[5] Flora Roman goddess of flowers and a symbol of fertility.

[6] Cupid Roman god of love, often depicted as the son of Venus.

BEL-IMPERIA. If I be Venus, thou must needs be Mars,[1]
And where Mars reigneth, there must needs be wars.
HORATIO. Then thus begin our wars: put forth thy hand,
That it may combat with my ruder hand.
BEL-IMPERIA. Set forth thy foot to try the push of mine.
HORATIO. But first my looks shall combat against thine.
BEL-IMPERIA. Then ward° thyself: I dart this kiss at thee. guard
HORATIO. Thus I retort the dart thou threw'st at me.
BEL-IMPERIA. Nay then, to gain the glory of the field,
My twining arms shall yoke[2] and make thee yield.
HORATIO. Nay then, my arms are large and strong withal:
Thus elms by vines are compassed till they fall.[3]
BEL-IMPERIA. O let me go, for in my troubled eyes
Now may'st thou read that life in passion dies.° orgasms
HORATIO. O stay a while and I will die with thee,
So shalt thou yield and yet have conquered me.
BEL-IMPERIA. Who's there? Pedringano? We are betrayed!

(Enter Lorenzo, Balthazar, Serberine, Pedringano, disguised.)

LORENZO. My lord, away with her, take her aside.
O sir, forbear, your valour is already tried.° tested
Quickly dispatch, my masters.

(They hang him in the arbour.)

HORATIO. What, will you murder me?
LORENZO. Ay, thus, and thus; these are the fruits of love.[4]

(They stab him.)

BEL-IMPERIA. O save his life and let me die for him!
O save him, brother, save him, Balthazar:
I loved Horatio, but he loved not me.
BALTHAZAR. But Balthazar loves Bel-Imperia.
LORENZO. Although his life were still ambitious proud,[5]
Yet is he at the highest[6] now he is dead.
BEL-IMPERIA. Murder! murder! Help, Hieronimo, help!
LORENZO. Come, stop her mouth, away with her.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 2, SCENE 5

(Enter Hieronimo in his shirt,° etc.) nightshirt

HIERONIMO. What outcries pluck me from my naked bed,
And chill my throbbing heart with trembling fear,
Which never danger yet could daunt before?
Who calls Hieronimo? Speak, here I am.
I did not slumber, therefore 'twas no dream,
No, no, it was some woman cried for help,
And here within this garden did she cry,
And in this garden must I rescue her.
But stay, what murderous spectacle is this?
A man hanged up and all the murderers gone,
And in my bower to lay the guilt on me.
This place was made for pleasure not for death.

(He cuts him down.)

Those garments that he wears I oft have seen—
Alas, it is Horatio, my sweet son!
Oh no, but he that whilom° was my son. formerly
O was it thou that calledst me from my bed?
O speak, if any spark of life remain:
I am thy father. Who hath slain my son?
What savage monster, not of human kind,
Hath here been glutted with thy harmless blood,

[1] Venus ... Mars Bel-Imperia refers to the illicit affair between Venus, Roman goddess of love, and Mars, god of war.

[2] yoke Join together, as in battle.

[3] elms ... fall Reversal of the popular depiction of Venus as vines, sustaining the elm tree rather than destroying it, as the vines do here.

[4] fruits of love Profane play on the crucifixion of Christ, often depicted as the sacrifice of the fruit of love in order to negate the effects of the forbidden fruit that brought about original sin.

[5] his life ... proud He was always seeking a greater position, one of more pride.

[6] at the highest Hanging in the arbor, and also referring to the highest point on the wheel of Fortune.

And left thy bloody corpse dishonoured[1] here,
For me, amidst this dark and deathful shades,
To drown thee with an ocean of my tears?
O heavens, why made you night to cover sin?
By day this deed of darkness had not been.
O earth, why didst thou not in time devour
The vile profaner of this sacred bower?
O poor Horatio, what hadst thou misdone,
To leese° thy life ere life was new begun? lose
O wicked butcher, whatsoe'er thou wert,
How could thou strangle virtue and desert?
Ay me most wretched, that have lost my joy,
In leesing my Horatio, my sweet boy!

(Enter Isabella.)

ISABELLA. My husband's absence makes my heart to throb—Hieronimo!
HIERONIMO. Here, Isabella, help me to lament,
For sighs are stopped° and all my tears are spent. stifled
ISABELLA. What world of grief! My son Horatio!
O where's the author of this endless woe?
HIERONIMO. To know the author were some ease of grief,
For in revenge my heart would find relief.
ISABELLA. Then is he gone? and is my son gone too?
O, gush out, tears, fountains and floods of tears;
Blow, sighs, and raise an everlasting storm:
For outrage fits our cursed wretchedness.

1602 text

[Ay me, Hieronimo, sweet husband, speak.[2]
HIERONIMO. He supped with us tonight, frolic and merry,
And said he would go visit Balthazar
At the duke's palace: there the prince doth lodge.
He had no custom to stay out so late,
He may be in his chamber; some go see.
Roderigo,[3] ho!

(Enter Pedro and Jaques.)

ISABELLA. Ay me, he raves. Sweet Hieronimo!
HIERONIMO. True, all Spain takes note of it.
Besides, he is so generally beloved
His majesty the other day did grace him
With waiting on his cup: these be favours
Which do assure he cannot be short-lived.
ISABELLA. Sweet Hieronimo!
HIERONIMO. I wonder how this fellow got his clothes?[4]
Sirrah, sirrah, I'll know the truth of all:
Jaques, run to the Duke of Castile's presently,
And bid my son Horatio to come home:
I and his mother have had strange dreams tonight.
Do you hear me, sir?
JAQUES. Ay, sir.
HIERONIMO. Well sir, be gone.
Pedro, come hither: knowest thou who this is?
PEDRO. Too well, sir.
HIERONIMO. Too well? Who? Who is it? Peace, Isabella:
Nay, blush not, man.
PEDRO. It is my lord Horatio.
HIERONIMO. Ha, ha! Saint James, but this doth make me laugh,
That there are more deluded than myself.
PEDRO. Deluded?
HIERONIMO. Ay, I would have sworn myself within this hour
That this had been my son Horatio,
His garments are so like.
Ha! are they not great persuasions?
ISABELLA. O, would to God it were not so!
HIERONIMO. Were not, Isabella? Dost thou dream it is?
Can thy soft bosom entertain a thought
That such a black deed of mischief should be done
On one so pure and spotless as our son?
Away, I am ashamed.

[1] dishonoured Hanging was usually punishment for crime, and a highly dishonorable way to die.

[2] Ay … speak With this line begins the first of several passages added to the text in the 1602 edition of the play; see the introduction for a discussion of the textual issues. The text of the 1592 edition resumes with the line, "Sweet lovely rose, ill plucked before thy time."

[3] Roderigo It is unclear to whom Hieronimo is calling, since no Roderigo appears in this scene.

[4] I … clothes I.e., how did this strange commoner get my son's clothes? Hieronimo is attempting to convince himself that the body is not Horatio's.

ISABELLA. Dear Hieronimo,
Cast a more serious eye upon thy grief:
Weak apprehension gives but weak belief.
HIERONIMO. It was a man, sure, that was hanged up here;
A youth, as I remember: I cut him down.
If it should prove my son now after all—
Say you, say you, light! Lend me a taper,
Let me look again. O God!
Confusion, mischief, torment, death and hell,
Drop all your stings at once in my cold bosom,
That now is stiff with horror; kill me quickly:
Be gracious to me, thou infective night,
And drop this deed of murder down on me;
Gird in my waste of grief[1] with thy large darkness,
And let me not survive to see the light
May put me in the mind I had a son.
ISABELLA. O, sweet Horatio. O, my dearest son!
HIERONIMO. How strangely had I lost my way to grief![2]]

1602 text

Sweet lovely rose, ill plucked before thy time,
Fair worthy son, not conquered, but betrayed:
I'll kiss thee now, for words with tears are stayed.° halted
ISABELLA. And I'll close up the glasses of his sight,[3]
For once these eyes were only my delight.
HIERONIMO. See'st thou this handkercher[4] besmeared with blood?
It shall not from me till I take revenge.
See'st thou those wounds that yet are bleeding fresh?
I'll not entomb them till I have revenged.
Then will I joy amidst my discontent,
Till then my sorrow never shall be spent.
ISABELLA. The heavens are just, murder cannot be hid:
Time is the author both of truth and right,
And time will bring this treachery to light.
HIERONIMO. Meanwhile, good Isabella, cease thy plaints,° laments
Or at the least dissemble them awhile:
So shall we sooner find the practice° out, scheme
And learn by whom all this was brought about.
Come Isabel, now let us take him up,

(They take him up.)

And bear him in from out this cursed place.
I'll say his dirge,[5] singing fits not this case.
O aliquis mihi quas pulchrum ver educat herbas

(Hieronimo sets his breast unto his sword.)

Misceat, et nostro detur medicina dolori;
Aut, si qui faciunt animis oblivia, succos
Praebeat; ipse metam magnum quaecunque per orbem
Gramina Sol pulchras effert in luminis oras;
Ipse bibam quicquid meditatur saga veneni,
Quicquid et herbarum vi caeca nenia nectit:
Omnia perpetiar, lethum quoque, dum semel omnis
Noster in extincto moriatur pectore sensus.
Ergo tuos oculos nunquam, mea vita, videbo,
Et tua perpetuus sepelivit lumina somnus?
Emoriar tecum: sic, sic juvat ire sub umbras.
At tamen absistam properato cedere letho,
Ne mortem vindicta tuam tum nulla sequatur.[6]

(Here he throws it [the sword] from him and bears the body away.)

---

[1] Gird … grief Enclose this vast wasteland of my grief.

[2] How … grief! This is the last line of the first addition of material from the 1602 edition of the play.

[3] glasses … sight I.e., his eyes.

[4] handkercher Possibly the scarf Horatio was wearing in memory of Andrea, once given as a love token by Bel-Imperia.

[5] dirge Funeral song or chant.

[6] O aliquis … sequatur Latin: Let someone blend together the herbs that beautiful spring brings forth, / and let a remedy be given for our misery; / or let him apply juices, if there are any that can render forgetfulness in minds; / I myself will amass anywhere in the great world / whatever herbs the sun brings forth into the splendid regions of light; / I myself will drink whatever potion the wise woman prepares, / and whatever herbs she blends together through magic's secret power. / I will face everything, even death, until the time / that all feeling is extinguished in my dead breast. / I shall never again in my life look into your eyes, / and has eternal slumber entombed your light of life? / I will die with you, thus, thus will I delight as I go to the shades beneath. / Nonetheless, I shall prevent in myself a hasty death, / in case that would result in no revenge following your death. (This passage constitutes a combination of lines from classical poets such as Virgil, Ovid, and Lucretius, with Kyd's original lines.)

ACT 2, SCENE 6

ANDREA. Brought'st thou me hither to increase my pain?
I looked° that Balthazar should have been slain; anticipated
But 'tis my friend Horatio that is slain,
And they abuse fair Bel-Imperia,
On whom I doted more than all the world,
Because she loved me more than all the world.
REVENGE. Thou talk'st of harvest when the corn° is green: grain
The end is crown of every work well done;
The sickle[1] comes not till the corn be ripe.
Be still, and ere I lead thee from this place,
I'll show thee Balthazar in heavy case.[2]

ACT 3, SCENE 1

(Enter Viceroy of Portingale, Nobles, Villuppo.)

VICEROY. Infortunate condition[3] of kings,
Seated amidst so many helpless° doubts! hopeless
First we are placed upon extremest height,
And oft supplanted with exceeding heat,
But ever subject to the wheel of chance;[4]
And at our highest never joy we so,
As we both doubt° and dread our overthrow. fear
So striveth not the waves with sundry winds
As Fortune toileth in the affairs of kings,
That would be feared, yet fear to be beloved,
Sith° fear or love to kings is flattery.[5] since
For instance, lordings,° look upon your king, lords
By hate deprived of his dearest son,
The only hope of our successive line.[6]
1 NOBLEMAN. I had not thought that Alexandro's heart
Had been envenomed with such extreme hate:
But now I see that words have several works,[7]
And there's no credit in the countenance.[8]
VILLUPPO. No, for, my lord, had you beheld the train° deceit
That feigned love had coloured° in his looks, concealed
When he in camp consorted° Balthazar, associated with Far more inconstant had you thought the sun,
That hourly coasts the centre of the earth,[9]
Than Alexandro's purpose to the prince.
VICEROY. No more, Villuppo, thou hast said enough,
And with thy words thou slay'st our wounded thoughts.
Nor shall I longer dally with the world,
Procrastinating Alexandro's death:
Go some of you and fetch the traitor forth,
That as he is condemned he may die.

(Enter Alexandro with a Nobleman and Halberts.[10])

2 NOBLEMAN. In such extremes will naught but patience serve.
ALEXANDRO. But in extremes what patience shall I use?
Nor discontents it me to leave the world,
With whom° there nothing can prevail but wrong. which
2 NOBLEMAN. Yet hope the best.
ALEXANDRO. 'Tis Heaven is my hope.
As for the earth, it is too much infect° corrupted
To yield me hope of any of her mould.[11]
VICEROY. Why linger ye? bring forth that daring fiend,
And let him die for his accursed deed.
ALEXANDRO. Not that I fear the extremity of death,
For nobles cannot stoop to servile fear,
Do I, O king, thus discontented live.
But this, O this, torments my labouring soul,
That thus I die suspected of a sin,
Whereof, as heavens have known my secret thoughts,

[1] sickle Symbol of the harvest or reaping. Also a symbol for death.

[2] in heavy case In a difficult position.

[3] condition Pronounced with four syllables to maintain the meter.

[4] wheel of chance Wheel of the goddess Fortune.

[5] Infortunate … flattery This speech comes from Seneca's Agamemnon, 57–73.

[6] successive line Royal line of succession.

[8] there's … countenance Appearance is not a reliable indicator of trustworthiness.

[9] the sun … earth The sun that routinely goes around the earth, reflecting the traditional understanding of the universe as encircling the earth.

[10] Halberts Halberd-bearing soldiers.

[11] To yield … mould For me to believe the best of any human created on earth.

So am I free from this suggestion.[1]
VICEROY. No more, I say! to the tortures! When![2]
Bind him, and burn his body in those flames,[3]

(They bind him to the stake.)

That shall prefigure those unquenched fires
Of Phlegethon[4] prepared for his soul.
ALEXANDRO. My guiltless death will be avenged on thee,
On thee, Villuppo, that hath maliced thus,
Or for thy meed° hast falsely me accused. profit
VILLUPPO. Nay, Alexandro, if thou menace me,
I'll lend a hand to send thee to the lake[5]
Where those thy words shall perish with thy works—
Injurious traitor, monstrous homicide!

(Enter Ambassador.)

AMBASSADOR. Stay, hold a while,
And here, with pardon of his majesty,
Lay hands upon Villuppo.
VICEROY. Ambassador,
What news hath urged this sudden entrance?
AMBASSADOR. Know, sovereign lord, that Balthazar doth live.
VICEROY. What say'st thou? Liveth Balthazar our son?
AMBASSADOR. Your highness' son, Lord Balthazar, doth live;
And, well entreated in the court of Spain,
Humbly commends him to your majesty.
These eyes beheld, and these my followers;
With these, the letters of the king's commends,° greetings

(Gives him letters.)

Are happy witnesses of his highness' health.

(The Viceroy looks on the letters, and proceeds.)

VICEROY. [Reading.] "Thy son doth live, your tribute is received,
Thy peace is made, and we are satisfied.
The rest resolve upon as things proposed
For both our honours and thy benefit."
AMBASSADOR. These are his highness' farther articles.

(He gives him more letters.)

VICEROY. Accursed wretch, to intimate these ills[6]
Against the life and reputation
Of noble Alexandro! Come, my lord,
Let him unbind thee that is bound to death,[7]
To make a quittal° for thy discontent. repayment

(They unbind him.)

ALEXANDRO. Dread lord, in kindness[8] you could do no less,
Upon report of such a damned fact.
But thus we see our innocence hath saved
The hopeless life which thou, Villuppo, sought
By thy suggestions to have massacred.
VICEROY. Say, false Villuppo, wherefore didst thou thus Falsely betray Lord Alexandro's life?
Him, whom thou knowest that no unkindness[9] else,
But even the slaughter of our dearest son,
Could once have moved us to have misconceived.° mistrusted
ALEXANDRO. Say, treacherous Villuppo, tell the king,
Wherein hath Alexandro used thee ill?
VILLUPPO. Rent with remembrance of so foul a deed,
My guilty soul submits me to thy doom:
For not for Alexandro's injuries,
But for reward and hope to be preferred,° promoted
Thus have I shamelessly hazarded his life.
VICEROY. Which, villain, shall be ransomed with thy death,

---

[1] suggestion Unfounded allegation.

[2] When! Exclamation intended to show eagerness.

[3] burn … flames In contrast, in England, burning at the stake was a sentence for heresy, not treason.

[4] Phlegethon One of the five rivers of fire in the classical underworld.

[5] lake The Acherusian lake said to be fed by the rivers Acheron and Phlegethon.

[6] intimate these ills Propagate these lies.

[7] Let him … death Let Villuppo, now destined himself for death, be the one to untie you.

[8] in kindness Because of your kingly nature.

[9] unkindness Ferocious act.

And not so mean a torment as we here
Devised for him who thou said'st slew our son,
But with the bitterest torments and extremes
That may be yet invented for thine end.

(Alexandro seems to entreat.)

Entreat me not, go, take the traitor hence.

(Exit Villuppo.)

And, Alexandro, let us honour thee
With public notice of thy loyalty.
To end those things articulated here[1]
By our great lord, the mighty King of Spain,
We with our Council will deliberate.
Come, Alexandro, keep us company.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 2

(Enter Hieronimo.)

HIERONIMO. O eyes, no eyes, but fountains fraught° with tears; filled
O life, no life, but lively° form of death; living
O world, no world, but mass of public wrongs,
Confused and filled with murder and misdeeds!
O sacred heavens! if this unhallowed deed,
If this inhuman and barbarous attempt,
If this incomparable murder thus
Of mine, but now no more my son,
Shall unrevealed and unrevenged pass,
How should we term your dealings to be just,
If you unjustly deal with those that in your justice trust?
The night, sad secretary° to my moans, confidant
With direful visions wake my vexed soul,
And with the wounds of my distressful son
Solicit me for notice° of his death. information
The ugly fiends do sally forth of hell,
And frame° my steps to unfrequented paths, direct
And fear° my heart with fierce inflamed thoughts. terrorize
The cloudy day my discontents records,
Early begins to register my dreams
And drive me forth to seek the murderer.
Eyes, life, world, heavens, hell, night, and day,
See, search, show, send some man, some mean, that may—

(A letter falleth.)

What's here? a letter? tush, it is not so!
A letter written to Hieronimo!

([Opens it.] Red ink.)[2]

"For want of ink, receive this bloody writ.
Me hath my hapless[3] brother hid from thee:
Revenge thyself on Balthazar and him,
For these were they that murdered thy son.
Hieronimo, revenge Horatio's death,
And better fare than Bel-Imperia doth."
What means this unexpected miracle?
My son slain by Lorenzo and the prince!
What cause had they Horatio to malign?[4]
Or what might move thee, Bel-Imperia,
To accuse thy brother, had he been the mean?
Hieronimo, beware, thou art betrayed,
And to entrap thy life this train° is laid. bait
Advise thee therefore, be not credulous:° gullible
This is devised to endanger thee,
That thou by this Lorenzo[5] shouldst accuse,
And he, for thy dishonour done, should draw
Thy life in question, and thy name in hate.
Dear was the life of my beloved son,
And of his death behoves me be revenged:
Then hazard not thine own, Hieronimo,

[1] To end … here To enact the terms in the letters, the treaty struck with Spain.

[2] Red ink This note is thought by most editors to be intended as confirmation that the letter is written in blood. The 1592 text labels the following six lines as being spoken by "Bel-Imperia," suggesting that she is supposed to read the letter at this point, rather than having the letter read aloud by Hieronimo.

[3] hapless Unfortunate (for the misfortune he brings upon me).

[4] malign Despise or conspire against.

[5] Lorenzo Referring to himself.

But live t'effect thy resolution.[1]
I therefore will by circumstances[2] try
What I can gather to confirm this writ,° letter
And, hearkening near the Duke of Castile's house,
Close° if I can with Bel-Imperia, come together
To listen more, but nothing to bewray.° reveal

(Enter Pedringano.)

Now Pedringano!
PEDRINGANO. Now, Hieronimo!
HIERONIMO. Where's thy lady?
PEDRINGANO. I know not; here's my lord.[3]

(Enter Lorenzo.)

LORENZO. How now, who's this? Hieronimo?
HIERONIMO. My lord.
PEDRINGANO. He asketh for my lady Bel-Imperia.
LORENZO. What to do, Hieronimo? The duke my father hath Upon some disgrace awhile removed her hence;
But if it be aught° I may inform her of, anything
Tell me, Hieronimo, and I'll let her know it.
HIERONIMO. Nay, nay, my lord, I thank you, it shall not need.[4]
I had a suit° unto her, but too late, petition
And her disgrace makes me unfortunate.
LORENZO. Why so, Hieronimo? use me.
HIERONIMO. O no, my lord, I dare not, it must not be,
I humbly thank your lordship.

1602 text

[HIERONIMO. Who, you, my lord?[5]
I reserve your favour for a greater honour;
This is a very toy[6] my lord, a toy.
LORENZO. All's one, Hieronimo, acquaint me with it.
HIERONIMO. I'faith, my lord, 'tis an idle° thing. unimportant
I must confess, I ha' been too slack,
Too tardy. Too remiss unto your honour.
LORENZO. How now, Hieronimo?
HIERONIMO. In troth, my lord, it is a thing of nothing,
The murder of a son, or so:
A thing of nothing, my lord.[7]]

1602 text

LORENZO. Why then, farewell.
HIERONIMO. My grief no heart, my thoughts no tongue can tell.

(Exit.)

LORENZO. Come hither, Pedringano, see'st thou this?
PEDRINGANO. My lord, I see it, and suspect it too.
LORENZO. This is that damned villain Serberine,
That hath, I fear, revealed Horatio's death.
PEDRINGANO. My lord, he could not, 'twas so lately done;
And since, he hath not left my company.
LORENZO. Admit he have not, his condition's° such, disposition
As fear or flattering words may make him false.
I know his humour,° and therewith repent nature
That e'er I used him in this enterprise.
But Pedringano, to prevent the worst,
And 'cause I know thee secret as my soul,
Here, for thy further satisfaction, take thou this,

(Gives him more gold.)

And hearken to me. Thus it is devised:
This night thou must, and prithee so resolve,
Meet Serberine at Saint Luigi's Park—
Thou know'st 'tis here hard° by behind the house. near
There take thy stand, and see thou strike him sure,
For die he must, if we do mean to live.
PEDRINGANO. But how shall Serberine be there, my lord?

[1] live … resolution Carry out the plan you have chosen.

[2] by circumstances By investigating the circumstantial evidence.

[3] my lord Pedringano's acknowledgment of Bel-Imperia's brother as his lord further demonstrates his shifting loyalty.

[4] it … need That will not be needed.

[5] Who … lord? With this line begins the second of several passages added to the text in the 1602 edition of the play. This passage was intended to replace Hieronimo's previous line ("O no, my lord, I dare not, it must not be, / I humbly thank your lordship.") The text of the 1592 edition resumes with the line, "Why, then farewell."

[6] toy Frivolous thing.

[7] A … lord This is the last line of the second addition of material from the 1602 edition of the play.

LORENZO. Let me alone,[1] I'll send to him to meet
The prince and me, where thou must do this deed.
PEDRINGANO. It shall be done, my lord, it shall be done,
And I'll go arm myself to meet him there.
LORENZO. When things shall alter, as I hope they will,
Then shalt thou mount[2] for this: thou know'st my mind.

(Exit Pedringano.)

Che le Ieron![3]

(Enter Page.)

PAGE. My lord?
LORENZO. Go, sirrah, to Serberine,
And bid him forthwith meet the prince and me
At Saint Luigi's Park, behind the house,
This evening, boy.
PAGE. I go, my lord.
LORENZO. But, sirrah, let the hour be eight o'clock.
Bid him not fail.
PAGE. I fly, my lord.

(Exit.)

LORENZO. Now to confirm the complot° thou hast cast conspiracy
Of all these practices, I'll spread the watch,[4]
Upon precise commandment from the king,
Strongly to guard the place where Pedringano
This night shall murder hapless Serberine.
Thus must we work that will avoid distrust,
Thus must we practise to prevent mishap,
And thus one ill another must expulse.[5]
This sly enquiry of Hieronimo
For Bel-Imperia breeds suspicion,
And this suspicion bodes a further ill.
As for myself, I know my secret fault;
And so do they, but I have dealt for them.
They that for coin their souls endangered,
To save my life, for coin shall venture theirs:
And better it's that base companions[6] die,
Than by their life to hazard our good haps.[7]
Nor shall they live, for me to fear their faith:[8]
I'll trust myself, myself shall be my friend,
For die they shall, slaves are ordained to no other end.

(Exit.)

ACT 3, SCENE 3

(Enter Pedringano with a pistol.)

PEDRINGANO. Now, Pedringano, bid thy pistol hold;° be dependable
And hold on, Fortune! once more favour me;
Give but success to mine attempting spirit,
And let me shift° for taking of mine aim! manage things
Here is the gold, this is the gold proposed:
It is no dream that I adventure for,
But Pedringano is possessed thereof.
And he that would not strain his conscience
For him that thus his liberal purse hath stretched,
Unworthy such a favour may he fail,
And, wishing, want, when such as I prevail.
As for the fear of apprehension,° capture
I know, if need should be, my noble lord
Will stand between me and ensuing harms;
Besides, this place is free from all suspect.° suspicion
Here therefore will I stay and take my stand.

(Enter the Watch.)

1 WATCH. I wonder much to what intent it is
That we are thus expressly charged to watch.
2 WATCH. 'Tis by commandment in the king's own name.

[1] Let me alone Leave it to me.

[2] mount Ascend in social positioning. This is also a play on mounting a scaffold to be hanged.

[3] Che le Ieron An Italian address to his page, possibly named Ieron (which may be a misprint of Jerome).

[4] spread the watch Direct the guards into position.

[5] And thus … expulse One wicked act must follow another to avoid suspicion.

[6] base companions Lowly accomplices, i.e., the servants who are involved.

[7] hazard … haps Expose our good fortune to danger.

[8] fear their faith Doubt their ability to remain loyal.

3 WATCH. But we were never wont to watch and ward[1]
So near the duke his brother's house before.
2 WATCH. Content yourself, stand close, there's somewhat in't.[2]

(Enter Serberine.)

SERBERINE. Here, Serberine, attend and stay thy pace,
For here did Don Lorenzo's page appoint
That thou by his command shouldst meet with him.
How fit a place, if one were so disposed,
Methinks this corner is, to close[3] with one.
PEDRINGANO. Here comes the bird that I must seize upon;
Now, Pedringano, or never, play the man!
SERBERINE. I wonder that his lordship stays so long,
Or wherefore should he send for me so late?
PEDRINGANO. For this, Serberine, and thou shalt ha't.

(Shoots the dag.)° large pistol

So, there he lies, my promise is performed.

(The Watch [come forward.])

1 WATCH. Hark gentlemen, this is a pistol shot.
2 WATCH. And here's one slain; stay° the murderer. seize PEDRINGANO. Now by the sorrows of the souls in hell,

(He strives with the Watch.)

Who first lays hand on me, I'll be his priest.[4]
3 WATCH. Sirrah, confess, and therein play the priest;
Why hast thou thus unkindly killed the man?
PEDRINGANO. Why? because he walked abroad so late.
3 WATCH. Come sir, you had been better kept your bed,
Than have committed this misdeed so late.
2 WATCH. Come, to the marshal's with the murderer!
1 WATCH. On to Hieronimo's! help me here
To bring the murdered body with us too.
PEDRINGANO. Hieronimo? Carry me before whom you will,
Whate'er he be I'll answer him and you.
And do your worst, for I defy you all.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 4

(Enter Lorenzo and Balthazar.)

BALTHAZAR. How now, my lord, what makes you rise so soon?
LORENZO. Fear of preventing our mishaps too late.
BALTHAZAR. What mischief is it that we not mistrust?° foresee
LORENZO. Our greatest ills we least mistrust, my lord,
And inexpected harms do hurt us most.
BALTHAZAR. Why tell me Don Lorenzo, tell me man,
If aught concerns our honour and your own.
LORENZO. Nor you nor me, my lord, but both in one;
For I suspect, and the presumption's great,
That by those base confederates in our fault[5]
Touching the death of Don Horatio,
We are betrayed to old Hieronimo.
BALTHAZAR. Betrayed, Lorenzo? tush, it cannot be.
LORENZO. A guilty conscience, urged with the thought
Of former evils, easily cannot err:
I am persuaded, and dissuade me not,
That all's revealed to Hieronimo.
And therefore know that I have cast° it thus— planned

[Enter Page.]

But here's the page. How now, what news with thee?
PAGE. My lord, Serberine is slain.
BALTHAZAR. Who? Serberine, my man?
PAGE. Your highness' man, my lord.
LORENZO. Speak page, who murdered him?
PAGE. He that is apprehended for the fact.
LORENZO. Who?
PAGE. Pedringano.

---

[1] never wont … ward Unaccustomed to patrol and guard as watchman.

[2] somewhat in't Something happening.

[3] close Have a covert meeting or confrontation.

[4] I'll … priest I will assist him into the afterlife (by killing him).

[5] base confederates … fault Low-class accomplices to our crime.

BALTHAZAR. Is Serberine slain, that loved his lord so well?
Injurious villain, murderer of his friend!
LORENZO. Hath Pedringano murdered Serberine?
My lord, let me entreat you to take the pains
To exasperate° and hasten his revenge harshen
With your complaints unto my lord the king.
This their dissension breeds a greater doubt.[1]
BALTHAZAR. Assure thee, Don Lorenzo, he shall die,
Or else his highness hardly shall deny.
Meanwhile I'll haste the marshal sessions,[2]
For die he shall for this his damned deed.

(Exit Balthazar.)

LORENZO. Why so, this fits our former policy,° plot
And thus experience bids the wise to deal:
I lay the plot, he prosecutes the point;[3]
I set the trap, he breaks the worthless twigs,
And sees not that wherewith the bird was limed.° ensnared
Thus hopeful men, that mean to hold their own,
Must look like fowlers to their dearest friends.
He runs to kill whom I have holp° to catch, helped
And no man knows it was my reaching fatch.[4]
'Tis hard to trust unto a multitude,
Or anyone, in mine opinion,
When men themselves their secrets will reveal.

(Enter a Messenger with a letter.)

Boy.
PAGE. My lord?
LORENZO. What's he?
MESSENGER. I have a letter to your lordship.
LORENZO. From whence?
MESSENGER. From Pedringano that's imprisoned.
LORENZO. So he is in prison then?
MESSENGER. Ay, my good lord.
LORENZO. What would he with us? He writes us here
To stand good lord[5] and help him in distress.
Tell him I have his letters, know his mind,
And what we may, let him assure him of.
Fellow, begone: my boy shall follow thee.

(Exit Messenger.)

This works like wax;[6] yet once more try thy wits.
Boy, go convey this purse to Pedringano,
Thou knowest the prison, closely° give it him, covertly
And be advised that none be there about.
Bid him be merry still, but secret;
And though the marshal sessions be today,
Bid him not doubt of his delivery.
Tell him his pardon is already signed,
And thereon bid him boldly be resolved;
For, were he ready to be turned off° hanged
(As 'tis my will the uttermost be tried)
Thou with his pardon shalt attend him still.
Show him this box, tell him his pardon's in't,
But open't not, and if[7] thou lov'st thy life,
But let him wisely keep his hopes unknown;
He shall not want while Don Lorenzo lives.
Away!
PAGE. I go my lord, I run.
LORENZO. But sirrah,[8] see that this be cleanly done.

(Exit Page.)

Now stands our fortune on a tickle° point, insecure
And now or never ends Lorenzo's doubts.° concerns
One only thing is uneffected yet,
And that's to see the executioner.
But to what end? I list not[9] trust the air
With utterance of our pretence therein,
For fear the privy whispering of the wind
Convey our words amongst unfriendly ears,
That lie too open to advantages.

[1] their dissension ... doubt As they turn on each other, there is a greater chance that our crimes will come to light.

[2] marshal sessions Hearings that the Knight Marshal was tasked with overseeing.

[3] prosecutes the point Follows it to conclusion.

[4] reaching fatch Far-ranging deception.

[5] To stand good lord To play the part of a generous patron.

[6] This ... wax This outcome can easily be shaped, like wax.

[7] and if Heavy emphasis on "if."

[8] sirrah Form of address used when speaking to children, or to those of a lower social status.

[9] I list not I do not wish to.

E quel che voglio io, nessun lo sa;
Intendo io: quel mi basterà.[1]

(Exit.)

ACT 3, SCENE 5

(Enter Boy with the box.)

BOY. My master hath forbidden me to look in this box, and by my troth 'tis likely, if he had not warned me, I should not have had so much idle time; for we men's-kind in our minority are like women in their uncertainty:[2] that they are most forbidden, they will soonest attempt. So I now. By my bare honesty, here's nothing but the bare empty box.[3] Were it not sin against secrecy, I would say it were a piece of gentleman-like knavery. I must go to Pedringano, and tell him his pardon is in this box; nay, I would have sworn it, had I not seen the contrary. I cannot choose but smile to think how the villain will flout the gallows, scorn the audience, and descant on[4] the hangman, and all presuming of his pardon from hence. Will't not be an odd jest, for me to stand and grace[5] every jest he makes, pointing my finger at this box, as who would say, "Mock on, here's thy warrant." Is't not a scurvy[6] jest that a man should jest himself to death? Alas, poor Pedringano, I am in a sort sorry for thee, but if I should be hanged with thee, I cannot weep.

(Exit.)

ACT 3, SCENE 6

(Enter Hieronimo and the Deputy.)[7]

HIERONIMO. Thus must we toil in other men's extremes,° misfortunes
That know not how to remedy our own;
And do them justice, when unjustly we,
For all our wrongs, can compass° no redress. accomplish
But shall I never live to see the day
That I may come, by justice of the heavens,
To know the cause° that may my cares allay? legal case
This toils my body, this consumeth age,
That only I to all men just must be,
And neither gods nor men be just to me.
DEPUTY. Worthy Hieronimo, your office asks° calls for
A care to punish[8] such as do transgress.
HIERONIMO. So is't my duty to regard° his death give care to
Who when he lived deserved my dearest blood.
But come, for that we came for, let's begin,
For here lies that which bids me to be gone.

(Enter Officers, [Hangman], Boy, and Pedringano, with a letter in his hand, bound.)

DEPUTY. Bring forth the prisoner, for the court is set.
PEDRINGANO. Gramercy,° boy, but it was time to come; thank you
For I had written to my lord anew
A nearer° matter that concerneth him, more personal
For fear his lordship had forgotten me.
But sith° he hath remembered me so well— since
Come, come, come on, when shall we to this gear?[9]
HIERONIMO. Stand forth, thou monster, murderer of men,
And here, for satisfaction of the world,
Confess thy folly and repent thy fault,
For there's thy place of execution.

[1] E quel … basterà Italian: And what I want, no one knows; it is enough that I do.

[2] idle time Free time; in our minority Because the female characters on the Elizabethan stage were played by boys, the boy cast as the page might also double as Isabella, making this line spoken by him function as metatheatrical humor; uncertainty Flightiness.

[3] bare empty box Possible allusion to Pandora's box, from which the world's evils escaped when she opened it. May also allude to the Silenus box appearing in Plato's Symposium, that was used to illustrate the difference between illusion and reality.

[4] flout Scoff or sneer at; descant on To remark on, often critically.

[5] grace Enhance.

[6] scurvy Pitiful.

[7] Deputy Official title of Hieronimo as the Knight Marshal's assistant.

[8] A care to punish Serious attention to be given to the matter of punishing.

[9] this gear Equipment. Here, referring to the hangman's apparatus.

PEDRINGANO. This is short work! Well, to your marshalship
First I confess, nor fear I death therefore,
I am the man, 'twas I slew Serberine.
But sir, then you think this shall be the place
Where we shall satisfy you for this gear?
DEPUTY. Ay, Pedringano.
PEDRINGANO. Now I think not so.
HIERONIMO. Peace, impudent, for thou shall find it so:
For blood with blood shall, while I sit as judge,
Be satisfied, and the law discharged.
And though myself cannot receive the like,
Yet will I see that others have their right.
Dispatch, the fault's approved and confessed,
And by our law he is condemned to die.
HANGMAN. Come on sir, are you ready?
PEDRINGANO. To do what, my fine officious knave?
HANGMAN. To go to this gear.
PEDRINGANO. O sir, you are too forward; thou wouldst fain furnish me with a halter,[1] to disfurnish me of my habit.[2] So I should go out of this gear, my raiment, into that gear, the rope. But, hangman, now I spy your knavery, I'll not change without boot,[3] that's flat.
HANGMAN. Come, sir.
PEDRINGANO. So then, I must up?
HANGMAN. No remedy.
PEDRINGANO. Yes, but there shall be for my coming down.
HANGMAN. Indeed, here's a remedy for that.
PEDRINGANO. How? Be turned off?[4]
HANGMAN. Ay, truly; come, are you ready? I pray, sir, dispatch, the day goes away.
PEDRINGANO. What, do you hang by the hour? If you do, I may chance to break your old custom.
HANGMAN. Faith, you have reason, for I am like to break your young neck.
PEDRINGANO. Dost thou mock me, hangman? Pray God I be not preserved to break your knave's pate[5] for this.
HANGMAN. Alas, sir, you are a foot too low to reach it, and I hope you will never grow so high while I am in the office.
PEDRINGANO. Sirrah, dost see yonder boy with the box in his hand?
HANGMAN. What, he that points to it with his finger?
PEDRINGANO. Ay, that companion.
HANGMAN. I know him not, but what of him?
PEDRINGANO. Dost thou think to live till his old doublet will make thee a new truss?[6]
HANGMAN. Ay, and many a fair year after, to truss up[7] many an honester man than either thou or he.
PEDRINGANO. What hath he in his box, as thou think'st?
HANGMAN. Faith, I cannot tell, nor I care not greatly. Methinks you should rather hearken[8] to your soul's health.
PEDRINGANO. Why, sirrah hangman, I take it that what is good for the body is likewise good for the soul; and it may be, in that box is balm for both.
HANGMAN. Well, thou art even the merriest piece of man's flesh that e'er groaned at my office door.
PEDRINGANO. Is your roguery become an office with a knave's name?
HANGMAN. Ay, and that shall all they witness that see you seal it with a thief's name.
PEDRINGANO. I prithee, request this good company to pray with me.
HANGMAN. Ay marry sir, this is a good motion;[9] my masters, you see here's a good fellow.
PEDRINGANO. Nay, nay, now I remember me, let them alone till some other time, for now I have no great need.
HIERONIMO. I have not seen a wretch so impudent!
O monstrous times, where murder's set so light;
And where the soul that should be shrined in heaven,
Solely delights in interdicted° things, forbidden
Still wandering in the thorny passages
That intercepts itself of happiness.

[1] fain ... halter Happily provide me with a noose.

[2] disfurnish ... habit To take possession of my clothing. This was the customary compensation for a hangman.

[3] without boot Without benefit or compensation, with a footwear pun.

[4] turned off To be pushed from a stool or ladder to hang from the noose. At this time, hanging was often simple strangulation by rope.

[5] pate Skull or crown.

[6] truss Tightly fitted jacket or pants.

[7] truss up String up on the hanging scaffold.

[8] hearken Pay attention to.

[9] motion Proposition.

Murder, O bloody monster, God forbid
A fault so foul should 'scape unpunished.
Dispatch and see this execution done—
This makes me to remember thee, my son.

(Exit Hieronimo.)

PEDRINGANO. Nay soft,° no haste. wait
DEPUTY. Why, wherefore stay you? Have you hope of life?
PEDRINGANO. Why, ay.
HANGMAN. As how?
PEDRINGANO. Why, rascal, by my pardon from the king.
HANGMAN. Stand° you on that? then you shall off with this. rely

(He turns him off.)[1]

DEPUTY. So, executioner. Convey him hence,
But let his body be unburied:
Let not the earth be choked or infect
With that which heaven contemns,° and men neglect. abhors

(Exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 7

(Enter Hieronimo.)

HIERONIMO. Where shall I run to breathe abroad° my woes, speak of
My woes whose weight hath wearied the earth?
Or mine exclaims, that have surcharged the air
With ceaseless plaints for my deceased son?
The blustering winds, conspiring with my words,
At my lament have moved the leafless trees,[2]
Disrobed the meadows of their flowered green,
Made mountains marsh with spring-tides of my tears,
And broken through the brazen gates of hell.
Yet still tormented is my tortured soul
With broken sighs and restless passions,
That winged mount, and hovering in the air,
Beat at the windows of the brightest heavens,
Soliciting for justice and revenge;
But they are placed in those empyreal[3] heights,
Where, countermured[4] with walls of diamond,
I find the place impregnable; and they
Resist my woes, and give my words no way.

(Enter Hangman with a letter.)

HANGMAN. O lord sir, God bless you sir, the man sir, Petergade[5] sir, he that was so full of merry conceits—
HIERONIMO. Well, what of him?
HANGMAN. O lord sir, he went the wrong way, the fellow had a fair commission to the contrary. Sir, here is his passport; I pray you sir, we have done him wrong.[6]
HIERONIMO. I warrant thee,[7] give it me.
HANGMAN. You will stand between the gallows and me?
HIERONIMO. Ay, ay.
HANGMAN. I thank your Lord Worship.

(Exit Hangman.)

HIERONIMO. And yet, though somewhat nearer me concerns,[8]
I will, to ease the grief that I sustain,
Take truce with sorrow while I read on this.
"My lord, I writ as mine extremes required,
That you would labour my delivery;[9]
If you neglect, my life is desperate,° hopeless

---

[1] turns him off The hangman pushes the victim from the stool or bench to hang freely from the noose.

[2] my lament … trees My expressions of grief have blown the leaves from the trees.

[3] empyreal Of the highest celestial realm. Also referring to "imperial," as "royalty."

[4] countermured Reinforced with a double wall.

[5] Petergade The Hangman mispronounces "Pedringano."

[6] fair commission … wrong The Hangman, being illiterate, has mistaken the letter for a pardon for Pedringano, and worries that the hanging was committed in error.

[7] I warrant thee I will shelter you from consequences.

[8] somewhat … concerns I am preoccupied with something more important.

[9] labour my delivery Work for my salvation. This is also a play on delivery, as in giving birth.

And in my death I shall reveal the truth.
You know, my lord, I slew him for your sake;
And as confederate with the prince and you,
Won by rewards and hopeful promises,
I holp to murder Don Horatio too."
Holp he to murder mine Horatio?
And actors in th'accursed tragedy
Wast thou, Lorenzo, Balthazar and thou,
Of whom my son, my son deserved so well?
What have I heard, what have mine eyes beheld?
O sacred heavens, may it come to pass
That such a monstrous and detested deed,
So closely smothered, and so long concealed,
Shall thus by this be vengéd[1] or revealed?
Now see I what I durst not then suspect,
That Bel-Imperia's letter was not feigned.° forged
Nor feigned she, though falsely they have wronged
Both her, myself, Horatio and themselves.
Now may I make compare, 'twixt hers and this,
Of every accident; I ne'er could find
Till now, and now I feelingly perceive,
They did what heaven unpunished would not leave.
O false Lorenzo, are these thy flattering looks?
Is this the honour that them didst my son?
And Balthazar, bane° to thy soul and me, poison
Was this the ransom he reserved thee for?
Woe to the cause of these constrained° wars, unnecessary
Woe to thy baseness and captivity,
Woe to thy birth, thy body and thy soul,
Thy cursed father, and thy conquered self!
And banned° with bitter execrations be cursed
The day and place where he did pity thee!
But wherefore waste I mine unfruitful words,
When naught but blood will satisfy my woes?
I will go plain me° to my lord the king, complain
And cry aloud for justice through the court,
Wearing the flints[2] with these my withered feet,
And either purchase justice by entreats° pleas
Or tire° them all with my revenging threats. exhaust

(Exit.)

ACT 3, SCENE 8

(Enter Isabella and her Maid.)

ISABELLA. So that, you say, this herb will purge the eye,
And this the head?
Ah, but none of them will purge the heart:
No, there's no medicine left for my disease,
Nor any physic to recure° the dead. heal

(She runs lunatic.)

Horatio! O, where's Horatio?
MAID. Good madam, affright not thus yourself
With outrage for your son Horatio:
He sleeps in quiet in the Elysian fields.
ISABELLA. Why, did I not give you[3] gowns and goodly things,
Bought you a whistle and a whipstalk[4] too,
To be revenged on their villainies?
MAID. Madam, these humours° do torment my soul. outbursts
ISABELLA. My soul! poor soul, thou talks of things
Thou know'st not what—my soul hath silver wings,
That mounts me up unto the highest heavens;
To heaven, ay, there sits my Horatio,
Backed with a troop of fiery cherubins,° angels
Dancing about his newly-healed wounds,
Singing sweet hymns and chanting heavenly notes,
Rare harmony to greet° his innocence, honor
That died, ay died a mirror[5] in our days.
But say, where shall I find the men, the murderers,
That slew Horatio? Whither shall I run
To find them out that murdered my son?

(Exeunt.)

---

[1] vengéd Avenged by just means, rather than by personal revenge.

[2] Wearing the flints Flattening the stones with my constant presence.

[3] you Referring to Horatio.

[4] whipstalk Handle of a whip, used to spin a toy top.

[5] mirror I.e., reflection of goodness.

ACT 3, SCENE 9

(Bel-Imperia at a window.)

BEL-IMPERIA. What means this outrage that is offered me?
Why am I thus sequestered from the court?
No notice?° Shall I not know the cause explanation
Of this my secret and suspicious ills?
Accursed brother, unkind murderer,
Why bends thou[1] thus thy mind to martyr me?
Hieronimo, why writ I of thy wrongs,
Or why art thou so slack in thy revenge?
Andrea, O Andrea, that thou sawest
Me for thy friend Horatio handled thus,
And him for me thus causeless murdered.
Well, force perforce, I must constrain myself
To patience, and apply me to the time,[2]
Till heaven, as I have hoped shall set me free.

(Enter Christophil.)

CHRISTOPHIL. Come, Madam Bel-Imperia, this may not be.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 10

(Enter Lorenzo, Balthazar, and the Page.)

LORENZO. Boy, talk no further, thus far things go well.
Thou art assured that thou sawest him dead?
PAGE. Or else my lord I live not.
LORENZO. That's enough.
As for his resolution in his end,
Leave that to him with whom he sojourns now.[3]
Here, take my ring and give it Christophil,
And bid him let my sister be enlarged,° freed
And bring her hither straight.

(Exit Page.)

This that I did was for a policy
To smooth and keep the murder secret,
Which as a nine-days' wonder[4] being o'erblown,
My gentle sister will I now enlarge.
BALTHAZAR. And time, Lorenzo, for my lord the duke,[5]
You heard, enquired for her yester-night.
LORENZO. Why, and, my lord, I hope you heard me say
Sufficient reason why she kept away.
But that's all one. My lord, you love her?
BALTHAZAR. Ay.
LORENZO. Then in your love beware, deal cunningly, Salve° all suspicions; only soothe me up;[6] mitigate
And if she hap to stand on terms[7] with us,
As for her sweetheart, and concealment so,
Jest with her gently: under feigned jest
Are things concealed that else would breed unrest.
But here she comes.

(Enter Bel-Imperia.)

Now, sister—
BEL-IMPERIA. Sister? No!
Thou art no brother, but an enemy,
Else wouldst thou not have used° thy sister so: treated
First, to affright me with thy weapons drawn,
And with extremes abuse my company;[8]
And then to hurry me, like whirlwind's rage,
Amidst a crew of thy confederates,
And clap me up[9] where none might come at me,
Nor I at any, to reveal my wrongs.
What madding fury did possess thy wits?
Or wherein is't that I offended thee?

[1] Why bends thou Why have you dedicated.

[2] patience Christian virtue for times of trial; apply … time Act according to the situation in which I find myself.

[3] Leave … now Leave his final fate to the underworld's judge (i.e., devil).

[4] nine-days' wonder News item that provokes an intense but brief commotion.

[5] time In good timing; my … duke Castile, the father of Lorenzo and Bel-Imperia.

[6] only … up Stand by me and our secrets.

[7] if … terms If she causes any complications.

[8] company Companion, i.e., Horatio.

[9] clap me up Incarcerate me.

LORENZO. Advise you better, Bel-Imperia,
For I have done you no disparagement;
Unless, by more discretion than deserved,
I sought to save your honour and mine own.[1]
BEL-IMPERIA. Mine honour! why, Lorenzo, wherein is't
That I neglect my reputation so,
As[2] you, or any, need to rescue it?
LORENZO. His highness and my father were resolved
To come confer with old Hieronimo,
Concerning certain matters of estate,
That by the viceroy was determined.[3]
BEL-IMPERIA. And wherein was mine honour touched in that?
BALTHAZAR. Have patience, Bel-Imperia; hear the rest.
LORENZO. Me next in sight[4] as messenger they sent,
To give him notice that they were so nigh:
Now when I came, consorted with the prince,
And unexpected, in an arbour there,
Found Bel-Imperia with Horatio—
BEL-IMPERIA. How then?
LORENZO. Why then, remembering that old disgrace,
Which you for Don Andrea had endured,
And now were likely longer to sustain,
By being found so meanly accompanied,[5]
Thought rather, for I knew no readier mean,
To thrust Horatio forth° my father's way. out of BALTHAZAR. And carry you obscurely somewhere else,
Lest that his highness should have found you there.
BEL-IMPERIA. Even so, my lord? And you are witness
That this is true which he entreateth of?
You, gentle° brother, forged this for my sake, high-born
And you, my lord, were made his instrument:
A work of worth, worthy the noting too!
But what's the cause that you concealed me since?
LORENZO. Your melancholy, sister, since the news
Of your first favourite Don Andrea's death,
My father's old wrath hath exasperate.[6]
BALTHAZAR. And better was't for you, being in disgrace,
To absent yourself, and give his fury place.[7]
BEL-IMPERIA. But why had I no notice of his ire?
LORENZO. That were to add more fuel to your fire,
Who burnt like Aetna[8] for Andrea's loss.
BEL-IMPERIA. Hath not my father then enquired for me?
LORENZO. Sister, he hath, and thus excused I thee.

(He whispereth in her ear.)

But, Bel-Imperia, see the gentle prince;
Look on thy love, behold young Balthazar,
Whose passions by thy presence are increased;
And in whose melancholy thou may'st see
Thy hate, his love; thy flight, his following thee.
BEL-IMPERIA. Brother, you are become an orator—
I know not, I, by what experience—
Too politic for me, past all compare,
Since last I saw you; but content yourself,
The prince is meditating higher things.
BALTHAZAR. 'Tis of thy beauty, then, that conquers kings;
Of those thy tresses, Ariadne's[9] twines,
Wherewith my liberty thou hast surprised;
Of that thine ivory front,° my sorrow's map, forehead
Wherein I see no haven to rest my hope.
BEL-IMPERIA. To love and fear, and both at once, my lord,
In my conceit,° are things of more import opinion
Than women's wits are to be busied with.
BALTHAZAR. 'Tis I that love.
BEL-IMPERIA. Whom?
BALTHAZAR. Bel-Imperia.
BEL-IMPERIA. But I that fear.
BALTHAZAR. Whom?

---

[1] I sought ... own As brother and sister, theirs is a shared family honor.

[2] so, As To the degree that.

[3] by ... determined Was of importance to Portugal.

[4] Me ... sight Because I was close by.

[5] meanly accompanied In such lowly company.

[6] Your ... exasperate Your continued grieving for your lower ranking suitor has made our father's original rage (at this unbalanced pairing) even worse.

[7] give ... place Let his rage manifest and work itself out.

[8] Aetna A live volcano in Sicily, Mount Etna.

[9] Ariadne Daughter of Minos whose thread helped Theseus survive the labyrinth. Kyd may have confused Ariadne with Arachne, a weaver who was transformed into a spider for challenging Athena to a weaving contest.

BEL-IMPERIA. Bel-Imperia.
LORENZO. Fear yourself?
BEL-IMPERIA. Ay, brother.
LORENZO. How?
BEL-IMPERIA: As those
That what they love are loath and fear to lose.
BALTHAZAR. Then, fair, let Balthazar your keeper[1] be.
BEL-IMPERIA. No, Balthazar doth fear as well as we:
Et tremulo metui pavidum junxere timorem,
Et vanum stolidae proditionis opus.[2]

(Exit.)

LORENZO. Nay and you argue things so cunningly,
We'll go continue this discourse at court.
BALTHAZAR. Led by the loadstar° of her heavenly looks, guiding star
Wends° poor oppressed Balthazar, journeys
As o'er the mountains walks the wanderer,
Incertain to effect[3] his pilgrimage.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 11

(Enter two Portingales, and Hieronimo meets them.)

1 PORTINGALE. By your leave, sir.

1602 text

[HIERONIMO. 'Tis neither as you think, nor as you think,[4]
Nor as you think: you're wide° all: off the mark
These slippers are not mine, they were my son Horatio's.
My son, and what's a son? A thing begot
Within a pair of minutes, thereabout:
A lump bred up in darkness, and doth serve
To ballast° these light° creatures we call women; stabilize / fickle
And, at nine moneth's end, creeps forth to light.
What is there yet in a son
To make a father dote, rave or run mad?
Being born, it pouts, cries, and breeds teeth.
What is there yet in a son? He must be fed,
Be taught to go, and speak. Ay, or yet?
Why might not a man love a calf as well?
Or melt in passion o'er a frisking kid,
As for a son? Methinks a young bacon° piglet
Or a fine little smooth horse-colt
Should move a man as much as doth a son:
For one of these in very little time
Will grow to some good use, whereas a son,
The more he grows in stature and in years,
The more unsquared, unbevelled° he appears, rough, unpolished
Reckons his parents among the rank of fools,
Strikes care upon their heads with his mad riots,
Makes them look old before they meet with age:
This is a son:
And what a loss were this, considered truly?
O, but my Horatio
Grew out of reach of these insatiate humours:
He loved his loving parents,
He was my comfort, and his mother's joy,
The very arm that did hold up our house:
Our hopes were stored up in him,
None but a damned murderer could hate him.
He had not seen the back of nineteen year,
When his strong arm unhorsed the proud Prince Balthazar,
And his great mind, too full of honour,
Took him unto mercy,[5]
That valiant but ignoble Portingale.
Well, heaven is heaven still,
And there is Nemesis and Furies,
And things called whips,
And they sometimes do meet with murderers:
They do not always 'scape, that's some comfort.
Ay, ay, ay, and then time steals on:
And steals, and steals, till violence leaps forth
Like thunder wrapped in a ball of fire,
And so doth bring confusion° to them all.[6]] devastation

[1] keeper Jailer. May also refer to someone who keeps a lover.

[2] Et … opus Latin: They yoked trembling fear together with quavering dread, / a useless act of foolish treachery.

[3] Incertain to effect Unsure how to proceed.

[4] 'Tis … think With this line begins the third of several passages added to the text in the 1602 edition of the play. The text of the 1592 edition resumes with the line, "Good leave have you: …"

[5] Took … mercy Showed him mercy.

[6] And … all This is the last line of the third addition of material from the 1602 edition of the play.

Good leave have you: nay, I pray you go,
For I'll leave you; if you can leave me, so.
2 PORTINGALE. Pray you, which is the next° way to my lord the duke's? nearest
HIERONIMO. The next way from me.
1 PORTINGALE. To his house, we mean.
HIERONIMO. O, hard by, 'tis yon house that you see.
2 PORTINGALE. You could not tell us if his son were there?
HIERONIMO. Who, my Lord Lorenzo?
1 PORTINGALE. Ay, sir.

(He goeth in at one door and comes out at another.)

HIERONIMO. O, forbear,
For other talk for us far fitter were.
But if you be importunate° to know pressing
The way to him, and where to find him out,
Then list° to me, and I'll resolve your doubt. listen
There is a path upon your left-hand side,
That leadeth from a guilty conscience
Unto a forest of distrust and fear,
A darksome place, and dangerous to pass:
There shall you meet with melancholy thoughts,
Whose baleful humours if you but uphold,° persevere
It will conduct you to despair and death;
Whose rocky cliffs when you have once beheld,
Within a hugy dale[1] of lasting night,
That, kindled with the world's iniquities,
Doth cast up filthy and detested fumes,
Not far from thence, where murderers have built
A habitation for their cursed souls,
There, in a brazen cauldron, fixed by Jove[2]
In his fell° wrath upon a sulphur flame, brutal
Yourselves shall find Lorenzo bathing him
In boiling lead and blood of innocents.
1 PORTINGALE. Ha, ha, ha!
HIERONIMO. Ha, ha, ha!
Why, ha, ha, ha! Farewell, good, ha, ha, ha!

(Exit.)

2 PORTINGALE. Doubtless this man is passing° lunatic, excessively
Or imperfection of his age doth make him dote.[3]
Come, let's away to seek my lord the duke.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 12

(Enter Hieronimo, with a poniard in one hand, and a rope in the other.)

HIERONIMO. Now sir, perhaps I come and see the king,
The king sees me, and fain° would hear my suit: willingly
Why, is not this a strange and seld-seen° thing, seldom seen
That standers-by with toys should strike me mute?
Go to, I see their shifts,° and say no more. ploys
Hieronimo, 'tis time for thee to trudge:° depart
Down by the dale that flows with purple° gore bloodstained
Standeth a fiery tower; there sits a judge
Upon a seat of steel and molten brass,
And 'twixt his teeth he holds a fire-brand,
That leads unto the lake where hell doth stand.
Away, Hieronimo, to him be gone:
He'll do thee justice for Horatio's death.
Turn down this path,[4] thou shalt be with him straight;° straightaway
Or this, and then thou need'st not take thy breath.
This way or that way? Soft and fair, not so:
For if I hang or kill myself, let's know
Who will revenge Horatio's murder then?
No, no! fie, no! pardon me, I'll none of that:

(He flings away the dagger and halter.)

This way I'll take, and this way comes the king;

(He takes them up again.)

---

[1] hugy dale Deep ravine.

[2] Jove Jupiter, Roman God and ruler of the heavens.

[3] imperfection … dote It is weakness brought by old age that has made him feeble-minded.

[4] Turn … path Take the path of suicide by dagger or noose.

And here I'll have a fling at him, that's flat;[1]
And, Balthazar, I'll be with thee to bring,[2]
And thee, Lorenzo! Here's the king; nay, stay,
And here, ay here; there goes the hare away.[3]

(Enter King, Ambassador, Castile, and Lorenzo.)

King. Now show, Ambassador, what our viceroy saith:
Hath he received the articles we sent?
Hieronimo. Justice, O, justice to Hieronimo.
Lorenzo. Back, see'st thou not the king is busy?
Hieronimo. O, is he so?
King. Who is he that interrupts our business?
Hieronimo. Not I. Hieronimo, beware: go by, go by.[4]
Ambassador. Renowned king, he hath received and read
Thy kingly proffers, and thy promised league,
And, as a man extremely overjoyed
To hear his son so princely entertained,
Whose death he had so solemnly bewailed,
This for thy further satisfaction
And kingly love, he kindly lets thee know:
First, for the marriage of his princely son
With Bel-Imperia, thy beloved niece,
The news are more delightful to his soul,
Than myrrh or incense to the offended heavens.
In person, therefore, will he come himself,
To see the marriage rites solemnised;
And, in the presence of the court of Spain,
To knit a sure, inexplicable band
Of kingly love, and everlasting league,
Betwixt the crowns of Spain and Portingale,
There will he give his crown to Balthazar,
And make a queen of Bel-Imperia.
King. Brother, how like you this our viceroy's love?
Castile. No doubt, my lord, it is an argument° proof
Of honourable care to keep his friend,
And wondrous zeal to Balthazar his son;
Nor am I least indebted to his grace,
That bends his liking to my daughter thus.
Ambassador. Now last, dread lord, here hath his highness sent (Although he send not that[5] his son return)
His ransom due to Don Horatio.
Hieronimo. Horatio! who calls Horatio?
King. And well remembered, thank his majesty.
Here, see it given to Horatio.
Hieronimo. Justice, O justice, justice, gentle king!
King. What is that? Hieronimo?
Hieronimo. Justice, O, justice! O my son, my son,
My son, whom naught can ransom or redeem!
Lorenzo. Hieronimo, you are not well-advised.
Hieronimo. Away, Lorenzo, hinder me no more,
For thou hast made me bankrupt of my bliss.
Give me my son, you shall not ransom him!
Away! I'll rip the bowels of the earth,

(He diggeth with his dagger.)

And ferry over to th'Elysian plains,
And bring my son to show his deadly wounds.
Stand from about me!
I'll make a pickaxe of my poniard,
And here surrender up my marshalship:
For I'll go marshal up the fiends in hell,
To be avenged on you all for this.
King. What means this outrage?
Will none of you restrain his fury?
Hieronimo. Nay, soft and fair:° you shall not need to strive, be calm
Needs must he go that the devils drive.

(Exit.)

King. What accident hath happed Hieronimo?
I have not seen him to demean him° so. himself
Lorenzo. My gracious lord, he is with extreme pride,
Conceived of young Horatio his son,
And covetous of having to himself
The ransom of the young prince Balthazar,
Distract, and in a manner lunatic.
King. Believe me, nephew, we are sorry for't:
This is the love that fathers bear their sons.
But, gentle brother, go give to him this gold,

---

[1] I'll … flat I'll make an attack on him in passing, that's a fact.

[2] I'll … bring We will be even.

[3] there … away Pun concerning Lorenzo and Balthazar, who are heirs but also prey for Hieronimo, the hunter.

[4] go by Take care not to get in trouble.

[5] that In order that.

The prince's ransom; let him have his due.
For what he hath Horatio shall not want:° lack
Haply Hieronimo hath need thereof.
LORENZO. But if he be thus helplessly distract,
'Tis requisite° his office be resigned, mandatory
And given to one of more discretion.
KING. We shall increase his melancholy so.
'Tis best that we see further in it[1] first;
Till when, ourself will exempt the place.[2]
And brother, now bring in the ambassador,
That he may be a witness of the match
Twixt Balthazar and Bel-Imperia,
And that we may prefix° a certain time, designate
Wherein the marriage shall be solemnised,
That we may have thy lord the viceroy here.
AMBASSADOR. Therein your highness highly shall content
His majesty, that longs to hear from hence.
KING. On, then, and hear you, Lord Ambassador.

(Exeunt.)

[(Enter Jaques and Pedro.)

JAQUES. I wonder, Pedro, why our master thus[3]
At midnight sends us with our torches' light,
When man and bird and beast are all at rest,
Save those that watch[4] for rape and bloody murder?
PEDRO. O Jaques, know thou that our master's mind
Is much distraught since his Horatio died,
And now his aged years should sleep in rest,
His heart in quiet; like a desperate man,
Grows lunatic and childish for his son:
Sometimes, as he doth at his table sit,
He speaks as if Horatio stood by him;
Then starting in a rage, falls on the earth,
Cries out "Horatio, where is my Horatio?"
So that with extreme grief and cutting sorrow,
There is not left in him one inch of man:
See, where he comes.

(Enter Hieronimo.)

HIERONIMO. I pry through every crevice of each wall,
Look on each tree, and search through every brake,° bush
Beat at the bushes, stamp our grandam earth,
Dive in the water, and stare up to heaven,
Yet cannot I behold my son Horatio.
How now, who's there, sprites, sprites?
PEDRO. We are your servants that attend you, sir.
HIERONIMO. What make you with your torches in the dark?
PEDRO. You bid us light them, and attend you here.
HIERONIMO. No, no, you are deceived, not I, you are deceived:
Was I so mad to bid you light your torches now?
Light me your torches at the mid of noon,
Whenas the sun-god rides in all his glory:
Light me your torches then.
PEDRO. Then we burn daylight.[5]
HIERONIMO. Let it be burnt: night is a murderous slut,
That would not have her treasons to be seen;
And yonder pale-faced Hecate[6] there, the moon,
Doth give consent to that is done in darkness;
And all those stars that gaze upon her face,
Are aglets[7] on her sleeve, pins on her train;
And those that should be powerful and divine,
Do sleep in darkness when they most should shine.
PEDRO. Provoke them not, fair sir, with tempting words:
The heavens are gracious, and your miseries
And sorrow makes you speak you know not what.
HIERONIMO. Villain, thou liest, and thou dost naught
But tell me I am mad: thou liest, I am not mad.
I know thee to be Pedro, and he Jaques.
I'll prove it to thee, and were I mad, how could I?

[1] see … it Examine the situation further.

[2] exempt the place Eliminate Hieronimo's position (rather than replacing him).

[3] I … thus With this line begins the fourth of several passages added to the text in the 1602 edition of the play. The text of the 1592 edition resumes at the beginning of Act 3, Scene 13, with the line, "Vindicta mihi!"

[4] watch Keep watch for.

[5] burn daylight Common phrase meaning "waste time," here made literal.

[6] Hecate Greek goddess originally associated with the moon and the underworld. Also considered the patron of witches during the Renaissance.

[7] aglets Metal fastening tags, or any metal embellishments on clothing.

Where was she that same night when my Horatio
Was murdered? She should have shone: search thou the book.° almanac
Had the moon shone, in my boy's face there was a kind of grace,
That I know (nay, I do know) had the murderer seen him,
His weapon would have fallen and cut the earth,
Had he been framed of naught but blood and death.
Alack, when mischief° doth it knows not what, sinfulness
What shall we say to mischief?

(Enter Isabella.)

ISABELLA. Dear Hieronimo, come in a-doors.
O, seek not means so to increase thy sorrow.
HIERONIMO. Indeed, Isabella, we do nothing here;
I do not cry; ask Pedro, and ask Jaques;
Not I indeed, we are very merry, very merry.
ISABELLA. How? be merry here, be merry here?
Is not this the place, and this the very tree,
Where my Horatio died, where he was murdered?
HIERONIMO. Was—do not say what: let her weep it out.
This was the tree, I set it of a kernel,
And when our hot Spain could not let it grow,
But that the infant and the human sap
Began to wither, duly twice a morning
Would I be sprinkling it with fountain water.
At last it grew, and grew, and bore and bore,
Till at the length
It grew a gallows, and did bear our son.
It bore thy fruit and mine: O wicked, wicked plant.

(One knocks within at the door.)

See who knock there.
PEDRO. It is a painter, sir.
HIERONIMO. Bid him come in, and paint some comfort,
For surely there's none lives but painted comfort.
Let him come in. One knows not what may chance:
God's will that I should set this tree—but even so
Masters ungrateful servants rear from naught,
And then they hate them that did bring them up.

(Enter the Painter.)

PAINTER. God bless you, sir.

1602 text

HIERONIMO. Wherefore? why, thou scornful villain,
How, where, or by what means should I be blessed?
ISABELLA. What wouldst thou have, good fellow?
PAINTER. Justice, madam.
HIERONIMO. O ambitious beggar, wouldst thou have that
That lives not in the world?
Why, all the undelved mines cannot buy
An ounce of justice, 'tis a jewel so inestimable:
I tell thee,
God hath engrossed° all justice in his hands, monopolized
And there is none, but what comes from him.
PAINTER. O then I see
That God must right me for my murdered son.
HIERONIMO. How, was thy son murdered?
PAINTER. Ay sir, no man did hold a son so dear.
HIERONIMO. What, not as thine? that's a lie
As massy as the earth: I had a son,
Whose least unvalued hair did weigh
A thousand of thy sons: and he was murdered.
PAINTER. Alas sir, I had no more but he.
HIERONIMO. Nor I, nor I: but this same one of mine
Was worth a legion:[1] but all is one.
Pedro, Jaques, go in a-doors: Isabella go,
And this good fellow here and I
Will range this hideous orchard up and down,
Like to two lions reaved° of their young. bereaved
Go in a-doors, I say.

(Exeunt [Isabella, Pedro and Jacques.]. The painter and Hieronimo sit down.)

Come, let's talk wisely now. Was thy son murdered?
PAINTER. Ay sir.
HIERONIMO. So was mine. How dost take it? Art thou not sometimes mad?
Is there no tricks that comes before thine eyes?
PAINTER. O Lord, yes sir.
HIERONIMO. Art a painter? Canst paint me a tear, or a wound, a groan, or a sigh? Canst paint me such a tree as this?
PAINTER. Sir, I am sure you have heard of my painting, my name's Bazardo.
HIERONIMO. Bazardo! afore God, an excellent fellow! Look you sir, do you see, I'd have you paint me in my gallery, in your oil colours matted, and draw me five years younger than I am. Do you see sir, let five years go, let them go, like the marshal of Spain. My wife Isabella standing by me, with a speaking[1] look to my son Horatio, which should intend to this or some such like purpose: "God bless thee, my sweet son": and my hand leaning upon his head, thus, sir, do you see? may it be done?

[1] legion Unit of soldiers, made up of 3000 to 6000 troops in the Roman army.

PAINTER. Very well sir.

HIERONIMO. Nay, I pray mark me sir. Then sir, would I have you paint me this tree, this very tree. Canst paint a doleful cry?

PAINTER. Seemingly, sir.

HIERONIMO. Nay, it should cry: but all is one. Well sir, paint me a youth run through and through with villains' swords, hanging upon this tree. Canst thou draw a murderer?

PAINTER. I'll warrant you sir, I have the pattern of the most notorious villains that ever lived in all Spain.

HIERONIMO. O, let them be worse, worse: stretch thine art, and let their beards be of Judas his own colour, and let their eyebrows jutty over:[2] in any case observe that. Then sir, after some violent noise, bring me forth in my shirt, and my gown under mine arm, with my torch in my hand, and my sword reared up thus: and with these words: "What noise is this? who calls Hieronimo?" May it be done?

PAINTER. Yea sir.

HIERONIMO. Well sir, then bring me forth, bring me through alley and alley, still with a distracted countenance going along, and let my hair heave up my night-cap. Let the clouds scowl, make the moon dark, the stars extinct, the winds blowing, the bells tolling, the owl shrieking, the toads croaking, the minutes jarring, and the clock striking twelve. And then at last, sir, starting, behold a man hanging: and tottering, and tottering as you know the wind will wave a man, and I with a trice[3] to cut him down. And looking upon him by the advantage of my torch, find it to be my son Horatio. There you may show a passion, there you may show a passion. Draw me like old Priam of Troy,[4] crying "The house is a-fire, the house is a-fire as the torch over my head!" Make me curse, make me rave, make me cry, make me mad, make me well again, make me curse hell, invocate heaven, and in the end leave me in a trance; and so forth.

PAINTER. And is this the end?

HIERONIMO. O no, there is no end: the end is death and madness! As I am never better than when I am mad, then methinks I am a brave[5] fellow, then I do wonders: but reason abuseth me, and there's the torment, there's the hell. At the last, sir, bring me to one of the murderers, were he as strong as Hector, thus would I tear and drag him up and down.

(He beats the painter in, then comes out again with a book in his hand.)[6]]

ACT 3, SCENE 13

(Enter Hieronimo with a book in his hand.)

HIERONIMO. Vindicta mihi![7]
Ay, heaven will be revenged of every ill,
Nor will they suffer murder unrepaid:
Then stay, Hieronimo, attend their will,
For mortal men may not appoint their time.
"Per scelus semper tutum est sceleribus iter."[8]
Strike, and strike home, where wrong is offered thee;
For evils unto ills conductors be,
And death's the worst of resolution.[9]
For he that thinks with patience to contend
To quiet life, his life shall easily end.
"Fata si miseros juvant, habes salutem;
Fata si vitam negant, habes sepulchrum."[10]
If destiny thy miseries do ease,

[1] speaking Eloquent and meaningful.

[2] Judas ... colour Red; jutty over Jut out.

[3] with a trice Within a trice, i.e., instantly.

[4] Priam of Troy Troy's last king and father of Hector, who would die along with his father during the Trojan war.

[5] brave Exemplary.

[6] He beats the painter ... hand This stage direction is the last line of the fourth addition of material from the 1602 edition of the play.

[7] Vindicta mihi Latin: Vengeance is mine. This phrase is from Romans 12.19, in which God claims vengeance as his own domain, instructing his followers to refrain from taking revenge themselves.

[8] Per ... iter Latin: The safe way to crime is through more crime.

[9] death's ... resolution Death is the worst possible outcome of a resolution.

[10] Fata ... sepulchrum Latin. Roughly translated in Hieronimo's lines that follow.

Then hast thou health, and happy shalt thou be;
If destiny deny thee life, Hieronimo,
Yet shalt thou be assured of a tomb;
If neither, yet let this thy comfort be,
Heaven covereth him that hath no burial.
And to conclude, I will revenge his death!
But how? not as the vulgar° wits of men, common
With open, but inevitable ills,[1]
As by a secret, yet a certain mean,° means
Which under kindship° will be cloaked best. kindness
Wise men will take their opportunity,
Closely and safely fitting things to time.
But in extremes advantage hath no time;[2]
And therefore all times fit not for revenge.
Thus therefore will I rest me in unrest,
Dissembling quiet in unquietness,[3]
Not seeming that I know their villainies;
That my simplicity° may make them think harmlessness
That ignorantly I will let all slip—
For ignorance, I wot, and well they know,
Remedium malorum iners est.[4]
Nor aught avails it me to menace them,
Who, as a wintry storm upon a plain,
Will bear me down with their nobility.
No, no, Hieronimo, thou must enjoin
Thine eyes to observation, and thy tongue
To milder speeches than thy spirit affords,
Thy heart to patience, and thy hands to rest,
Thy cap to courtesy, and thy knee to bow,
Till to revenge thou know, when, where and how.

(A noise within.)

How now, what noise? what coil is that you keep?[5]

(Enter a Servant.)

Servant. Here are a sort° of poor petitioners, gathering
That are importunate,° and it shall please you, sir, persistent
That you should plead their cases to the king.
Hieronimo. That I should plead their several actions?[6]
Why, let them enter, and let me see them.

(Enter three Citizens and an Old Man.)

1 Citizen. So, I tell you this, for learning and for law,
There's not any advocate in Spain
That can prevail, or will take half the pain
That he will, in pursuit of equity.
Hieronimo. Come near, you men, that thus importune me.
[Aside.] Now must I bear a face of gravity,
For thus I used, before my marshalship,
To plead in causes as corregidor.—[7]
Come on sirs, what's the matter?
2 Citizen. Sir, an action.
Hieronimo. Of battery?
1 Citizen. Mine of debt.
Hieronimo. Give place.° make room
2 Citizen. No sir, mine is an action of the case.[8]
3 Citizen. Mine an ejectione firmae[9] by a lease.
Hieronimo. Content you sirs, are you determined
That I should plead your several actions?
1 Citizen. Ay sir, and here's my declaration.
2 Citizen. And here is my band.° bond
3 Citizen. And here is my lease.

(They give him papers.)

Hieronimo. But wherefore stands yon silly° man so mute, pitiful
With mournful eyes and hands to heaven upreared?
Come hither, father, let me know thy cause.
Senex. O worthy sir, my cause, but slightly known,

---

[1] With … ills By public acts of violence and their inevitable negative outcomes.

[2] in extremes … time In extreme moments, there is no time for opportunity.

[3] Dissembling … unquietness Feigning calm during agitation.

[4] Remedium … est Latin: Is a worthless remedy for evil.

[5] what … keep? What is this commotion about?

[6] several actions Various legal suits.

[7] corregidor Advocate who is the primary magistrate in a Spanish town.

[8] action … case Action that falls outside the limits of this court's authority, permitted to be presented in the court of Common Pleas by obtaining a special writ.

[9] ejectione firmae Writ serving to eject a tenant before his lease has expired.

May move the hearts of warlike Myrmidons[1]
And melt the Corsic rocks[2] with ruthful° tears. pitying
Hieronimo. Say, father, tell me what's thy suit?
Senex. No sir, could my woes
Give way unto my most distressful words,
Then should I not in paper, as you see,
With ink bewray what blood began in me.[3]
Hieronimo. What's here? "The humble supplication
Of Don Bazulto for his murdered son."
Senex. Ay sir.
Hieronimo. No sir, it was my murdered son,
O my son, my son, O my son Horatio!
But mine, or thine, Bazulto, be content.
Here, take my handkercher, and wipe thine eyes,
Whiles wretched I in thy mishaps may see
The lively° portrait of my dying self. living

(He draweth out a bloody napkin.)

O no, not this: Horatio, this was thine,
And when I dyed it in thy dearest blood,
This was a token 'twixt thy soul and me
That of thy death revenged I should be.
But here, take this, and this—what, my purse?—
Ay, this, and that, and all of them are thine;
For all as one are our extremities.° sufferings
1 Citizen. O see the kindness of Hieronimo!
2 Citizen. This gentleness shows him a gentleman.
Hieronimo. See, see, O see thy shame, Hieronimo,
See here a loving father to his son!
Behold the sorrows and the sad laments
That he delivereth for his son's decease!
If love's effects so strives in lesser things,
If love enforce such moods in meaner wits,
If love express such power in poor estates—
Hieronimo, whenas° a raging sea since
Tossed with the wind and tide, o'erturneth then
The upper billows, course of waves to keep,
Whilst lesser waters labour in the deep,
Then sham'st thou not, Hieronimo, to neglect
The sweet revenge of thy Horatio?
Though on this earth justice will not be found,
I'll down to hell, and in this passion
Knock at the dismal gates of Pluto's court,
Getting by force, as once Alcides° did, Hercules
A troop of Furies and tormenting hags
To torture Don Lorenzo and the rest.
Yet lest the triple-headed porter° should Cerberus
Deny my passage to the slimy strond,° beach
The Thracian poet[4] thou shalt counterfeit:
Come on, old father, be my Orpheus,
And if thou canst no notes upon the harp,
Then sound the burden[5] of thy sore heart's grief,
Till we do gain that Proserpine may grant
Revenge on them that murdered my son.
Then will I rent and tear them thus and thus,
Shivering° their limbs in pieces with my teeth. ripping

(Tear the papers.)

1 Citizen. O sir, my declaration!

(Exit Hieronimo and they after.)

2 Citizen. Save my bond!

(Enter Hieronimo.)

2 Citizen. Save my bond!
3 Citizen. Alas, my lease! It cost me ten pound,
And you, my lord, have torn the same.
Hieronimo. That cannot be, I gave it never a wound;
Show me one drop of blood fall from the same:
How is it possible I should slay it then?
Tush, no; run after, catch me if you can.

(Exeunt all but the Old Man. Bazulto remains till Hieronimo enters again, who, staring him in the face, speaks.)

[1] Myrmidons Vicious soldiers who followed Achilles into battle against Troy.

[2] Corsic rocks Jagged rocks of Corsica.

[3] Then … me If I was able to speak of it, I would not use ink to reveal the tragedy that befell my blood.

[4] Thracian poet Orpheus, who convinced Proserpine by way of his music to let Eurydice, his wife, leave the underworld and accompany him home.

[5] sound the burden Play the musical refrain, or evaluate the weight (of your grief).

HIERONIMO. And art thou come, Horatio, from the depth,
To ask for justice in this upper earth?
To tell thy father thou art unrevenged,
To wring more tears from Isabella's eyes,
Whose lights are dimmed with over-long laments?
Go back my son, complain to Aeacus,[1]
For here's no justice; gentle boy be gone,
For justice is exiled from the earth;[2]
Hieronimo will bear thee company.
Thy mother cries on righteous Rhadamanth[3]
For just revenge against the murderers.
SENEX. Alas my lord, whence springs this troubled speech?
HIERONIMO. But let me look on my Horatio.
Sweet boy, how art thou changed in death's black shade!
Had Proserpine no pity on thy youth,
But suffered thy fair crimson-coloured spring
With withered winter to be blasted° thus? damaged
Horatio, thou art older than thy father;
Ah ruthless fate, that favour° thus transforms! appearance
SENEX. Ah my good lord, I am not your young son.
HIERONIMO. What, not my son? thou, then, a Fury art,
Sent from the empty kingdom of black night
To summon me to make appearance
Before grim Minos[4] and just Rhadamanth,
To plague Hieronimo that is remiss,
And seeks not vengeance for Horatio's death.
SENEX. I am a grieved man, and not a ghost,
That came for justice for my murdered son.
HIERONIMO. Ay, now I know thee, now thou nam'st thy son;
Thou art the lively image of my grief:
Within thy face my sorrows I may see.
Thy eyes are gummed with tears, thy cheeks are wan,
Thy forehead troubled, and thy muttering lips
Murmur sad words abruptly broken off
By force of windy sighs thy spirit breathes;
And all this sorrow riseth for thy son:
And selfsame sorrow feel I for my son.
Come in old man, thou shalt to Isabel;
Lean on my arm: I thee, thou me shalt stay,° support
And thou, and I, and she, will sing a song,
Three parts in one, but all of discords framed—
Talk not of cords,[5] but let us now be gone,
For with a cord Horatio was slain.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 14

(Enter King of Spain, the Duke [of Castile], Viceroy, and Lorenzo, Balthazar, Don Pedro, and Bel-Imperia.)

KING. Go brother, it is the Duke of Castile's cause,
Salute the viceroy in our name.
CASTILE. I go.
VICEROY. Go forth, Don Pedro, for thy nephew's sake,
And greet the Duke of Castile.
PEDRO. It shall be so.
KING. And now to meet these Portuguese,
For as we now are, so sometimes were these,
Kings and commanders of the western Indies.° Portugese Brazil
Welcome, brave viceroy, to the court of Spain,
And welcome all his honourable train.
'Tis not unknown to us, for why you come,
Or have so kingly crossed the seas:[6]
Sufficeth it, in this we note the troth° loyalty
And more than common love you lend to us.
So is it that mine honourable niece,
(For it beseems us now that it be known)
Already is betrothed to Balthazar,
And by appointment and our condescent° consent
To-morrow are they to be married.
To this intent we entertain thyself,
Thy followers, their pleasure and our peace.
Speak, men of Portingale, shall it be so?
If ay, say so; if not, say flatly no.

[1] Aeacus In Greek mythology, one of the three judges of the underworld.

[2] justice ... earth Alludes to the goddess Astraea, the figure of justice, who was last of the deities to leave earth.

[3] Rhadamanth Another of the three judges of the underworld.

[4] Minos The last of three judges of the underworld.

[5] cords Hieronimo makes a pun with "rope" and musical "chords."

[6] crossed the seas Some have suggested that Kyd's geographical knowledge may have been faulty because Portugal and Spain are connected by land. The poor condition of the roads sometimes did prompt royal travelers to take a longer voyage by sea however.

VICEROY. Renowned king, I come not as thou think'st,
With doubtful followers, unresolved men,
But such as have upon thine articles
Confirmed thy motion and contented me.
Know sovereign, I come to solemnise
The marriage of thy beloved niece,
Fair Bel-Imperia, with my Balthazar—
With thee, my son; whom sith I live to see,
Here take my crown, I give it her and thee;
And let me live a solitary life,
In ceaseless prayers,
To think how strangely° heaven hath thee preserved. miraculously
KING. See brother, see, how nature strives in him![1]
Come, worthy viceroy, and accompany
Thy friend with thine extremities;
A place more private fits this princely mood.
VICEROY. Or° here or where your highness thinks it good. either

(Exeunt all but Castile and Lorenzo.)

CASTILE. Nay stay, Lorenzo, let me talk with you.
See'st thou this entertainment of these kings?
LORENZO. I do, my lord, and joy to see the same.
CASTILE. And knowest thou why this meeting is?
LORENZO. For her, my lord, whom Balthazar doth love,
And to confirm their promised marriage.
CASTILE. She is thy sister?
LORENZO. Who, Bel-Imperia?
Ay, my gracious lord, and this is the day
That I have longed so happily to see.
CASTILE. Thou wouldst be loath that any fault of thine
Should intercept° her in her happiness. impede
LORENZO. Heavens will not let Lorenzo err so much.
CASTILE. Why then, Lorenzo, listen to my words:
It is suspected and reported too,
That thou, Lorenzo, wrong'st Hieronimo,
And in his suits towards his majesty
Still keep'st him back, and seeks to cross his suit.
LORENZO. That I, my lord—?
CASTILE. I tell thee son, myself have heard it said,
When, to my sorrow, I have been ashamed
To answer for thee, though thou art my son.
Lorenzo, knowest thou not the common love
And kindness that Hieronimo hath won
By his deserts within the court of Spain?
Or seest thou not the king my brother's care
In his behalf, and to procure his health?
Lorenzo, shouldst thou thwart his passions,
And he exclaim against thee to the king,[2]
What honour were't in this assembly,
Or what a scandal were't among the kings
To hear Hieronimo exclaim on thee?
Tell me, and look thou tell me truly too,
Whence grows the ground of this report in court?
LORENZO. My lord, it lies not in Lorenzo's power
To stop the vulgar, liberal of their tongues:[3]
A small advantage makes a water-breach,[4]
And no man lives that long contenteth all.
CASTILE. Myself have seen thee busy to keep back
Him and his supplications from the king.
LORENZO. Yourself, my lord, hath seen his passions,
That ill beseemed the presence of a king;
And for I pitied him in his distress,
I held him thence with kind and courteous words,
As free from malice to Hieronimo
As to my soul, my lord.
CASTILE. Hieronimo, my son, mistakes thee then.
LORENZO. My gracious father, believe me so he doth.
But what's a silly man, distract in mind,
To think upon the murder of his son?
Alas, how easy is it for him to err!
But for his satisfaction and the world's,
'Twere good, my lord, that Hieronimo and I
Were reconciled, if he misconster° me. misconstrue
CASTILE. Lorenzo, thou hast said; it shall be so;
Go one of you and call Hieronimo.

(Enter Balthazar and Bel-Imperia.)

BALTHAZAR. Come, Bel-Imperia, Balthazar's content,
My sorrow's ease and sovereign of my bliss,
Sith heaven hath ordained thee to be mine;

---

[1] nature … him His emotions overwhelm him.

[2] exclaim … king Accuse you to the king.

[3] To stop … tongues To keep the common people from indecent gossip.

[4] A small … water-breach A small breach can allow a leak to violently split a dam.

Disperse those clouds and melancholy looks,
And clear them up with those thy sun-bright eyes,
Wherein my hope and heaven's fair beauty lies.
BEL-IMPERIA. My looks, my lord, are fitting for my love,
Which new begun, can show no brighter yet.
BALTHAZAR. New kindled flames should burn as morning sun.
BEL-IMPERIA. But not too fast, lest heat and all be done.
I see my lord my father.
BALTHAZAR. Truce, my love;
I will go salute him.
CASTILE. Welcome, Balthazar,
Welcome brave prince, the pledge of Castile's peace;
And welcome Bel-Imperia. How now, girl?
Why com'st thou sadly to salute us thus?
Content thyself, for I am satisfied;
It is not now as when Andrea lived,
We have forgotten and forgiven that,
And thou art graced with a happier love.
But Balthazar, here comes Hieronimo,
I'll have a word with him.

(Enter Hieronimo and a Servant.)

HIERONIMO. And where's the duke?
SERVANT. Yonder.
HIERONIMO. Even so:
What new device have they devised, trow?[1]
Pocas palabras![2] mild as the lamb,
Is't I will be revenged? No, I am not the man.
CASTILE. Welcome Hieronimo.
LORENZO. Welcome Hieronimo.
BALTHAZAR. Welcome Hieronimo.
HIERONIMO. My lords, I thank you for Horatio.
CASTILE. Hieronimo, the reason that I sent
To speak with you, is this.
HIERONIMO. What, so short?[3]
Then I'll be gone, I thank you for't.
CASTILE. Nay, stay, Hieronimo—go call him, son.
LORENZO. Hieronimo, my father craves a word with you.
HIERONIMO. With me sir? Why, my lord, I thought you had done.
LORENZO. [Aside] No, would he had.
CASTILE. Hieronimo, I hear
You find yourself aggrieved at my son
Because you have not access unto the king,
And say 'tis he that intercepts your suits.
HIERONIMO. Why, is not this a miserable thing, my lord?
CASTILE. Hieronimo, I hope you have no cause,
And would be loath that one of your deserts[4]
Should once have reason to suspect my son,
Considering how I think of you myself.
HIERONIMO. Your son Lorenzo! Whom, my noble lord?
The hope of Spain, mine honourable friend?
Grant me the combat of them,[5] if they dare:

(Draws out his sword.)

I'll meet him face to face, to tell me so.
These be the scandalous reports of such
As love not me, and hate my lord too much.
Should I suspect Lorenzo would prevent
Or cross[6] my suit, that loved my son so well?
My lord, I am ashamed it should be said.
LORENZO. Hieronimo, I never gave you cause.
HIERONIMO. My good lord, I know you did not.
CASTILE. There then pause,
And for the satisfaction of the world,
Hieronimo, frequent my homely° house, humble
The Duke of Castile, Cyprian's ancient seat,
And when thou wilt, use me, my son, and it.
But here, before Prince Balthazar and me,
Embrace each other, and be perfect friends.
HIERONIMO. Ay marry, my lord, and shall.
Friends, quoth he? see, I'll be friends with you all:
Specially with you, my lovely lord;
For divers causes it is fit for us
That we be friends—the world is suspicious,
And men may think what we imagine not.
BALTHAZAR. Why, this is friendly done, Hieronimo.

---

[1] What … trow What, do you suppose, are Castile and Lorenzo plotting now?

[2] Pocas palabras Spanish: Few words.

[3] so short? Are you going to address me so rudely, or, in so few words?

[4] one … deserts One who deserves as much as you do.

[5] Grant … them Allow me the right to formally demand a fight.

[6] prevent … cross Postpone or obstruct.

LORENZO. And thus I hope old grudges are forgot.
HIERONIMO. What else? it were a shame it should not be so.
CASTILE. Come on, Hieronimo, at my request;
Let us intreat your company today.

(Exeunt [everyone except Hieronimo.])

HIERONIMO. Your lordship's to command.—Pah! keep your way:
Chi mi fa più carezze che non suole,
Tradito mi ha, o tradir mi vuole.[1]

(Exit.)

ACT 3, SCENE 15

([Enter Andrea's] Ghost and Revenge.)

ANDREA. Awake, Erichtho![2] Cerberus, awake!
Solicit Pluto, gentle Proserpine;
To combat, Acheron and Erebus![3]
For ne'er, by Styx and Phlegethon[4] in hell[5]
Nor ferried Charon[6] to the fiery lakes
Such fearful sights, as poor Andrea sees!
Revenge, awake!
REVENGE. Awake? for why?
ANDREA. Awake, Revenge, for thou art ill-advised
To sleep away, what thou art warned to watch!
REVENGE. Content thyself, and do not trouble me.
ANDREA. Awake, Revenge, if love, as love hath had,
Have yet the power or prevalence in hell!
Hieronimo with Lorenzo is joined in league,
And intercepts our passage to revenge:
Awake, Revenge, or we are woe-begone!
REVENGE. Thus worldlings ground, what they have dreamed, upon.[7]
Content thyself, Andrea: though I sleep,
Yet is my mood soliciting their souls;[8]
Sufficeth thee that poor Hieronimo
Cannot forget his son Horatio.
Nor dies Revenge although he sleep awhile,
For in unquiet, quietness is feigned,
And slumbering is a common worldly wile.
Behold, Andrea, for an instance how
Revenge hath slept, and then imagine thou
What 'tis to be subject to destiny.

(Enter a Dumb Show.)

ANDREA. Awake, Revenge, reveal this mystery.
REVENGE. The two first, the nuptial torches[9] bore,
As brightly burning as the mid-day's sun;
But after them doth Hymen[10] hie° as fast, hurry
Clothed in sable, and a saffron robe,
And blows them out, and quencheth them with blood,
As discontent that things continue so.
ANDREA. Sufficeth me; thy meaning's understood;
And thanks to thee and those infernal powers
That will not tolerate a lover's woe.
Rest thee, for I will sit to see the rest.
REVENGE. Then argue not, for thou hast thy request.

(Exeunt.)[11]

ACT 4, SCENE 1

(Enter Bel-Imperia and Hieronimo.)

BEL-IMPERIA. Is this the love thou bear'st Horatio?
Is this the kindness that thou counterfeits?

---

[1] Chi … vuole Italian: One who displays more good will towards me than normal / is either hoping to betray me or has already done so.

[2] Erichtho Sorceress of Thessaly in Greek myth.

[3] Erebus A child of Chaos, primeval darkness that is representative of hell itself.

[4] Styx and Phlegethon Underworld rivers.

[5] Scholars believe there to be line missing here, perhaps providing further description of Andrea's experience in the underworld.

[6] Charon Driver of the boat that ferries souls to the world of the dead.

[7] worldlings … upon Humans pin their hopes on fantasies.

[8] my mood … souls My vengeful passion is inspiring those who have experienced injustice.

[9] nuptial torches Torches lit to celebrate a marriage.

[10] Hymen In classical mythology, god of marriage.

[11] Exeunt As Andrea's speech suggests that he and Revenge will stay onstage to watch the rest of the performance, this stage direction likely refers to the dumb show players.

Are these the fruits of thine incessant tears?
Hieronimo, are these thy passions,
Thy protestations and thy deep laments,
That thou wert wont to weary men withal?
O unkind father, O deceitful world!
With what excuses canst thou show thyself,
What with[1]
From this dishonour and the hate of men?—
Thus to neglect the loss and life of him
Whom both my letters and thine own belief
Assures thee to be causeless slaughtered.
Hieronimo, for shame, Hieronimo,
Be not a history to after times
Of such ingratitude unto thy son.
Unhappy mothers of such children then—
But monstrous fathers, to forget so soon
The death of those, whom they with care and cost
Have tendered° so, thus careless should be lost.[2] adored
Myself a stranger in respect of thee,[3]
So loved his life, as still I wish their deaths;
Nor shall his death be unrevenged by me,
Although I bear it out for fashion's sake:[4]
For here I swear in sight of heaven and earth,
Shouldst thou neglect the love thou shouldst retain
And give it over and devise no more,
Myself should send their hateful souls to hell,
That wrought his downfall with extremest death.
HIERONIMO. But may it be that Bel-Imperia
Vows such revenge as she hath deigned to say?[5]
Why then, I see that heaven applies our drift[6]
And all the saints do sit soliciting
For vengeance on those cursed murderers.
Madam 'tis true, and now I find it so;
I found a letter, written in your name,
And in that letter, how Horatio died.
Pardon, O pardon, Bel-Imperia,
My fear and care° in not believing it, caution
Nor think I thoughtless think[7] upon a mean
To let his death be unrevenged at full;
And here I vow, so you but give consent,
And will conceal my resolution,
I will ere long determine of[8] their deaths
That causeless thus have murdered my son.
BEL-IMPERIA. Hieronimo, I will consent, conceal;
And aught that may effect for thine avail
Join with thee to revenge Horatio's death.
HIERONIMO. On then; whatsoever I devise,
Let me entreat you, grace my practices.[9]
For why, the plot's already in mine head.
Here they are.

(Enter Balthazar and Lorenzo.)

BALTHAZAR. How now, Hieronimo?
What, courting Bel-Imperia?
HIERONIMO. Ay, my lord,
Such courting as, I promise you,
She hath my heart, but you, my lord, have hers.
LORENZO. But now, Hieronimo, or never,
We are to entreat your help.
HIERONIMO. My help?
Why, my good lords, assure yourselves of me,
For you have given me cause,
Ay, by my faith have you.
BALTHAZAR. It pleased you
At the entertainment of the ambassador
To grace the king so much as with a show:
Now were your study so well furnished,
As, for the passing of the first night's sport,
To entertain my father with the like,
Or any such-like pleasing motion,
Assure yourself it would content them well.
HIERONIMO. Is this all?
BALTHAZAR. Ay, this is all.

[1] What with Editors have often attributed line 9 of the 1592 text, the repetitious "What with dishonour, and the hate of men," to a compositor's error.

[2] Unhappy … lost Editors have puzzled over the ungrammatical structure of these lines, suggesting further corruption of the text, though the phrasing can also be attributed to Bel-Imperia's frame of mind.

[3] in … thee In relation to you.

[4] bear … sake Go along with it for the purposes of maintaining our outward appearance.

[5] deigned to say Conceded to speak of.

[6] applies our drift Endorses our intentions.

[7] Nor … think Do not assume that I will easily put my goal out of mind.

[8] determine of Deliberate on a fitting decision.

[9] grace my practices Support my ploys.

HIERONIMO. Why then I'll fit you;[1] say no more.
When I was young I gave my mind
And plied myself to fruitless poetry:
Which though it profit the professor[2] naught,
Yet is it passing pleasing to the world.
LORENZO. And how for that?
HIERONIMO. Marry, my good lord, thus—
And yet, methinks, you are too quick[3] with us—
When in Toledo there I studied,
It was my chance to write a tragedy—
See here my lords—

(He shows them a book.)

Which long forgot, I found this other day.
Now would your lordships favour me so much
As but to grace me with your acting it—
I mean each one of you to play a part—
Assure you it will prove most passing° strange tremendously
And wondrous plausible[4] to that assembly.
BALTHAZAR. What, would you have us play a tragedy?
HIERONIMO. Why, Nero thought it no disparagement,
And kings and emperors have ta'en delight
To make experience of their wits in plays![5]
LORENZO. Nay, be not angry good Hieronimo,
The prince but asked a question.
BALTHAZAR. In faith, Hieronimo, and° you be in earnest, if
I'll make one.[6]
LORENZO. And I another.
HIERONIMO. Now my good lord, could you entreat
Your sister Bel-Imperia to make one?
For what's a play without a woman in it?
BEL-IMPERIA. Little entreaty shall serve me, Hieronimo,
For I must needs be employed in your play.
HIERONIMO. Why, this is well; I tell you, lordings,
It was determined° to have been acted designed
By gentlemen and scholars too
Such as could tell what to speak.
BALTHAZAR. And now it shall be played by princes and courtiers,
Such as can tell how to speak,[7]
If, as it is our country manner,
You will but let us know the argument.° storyline
HIERONIMO. That shall I roundly.° The chronicles of Spain at once
Record this written of a knight of Rhodes:[8]
He was betrothed, and wedded at the length
To one Perseda, an Italian dame,
Whose beauty ravished all that her beheld,
Especially the soul of Soliman,[9]
Who at the marriage was the chiefest guest.
By sundry means sought Soliman to win
Perseda's love, and could not gain the same.
Then gan he break° his passions to a friend, confide
One of his bashaws[10] whom he held full dear;
Her had this bashaw long solicited,
And saw she was not otherwise to be won
But by her husband's death, this knight of Rhodes,
Whom presently by treachery he slew.
She, stirred with an exceeding hate therefore,
As cause of this slew Soliman;
And to escape the bashaw's tyranny
Did stab herself: and this the tragedy.
LORENZO. O excellent!
BEL-IMPERIA. But say, Hieronimo,
What then became of him that was the bashaw?
HIERONIMO. Marry thus: moved with remorse of his misdeeds,
Ran to a mountain-top and hung himself.

---

[1] I'll fit you I will supply you with what you need, but also I will take revenge on you.

[2] professor The one who engages in it.

[3] too quick Too insistent, with added meaning of too alive.

[4] plausible Amusing and deserving applause, or true to life.

[5] Nero … plays Emperor Nero (37–68) was an enthusiastic performer on the Roman stage. Given the events about to unfold, this might also be an allusion to the practice in Nero's time of having criminals executed onstage as part of a play.

[6] make one Appear as one of the players.

[7] what to … speak I.e., intellectual performers will primarily focus on the subject matter and themes of their speeches while those of the noble class will be trained in the stylistic elements of performing.

[8] knight of Rhodes Member of a Christian military order, originally called the Knights Hospitaller, who provided protection to pilgrims and crusaders traveling to the Holy Land and eventually also participated in battle.

[9] Perseda … Soliman Hieronimo's description of his play echoes the 1592 play Soliman and Perseda, believed to have also been written by Kyd.

[10] bashaws High-ranking Turkish officials.

BALTHAZAR. But which of us is to perform that part?
HIERONIMO. O, that will I my lords, make no doubt of it:
I'll play the murderer, I warrant you,
For I already have conceited[1] that.
BALTHAZAR. And what shall I?
HIERONIMO. Great Soliman the Turkish emperor.
LORENZO. And I?
HIERONIMO. Erastus the knight of Rhodes.
BEL-IMPERIA. And I?
HIERONIMO. Perseda, chaste and resolute.
And here, my lords, are several abstracts drawn,[2]
For each of you to note your parts,
And act it, as occasion's offered you.
You must provide a Turkish cap,
A black mustachio and a fauchion.[3]

(Gives a paper to Balthazar.)

You with a cross like to a Knight of Rhodes.

(Gives another to Lorenzo.)

And madam, you must attire yourself

(He giveth Bel-Imperia another.)

Like Phoebe, Flora, or the Huntress,[4]
Which to your discretion shall seem best.
And as for me, my lords, I'll look to one;
And, with the ransom that the viceroy sent
So furnish and perform this tragedy,
As all the world shall say Hieronimo
Was liberal in gracing of it so.[5]
BALTHAZAR. Hieronimo, methinks a comedy were better.
HIERONIMO. A comedy?
Fie, comedies are fit for common wits:
But to present a kingly troop[6] withal,
Give me a stately-written tragedy,
Tragedia cothurnata,[7] fitting kings,
Containing matter,[8] and not common things.
My lords, all this must be performed,
As fitting for the first night's revelling.
The Italian tragedians were so sharp of wit,
That in one hour's meditation
They would perform anything in action.[9]
LORENZO. And well it may; for I have seen the like
In Paris, 'mongst the French tragedians.
HIERONIMO. In Paris? Mass,[10] and well remembered!
There's one thing more that rests for us to do.
BALTHAZAR. What's that, Hieronimo? Forget not anything.
HIERONIMO. Each one of us must act his part
In unknown languages,[11]
That it may breed the more variety.
As you, my lord, in Latin, I in Greek,
You in Italian; and for because I know
That Bel-Imperia hath practised the French,
In courtly French shall all her phrases be.
BEL-IMPERIA. You mean to try my cunning[12] then, Hieronimo.
BALTHAZAR. But this will be a mere confusion,
And hardly shall we all be understood.
HIERONIMO. It must be so, for the conclusion
Shall prove the invention[13] and all was good.

[1] conceited Developed an interpretation (of the part).

[2] abstracts drawn Specific parts were written on rolls of paper which showed the character's lines and cues.

[3] fauchion Turkish broad curved sword.

[4] Phoebe … Huntress Like Diana the Roman goddess of the moon (Phoebe), the flower goddess Flora, or huntress (another reference to Diana, patroness of hunting).

[5] liberal … so Generous in embellishing it so well.

[6] a kingly troop I.e., group of royal spectators.

[7] Tragedia cothurnata Greek drama in its most grave form. The figure of Tragedy was usually depicted in royal dress.

[8] matter Serious subject matter.

[9] Italian … action The performers of the Commedia dell'arte could improvise their performance from a small outline.

[10] Mass By the mass (a mild curse).

[11] act … languages It is unknown if the parts were actually spoken in different languages in early performances, though scholars have argued that this was Kyd's design, meant to be incomprehensible to his own audiences. Possibly the speeches were changed to English by the compositor.

[12] cunning Education, or ability to scheme and deceive.

[13] invention Realization of the play's themes and aims, but also that of Hieronimo's plot.

And I myself in an oration,
And with a strange and wondrous show besides,
That I will have there behind a curtain,
Assure yourself, shall make the matter known.
And all shall be concluded in one scene,
For there's no pleasure ta'en in tediousness.
BALTHAZAR. [Aside to Lorenzo] How like you this?
LORENZO. Why, thus my lord,
We must resolve to soothe his humours up.[1]
BALTHAZAR. On then Hieronimo, farewell till soon.
HIERONIMO. You'll ply this gear?
LORENZO. I warrant you.

(Exeunt all but Hieronimo.)

HIERONIMO. Why so.
Now shall I see the fall of Babylon,[2]
Wrought by the heavens in this confusion.
And if the world like not this tragedy,
Hard is the hap° of old Hieronimo. lot

(Exit.)

ACT 4, SCENE 2

(Enter Isabella with a weapon.)

ISABELLA. Tell me no more! O monstrous homicides!
Since neither piety nor pity moves
The king to justice or compassion,
I will revenge myself upon this place
Where thus they murdered my beloved son.

(She cuts down the arbour.)[3]

Down with these branches and these loathsome boughs
Of this unfortunate and fatal pine:
Down with them, Isabella, rent them up
And burn the roots from whence the rest is sprung.
I will not leave a root, a stalk, a tree,
A bough, a branch, a blossom, nor a leaf,
No, not an herb within this garden-plot.
Accursed complot of my misery,
Fruitless for ever may this garden be!
Barren the earth, and blissless whosoever
Imagines not to keep it unmanured!
An eastern wind commixed with noisome° airs poisonous
Shall blast the plants and the young saplings;
The earth with serpents shall be pestered,
And passengers,° for fear to be infect, travelers
Shall stand aloof, and, looking at it, tell,
"There, murdered, died the son of Isabel."
Ay, here he died, and here I him embrace:
See where his ghost solicits with his wounds
Revenge on her that should revenge his death.
Hieronimo, make haste to see thy son,
For sorrow and despair hath cited° me enjoined
To hear Horatio plead with Rhadamanth:
Make haste, Hieronimo, to hold excused
Thy negligence in pursuit of their deaths,
Whose hateful wrath bereaved him of his breath.
Ah nay, thou dost delay their deaths,
Forgives the murderers of thy noble son,
And none but I bestir[4] me—to no end.
And as I curse this tree from further fruit,
So shall my womb be cursed for his sake;
And with this weapon will I wound the breast,

(She stabs herself.)

The hapless breast that gave Horatio suck.

[Exit.][5]

---

[1] soothe … up Indulge his behavior.

[2] fall of Babylon I.e., destruction of the tower of Babel, the place where people were thrown into confusion and discord as they all began to speak different languages (Genesis 11). Bibles of the Renaissance depicted Babel and Babylon, the symbol of pagan opulence, as the same location, and in protestant England Babylon was also closely associated with the Catholic church.

[3] She … arbour She probably cuts down some of the leaves and branches in a symbolic gesture.

[4] bestir Incite to take action.

[5] Exit Isabella must step offstage to die after her final line.

ACT 4, SCENE 3

(Enter Hieronimo; he knocks up the curtain. Enter the Duke of Castile.)

CASTILE. How now Hieronimo, where's your fellows,
That you take all this pain?
HIERONIMO. O sir, it is for the author's credit
To look that all things may go well.
But, good my lord, let me entreat your grace
To give the king the copy of the play:
This is the argument[1] of what we show.
CASTILE. I will, Hieronimo.
HIERONIMO. One thing more, my good lord.
CASTILE. What's that?
HIERONIMO. Let me entreat your grace
That, when the train are passed into the gallery,
You would vouchsafe to throw me down the key.[2]
CASTILE. I will, Hieronimo.

(Exit Castile.)

HIERONIMO. What are you ready, Balthazar?
Bring a chair and a cushion for the king.

(Enter Balthazar with a chair.)

Well done, Balthazar; hang up the title.[3]
Our scene is Rhodes—what, is your beard[4] on?
BALTHAZAR. Half on, the other is in my hand.
HIERONIMO. Dispatch for shame, are you so long?

(Exit Balthazar.)

Bethink thyself, Hieronimo,
Recall thy wits, recompt° thy former wrongs remember
Thou hast received by murder of thy son;
And lastly, not least, how Isabel,
Once his mother and thy dearest wife,
All woe-begone for him, hath slain herself.
Behoves thee then, Hieronimo, to be revenged.
The plot is laid of dire revenge:
On then, Hieronimo, pursue revenge,
For nothing wants but acting of revenge.

(Exit Hieronimo.)

ACT 4, SCENE 4

(Enter Spanish King, Viceroy, the Duke of Castile, and their train.)

KING. Now, Viceroy, shall we see the tragedy
Of Soliman the Turkish emperor,
Performed of pleasure by your son the prince,
My nephew Don Lorenzo, and my niece.
VICEROY. Who, Bel-Imperia?
KING. Ay, and Hieronimo, our marshal,
At whose request they deign to do't themselves:
These be our pastimes in the court of Spain.
Here, brother, you shall be the book-keeper:[5]
This is the argument of that they show.

(He giveth him a book.)

(Gentlemen, this play of Hieronimo, in sundry languages, was thought good to be set down in English more largely, for the easier understanding to every public reader.)[6]

(Enter Balthazar, Bel-Imperia, and Hieronimo.)

[1] copy ... argument The king will receive a copy of the play with a synopsis of the argument.

[2] gallery ... key One of the staging questions that has sparked debate among scholars has been the issue of where the royal spectators are seated during Hieronimo's play. Some have suggested that the "gallery" is a seating area on the main stage, while others have argued that a raised balcony could have been positioned in such a way that would permit the royals to see the play, perhaps explaining why they must run later to try to catch Hieronimo once they have seen the outcome of his performance.

[4] beard To play Soliman, who is a Turkish emperor, Balthazar wears a full beard.

[5] book-keeper Person charged with the task of prompting the performers during the play and in charge of the company's collection of manuscripts.

[6] Gentlemen ... reader A note like this, addressed to a reader rather than giving a direction to a character or actor, is an unusual occurrence in an Early Modern play.

BALTHAZAR. Bashaw, that Rhodes is ours,[1] yield heavens the honour,
And holy Mahomet, our sacred prophet;
And be thou graced with every excellence
That Soliman can give, or thou desire.
But thy desert in conquering Rhodes is less
Than in reserving this fair Christian nymph,
Perseda, blissful lamp of excellence,
Whose eyes compel, like powerful adamant,
The warlike heart of Soliman to wait.[2]
KING. See, Viceroy, that is Balthazar, your son,
That represents the emperor Soliman:
How well he acts his amorous passion.° speech
VICEROY. Ay, Bel-Imperia hath taught him that.
CASTILE. That's because his mind runs all on Bel-Imperia.
HIERONIMO. Whatever joy earth yields betide your majesty.
BALTHAZAR. Earth yields no joy without Perseda's love.
HIERONIMO. Let then Perseda on your grace attend.
BALTHAZAR. She shall not wait on me, but I on her:
Drawn by the influence[3] of her lights,° I yield. eyes
But let my friend, the Rhodian knight, come forth,
Erasto, dearer than my life to me,
That he may see Perseda, my beloved.

(Enter [Lorenzo playing] Erasto.)

KING. Here comes Lorenzo; look upon the plot,
And tell me, brother, what part plays he?
BEL-IMPERIA. Ah, my Erasto, welcome to Perseda.
LORENZO. Thrice happy is Erasto that thou liv'st—
Rhodes' loss is nothing to Erasto's joy;
Sith his Perseda lives, his life survives.
BALTHAZAR. Ah, bashaw, here is love between Erasto
And fair Perseda, sovereign of my soul.
HIERONIMO. Remove Erasto, mighty Soliman,
And then Perseda will be quickly won.
BALTHAZAR. Erasto is my friend, and while he lives
Perseda never will remove her love.
HIERONIMO. Let not Erasto live to grieve great Soliman.
BALTHAZAR. Dear is Erasto in our princely eye.
HIERONIMO. But if he be your rival, let him die.
BALTHAZAR. Why, let him die: so love commandeth me.
Yet grieve I that Erasto should so die.
HIERONIMO. Erasto, Soliman saluteth thee,
And lets thee wit° by me his highness' will know
Which is, thou shouldst be thus employed.

(Stab him.)

BEL-IMPERIA. Ay me,
Erasto! see, Soliman, Erasto's slain!
BALTHAZAR. Yet liveth Soliman to comfort thee.
Fair queen of beauty, let not favour die,
But with a gracious eye behold his grief,
That with Perseda's beauty is increased,
If by Perseda his grief be not released.
BEL-IMPERIA. Tyrant, desist soliciting vain suits;
Relentless are mine ears to thy laments,
As thy butcher is pitiless and base,
Which seized on my Erasto, harmless knight,
Yet by thy power thou thinkest to command,
And to thy power Perseda doth obey:
But were she able, thus she would revenge
Thy treacheries on thee, ignoble prince:

(Stab him.)

And on herself she would be thus revenged.

(Stab herself.)

KING. Well said, old marshal, this was bravely done!
HIERONIMO. But Bel-Imperia plays Perseda well.
VICEROY. Were this in earnest, Bel-Imperia,
You would be better to my son than so.
KING. But now what follows for Hieronimo?
HIERONIMO. Marry, this follows for Hieronimo:
Here break we off our sundry languages
And thus conclude I in our vulgar tongue.[4]
Haply° you think, but bootless[5] are your thoughts, maybe

---

[1] Rhodes is ours The Turkish army seized the island of Rhodes from the Knights Hospitaller in 1523.

[2] wait Be in service of.

[3] influence Otherworldly fluid was said to stream from celestial bodies to earth, where it affected the behavior of humans.

[4] vulgar tongue Common language.

[5] bootless In vain.

That this is fabulously counterfeit,[1]
And that we do as all tragedians do:
To die today, for fashioning our scene,[2]
The death of Ajax,[3] or some Roman peer,
And in a minute starting up again,
Revive to please to-morrow's audience.
No, princes; know I am Hieronimo,
The hopeless father of a hapless son,
Whose tongue is tuned to tell his latest° tale, final
Not to excuse gross errors in the play.
I see your looks urge instance[4] of these words;
Behold the reason urging me to this:

(Shows his dead son.)

See here my show, look on this spectacle.
Here lay my hope, and here my hope hath end;
Here lay my heart, and here my heart was slain;
Here lay my treasure, here my treasure lost;
Here lay my bliss, and here my bliss bereft:
But hope, heart, treasure, joy, and bliss,
All fled, failed, died, yea, all decayed with this.
From forth these wounds came breath that gave me life;
They murdered me that made these fatal marks.
The cause was love, whence grew this mortal hate,
The hate, Lorenzo and young Balthazar,
The love, my son to Bel-Imperia.
But night, the coverer of accursed crimes,
With pitchy° silence hushed these traitors' harms dark
And lent them leave, for they had sorted leisure° opportunity
To take advantage in my garden-plot
Upon my son, my dear Horatio:
There merciless they butchered up my boy,
In black dark night, to pale dim cruel death.
He shrieks, I heard, and yet methinks I hear,
His dismal outcry echo in the air.
With soonest speed I hasted to the noise,
Where hanging on a tree I found my son,
Through-girt[5] with wounds, and slaughtered as you see.
And grieved I, think you, at this spectacle?
Speak, Portuguese, whose loss resembles mine:
If thou canst weep upon thy Balthazar,
'Tis like I wailed for my Horatio.
And you, my lord, whose reconciled son
Marched in a net,[6] and thought himself unseen
And rated° me for brainsick lunacy, berated
With "God amend that mad Hieronimo!"—
How can you brook° our play's catastrophe? endure
And here behold this bloody handkercher,
Which at Horatio's death I weeping dipped
Within the river of his bleeding wounds:
It as propitious, see I have reserved,
And never hath it left my bloody heart,
Soliciting remembrance of my vow
With these, O these accursed murderers:
Which now performed, my heart is satisfied.
And to this end the bashaw I became
That might revenge me on Lorenzo's life,
Who therefore was appointed to the part,
And was to represent the Knight of Rhodes,
That I might kill him more conveniently.
So, Viceroy, was this Balthazar, thy son—
That Soliman which Bel-Imperia
In person of Perseda murdered—
Solely appointed to that tragic part
That she might slay him that offended her.
Poor Bel-Imperia missed her part in this:
For though the story saith she should have died,
Yet I of kindness, and of care to her,
Did otherwise determine of her end;
But love of him whom they did hate too much
Did urge her resolution to be such.
And princes, now behold Hieronimo,
Author and actor in this tragedy,
Bearing his latest fortune in his fist:[7]
And will as resolute conclude his part
As any of the actors gone before.
And, gentles, thus I end my play:
Urge no more words: I have no more to say.

[1] fabulously counterfeit Imaginary and false.

[2] for … scene In the context of performing the play.

[3] Ajax Greek warrior who killed himself after being overcome with envy after his heroic actions in the Trojan war went unrecognized and Achilles' armor was bequeathed to Odysseus instead of him.

[4] urge instance Require evidence.

[5] Through-girt Pierced through.

[6] Marched … net Proverbial, meaning in disguise.

[7] Bearing … fist I.e., rope with which he will hang himself.

(He runs to hang himself.)

KING. O hearken, Viceroy! Hold,° Hieronimo! halt
Brother, my nephew and thy son are slain!
VICEROY. We are betrayed! My Balthazar is slain!
Break ope the doors, run, save Hieronimo.

[They break in and hold Hieronimo.]

Hieronimo, do but inform the king of these events;
Upon mine honour thou shalt have no harm.[1]
HIERONIMO. Viceroy, I will not trust thee with my life,
Which I this day have offered to my son.
Accursed wretch,
Why stayest thou him that was resolved to die?
KING. Speak, traitor; damned, bloody murderer, speak!
For now I have thee I will make thee speak—
Why hast thou done this undeserving° deed? undeserved
VICEROY. Why hast thou murdered my Balthazar?
CASTILE. Why hast thou butchered both my children thus?
HIERONIMO. O, good words![2]
As dear to me was my Horatio
As yours, or yours, or yours, my lord, to you.
My guiltless son was by Lorenzo slain,
And by Lorenzo and that Balthazar
Am I at last revenged thoroughly,
Upon whose souls may heavens be yet avenged
With greater far than these afflictions.
CASTILE. But who were thy confederates in this?[3]
VICEROY. That was thy daughter Bel-Imperia;
For by her hand my Balthazar was slain:
I saw her stab him.
KING. Why speak'st thou not?
HIERONIMO. What lesser liberty can kings afford
Than harmless silence? Then afford it me:
Sufficeth I may not, nor I will not tell thee.
KING. Fetch forth the tortures.

[1] thou … harm The Viceroy would in reality not have the authority to guarantee this.

[2] O, good words! The lines that are here marked were replaced with an expanded version in the 1602 edition. The passage beginning "O, good words" and ending "I saw her stab him" was rearranged and incorporated into the edition, as follows:

HIERONIMO. But are you sure they are dead?
CASTILE. Ay, slave, too sure.
HIERONIMO. What, and yours too?
VICEROY. Ay, all are dead, not one of them survive.
HIERONIMO. Nay then, I care not, come, and we shall be friends:
Let us lay our heads together;
See here's a goodly noose will hold them all.
VICEROY. O damned devil, how secure° he is. overconfident
HIERONIMO. Secure, why dost thou wonder at it?
I tell thee Viceroy, this day I have seen revenge,
And in that sight am grown a prouder monarch
Than ever sat under the crown of Spain:
Had I as many lives as there be stars,
As many heavens to go to as those lives,
I'd give them all, ay, and my soul to boot,
But I would see thee ride in this red pool.
CASTILE. Speak, who were thy confederates in this?
VICEROY. That was thy daughter Bel-Imperia,
For by her hand my Balthazar was slain:
I saw her stab him.
HIERONIMO. O, good words:
As dear to me was my Horatio,
As yours, or yours, or yours, my lord, to you.
My guiltless son was by Lorenzo slain,
And by Lorenzo, and that Balthazar,
Am I at last revenged thoroughly,
Upon whose souls may heavens be yet revenged
With greater far than these afflictions.
Methinks since I grew inward with revenge,
I cannot look with scorn enough on death.
KING. What, dost thou mock us, slave? Bring tortures forth.
HIERONIMO. Do, do, do, and meantime I'll torture you.
You had a son, as I take it: and your son
Should ha'been married to your daughter:
Ha, was't not so? You had a son too,
He was my liege's nephew. He was proud,
And politic.° Had he lived, he might ha'come cunning
To wear the crown of Spain, I think 'twas so:
'Twas I that killed him; look you, this same hand,
'Twas it that stabbed his heart; do you see, this hand?
For one Horatio, if you ever knew him, a youth,
One that they hanged up in his father's garden,
One that did force your valiant son to yield,
While your more valiant son did take him prisoner.
VICEROY. Be deaf my sense, I can hear no more.
KING. Fall heaven, and cover us with thy sad ruins.
CASTILE. Roll all the world within thy pitchy cloud.
HIERONIMO. Now do I applaud what I have acted
Nunc iners cadat manus.
Now to express the rupture of my part,
First take my tongue, and afterward my heart.

[3] who … in this? Scholars have puzzled over this line since Hieronimo has already confessed everything known to us. It is possible the royals assume there are confederates.

Traitor as thou art, I'll make thee tell.
HIERONIMO. Indeed,
Thou may'st torment me, as his wretched son
Hath done in murdering my Horatio,
But never shalt thou force me to reveal
The thing which I have vowed inviolate.[1]
And therefore in despite of all thy threats,
Pleased with their deaths, and eased with their revenge,
First take my tongue, and afterwards my heart.

(He bites out his tongue.)

KING. O monstrous resolution of a wretch!
See, Viceroy, he hath bitten forth his tongue
Rather than to reveal what we required.
CASTILE. Yet can he write.
KING. And if in this he satisfy us not,
We will devise th'extremest kind of death
That ever was invented for a wretch.

(Then he makes signs for a knife to mend his pen.)[2]

CASTILE. O, he would have a knife to mend his pen.
VICEROY. Here; and advise thee that thou write the troth.
KING. Look to my brother! Save Hieronimo!

([Hieronimo] with a knife stabs the Duke and himself.)

What age hath ever heard such monstrous deeds?
My brother, and the whole succeeding hope° heirs
That Spain expected after my decease!
Go bear his body hence, that we may mourn
The loss of our beloved brother's death;
That he may be entombed, whate'er befall:
I am the next, the nearest, last of all.
VICEROY. And thou, Don Pedro, do the like for us;
Take up our hapless son, untimely slain:
Set me with him, and he with woeful me,
Upon the main-mast of a ship unmanned,
And let the wind and tide haul me along
To Scylla's barking and untamed gulf,[3]
Or to the loathsome pool of Acheron,
To weep my want for[4] my sweet Balthazar:
Spain hath no refuge for a Portingale.

(The trumpets sound a dead march,[5] the King of Spain mourning after his brother's body, and the Viceroy of Portingale bearing the body of his son.)

ACT 4, SCENE 5

([Andrea's] Ghost and Revenge.)

ANDREA. Ay, now my hopes have end in their effects,
When blood and sorrow finish my desires:
Horatio murdered in his father's bower,
Vile Serberine by Pedringano slain,
False Pedringano hanged by quaint° device, devious
Fair Isabella by herself misdone,
Prince Balthazar by Bel-Imperia stabbed,
The Duke of Castile and his wicked son
Both done to death by old Hieronimo,
My Bel-Imperia fallen as Dido[6] fell,
And good Hieronimo slain by himself:
Ay, these were spectacles to please my soul.
Now will I beg at lovely Proserpine,
That, by the virtue of her princely doom,
I may consort my friends in pleasing sort,
And on my foes work just and sharp revenge.
I'll lead my friend Horatio through those fields
Where never-dying wars are still inured:[7]
I'll lead fair Isabella to that train[8]
Where pity weeps but never feeleth pain:
I'll lead my Bel-Imperia to those joys mend his pen I.e., sharpen the tip of a quill pen.

I'll lead Hieronimo where Orpheus plays,
Adding sweet pleasure to eternal days.
But say, Revenge, for thou must help, or none,
Against the rest how shall my hate be shown?

REVENGE. This hand shall hale them down to deepest hell,
Where none but Furies, bugs and tortures dwell.

ANDREA. Then, sweet Revenge, do this at my request;
Let me be judge, and doom them to unrest:
Let loose poor Tityus[2] from the vulture's gripe,
And let Don Cyprian supply his room;
Place Don Lorenzo on Ixion's wheel,
And let the lover's endless pains surcease—° cease
Juno forgets old wrath, and grants him ease;
Hang Balthazar about Chimaera's[3] neck,
And let him there bewail his bloody love,
Repining at our joys that are above;
Let Serberine go roll the fatal stone,
And take from Sisyphus[4] his endless moan;
False Pedringano for his treachery,
Let him be dragged through boiling Acheron,
And there live, dying still in endless flames,
Blaspheming gods and all their holy names.

REVENGE. Then haste we down to meet thy friends and foes:
To place thy friends in ease, the rest in woes.
For here, though death hath end their misery,
I'll there begin their endless tragedy.

(Exeunt.)

FRANCIS BACON

1561 – 1626

Philosopher, essayist, jurist, politician, naturalist, classicist, historian, and utopian fantasist, Francis Bacon had an extraordinary capacity to range throughout the world of learning while keeping a focus on the practical uses of knowledge, able not only to master the traditions of the past but also to combine, manipulate, and consolidate old concepts into fruitful new ideas. His essays, memorable distillations of his wide reading and worldly experience, are still widely read and enjoyed. His philosophical writings, in both Latin and English, aim at nothing less than the reformation of humanity's approach to understanding nature and society. Ironically, it can be hard for us now, reading from the other side of the revolution he helped accelerate, to appreciate the full impact of Bacon's philosophy. He did not fully develop what some call "the scientific method" or anticipate the crucial role of mathematics in later scientific developments. What he did accomplish, in his philosophy and in his often terse style (deliberately free, usually, from flights of metaphor or fancy), was to anchor the mind more firmly in experience and to lend momentum to a new sense of worldly inquiry and expectation. It would be unfair to hold him responsible, as some have done, for the dangers and excesses inherent in modern science and its assumptions; indeed, in The New Atlantis Bacon himself hints presciently that increased power over nature should be accompanied by increased love and gratitude.

"I had rather studied books than men," Bacon concluded late in his life, but his origins made vast ambitions in both the political and intellectual spheres seem almost inevitable. His father, Sir Nicholas Bacon, was Lord Keeper of the Great Seal, one of the most powerful ministers in the Elizabethan government. His mother, Ann Cook, was an erudite and devout Calvinist who instilled in her son a deep sense of purpose and a passion for knowledge. Cambridge student at twelve, Assistant to the Ambassador to France at sixteen, barrister and Member of Parliament by the age of twenty-three, Bacon achieved much early, but his father's untimely death in 1579 left him short of funds and without direct influence at court. He was not well liked by Elizabeth, and it was not until the accession of James I that his star began to rise. Knighted in 1603, he was appointed Solicitor General in 1607, Attorney General in 1613, Privy Councillor in 1616, Lord Keeper of the Seal in 1617, and finally Lord Chancellor in 1618, acquiring along the way the titles of Baron Verulam and Viscount St. Albans. "By indignities men come to dignities," Bacon wrote in his essay "Of Great Place"—conscious, no doubt, of the reputation for sycophancy and scheming he had acquired in his quest for power and position—and "the standing is slippery." In 1621, Bacon lost his political footing. Caught on the wrong side of a dispute between Parliament and his ally the Duke of Buckingham, he pleaded guilty to accepting bribes and was expelled for life from public office. The bribes do not seem to have dulled Bacon's keen legal mind: John Aubrey could report fifty years later that "there are fewer of his decrees reversed than of any other Chancellor." Bacon was variously denounced as a spendthrift, a calculating politician, and a homosexual who had married the heiress Alice Barnham in 1606 merely for money (and had disinherited her in his last will), but he was also respected as an able administrator and advisor and a consummate orator whose audiences, Ben Jonson testified, were unwilling to accept that his speeches must end.

Until his death in 1626 (reputedly from a chill caught while investigating the preservative properties of snow), Bacon concentrated on expanding and refining his intellectual project. A third edition of his Essays appeared in 1625 with a new subtitle, Counsels, Civil and Moral. Bacon was the first to import the term "essai" into English from Montaigne for this new form, but as the subtitle indicates, his orientation was more public and impersonal than Montaigne's, based more in the tradition of the commonplace book and the manual of conduct than in discursive meditation. The first edition of 1597 was composed of terse, aphoristic observations organized under ten topics. The final edition of 1625 had grown to 58 essays. The overall style is one of brevity, curtness, and sagacity, with fluid transitions between subjects. Bacon employs to great effect aphoristic devices such as observations in parallel series of twos and threes, and he is fond of antitheses, "the case exaggerated both ways, with the utmost force of the wit," which have the effect of encouraging a balanced consideration of the issues by the reader. A notable exception is "Of Gardens," in which Bacon, an avid gardener, indulges in a didactic and uncharacteristically opinionated exhortation concerning his lifelong passion.

To the end of his life Bacon pursued another passion, his grand design for the renewal of knowledge, the Great Instauration, which he had already outlined in the preface to his aphoristic Latin treatise Novum Organum (New Instrument) in 1620. Only a few of the many volumes he conceived for this project were actually completed, though others exist in partial form, or as prefaces or proposals. He wrote many of these in Latin, still considered the international language of scholarship. Bacon now expanded and translated The Advancement of Learning, which had appeared in English in 1605, as De Augmentis. Its vital innovation was a reclassification of knowledge so as to separate theology from natural philosophy. Bacon was no atheist, but he insisted that the deductive, syllogistic methods applied by the Aristotelian Schoolmen to theological speculation would not succeed in unlocking nature's secrets. Rather than perceiving the natural world through the lens of unproven axioms and generalizations, we must begin with nature itself, gathering facts, sorting and analyzing them using inductive methods, and only then deriving principles which may be used to enhance further investigation: "Nature cannot be commanded except by being obeyed."

In fact, the pure induction favored by Bacon did not suffice for fruitful experimental investigation; the scientific method still needs room for intuitive guesses and intermediate deduction. But if Bacon's methodology and philosophy was not in accord with twenty-first century practices, he was certainly rhetorically skillful and inspiring on the topic to a degree unmatched by his contemporaries. His New Atlantis, a fragment written in 1610 and published after his death in 1626, imagines in vivid and beguiling detail a utopian community of dynamic technical and spiritual progress founded upon bureaucratic and co-operative science. The power of Bacon's prose fired the imagination of seventeenth-century English readers and sparked widespread public interest in scientific undertakings. In 1662, the Royal Society, the first concrete realization of Bacon's dream of a scientific bureaucracy, acclaimed him as their model and prophet; a century later, Diderot adopted Bacon's classification of learning and dedicated the Encyclopedia to him, as did Kant his Critique of Pure Reason. Bacon's ambition, announced in The Advancement of Learning, to "ring a bell to call other wits together," has been fulfilled.

OF TRUTH

"What is truth?" said jesting Pilate,[1] and would not stay for an answer. Certainly there be that delight in giddiness, and count it a bondage to fix a belief; affecting free-will in thinking, as well as in acting. And though the sects of philosophers of that kind[2] be gone, yet there remain certain discoursing wits, which are of the same veins, though there be not so much blood in them, as was in those of the ancients. But it is not only the difficulty and labor which men take in finding out of truth, nor again that when it is found it imposeth upon men's thoughts, that doth bring lies in favor; but a natural though corrupt love of the lie itself. One of the later school of the Grecians examineth the matter,[3] and is at a stand to think what should be in it, that men should love lies, where neither they make for pleasure, as with poets, nor for advantage, as with the merchant; but for the lie's sake. But I cannot tell: this same truth is a naked and open day-light, that doth not show the masks and mummeries and triumphs[4] of the world half so stately and daintily as candle-lights. Truth may perhaps come to the price of a pearl, that showeth best by day; but it will not rise to the price of a diamond or carbuncle,[5] that showeth best in varied lights. A mixture of a lie doth ever add pleasure.

Doth any man doubt, that if there were taken out of men's minds vain opinions, flattering hopes, false valuations, imaginations as one would, and the like, but it would leave the minds of a number of men poor shrunken things, full of melancholy and indisposition,[1] and unpleasing to themselves? One of the fathers, in great severity, called poesy vinum daemonum,[2] because it filleth the imagination; and yet it is but with the shadow of a lie. But it is not the lie that passeth through the mind, but the lie that sinketh in and settleth in it, that doth the hurt; such as we spake of before. But howsoever these things are thus in men's depraved judgments and affections, yet truth, which only doth judge itself, teacheth that the inquiry of truth, which is the love-making, or wooing of it, the knowledge of truth, which is the presence of it, and the belief of truth, which is the enjoying of it, is the sovereign good of human nature.

[1] What is truth Cf. John 18.38; Pilate Pontius Pilate, Roman governor of Judea from 26–36 CE, who presided over Christ's trial.

[2] of that kind I.e., skepticism, a mid-fourth century BCE philosophy positing the uncertainty of all knowledge.

[3] One of … matter See the Philopseudes (The Lover of Lies) by Lucian of Samosata (c. 120–180 CE).

[4] masks I.e., masques, elaborate court pageants; mummeries Popular plays or ceremonies; triumphs Ceremonial processions of victorious military commanders and their forces.

[5] carbuncle Ruby.

The first creature of God, in the works of the days, was the light of the sense; the last, was the light of reason; and His sabbath work[3] ever since, is the illumination of his Spirit. First He breathed light upon the face of the matter or chaos; then He breathed light into the face of man; and still He breatheth and inspireth light into the face of His chosen. The poet that beautified the sect that was otherwise inferior to the rest[4] saith yet excellently well: "It is a pleasure to stand upon the shore, and to see ships tossed upon the sea; a pleasure to stand in the window of a castle, and to see a battle and the adventures thereof below: but no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage ground of Truth" (a hill not to be commanded, and where the air is always clear and serene), "and to see the errors, and wanderings, and mists, and tempests, in the vale below";[5] so always that this prospect be with pity, and not with swelling or pride. Certainly, it is heaven upon earth to have a man's mind move in charity, rest in Providence, and turn upon the poles of truth.

To pass from theological, and philosophical truth to the truth of civil business; it will be acknowledged even by those that practise it not that clear and round[6] dealing is the honor of man's nature; and that mixture of falsehood is like alloy in coin of gold and silver, which may make the metal work the better, but it embaseth[7] it. For these winding and crooked courses are the goings of the serpent, which goeth basely upon the belly, and not upon the feet. There is no vice that doth so cover a man with shame as to be found false and perfidious. And therefore Montaigne[8] saith prettily, when he inquired the reason, why the word of the lie should be such a disgrace and such an odious charge? Saith he, "If it be well weighed, to say that a man lieth, is as much to say, as that he is brave towards God and a coward towards men."[9] For a lie faces God, and shrinks from man. Surely the wickedness of falsehood and breach of faith cannot possibly be so highly expressed, as in that it shall be the last peal to call the judgments of God upon the generations of men; it being foretold, that when Christ cometh, "He shall not find faith upon the earth."[10]

Of Death

Men fear death as children fear to go in the dark; and as that natural fear in children is increased with tales, so is the other. Certainly, the contemplation of death, as the wages of sin, and passage to another world, is holy and religious; but the fear of it, as a tribute due unto nature, is weak. Yet in religious meditations there is sometimes mixture of vanity and of superstition. You shall read in some of the friars' books of mortification, that a man should think with himself, what the pain is, if he have but his finger's end pressed or tortured; and thereby imagine what the pains of death are, when the whole body is corrupted and dissolved; when many times death passeth with less pain than the torture of a limb, for the most vital parts are not the quickest of sense.[1] And by him that spake only as a philosopher and natural man, it was well said, Pompa mortis magis terret, quam mors ipsa.[2] Groans and convulsions, and a discolored face, and friends weeping, and blacks and obsequies,[3] and the like, show death terrible. It is worthy the observing that there is no passion in the mind of man so weak but it mates and masters the fear of death; and therefore death is no such terrible enemy when a man hath so many attendants about him that can win the combat of him. Revenge triumphs over death; love slights it; honor aspireth to it; grief flieth to it; fear preoccupateth it; nay, we read, after Otho the emperor[4] had slain himself, pity (which is the tenderest of affections) provoked many to die out of mere compassion to their sovereign, and as the truest sort of followers. Nay Seneca adds niceness[5] and satiety: Cogita quamdiu eadem feceris; mori velle, non tantum fortis aut miser, sed etiam fastidiosus potest.[6] A man would die, though he were neither valiant nor miserable, only upon a weariness to do the same thing so oft, over and over. It is no less worthy to observe how little alteration in good spirits the approaches of death make, for they appear to be the same men till the last instant. Augustus Caesar died in a compliment: Livia, conjugii nostri memor, vive et vale.[7] Tiberius in dissimulation, as Tacitus saith of him, Jam Tiberium vires et corpus, non dissimulatio, deserebant.[8] Vespasian in a jest, sitting upon the stool, Ut puto deus fio.[9] Galba with a sentence, Feri, si ex re sit populi Romani,[10] holding forth his neck. Septimius Severus in dispatch, Adeste, si quid mihi restat agendum,[11] and the like. Certainly the Stoics[12] bestowed too much cost upon death, and by their great preparations made it appear more fearful. Better, saith he, Qui finem vitae extremum inter munera ponat naturae.[13] It is as natural to die as to be born; and to a little infant, perhaps, the one is as painful as the other. He that dies in an earnest pursuit is like one that is wounded in hot blood who, for the time, scarce feels the hurt; and therefore a mind fixed and bent upon somewhat that is good doth avert the dolors[14] of death; but, above all, believe it, the sweetest canticle is, Nunc dimittis,[15] when a man hath obtained worthy ends and expectations. Death hath this also, that it openeth the gate to good fame, and extinguisheth envy: Extinctus amabitur idem.[16]

[15] canticle Song; Nunc dimittis Latin: literally, "thou dost dismiss." From Luke 2.29, Nunc dimittis servun tuum Domine, "And, now lettest thou they servant depart," used in the Anglican service for Evening prayer.

[16] fame Reputation; Extinctus … idem Latin: When dead, that same man will be loved. See Horace, Epistles 2.1.14.

OF REVENGE

Revenge is a kind of wild justice; which the more man's nature runs to, the more ought law to weed it out. For as for the first wrong, it doth but offend the law; but the revenge of that wrong, putteth the law out of office. Certainly, in taking revenge, a man is but even with his enemy; but in passing it over, he is superior: for it is a prince's part to pardon. And Solomon,[1] I am sure, saith, It is the glory of a man to pass by an offence. That which is past, is gone, and irrevocable; and wise men have enough to do, with things present, and to come: therefore, they do but trifle with themselves, that labour in past matters. There is no man doth a wrong, for the wrong's sake; but thereby to purchase himself profit, or pleasure, or honour, or the like. Therefore why should I be angry with a man, for loving himself better than me? And if any man should do wrong, merely out of ill nature, why, yet it is but like the thorn, or briar, which prick, and scratch, because they can do no other. The most tolerable sort of revenge, is for those wrongs which there is no law to remedy: but then, let a man take heed the revenge be such as there is no law to punish: else, a man's enemy is still before hand, and it is two for one. Some, when they take revenge, are desirous the party should know whence it cometh: this is the more generous. For the delight seemeth to be, not so much in doing the hurt, as in making the party repent: but base and crafty cowards are like the arrow that flieth in the dark. Cosmus, duke of Florence,[2] had a desperate saying, against perfidious or neglecting friends, as if those wrongs were unpardonable: You shall read (saith he) that we are commanded to forgive our enemies; but you never read, that we are commanded to forgive our friends. But yet the spirit of Job,[3] was in a better tune; Shall we (saith he) take good at God's hands, and not be content to take evil also? And so of friends in a proportion. This is certain; that a man that studieth revenge, keeps his own wounds green, which otherwise would heal, and do well. Public revenges, are, for the most part, fortunate; as that for the death of Caesar; for the death of Pertinax; for the death of Henry the Third of France;[4] and many more. But in private revenges it is not so. Nay rather, vindictive persons live the life of witches; who as they are mischievous, so end they unfortunate.

OF SIMULATION AND DISSIMULATION[5]

Dissimulation is but a faint kind of policy or wisdom; for it asketh a strong wit and a strong heart to know when to tell truth, and to do it. Therefore it is the weaker sort of politiques,[6] that are the great dissemblers.

Tacitus saith, "Livia sorted well with the arts of her husband and dissimulation of her son"; attributing arts or policy to Augustus, and dissimulation to Tiberius.[7] And again, when Mucianus encourageth Vespasian to take arms against Vitellius, he saith, "We rise not against the piercing judgment of Augustus, nor the extreme caution or closeness of Tiberius."[8] These properties, of arts or policy and dissimulation or closeness, are indeed habits and faculties several,[1] and to be distinguished. For if a man have that penetration of judgment as he can discern what things are to be laid open, and what to be secreted, and what to be showed at half lights, and to whom and when (which indeed are arts of state and arts of life, as Tacitus well calleth them), to him a habit of dissimulation is a hindrance and a poorness. But if a man cannot obtain to that judgment, then it is left to him generally to be close, and a dissembler. For where a man cannot choose or vary in particulars, there it is good to take the safest and wariest way, in general; like the going[2] softly, by one that cannot well see. Certainly the ablest men that ever were have had all an openness and frankness of dealing; and a name of certainty[3] and veracity; but then they were like horses well managed; for they could tell passing well when to stop or turn; and at such times when they thought the case indeed required dissimulation, if then they used it, it came to pass that the former opinion spread abroad of their good faith and clearness of dealing made them almost invisible.

[1] Solomon King of Israel (c. tenth century BCE) associated with wisdom.

[2] Cosmus, duke of Florence Cosimo "The Great" Gherardini, 1st Duke of Florence (c. 870–950).

[3] Job Subject of the Old Testament book of the same name. He endured many trials and misfortunes without wavering in his faith.

[4] Caesar … of France Julius Caesar (r. 49–44 BCE), Roman Emperor Publius Helvius Pertinax (r. 193 CE), and Henry III (r. 1574–89), were all assassinated during times of instability in the states over which they ruled.

[5] SIMULATION Explicit, outright lying; DISSIMULATION Disguising intentions or feelings with a false appearance.

[6] politiques Politicians, here dependent on cunning and strategy.

[7] Tacitus Prominant Roman historian (55?–120? CE); Livia Notable Roman empress (58 BCE–29 CE), married to Octavian of Rome and mother to Tiberius; "Livia … son" Cf. Tacitus Annals Book 1; sorted Partook of; Augustus Octavian (63 BCE–14 CE), first emperor of Rome and arguably the most important figure in Roman history; Tiberius Augustus' successor (14–37 CE); his reign was characterized by his own dark moodiness and manipulation by unscrupulous politicians.

[8] Mucianus Gaius Licinius Mucianus (c. first century CE), Roman statesman and general; Vespasian Caesar Vespasian Augustus (9–79 CE), succeeded Vitellius as Roman Emperor at the end of the civil war known as the Year of the Four Emperors. He restored the discipline and order his predecessor eroded among the Roman military; Vitellius Aulus Vitellius (15–69 CE), Vespasian's predecessor, known for his luxurious excesses; "We rise … Tiberius" See Tacitus, Histories 1.10.

There be three degrees of this hiding and veiling of a man's self. The first, closeness, reservation, and secrecy; when a man leaveth himself without observation, or without hold to be taken, what he is. The second, dissimulation, in the negative; when a man lets fall signs and arguments, that he is not that[4] he is. And the third, simulation, in the affirmative; when a man industriously and expressly feigns and pretends to be that he is not.

For the first of these, secrecy; it is indeed the virtue of a confessor. And assuredly the secret man heareth many confessions. For who will open himself to a blab or a babbler? But if a man be thought secret, it inviteth discovery; as the more close air sucketh in the more open; and as in confession the revealing is not for worldly use, but for the ease of a man's heart, so secret men come to the knowledge of many things in that kind; while men rather discharge their minds than impart their minds. In few words, mysteries are due to secrecy. Besides (to say truth) nakedness is uncomely,[5] as well in mind as body; and it addeth no small reverence to men's manners and actions, if they be not altogether open. As for talkers and futile persons, they are commonly vain and credulous withal.[6] For he that talketh what he knoweth, will also talk what he knoweth not. Therefore set it down, that an habit of secrecy is both politic[7] and moral. And in this part, it is good that a man's face give his tongue leave to speak. For the discovery of a man's self by the tracts of his countenance is a great weakness and betraying; by how much it is many times more marked and believed than a man's words.

For the second, which is dissimulation; it followeth many times upon secrecy by a necessity; so that he that will be secret must be a dissembler in some degree. For men are too cunning to suffer a man to keep an indifferent carriage between both, and to be secret, without swaying the balance on either side. They will so beset a man with questions, and draw him on, and pick it out of him, that, without an absurd silence, he must show an inclination one way; or if he do not, they will gather as much by his silence as by his speech. As for equivocations, or oraculous[8] speeches, they cannot hold out long. So that no man can be secret, except he give himself a little scope of dissimulation; which is, as it were, but the skirts or train[9] of secrecy.

But for the third degree, which is simulation and false profession; that I hold more culpable, and less politic; except it be in great and rare matters. And therefore a general custom of simulation (which is this last degree) is a vice, rising either of a natural falseness or fearfulness, or of a mind that hath some main faults, which because a man must needs disguise, it maketh him practise simulation in other things, lest his hand should be out of ure.[10]

The great advantages of simulation and dissimulation are three. First, to lay asleep opposition, and to surprise. For where a man's intentions are published, it is an alarum to call up all that are against them. The second is, to reserve to a man's self a fair retreat. For if a man engage himself by a manifest declaration, he must go through or take a fall. The third is, the better to discover the mind of another. For to him that opens himself men will hardly show themselves adverse; but will (fair) let him go on, and turn their freedom of speech to freedom of thought. And therefore it is a good shrewd proverb of the Spaniard, "Tell a lie and find a truth." As if there were no way of discovery but by simulation. There be also three disadvantages, to set it even. The first, that simulation and dissimulation commonly carry with them a show of fearfulness, which in any business doth spoil the feathers of round flying up to the mark. The second, that it puzzleth and perplexeth the conceits[1] of many, that perhaps would otherwise co-operate with him; and makes a man walk almost alone to his own ends. The third and greatest, is, that it depriveth a man of one of the most principal instruments for action; which is trust and belief. The best composition and temperature is to have openness in fame[2] and opinion; secrecy in habit; dissimulation in seasonable use; and a power to feign, if there be no remedy.

OF MARRIAGE AND SINGLE LIFE

He that hath wife and children hath given hostages to fortune; for they are impediments to great enterprises, either of virtue or mischief. Certainly the best works, and of greatest merit for the public, have proceeded from the unmarried or childless men; which both in affection and means have married and endowed the public. Yet it were great reason that those that have children should have greatest care of future times; unto which they know they must transmit their dearest pledges. Some there are, who though they lead a single life, yet their thoughts do end with themselves, and account future times impertinences.[3] Nay, there are some other that account wife and children but as bills of charges. Nay more, there are some foolish rich covetous men, that take a pride in having no children, because they may be thought so much the richer. For perhaps they have heard some talk, "Such an one is a great rich man," and another except[4] to it, "Yea, but he hath a great charge of children"; as if it were an abatement[5] to his riches. But the most ordinary cause of a single life is liberty, especially in certain self-pleasing and humorous minds, which are so sensible of every restraint, as they will go near to think their girdles and garters[6] to be bonds and shackles.

Unmarried men are best friends, best masters, best servants; but not always best subjects; for they are light to run away; and almost all fugitives are of that condition. A single life doth well with churchmen; for charity will hardly water the ground where it must first fill a pool. It is indifferent for judges and magistrates; for if they be facile[7] and corrupt, you shall have a servant five times worse than a wife. For soldiers, I find the generals commonly in their hortatives[8] put men in mind of their wives and children; and I think the despising of marriage amongst the Turks maketh the vulgar soldier more base. Certainly wife and children are a kind of discipline of humanity; and single men, though they may be many times more charitable, because their means are less exhaust, yet, on the other side, they are more cruel and hardhearted (good to make severe inquisitors), because their tenderness is not so oft called upon. Grave natures, led by custom, and therefore constant, are commonly loving husbands; as was said of Ulysses, vetulam suam praetulit immortalitati.[9] Chaste women are often proud and froward,[10] as presuming upon the merit of their chastity. It is one of the best bonds both of chastity and obedience in the wife, if she think her husband wise; which she will never do if she find him jealous. Wives are young men's mistresses; companions for middle age; and old men's nurses. So as a man may have a quarrel to marry when he will. But yet he was reputed one of the wise men,[1] that made answer to the question, when a man should marry?—"A young man not yet, an elder man not at all." It is often seen that bad husbands have very good wives; whether it be that it raiseth the price of their husband's kindness when it comes; or that the wives take a pride in their patience. But this never fails, if the bad husbands were of their own choosing, against their friends' consent; for then they will be sure to make good their own folly.

Of Love

The stage is more beholding to love, than the life of man. For as to the stage, love is ever matter of comedies, and now and then of tragedies; but in life it doth much mischief; sometimes like a siren, sometimes like a fury.[2] You may observe, that amongst all the great and worthy persons whereof the memory remaineth, either ancient or recent, there is not one that hath been transported to the mad degree of love: which shows that great spirits and great business do keep out this weak passion. You must except nevertheless Marcus Antonius, the half-partner of the empire of Rome, and Appius Claudius, the decemvir[3] and lawgiver; whereof the former was indeed a voluptuous man, and inordinate;[4] but the latter was an austere and wise man: and therefore it seems (though rarely) that love can find entrance not only into an open heart, but also into a heart well fortified, if watch be not well kept. It is a poor saying of Epicurus, Satis magnum alter alteri theatrum sumus;[5] as if man, made for the contemplation of heaven and all noble objects, should do nothing but kneel before a little idol, and make himself a subject, though not of the mouth (as beasts are), yet of the eye; which was given him for higher purposes.

It is a strange thing to note the excess of this passion, and how it braves the nature and value of things, by this: that the speaking in a perpetual hyperbole is comely[6] in nothing but in love. Neither is it merely in the phrase; for whereas it hath been well said that the arch-flatterer, with whom all the petty flatterers have intelligence,[7] is a man's self; certainly the lover is more. For there was never proud man thought so absurdly well of himself, as the lover doth of the person loved; and therefore it was well said, that "it is impossible to love and to be wise."[8] Neither doth this weakness appear to others only, and not to the party loved; but to the loved most of all, except the love be reciproque.[9] For it is a true rule, that love is ever rewarded either with the reciproque or with an inward and secret contempt. By how much the more men ought to beware of this passion, which loseth not only other things, but itself. As for the other losses, the poet's relation doth well figure them; that he that preferred Helena, quitted the gifts of Juno and Pallas.[10] For whosoever esteemeth too much of amorous affection quitteth both riches and wisdom.

This passion hath his floods in very times of weakness, which are great prosperity and great adversity, though this latter hath been less observed: both which times kindle love, and make it more fervent, and therefore show it to be the child of folly. They do best, who if they cannot but admit love, yet make it keep quarter,[1] and sever it wholly from their serious affairs, and actions of life; for if it check[2] once with business, it troubleth men's fortunes, and maketh men that they can no ways be true to their own ends. I know not how, but martial men are given to love: I think it is but as they are given to wine; for perils commonly ask to be paid in pleasures. There is in man's nature a secret inclination and motion towards love of others, which if it be not spent upon some one or a few, doth naturally spread itself towards many, and maketh men become humane and charitable; as it is seen sometime in friars. Nuptial love maketh mankind; friendly love perfecteth it; but wanton love corrupteth and embaseth[3] it.

OF TRAVEL

Travel, in the younger sort, is a part of education; in the elder, a part of experience. He that travelleth into a country before he hath some entrance into the language, goeth to school,[4] and not to travel. That young men travel under some tutor, or grave servant, I allow[5] well; so that he be such a one that hath the language, and hath been in the country before; whereby he may be able to tell them what things are worthy to be seen in the country where they go; what acquaintances they are to seek; what exercises or discipline, the place yieldeth. For else young men shall go hooded,[6] and look abroad little. It is a strange thing, that in sea voyages, where there is nothing to be seen but sky and sea, men should make diaries; but in land-travel, wherein so much is to be observed, for the most part they omit it; as if chance were fitter to be registered than observation. Let diaries, therefore, be brought in use.

The things to be seen and observed are: the courts of princes, specially when they give audience to ambassadors; the courts of justice, while they sit and hear causes; and so of consistories ecclesiastic;[7] the churches and monasteries, with the monuments which are therein extant; the walls and fortifications of cities and towns, and so the havens[8] and harbors; antiquities and ruins; libraries; colleges, disputations,[9] and lectures, where any are; shipping and navies; houses and gardens of state and pleasure, near great cities; armories; arsenals; magazines;[10] exchanges; bourses;[11] warehouses; exercises of horsemanship, fencing, training of soldiers, and the like; comedies, such whereunto the better sort of persons do resort; treasuries of jewels and robes; cabinets[12] and rarities; and, to conclude, whatsoever is memorable in the places where they go. After all which the tutors or servants ought to make diligent inquiry. As for triumphs, masks,[13] feasts, weddings, funerals, capital executions, and such shows, men need not to be put in mind of them; yet are they not to be neglected.

If you will have a young man to put his travel into a little room, and in short time to gather much, this you must do. First, as was said, he must have some entrance into the language before he goeth. Then he must have such a servant or tutor as knoweth the country, as was likewise said. Let him carry with him also some card[14] or book describing the country where he travelleth; which will be a good key to his inquiry. Let him keep also a diary. Let him not stay long in one city or town; more or less as the place deserveth, but not long; nay, when he stayeth in one city or town, let him change his lodging from one end and part of the town to another; which is a great adamant[1] of acquaintance. Let him sequester himself from the company of his countrymen, and diet in such places where there is good company of the nation where he travelleth. Let him upon his removes from one place to another, procure recommendation to some person of quality residing in the place whither he removeth; that he may use his favour in those things he desireth to see or know. Thus he may abridge[2] his travel with much profit.

As for the acquaintance which is to be sought in travel; that which is most of all profitable, is acquaintance with the secretaries and employed men of ambassadors: for so in travelling in one country, he shall suck the experience of many. Let him also see and visit eminent persons in all kinds, which are of great name abroad; that he may be able to tell how the life agreeth with the fame. For quarrels, they are with care and discretion to be avoided. They are commonly for mistresses, healths, place, and words. And let a man beware how he keepeth company with choleric[3] and quarrelsome persons; for they will engage him into their own quarrels. When a traveller returneth home, let him not leave the countries where he hath travelled altogether behind him; but maintain a correspondence by letters with those of his acquaintance which are of most worth. And let his travel appear rather in his discourse[4] than his apparel or gesture; and in his discourse let him be rather advised in his answers, than forward to tell stories; and let it appear that he doth not change his country manners for those of foreign parts; but only prick in some flowers of that he hath learned abroad into the customs of his own country.

Of Plantations[5]

Plantations are amongst ancient, primitive, and heroical works. When the world was young it begat more children; but now it is old it begets fewer: for I may justly account new plantations to be the children of former kingdoms. I like a plantation in a pure soil; that is, where people are not displanted to the end to plant in others. For else it is rather an extirpation[6] than a plantation. Planting of countries is like planting of woods; for you must make account to lease almost twenty years' profit, and expect your recompense in the end. For the principal thing that hath been the destruction of most plantations, hath been the base[7] and hasty drawing of profit in the first years. It is true, speedy profit is not to be neglected, as far as may stand with the good of the plantation, but no further.

It is a shameful and unblessed thing to take the scum of people, and wicked condemned men, to be the people with whom you plant; and not only so, but it spoileth the plantation; for they will ever live like rogues, and not fall to work, but be lazy, and do mischief, and spend victuals, and be quickly weary, and then certify over to their country[8] to the discredit of the plantation. The people wherewith you plant ought to be gardeners, ploughmen, laborers, smiths, carpenters, joiners, fishermen, fowlers, with some few apothecaries,[9] surgeons, cooks, and bakers.

In a country of plantation, first look about, what kind of victual the country yields of itself to hand; as chestnuts, walnuts, pine-apples,[10] olives, dates, plums, cherries, wild honey, and the like; and make use of them. Then consider what victual or esculent[11] things there are, which grow speedily, and within the year; as parsnips, carrots, turnips, onions, radish, artichokes of Hierusalem, maize,[1] and the like. For wheat, barley, and oats, they ask too much labour; but with peas and beans you may begin, both because they ask less labour, and because they serve for meat as well as for bread. And of rice likewise cometh a great increase, and it is a kind of meat. Above all, there ought to be brought store of biscuit, oatmeal, flour, meal, and the like, in the beginning, till bread may be had. For beasts, or birds, take chiefly such as are least subject to diseases, and multiply fastest; as swine, goats, cocks, hens, turkeys, geese, housedoves, and the like. The victual in plantations ought to be expended almost as in a besieged town; that is, with certain allowance.[2] And let the main part of the ground employed to gardens or corn, be to a common stock; and to be laid in, and stored up, and then delivered out in proportion; besides some spots of ground that any particular person will manure for his own private.[3]

Consider likewise what commodities the soil where the plantation is doth naturally yield, that they may some way help to defray the charge of the plantation (so it be not, as was said, to the untimely prejudice of the main business), as it hath fared with tobacco in Virginia. Wood commonly aboundeth but too much; and therefore timber is fit to be one. If there be iron ore, and streams whereupon to set the mills, iron is a brave[4] commodity where wood aboundeth. Making of bay-salt,[5] if the climate be proper for it, would be put in experience. Growing silk likewise, if any be, is a likely commodity. Pitch and tar, where store of firs and pines are, will not fail. So drugs and sweet woods, where they are, cannot but yield great profit. Soap-ashes[6] likewise, and other things that may be thought of. But moil[7] not too much under ground; for the hope of mines is very uncertain, and useth to make the planters lazy in other things.

For government, let it be in the hands of one, assisted with some counsel; and let them have commission to exercise martial laws, with some limitation. And above all, let men make that profit of being in the wilderness, as they have God always, and His service, before their eyes. Let not the government of the plantation depend upon too many counsellors and undertakers in the country that planteth, but upon a temperate[8] number; and let those be rather noblemen and gentlemen, than merchants; for they look ever to the present gain. Let there be freedoms from custom,[9] till the plantation be of strength; and not only freedom from custom, but freedom to carry their commodities where they may make their best of them, except there be some special cause of caution.

Cram not in people, by sending too fast company after company; but rather hearken how they waste,[10] and send supplies proportionably; but so as the number may live well in the plantation, and not by surcharge be in penury.[11]

It hath been a great endangering to the health of some plantations, that they have built along the sea and rivers, in marish[12] and unwholesome grounds. Therefore, though you begin there, to avoid carriage and like discommodities,[13] yet build still rather upwards from the streams, than along. It concerneth likewise the health of the plantation that they have good store of salt with them, that they may use it in their victuals, when it shall be necessary.

If you plant where savages are, do not only entertain them with trifles and gingles;[14] but use them justly and graciously, with sufficient guard nevertheless; and do not win their favor by helping them to invade their enemies, but for their defence it is not amiss; and send oft of them over to the country that plants,[1] that they may see a better condition than their own, and commend it when they return. When the plantation grows to strength, then it is time to plant with women as well as with men; that the plantation may spread into generations, and not be ever pieced from without. It is the sinfullest thing in the world to forsake or destitute a plantation once in forwardness; for besides the dishonor, it is the guiltiness of blood of many commiserable[2] persons.

OF MASKS AND TRIUMPHS[3]

These things are but toys, to come amongst such serious observations. But yet, since princes will have such things, it is better they should be graced with elegancy than daubed[4] with cost.

Dancing to song is a thing of great state and pleasure. I understand it, that the song be in choir, placed aloft, and accompanied with some broken music,[5] and the ditty fitted to the device. Acting in song, especially in dialogues, hath an extreme good grace; I say acting, not dancing (for that is a mean[6] and vulgar thing); and the voices of the dialogue would be strong and manly (a bass and a tenor, no treble); and the ditty high and tragical, not nice or dainty. Several choirs placed one over against another and taking the voice by catches,[7] anthem-wise, give great pleasure. Turning dances into figure is a childish curiosity.[8] And generally let it be noted, that those things which I here set down are such as do naturally take the sense, and not respect petty wonderments. It is true, the alterations of scenes, so it be quietly and without noise, are things of great beauty and pleasure; for they feed and relieve the eye, before it be full of the same object.

Let the scenes abound with light, specially colored and varied; and let the maskers, or any other, that are to come down from the scene, have some motions upon the scene itself before their coming down; for it draws the eye strangely, and makes it with great pleasure to desire to see that it cannot perfectly discern. Let the songs be loud and cheerful, and not chirpings or pulings.[9] Let the music likewise be sharp and loud, and well placed. The colors that show best by candle-light are white, carnation, and a kind of sea-water-green; and oes, or spangs,[10] as they are of no great cost, so they are of most glory. As for rich embroidery, it is lost and not discerned. Let the suits of the maskers be graceful, and such as become the person when the vizards[11] are off; not after examples of known attires, Turks, soldiers, mariners, and the like.

Let anti-masks[12] not be long; they have been commonly of fools, satyrs, baboons, wild-men, antics, beasts, sprites, witches, Ethiops, pygmies, turquets, nymphs, rustics,[13] cupids, statues moving, and the like. As for angels, it is not comical enough to put them in anti-masks; and any thing that is hideous, as devils, giants, is on the other side as unfit. But chiefly, let the music of them be recreative, and with some strange changes. Some sweet odors suddenly coming forth, without any drops falling, are, in such a company as there is steam and heat, things of great pleasure and refreshment. Double masks, one of men, another of ladies, addeth state[1] and variety. But all is nothing except the room be kept clear and neat.

[1] send … plants I.e., often send some of them to the plantation's home country.

[2] commiserable Pitiable.

[3] MASKS I.e., masques: elaborate theatrical spectacles; TRIUMPHS Here, chivalric jousts and tournaments, often with theatrical elements. While Bacon affects to dismiss these court entertainments as "toys," the essay reveals his first-hand knowledge of them: Bacon wrote several masque-like "devices" in the 1590s, and organized two magnificently expensive entertainments in 1613–14.

[4] daubed Plastered over.

[8] figure Form; curiosity Interest.

[9] pulings Whinings.

[10] oes … spangs Spangles, or glittering ornaments. "Oes" is the plural of the letter "O," suggesting their round shapes.

[11] vizards Masks.

[12] anti-masks I.e., anti-masques: grotesquely comic scenes of chaos contrasting with the opulent order of the main masque.

[13] fools Jesters; satyrs Mythical woodland creatures with human torsos and legs of a goat; antics Grotesque figures often combining animal and vegetable elements; sprites Elf or pixie-like creatures; Ethiops Ethiopians, commonly used to denote any individual of African descent; pygmies Dwarfish figures; turquets Players dressed as little Turks; nymphs Woodland fairies usually represented as beautiful maidens; rustics Clownish countryfolk.

For jousts, and tourneys, and barriers:[2] the glories of them are chiefly in the chariots, wherein the challengers make their entry; especially if they be drawn with strange beasts, as lions, bears, camels, and the like; or in the devices[3] of their entrance; or in the bravery of their liveries; or in the goodly furniture of their horses and armor. But enough of these toys.

Of Studies
(1597 version, original spelling)

Studies serve for pastimes, for ornaments and for abilities. Their chiefe use for pastime is in privateness and retiring; for ornamente is in discourse, and for abilitie is in judgement. For expert men can execute, but learned men are fittest to judge or censure.

To spend too much time in them is slouth, to use them too much for ornament is affectation: to make judgement wholly by their rules, is the humour of a Scholler.

They perfect Nature, and are perfected by experience.

Craftie men contemn them, simple men admire them, wise men use them: For they teach not their owne use, but that is a wisedome without them: and above them wonne by observation.

Reade not to contradict, nor to believe, but to waigh and consider.

Some bookes are to bee tasted, others are to bee swallowed, and some few to bee chewed and disgested: That is, some bookes are to be read only in partes; others to be read, but cursorily, and some few to be read wholly and with diligence and attention.

Reading maketh a full man, conference a readye man, and writing an exacte man. And therefore if a man write little, he had neede have a great memorie, if he conferre little, he had neede have a present wit, and if he reade little, hee had neede have much cunning, to seeme to know that he doth not.

Histories make men wise, Poets wittie: the Mathematickes subtle, naturall Phylosophie deepe: Morall grave, Logicke and Rhetoricke able to contend.

(1625 version, modernized)

Studies serve for delight, for ornament, and for ability. Their chief use for delight, is in privateness and retiring;[4] for ornament, is in discourse;[5] and for ability, is in the judgment and disposition of business. For expert men can execute, and perhaps judge of particulars, one by one; but the general counsels, and the plots and marshalling of affairs, come best from those that are learned. To spend too much time in studies is sloth; to use them too much for ornament, is affectation; to make judgment wholly by their rules, is the humor of a scholar. They perfect nature, and are perfected by experience: for natural abilities are like natural plants, that need pruning by study; and studies themselves do give forth directions too much at large, except they be bounded in by experience. Crafty men contemn[6] studies, simple men admire them, and wise men use them; for they teach not their own use; but that is a wisdom without them, and above them, won by observation. Read not to contradict and confute; nor to believe and take for granted; nor to find talk and discourse; but to weigh and consider. Some books are to be tasted, others to be swallowed, and some few to be chewed and digested; that is, some books are to be read only in parts; others to be read but not curiously;[7] and some few to be read wholly, and with diligence and attention. Some books also may be read by deputy,[1] and extracts made of them by others; but that would be only in the less important arguments, and the meaner[2] sort of books; else distilled books are like common distilled waters, flashy[3] things. Reading maketh a full man; conference a ready man; and writing an exact man. And therefore, if a man write little, he had need have a great memory; if he confer little, he had need have a present wit: and if he read little, he had need have much cunning, to seem to know that he doth not. Histories make men wise; poets witty; the mathematics subtle; natural philosophy deep; moral grave; logic and rhetoric able to contend. Abeunt studia in mores.[4] Nay there is no stond or impediment in the wit, but may be wrought[5] out by fit studies; like as diseases of the body may have appropriate exercises. Bowling is good for the stone and reins;[6] shooting for the lungs and breast; gentle walking for the stomach; riding for the head; and the like. So if a man's wit be wandering, let him study the mathematics; for in demonstrations, if his wit be called away never so little, he must begin again. If his wit be not apt to distinguish or find differences, let him study the schoolmen;[7] for they are cymini sectores.[8] If he be not apt to beat over matters, and to call up one thing to prove and illustrate another, let him study the lawyers' cases. So every defect of the mind, may have a special receipt.[9]

ROBERT SOUTHWELL

1561 – 1595

Robert Southwell wrote in early modern England as a religious outlaw. Serving as a Jesuit priest of the Roman Catholic faith in Protestant England, Southwell composed poems, prose homilies, and treatises, as part of an illegal missionary project to further the interests of the underground Catholic community in England. Because the outward practice of Roman Catholicism was a crime in Elizabethan England, uncensored versions of Southwell's work were initially read in secret through manuscripts that circulated privately among Catholics. Somewhat surprising, however, is the fact that anonymous versions of his work, which had explicitly Catholic elements excised so as not to offend Protestant authorities, flourished in England. The popularity of Southwell's works is significant given that even these slightly censored, anonymous print editions contained coded expressions of Catholic experience in early modern England that were legible to those who knew what to look for. Even though the works did not identify Southwell as their author, there seems to have been a general understanding among readers as to their authorship.

Londini pro Cath. fide suspensus et sectus .3. mar. 1595.

The popularity of Southwell's works testifies to the significant impact he had on English literary history. His long poem St. Peter's Complaint (1595) is perhaps his most widely known and often imitated work. Allusions to this and other of Southwell's texts have been identified in William Shakespeare, George Herbert, Richard Crashaw, and many other English Renaissance writers. Imitations of his poetry, particularly his representations of repentance for sins, also appear throughout the seventeenth century.

Stylistically, Southwell helped introduce so-called "metaphysical poetry" into England—a mode of writing often associated with John Donne and George Herbert, in which paradox and outlandish metaphors are used to express, among other things, key aspects of Christian faith. He also played a significant role in the rise of religious verse at the end of the sixteenth and into the seventeenth century. The full extent and the precise nature of his influence on various poets and playwrights (most notably William Shakespeare) has only recently begun to be seriously explored.

Born at Horsham St. Faith's, Norfolk, in 1561, Southwell was the son of a well-to-do Protestant convert and a Catholic mother who was descended from the Copley and Shelley families. There is a distant relation between Southwell and P.B. Shelley, both of whom wrote poems about the alpine landscape, albeit, in very different ways and in very different contexts. Raised in his mother's faith, Southwell was sent to the Continent as a boy to be educated by leading Catholic scholars. His education began at the college in Douai, which was founded by Cardinal William Allen, a major Catholic apologist during Elizabeth's reign. At the age of 17. Southwell sought admission into the Society of Jesus but was initially rejected. Although Southwell took the rejection hard, he was admitted soon thereafter. Southwell's training as a Jesuit took him to Rome where he was ordained a priest in 1584, becoming director of the English College.

Southwell returned to England in July 1586 with his Jesuit superior, Henry Garnet, as part of the Catholic mission. Knowing that he would likely be captured and executed, Southwell worked secretly as a chaplain for powerful Catholic families, administering to the spiritual needs of those still committed to the "old faith." During this time, Southwell helped popularize St. Ignatius's Spiritual Exercises (c. 1522–24), a work setting out a rigorous program of spiritual meditation in which believers visualize themselves as participating in central biblical events. The highly visual nature of this Jesuit form of meditation informs the themes and structures of Southwell's poetry and prose, and also likely influenced work by subsequent writers of devotional literature.

Southwell's clandestine life as a Jesuit priest came to an end when he was arrested in 1592 by the priest-hunter, Richard Topcliffe. After long periods of torture and confinement, Southwell was executed in 1595 for treason, suffering the penalty then usual for the crime—hanging, disembowelment, and quartering. He was beatified by the Roman Catholic Church in 1927 and canonized in 1970.

The Nativity of Christ

Behold the father, is his daughter's son:
The bird that built the nest, is hatched therein:
The old of years, an hour hath not outrun:
Eternal life, to live doth now begin.
The word is dumb:° the mirth of heaven doth weep: silent
Might feeble is: and force doth faintly creep.

O dying souls, behold your living spring:
O dazzled eyes, behold your son of grace:
Dull ears, attend what word this word doth bring:
Up heavy hearts: with joy your joy embrace.
From death, from dark, from deafness, from despairs:
This life, this light, this word, this joy repairs.

Gift better than himself. God doth not know:
Gift better than his God, no man can see:
This gift doth here the giver given bestow:
Gift to this gift let each receiver be.
God is my gift, himself he freely gave me:
God's gift am I and none but God shall have me.

Man altered was by sin from man to beast:
Beast's food is hay, hay is all mortal flesh:
Now God is flesh and lies in Manger pressed:
As hay, the brutest° sinner to refresh most brutish
O happy field wherein this fodder grew,
Whose taste, doth us from beasts to men renew.

His Circumcision

The head is lanced to work the body's cure,
With angring[1] salve[2] it smarts to heal our wound,
To faultless son from all offences pure
The faulty vassals scourges do redound,
The Judge is cast the guilty to acquit,
The son defaced to lend the star his light,

The vein[3] of life distilleth drops of grace,
Our rock gives issue to an heavenly spring,
Tears from his eyes, blood runs from wounded place,
Which showers to heaven of joy a harvest bring,
This sacred dew let angels gather up,
Such dainty drops best fit their nectared cup.

With weeping eyes his mother rued° his smart, pitied
If blood from him, tears came from her as fast,
The knife that cut his flesh did pierce her heart,
The pain that Jesus felt did Mary taste,
His life and hers hung by one fatal twist,
No blow that hit the son the mother missed.
—1595

[1] angring Smarting, used in relation to inflamed or painful wounds.

[2] salve A healing ointment for wounds; a remedy, especially of spiritual sorrows.

[3] vein Likely with a pun on "vine."

Christ's Bloody Sweat

Fat soil, full spring, sweet olive, grape of bliss,
That yields, that streams, that pours,[1] that dost distil,
Untilled, undrawn, unstamped, untouched of press,
Dear fruit, clear brooks, fair oil, sweet wine at will:
Thus Christ unforced prevents in shedding blood
The whips, the thorns, the nails, the spear, and rood.

He Pelican's, he Phoenix fate doth prove,
Whom flames consume, whom streams enforce to die,
How burneth blood, how bleedeth burning love?
Can one in flame and stream both bathe and fry?
How could he join a Phoenix fiery pains
In fainting Pelican's still bleeding veins?

Elias once to prove god's sovereign power
By prayer procured a fire of wondrous force
That blood and wood and water did devour,
Yea stones and dust beyond all nature's course:
Such fire is love that fed with gory blood
Doth burn no less than in the driest wood.[2]

O sacred Fire come show thy force on me
That sacrifice to Christ I may return,
If withered wood for fuel fittest be,
If stones and dust, if flesh and blood will burn,
I withered am and stony to all good,
A sack of dust, a mass of flesh and blood.

Lewd Love Is Loss

Misdeeming° eye that stoopest to the lure Misjudging, Mistaking
 Of mortal worths not worth so worthy love:
All beauties base, all graces are impure:
 That do thy erring thoughts from God remove.
Sparks to the fire, the beams yield to the sun,
All grace to God from whom all graces run.

If picture move, more should the pattern please,
 No shadow can with shadowed things compare,
And fairest shapes whereon our loves do seize,
 But silly° signs of God's high beauties are. weak, frail
Go starving sense, feed thou on earthly mast,° animal feed
True love in Heav'n, seek thou thy sweet repast.

Glean not in barren soil these offal° ears,° worthless / corn
 Sith reap thou mayest whole harvests of delight.
Base joys with griefs, bad hopes do end in fears:
 Lewd love with loss, evil peace with deadly fight:
God's love alone doth end with endless ease,
Whose joys in hope, whose hope concludes in peace.

Let not the luring train[3] of Fancy's[4] trap,
 Or gracious features proofs of nature's skill,
Lull Reason's force asleep in Error's lap,
 Or draw thy wit to bent of wanton will;[5]
The fairest flowers have not the sweetest smell,
A seeming heaven proves oft a damning hell.

Self-pleasing souls that play with beauty's bait,
 In shining shroud may swallow fatal hook,
Where eager sight, or semblant° fair doth wait, appearance
 A lock it proves that first was but a look.
The fish with ease into the Net doth glide,
But to get out the way is not so wide.

So long the fly doth dally with the flame,
 Until his singed wings do force his fall:
So long the eye doth follow Fancy's game,

---

[1] pours With a pun on "powers."

[2] Elias once … wood See 1 Kings 18.21–39; "Elias" is the Latinized form of "Elijah."

[3] luring train Pieces of meat laid in a line or trail for luring wild beasts such as wolves or foxes into a trap.

[4] of Fancy's A personification of the mind's ability to construct and become enamored with delusional images.

[5] Or draw … will The mind is being described here through a comparison with an archery bow, where the faculty of thought (or wit) is the bowstring and the faculty of will is the bow that bends when the string is pulled taut.

Till love hath left the heart[1] in heavy thrall.
Soon may the mind be cast in Cupid's jail,
But hard it is imprisoned thoughts to bail.

O loath that love whose final aim is lust,
Moth of the mind, eclipse of reason's light:
The grave of grace, the mole of nature's rust,
The wrack of wit, the wrong of every right.
In sum an evil whose harms no tongue can tell,
In which to live is death, to die is hell.

A Vale of Tears

A Vale there is enwrapped with dreadful shades,
Which thick of mourning pines shrouds from the sun,
Where hanging cliffs yield short and dumpish° glades,[2] sad, dejected
And snowy floods with broken streams do run,

Where eye-roam is from rocks to cloudy sky,
From thence to dales with stony ruins strow'd,°[3] strewn
Then to the crushed waters frothy fry,
Which tumbleth from the tops where snow is thaw'd:

Where ears of other sound can have no choice,
But various blustering of the stubborn wind
In trees, in caves, in straits[4] with diverse noise,
Which now doth hiss, now howl, now roar by kind:

Where waters wrestle with encountering stones,
That break their streams, and turn them into foam,
The hollow clouds full fraught with thundering groans,
With hideous thumps discharge their pregnant womb.

And in the horror of this fearful choir,
Consists the music of this doleful° place: sad, mournful
All pleasant birds their tunes from thence retire,
Where none but heavy° notes have any grace. profound, grave

Resort there is of none but pilgrim wights,° living creatures
That pass with trembling foot and panting heart,
With terror cast in cold and shivering frights
They judge the place to terror framed by art:

Yet nature's work it is of art untouched,
So strait indeed, so vast unto the eye,
With such disordered order strangely couched,
And so with pleasing horror low and high,

That who it views must needs remain aghast,
Much at the work, more at the maker's might,
And muse how Nature such a plot could cast,
Where nothing seemed wrong, yet nothing right:

A place for mated[5] minds, an only[6] bower,
Where every thing doth sooth[7] a dumpish mood.
Earth lies forlorn, the cloudy sky doth lower,[8]
The wind here weeps, here sighs, here cries aloud.

The struggling flood between the marble groans,
Then roaring beats upon the craggy sides,
A little off amidst the pebble stones,
With bubbling streams and purling noise it glides.

---

[1] heart With a pun on "hart" or deer.

[2] glades A clear, open space or passage in a wood or wild area.

[3] strow'd Print editions of the poem that were published in England and that underwent scrutiny by Protestant censors of the period are different from manuscript versions that circulated privately amongst Catholic readers. In editions of the poem that were printed in England and deemed acceptable by the Protestant censor, this line reads, "From thence to dales which stormy ruins shroud." The published editions of the poem thus soften, if not totally efface, Southwell's apparent allusion to the dissolution of the monasteries at the beginning of the English Reformation under Henry VIII, a highly traumatic event for English Catholics.

[4] straits Narrow places, such as passes or gorges between mountains. Also used figuratively for psychological or spiritual states of feeling confined or overwhelmed.

[5] mated Confounded, amazed; matched, fitted or fitting together.

[6] only Solitary, lonely; unique.

[7] sooth Confirm, verify; also, to restore to a more tranquil condition.

[8] lower With a pun on "lower/lour."

The pines thick set, high grown, and ever green,
Still clothe the place with shade and mourning veil.
Here gaping cliffs, there moss grown plain is seen,
Here hope doth spring, and there again doth quail.° fail, give way

Huge massy stones that hang by tickle[1] stay
Still threaten fall, and seem to hang in fear:
Some withered trees ashamed of their decay,
Beset with green, are forced gray coats to wear.

Here crystal springs crept out of secret vein,[2]
Straight find some envious hole that hides their grace.
Here seared tufts lament the want of rain,
There thunder wrack gives terror to the place.

All pangs and heavy passions here may find
A thousand motives[3] suitly to their griefs,[4]
To feed the sorrows of their troubled mind,
And chase away dame pleasure's vain reliefs.

To plaining thoughts this vale a rest may be,
To which from worldly joys they may retire,
Where sorrow springs from water, stone, and tree,
Where every thing with mourners doth conspire.

Set here my soul main streams of tears afloat,
Here all thy sinful foils° alone recount, disgraces, stigmas
Of solemn tunes make thou the dolefulest note,
That to thy ditties dolor may amount.

When Echo doth repeat thy plainful cries,
Think that the very stones thy sins bewray,° betray
And now accuse thee with their sad replies,
As heaven and earth shall in the latter day,

Let former faults be fuel of the fire,
For grief in Limbeck[5] of thy heart to still
Thy pensive thoughts, and dumps of thy desire,
And vapour tears up to thy eyes at will.

Let tears to tunes, and pains to plaints be pressed,
And let this be the burden[6] of thy song,
Come deep remorse, possess my sinful breast:
Delights adieu, I harboured you too long.

The Burning Babe

As I in hoary[7] Winter's night
Stood shivering in the snow,
Surprised I was with sudden heat,
Which made my heart to glow;

And lifting up a fearful eye,
To view what fire was near,
A pretty Babe all burning bright
Did in the air appear;

Who, scorched with excessive heat,
Such floods of tears did shed,
As though his floods should quench his flames,
Which with his tears were fed:

Alas, (quoth he) but newly born,
In fiery heats I fry,
Yet none approach to warm their hearts,
Or feel my fire, but I;

My faultless breast the furnace is,
The fuel wounding thorns:
Love is the fire, and sighs the smoke,
The ashes, shame and scorns;

---

[1] hang by tickle Precarious, insecure; in danger of falling.

[2] secret vein A channel from which water flows out of the earth.

[3] motives Denotes a movement of emotion.

[4] suitly to their griefs Signifies "appropriate to" or "in sympathy with."

[5] Limbeck Alembic, an apparatus used for the process of distillation.

[6] burden The refrain or chorus of a song; a set of words at the end of each verse.

[7] hoary Grayish-white, as in the white of frozen dew also known as hoar-frost; also associated with age and venerability.

The fuel Justice layeth on,
And Mercy blows the coals,
The metal in this furnace wrought,

For which, as now on fire I am
To work them to their good,
So will I melt into a bath,
To wash them in my blood.

And swiftly shrunk away,
And straight I called unto mind,
That it was Christmas day.

Mary Magdalen's Complaint at Christ's Death

Sith° my life from life is parted: since
Death come take thy portion.
Who survives, when life is murdered,
Lives by mere extortion.
All that live, and not in God:
Couch their life in death's abode.

Silly[1] stars must needs leave shining,
When the sun is shadowed.
Borrowed streams refrain their running,
When head springs are hindered.
One that lives by other's breath,
Dieth also by his death.

O true life, sith thou hast left me,
Mortal life is tedious.
Death it is to live without thee,
Death, of all most odious.
Turn again or take me to thee,
Let me die or live thou in me.

Where the truth once was, and is not,
Shadows are but vanity:
Showing want, that help they cannot:
Signs, not salves of misery.
Painted meat no hunger feeds,
Dying life each death exceeds.

With my love, my life was nestled
In the sum of happiness:
From my love, my life is wrested° taken by force
To a world of heaviness.
O, let love my life remove
Sith I live not where I love.

O my soul, what did unloose thee
From thy sweet captivity?
God, not I, did still possess thee:
His, not mine, thy liberty.
O, too happy thrall thou wert,° were
When thy prison, was his heart.

Spiteful spear,[2] that break'st° this prison, broke
Seat of all felicity,
Working thus, with double treason,
Love's and life's delivery:° surrender
Though my life thou drav'st° away, drove Maugre° thee my love shall stay. in spite of

CHRISTOPHER MARLOWE

1564 – 1593

Christopher Marlowe's small body of work—seven plays, as well as a number of poems written during six productive years—profoundly influenced the course of English Renaissance drama. His plays set precedents for English history plays, tragedy, and heroic drama, while his newly supple and powerful blank verse (unrhymed iambic pentameter) impressed Ben Jonson as Marlowe's "mighty line." Had his writing career not been cut so short by a lethal tavern brawl he might have rivaled Shakespeare as the finest dramatist of his age.

Marlowe was born in Canterbury on 26 February 1564, in the same year as Shakespeare. His father was a shoemaker and a bondsman but also an actor; his mother was the daughter of a clergyman—and both theater and theology would help shape him. Despite his father's fairly humble occupation, Marlowe was well educated, first at King's School, in Canterbury, and then at Cambridge University's Corpus Christi College. His education at Cambridge, which was paid for by a foundation set up by Matthew Parker, Archbishop of Canterbury, included history, philosophy, and the theology of the Protestant Reformation, one version of which, despite a large and sometimes surreptitiously active Catholic minority, was now the orthodoxy of the officially established Church of England. In 1584 he earned his B.A.

During the latter part of his time at Cambridge, Marlowe frequently disappeared for extended periods. It is likely, some historians believe, that Marlowe had been recruited as a spy by Queen Elizabeth's Privy Council, which had longstanding fears of subversive Catholic activity at home and abroad. He spent time in the French city of Rheims, a refuge for many English Catholic expatriates, and perhaps helped uncover a Catholic plot to assassinate Elizabeth. This theory is strengthened by the actions of the Council upon Marlowe's return to England. Marlowe applied for his M.A., a degree normally granted automatically upon application once a certain amount of time had elapsed since the granting of a B.A., but the university refused him on multiple grounds. Not only had Marlowe failed to pursue ordination after his theological studies (as was expected of theology students); he had also spent considerable time among Catholics in France, and was therefore suspected of Catholic sympathies. Marlowe asked the Privy Council to intercede on his behalf and it obliged by sending a letter to the Cambridge authorities indicating that Marlowe "had done Her Majesty good service, & deserved to be rewarded for his faithful dealing." Moreover, says the letter severely, "it was not Her Majesty's pleasure that anyone employed, as [Marlowe] had been, in matters touching the benefit of his country, should be defamed by those that are ignorant in th' affairs he went about." Marlowe was granted his M.A. in 1587.

In the same year, Marlowe left Cambridge and moved to London to pursue his career as a playwright. His London years were marked by violence. In 1589 he spent two weeks in Newgate Prison, charged with the murder of one William Bradley, although he was acquitted and released, and in 1592 court records indicate that he was implicated in a street fight in which another man was killed. Through these same years, however, Marlowe's career soared. He had the luxury of being hired by the Lord Admiral's Company, which meant that the finest of London's actors would perform his plays. His first major plays, including Tamburlaine the Great—a grandiloquently written and violence-filled play—were produced in 1587 and were wildly popular. Over the next six years Marlowe completed at least five more plays: The Jew of Malta (c. 1589), Edward II (c. 1592), The Massacre of Paris (printed c. 1593), Dido, Queen of Carthage (printed in 1594), and The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus (?1593). In recent decades Edward II has drawn critical notice for its ambivalent portrayal of homoerotic love in conflict with political and marital duty, while the darkly comic Jew of Malta, whose Christians are quite as wicked as the Jewish protagonist, is significant in understanding early modern English views of the Jew as "other." Faustus, however, remains the most widely read and performed of Marlowe's plays. Based on an old Czech and German legend, the play presents a scholar who sells his soul to the devil in exchange for knowledge and power. As always, this proves a bad bargain: Faustus fritters away his power on pointless magic tricks and must, eventually, disappear in anguish into Hell. Marlowe's sympathies are hard to identify: the play may be read as orthodox (the anti-Catholic humor would not displease audiences or ecclesiastical authorities in England) but it may also raise difficult questions about free will and an implacable God.

Marlowe is also known for his poetry, including translations from Lucan's Pharsalia and Ovid's Amores. His most famous English poems are the unfinished "Hero and Leander," a tragic love story lightened by witty rhymes, outrageous metaphors, and a view of erotic love at once skeptical and sympathetic, and "The Passionate Shepherd to His Love," a poem based in part on Virgil's homoerotic Second Eclogue (Marlowe's version was soon treated as entirely heterosexual but recent criticism has noted its ambiguity in this regard). Unfortunately, piecing together Marlowe's oeuvre is a complicated matter. We have, for example, two quite different versions of Doctor Faustus (1604 and 1616).

Marlowe's death on 30 May 1593 has been the subject of much controversy. According to the coroner's report, Marlowe and a number of his acquaintances were dining at Eleanor Bull's House, a tavern just outside London. A heated argument arose between Marlowe and a fellow diner, Ingram Frizer, over the bill. The report states that Marlowe attacked Frizer with a knife and injured him on the back of the head. Frizer wrested the knife from Marlowe's grasp and sank its blade two inches into Marlowe's skull, just above the right eye. Marlowe died instantly. Was there a conspiracy behind this? Marlowe had maintained connections from his spying days and at the time of his death was in the presence of men with connections to his former employer, Sir Francis Walsingham, who as Secretary of State was responsible for the government's intelligence operations. Marlowe had recently been arrested on charges of atheism (an imprecisely defined offence which could be laid against anyone expressing unorthodox theological opinions) and was due to go on trial in a few days. Some scholars have speculated that members of the government feared that Marlowe would identify other "atheists" in high positions or perhaps reveal espionage secrets should he appear in a court of law, and so had him assassinated.

Marlowe was buried in an unmarked grave on the grounds of St. Nicholas's Church, Deptford, on 1 June 1593. Not until July 2002, more than 400 years after he died, was he memorialized in the prestigious Poet's Corner of Westminster Abbey.

Hero and Leander

Christopher Marlowe's Hero and Leander is an epyllion, or little epic. Marlowe evokes the epic tradition in his very first lines, where he mentions the Hellespont, the narrow strait that divides Europe from Asia, Greece from Troy. But Marlowe soon reveals that his is not a story of imperialist conquest, but of sexual conquest. From the high style of classical epic, Marlowe rapidly brings his readers down to earth—into a very different kind of poetic world, characterized by fervent erotic desires (both heterosexual and homosexual), sex, rapid shifts of mood and tone, and characters that fluctuate between apparent sexual sophistication and comic naiveté. Even in its darkest moments, the poem undercuts its own seriousness with Marlowe's spirit of excess, humor, and irreverence.

The story of the tragic lovers Hero and Leander was very popular in the period; it was, according to one contemporary, "in every man's mouth." Musaeus, a poet of the fifth or early sixth century CE, had written a version of the Hero and Leander story in Greek that enjoyed widespread popularity in the Renaissance, first through a translation into Latin, and then through numerous adaptations in vernacular languages such as Italian, French, and Spanish. One reason for Musaeus's popularity was that most Renaissance writers and printers mistakenly believed that he was a much earlier poet of the same name, a semi-mythic student of Orpheus whom Virgil mentions in the underworld (Aeneid, Book VI). As "the most ancient poet," Musaeus seemed to demand a reverence that Marlowe's poem delights in flouting.

A very different sort of classical poet—the Roman poet Ovid (43 BCE—c. 17 CE)—was a major influence on Marlowe's peculiarly subversive tone and subject matter. Ovid told a version of the Hero and Leander story in his Heroïdes; but his collection of love poems, the Amores, may have exerted at least as strong an influence on Marlowe's Hero and Leander. While still in college at Cambridge, Marlowe had translated Ovid's Amores, which similarly treats erotic subject matter mischievously against a backdrop of the high seriousness of epic. "Love slacked my Muse," Ovid's narrator explains in Marlowe's translation, "and made my numbers soft." In his translation of the Roman poet, Marlowe used heroic couplets (rhyming pairs of lines in iambic pentameter)—the same meter that he would employ in Hero and Leander.

Until the late twentieth century Marlowe's poem was generally read as a fragment; it ends with his lovers' sexual consummation, rather than with their tragic deaths (as does the story in his sources). When George Chapman "finished" Marlowe's poem in 1598, he assumed that what Marlowe had written was very far from complete; he added to Marlowe's 818 lines an additional 1,558 lines, and brought the story to the tragic conclusion that readers had come to expect from the many other versions of the story. Whatever the pleasures of his version, Chapman's poem is less subversive and less Ovidian than Marlowe's over-the-top work. Did Marlowe in fact intend to extend the story so as to bring it to its expected conclusion? We will of course never know, but numerous scholars have suggested that the poem may best be read as a unified whole rather than under the presumption that it is a fragment. Read in this way, the poem ends with the sort of defiant disregard of convention that is characteristic of so much of Marlowe's work—and with a flamboyant emphasis on the lovers' erotic physicality.

Hero and Leander[1]

On Hellespont,[2] guilty of true-loves' blood,
In view and opposite, two cities stood,
Sea-borderers, disjoined by Neptune's[3] might;
The one Abydos,[4] the other Sestos[5] hight.° named
At Sestos Hero dwelt; Hero the fair,
Whom young Apollo[6] courted for her hair,
And offered as a dower° his burning throne, dowry
Where she should sit for men to gaze upon.
The outside of her garments were of lawn,[7]
The lining purple silk, with gilt stars drawn;
Her wide sleeves green, and bordered° with a grove, embroidered
Where Venus[8] in her naked glory strove
To please the careless and disdainful eyes
Of proud Adonis,[9] that before her lies;
Her kirtle° blue, whereon was many a stain, skirt
Made with the blood of wretched lovers slain.
Upon her head she ware° a myrtle wreath, wore
From whence her veil reached to the ground beneath.
Her veil was artificial flowers and leaves,
Whose workmanship both man and beast deceives;
Many would praise the sweet smell as she passed,
When 'twas the odor which her breath forth cast;
And there for honey, bees have sought in vain,
And, beat from thence, have lighted there again.
About her neck hung chains of pebble-stone,
Which, lightened° by her neck, like diamonds shone. lit up
She ware no gloves, for neither sun nor wind
Would burn or parch her hands, but to her mind[10]
Or° warm or cool them, for they took delight either
To play upon those hands, they were so white.
Buskins° of shells all silvered usèd she, boots
And branched with blushing coral to the knee,
Where sparrows perched, of hollow pearl and gold,
Such as the world would wonder to behold;
Those with sweet water oft her handmaid fills,
Which, as she went, would chirrup through the bills.
Some say, for her the fairest Cupid pined,
And looking in her face, was strooken° blind. struck
But this is true: so like was one the other,
As he imagined Hero was his mother;[11]
And oftentimes into her bosom flew,
About her naked neck his bare arms threw,
And laid his childish head upon her breast,
And with still° panting rocked, there took his rest. constant
So lovely fair was Hero, Venus's nun,[12]
As Nature wept, thinking she was undone,

[1] Hero and Leander The textual history of Hero and Leander is contested, but the central facts are relatively straightforward. The first extant reference to the poem is the listing of it in the Stationers' Register some four months after Marlowe's death; an entry on 28 September 1593 lists "a book entitled Hero and Leander, being an amorous poem devised by Christopher Marlowe" (with no indication of the work being anything other than a complete poem rather than an unfinished work). The poem appears to have circulated in manuscript over the course of the next five years.

Then, in 1598, two printed works appear. One contains the poem much as it appears below; the title page reads "Hero and Leander. By Christopher Marlowe. London, Printed by Adam Islip, for Edward Blunt. 1598." At the conclusion of what is printed in this edition appear the words Desunt nonnulla (Latin: "Some things are missing")—evidently a note by the printer. A second 1598 publication, from later in the year (after the poem's copyright had been reassigned), is described on the title page as "begun by Christopher Marlowe, and finished by George Chapman." Chapman's version divides the Marlowe text into two sections, and adds four more sections (written in a style described by Chapman as "more grave and high"); in this greatly lengthened version, the story ends in the same way it ends in the sources.

The present text, which has been edited for The Broadview Anthology of British Literature by Rachel Eisendrath, is based on that of the Blunt (or Blount, as it has more often been spelled) edition of 1598; the section breaks and other changes made in the George Chapman edition of the same year are not included. Spelling and punctuation have been modernized in accordance with the practice of this anthology.

[2] Hellespont Now called the Dardanelles, narrow strait in Turkey between the Aegean Sea and the Marmara sea. One bank lies in Europe, one in Asia.

[3] Neptune Roman god of the sea.

[4] Abydos Ancient city on the Asian bank.

[5] Sestos Ancient city on the European bank.

[6] Apollo Greek and Roman sun god.

[7] lawn Fine linen.

[8] Venus Roman goddess of love.

[9] Adonis Adonis was a beautiful youth who scorned Venus's love and died in a boar hunt. The story is told by Ovid in his Metamorphoses (1 CE) and by Shakespeare in his Venus and Adonis (1593).

[10] to her mind As she chose.

[11] Hero … mother Cupid's mother was Venus.

[12] Venus's nun Hero was a priestess of Venus.

Because she took more from her than she left
And of such wondrous beauty her bereft;
Therefore, in sign her treasure suffered wrack,° wreck
Since Hero's time hath half the world been black.
Amorous Leander, beautiful and young
(Whose tragedy divine Musaeus[1] sung)
Dwelt at Abydos; since him dwelt there none
For whom succeeding times make greater moan.
His dangling tresses that were never shorn,
Had they been cut and unto Colchos[2] borne,
Would have allured the vent'rous youth of Greece
To hazard more than for the Golden Fleece.
Fair Cynthia[3] wished his arms might be her sphere;° orbit
Grief makes her pale because she moves not there.
His body was as straight as Circe's wand;[4]
Jove[5] might have sipped out nectar from his hand.
Even as delicious meat is to the taste,
So was his neck in touching, and surpassed
The white of Pelops' shoulder.[6] I could tell ye
How smooth his breast was, and how white his belly,
And whose immortal fingers did imprint
That heavenly path with many a curious° dint, exquisite
That runs along his back, but my rude[7] pen
Can hardly blazon forth the loves of men,
Much less of powerful gods; let it suffice
That my slack° muse sings of Leander's eyes, weak
Those orient° cheeks and lips, exceeding his radiant
That leapt into the water for a kiss
Of his own shadow, and despising many,
Died ere he could enjoy the love of any.[8]
Had wild Hippolytus[9] Leander seen,
Enamored of his beauty had he been;
His presence made the rudest peasant melt,
That in the vast uplandish country dwelt;
The barbarous Thracian soldier, moved with naught,
Was moved with him, and for his favor sought.
Some swore he was a maid in man's attire,
For in his looks were all that men desire:
A pleasant smiling cheek, a speaking° eye, expressive
A brow for love to banquet royally;
And such as knew he was a man would say,
"Leander, thou art made for amorous play;
Why art thou not in love, and loved of all?
Though thou be fair, yet be not thine own thrall."
    The men of wealthy Sestos every year,
For his sake whom their goddess held so dear,
Rose-cheeked Adonis, kept a solemn feast.
Thither resorted many a wand'ring guest
To meet their loves; such as had none at all
Came lovers home from this great festival,
For every street, like to a firmament,
Glistered with breathing stars, who where they went Frighted the melancholy earth, which deemed Eternal heaven to burn, for so it seemed
As if another Phaëton[10] had got
The guidance of the sun's rich chariot.
But far above the loveliest Hero shined,
And stole away th' enchanted gazer's mind;
For like sea nymphs'[11] inveigling harmony,
So was her beauty to the standers by.
Nor that night-wand'ring pale and watery star[12]
(When yawning dragons draw her thirling car° whirling chariot
From Latmus's mount[13] up to the gloomy sky,
Where crowned with blazing light and majesty,
She proudly sits) more over-rules the flood

Than she the hearts of those that near her stood.
Even as when gaudy nymphs pursue the chase,° hunt
Wretched Ixion's shaggy-footed race,[1]
Incensed with savage heat, gallop amain
From steep pine-bearing mountains to the plain,
So ran the people forth to gaze upon her,
And all that viewed her were enamored on her.
And as in fury of a dreadful fight,
Their fellows being slain or put to flight,
Poor soldiers stand with fear of death dead-strooken,
So at her presence all surprised and tooken
Await the sentence of her scornful eyes;
He whom she favors lives, the other dies.
There might you see one sigh, another rage,
And some, their violent passions to assuage,
Compile sharp satires, but alas too late,
For faithful love will never turn to hate.
And many, seeing great princes were denied,
Pined as they went, and thinking on her, died.
On this feast day, oh cursèd day and hour!
Went Hero thorough° Sestos, from her tower through
To Venus's temple, where unhappily,
As after chanced, they did each other spy.
So fair a church as this had Venus none:
The walls were of discolored° jasper stone, multicolored
Wherein was Proteus[2] carved, and o'erhead
A lively° vine of green sea agate spread, lifelike
Where, by one hand, light-headed Bacchus[3] hung,
And with the other, wine from grapes out-wrung.
Of crystal shining fair the pavement was;
The town of Sestos called it Venus's glass;° mirror
There might you see the gods in sundry shapes,
Committing heady riots, incest, rapes:
For know that underneath this radiant floor
Was Danaë's statue in a brazen tower,
Jove slyly stealing from his sister's bed
To dally with Idalian Ganymede,
And for his love Europa bellowing loud,
And tumbling with the rainbow in a cloud;[4]
Blood-quaffing Mars heaving the iron net
Which limping Vulcan and his Cyclops set;[5]
Love kindling fire to burn such towns as Troy;[6]
Sylvanus weeping for the lovely boy[7]
That now is turned into a cypress tree,
Under whose shade the wood gods love to be.
And in the midst a silver altar stood;
There Hero sacrificing turtles'[8] blood,
Vailed° to the ground, veiling her eyelids close, bowed
And modestly they opened as she rose;
Thence flew love's arrow with the golden head,
And thus Leander was enamorèd.
Stone still he stood, and evermore he gazed,
Till with the fire that from his countenance blazed,
Relenting Hero's gentle heart was strook;
Such force and virtue° hath an amorous look. power
　It lies not in our power to love or hate,
For will in us is overruled by fate.
When two are stripped, long ere the course[9] begin
We wish that one should lose, the other win;
And one especially do we affect° prefer
Of two gold ingots,° like in each respect. blocks of gold
The reason no man knows; let it suffice,
What we behold is censured° by our eyes. judged
Where both deliberate, the love is slight;
Who ever loved, that loved not at first sight?
　He kneeled, but unto her devoutly prayed;
Chaste Hero to herself thus softly said,
"Were I the saint he worships, I would hear him,"
And as she spake those words, came somewhat near him.

[1] Ixion's ... race Centaurs, fathered by Ixion, who was condemned to be bound to a burning wheel for all eternity.

[2] Proteus Greek lesser sea god able to change his shape rapidly.

[3] Bacchus Roman god of wine.

[4] Danaë's ... cloud Chronicle of the amorous exploits of Jove. He impregnated Danaë as a shower of gold while she was locked in a tower, married his sister Juno, kidnapped the beautiful youth Ganymede on Mount Ida, seduced Europa while in the form of a bull, and had a tryst with Iris, goddess of the rainbow (although this last conquest is a Renaissance addition to the myth).

[5] Blood-quaffing ... set Vulcan, god of fire, used a net to catch his wife Venus in an affair with Mars, god of war. The Cyclopes were his assistants.

[6] Love ... Troy Paris's abduction of Helen of Troy caused the Trojan Wars.

He started up; she blushed as one ashamed,
Wherewith Leander much more was inflamed.
He touched her hand; in touching it she trembled:
Love deeply grounded hardly is dissembled.[1]
These lovers parlèd° by the touch of hands; spoke
True love is mute, and oft amazèd stands.
Thus, while dumb signs their yielding hearts entangled,
The air with sparks of living fire was spangled,
And Night, deep drenched in misty Acheron,[2]
Heaved up her head, and half the world upon
Breathed darkness forth (dark night is Cupid's day),
And now begins Leander to display
Love's holy fire, with words, with sighs and tears,
Which like sweet music entered Hero's ears,
And yet at every word she turned aside
And always cut him off as he replied.
At last, like to a bold sharp sophister,[3]
With cheerful hope thus he accosted her:
"Fair creature, let me speak without offense;
I would my rude words had the influence
To lead thy thoughts as thy fair looks do mine;
Then shouldst thou be his prisoner, who is thine.
Be not unkind and fair; misshapen stuff[4]
Are of behavior boisterous and rough.
O shun me not, but hear me ere you go;
God knows I cannot force° love, as you do. compel
My words shall be as spotless as my youth,
Full of simplicity and naked truth.
This sacrifice, whose sweet perfume descending
From Venus's altar to your footsteps bending,° turning
Doth testify that you exceed her far
To whom you offer and whose nun you are.
Why should you worship her? Her you surpass
As much as sparkling diamonds flaring° glass. gaudy
A diamond set in lead his worth retains;
A heavenly nymph, beloved of human swains,° shepherds
Receives no blemish but ofttimes more grace,
Which makes me hope, although I am but base,
Base in respect of[5] thee, divine and pure,
Dutiful service may thy love procure;
And I in duty will excel all other,
As thou in beauty dost exceed Love's mother.° Venus
Nor heaven, nor thou, were made to gaze upon;
As heaven preserves all things, so save thou one.
A stately builded ship, well-rigged and tall,
The ocean maketh more majestical;
Why vowest thou then to live in Sestos here,
Who on Love's seas more glorious wouldst appear?
Like untuned golden strings all women are,
Which, long time lie untouched, will harshly jar.[6]
Vessels of brass, oft handled, brightly shine;
What difference betwixt the richest mine
And basest mold,° but use? for both, not used, earth
Are of like worth. Then treasure is abused
When misers keep it; being put to loan,[7]
In time it will return us two for one.
Rich robes themselves and others do adorn;
Neither themselves nor others, if not worn.
Who builds a palace and rams up the gate
Shall see it ruinous and desolate.
Ah, simple Hero, learn thyself to cherish;
Lone women, like to empty houses, perish.
Less sins the poor rich man that starves himself
In heaping up a mass of drossy pelf,[8]
Than such as you: his golden earth remains,
Which after his decease some other gains,
But this fair gem, sweet in the loss alone,
When you fleet hence[9] can be bequeathed to none.
Or if it could, down from th' enameled° sky glossy
All heaven would come to claim this legacy,
And with intestine broils[10] the world destroy
And quite confound Nature's sweet harmony.
Well therefore by the gods decreed it is,
We human creatures should enjoy that bliss.
One is no number;[11] maids are nothing then
Without the sweet society of men.

By which alone, our reverend fathers say,
Women receive perfection every way.
This idol which you term Virginity
Is neither essence,° subject to the eye, a real thing
No, nor to any one exterior sense;
Nor hath it any place of residence,
Nor is 't of earth or mold° celestial, form
Or capable of any form at all.
Of that which hath no being, do not boast:
Things that are not at all are never lost.
Men foolishly do call it virtuous;
What virtue is it that is born with us?[3]
Much less can honor be ascribed thereto:
Honor is purchased by the deeds we do.
Believe me, Hero, honor is not won
Until some honorable deed be done.
Seek you for chastity, immortal fame,
And know that some have wronged Diana's name?[4]
Whose name is it, if she be false or not,
So she be fair, but some vile tongues will blot?
But you are fair, aye me! so wondrous fair,
So young, so gentle, and so debonair,° pleasant
As Greece will think, if thus you live alone,
Some one or other keeps you as his own.
Then, Hero, hate me not, nor from me fly
To follow swiftly-blasting infamy.
Perhaps thy sacred priesthood makes thee loath.
Tell me, to whom madest thou that heedless oath?"

"To Venus," answered she, and as she spake,
Forth from those two tralucent cisterns[5] brake
A stream of liquid pearl, which down her face
Made milk-white paths, whereon the gods might trace° follow
To Jove's high court. He thus replied: "The rites
In which Love's beauteous empress most delights
Are banquets, Doric music,[6] midnight revel,
Plays, masques, and all that stern age counteth evil.
Thee as a holy idiot doth she scorn,
For thou, in vowing chastity, hast sworn,
To rob her name and honor, and thereby
Commit'st a sin far worse than perjury,
Even sacrilege against her Deity,
Through regular and formal purity.
To expiate which sin, kiss and shake hands;
Such sacrifice as this Venus demands."
Thereat she smiled and did deny him so
As put° thereby, yet might he hope for mo.° put aside / more
Which makes him quickly reinforce his speech
And her in humble manner thus beseech:
"Though neither gods nor men may thee deserve,
Yet for her sake whom you have vowed to serve,
Abandon fruitless, cold Virginity,
The gentle queen of Love's sole enemy.
Then shall you most resemble Venus' nun,
When Venus's sweet rites are performed and done.
Flint-breasted Pallas[7] joys in single life,
But Pallas and your mistress are at strife.
Love, Hero, then, and be not tyrannous,
But heal the heart that thou hast wounded thus,
Nor stain thy youthful years with avarice;
Fair fools delight to be accounted nice.° coy
The richest corn° dies if it be not reaped; grain
Beauty alone is lost, too warily kept."
These arguments he used, and many more,
Wherewith she yielded, that was won before.[8]
Hero's looks yielded, but her words made war;
Women are won when they begin to jar.° argue
Thus, having swallowed Cupid's golden hook,

[1] Hymen Greek god of weddings.

[2] Base … allow We allow poorer metal to gain worth by being stamped as coins.

[3] What … us? Virtues can only be acquired. We are not born with them.

[4] Seek … name? Even Diana, the Roman goddess of chastity, could not prove her chastity when it was slandered.

[5] tralucent cisterns Translucent eyes.

[6] Doric music Militaristic music.

[7] Pallas Athena, Greek virgin goddess of wisdom and war, often depicted dressed in armor.

[8] that … before I.e., she was, privately, already convinced.

The more she strived, the deeper was she strook.
Yet, evilly feigning anger, strove she still
And would be thought to grant against her will.
So having paused a while, at last she said:
"Who taught thee rhetoric to deceive a maid?
Aye me, such words as these should I abhor,
And yet I like them for the orator."
With that, Leander stooped to have embraced her,
But from his spreading arms away she cast her,° herself
And thus bespake him: "Gentle youth, forbear
To touch the sacred garments which I wear.
Upon a rock, and underneath a hill,
Far from the town, where all is whist° and still, hushed
Save that the sea, playing on yellow sand,
Sends forth a rattling murmur to the land,
Whose sound allures the golden Morpheus[1]
In silence of the night to visit us,
My turret stands, and there, God knows, I play
With Venus' swans and sparrows[2] all the day.
A dwarfish beldame° bears me company, old woman
That hops about the chamber where I lie
And spends the night, that might be better spent,
In vain discourse and apish° merriment. foolish
Come thither." As she spake this, her tongue tripped,
For unawares "Come thither" from her slipped,
And suddenly her former color changed,
And here and there her eyes through anger ranged.
And like a planet, moving several° ways,[3] various
At one self° instant, she, poor soul, assays° same / tries
Loving, not to love at all, and every part
Strove to resist the motions of her heart;
And hands so pure, so innocent, nay, such
As might have made heaven stoop to have a touch,
Did she uphold to Venus, and again
Vowed spotless chastity, but all in vain.
Cupid beats down her prayers with his wings;
Her vows above the empty air he flings.
All deep enraged, his sinewy° bow he bent, tough
And shot a shaft that burning from him went,
Wherewith she, strooken, looked so dolefully,
As made Love sigh to see his tyranny.
And as she wept, her tears to pearl he turned,
And wound them on his arm, and for her mourned.
Then towards the palace of the Destinies,[4]
Laden with languishment and grief, he flies,
And to those stern nymphs humbly made request
Both might enjoy each other and be blessed.
But with a ghastly dreadful countenance,
Threatening a thousand deaths at every glance,
They answered Love, nor would vouchsafe so much
As one poor word, their hate to him was such.
Harken a while, and I will tell you why:
Heaven's wingèd herald, Jove-born Mercury,[5]
The selfsame day that he asleep had laid
Enchanted Argus,[6] spied a country maid
Whose careless hair, instead of pearl t' adorn it,
Glistered with dew, as one that seemed to scorn it,[7]
Her breath as fragrant as the morning rose,
Her mind pure, and her tongue untaught to glose.° flatter
Yet proud she was, for lofty pride that dwells
In towered courts is oft in shepherds' cells,
And too too well the fair vermilion° knew, bright red
And silver tincture of her cheeks, that drew
The love of every swain. On her, this god
Enamored was, and with his snaky rod[8]
Did charm her nimble feet and made her stay;
The while upon a hillock down he lay,
And sweetly on his pipe began to play,
And with smooth speech, her fancy to assay,
Till in his twining arms he locked her fast,
And then he wooed with kisses, and at last,
As shepherds do, her on the ground he laid,
And tumbling in the grass, he often strayed
Beyond the bounds of shame, in being bold
To eye those parts which no eye should behold,
And like an insolent commanding lover,

Boasting his parentage, would needs discover
The way to new Elysium;[1] but she,
Whose only dower was her chastity,
Having striv'n in vain, was now about to cry
And crave the help of shepherds that were nigh.
Herewith he stayed his fury° and began passion
To give her leave to rise. Away she ran;
After went Mercury, who used such cunning
As she, to hear his tale, left off her running.
Maids are not won by brutish force and might,
But speeches full of pleasure and delight.
And knowing Hermes courted her, was glad
That she such loveliness and beauty had
As could provoke his liking, yet was mute,
And neither would deny nor grant his suit.
Still vowed he love; she, wanting no excuse
To feed him with delays, as women use,
Or thirsting after immortality
(All women are ambitious naturally),
Imposed upon her lover such a task
As he ought not perform, nor yet she ask.
A draft of flowing nectar she requested,
Wherewith the king of gods and men is feasted.
He, ready to accomplish what she willed,
Stole some from Hebe[2] (Hebe Jove's cup filled)
And gave it to his simple rustic love,
Which being known (as what is hid from Jove?)
He inly° stormed and waxed more furious inwardly
Than for the fire filched by Prometheus,[3]
And thrusts him down from heaven. He, wand'ring here,
In mournful terms, with sad and heavy cheer,[4]
Complained to Cupid. Cupid, for his sake,
To be revenged on Jove did undertake;
And those on whom heaven, earth, and hell relies
(I mean the adamantine° Destinies) unyielding
He wounds with love and forced them equally
To dote upon deceitful Mercury.
They offered him the deadly fatal knife
That shears the slender threads of human life;[5]
At his fair feathered feet the engines° laid instruments
Which th' earth from ugly Chaos's den upweighed.[6]
These he regarded not, but did entreat
That Jove, usurper of his father's seat,
Might presently be banished into hell,
And agèd Saturn in Olympus dwell.
They granted what he craved, and once again
Saturn and Ops began their golden reign.[7]
Murder, rape, war, lust, and treachery
Were with Jove closed in Stygian empery.° underworld
But long this blessèd time continued not;
As soon as he his wishèd purpose got,
He, reckless of his promise, did despise
The love of th' everlasting Destinies.
They seeing it, both Love and him abhorred,
And Jupiter unto his place restored.
And but that Learning, in despite of Fate,
Will mount aloft and enter heaven gate,
And to the seat of Jove itself advance,
Hermes had slept in hell with Ignorance.
Yet as a punishment they added this,
That he and Poverty should always kiss.[8]
And to this day is every scholar poor;
Gross gold from them runs headlong to the boor.
Likewise the angry sisters, thus deluded,
To venge themselves on Hermes, have concluded
That Midas' brood[9] shall sit in Honor's chair,
To which the Muses' sons are only heir.
And fruitful wits, that inaspiring[10] are

[1] Elysium Section of the underworld in Greek mythology reserved for heroes. In the Renaissance this term could refer to Paradise.

[2] Hebe Greek goddess of youth, cupbearer for the gods.

[3] Prometheus Greek Titan who stole fire from the gods.

[4] terms Condition; cheer Expression.

[5] knife … life The Fate Atropos caused a human death by cutting the thread of life.

[6] engines … upweighed The Fates were also said to be in charge of the pillars that held up the world since it emerged from Chaos.

[7] Saturn … reign Along with his consort Ops, Saturn was ruler of the gods during the Golden Age before his son Jove overcame him. Marlowe apparently invented this story of Saturn and Ops's temporary return to power.

[8] Learning … kiss Myth invented by Marlowe. Mercury (referred to here by his Greek name Hermes) is identified as god of learning. Mercury sleeps "in hell with Ignorance," yet Learning is so great a power that it raises him up to heaven ("the seat of Jove") despite the wishes of the Fates. The Fates punish Mercury for his inconstancy, linking Learning with Poverty.

[9] Midas' brood I.e., the rich and the foolish.

[10] inaspiring I.e., those that do not aspire toward wealth or honor.

Shall discontent run into regions far;
And few great lords in virtuous deeds shall joy,
But be surprised with every garish toy,
And still enrich the lofty servile clown,° boor
Who, with encroaching guile, keeps learning down.
Then muse not[1] Cupid's suit no better sped,
Seeing in their loves the Fates were injurèd.
By this, sad Hero, with love unacquainted,
Viewing Leander's face, fell down and fainted.
He kissed her and breathed life into her lips,
Wherewith, as one displeased, away she trips.
Yet as she went, full often looked behind,
And many poor excuses did she find
To linger by the way, and once she stayed,
And would have turned again, but was afraid,
In offering parley to be counted light.[2]
So on she goes, and in her idle flight
Her painted fan of curlèd plumes let fall,
Thinking to train° Leander therewithal. lure
He, being a novice, knew not what she meant
But stayed, and after her a letter sent,
Which joyful Hero answered in such sort
As he had hope to scale the beauteous fort
Wherein the liberal Graces[3] locked their wealth,
And therefore to her tower he got by stealth.
Wide open stood the door; he need not climb,
And she herself before the pointed° time appointed
Had spread the board,[4] with roses strewed the room,
And oft looked out, and mused he did not come.
At last he came; O who can tell the greeting
These greedy lovers had at their first meeting?
He asked, she gave, and nothing was denied;
Both to each other quickly were affied.° betrothed
Look how their hands, so were their hearts united,
And what he did she willingly requited.
(Sweet are the kisses, the embracements sweet,
When like desires and affections meet,
For from the earth to heaven is Cupid raised,
Where fancy is in equal balance peised.)° weighed
Yet she this rashness suddenly repented
And turned aside and to herself lamented,
As if her name and honor had been wronged
By being possessed of him for whom she longed.
Ay, and she wished, albeit not from her heart,
That he would leave her turret and depart.
The mirthful god of amorous pleasure smiled
To see how he this captive nymph beguiled,
For hitherto he did but fan the fire
And kept it down that it might mount the higher.
Now waxed she jealous lest his love abated,
Fearing her own thoughts made her to be hated.
Therefore unto him hastily she goes
And, like light Salmacis,[5] her body throws
Upon his bosom where, with yielding eyes,
She offers up herself a sacrifice
To slake his anger; if he were displeased,
O what god would not therewith be appeased?
Like Aesop's cock,[6] this jewel he enjoyed,
And as a brother with his sister toyed,
Supposing nothing else was to be done,
Now he her favor and good will had won.
But know you not that creatures wanting sense° intelligence
By nature have a mutual appetence,° attraction
And wanting organs to advance a step,
Moved by love's force, unto each other leap?
Much more in subjects having intellect
Some hidden influence breeds like effect.
Albeit Leander, rude° in love and raw, unsophisticated
Long dallying with Hero, nothing saw
That might delight him more, yet he suspected
Some amorous rites or other were neglected.
Therefore unto his body hers he clung;
She, fearing on the rushes[7] to be flung,
Strived with redoubled strength; the more she strived,
The more a gentle, pleasing heat revived,
Which taught him all that elder lovers know.
And now the same 'gan° so to scorch and glow, began
As in plain terms, yet cunningly, he craved it.
Love always makes those eloquent that have it.

[1] muse not Do not wonder that.

[2] In offering ... light By conversing to be considered improper.

[3] Graces Three Greek goddesses of joy, charm, and beauty.

[4] spread the board Set the table.

[5] Salmacis Nymph who falls in love with Hermaphroditus. He rejects her, but she clings to him and prays that they will never be parted. The gods grant her wish by fusing their two bodies together.

[6] Aesop's cock In Aesop's "The Cock and the Jewel" a rooster finds a jewel but sees no value in it, preferring barleycorns.

[7] rushes Floors in Renaissance houses and castles were often strewn with reeds.

She, with a kind of granting, put him by it,
And, ever as he thought himself most nigh it,
Like to the tree of Tantalus,[1] she fled,
And, seeming lavish, saved her maidenhead.
Ne'er king more sought to keep his diadem° crown
Than Hero this inestimable gem.
Above our life we love a steadfast friend,
Yet when a token of great worth we send,
We often kiss it, often look thereon,
And stay the messenger that would be gone.
No marvel then, though Hero would not yield
So soon to part from that she dearly held.
Jewels being lost are found again, this never;
'Tis lost but once, and once lost, lost forever.
Now had the Morn espied her lover's steeds,[2]
Whereat she starts, puts on her purple weeds,° clothes
And, red for anger that he stayed so long,
All headlong throws herself the clouds among.
And now Leander, fearing to be missed,
Embraced her suddenly, took leave, and kissed;
Long was he taking leave, and loath to go,
And kissed again, as lovers use to do.
Sad Hero wrung him by the hand and wept,
Saying, "Let your vows and promises be kept."
Then standing at the door, she turned about,
As loath to see Leander going out.
And now the sun that through th' horizon peeps,
As pitying these lovers, downward creeps,
So that in silence of the cloudy night,
Though it was morning, did he take his flight.
But what the secret trusty night concealed,
Leander's amorous habit° soon revealed. clothing
With Cupid's myrtle[3] was his bonnet° crowned; hat
About his arms the purple riband° wound ribbon
Wherewith she wreathed her largely spreading hair;
Nor could the youth abstain but he must wear
The sacred ring wherewith she was endowed
When first religious chastity she vowed;
Which made his love through Sestos to be known,
And thence unto Abydos sooner blown
Than he could sail, for incorporeal Fame,
Whose weight consists in nothing but her name,
Is swifter than the wind, whose tardy plumes
Are reeking water and dull earthly fumes.[4]
Home when he came, he seemed not to be there,
But like exilèd air thrust from his sphere,
Set in a foreign place, and straight from thence,
Alcides-like,[5] by mighty violence
He would have chased away the swelling main
That him from her unjustly did detain.
Like as the sun in a diameter[6]
Fires and inflames objects removèd far,
And heateth kindly, shining lat'rally,° at the horizon
So beauty sweetly quickens when 'tis nigh,
But being separated and removed,
Burns where it cherished, murders where it loved.[7]
Therefore, even as an index to a book,
So to his mind was young Leander's look.
O none but gods have power their love to hide:
Affection by the count'nance is descried.[8]
The light of hidden fire itself discovers,
And love that is concealed betrays poor lovers.
His secret flame apparently° was seen; clearly
Leander's father knew where he had been,
And for the same mildly rebuked his son,
Thinking to quench the sparkles new begun.
But love, resisted once, grows passionate,
And nothing more than counsel lovers hate.
For as a hot, proud horse highly disdains
To have his head controlled, but breaks the reins,
Spits forth the ringled° bit, and with his hooves ringed
Checks° the submissive ground; so he that loves, paws
The more he is restrained, the worse he fares.
What is it now but mad Leander dares?[9]
"O Hero, Hero!" thus he cried full oft,
And then he got him to a rock aloft,
Where, having spied her tower, long stared he on't

[1] Tantalus Tantalus was cursed to stand under a fruit tree. Whenever he tried to reach the fruit, the branch rose out of reach; whenever he tried to drink, the water lowered beneath him.

[2] lover's steeds Horses that pull the sun's chariot.

[3] myrtle Plant sacred to Venus and Cupid.

[4] Are … fumes I.e., are as fleeting as mist.

[5] Alcides-like Like Hercules, who committed feats of strength.

[6] in a diameter I.e., directly overhead.

[7] being separated … loved I.e., inaccessible love can be a destructive force.

[8] Affection … descried Love is visible on the face.

[9] but mad … dares? That Leander won't do?

And prayed the narrow toiling Hellespont
To part in twain, that he might come and go,
But still the rising billows answered "No!"
With that he stripped him to the ivory skin,
And crying, "Love, I come!" leapt lively in.
Whereat the sapphire-visaged god[1] grew proud,
And made his capering Triton[2] sound aloud;
Imagining that Ganymede,[3] displeased,
Had left the heavens, therefore on him he seized.
Leander strived; the waves about him wound
And pulled him to the bottom, where the ground
Was strewed with pearl, and in low coral groves
Sweet singing mermaids sported with their loves
On heaps of heavy gold and took great pleasure
To spurn in careless sort the shipwrack treasure,
For here the stately azure palace stood
Where kingly Neptune and his train abode.° dwelled
The lusty god embraced him, called him love,
And swore he never should return to Jove.
But when he knew it was not Ganymede,
For underwater he was almost dead,
He heaved him up, and looking on his face,
Beat down the bold waves with his triple mace,[4]
Which mounted up, intending to have kissed him,
And fell in drops like tears because they missed him.
Leander being up, began to swim,
And, looking back, saw Neptune follow him;
Whereat aghast, the poor soul 'gan to cry,
"O let me visit Hero ere I die!"
The god put Helle's bracelet[5] on his arm,
And swore the sea should never do him harm.
He clapped his plump cheeks, with his tresses played,
And, smiling wantonly, his love bewrayed.° exposed
He watched his arms, and as they opened wide,
At every stroke, betwixt them he would slide
And steal a kiss, and then run out and dance
And, as he turned, cast many a lustful glance
And threw him gaudy toys to please his eye,
And dive into the water and there pry
Upon his breast, his thighs, and every limb,
And up again and close beside him swim
And talk of love. Leander made reply,
"You are deceived; I am no woman, I."
Thereat smiled Neptune, and then told a tale,
How that a shepherd, sitting in a vale,
Played with a boy so fair and kind,
As for his love both earth and heaven pined;
That of the cooling river durst not drink,
Lest water nymphs should pull him from the brink.
And when he sported in the fragrant lawns,
Goat-footed satyrs and up-staring fauns[6]
Would steal him thence. Ere half this tale was done,
"Ay me!" Leander cried, "th' enamored sun
That now should shine on Thetis' glassy bower[7]
Descends upon my radiant Hero's tower.
O that these tardy arms of mine were wings!"
And as he spake, upon the waves he springs.
Neptune was angry that he gave no ear,
And in his heart revenging malice bare.
He flung at him his mace, but as it went
He called it in, for love made him repent.
The mace returning back, his own hand hit,
As meaning to be venged for darting it.
When this fresh bleeding wound Leander viewed,
His color went and came, as if he rued
The grief which Neptune felt. In gentle breasts
Relenting thoughts, remorse, and pity rests;
And who have hard hearts and obdurate minds
But vicious, harebrained, and illit'rate hinds?° boors
The god, seeing him with pity to be moved,
Thereon concluded that he was beloved.
(Love is too full of faith, too credulous,
With folly and false hope deluding us.)
Wherefore Leander's fancy to surprise,
To the rich ocean for gifts he flies.
'Tis wisdom to give much; a gift prevails
When deep persuading oratory fails.
By this[8] Leander, being near the land,
Cast down his weary feet and felt the sand.

[1] sapphire-visaged god Neptune, Roman god of the sea.

[2] Triton Son of Neptune, who blew on a conch shell to raise the waves.

[3] Ganymede Young man abducted by Jove and taken to the heavens to be the gods' cupbearer.

[4] triple mace Three-pointed trident.

[5] Helle's bracelet Fleeing a cruel stepmother on a flying ram, Helle fell into the Hellespont and, in most versions, drowned. She gave her name to the Hellespont. The bracelet appears to be Marlowe's invention.

[6] up-staring fauns Wood creatures who divined the future by looking up at the stars.

[7] Thetis' glassy bower Sea. Thetis was a sea nymph.

[8] By this By this time.

Breathless albeit he were, he rested not
Till to the solitary tower he got,
And knocked and called, at which celestial noise
The longing heart of Hero much more joys
Than nymphs and shepherds when the timbrel[1] rings,
Or crooked dolphin when the sailor sings.[2]
She stayed not for her robes, but straight arose
And, drunk with gladness, to the door she goes;
Where, seeing a naked man, she screeched for fear
(Such sights as this to tender maids are rare)
And ran into the dark herself to hide.
Rich jewels in the dark are soonest spied.
Unto her was he led, or rather drawn
By those white limbs, which sparkled through the lawn.
The nearer that he came, the more she fled,
And, seeking refuge, slipped into her bed.
Whereon Leander sitting, thus began,
Through numbing cold, all feeble, faint, and wan:
"If not for love, yet, love, for pity sake
Me in thy bed and maiden bosom take;
At least vouchsafe these arms some little room,
Who, hoping to embrace thee, cheerly° swum. gladly
This head was beat with many a churlish billow,[3]
And therefore let it rest upon thy pillow."
Herewith affrighted Hero shrunk away
And in her lukewarm place Leander lay,
Whose lively heat, like fire from heaven fet,° fetched
Would animate gross clay, and higher set
The drooping thoughts of base declining souls
Than dreary° Mars carousing nectar bowls. gory
His hands he cast upon her like a snare;
She, overcome with shame and sallow fear,
Like chaste Diana when Actaeon spied her,[4]
Being suddenly betrayed, dived down to hide her,
And as her silver body downward went,
With both her hands she made the bed a tent,
And in her own mind thought herself secure,
O'ercast with dim and darksome coverture.° covering
And now she lets him whisper in her ear,
Flatter, entreat, promise, protest, and swear;
Yet ever as he greedily assayed
To touch those dainties, she the Harpy[5] played,
And every limb did, as a soldier stout,
Defend the fort and keep the foeman out.
For though the rising ivory mount he scaled,
Which is with azure circling lines empaled,° surrounded
Much like a globe (a globe may I term this,
By which love sails to regions full of bliss),
Yet there with Sisyphus[6] he toiled in vain,
Till gentle parley did the truce obtain.
Wherein Leander on her quivering breast,
Breathless spoke something, and sighed out the rest;
Which so prevailed, as he with small ado
Enclosed her in his arms and kissed her, too.
And every kiss to her was as a charm,
And to Leander as a fresh alarm,[7]
So that the truce was broke, and she, alas,
Poor silly° maiden, at his mercy was. weak
Love is not full of pity, as men say,
But deaf and cruel where he means to prey.
Even as a bird which in our hands we wring
Forth plungeth and oft flutters with her wing,
She trembling strove; this strife of hers, like that
Which made the world,[8] another world begat
Of unknown joy. Treason was in her thought,
And cunningly to yield herself she sought.
Seeming not won, yet won she was at length.
(In such wars women use but half their strength.)
Leander now, like Theban Hercules,[9]
Entered the orchard of th' Hesperides,
Whose fruit none rightly can describe but he
That pulls or shakes it from the golden tree.[10]

And now she wished this night were never done,
And sighed to think upon th' approaching sun,
For much it grieved her that the bright daylight
Should know the pleasure of this blessèd night,
And them like Mars and Erycine[1] displayed,
Both in each other's arms chained as they laid.
Again she knew not how to frame her look
Or speak to him who in a moment took
That which so long, so charily° she kept; carefully
And fain by stealth away she would have crept
And to some corner secretly have gone,
Leaving Leander in the bed alone.
But as her naked feet were whipping out,
He on the sudden clinged her so about
That mermaid-like unto the floor she slid:
One half appeared, the other half was hid.
Thus near the bed she blushing stood upright;
And from her countenance behold ye might
A kind of twilight break, which through the hair,
As from an orient cloud, glims° here and there, glimmers
And round about the chamber this false morn
Brought forth the day before the day was born.
So Hero's ruddy cheek Hero betrayed,
And her all naked to his sight displayed,
Whence his admiring eyes more pleasure took
Than Dis[2] on heaps of gold fixing his look.
By this Apollo's golden harp began
To sound forth music to the Ocean,
Which watchful Hesperus[3] no sooner heard
But he the day's bright-bearing car prepared,
And ran before, as harbinger of light,
And with his flaring beams mocked ugly Night
Till she, o'ercome with anguish, shame, and rage,
Danged° down to hell her loathsome carriage. threw
Desunt nonnulla.[4]

The Passionate Shepherd to His Love

Come live with me and be my love,
And we will all the pleasures prove° experience
That valleys, groves, hills, and fields,
Woods, or steepy mountain yields.

And we will sit upon the rocks,
Seeing the shepherds feed their flocks,
By shallow rivers to whose falls
Melodious birds sing madrigals.[5]

And I will make thee beds of roses
And a thousand fragrant posies,
A cap of flowers, and a kirtle° skirt
Embroidered all with leaves of myrtle;

A gown made of the finest wool
Which from our pretty lambs we pull;
Fair linèd slippers for the cold,
With buckles of the purest gold;

A belt of straw and ivy buds,
With coral clasps and amber studs:
And if these pleasures may thee move,
Come live with me, and be my love.

The shepherd swains° shall dance and sing rustic lovers
For thy delight each May morning:
If these delights thy mind may move,
Then live with me and be my love.

of Marlowe's original manuscript were reversed.

[1] Erycine Another name for Venus, caught in bed with Mars by her husband Vulcan, who trapped the lovers in a bronze net.

[2] Dis Another name for Pluto, god of the underworld and wealth.

[3] Hesperus Evening star, the planet Venus.

[4] Desunt nonnulla Latin: Some things are missing. Inserted by the first printer. Marlowe does not include the tragic end of the story as related by other authors. It is possible that he died before finishing the poem.

[5] madrigals Part-songs for several voices, often with pastoral or amatory associations.

The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus

The Tragical History of Doctor Faustus is a work that employs belief from both the medieval and modern worlds. At its core is a story, of which there are various medieval versions, of a man selling his soul to the devil. Yet the play is plotted in a way that differs strikingly from the conventions of most medieval drama with, for example, a progression of scenes structured to suggest the passage of time in the real world. (Whereas in most medieval plays characters may exit at the end of one scene and reappear immediately at the beginning of the next in a different place or at a different time, Marlowe and Shakespeare broke new ground in the early 1590s, always providing for some passage of time in such circumstances.) The play posits sinister magical worlds that may seem far-fetched to the modern mind; in the late sixteenth century the lines that now divide what we term "science" from "superstition" had barely begun to be drawn and—again like Shakespeare—Marlowe mixes the comic and the tragic in ways that may jar on some modern sensibilities. Yet its treatment of the connections between the worlds of religion, magic, and science; of the connections between knowledge and power; and of the bitter fruits of excessive ambition resonate deeply with modern readers and modern audiences. So too does the material of the story itself, which has been recast by many authors in the intervening centuries—most notably by Goethe in the eighteenth century (Faust, 1790) and by Thomas Mann in the twentieth century (Dr. Faustus, 1947).

Not surprisingly, a somewhat uneasy relationship exists between Dr. Faustus and traditional Christian doctrine, Protestant or Catholic. However much the ambition of Faustus leads to damning sin, we are made to sense something attractive in his soaring visions. And in numerous other respects, too, the play puts forward religious notions from outside the mainstream (that hell may also be a state of mind, for example, and that there may be legitimate ties between the practices of magic and those of Christianity). Yet the play remains a memorable and provocative literary exploration of Christian doctrine. Do we have free will? What are the limits of God's forgiveness?

Marlowe's Dr. Faustus exists in two substantially different versions. There has been a great deal of scholarly discussion of the differences between the two, and debate over which is closest to what Marlowe himself wrote.

Marlowe probably completed the play in 1592 or early 1593 (he died on 30 May of that year). We know that between September of 1594 and October of 1597 the play was performed 25 times at the Rose Theatre by the Admiral's Men, with Edward Alleyn playing Faustus. The same company added the play to their repertory again when they opened the Fortune Theatre as their new house in late 1602. (Payment of £4 was made at this time on behalf of the Admiral's Men to two individuals "for there adicyones in doctor fostes.")

The first printed text that has come down to us is that of 1604 (commonly known as the "A" text). A much longer version was published in 1616; it included numerous new scenes (the majority of them comic) and a variety of other revisions throughout. Some of these revisions were evidently forced by the 1606 "Act to restrain Abuses of Players," which forbad actors "in any Stage play … jestingly or prophanely" from speaking or using "the holy Name of God or of Christ Jesus, or of the Holy Ghoste or of the Trinitie, which are not to be spoken but with feare and reverence." Thus Faustus's characterization of God as "unpleasant, harsh, contemptible, and vile" 1.1.110 is cut from the 1616 (or "B") text; similarly, his vision of Christ's blood and the frowns of an angry God (5.2.70–77) are radically altered. The reasons for and the source of the various other differences between the A and B texts remain in dispute among scholars. Michael Keefer, whose edition of the play appears in these pages, has argued persuasively not only that the "A" text is "shorter, harsher, more focused, and more disturbing" than the 1616 "B" text but also that it is much closer to the play as it was performed in the 1590s. The edition here has been adapted from Keefer's edition, which is based on the 1604 "A" text. For the text of all the 1616 revisions, together with a full scholarly discussion of the differences between the two versions, readers are invited to consult Keefer's full edition of the play, which appears as part of the Broadview Editions series.

PROLOGUE

(Enter Chorus.)

CHORUS. Not marching now in fields of Thracimene
Where Mars did mate[1] the Carthaginians,
Nor sporting in the dalliance of love
In courts of kings where state is overturn'd,
Nor in the pomp of proud audacious deeds
Intends our muse to vaunt° his heavenly verse. display proudly
Only this, gentlemen: we must perform
The form of Faustus' fortunes, good or bad.
To patient judgments we appeal our plaud,[2]
And speak for Faustus in his infancy:
Now is he born, his parents base of stock,
In Germany, within a town call'd Rhodes;[3]
Of riper years to Wittenberg[4] he went,
Whereas his kinsmen chiefly brought him up.
So soon he profits in divinity,
The fruitful plot of scholarism grac'd,
That shortly he was grac'd[5] with doctor's name,
Excelling all whose sweet delight disputes[6]

---

[1] Mars did mate Mars "allied himself with" or "rivaled." Hannibal's Carthaginian army inflicted a crushing defeat upon the Romans at the battle of Lake Trasummenus in 217 BCE.

[2] appeal our plaud Appeal for our applause.

[3] Rhodes Roda (now Stadtroda), near Weimar.

[4] Wittenberg The University of Wittenberg was famous under Martin Luther as a Protestant center of learning.

[5] grac'd At Cambridge it was and still is by the "grace" or decree of the university Senate that degrees are conferred; Marlowe's name appears in the Grace Book in 1584 and 1587 for the B.A. and M.A. degrees respectively.

[6] whose … disputes It is possible to construe "disputes" as a verb; more probably the expression is elliptical and means "whose sweet delight consists in disputes."

In heavenly matters of theology,
Till swoll'n with cunning[1] of a self-conceit,
His waxen wings[2] did mount above his reach
And melting heavens conspir'd his overthrow.
For falling to a devilish exercise,
And glutted now with learning's golden gifts,
He surfeits upon cursed necromancy;
Nothing so sweet as magic is to him,
Which he prefers before his chiefest bliss:
And this the man that in his study sits.

(Exit.)

ACT 1, SCENE 1[3]

(Faustus in his study.)

FAUSTUS. Settle thy studies, Faustus, and begin
To sound the depth of that thou wilt profess.[4]
Having commenc'd,[5] be a divine in show,
Yet level at the end of every art,[6]
And live and die in Aristotle's works:
Sweet Analytics,[7] 'tis thou hast ravish'd me—
Bene disserere est finis logices.[8]
Is to dispute well logic's chiefest end?
Affords this art no greater miracle?
Then read no more, thou hast attain'd the end.
A greater subject fitteth Faustus' wit:° understanding
Bid on kai me on[9] farewell; Galen[10] come,
Seeing ubi desinit philosophus, ibi incipit medicus.[11]
Be a physician Faustus, heap up gold,
And be eterniz'd for some wondrous cure!
Summum bonum medicinae sanitas:[12]
The end of physic° is our bodies' health. medicine
Why Faustus, hast thou not attain'd that end?
Is not thy common talk sound aphorisms?[13]
Are not thy bills hung up as monuments,
Whereby whole cities have escap'd the plague,
And thousand desperate maladies been eas'd?
Yet art thou still but Faustus, and a man.
Couldst thou make men to live eternally,
Or being dead, raise them to life again,
Then this profession were to be esteem'd.
Physic farewell; where is Justinian?
Si una eademque res legatur duobus,
alter rem, alter valorem rei,[14] etc.
A petty case of paltry legacies!
Exhereditare filium non potest pater, nisi—[15]
Such is the subject of the Institute[16]
And universal body of the law.
This study fits a mercenary drudge
Who aims at nothing but external trash—

[1] cunning Knowledge, erudition, cleverness; sometimes with negative connotations.

[2] waxen wings Allusion to the story of Icarus (cf. Ovid, Metamorphoses 8.183–235): escaping with his father Daedalus from Minos's island kingdom of Crete, Icarus ignored his father's warning about the wings he had made for them and flew too close to the sun.

[3] ACT 1, SCENE 1 Neither the 1604 nor the 1616 texts of the play contains any act or scene divisions; all such divisions in modern editions of the play are therefore editorial.

[4] profess Affirm faith in or allegiance to.

[5] commenc'd Taken a degree.

[6] level … art Take aim at the final purpose or limit of every discipline.

[7] Analytics Name of two treatises on logic by Aristotle, whose works still dominated the university curriculum.

[8] Bene … logices Latin: To argue well is the end or purpose of logic (a definition derived not from Aristotle but from Cicero).

[9] on kai me on Transliteration of Greek words meaning "being and not being," the subject of an ancient Greek philosophical treatise.

[10] Galen Claudius Galenus (c. 130–200 CE), most famous of ancient writers on medicine.

[11] ubi … medicus Latin: where the philosopher leaves off, there the physician begins. Freely translated from Aristotle, Sense and Sensibilia 436a.

[12] Summum … sanitas Latin: The supreme good of medicine is health. Translated from Aristotle, Nicomachean Ethics 1094a.

[13] sound aphorisms Reliable medical precepts.

[14] Si … rei Latin: If one and the same thing is bequeathed to two persons, one of them shall have the thing, the other the value of the thing. Derived in part from 2.20 of the Institutes, a compilation of Roman law carried out at the command of the emperor Justinian in the sixth century.

[15] Exhereditare … nisi— Latin: A father cannot disinherit his son except—. An incomplete formulation of a rule from Justinian's Institutes 2.12.

[16] Institute "Institute" here means "founding principle," and may refer also to Justinian's Institutes.

Too servile[1] and illiberal for me.
When all is done, divinity is best:
Jerome's Bible,[2] Faustus, view it well.
Stipendium peccati mors est.[3] Ha! Stipendium, etc.
The reward of sin is death? That's hard.
Si peccasse negamus, fallimur,
et nulla est in nobis veritas:[4]
If we say that we have no sin
We deceive ourselves, and there's no truth in us.
Why then belike we must sin,
And so consequently die.
Ay, we must die, an everlasting death.
What doctrine call you this? Che sarà, sarà,
What will be, shall be? Divinity, adieu!
These metaphysics[5] of magicians
And necromantic books are heavenly!
Lines,[6] circles,[7] seals, letters and characters:[8]
Ay, these are those that Faustus most desires,
O, what a world of profit and delight,
Of power, of honor, of omnipotence,
Is promis'd to the studious artisan![9]
All things that move between the quiet poles[10]
Shall be at my command. Emperors and kings
Are but obey'd in their several provinces,
Nor can they raise the wind, or rend the clouds;[11]
But his dominion that exceeds° in this excels
Stretcheth as far as doth the mind of man!
A sound magician is a mighty god:
Here tire, my brains, to get° a deity! beget

(Enter Wagner.)

Wagner, commend me to my dearest friends,
The German Valdes and Cornelius;
Request them earnestly to visit me.
WAGNER. I will, sir.

(Exit.)

FAUSTUS. Their conference will be a greater help to me
Than all my labors, plod I ne'er so fast.

(Enter the Good Angel and the Evil Angel.)

GOOD ANGEL. O Faustus, lay that damned book aside,
And gaze not on it, lest it tempt thy soul
And heap God's heavy wrath upon thy head!
Read, read the Scriptures; that is blasphemy.
EVIL ANGEL. Go forward, Faustus, in that famous art
Wherein all nature's treasury is contain'd:
Be thou on earth as Jove[12] is in the sky,
Lord and commander of these elements![13]

(Exeunt Angels.)

---

[1] Too servile To contrast the liberal arts with "servile" or "mechanical" studies and practices is an Elizabethan commonplace.

[2] Jerome's Bible Vulgate, prepared mainly by St. Jerome in the fourth century, was the Latin text of the Bible used by the Roman Catholic church.

[3] Stipendium … est This is the first of several quotations from the Latin Vulgate Bible. This quotation is the first half of Romans 6.23, a verse which in the Geneva Bible (1560) is translated as follows: "For the wages of sin is death: but the gift of God is eternal life through Jesus Christ our Lord."

[4] Si peccasse … veritas 1 John 1.8. Faustus has again quoted only the first half of an antithetical statement: he notices the condemnation of sinners by the law of God, but not the conditional promise of divine mercy which immediately follows in 1 John 1.9. In the Geneva Bible, 1 John 1.8–9 is rendered as follows: "If we say that we have no sin, we deceive our selves, and truth is not in us. If we acknowledge our sins, he is faithful and just, to forgive us our sins, and to cleanse us from all unrighteousness."

[5] metaphysics Science of the supernatural.

[6] Lines Reference to the occult art of geomancy, or divination by means of astrologically determined patterns of points and lines.

[7] circles Magic circles protected the practitioner of ceremonial magic from evil spirits.

[8] seals, letters and characters Talismanic symbols of the planets and of the angels, spiritual intelligences, and daemons that were believed to govern them.

[9] artisan Practitioner of an art.

[10] quiet poles This could refer either to the poles of the outermost celestial sphere or, more probably, to those of the earth.

[11] raise … clouds Blasphemous echo of Jeremiah 10.13 (which speaks of God's power over clouds, lightning and wind).

[12] Jove The substitution of the supreme god of the pagan Roman pantheon for the Christian God is common in Renaissance texts and in Elizabethan poetry.

[13] these elements Earth, water, air and fire, here used as a metonymy for the world contained by the sphere of the moon which these elements were thought to constitute.

FAUSTUS. How am I glutted with conceit[1] of this!
Shall I make spirits fetch me what I please,
Resolve me of all ambiguities,
Perform what desperate enterprise I will?
I'll have them fly to India for gold,
Ransack the ocean for orient pearl
And search all corners of the new found world
For pleasant fruits and princely delicates;
I'll have them read me strange philosophy
And tell the secrets of all foreign kings;
I'll have them wall all Germany with brass
And make swift Rhine[2] circle fair Wittenberg;
I'll have them fill the public schools with silk
Wherewith the students shall be bravely[3] clad;
I'll levy soldiers with the coin they bring,
And chase the Prince of Parma[4] from our land
And reign sole king of all our provinces;
Yea, stranger engines for the brunt° of war assault, onset
Than was the fiery keel at Antwerp's bridge[5]
I'll make my servile spirits to invent.
Come, German Valdes and Cornelius,
And make me blest with your sage conference!

(Enter Valdes and Cornelius.)

Valdes, sweet Valdes, and Cornelius,
Know that your words have won me at the last
To practise magic and concealed arts:
Yet not your words only, but mine own fantasy,
That will receive no object, for my head
But ruminates on necromantic skill.[6]
Philosophy is odious and obscure;
Both law and physic are for petty wits;
Divinity is basest of the three,
Unpleasant, harsh, contemptible and vile;
'Tis magic, magic, that hath ravish'd me.
Then, gentle friends, aid me in this attempt,
And I, that have with concise syllogisms[7]
Gravell'd° the pastors of the German church confounded
And made the flowering pride of Wittenberg
Swarm to my problems as the infernal spirits
On sweet Musaeus[8] when he came to hell,
Will be as cunning as Agrippa was,
Whose shadows[9] made all Europe honor him.

VALDES. Faustus, these books, thy wit, and our experience
Shall make all nations canonize us.
As Indian Moors[10] obey their Spanish lords,
So shall the subjects[11] of every element
Be always serviceable to us three:
Like lions shall they guard us when we please,
Like Almain rutters[12] with their horsemen's staves,° lances
Or Lapland giants trotting by our sides;
Sometimes like women, or unwedded maids,
Shadowing° more beauty in their airy brows harboring
Than has the white breasts of the queen of love.[13]
From Venice shall they drag huge Argosies,[14]

---

[1] conceit Thought, notion.

[2] Rhine River in Germany.

[3] bravely Splendidly. University regulations forbade students to wear fine clothing: their scholars' gowns were to be made of woolen cloth in somber colors, and silk-lined hoods could only be worn by the holders of doctoral degrees.

[4] Prince of Parma Alessandro Farnese, Duke of Parma, a grandson of the emperor Charles V and the foremost general of his time. Parma served as Spanish governor of the Netherlands from 1578 until his death in 1592; he was hated by Protestants as a tyrant. He commanded the force that the Spanish Armada was to have transported across the Channel in 1588 for the invasion of England.

[5] fiery ... bridge On 4 April 1585 the Netherlanders sent two fireships loaded with explosives against the pontoon bridge over the river Scheldt which formed part of Parma's siegeworks around Antwerp; one of them reached its target and destroyed part of the bridge, killing many Spanish soldiers. Parma had the bridge rebuilt, and Antwerp subsequently surrendered.

[6] Yet ... skill Faustus is saying that his imagination is so preoccupied with thoughts of magic that he can think of no other subjects.

[7] syllogisms Particular form of argument from logic.

[8] Musaeus Legendary pre-Homeric Greek poet, a pupil of Orpheus. In Virgil's Aeneid, Musaeus is represented as standing in the midst of a crowd of spirits in the underworld, head and shoulders above the rest.

[9] Agrippa ... shadows Henricus Cornelius Agrippa of Nettesheim (1486–1535), said to be "the greatest conjurer in Christendom." Agrippa distinguished between two kinds of necromancy: necyomantia, the reviving of corpses by means of a blood sacrifice, and scyomantia, in which only the shadow of a dead person is invoked.

[10] Indian Moors Native peoples of the Americas.

[11] subjects Spirits. "Subjects" carries the additional implication of subjection to a sovereign will (here, that of the magician).

[12] Almain rutters German soldiers.

[13] queen of love Venus, Roman goddess of love.

[14] Argosies Richly laden merchant ships.

And from America the golden fleece[1]
That yearly stuffs old Philip's treasury,[2]
If learned Faustus will be resolute.
FAUSTUS. Valdes, as resolute am I in this
As thou to live, therefore object it not.
CORNELIUS. The miracles that magic will perform
Will make thee vow to study nothing else.
He that is grounded in[3] astrology,
Enrich'd with tongues,[4] well seen in minerals,[5]
Hath all the principles magic doth require.
Then doubt not, Faustus, but to be renown'd
And more frequented° for this mystery sought out
Than heretofore the Delphian oracle.[6]
The spirits tell me they can dry the sea
And fetch the treasure of all foreign wrecks,
Ay, all the wealth that our forefathers hid Within the massy° entrails of the earth. heavy, massive
Then tell me Faustus, what shall we three want?
FAUSTUS. Nothing, Cornelius. O, this cheers my soul!
Come, show me some demonstrations magical,
That I may conjure in some lusty grove
And have these joys in full possession.
VALDES. Then haste thee to some solitary grove,
And bear wise Bacon's and Albanus' works,[7]
The Hebrew Psalter, and New Testament;
And whatsoever else is requisite
We will inform thee ere our conference cease.
CORNELIUS. Valdes, first let him know the words of art,
And then, all other ceremonies learn'd,
Faustus may try his cunning by himself.
VALDES. First I'll instruct thee in the rudiments,
And then wilt thou be perfecter than I.
FAUSTUS. Then come and dine with me, and after meat
We'll canvas every quiddity[8] thereof.
For ere I sleep I'll try what I can do;
This night I'll conjure though I die therefore.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 1, SCENE 2

(Enter two scholars.)

FIRST SCHOLAR. I wonder what's become of Faustus, that was wont to make our schools ring with sic probo.[9]

SECOND SCHOLAR. That shall we presently° know, for see: here comes his boy. at once

(Enter Wagner.)

FIRST SCHOLAR. How now sirrah,[10] where's thy master?

WAGNER. God in heaven knows.

SECOND SCHOLAR. Why, dost not thou know?

WAGNER. Yes, I know, but that follows not.

FIRST SCHOLAR. Go to sirrah, leave your jesting, and tell us where he is.

WAGNER. That follows not necessary by force of argument, which you, being licentiate,[11] should stand upon;[12] therefore acknowledge your error and be attentive.

SECOND SCHOLAR. Why, didst thou not say thou knew'st?

WAGNER. Have you any witness on't?

FIRST SCHOLAR. Yes, sirrah, I heard you.

WAGNER. Ask my fellow if I be a thief!

SECOND SCHOLAR. Well, you will not tell us.

---

[1] golden fleece In Greek mythology, Jason and his crew sailed in the Argo on a quest for the Golden Fleece.

[2] golden ... treasury Annual fleet that shipped gold and silver from the Americas to Spain.

[3] grounded in Firmly established in.

[4] Enrich'd with tongues Improved by knowledge of (ancient) languages.

[5] well ... minerals Well versed in the properties of minerals.

[6] Delphian oracle Oracle of Apollo at Delphi, the most famous and authoritative of ancient Greek oracles.

[7] wise Bacon's and Albanus' works Roger Bacon (c. 1214–94), an English Franciscan philosopher, was reputed also to have been a magician "Albanus" is an error for Pietro d'Abano or Petrus de Aponus (c. 1250–1316), a physician who was posthumously convicted of sorcery and burned in effigy by the Inquisition.

[8] canvas every quiddity Discuss every essential particular.

[9] sic probo Latin: thus I prove; the cry of triumph with which Faustus would have clinched his victories in disputation.

[10] sirrah Term of address that expresses the speaker's contempt, the addressee's social inferiority, or both.

[11] licentiate Licensed by an academic degree to proceed to further studies.

[12] stand upon Insist on.

WAGNER. Yes sir, I will tell you; yet if you were not dunces[1] you would never ask me such a question, for is not he corpus naturale, and is not that mobile?[2] Then wherefore should you ask me such a question? But that I am by nature phlegmatic, slow to wrath and prone to lechery (to love I would say), it were not for you to come within forty foot of the place of execution[3]—although I do not doubt but to see you both hanged the next sessions. Thus having triumphed over you, I will set my countenance like a precisian,[4] and begin to speak thus: Truly, my dear brethren, my master is within at dinner with Valdes and Cornelius, as this wine if it could speak would inform your worships; and so the Lord bless you, preserve you, and keep you,[5] my dear brethren, my dear brethren.

(Exit.)

FIRST SCHOLAR. Nay then, I fear he is fallen into that damned art, for which they two are infamous through the world.

SECOND SCHOLAR. Were he a stranger, and not allied to me, yet should I grieve for him. But come, let us go and inform the Rector, and see if he by his grave counsel can reclaim him.

FIRST SCHOLAR. O, but I fear me nothing can reclaim him.

SECOND SCHOLAR. Yet let us try what we can do.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 1, SCENE 3

(Enter Faustus to conjure.)

FAUSTUS. Now that the gloomy shadow of the earth,
Longing to view Orion's drizzling look,[6]
Leaps from th'antarctic world[7] unto the sky
And dims the welkin° with her pitchy breath, sky
Faustus, begin thine incantations,
And try if devils will obey thy hest,° command
Seeing thou hast pray'd and sacrific'd to them.
Within this circle is Jehovah's name,
Forward and backward anagrammatiz'd,[8]
The breviated° names of holy saints, abbreviated
Figures of every adjunct to[9] the heavens,
And characters of signs and erring stars[10]
By which the spirits are enforc'd to rise;
Then fear not, Faustus, but be resolute,
And try the uttermost magic can perform.
Sint mihi dei Acherontis propitii! Valeat numen triplex Iehovae! Ignei, aerii, aquatici spiritus salvete! Orientis princeps Belzebub, inferni ardentis monarcha, et Demogorgon, propitiamus vos ut appareat et surgat Mephastophilis. Quid tu moraris? Per Iehovam, Gehennam et consecratam aquam quam nunc spargo, signumque crucis quod nunc facio, et per vota nostra, ipse nunc surgat nobis dicatus Mephastophilis.[11]

---

[1] dunces Renaissance humanists opposed both the hair-splitting complexity of scholastic logic. As a result, the name of Johannes Duns Scotus (c. 1265–1308), one of the most subtle medieval logicians, came to connote sophistical quibbling and, by extension, stupidity.

[2] corpus naturale ... mobile Latin: a body that is natural or subject to change—an adaptation of Aristotle's statement of the subject-matter of physics.

[3] place of execution Scene of action; in this case, the dining-room.

[4] precisian Puritan, one who is precise and scrupulous about religious observances. Having parodied the logic of scholastic disputation, Wagner proceeds to parody the discourse of excessive piety.

[5] the Lord ... keep you Numbers 6.24. In quoting these words as an exit line, Wagner is mocking the language with which religious services were (and are) commonly brought to a close.

[6] Orion's drizzling look Constellation of Orion associated in classical poetry with winter storms.

[7] th'antarctic world If one believes the sun to revolve around the earth, and lives in the northern hemisphere, then the sun will be conceived of as shining on the southern hemisphere when it is night in the northern, and re-emerging from "th'antarctic world" at dawn.

[8] anagrammatiz'd Cabalist mystics believed that hidden meanings were present in every possible recombination of letters in the Hebrew scriptures, and practitioners of Cabalistic magic saw the names of God in particular as containing occult secrets of divine power and knowledge.

[9] adjunct to Heavenly body attached to.

[10] characters ... stars Diagrams representing the constellations of the zodiac (one Latin term for which was signa) and the planets.

[11] Sint ... Mephastophilis Latin: May the gods of Acheron be propitious to me. Away with the threefold divinity of Jehovah! Hail, spirits of fire, air, and water! Belzebub, Prince of the East, monarch of burning hell, and Demogorgon, we invoke your favor that Mephastophilis may appear and ascend. Why do you delay? By Jehovah, Gehenna, and the holy water which I now sprinkle, by the sign of the cross which I now make, and by our vows, may Mephastophilis himself now rise to serve us!;

(Enter a devil.)

I charge thee to return and change thy shape.
Thou art too ugly to attend on me;
Go, and return an old Franciscan friar:
That holy shape becomes a devil best.

(Exit devil.)

I see there's virtue[1] in my heavenly words,
Who would not be proficient in this art?
How pliant is this Mephastophilis,
Full of obedience and humility:
Such is the force of magic and my spells!
Now, Faustus, thou art conjurer laureate[2]
That canst command great Mephastophilis!
Quin redis, Mephastophilis, fratris imagine![3]

(Enter Mephastophilis.)

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Now, Faustus, what wouldst thou have me do?
FAUSTUS. I charge thee wait upon me whilst I live
To do whatever Faustus shall command,
Be it to make the moon drop from her sphere
Or the ocean to overwhelm the world.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. I am a servant to great Lucifer,[4]
And may not follow thee without his leave;
No more than he commands must we perform.
FAUSTUS. Did not he charge thee to appear to me?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. No, I came hither of my own accord.
FAUSTUS. Did not my conjuring speeches raise thee? Speak.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. That was the cause, but yet per accidens,[5]
For when we hear one rack° the name of God, torture
Abjure the Scriptures and his saviour Christ,
We fly, in hope to get his glorious[6] soul;
Nor will we come unless he use such means
Whereby he is in danger to be damn'd.
Therefore the shortest cut for conjuring
Is stoutly[7] to abjure the Trinity,[8]
And pray devoutly to the prince of hell.
FAUSTUS. So Faustus hath already done,
And holds this principle:
There is no chief but only Belzebub,
To whom Faustus doth dedicate himself.
This word "damnation" terrifies not him,
For he confounds hell in Elysium:[9]
His ghost be with the old philosophers!
But leaving these vain trifles of men's souls,
Tell me, what is that Lucifer thy lord?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Arch-regent and commander of all spirits.
FAUSTUS. Was not that Lucifer an angel once?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Yes Faustus, and most dearly lov'd of God.
FAUSTUS. How comes it then that he is prince of devils?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. O, by aspiring pride and insolence,
For which God threw him from the face of heaven.
FAUSTUS. And what are you that live with Lucifer?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Unhappy spirits that fell with Lucifer,
Conspir'd against our God with Lucifer,
And are for ever damn'd with Lucifer.
FAUSTUS. Where are you damn'd?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. In hell.
FAUSTUS. How comes it then that thou art out of hell?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Why this is hell, nor am I out of it:
Think'st thou that I who saw the face of God
And tasted the eternal joys of heaven

Mephastophilis Compound of three Greek words indicating negation (me), light (phos), and loving (philis); in its original form, the name thus means "not-light-loving"—perhaps parodying the Latin "Lucifer," or "light-bearer."

[1] virtue Power.

[2] laureate Crowned with laurel; of proved distinction.

[3] Quin … imagine Latin: Why do you not return, Mephastophilis, in the shape of a friar!

[4] Lucifer The name appears in Isaiah 14.12.

[5] per accidens Scholastics distinguished between an efficient cause, i.e., an agent which itself produced an effect, and a cause per accidens, which was related to the final effect only in having provided an occasion for the intervention of some external agent.

[6] glorious Splendid; possibly also boastful.

[7] stoutly Courageously, resolutely.

[8] Trinity In orthodox Christian belief, the three persons (God the Father, Son, and Holy Spirit) of the Godhead.

[9] confounds … Elysium Identifies Hell with Elysium; confuses the two; undoes Hell through belief in Elysium (in ancient Greece, the place in the afterworld reserved for heroes).

Am not tormented with ten thousand hells
In being depriv'd of everlasting bliss?
O Faustus, leave these frivolous demands,
Which strike a terror to my fainting soul.

FAUSTUS. What, is great Mephastophilis so passionate
For being deprived of the joys of heaven?
Learn thou of Faustus manly fortitude
And scorn those joys thou never shalt possess.
Go, bear these tidings to great Lucifer:
Seeing Faustus hath incurr'd eternal death
By desperate thoughts against Jove's deity,
Say he surrenders up to him his soul,
So[1] he will spare him four and twenty years,
Letting him live in all voluptuousness,
Having thee ever to attend on me
To give me whatsoever I shall ask,
To tell me whatsoever I demand,
To slay mine enemies and aid my friends,
And always be obedient to my will.
Go, and return to mighty Lucifer,
And meet me in my study at midnight,
And then resolve me of thy master's mind.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. I will, Faustus.

(Exit.)

FAUSTUS. Had I as many souls as there be stars
I'd give them all for Mephastophilis!
By him I'll be a great emperor of the world,
And make a bridge thorough[2] the moving air
To pass the ocean with a band of men;
I'll join the hills that bind the Afric shore,
And make that country continent to[3] Spain,
And both contributory to my crown;
The emperor shall not live but by my leave,
Nor any potentate of Germany.
Now that I have obtain'd what I desire,
I'll live in speculation of this art
Till Mephastophilis return again.

(Exit.)

ACT 1, SCENE 4

(Enter Wagner and the Clown.)[4]

WAGNER. Sirrah boy, come hither.

CLOWN. How, "boy"? Swowns[5] boy, I hope you have seen many boys with such pickadevaunts[6] as I have. "Boy," quotha?

WAGNER. Tell me sirrah, hast thou any comings in?[7]

CLOWN. Ay, and goings out[8] too, you may see else.

WAGNER. Alas, poor slave: see how poverty jesteth in his nakedness. The villain is bare, and out of service,[9] and so hungry that I know he would give his soul to the devil for a shoulder of mutton, though it were blood raw.

CLOWN. How, my soul to the devil for a shoulder of mutton though 'twere blood raw? Not so, good friend: b'urlady[10] I had need have it well roasted, and good sauce to it, if I pay so dear.

WAGNER. Well, wilt thou serve me, and I'll make thee go like Qui mihi discipulus?[11]

CLOWN. How, in verse?

WAGNER. No sirrah, in beaten silk[12] and stavesacre.[13]

CLOWN. How, how, knave's acre? Ay, I thought that was all the land his father left him. Do ye hear, I would be sorry to rob you of your living.

WAGNER. Sirrah, I say in stavesacre!

CLOWN. Oho, oho, stavesacre! Why then belike,[14] if I were your man I should be full of vermin.

---

[1] So On condition that.

[2] thorough I.e., through.

[3] continent to Continuous with.

[4] Clown Boorish rustic, a fool. This character is presumably to be identified with the Robin of 2.2 and 3.2.

[5] Swowns Contraction of "God's wounds" (a mild oath).

[6] pickadevaunts Short beards trimmed to a point; apparently from the French piqué devant, "peaked in front," possibly with an obscene double entendre.

[7] comings in Earnings.

[8] goings out Expenses; a punning reference to the fact that the Clown is bursting out of his tattered clothes.

[9] out of service Unemployed.

[10] b'urlady Contraction of "by Our Lady."

[11] Qui mihi discipulus Latin: You who are my pupil. The opening words of a didactic poem which appeared in the standard elementary Latin textbook used in Elizabethan schools.

[12] beaten silk Embroidered silk; with a punning suggestion that Wagner will thrash his servant.

[13] stavesacre Preparation against lice made from the seeds of a plant related to the delphinium.

[14] belike In all likelihood.

WAGNER. So thou shalt, whether thou beest with me or no. But sirrah, leave your jesting, and bind yourself presently unto me for seven years,[1] or I'll turn all the lice about thee into familiars,[2] and they shall tear thee to pieces.

CLOWN. Do you hear, sir? You may save that labor: they are too familiar with me already, swowns they are as bold with my flesh as if they had paid for my meat and drink.

WAGNER. Well, do you hear, sirrah? Hold, take these guilders.

CLOWN. Gridirons, what be they?

WAGNER. Why, French crowns.

CLOWN. Mass, but for the name of French crowns, a man were as good have as many English counters.[3] And what should I do with these?

WAGNER. Why now, sirrah, thou art at an hour's warning whensoever or wheresoever the devil shall fetch thee.

CLOWN. No, no; here, take your gridirons again.

WAGNER. Truly, I'll none of them.

CLOWN. Truly, but you shall.

WAGNER. Bear witness I gave them him!

CLOWN. Bear witness I give them you again!

WAGNER. Well, I will cause two devils presently to fetch thee away. Baliol,[4] and Belcher!

CLOWN. Let your Balio and Belcher come here, and I'll knock them, they were never so knocked since they were devils! Say I should kill one of them, what would folks say? "Do ye see yonder tall[5] fellow in the round slop,[6] he has killed the devil": so I should be called "kill-devil" all the parish over.

(Enter two devils, and the clown runs up and down crying.)

WAGNER. Balio and Belcher, spirits away!

(Exeunt.)

CLOWN. What, are they gone? A vengeance on them, they have vile long nails. There was a he-devil and a she-devil. I'll tell you how you shall know them: all he-devils has horns,[7] and all she-devils has clefts[8] and cloven feet.

WAGNER. Well sirrah, follow me.

CLOWN. But do you hear: If I should serve you, would you teach me to raise up Banios and Belcheos?

WAGNER. I will teach thee to turn thyself to anything: to a dog, or a cat, or a mouse, or a rat, or any thing.

CLOWN. How? A Christian fellow to a dog or a cat, a mouse or a rat? No, no, sir. If you turn me into anything, let it be in the likeness of little pretty frisking flea, that I may be here and there and everywhere: O, I'll tickle the pretty wenches' plackets,[9] I'll be amongst them i'faith!

WAGNER. Well sirrah, come.

CLOWN. But do you hear, Wagner?

WAGNER. How? Baliol and Belcher!

CLOWN. O Lord! I pray sir, let Banio and Belcher go sleep.

WAGNER. Villain, call me Master Wagner, and see that you walk attentively, and let your right eye be always diametrally fixed upon my left heel, that thou mayest quasi vestigiis nostris insitere.[10]

(Exit.)

---

[1] seven years Standard period of time for an apprenticeship or a contract of indentured labor.

[2] familiars Attendant spirits of witches and sorcerers, who took the form of animals.

[3] guilders … English counters Wagner professes to give the Clown Dutch guilders. Observing, it would seem, that the coins have holes punched in them, the Clown mis-hears the word as "gridirons"—whereupon Wagner re-identifies the coins as French crowns. A proclamation of 1587 authorized members of the public to strike holes in French crowns, which in the late 1580s and early 1590s were notoriously debased, and often counterfeit. From the sixteenth until the early nineteenth century, English merchants issued privately minted counters or tokens which circulated without having any officially accepted value; "counter" often denoted a debased or counterfeit coin; Mass An oath: "by the Mass."

[4] Baliol Deformation of "Belial," a name which occurs in the Bible (e.g., 2 Corinthians 6.15).

[5] tall Valiant, handsome.

[6] round slop Baggy breeches.

[7] horns Standard demonic equipment, perhaps with an overtone of cuckoldry.

[8] clefts Vulvas.

[9] plackets Pockets in women's skirts; metaphorically, a woman's genitals.

[10] quasi vestigiis nostris insitere Latin: as if walking in our footsteps.

Clown. God forgive me, he speaks Dutch fustian.[1]
Well, I'll follow him, I'll serve him, that's flat.

(Exit.)

Act 2, Scene 1

(Enter Faustus in his study.)

Faustus. Now Faustus, must thou needs be damn'd,
And canst thou not be saved.
What boots° it then to think of God or heaven? avails
Away with such vain fancies, and despair,
Despair in God, and trust in Belzebub.
Now go not backward: no Faustus, be resolute.
Why waverest thou? O, something soundeth in mine ears:
"Abjure this magic, turn to God again."
Ay, and Faustus will turn to God again.
To God? He loves thee not;
The god thou serv'st is thine own appetite,
Wherein is fix'd the love of Belzebub:
To him I'll build an altar and a church,
And offer lukewarm blood of new-born babes!

(Enter Good Angel, and Evil.)

Good Angel. Sweet Faustus, leave that execrable art.
Faustus. Contrition, prayer, repentance: what of these?
Good Angel. O, they are means to bring thee unto heaven.
Evil Angel. Rather illusions, fruits of lunacy,
That makes men foolish that do trust them most.
Good Angel. Sweet Faustus, think of heaven and heavenly things.
Evil Angel. No Faustus, think of honor and of wealth.

(Exeunt Angels.)

Faustus. Of wealth?
Why, the signory° of Emden[2] shall be mine! lordship, rule
When Mephastophilis shall stand by me
What God can hurt me?[3] Faustus, thou art safe;
Cast° no more doubts. Come, Mephastophilis, emit, ponder
And bring glad tidings[4] from great Lucifer!
Is't not midnight? Come Mephastophilis,
Veni, veni, Mephastophilis![5]

(Enter Mephastophilis.)

Now tell me, what says Lucifer thy lord?
Mephastophilis. That I shall wait on Faustus whilst he lives,
So he will buy my service with his soul.
Faustus. Already Faustus hath hazarded that for thee.
Mephastophilis. But now thou must bequeath it solemnly,
And write a deed of gift with thine own blood,
For that security craves great Lucifer.
If thou deny it I will back to hell.
Faustus. Stay Mephastophilis, and tell me,
What good will my soul do thy lord?
Mephastophilis. Enlarge his kingdom.
Faustus. Is that the reason why he tempts us thus?
Mephastophilis. Solamen miseris socios habuisse doloris.[6]
Faustus. Why, have you any pain that tortures others?
Mephastophilis. As great as have the human souls of men.
But tell me, Faustus, shall I have thy soul?
And I will be thy slave and wait on thee,
And give thee more than thou hast wit to ask.
Faustus. Ay Mephastophilis, I give it thee.
Mephastophilis. Then stab this arm courageously,
And bind thy soul, that at some certain day
Great Lucifer may claim it as his own:

---

[1] fustian Bombast, nonsense. Fustian was a coarse cloth made of cotton and flax; the word was metaphorically applied to inflated or inappropriately lofty language.

[2] Emden Prosperous port in northwest Germany which conducted an extensive trade with England.

[3] When … me? Blasphemous distortion of Romans 8.31: "If God be on our side, who can be against us?"

[4] glad tidings Cf. Luke 2.10: "I bring you glad tidings of great joy."

[5] Veni, veni, Mephastophilis! Latin: Come, O come, Mephastophilis!—a blasphemous echo of the twelfth-century Advent hymn Veni, veni, Emmanuel (Come, O Come Redeemer).

[6] Solamen … doloris Latin: It is a comfort to the wretched to have had companions in misfortune.

And then be thou as great as Lucifer!
FAUSTUS. Lo Mephastophilis, for love of thee
I cut mine arm, and with my proper° blood own
Assure my soul to be great Lucifer's,
Chief lord and regent of perpetual night.
View here the blood that trickles from mine arm,
And let it be propitious for my wish.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. But Faustus, thou must
Write it in manner of a deed[1] of gift.
FAUSTUS. Ay, so I will. But Mephastophilis,
My blood congeals, and I can write no more.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. I'll fetch thee fire to dissolve it straight.

(Exit.)

FAUSTUS. What might the staying of my blood portend?
Is it unwilling I should write this bill?° contract
Why streams it not, that I may write afresh?
"Faustus gives to thee his soul": ah, there it stay'd.
Why should'st thou not? Is not thy soul thine own?
Then write again: "Faustus gives to thee his soul."

(Enter Mephastophilis with a chafer[2] of coals.)

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Here's fire: come Faustus, set it on.
FAUSTUS. So: now the blood begins to clear again;
Now will I make an end immediately.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. (Aside.) O, what will not I do to obtain his soul!
FAUSTUS. Consummatum est:[3] this bill is ended,
And Faustus hath bequeath'd his soul to Lucifer.
But what is this inscription on mine arm?
Homo fuge![4] Whither should I fly?
If unto God he'll throw thee down to hell.
My senses are deceiv'd: here's nothing writ.
O yes, I see it plain! Even here is writ
Homo fuge; yet shall not Faustus fly.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. I'll fetch him somewhat to delight his mind.

(Exit. Enter with devils, giving crowns and rich apparel to Faustus, and dance, and then [the devils] depart.)

FAUSTUS. Speak Mephastophilis: what means this show?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Nothing, Faustus, but to delight thy mind,
And let thee see what magic can perform.
FAUSTUS. But may I raise such spirits when I please?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Ay Faustus, and do greater things than these.
FAUSTUS. Then there's enough for a thousand souls!
Here Mephastophilis, receive this scroll,
A deed of gift, of body and of soul:
But yet conditionally, that thou perform
All articles prescrib'd between us both.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Faustus, I swear by hell and Lucifer
To effect all promises between us made.
FAUSTUS. Then hear me read them.
On these conditions following:
First, that Faustus may be a spirit in form and substance;
Secondly, that Mephastophilis shall be his servant, and at his command;
Thirdly, that Mephastophilis shall do for him, and bring him whatsoever;
Fourthly, that he shall be in his chamber or house invisible;
Lastly, that he shall appear to the said John Faustus at all times, in what form or shape soever he please;
I, John Faustus of Wittenberg, Doctor, by these presents[5] do give both body and soul to Lucifer, Prince of the East, and his minister Mephastophilis, and furthermore grant unto him that four and twenty years being expired, and these articles above written being inviolate, full power to fetch or carry the said John Faustus, body and soul, flesh, blood, or goods, into their habitation wheresoever.
By me, John Faustus.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Speak Faustus, do you deliver this as your deed?
FAUSTUS. Ay, take it, and the devil give thee good on't.

---

[1] deed Legally binding document.

[2] chafer Saucepan or chafing-dish.

[3] Consummatum est Latin: It is finished. According to the Gospel of John, these were the last words of Jesus on the cross (John 19.30).

[4] Homo fuge Latin: Man, flee! The words occur in the Vulgate text of 1 Timothy 6.11, but this line as a whole alludes more distinctly to Psalm 139.7–8: "Whither shall I go from thy spirit? or whither shall I flee from thy presence? If I ascend into heaven, thou art there: if I lie down in hell, thou art there."

[5] these presents Legal articles being presented.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. So. Now, Faustus, ask me what thou wilt.
FAUSTUS. First will I question with thee about hell.
Tell me, where is the place that men call hell?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Under the heavens.
FAUSTUS. Ay, so are all things else; but whereabouts?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Within the bowels of these elements,
Where we are tortur'd and remain forever.
Hell hath no limits, nor is circumscrib'd
In one self° place, but where we are is hell, single, particular
And where hell is there must we ever be;
And to be short, when all the world dissolves
And every creature shall be purify'd,
All places shall be hell that is not heaven.
FAUSTUS. Come, I think hell's a fable.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Ay, think so still, till experience change thy mind.
FAUSTUS. Why, think'st thou then that Faustus shall be damn'd?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Ay, of necessity, for here's the scroll
Wherein thou hast given thy soul to Lucifer.
FAUSTUS. Ay, and body too, but what of that?
Think'st thou that Faustus is so fond° to imagine foolish
That after this life there is any pain?
Tush, these are trifles and mere old wives' tales.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. But I am an instance to prove the contrary,
For I tell thee I am damn'd, and now in hell.
FAUSTUS. Nay, and this be hell, I'll willingly be damn'd!
What, sleeping, eating, walking and disputing?
But leaving this, let me have a wife, the fairest maid in Germany, for I am wanton and lascivious, and cannot live without a wife.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. How, a wife? I prithee Faustus, talk not of a wife.

FAUSTUS. Nay, sweet Mephastophilis, fetch me one, for I will have one.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Well, thou wilt have one. Sit there till I come; I'll fetch thee a wife in the devil's name.

(Enter a devil dressed like a woman, with fireworks.)[1]

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Tell, Faustus: how dost thou like thy wife?

FAUSTUS. A plague on her for a hot whore!

(Exit devil.)

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Tut, Faustus, marriage is but a ceremonial toy.° trifle
If thou lov'st me, think no more of it.
I'll cull thee out the fairest courtesans
And bring them every morning to thy bed.
She whom thine eye shall like, thy heart shall have,
Be she as chaste as was Penelope,[2]
As wise as Saba,[3] or as beautiful
As was bright Lucifer before his fall.
Hold, take this book: peruse it thoroughly.
The iterating of these lines brings gold;
The framing of this circle on the ground
Brings whirlwinds, tempests, thunder and lightning.
Pronounce this thrice devoutly to thyself,
And men in armor shall appear to thee,
Ready to execute what thou desir'st.

FAUSTUS. Thanks, Mephastophilis; yet fain would I have a book wherein I might behold all spells and incantations, that I might raise up spirits when I please.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Here they are in this book.

(There turn to them.)

FAUSTUS. Now would I have a book where I might see all characters[4] and planets of the heavens, that I might know their motions and dispositions.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Here they are too.

(Turn to them.)

FAUSTUS. Nay, let me have one book more, and then I have done, wherein I might see all plants, herbs, and trees that grow upon the earth.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Here they be.

---

[1] fireworks In the comic sequences of sixteenth-century pageants and plays, fireworks were often attached to the costumes of devils and clowns in ways designed to make fun of sexual and excretory functions.

[2] Penelope Faithful wife of Odysseus, hero of the Trojan War and Homer's Odyssey.

[3] Saba Queen of Sheba, who in 1 Kings 10.1–13 comes to Jerusalem to test King Solomon's knowledge of God.

[4] characters Talismanic symbols of the planets and of the spiritual powers that govern them.

FAUSTUS. O, thou art deceived.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Tut, I warrant thee.[1]

(Turn to them. Exeunt.)

ACT 2, SCENE 2[2]

(Enter Robin the ostler with a book in his hand.)

ROBIN. O, this is admirable! Here I ha' stolen one of Doctor Faustus' conjuring books, and i'faith I mean to search some circles[3] for my own use: now will I make all the maidens in our parish dance at my pleasure stark naked before me, and so by that means I shall see more than I ever felt, or saw yet.

(Enter Rafe, calling Robin.)

RAFE. Robin, prithee come away! There's a gentleman tarries to have his horse, and he would have his things rubbed and made clean: he keeps such a chafing with my mistress about it, and she has sent me to look thee out; prithee come away!

ROBIN. Keep out, keep out, or else you are blown up, you are dismembered. Rafe! Keep out, for I am about a roaring[4] piece of work.

RAFE. Come, what dost thou with that same book? Thou canst not read.

ROBIN. Yes, my master and mistress shall find that I can read: he for his forehead,[5] she for her private study.[6] She's born to bear with[7] me, or else my art fails.

RAFE. Why Robin, what book is that?

ROBIN. What book? Why, the most intolerable book for conjuring that e'er was invented by any brimstone devil!

RAFE. Canst thou conjure with it?

ROBIN. I can do all these things easily with it: first, I can make thee drunk with hippocras[8] at any tavern in Europe for nothing; that's one of my conjuring works.

RAFE. Our master parson says that's nothing.

ROBIN. True, Rafe. And more, Rafe, if thou hast any mind to Nan Spit our kitchen maid, then turn her and wind her[9] to thine own use, as often as thou wilt, and at midnight.

RAFE. O brave Robin, shall I have Nan Spit, and to mine own use? On that condition I'll feed thy devil with horse-bread[10] as long as he lives, of free cost.

ROBIN. No more, sweet Rafe: let's go and make clean our boots which lie foul upon our hands; and then to our conjuring, in the devil's name!

(Exeunt.)

ACT 2, SCENE 3

(Enter Faustus in his study, and Mephastophilis.)

FAUSTUS. When I behold the heavens then I repent
And curse thee, wicked Mephastophilis,
Because thou hast depriv'd me of those joys.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Why Faustus,
Think'st thou heaven is such a glorious thing?
I tell thee 'tis not half so fair as thou
Or any man that breathes on earth.
FAUSTUS. How prov'st thou that?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. 'Twas made for man,
Therefore is man more excellent.
FAUSTUS. If it were made for man, 'twas made for me:
I will renounce this magic and repent.

---

[1] I warrant thee I assure you.

[2] ACT 2, SCENE 2 In both the 1604 and the 1616 texts of the play this scene, together with the scene numbered Act 3, Scene 2 in the present edition, appear in succession.

[3] circles Magic circles, and also women's vaginas.

[4] roaring Noisy, riotous.

[5] forehead Deceived husbands or cuckolds were said to wear horns on their foreheads.

[6] private study With a quibble on private parts.

[7] to bear with To put up with; also (another bawdy quibble) to lie under, to bear the weight of his body.

[8] hippocras Wine flavored with spices.

[9] Nan Spit … wind her One of the humblest occupations in the kitchen of a large household or inn was that of the turnspit, whose job was to stand by the open fireplace and crank the horizontally mounted spit on which roasting meat was impaled. Robin tempts Rafe with the thought of sexually impaling and "turning" this kitchen maid—of treating her, in effect, as she treats a roast of meat.

[10] horse-bread Bread made of beans, bran, etc. for horses—but apparently sometimes eaten also by the very poor. Rafe seems to be aware of the popular superstition according to which familiar spirits took the form of animals, and were fed like pets by the witches to whom they attached themselves.

(Enter Good Angel and Evil Angel.)

GOOD ANGEL. Faustus, repent yet, God will pity thee.
EVIL ANGEL. Thou art a spirit, God cannot pity thee.
FAUSTUS. Who buzzeth° in mine ears I am a spirit? whispers
Be I a devil, yet God may pity me.
Ay, God will pity me if I repent.
EVIL ANGEL. Ay, but Faustus never shall repent.

(Exeunt Angels.)

FAUSTUS. My heart's so harden'd I cannot repent.
Scarce can I name salvation, faith, or heaven,
But fearful echoes thunders in mine ears,
"Faustus, thou art damn'd!" Then swords and knives,
Poison, guns, halters,[1] and envenom'd steel
Are laid before me to dispatch myself,
And long ere this I should have done the deed
Had not sweet pleasure conquer'd deep despair.
Have I not made blind Homer sing to me
Of Alexander's love and Oenone's death?[2]
And hath not he that built the walls of Thebes
With ravishing sound of his melodious harp[3]
Made music with my Mephastophilis?
Why should I die, then, or basely despair?
I am resolv'd: Faustus shall ne'er repent.
Come Mephastophilis, let us dispute again,
And reason of divine astrology.[4]
Speak, are there many spheres above the moon?
Are celestial bodies but one globe,
As is the substance of this centric earth?[5]
MEPHASTOPHILIS. As are the elements, such are the heavens,
Even from the moon unto the empyreal orb,
Mutually folded on each other's spheres,
And jointly move upon one axle-tree
Whose termine is term'd the world's wide pole.
Nor are the names of Saturn, Mars, or Jupiter
Feign'd, but are erring stars.
FAUSTUS. But tell me, have they all one motion, both situ et tempore?[6]
MEPHASTOPHILIS. All jointly move from east to west in four and twenty hours upon the poles of the world, but differ in their motions upon the poles of the zodiac.
FAUSTUS. These slender questions Wagner can decide:
Hath Mephastophilis no greater skill?
Who knows not the double notion of the planets?[7]
The first is finish'd in a natural day,
The second thus: Saturn in thirty years,
Jupiter in twelve, Mars in four, the Sun, Venus, and Mercury in a year, the Moon in twenty-eight days.[8]

---

[1] halters Hangman's nooses.

[2] Alexander's … death These are matters which Homer left unsung; Faustus would have been the first to hear them from his lips. Paris (also named Alexandros), a son of King Priam and Queen Hecuba of Troy, was cast out by his parents (for it was prophesied that he should cause the destruction of Troy) and brought up among the shepherds of Mount Ida, where he won the love of Oenone. Asked by Hera, Athena, and Aphrodite to award a golden apple to the most beautiful goddess, he succumbed to Aphrodite's bribe of the love of the fairest woman alive, abandoned Oenone and abducted Helen from Sparta, thus provoking the Trojan War. Later, having been wounded by a poisoned arrow, he could have been healed only by Oenone; after jealously refusing to cure him, she was overwhelmed with remorse and threw herself onto his funeral pyre.

[3] he … harp Amphion and his brother built the walls of Thebes; the music of Amphion's lyre magically moved huge stones into place.

[4] astrology Not clearly distinguished from astronomy until the seventeenth century.

[5] the substance of this centric earth The elements (earth, water, air, and fire) that make up "the substance of this centric earth" were thought to be concentrically disposed; so also, in the old geocentric cosmology, were the spheres that governed the motions of those wandering or "erring" stars, the planets. Mephastophilis says there are nine spheres: those of the planets, including the moon and the sun; the firmament, to which the fixed stars are attached; and the empyrean, the outermost and motionless sphere of the universe. (He apparently conflates the primum mobile, thought of by some astronomers as a distinct sphere that imparts motion to the heavens, with the firmament.) All of this is utterly commonplace. The systems developed by ancient astronomers were enormously more complex: Eudoxus (fourth century BCE) required twenty-seven, and Ptolemy (second century CE) more than eighty variously revolving spheres, including epicyclic and eccentric ones, to explain the motions of the planets.

[6] situ et tempore Latin: in position and time; i.e., in the direction of their revolutions around the earth and in the time these take.

[7] poles … planets The apparent diurnal motion of the planetary spheres "upon one axle-tree" (the northern "termine" of which nearly coincides with the star Polaris) is of course due, in post-Copernican terms, to the earth's rotation upon its axis. The second component of the planets' apparent "double motion" is an effect of the differences between the earth's period of revolution around the sun and theirs.

[8] first … days The periods of planetary revolution given by Faustus correspond for the most part to the then-accepted figures: Saturn 28 years, Jupiter 12 years, Mars 2 years, Venus, Mercury, and, of course, the sun 1 year, and the moon 1 month. The actual—as opposed to apparent—periods for the inner planets are of course much less: 7$^1/_2$ and 3 months respectively.

Tush, these are freshmen's suppositions! But tell me, hath every sphere a dominion or intelligentia?[1]

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Ay.

FAUSTUS. How many planets or spheres are there?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Nine: the seven planets, the firmament, and the empyreal heaven.

FAUSTUS. But is there not coelum igneum, et crystallinum?[2]

MEPHASTOPHILIS. No, Faustus, they be but fables.

FAUSTUS. Resolve me then in this one question: Why are not conjunctions, oppositions, aspects,[3] eclipses all at one time, but in some years we have more, in some less?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Per inaequalem motum respectu totius.[4]

FAUSTUS. Well, I am answered. Now tell me who made the world.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. I will not.

FAUSTUS. Sweet Mephastophilis, tell me.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Move° me not, Faustus. anger

FAUSTUS. Villain, have I not bound thee to tell me any thing?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Ay, that is not against our kingdom.
This is. Thou are damn'd, think thou of hell.

FAUSTUS. Think, Faustus, upon God that made the world!

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Remember this.

(Exit.)

FAUSTUS. Ay, go accursed spirit to ugly hell:
'Tis thou hast damn'd distressed Faustus' soul.
Is't not too late?

(Enter Good Angel and Evil Angel.)

EVIL ANGEL. Too late.

GOOD ANGEL. Never too late, if Faustus can repent.

EVIL ANGEL. If thou repent, devils shall tear thee in pieces.

GOOD ANGEL. Repent, and they shall never raze° thy skin. graze

(Exeunt Angels.)

FAUSTUS. Ah Christ, my Saviour,
Seek to save distressed Faustus' soul!

(Enter Lucifer, Belzebub, and Mephastophilis.)

LUCIFER. Christ cannot save thy soul, for he is just;
There's none but I have interest in[5] the same.

FAUSTUS. O, what art thou that look'st so terribly?

LUCIFER. I am Lucifer, and this is my companion prince in hell.

FAUSTUS. O Faustus, they are come to fetch away thy soul!

LUCIFER. We come to tell thee thou dost injure us.
Thou talk'st of Christ, contrary to thy promise.

BELZEBUB. Thou should'st not think of God.

LUCIFER. Think of the devil.

BELZEBUB. And of his dam° too. woman

FAUSTUS. Nor will I henceforth:[6] pardon me in this,
And Faustus vows never to look to heaven,
Never to name God or to pray to him,
To burn his Scriptures, slay his ministers,
And make my spirits pull his churches down.

LUCIFER. So shalt thou show thyself an obedient servant, and we will highly gratify thee for it.

BELZEBUB. Faustus, we are come from hell to show thee some pastime. Sit down, and thou shalt behold the Seven Deadly Sins appear to thee in their own proper shapes and likeness.

FAUSTUS. That sight will be as pleasing unto me as Paradise was to Adam, the first day of his creation.

LUCIFER. Talk not of Paradise, or creation, but mark the show.
Go, Mephastophilis, fetch them in.

(Enter the Seven Deadly Sins.)

---

[1] dominion or intelligentia It was widely believed that the planets were moved or guided by angels or intelligences.

[2] coelum igneum, et crystallinum Latin: a fiery, and a crystalline heaven.

[3] conjunctions … aspects Astrological terms referring respectively to the apparent proximity of two planets, to their positioning on opposite sides of the sky, and to any other angular relation between their positions.

[4] Per inaequalem motum respectu totius Latin: Through an unequal motion with respect to the whole.

[5] interest in Legal claim upon.

[6] Nor … henceforth I.e., think of God.

BELZEBUB. Now Faustus, question them of their names and dispositions.

FAUSTUS. That shall I soon: what art thou, the first?

PRIDE. I am Pride. I disdain to have any parents. I am like Ovid's flea,[1] I can creep into every corner of a wench: sometimes like a periwig I sit upon her brow; next like a necklace I hang about her neck; then like a fan of feathers I kiss her lips; and then, turning myself to a wrought smock, do what I list. But fie, what a smell is here? I'll not speak a word more, unless the ground be perfumed and covered with a cloth of arras.[2]

FAUSTUS. Thou art a proud knave indeed. What art thou, the second?

COVETOUSNESS. I am Covetousness, begotten of an old churl in an old leathern bag; and might I have my wish, I would desire that this house and all the people in it were turned to gold, that I might lock you up in my good chest. O, my sweet gold!

FAUSTUS. What art thou, the third?

WRATH. I am Wrath. I had neither father nor mother; I leapt out of a lion's mouth when I was scarce half an hour old, and ever since I have run up and down the world with this case[3] of rapiers, wounding myself when I had nobody to fight withal. I was born in hell, and look to it: for some of you shall be my father.

FAUSTUS. What art thou, the fourth?

ENVY. I am Envy, begotten of a chimney-sweeper and an oyster wife.[4] I cannot read, and therefore wish all books were burned; I am lean with seeing others eat. O, that there would come a famine through all the world, that all might die, and I live alone: then thou should'st see how fat I would be. But must thou sit and I stand? Come down, with a vengeance![5]

FAUSTUS. Away, envious rascal! What art thou, the fifth?

GLUTTONY. Who I, sir? I am Gluttony. My parents are all dead, and the devil a penny they have left me, but a bare pension, and that buys me thirty meals a day and ten bevers:[6] a small trifle to suffice nature. O, I come of a royal parentage: my grandfather was a gammon of bacon,[7] my grand-mother a hogshead[8] of claret[9] wine. My god-fathers were these: Peter Pickleherring[10] and Martin Martlemas-beef.[11] O, but my godmother she was a jolly gentlewoman, and well-beloved in every good town and city: her name was Mistress Margery March-beer.[12] Now, Faustus, thou hast heard all my progeny, wilt thou bid me to supper?

FAUSTUS. No, I'll see thee hanged: thou wilt eat up all my victuals.

GLUTTONY. Then the devil choke thee.

FAUSTUS. Choke thyself, glutton! What art thou, the sixth?

SLOTH. I am Sloth. I was begotten on a sunny bank, where I have lain ever since, and you have done me great injury to bring me from thence. Let me be carried thither again by Gluttony and Lechery. I'll not speak another word for a king's ransom.

FAUSTUS. What are you, mistress minx,[13] the seventh and last?

LECHERY. Who I, sir? I am one that loves an inch of raw mutton[14] better than an ell[15] of fried stock-fish,[16] and the first letter of my name begins with Lechery.

LUCIFER. Away, to hell, to hell.

---

[1] Ovid's flea The poem being referenced, Elegia de pulice, was written in imitation of Ovid, and wrongly ascribed to him. In it is a line addressed to the flea: "You go wherever you wish; nothing, savage, is hidden from you."

[2] cloth of arras Tapestry fabric of the kind woven at Arras in Flanders; to use it as a floor covering would be grossly ostentatious.

[3] case Pair.

[4] begotten … wife I.e., filthy and foul-smelling woman.

with a vengeance With a curse on you.

[6] bevers Drinks; also light meals or snacks.

[7] gammon of bacon Bottom piece of a flitch of bacon.

[8] hogshead Wine-barrel of a standard size, holding (in modern terms) 225 liters or 63 American gallons—the equivalent of 25 cases of a dozen bottles of wine.

[9] claret Light red wine from the Bordeaux region.

[11] Martlemas-beef Martinmas, or St. Martin's Day (November 11), was the traditional time to slaughter cattle that could not be fed over the winter, and to commence the production of salt beef; it was therefore also a time for feasting on "green" or unsalted beef.

[12] March-beer Strong beer brewed in March.

[13] minx Hussy, wanton woman.

[14] raw mutton Metaphor for prostitutes; the expression here takes on a phallic meaning.

[15] ell Measure of length (equal in England to some forty-five inches), commonly contrasted to an inch.

[16] stock-fish Unsalted dried fish, sometimes abusively associated with the flaccid male organ.

(Exeunt the Sins.)

Now Faustus, how dost thou like this?
FAUSTUS. O, this feeds my soul.
LUCIFER. Tut, Faustus, in hell is all manner of delight.
FAUSTUS. O, might I see hell, and return again, how happy were I then!
LUCIFER. Thou shalt. I will send for thee at midnight. In mean time, take this book, peruse it thoroughly, and thou shalt turn thyself into what shape thou wilt.
FAUSTUS. Great thanks, mighty Lucifer:
This will I keep as chary° as my life. carefully
LUCIFER. Farewell, Faustus, and think on the devil.
FAUSTUS. Farewell, great Lucifer. Come, Mephastophilis.

(Exeunt all.)

ACT 3, CHORUS.

(Enter the Chorus [Wagner].)

WAGNER. Learned Faustus,
To know the secrets of astronomy
Graven in the book of Jove's high firmament,
Did mount him up to scale Olympus' top,[1]
Where sitting in a chariot burning bright,[2]
Drawn by the strength of yoked dragons' necks,
He views the clouds, the planets and the stars,
The tropics, zones, and quarters[3] of the sky,
From the bright circle of the horned moon
Even to the height of primum mobile;[4]
And whirling round with this circumference
Within the concave compass of the pole,
From east to west his dragons swiftly glide,
And in eight days did bring him home again.
Not long he stay'd within his quiet house
To rest his bones after his weary toil,
But new exploits do hale him out again,
And mounted then upon a dragon's back
That with his wings did part the subtle° air, rarified
He now is gone to prove cosmography,[5]
That measures coasts and kingdoms of the earth.
And as I guess, will first arrive at Rome
To see the Pope, and manner of his court,
And take some part of holy Peter's[6] feast,
The which this day is highly solemniz'd.

(Exit.)

ACT 3, SCENE 1

(Enter Faustus and Mephastophilis.)

FAUSTUS. Having now, my good Mephastophilis,
Pass'd with delight the stately town of Trier,[7]
Environ'd round with airy mountain tops,
With walls of flint, and deep entrenched lakes,
Not to be won by any conquering prince;
From Paris next, coasting the realm of France,
We saw the river Main fall into Rhine,
Whose banks are set with groves of fruitful vines;
Then up to Naples, rich Campania,[8]
Whose buildings, fair and gorgeous to the eye
(The streets are straightforth and pav'd with finest brick),
Quarters the town in four equivalents.
There saw we learned Maro's[9] golden tomb,

---

[1] to scale Olympus' top I.e., to ascend to the dwelling-place of the gods, on the top of Mount Olympus.

[2] chariot … bright Parodic echo of the vision of the divine chariot-throne in Ezekiel 1.13–28.

[3] tropics … quarters Tropics of Cancer and Capricorn, the arctic and antarctic circles and the equator divided the celestial sphere into five belts or zones; traditional astronomy also quartered the celestial sphere with two other circles that passed through its north and south poles: the solstitial colure, which intersects the two tropics at the solstitial points (those at which the ecliptic meets the tropics); and the equinoctial colure, which intersects the equator at the equinoctial points (those at which the ecliptic crosses the equator).

[4] From … mobile From the lowest to the highest of the spheres.

[5] to prove cosmography To put geography to the test. Cosmography was sometimes thought of as a science that maps the universe as a whole, thus incorporating geography and astronomy.

[6] holy Peter St. Peter.

[7] Trier City on the Moselle River, capital of an electoral state of the Holy Roman Empire, which under the rule of Elector-Archbishop Johann von Schönenburg was subjected during the 1580s and 1590s to a violent wave of witch-hunts.

[8] Campania In ancient usage, the plain surrounding the city of Capua; since medieval times, Naples has been the principal city of this region. (In modern Italy the name Campania is applied to a much larger area.)

[9] Maro Virgil, or Publius Vergilius Maro, died at Naples in 19 BCE. In part because his fourth Eclogue was interpreted as a prophecy of the coming of Christ, he acquired a reputation during the medieval period as a necromancer. His supposed (continued)

The way[1] he cut, an English mile in length,
Thorough a rock of stone in one night's space.
From thence to Venice, Padua, and the rest,
In midst of which a sumptuous temple stands,
That threats the stars[2] with her aspiring top.
Thus hitherto hath Faustus spent his time.
But tell me now, what resting place is this?
Hast thou, as erst° I did command, first
Conducted me within the walls of Rome?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Faustus, I have, and because we will not be unprovided,
I have taken up his Holiness' privy chamber[3] for our use.
FAUSTUS. I hope his Holiness will bid us welcome.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Tut, 'tis no matter, man, we'll be bold with his good cheer.
And now my Faustus, that thou may'st perceive
What Rome containeth to delight thee with,
Know that this city stands upon seven hills
That underprop the groundwork of the same;
Just through the midst runs flowing Tiber's stream,
With winding banks that cut it in two parts,
Over the which four stately bridges lean,
That make safe passage to each part of Rome.
Upon the bridge call'd Ponte Angelo
Erected is a castle passing strong,[4]
Within those walls such stores of ordnance are,
And double cannons,[5] fram'd of carved brass,
As match the days within one complete year—
Besides the gates and high pyramides[6]
Which Julius Caesar brought from Africa.
FAUSTUS. Now, by the kingdoms of infernal rule,
Of Styx, Acheron, and the fiery lake
Of ever-burning Phlegethon,[7] I swear
That I do long to see the monuments
And situation of bright splendent Rome.
Come therefore, let's away.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Nay Faustus, stay: I know you'd fain see the Pope,
And take some part of° holy Peter's feast, in
Where thou shalt see a troop of bald-pate friars
Whose summum bonum[8] is in belly-cheer.
FAUSTUS. Well, I am content to compass° contrive then some sport,
And by their folly make us merriment.
Then charm me, that I may be invisible,
To do what I please
Unseen of any whilst I stay in Rome.

(Mephastophilis charms him.)[9]

MEPHASTOPHILIS. So, Faustus: now
Do what thou wilt, thou shalt not be discern'd.

(Sound a sennet.[10] Enter the Pope and the Cardinal of Lorraine[11] to the banquet, with Friars attending.)

POPE. My lord of Lorraine, will't please you draw near?
FAUSTUS. Fall to, and the devil choke you and you spare.[12] tomb stands on the promontory of Posilipo on the Bay of Naples, at the Naples end of a tunnel, nearly half a mile in length, which cuts through the promontory—and which, as Petrarch wrote, "the insipid masses conclude was made by Virgil with magical incantations."

---

[1] way Road. The tunnel is in fact some seven yards wide.

[2] sumptuous … stars Saint Mark's in Venice. The "aspiring top" would have to be that of the campanile, which stands at some distance from the church.

[3] privy chamber Bedchamber.

[4] castle … strong Papal fortress of Castel San Angelo.

[5] double cannons Cannons of very large caliber.

[6] pyramides Obelisk, in this case the one brought to Rome from Egypt by the emperor Caligula (not Julius Caesar), and moved to its present site in the Piazza San Pietro in 1586. The word is singular, not plural.

[7] Styx, Acheron … Phlegethon Three of the four rivers of Hades, the Greek underworld.

[8] summum bonum Latin: highest good.

[9] Mephastophilis charms him According to Henslowe's Diary the Admiral's Men owned a "robe for to go invisible," a prop which may have been used here.

[10] sennet Flourish on the trumpet to announce a ceremonial entrance.

[11] Cardinal of Lorraine This position was held during the sixteenth century by several members of the powerful Guise family: Jean de Guise (1498–1550); Charles de Guise (1524–74), who helped foment the wars of religion that convulsed France for decades after 1562 and acquired a reputation for dissimulation and cruelty; and Louis de Guise (1555–88), who along with his brother, Henri, third Duc de Guise (1550–88), was assassinated by King Henri III. As leaders of the pro-Spanish and ultra-Catholic Ligue, and thus major figures in the Spanish-led campaign against Protestantism, Louis and Henri de Guise were feared and detested in England.

[12] and you spare If you eat sparingly.

POPE. How now, who's that which spake? Friars, look about!

FRIAR. Here's nobody, if it like[1] your Holiness.

POPE. My lord, here is a dainty dish was sent me from the Bishop of Milan.

FAUSTUS. I thank you, sir.

(Snatch it.)

POPE. How now, who's that which snatched the meat from me? Will no man look? My lord, this dish was sent me from the Cardinal of Florence.

FAUSTUS. You say true, I'll ha' it.

(Snatch it.)

POPE. What, again! My lord, I'll drink to your grace.

FAUSTUS. I'll pledge your grace.

(Snatch it.)

LORRAINE. My lord, it may be some ghost newly crept out of purgatory come to beg a pardon of your Holiness.

POPE. It may be so. Friars, prepare a dirge[2] to lay the fury of this ghost. Once again, my lord, fall to. (The Pope crosses himself.[3])

FAUSTUS. What, are you crossing your self? Well, use that trick no more, I would advise you.

(Cross again.)

FAUSTUS. Well, there's the second time. Aware the third, I give you fair warning.

(Cross again, and Faustus hits him a box of the ear, and they all run away.)

Come on, Mephastophilis, what shall we do?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Nay, I know not; we shall be cursed with bell, book and candle.[4]

FAUSTUS. How? Bell, book and candle, candle, book and bell,
Forward and backward, to curse Faustus to hell.
Anon you shall hear a hog grunt, a calf bleat, and an ass bray,
Because it is Saint Peter's holy day!

(Enter all the Friars to sing the dirge.)

FRIAR. Come brethren, let's about our business with good devotion.

(They sing this:)

Cursed be he that stole away his Holiness' meat from the table.
Maledicat dominus![5]
Cursed be he that struck his Holiness a blow on the face.
Maledicat dominus!
Cursed be he that took Friar Sandelo a blow on the pate.
Maledicat dominus!
Cursed be he that disturbeth our holy dirge.
Maledicat dominus!
Cursed be he that took away his Holiness' wine.
Maledicat dominus! Et omnes sancti![6] Amen.

(Faustus and Mephastophilis beat the Friars and fling fireworks among them, and so exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 2

(Enter Robin and Rafe with a silver goblet.)

ROBIN. Come Rafe, did I not tell thee we were for ever made by this Doctor Faustus' book? Ecce signum,[7] here's a simple purchase for horse-keepers! Our horses shall eat no hay as long as this lasts.

[1] like Please.

[2] dirge Originally "dirige," the first word of the Latin antiphon at matins in the Office of the Dead ("Dirige, Domine, Deus meus, in conspectu tuo viam meum": "Direct, O Lord, my God, my way in thy sight").

[3] crosses himself Makes the sign of the cross, the preliminary to Roman Catholic prayer.

[4] bell, book and candle At the end of the ritual of excommunication, which is performed to debar a member of the Church from the sacraments, the bell is tolled, the book closed, and the candle extinguished. That ritual is confused here with the office of exorcism, performed to banish evil spirits.

[5] Maledicat dominus Latin: May the Lord curse him.

[6] Et omnes sancti! Latin: And (may) all the saints (curse him).

[7] Ecce signum Latin: Behold the sign.

(Enter the Vintner.)

RAFE. But Robin, here comes the Vintner.

ROBIN. Hush, I'll gull[1] him supernaturally. Drawer,[2] I hope all is paid. God be with you; come Rafe.

VINTNER. Soft,[3] sir; a word with you. I must yet have a goblet paid from you ere you go.

ROBIN. I a goblet? Rafe, I a goblet? I scorn you, and you are but a etc.[4] I a goblet? Search me!

VINTNER. I mean so, sir, with your favor.

(Searches Robin.)

ROBIN. How say you now?

VINTNER. I must say somewhat to your fellow. You, sir.

RAFE. Me, sir? Me, sir! Search your fill! Now, sir, you may be ashamed to burden honest men with a matter of truth.

VINTNER. Well, t'one of you hath this goblet about you.

ROBIN. You lie, drawer, 'tis afore me. Sirrah you, I'll teach ye to impeach[5] honest men: stand by, I'll scour you for a goblet. Stand aside, you had best, I charge you in the name of Belzebub! Look to the goblet, Rafe.[6]

VINTNER. What mean you, sirrah?

ROBIN. I'll tell you what I mean.

(He reads.)

Sanctabulorum periphrasticon—Nay, I'll tickle you, Vintner! Look to the goblet, Rafe. Polypragmos Belseborams framanto pacostiphos tostu Mephastophilis, etc.[7]

(Enter Mephastophilis; sets squibs[8] at their backs; they run about.)

VINTNER. O nomine Domine! What mean'st thou, Robin? Thou hast no goblet!

RAFE. Peccatum peccatorum! Here's thy goblet, good Vintner!

ROBIN. Misericordia pro nobis![9] What shall I do? Good devil, forgive me now, and I'll never rob thy library more!

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Monarch of hell, under whose black survey
Great potentates do kneel with awful fear,
Upon whose altars thousand souls do lie,
How am I vexed with these villains' charms!
From Constantinople am I hither come
Only for pleasure of these damned slaves.

ROBIN. How, from Constantinople? You have had a great journey, will you take sixpence in your purse to pay for your supper, and be gone?

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Well villains, for your presumption, I transform thee into an ape, and thee into a dog, and so be gone!

(Exit.)

ROBIN. How, into an ape? That's brave, I'll have fine sport with the boys; I'll get nuts and apples enow.[10]

RAFE. And I must be a dog.

ROBIN. I'faith, thy head will never be out of the pottage pot.

(Exeunt.)

---

[1] gull Trick.

[2] Drawer An insult: Robin pretends to mistake the Vintner (or innkeeper) for his employee, the tapster or drawer who serves the customers.

[3] Soft Softly, slowly; here carrying an imperative force, as in "not so fast!"

[4] etc. Substitute for a scatological or obscene expression.

[5] impeach Accuse.

[6] Look … Rafe Robin and Rafe are apparently passing the goblet back and forth between them.

[7] Sanctabulorum … Mephastophilis, etc. Robin's incantation is gibberish, though some of it comes close to deviating into sense. The Greek periphrastikos means "circumlocutory." In Greek polypragmosyne means "curiosity" or "meddlesomeness," and a polypragmon is a "busybody." The first four words of the invocation might then be translated as "Busy-body Belseborams … of beating-around-the-bush holy-molydoms!"

[8] squibs Fireworks.

[9] O … nobis Garbled scraps of liturgical Latin.

[10] enow Enough.

ACT 4, CHORUS

(Enter Chorus.)

CHORUS. When Faustus had with pleasure ta'en the view
Of rarest things and royal courts of kings,
He stay'd his course, and so returned home,
Where such as bear his absence but with grief,
I mean his friends and nearest companions,
Did gratulate his safety with kind words,
And in their conference of what befell
Touching his journey through the world and air
They put forth questions of astrology,
Which Faustus answer'd with such learned skill
As[1] they admir'd and wonder'd at his wit.
Now is his fame spread forth in every land;
Amongst the rest of Emperor is one,
Carolus the Fifth,[2] at whose palace now
Faustus is feasted 'mongst his noblemen.
What there he did in trial of his art
I leave untold, your eyes shall see perform'd.

(Exit.)

ACT 4, SCENE 1

(Enter Emperor, Faustus, and a Knight, with attendants.)

EMPEROR. Master Doctor Faustus, I have heard strange report of thy knowledge in the black art, how that none in my empire, nor in the whole world, can compare with thee for the rare[3] effects of magic: they say thou hast a familiar spirit, by whom thou canst accomplish what thou list.[4] This therefore is my request: that thou let me see some proof of thy skill, that mine eyes may be witnesses to confirm what mine ears have heard reported; and here I swear to thee, by the honor of mine imperial crown, that whatever thou doest, thou shalt be no ways prejudiced or endamaged.[5]

KNIGHT. (Aside.) I'faith, he looks much like a conjurer.

FAUSTUS. My gracious sovereign, though I must confess myself far inferior to the report men have published, and nothing answerable[6] to the honor of your imperial Majesty, yet for that[7] love and duty binds me thereunto, I am content to do whatsoever your Majesty shall command me.

EMPEROR. Then Doctor Faustus, mark what I shall say.
As I was sometime solitary set
Within my closet,[8] sundry thoughts arose
About the honor of mine ancestors:
How they had won by prowess such exploits,
Got riches, subdu'd so many kingdoms,
As we that do succeed,[9] or they that shall Hereafter possess our throne shall,
I fear me, never attain to that degree
Of high renown and great authority;
Amongst which kings is Alexander the Great,
Chief spectacle of the world's pre-eminence,[10]
The bright shining of whose glorious acts
Lightens the world with his reflecting beams,
As when I hear but motion° made of him mention
It grieves my soul I never saw the man.
If therefore thou, by cunning of thine art,
Canst raise this man from hollow vaults below
Where lies entomb'd this famous conqueror,
And bring with him his beauteous paramour,[11]
Both in their right shapes, gesture, and attire
They us'd to wear during their time of life,
Thou shalt both satisfy my just desire
And give me cause to praise thee whilst I live.

FAUSTUS. My gracious lord, I am ready to accomplish your request, so far forth as by art and power of my spirit I am able to perform.

KNIGHT. (Aside.) I'faith that's just nothing at all.

FAUSTUS. But if it like your Grace, it is not in my ability to present before your eyes the true substantial bodies of those two deceased princes, which long since are consumed to dust.

---

[1] As That.

[2] Carolus the Fifth Charles V (1500–58), King of Spain and Holy Roman Emperor from 1518 and 1519 respectively until his abdication in 1555. The historical Doctor Faustus never made an appearance at the imperial court. Contemporary magi, however, had connections with the courts of both the emperor Maximilian (Charles V's grandfather and immediate predecessor) and Charles V.

[3] rare Remarkable, extraordinary.

[4] what thou list Whatever you wish.

[5] endamaged Harmed.

[6] nothing answerable Quite unequal.

[7] for that Because.

[8] closet Study, inner chamber.

[9] succeed Follow in dynastic succession.

[10] pre-eminence Pre-eminent people.

[11] paramour Mistress, consort (i.e., Roxane of Oxyartes).

KNIGHT. (Aside.) Ay, marry[1] Master Doctor, now there's a sign of grace in you when you will confess the truth.

FAUSTUS. But such spirits as can lively resemble Alexander and his paramour shall appear before your Grace, in that manner that they best lived in, in their most flourishing estate, which I doubt not shall sufficiently content your imperial Majesty.

EMPEROR. Go to,[2] Master Doctor, let me see them presently.[3]

KNIGHT. Do you hear, Master Doctor? You bring Alexander and his paramour before the Emperor?

FAUSTUS. How then, sir?

KNIGHT. I'faith, that's as true as Diana turned me to a stag.

FAUSTUS. No sir, but when Actaeon[4] died, he left the horns for you. Mephastophilis, be gone.

(Exit Mephastophilis.)

KNIGHT. Nay, and[5] you go to conjuring, I'll be gone.

(Exit Knight.)

FAUSTUS. I'll meet with[6] you anon for interrupting me so. Here they are, my gracious lord.

(Enter Mephastophilis with Alexander and his paramour.)

EMPEROR. Master Doctor, I heard this lady while she lived had a wart or mole in her neck. How shall I know whether it be so or no?

FAUSTUS. Your highness may boldly go and see.

(Emperor does so; then spirits exeunt.)

EMPEROR. Sure these are no spirits, but the true substantial bodies of these two deceased princes.[7]

FAUSTUS. Will't please your highness now to send for the knight that was so pleasant with me here of late?

EMPEROR. One of you call him forth.

(Enter the Knight with a pair of horns on his head.)

How now, sir knight? Why, I had thought thou had'st been a bachelor, but now I see thou hast a wife, that not only gives thee horns but makes thee wear them. Feel on thy head!

KNIGHT. Thou damned wretch and execrable dog,
Bred in the concave of some monstrous rock,
How dar'st thou thus abuse a gentleman?
Villain, I say, undo what thou hast done!

FAUSTUS. O not so fast, sir; there's no haste but good.[8] Are you remembered how you crossed me in my conference with the Emperor? I think I have met with you for it.

EMPEROR. Good Master Doctor, at my entreaty release him. He hath done penance sufficient.

FAUSTUS. My gracious lord, not so much for the injury[9] he offered me here in your presence, as to delight you with some mirth, hath Faustus worthily requited this injurious knight; which being all I desire, I am content to release him of his horns. And sir knight, hereafter speak well of scholars. Mephastophilis, transform him straight.[10] Now, my good lord, having done my duty, I humbly take my leave.

EMPEROR. Farewell, Master Doctor; yet ere you go, expect from me a bounteous reward.

(Exeunt Emperor, Knight, and attendants.)

ACT 4, SCENE 2

FAUSTUS. Now Mephastophilis, the restless course
That time doth run with calm and silent foot,
Shortening my days and thread of vital life,

---

[1] marry Here, expression used to give emphasis to a statement.

[2] Go to Normally an expression of incredulity, it appears here to express mild demurral, or perhaps encouragement, with the same range of meanings as "Come, come."

[3] presently At once.

[4] Diana … Actaeon Actaeon, a hunter, witnessed the goddess Diana and her nymphs bathing; the goddess transformed him into a stag and he was torn to pieces by his own dogs.

[5] and If.

[6] meet with Get even with.

[7] princes Used in this period to refer, not to a male ruler, but any ruler.

[8] there's … good Common proverb: "No haste but good (speed)."

[9] injury Insult.

[10] straight At once.

Calls for the payment of my latest years.
Therefore, sweet Mephastophilis,
Let us make haste to Wittenberg.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. What, will you go on horseback, or on foot?

FAUSTUS. Nay, till I am past this fair and pleasant green
I'll walk on foot.

(Enter a Horse-courser.)[1]

HORSE-COURSER. I have been all this day seeking one Master Fustian; mass,[2] see where he is. God save you, Master Doctor.

FAUSTUS. What, horse-courser, you are well met.

HORSE-COURSER. Do you hear, sir? I have brought you forty dollars for your horse.

FAUSTUS. I cannot sell him. If thou lik'st him for fifty, take him.

HORSE-COURSER. Alas sir, I have no more. I pray you, speak for me.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. I pray you, let him have him. He is an honest fellow, and he has a great charge,[3] neither wife nor child.

FAUSTUS. Well, come, give me your money. My boy will deliver him to you. But I must tell you one thing before you have him: ride him not into the water at any hand.[4]

HORSE-COURSER. Why sir, will he not drink of all waters?

FAUSTUS. O yes, he will drink of all waters, but ride him not into the water. Ride him over hedge or ditch, or where thou wilt, but not into the water.

HORSE-COURSER. Well, sir, now am I a made man for ever! I'll not leave[5] my horse for forty. If he had but the quality of hey ding ding, hey ding ding, I'd make a brave living on him: he has a buttock so slick as an eel.[6] Well, God-bye[7] sir, your boy will deliver him me. But hark ye sir, if my horse be sick or ill at ease, if I bring his water[8] to you, you'll tell me what it is?

FAUSTUS. Away, you villain! What, dost thou think I am a horse-doctor?

(Exit Horse-courser.)

What art thou, Faustus, but a man condemn'd to die?
Thy fatal time[9] doth draw to final end;
Despair doth drive distrust into my thoughts.
Confound these passions with a quiet sleep:
Tush, Christ did call the thief upon the cross.[10]
Then rest thee, Faustus, quiet in conceit.

(Sleeps in his chair. Enter Horse-courser all wet, crying.)

HORSE-COURSER. Alas, alas, Doctor Fustian, quotha? Mass, Doctor Lopus[11] was never such a doctor: has given me a purgation,[12] has purged me of forty dollars, I shall never see them more. But yet like an ass as I was, I would not be ruled by him, for he bade me I should ride him into no water. Now I, thinking my horse had some rare quality that he would not have had me know of, I like a venturous youth rid him into the deep pond at the town's end. I was no sooner in the middle of the pond, but my horse vanished away, and I sat upon a bottle[13] of hay, never so near drowning in my life! But I'll seek out my doctor, and have my forty dollars again, or I'll make it dearest[1] horse. O, yonder is his snipper-snapper.[2] Do you hear? you, hey-pass,[3] where's your master?

[1] Horse-courser Horse dealer.

[2] Fustian Clownish deformation of "Faustus"; bombast, nonsense; mass Contraction of "By the Mass."

[3] charge Burden (of family responsibilities).

[4] at any hand Under any circumstances.

[5] leave Sell.

[6] hey ding ding ... eel "Hey ding-a-ding" is a common refrain in popular songs. The phrase has sexual overtones, and "buttock so slick as an eel" implies sexual potency; thus, the "brave living" that the horse-courser anticipates will presumably come from stud fees.

[7] God-bye Contraction of "God be with you."

[8] water Urine.

[9] fatal time Time allotted by fate.

[10] the thief ... cross See Luke 23.43.

[11] Doctor Lopus Doctor Roderigo Lopez, a Portuguese marrano, or Christianized Jew, and personal physician to Queen Elizabeth. Lopez incurred the enmity of the Earl of Essex, who in January 1594 accused him of high treason; he was tried (and convicted) on 28 February on charges that included attempting to poison the queen, and was executed on 7 June—more than a year after Marlowe's death. Although Lopez was well-known even before his appointment as the queen's physician in 1586 (he had previously been household physician to the Earl of Leicester), the past-tense allusion to him suggests that in its present form this scene must have been written after Marlowe's death.

[12] purgation Emetic.

[13] bottle From the French "botte," meaning bundle.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Why sir, what would you? You cannot speak with him.

HORSE-COURSER. But I will speak with him.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Why, he's fast asleep; come some other time.

HORSE-COURSER. I'll speak with him now, or I'll break his glass windows[4] about his ears.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. I tell thee, he hath not slept this eight nights.

HORSE-COURSER. And he have not slept this eight weeks I'll speak with him.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. See where he is, fast asleep.

HORSE-COURSER. Ay, this is he. God save ye Master Doctor! Master Doctor, Master Doctor Fustian, forty dollars, forty dollars for a bottle of hay!

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Why, thou seest he hears thee not.

HORSE-COURSER. So ho, ho! So ho, ho![5] (Hallow in his ear.) No, will you not wake? I'll make you wake ere I go!

(Pull him by the leg, and pull it away.)

Alas, I am undone! What shall I do?

FAUSTUS. O my leg, my leg! Help, Mephastophilis! Call the officers, my leg, my leg!

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Come villain, to the constable.

HORSE-COURSER. O Lord, sir: let me go, and I'll give you forty dollars more.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Where be they?

HORSE-COURSER. I have none about me; come to my ostry,[6] and I'll give them you.

MEPHASTOPHILIS. Be gone, quickly.

(Horse-courser runs away.)

FAUSTUS. What, is he gone? Farewell he, Faustus has his leg again, and the horse-courser, I take it, a bottle of hay for his labor. Well, this trick shall cost him forty dollars more.

(Enter Wagner.)

How now, Wagner, what's the news with thee?

WAGNER. Sir, the Duke of Vanholt doth earnestly entreat your company.

FAUSTUS. The Duke of Vanholt! An honorable gentleman, to whom I must be no niggard[7] of my cunning. Come Mephastophilis, let's away to him.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 4, SCENE 3

(Enter to them the Duke, and the Duchess; the Duke speaks.)

DUKE. Believe me, Master Doctor, this merriment hath much pleased me.

FAUSTUS. My gracious lord, I am glad it contents you so well. But it may be, madam, you take no delight in this. I have heard that great-bellied[8] women do long for some dainties or other: what is it, madam? Tell me, and you shall have it.

DUCHESS. Thanks, good Master Doctor, and for I see your courteous intent to pleasure me, I will not hide from you the thing my heart desires; and were it now summer, as it is January, and the dead time of winter, I would desire no better meat[9] than a dish of ripe grapes.

FAUSTUS. Alas, madam, that's nothing. Mephastophilis, be gone.

(Exit Mephastophilis.)

Were it a greater thing than this, so it would content you, you should have it.

(Enter Mephastophilis with the grapes.)

Here they be, madam, will't please you to taste on them?

DUKE. Believe me, Master Doctor, this makes me wonder above the rest, that being in the dead time of winter, and in the month of January, how you should come by these grapes.

---

[1] dearest Most expensive. If the horse-courser can't have his money back, he'll take revenge.

[2] snipper-snapper Conceited young fellow, smart-aleck.

[3] hey-pass Expression used by fairground conjurors or jugglers.

[4] glass windows Spectacles.

So ho, ho Huntsman's cry.

ostry Hostelry, inn.

[7] niggard Parsimonious person, one who shares only grudgingly.

[8] great-bellied Pregnant.

[9] meat Food.

FAUSTUS. If it like your Grace, the year is divided into two circles over the whole world, that when it is here winter with us, in the contrary circle it is summer with them, as in India, Saba, and farther countries in the east;[1] and by means of a swift spirit that I have, I had them brought hither, as ye see. How do you like them, madam, be they good?

DUCHESS. Believe me, Master Doctor, they be the best grapes that e'er I tasted in my life before.

FAUSTUS. I am glad they content you so, madam.

DUKE. Come, madam, let us in, where you must well reward this learned man for the kindness he hath showed to you.

DUCHESS. And so I will, my lord, and whilst I live rest beholden for this courtesy.

FAUSTUS. I humbly thank your Grace.

DUKE. Come Master Doctor, follow us, and receive your reward.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 5, SCENE 1

(Enter Wagner alone.)

WAGNER. I think my master means to die shortly,
For he hath given to me all his goods;
And yet methinkes[2] if that death were near
He would not banquet and carouse and swill
Amongst the students, as even now he doth,
Who are at supper with such belly-cheer
As Wagner ne'er beheld in all his life.
See where they come: belike the feast is ended.

(Exit. Enter Faustus with two or three scholars.)

FIRST SCHOLAR. Master Doctor Faustus, since our conference about fair ladies, which was the beautiful'st in all the world, we have determined with[3] our selves that Helen of Greece was the admirablest lady that ever lived. Therefore, Master Doctor, if you will do us so much favor as to let us see that peerless dame of Greece, whom all the world admires for majesty, we should think ourselves much beholding unto you.

FAUSTUS. Gentlemen,
For that[4] I know your friendship is unfeign'd
(And Faustus' custom is not to deny
The just requests of those that wish him well),
You shall behold that peerless dame of Greece
No otherways for pomp and majesty
Than when Sir Paris cross'd the seas with her
And brought the spoils to rich Dardania.[5]
Be silent then, for danger is in words.

(Music sounds, and Helen passeth over the stage.)

SECOND SCHOLAR. Too simple is my wit to tell her praise,
Whom all the world admires for majesty.

THIRD SCHOLAR. No marvel though the angry Greeks pursued[6]
With ten years' war the rape° of such a queen, abduction
Whose heavenly beauty passeth all compare.

FIRST SCHOLAR. Since we have seen the pride of nature's works,
And only paragon of excellence,

(Enter an old man.)

Let us depart, and for this glorious deed
Happy and blest be Faustus evermore.

FAUSTUS. Gentlemen, farewell, the same I wish to you.

(Exeunt scholars.)

OLD MAN. Ah, Doctor Faustus, that I might prevail
To guide thy steps unto the way of life,
By which sweet path thy may'st attain the goal
That shall conduct thee to celestial rest.
Break heart, drop blood, and mingle it with tears,
Tears falling from repentant heaviness

---

[1] two circles … east The two "circles" should of course be the northern and southern hemispheres. Saba is the land of the Queen of Sheba, now Yemen.

[2] methinkes Modernized spelling would upset the rhythm of this line.

[3] determined with Settled among.

[4] For that Because.

[5] Dardania Troy, referred to here by the name of the founder of the Trojan dynasty, Dardanus.

[6] pursued Sought to avenge.

Of thy most vile and loathsome filthiness,
The stench whereof corrupts the inward soul
With such flagitious[1] crimes of heinous sins
As no commiseration may expel
But mercy, Faustus, of thy Saviour sweet,
Whose blood alone must wash away thy guilt.[2]
FAUSTUS. Where art thou, Faustus?[3] wretch, what hast thou done?
Damn'd art thou, Faustus, damn'd, despair and die!
Hell claims his right, and with a roaring voice
Says, "Faustus, come, thine hour is almost come!"

(Enter Mephastophilis, who gives him a dagger.)

And Faustus now will come to do thee right.
OLD MAN. Ah stay, good Faustus, stay thy desperate steps:
I see an angel hovers o'er thy head,
And with a vial full of precious grace[4]
Offers to pour the same into thy soul:
Then call for mercy and avoid despair.
FAUSTUS. Ah my sweet friend, I feel thy words
To comfort my distressed soul.
Leave me awhile to ponder on my sins.
OLD MAN. I go, sweet Faustus, but with heavy cheer,
Fearing the ruin of thy hopeless soul.

(Exit.)

FAUSTUS. Accursed Faustus, where is mercy now?
I do repent, and yet I do despair:
Hell strives with grace for conquest in my breast;
What shall I do to shun the snares of death?
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Thou traitor, Faustus, I arrest thy soul
For disobedience to my sovereign lord.
Revolt,[5] or I'll in piece-meal tear thy flesh!
FAUSTUS. I do repent I e'er offended him.
Sweet Mephastophilis, entreat thy lord
To pardon my unjust presumption,
And with my blood again I will confirm
My former vow I made to Lucifer.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Do it then quickly, with unfeigned heart,
Lest greater danger do attend thy drift.[6]
FAUSTUS. Torment, sweet friend, that base and crooked age
That durst dissuade me from thy Lucifer,
With greatest torments that our hell affords.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. His faith is great, I cannot touch his soul.
But what I may afflict his body with
I will attempt, which is but little worth.
FAUSTUS. One thing, good servant, let me crave of thee
To glut the longing of my heart's desire:
That I might have unto° my paramour as
That heavenly Helen which I saw of late,
Whose sweet embracings may extinguish clean
These thoughts that do dissuade me from my vow,
And keep mine oath I made to Lucifer.
MEPHASTOPHILIS. Faustus, this, or what else thou shalt desire
Shall be perform'd in the twinkling of an eye.

(Enter Helen.)

FAUSTUS. Was this the face that launch'd a thousand ships
And burnt the topless° towers of Ilium?° soaring / Troy
Sweet Helen, make me immortal with a kiss;
Her lips suck forth my soul, see where it flies!
Come Helen, come, give me my soul again;
Here will I dwell, for heaven be in these lips,
And all is dross that is not Helena.

(Enter old man.)

I will be Paris, and for love of thee
Instead of Troy shall Wittenberg be sack'd,
And I will combat with weak Menelaus[7]

[1] flagitious Extremely wicked, infamous.

[2] no … guilt Cf. Revelation 1.5: "Jesus Christ … loved us, and washed us from our sins in his own blood." The Prayer-Book of Queen Elizabeth (1559) specifies that if a person in "extremity of sickness … do truly repent him of his sins, and steadfastly believe that Jesus Christ … shed his blood for his redemption" (135), this is the equivalent of taking communion.

[3] Where … Faustus? Cf. Genesis 3.9: "The Lord God called to the man, and said unto him, Where art thou?"

[4] vial … grace The old man here individualizes an image from Revelation 5.8, in which elders worshiping before the throne of God carry "golden vials full of odors, which are the prayers of saints."

[5] Revolt Reverse your course of action.

[6] drift Conscious or unconscious tendency or aim.

[7] weak Menelaus Book 3 of Homer's Iliad recounts the duel between Alexandros or Paris and Menelaus. Paris challenged all the best of the Achaeans to single combat, but recoiled in fear from Menelaus. Having agreed that Helen and her possessions should go to the victor, Paris was defeated, but saved from [continued …]

And wear thy colours on my plumed crest;
Yea, I will wound Achilles in the heel
And then return to Helen for a kiss.
O, thou art fairer than the evening air
Clad in the beauty of a thousand stars;
Brighter art thou than flaming Jupiter
When he appear'd to hapless Semele,[1]
More lovely than the monarch of the sky
In wanton Arethusa's[2] azur'd arms,
And none but thou shalt be my paramour.

(Exeunt.)

OLD MAN. Accursed Faustus, miserable man,
That from thy soul exclud'st the grace of heaven
And fliest the throne of his tribunal seat!

(Enter the devils.)

Satan begins to sift me[3] with his pride;
As in this furnace God shall try my faith,
My faith, vile hell, shall triumph over thee!
Ambitious fiends, see how the heaven smiles
At your repulse, and laughs your state to scorn:
Hence, hell, for hence I fly unto my God.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 5, SCENE 2

(Enter Faustus with the scholars.)

FAUSTUS. Ah, gentlemen!

FIRST SCHOLAR. What ails Faustus?

FAUSTUS. Ah, my sweet chamber-fellow, had I lived with thee, then had I lived still, but now I die eternally. Look, comes he not, comes he not?

SECOND SCHOLAR. What means Faustus?

THIRD SCHOLAR. Belike he is grown into some sickness, by being over-solitary.

FIRST SCHOLAR. If it be so, we'll have physicians to cure him. 'Tis but a surfeit,[4] never fear, man.

FAUSTUS. A surfeit of deadly sin, that hath damned both body and soul.

SECOND SCHOLAR. Yet Faustus, look up to heaven; remember, God's mercies are infinite.

FAUSTUS. But Faustus' offence can ne'er be pardoned: the serpent that tempted Eve may be saved, but not Faustus. Ah gentlemen, hear me with patience, and tremble not at my speeches. Though my heart pants and quivers to remember that I have been a student here these thirty years, O would I had never seen Wittenberg, never read book: and what wonders I have done, all Germany can witness, yea all the world, for which Faustus hath lost both Germany and the world, yea heaven itself, heaven the seat of God, the throne of the blessed, the kingdom of joy, and must remain in hell for ever—hell, ah, hell, for ever! Sweet friends, what shall become of Faustus, being in hell for ever?

THIRD SCHOLAR. Yet Faustus, call on God.

FAUSTUS. On God, whom Faustus hath abjured? on God, whom Faustus hath blasphemed? Ah my God, I would weep, but the devil draws in my tears. Gush forth blood instead of tears, yea life and soul! Oh, he stays my tongue; I would lift up my hands, but see, they hold them, they hold them!

ALL. Who, Faustus?

FAUSTUS. Lucifer and Mephastophilis. Ah, gentlemen, I gave them my soul for my cunning.[5]

ALL. God forbid!

FAUSTUS. God forbade it indeed, but Faustus hath done it: for the vain pleasure of four and twenty years hath Faustus lost eternal joy and felicity. I writ them a bill with mine own blood, the date is expired, the time will come, and he will fetch me!

FIRST SCHOLAR. Why did not Faustus tell of this before, that divines might have prayed for thee?

FAUSTUS. Oft have I thought to have done so, but the devil threatened to tear me in pieces if I named God, to fetch both body and soul if I once gave ear to divinity, death by Aphrodite, who carried him in a mist into his own bedchamber. There, although shamed in Helen's eyes as in everyone else's, he promptly took her to bed.

[1] hapless Semele One of Jupiter's human mistresses, she was persuaded by Juno to ask him to come to her in the same form in which he embraced Juno in heaven, and was consumed by fire.

[2] Arethusa Nymph who, bathing in the river Alpheus, aroused the river-god's lust; fleeing from him, she was transformed into a fountain. No classical myth links her with Jupiter or the sun-god.

[3] sift me Cf. Christ's words to Peter at the last supper: "Simon, Simon, behold, Satan hath desired to have you, and he may sift you as wheat" (Luke 22.31).

[4] surfeit Excessive indulgence in food or drink, and the resulting disorder of the system.

[5] cunning Knowledge.

and now 'tis too late: gentlemen, away, lest you perish with me.

SECOND SCHOLAR. O what may we do to save Faustus?

FAUSTUS. Talk not of me, but save yourselves, and depart.

THIRD SCHOLAR. God will strengthen me, I will stay with Faustus.

FIRST SCHOLAR. Tempt not God, sweet friend, but let us into the next room, and there pray for him.

FAUSTUS. Ah, pray for me, pray for me; and what noise soever[1] ye hear, come not unto me, for nothing can rescue me.

SECOND SCHOLAR. Pray thou, and we will pray that God may have mercy upon thee.

FAUSTUS. Gentlemen, farewell. If I live till morning, I'll visit you; if not, Faustus is gone to hell.

ALL. Faustus, farewell.

(Exeunt scholars. The clock strikes eleven.)

FAUSTUS. Ah Faustus,
Now hast thou but one bare hour to live,
And then thou must be damn'd perpetually.
Stand still, you ever-moving spheres of heaven.
That time may cease, and midnight never come!
Fair nature's eye, rise, rise again, and make
Perpetual day, or let this hour be but a year,
A month, a week, a natural day,
That Faustus may repent, and save his soul.
O lente lente currite noctis equi![2]
The stars move still, time runs, the clock will strike,
The devil will come, and Faustus must be damn'd.
O, I'll leap up to my God: who pulls me down?
See, see where Christ's blood streams in the firmament:
One drop would save my soul, half a drop! Ah, my Christ,
Ah rend not my heart for the naming of my Christ,[3]
Yet I will call on him, oh spare me Lucifer!
Where is it now? 'tis gone,
And see where God stretcheth out his arm
And bends his ireful brows!
Mountains and hills, come, come, and fall on me
And hide me from the heavy wrath of God.[4]
No, no?
Then will I headlong run into the earth.
Earth, gape! O no, it will not harbor me.
You stars that reign'd at my nativity,
Whose influence hath allotted death and hell,
Now draw up Faustus like a foggy mist
Into the entrails of yon laboring cloud,
That when you vomit forth into the air
My limbs may issue from your smoky mouths,
So that my soul may but ascend to heaven.

(The watch° strikes.) clock

Ah, half the hour is past: 'twill all be past anon.
Oh God, if thou wilt not have mercy on my soul,
Yet for Christ's sake, whose blood hath ransom'd me,
Impose some end to my incessant pain:
Let Faustus live in a hell a thousand years,
A hundred thousand, and at last be sav'd.
O, no end is limited to damned souls.[5]
Why wert thou not a creature wanting soul?
Or why is this immortal that thou hast?
Ah, Pythagoras' metempsychosis,[6] were that true
This soul should fly from me, and I be chang'd
Unto some brutish beast.
All beasts are happy, for when they die
Their souls are soon dissolv'd in elements,
But mine must live still to be plagu'd in hell.
Curst be the parents that engender'd me;
No Faustus, curse thyself, curse Lucifer
That hath depriv'd thee of the joys of heaven!

(The clock strikes twelve.)

O it strikes, it strikes, now body, turn to air
Or Lucifer will bear thee quick° to hell! alive

(Thunder and lightning.)

O soul, be changed into little water drops
And fall into the ocean, ne'er be found;
My God, my God, look not so fierce on me!

(Enter Chorus.)

CHORUS. Cut is the branch that might have grown full straight,
And burned is Apollo's laurel bough
That sometime grew within this learned man:
Faustus is gone, regard his hellish fall,
Whose fiendful fortune may exhort the wise
Only to wonder[1] at unlawful things,
Whose deepness doth entice such forward wits
To practice more than heavenly power permits.

Dr. Faustus

from Anonymous, The History of the Damnable Life, and Deserved Death of Dr. John Faustus (1592)

Though much of the story of Marlowe's Dr. Faustus and of its principal source, the prose History of the Damnable Life, and Deserved Death of Dr. John Faustus, are obviously legendary or mythic in nature, there was indeed a historical Dr. Faustus. Like Marlowe himself, the historical Faustus was, in Michael Keefer's words, "a transgressor both of sexual and of ideological codes."

The historical Faustus was Georgius of Helmstadt (c. 1466–c. 1537), a magician from the village of Helmstadt who attended the University of Heidelberg from 1483 until 1489 or thereabouts, and who by 1507 had established himself as a magician styling himself as "Magister Georgius Sabellicus, the younger Faustus, Chief of Necromancers, Astrologer, the Second Magus, Palmist, Diviner by Earth and Fire, Second in the Art of Divination by Water." Georgius Faustus seems to have had a very mixed career; he was hired in 1520 to cast the horoscope of the Bishop of Bamberg, and consulted in 1536 by a close associate of Erasmus's to predict the fortunes of an expedition to the new world—but he was also accused of being a braggart, a blasphemer, and worse. (When, in 1507, Faustus for a time took an appointment as a schoolmaster, he was accused of having indulged "in the most abominable kind of fornication with the boys," and fled to escape punishment.)

There was no suggestion during the life of the historical Faustus of a pact with the devil. Even before his death, however, the historical figure had evidently become something of a magnet for anecdotes of all sorts about sorcerers, charlatans, and demons. Interestingly, Martin Luther seems to have played a key role in the formation of the Faustus legend; the earliest record that survives of many of the anecdotes about Faustus is the written record of the "table talk" of Luther in the 1530s.

The direct source of the legend of Faustus selling his soul to the devil is the Historia von D. Johann Fausten of 1587, translated into English as The History of the Damnable Life, and Deserved Death of Dr. John Faustus in 1592. Marlowe evidently drew on this work extensively for his Dr. Faustus; a few key passages are reproduced below.

from CHAPTER 1. John Faustus, born in the town of Rhode, lying in the province of Weimar in Germ[any], his father a poor husbandman and not [able] well to bring him up: but having an uncle at Wittenberg, a rich man and without issue, took this J. Faustus from his father and made him his heir, in so much that his father was no more troubled with him, for he remained with his uncle at Wittenberg, where he was kept at the university in the same city to study divinity. But Faustus, being of a naughty mind and otherwise addicted, applied not his studies, but took himself to other exercises: the which his uncle oftentimes hearing, rebuked him for it, as Eli oft times rebuked his children for sinning against the Lord: even so this good man labored to have Faustus apply his study of divinity, that he might come to the knowledge of God and his laws. But it is manifest that many virtuous parents have wicked children, as Cain, Reuben, Absolom and such like have been to their parents: so this Faustus having godly parents, and seeing him to be of a toward wit, were very desirous to bring him up in those virtuous studies, namely, of divinity: but he gave himself secretly to study necromancy and conjuration, in so much that few or none could perceive his profession.

But to the purpose: Faustus continued at study in the university, and was by the Rectors and sixteen Masters afterwards examined how he had profited in his studies; and being found by them that none for his time were able to argue with him in divinity, or for the excellency of his wisdom to compare with him, with one consent they made him Doctor of Divinity. But Doctor Faustus, within short time after he had obtained his degree, fell into such fantasies and deep cogitations that he was marked of many, and of the most part of the students was called the Speculator; and sometime he would throw the scriptures from him as though he had no care of his former profession: so that he began a very ungodly life, as hereafter more at large may appear; for the old proverb saith, Who can hold that will away? So who can hold Faustus from the devil, that seeks after him with all his endeavor? For he accompanied himself with divers that were seen in those devilish arts, and that had the Chaldean, Persian, Hebrew, Arabian, and Greek tongues, using figures, characters, conjurations, incantations, with many other ceremonies belonging to these infernal arts, as necromancy, charms, soothsaying, witchcraft, enchantment, being delighted with their books, words, and names so well that he studied day and night therein: in so much that he could not abide to be called doctor of divinity, but waxed a worldly man, and named himself an astrologian, and a mathematician: and for a shadow sometimes a physician, and did great cures, namely with herbs, roots, waters, drinks, receipts, and clisters. And without doubt he was passing wise, and excellent perfect in the holy scriptures: but he that knoweth his master's will and doth it not, is worthy to be beaten with many stripes. It is written, No man can serve two masters, and Thou shalt not tempt the Lord thy God: but Faustus threw all this in the wind, and made his soul of no estimation, regarding more his worldly pleasure than the joys to come: therefore at the day of judgment there is no hope of his redemption.

CHAPTER 2. You have heard before, that all Faustus' mind was set to study the arts of necromancy and conjuration, the which exercise he followed day and night: and taking to him the wings of an eagle, thought to fly over the whole world, and to know the secrets of heaven and earth; for his speculation was so wonderful, being expert in using his vocabula, figures, characters, conjurations, and other ceremonial actions, that in all the haste he put in practice to bring the devil before him. And taking his way to a thick wood near to Wittenberg, called in the German tongue Spisser Waldt..., he came into the same wood towards evening into a cross way, where he made with a wand a circle in the dust, and within that many more circles and characters: and thus he passed away the time, until it was nine or ten of the clock in the night, then began Doctor Faustus to call for Mephostophiles the spirit, and to charge him in the name of Beelzebub to appear there personally without any long stay: then presently the devil began so great a rumor in the wood, as if heaven and earth would have come together with wind, the trees bowing their tops to the ground; then fell the devil to bleat as if the whole wood had been full of lions, and suddenly about the circle ran the devil as if a thousand wagons had been running together on paved stones. ... Faustus commanded that the next morning at twelve of the clock he should appear to him at his house, but the devil would in no wise grant. Faustus began again to conjure him in the name of Beelzebub, that he should fulfil his request: whereupon the spirit agreed, and so they departed each one his way.

from CHAPTER 3. Doctor Faustus having commanded the spirit to be with him, at his hour appointed he came and appeared in his chamber, demanding of Faustus what his desire was: then began Doctor Faustus anew with him to conjure him that he should be obedient unto him, and to answer him certain articles, and to fulfil them in all points.

1. That the spirit should serve him and be obedient unto him in all things that he asked of him from that hour until the hour of his death.
2. Farther, any thing that he desired of him he should bring it to him.
3. Also, that in all Faustus his demands or interrogations the spirit should tell him nothing but that which is true.

Hereupon the spirit answered and laid his case forth, that he had no power of himself, until he had first given his prince (that was ruler over him) to understand thereof, and to know if he could obtain so much of his lord: Therefore speak farther that I may do thy whole desire to my prince: for it is not in my power to fulfil without his leave....

Doctor Faustus upon this arose where he sat, and said, I will have my request, and yet I will not be damned. The spirit answered, Then shalt thou want thy desire, and yet art thou mine notwithstanding: if any man would detain thee it is in vain, for thine infidelity hath confounded thee.

Hereupon spake Faustus: Get thee hence from me, and take Saint Valentine's farewell and Crisam with thee, yet I conjure thee that thou be here at evening, and bethink thyself on that I have asked thee, and ask thy prince's counsel therein. Mephostophiles the spirit, thus answered, vanished away, leaving Faustus in his study, where he sat pondering with himself how he might obtain his request of the devil without loss of his soul: yet fully he was resolved in himself rather than to want his pleasure, to do whatsoever the spirit and his lord should condition upon.

from CHAPTER 4. Faustus continuing in his devilish cogitations, never moving out of the place where the spirit left him (such was his fervent love to the devil), the night approaching, this swift flying spirit appeared to Faustus, offering himself with all submission to his service, with full authority from his prince to do whatsoever he would request, if so be Faustus would promise to be his: This answer I bring thee, and an answer must thou make by me again, yet will I hear what is thy desire, because thou hast sworn me to be here at this time. Doctor Faustus gave him this answer, though faintly (for his soul's sake): That his request was none other but to become a devil, or at least a limb of him, and that the spirit should agree unto these articles as followeth.

1. That he might be a spirit in shape and quality.
2. That Mephostophiles should be his servant, and at his commandment.
3. That Mephostophiles should bring him any thing, and do for him whatsoever.
4. That at all times he should be in his house, invisible to all men, except only to himself, and at his commandment to show himself.
5. Lastly, that Mephostophiles should at all times appear at his command, in what form or shape soever he would.

Upon these points the spirit answered Doctor Faustus, that all this should be granted him and fulfilled, and more if he would agree unto him upon certain articles as followeth.

> First, that Doctor Faustus should give himself to his lord Lucifer, body and soul.
> Secondly, for confirmation of the same, he should make him a writing, written with his own blood.
> Thirdly, that he would be an enemy to all Christian people.
> Fourthly, that he would deny his Christian belief.
> Fifthly, that he let not any man change his opinion, if so be any man should go about to dissuade or withdraw him from it.

Further, the spirit promised Faustus to give him certain years to live in health and pleasure, and when such years were expired, that then Faustus should be fetched away, and if he should hold these articles and conditions, then he should have all whatsoever his heart would wish or desire; and that Faustus should quickly perceive himself to be a spirit in all manner of actions whatsoever. Hereupon Doctor Faustus his mind was so inflamed that he forgot his soul, and promised Mephostophiles to hold all things as he had mentioned them: he thought the devil was not so black as they use to paint him, nor hell so hot as the people say, etc.

from CHAPTER 6. How Doctor Faustus set his blood in a saucer on warm ashes, and writ as followeth. … [N]ow have I, Doctor John Faustus, unto the hellish prince of Orient and his messenger Mephostophiles, given both body and soul, upon such condition that they shall learn me, and fulfil my desire in all things, as they have promised and vowed unto me, with due obedience unto me, according to the articles mentioned between us.

Further, I covenant and grant them by these presents, that at the end of 24 years next ensuing the date of this present letter … I give them full power to do with me at their pleasure, to rule, to send, fetch, or carry me or mine, be it either body, soul, flesh, blood, or goods, into their habitation, be it wheresoever: and hereupon, I defy God and his Christ, all the host of heaven, and all living creatures that bear the shape of God, yea all that lives; and again I say it, and it shall be so. And to the more strengthening of this writing, I have written it with mine own hand and blood.…

from Henricus Cornelius Agrippa, De Occulta Philosophia (Of Occult Philosophy),[1] 1533

> Early in Dr. Faustus Faustus imagines that he "will be as cunning as Agrippa was, / Whose shadows made all Europe honour him." Agrippa (1486–1535) was a contemporary of the historical Dr. Faustus, and the two names were often linked in sixteenth century attacks on magic. Agrippa's De Occulta Philosophia is an encyclopaedic survey of magical beliefs and practices which also expounds a magical form of Christianity; Agrippa draws on Hermetic, Cabalistic, and Neoplatonic writings as well as on the canonical scriptures in developing his own notions of rebirth and deification. Not surprisingly, his efforts to associate non-Christian magical practices and traditions with the Christian scriptures were widely denounced. The groundbreaking Protestant thinker Jean Calvin termed him an atheist (1550), and André Thevet described his doctrines as "mortal poison" in 1584.

from AUTHOR'S PREFACE

I do not doubt but that the title of our book, Of Occult Philosophy, or of Magic, may by its rarity entice a large number to read it, among whom some twisted, feeble-minded people, and also many ill-disposed and hostile to my talents, will approach: these, in their rash ignorance taking the name of magic in the worse sense, will cry out, hardly having beheld the title, that I teach forbidden arts, sow the seed of heresy, am an offence to pious ears and to outstanding minds a stumbling block; that I am a sorcerer, a superstitious man, and a demoniac, because I am a magician. To these people I would reply that magus among learned men does not signify a sorcerer, nor a superstitious man, nor one possessed, but one who is a wise man, a priest, a prophet. The Sibyls were magicians; hence they prophesied most plainly of Christ. And indeed the Magi knew by the wonderful secrets of the world that Christ the author of the world itself was born, and were the first of all to come and worship him. And the name itself of magic was accepted by philosophers, extolled by theologians, and was also not displeasing to the gospel itself. Yet I believe those censors to be of such steadfast arrogance that they will forbid themselves the Sibyls and the holy magicians, and even the gospel itself, sooner than that the name of magic should be admitted into favour; to such a degree are they careful of their conscience, that neither Apollo, nor all the Muses, nor an angel from heaven would be able to deliver me from their curse. And I advise them now that they neither read, nor understand, nor remember our treatise, for it is harmful, it is poisonous, the gate of Acheron is in this book, it speaks stones: let them take heed lest it beat out their brains. …

Early modern England was awash with jests. Collections of these short "merry tales" and "pleasant conceits" were published and republished in blackletter volumes designed and priced to reach the widest possible readership. Jesting was a pervasive social and cultural presence in early modern England. Jesters had enormous celebrity appeal; the average Elizabethan would have known not only of such famous personages as Richard Tarlton and Robert Armin (both of whom are associated with jestbooks in various ways) but also of such imaginary figures as Old Hobson, Howleglas (the German trickster Til Ulenspiegel), Long Meg, and Widow Edith. By the late sixteenth century John Skelton was known less as a serious poet than as the joking figure found in the jestbook excerpted below. A similar point could be made about Sir Thomas More, whose associations with early jestbooks helped cement his witty reputation and foreshadowed his appearance as a jesting character in many later jestbooks. (More even included jests in his polemical and religious works.) Jokes, quips, merry tales, riddles, and comic ripostes seem to be mainstream in early modern England; we also find serious attention being paid to the social functions and physiology of wit and jesting. The early modern obsession with humor seems to be closely linked to the enormous social changes taking place: as class, privilege, status, national identity, and gender became more fluid, jokes and merry tales provided a means for articulating social debates and negotiating social tensions and anxieties. Such anxieties, unsurprisingly, coalesce around the subject of women. In jests, comic stories, and ballads, we find a remarkable attention to the public decorum, sexual propriety, and social agency of women. Power relations between husbands and wives form a substantial portion of these jests, suggesting a palpable social concern about the ability of men to control their wives. Similarly, the emphasis on the display of women's bodies—whether in erotic, shaming, or grotesque contexts, or in all three together—suggests some of the social contradictions attendant on the visibility of women in society. Early modern medical theory, moreover, included the importance of laughter in maintaining or restoring health. Laurent Joubert's 1579 Traité du Ris ["Treatise on Laughter"], for example, argued that because humor is related to ambivalence—our hearts both shrink with pleasure at others' troubles and swell with pity for their plight—the resulting cardiac flutter pulls on our diaphragms and makes us laugh, the "ho, ho, ho" bringing in the air that increases our sanguine humor and counteracts melancholy.

The selections below have been organized into four broad categories: jest collections, jest biographies, elite discussions of jesting, and jesting ballads. These are overlapping categories, to be sure, but they are useful in terms of indicating some of the different ways in which humor was published and discussed. Jest collections such as A Hundred Merry Tales, Wits, Fits, and Fancies, Tales and Quick Answers,* or A Banquet of Jests usually have little framing of their collected jests beyond the intermittent application of morals, although John Taylor's *Wit and Mirth is a notable exception, prefaced as it is by a long dream vision in which a recently departed jester commands Taylor to collect and publish the work. In texts such as Walter Smith's *Twelve Merry Jests of the Widow Edith, Merry Tales Made by Master Skelton, Tarlton's Jests, Merry and Conceited Jests of George Peele, and Long Meg of Westminster, quips and comic stories are centered on a famous figure, whether real (like John Skelton, Richard Tarlton, or George Peele) or fictional (like Widow Edith and Long Meg).

Elite discussions of jesting are found in many places. Granted the interest of rhetoricians in humor's power to reinforce an argument by showing the speaker or writer to have mental balance and hence wisdom, it is not surprising that some elite writers included jests. Thomas More, famed for his wit, included jokes in many of his works, most aggressively in his polemics and most movingly in the Dialogue of Comfort, written while he faced death (he even joked on the scaffold, according to legend, putting his beard to one side saying that it was innocent, having grown since his conviction). Books such as Baldassare Castiglione's The Courtier (translated into English by Thomas Hoby in 1561) made manifest the centrality of witty performance to courtly identity—and the social dangers of its inappropriate use. Castiglione also reminds readers that jests at court help amuse the prince and elevate one's status. Scholars, too, made use of jests; Thomas Wilson, for instance, offers jokes in his advice on rhetoric, addressing not a popular readership but those intending to be lawyers, or perhaps courtiers. Wilson included extensive discussion of jesting in his rhetorical treatises (building on, as Castiglione does, the importance Cicero places on jests in his rhetorical masterwork De Oratore), and no less a figure than Francis Bacon would publish his own book of comic tales, although under the more decorous and education title of "apophthegmes," or exemplary stories. Here we offer examples of such jesting.

Finally, there is a wide range of extant jovial ballads from the period (most of the copies we have date from the later seventeenth century, although many of the ballads would have been in circulation much earlier). The three included here are intended to give a sense of the flavor and frequent topics of these works. The Mad-Merry Pranks of Robin Good-fellow, an interesting appropriation of Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream, charts the boisterous antics of Puck as he revels through the night. The Cucking of a Scold will hardly seem humorous to modern readers, but it is representative of a ubiquitous misogynist literature that celebrates (and participates in) the shaming of women who speak too freely. And finally Martin Parker's *A New Medley, or A Mess of All-together, tells a different comical story (verging on nonsense) in each verse, illustrating how the world has changed.

from Anonymous, A Hundred Merry Tales (1526)

There was a maid stood by a river's side in her smock washing clothes. And as she stooped oft times her smock cleaved between her buttocks. By whom there came a friar seeing her and said in sport, "Maid, maid, take heed for Bayard[1] bites on the bridle." "Nay wise, master friar," quoth the maiden, "he doth but wipe his mouth and wenneth[2] ye will come and kiss him."

By this ye may see that a woman's answer is never to seek.

A man there [was] that came to confess himself to a gray friar shrove him[3] that he had lain with a young gentlewoman. This friar then asked him in what place, and he said it was in a goodly chamber all night long in a soft warm bed. The friar hearing that shrugged in his clothes and said, "Now, by sweet Saint Francis, then was thou very well at ease."

A merchant's wife there was in Bow parish in London somewhat stepped in age[4] to whom her maid came on a Sunday in Lent after dinner and said, "Mistress," quoth she, "they ring at Saint Thomas of Acres for there shall be a sermon preached anon." To whom the mistress answered and said, "Marry, God's blessing on thy heart for warning me thereof; and because I slept not well all this night I pray thee bring my stool with me for I will go thither to look whether I can take a nap there while the priest is preaching."

By this ye may see that many on goeth[5] to church as much for other things as for devotion.

In the time of Lent a Welshman came to be confessed of his curate, which in his confession said that he had killed a friar. To whom the curate said he could not absolve him. "Yes," quoth the Welshman, "if thou knewest all thou wouldest absolve me well enough." And when the curate had commanded him to show him all the case he said thus: "Marry, there were two friars and I might have slain them both if I had list but I let the one escape; therefore, Master Curate, set the t'one against the t'other and then the offence is not so great but ye may absolve me well enough."

By this ye may see that diverse men have so evil and large confessions that they think if they do one good deed or refrain from the doing of one evil sin that it is a satisfaction for other sins and offences.

There was a certain ploughman's son of the country of the age of sixteen years that never come much among company always went to plough and husbandry. On a time this young lad went to a wedding with his father where he saw one lute upon a lute.[6] And when he came home again at night his mother asked him what sport he had at the wedding. This lad answered and said, "By my troth, Mother," quoth he, "there was one that brought in a goose between his arms and tickled her so upon the neck that she creaked the sweetliest that ever I heard goose creak in my life."

A man asked his neighbour which was but late married to a widow how he agreed with his wife, for he said that her first husband and she could never agree. "By God," quoth the other, "we agree marvelous well." "I pray ye, how so?" "Marry," quoth the other, "I shall tell ye: when I am merry she is merry, and when I am sad she is sad. For when I go out of my doors I am merry to go from her and so is she, and when I come in again I am sad and so is she."

from Anthony Copley, Wits, Fits, and Fancies (1595)

A gallant was brought before a merry Recorder of London[7] for getting a maid with child, and the Recorder said, "It is a marvel (Master N.) that you being a Gentleman of good quality, would venture to get maids with child. The gentleman answered, "Nay, rather were it a marvel if a maid had gotten me with child."

A young master that had wasted a goodly inheritance in a very short space, one said in mockage of him, "Whereas earth useth to consume all other men, this gallant hath consumed earth."

A Gallego[1] of Spain went to the wars, and was shot with an arrow into the head. The surgeon searching the wound said that he could not possibly live, for that the arrow had pierced his brain. The Gallego answered, "That cannot be, for I have no brain at all: had I had brains, I trow[2] I had never come to the wars."

A politician wonted[3] to say, "Who so deceives me once, God forgive him; if twice, God forgive him and God forgive me; but if thrice, God forgive him, but ne'er forgive me."

A lady had an unthrifty son, and she being to take water on a time, and seeing the billows rough, and the wind high, said unto him, "Son, if I drown today, I pray thee play not away my clothes till I be buried."

A cardinal complained unto Pope Clement the Seventh, how one Michaelangelo painted in a picture which he had drawn of Doomsday in St. Peter's chapel in Rome,[4] had therein figured him in hell amongst the damned, beseeching him to bid it be altered to some other favour. Whereunto the Pope answered, "Well you wot,[5] I can release a soul out of Purgatory but not out of Hell."

A bishop sent half a dozen of capons[6] to an abbot, and the bearer eat one of them to his dinner by the way. Now when the abbot had read the bishop's letter, which certified that he had sent him six capons, he then said unto the messenger, "My lad, I pray thee tell my Lord Bishop I humbly thank his Lordship for five capons—and for the sixth, give thou him thanks for it thyself."

A Scot was a preaching how that all men are one another's neighbour and brother in Christ, even the Turk, the Jew, the Moor, the Cannibal, the far Indian, and then concluded, "Yea, and the very Englishman is our neighbour, too."

One in Queen Mary's days that had formerly under King Henry gotten much by the fall of Abbeys,[7] went about to build a chapel—whereupon a gentleman his neighbour said that it was like as if one having first ravished the mother would afterward pay for the nursing of the child.

A Moor walking along the streets of Toledo, passed over a bridge where stood many shops and no housing. Seeing it, he asked a shop boy where his Master lay a-nights, who answered, "At his house in the town," as all the rest besides did. "Oh, foolish people," then replied the Moor, "no wife by day, nor no goods by night."

A kind wife followed her husband to the gallows, and he requesting her not to trouble herself any further, she answered, "Ah yes, dear husband, now that I am come thus far, faith, I'll see you hanged, too, God willing."

from T.D. and G.W., Jests to Make You Merry (1607)

"What a Jest is.":

A Jest is the bubbling up of wit. It is a bavin[8] which being well kindled maintains for a short time the heat of laughter. It is a weapon wherewith a fool does oftentimes fight, and a wise man defends himself by. It is the food of good company, if it be seasoned with judgment; but if with too much tartness, it is hardly digested but turns to quarrel. A jests is tried as powder[1] is, the most sudden is the best. It is a merry gentleman and hath a brother so like him, that many take them for twins: for the one is a jest spoken, the other is a jest done. Stay but the reading of this book but half an hour, and you shall be brought acquainted with both.

A fellow that to be a fool in print had spent the stock of his wits upon ink and paper and made it into a book, offered to sell it at diverse stationers' stalls,[2] but none would buy it. At the length he came to one of the company,[3] and swore to him he should not need to fear to venture money upon it, for it would be an everlasting book. "Oh," says the other, "then I will not meddle with it: everlasting books are ill commodities in our trade—bring me a book that will go away, and I am for you."

An ancient gentlewoman making her brags, that she was descended from John of Gaunt; one that stood by said he thought she was rather descended from William the Conqueror,[4] because her face was so old.

A servingman bringing a capon and white broth to the table, stumbled and let all fall to the ground, for which his master reviled him, and said, "I could have done so much myself." "I think so," quoth the fellow, "any fool may do it, now 'tis done before him."

A woman finding her husband reeling in the streets till he was unable to stand, railed upon him, and said, "Art not thou ashamed to lie like a drunken beast thus in the open streets?" "Thou liest like a sober whore as thou art," quoth he, "If I were a beast I would not lie drunk."

A company of thieves broke one night into a country schoolmaster's house, but he hearing them, never stirred out of his bed for the matter, but cried out aloud, "You mistake your mark, my masters, go to the next house, that's a rich farmer's; I wonder you will lose time to seek any thing here by night, when I myself can find nothing by day."

from Anonymous, A Banquet of Jests (1630)

A horse-stealer was brought to be examined before an Justice, who finding the felony to be most apparent, "Well, friend," saith he, "if thou beest not hanged for this fact, I'll be hanged for thee." "I humbly thank your Worship," replied the thief, "and when the time comes, I desire you that you will not be out of the way."

One making a long and tedious speech to a grave counselor, in the conclusion thereof made an apology to excuse himself for being so troublesome—who gave him this answer: "I assure you, sir, you have not been troublesome to me at all, for all the time that you were speaking, my mind was of another matter."

A gentlewoman suspected to be a Roman Catholic,[5] being brought before a busy Justice in the country, he would not accept of her oath, unless she would publicly call the Pope knave, to whom she answered: "Sir, if it please your Worship, it were great folly and indiscretion in me, to call any man knave whom I never either saw, or knew; but I protest, sir, if I had seen him so often, or known him so well as I do your good worship, I think I might, and with a clear conscience, too, call him knave, and knave again, and with this answer I pray you rest satisfied."

A scholar having married a young wife, and being still at his book, preferring his serious study before dalliance with her, as she was one day wantoning whilst he was reading: "Sir," saith she, "I could wish myself that I had been a book, for then you would be still peering upon me, and should never night nor day be out of your fingers." "So would I, sweetheart," answered he, "so I might choose what book;" to whom she again answered, "And what book would you wish me to be?" "Marry, sweet wife," saith he, "an almanac, for so I might have every year a new one."

A young gentleman having a deaf hostess, used to put many jests upon her, and one day having invited diverse of his friends to dinner, and thinking to make them merry, taketh a glass of wine, and maketh signs to the good old woman that he drank to her, and saith, "Here, Hostess, I will drink to you, and to all your friends, namely the bawds and whores in Turnbull Street";[1] to whom she innocently said, "I thank you, Sir, even with all my heart; I know you remember your mother, your aunt, and those good gentlewomen your sisters."

Jest Biographies

from Anonymous, Merry Tales Made by Master Skelton (1567)

Skelton was an Englishman born as Scoggin[2] was, and he was educated and brought up in Oxford, and there he was made a Poet Laureate. And on a time he had been at Abington to make merry, where that he had eaten salt meats and he did come late home to Oxford, and he did lie in an inn named the Tabard which is now the Angel, and he did drink and went to bed. About midnight he was so thirsty or dry that he was constrained to call to the tapster for drink, and the tapster heard him not. Then he cried to his host and his hostess, and to the ostler[3] for drink, and no man would hear him. "Alack," said Skelton, "I shall perish for lack of drink, what remedy?" At the last he did cry out and said, "Fire, fire, fire!"

Then Skelton heard every man bustle himself upward, and some of them were naked, and some were fast asleep and afraid, and Skelton did cry, "Fire, fire!" still, that every man knew not whether to resort. Skelton did go to bed, and the host and hostess and the tapster, with the ostler, did turn to Skelton's chamber with candles lighted in their hands, saying, "Where, where, where is the fire?" "Here, here, here," said Skelton, and pointed his finger to his mouth, saying, "Fetch me some drink to quench the fire and the heat and the dryness in my mouth." And so they did: wherefore, it is good for every man to help his own self in time of need with some policy or craft, so be it there use no deceit nor faith abused.

Thomas Wolsey, Cardinal and Archbishop of York, had made a regal tomb to lie in after he was dead. And he desired Master Skelton to make for his tomb an epitaph, which is a memorial to show the life with the acts of a noble man. Skelton said, "If it do like your Grace, I cannot make an epitaph unless that I go see your tomb." The cardinal said, "I do pray you to meet with me tomorrow at the west monastery and there shall you see my tomb a-making." The appointment kept, and Skelton, seeing the sumptuous cost, more pertaining for an emperor or a maximus king than for such as man as he was (although cardinals well compare with kings): "Well," said Skelton, "If it shall like your Grace to creep into this tomb while you be alive, I can make an epitaph; for I am sure that when that you be dead you shall never have it." The which was verified of truth.

from Anonymous, Merry and Conceited Jests of George Peele[4] (1607)

George was at Bristol, and there staying somewhat longer than his coin would last him, his palfrey that should be his carrier to London, his head[5] was grown so big that he could not get him out of the stable, it so fortuned at that instant certain players came to town, and lay at that inn where George Peele was: to whom George was well known, being in that time an excellent poet, and had acquaintance of most of the best players in England, from the trivial sort he was but so-so: of which these were, only knew George by name, no otherwise. There was not past three of the company come with the carriage, the rest were behind, by reason of a long journey they had, so that night they could not act, which George hearing had presently a stratagem in his head to get his horse free out of the stable, and money in his purse to bear his charges up to London. And thus it was: he goes directly to the mayor, tells him he was a scholar and a gentleman, and that he had a certain history of the Knights of Rhodes, and withal how Bristol was first founded and by whom, and a brief of all those that before him had succeeded in office in that worshipful city, desiring the mayor that he with his presence and the rest of his brethren would grace his labors. The mayor agreed to it, gave him leave and withal appointed him a place, but for himself he could not be there being in the evening, but bid him make his best benefit he could of the city, and very liberally gave him an Angel, which George thankfully receives. And about his business he goes: got his stage made, his history cried, and hired the players' apparel, to flourish out his show, promising to pay them liberally, and withal desired them they favour him so much as to gather him his money at the door (for he thought it his best course to employ them, lest they should spy out his knavery, for they have perilous heads); they willingly yield to do him any kindness that lies in them, in brief carries their apparel to the hall, placeth themselves at the door, where George in the [mean?] time with the ten shillings he had of the mayor delivered his horse out of purgatory and carries him to the town's end, and there placeth him, to be ready at his coming. By this time the audience were come, and some forty shillings gathered, which money George put in his purse. And putting on one of the players' silk robes, after the trumpet had sounded thrice, out he comes, makes low obeisance, goes forward with his prologue, which was thus:

> A trifling toy, a jest of no account, pardie.[1]
> The Knight perhaps, you think for to be I.
> Think on so still, for why you know that thought is free,
> Sit still a while, I'll send the actors to ye.

Which being said, after some fireworks that he had made of purpose, threw out among them, and downstairs goes, he gets to his horse and so with his forty shillings to London, leaves the players to answer it, who when the jest was known, their innocence excused them, being as well gulled as the mayor and the audience.

from Anonymous, Tarlton's Jests (1613)

How Tarlton[2] played the drunkard before the queen: The queen being discontented, which Tarlton perceiving took upon himself to delight her with some quaint jest. Whereupon he counterfeited a drunkard, and called for beer, which was brought immediately. Her Majesty noting this humour, commanded that he should have no more, "For," quoth she, "he will play the beast, and so shame himself." "Fear not you," quoth Tarlton, "for your beer is small enough." Whereat her Majesty laughed heartily, and commanded that he should have enough.

[1] pardie Indeed; from "by God" in French ("Par Dieu").

[2] Tarlton Richard Tarlton (d. 1588) was the most famous English comic actor of his era.

How Tarlton answered a wanton gentlewoman:

A gentlewoman merrily disposed, being crossed by Tarlton and half angry, said, "Sirrah, a little thing would make me requite you with a cuff." "With a cuff, Lady?" says Tarlton: "So would you spell my sorrow forward; but spell my sorrow backward, then cuff me a spare not." When the gentlemen nearby considered of the word they laughed, and made the simple-meaning gentlewoman to blush for shame.

An excellent jest of Tarlton suddenly spoken:

At the Bull in Bishopsgate was a play of Henry the Fifth, wherein the Judge was to take a box on the ear, and because he was absent that should take the blow, Tarlton himself (ever forward to please) took upon him to play the same judge besides his own part of the clown, and Knell[1] then playing Henry the Fifth, hit Tarlton a sound box indeed, which made the people laugh the more because it was he; but anon the judge goes in, and immediately Tarlton (in his clown's clothes) comes out, and asks the actors, "What news?" "Oh," saith one, "hadst thou been here thou shouldest have seen Prince Henry hit the judge a terrible box on the ear." "What, man," said Tarlton, "strike a judge?" "It is true in faith," said the other. "No other like," said Tarlton, "and it could not be but terrible to the judge, when the report so terrifies me that methinks the blow remains on my cheek, that it burns again." The people laughed at this mightily, and to this day I have heard it commended for rare—but no marvel, for he had many of these. But I would see our clowns in these days do the like: no, I warrant thee, and yet they think well of themselves, too.

from Anonymous, The Life of Long Meg of Westminster (1635)

There was a great suitor to Meg's mistress, called Sir James of Castile, to win her love—but her affection was set on Doctor Skelton,[2] so that Sir James could get no grant of any favour. Whereupon he swore, if he knew who was her paramour, he would run him through with his rapier. The mistress (who had a great delight to be pleasant) made a match between her and Long Meg, that she should go dressed in gentleman's apparel, and with her sword and buckler go and meet Sir James in Saint George's Fields;[3] if she beat him, she should for her labour have a new petticoat. And with that her mistress delivered her a suit of white satin, that was on of the guards that lay at her house. Meg put it on, and took her whinyard[4] by her side, and away she went into Saint George's Fields to meet Sir James. Presently after came Sir James, and found his mistress very melancholy, as women have faces that are fit for all fancies. "What ails you, sweetheart?" quoth he, "tell me: hath any man wronged you? If he hath, be he the proudest champion in London, I'll have him by the ears, and teach him to know Sir James of Castile can chastise whom he list." "Now," quoth she, "shall I know if you love me: a squaring young knave in a white satin doublet hath this day monstrously misused me in words, and I have nobody to revenge it; and in a bravery went out of doors, and bade the proudest champion I had come into Saint George's Fields, and quit my wrong if they durst. Now, Sir James, if ever you loved me, learn the knave to know how he hath wronged me, and I will grant whatsoever you will request at my hands." "Marry, that I will," quoth he, "and for that you may see how I will use the knave, go with me, and Master Doctor Skelton, and be eyewitnesses of my manhood."

"To this they agreed, and all three went into Saint George's Fields, where Long Meg was walking by the windmills. "Yonder," quoth she, "walks the villain that abused me." "Follow me, hostess," quoth Sir James, "I'll go to him." As soon as he drew nigh, Meg began to settle herself, and so did Sir James; but Meg passed on as though she would have gone by. "Nay, sirrah, stay," quoth Sir James, "you and I part not so, we must have a bout ere we pass, for I am this gentlewoman's champion, and flatly for her sake will have you by the ears." Meg replied not a word, but only out with her sword, and to it they went. At the first bout Meg hit him on the hand, and hurt him a little, but endangered him diverse times, and made him give ground, following so hotly that she struck Sir James' weapon out of his hand; then when she saw him disarmed, she stepped within him, and drawing her poinard, swore all the world should not save him. "Oh, save me, Sir," quoth he, "I am a knight, and 'tis but for a woman's matter, spill not my blood." "Wert thou twenty knights," quoth Meg, "and were the King himself here, he should not save thy life, unless you grant me one thing." "Whatsoever it be," quoth Sir James. "Marry," quoth she, "that is, that this night thou wait on my trencher at supper at this woman's house, and when supper is done, then confess me to be thy better at weapon in any ground in England." "I will do it," quoth he, "as I am a true knight." With this they departed, and Sir James went home with his hostess sorrowful and ashamed, swearing that his adversary was the stoutest man in England.

Well, supper was provided, and Sir Thomas More and diverse other gentlemen bidden thither by Skelton's means, to make up the jest: which when Sir James saw invited, he put a good face on the matter, and though to make a slight matter of it, and therefore beforehand told Sir Thomas More what had befallen him, how entering a quarrel of his hostess, he fought with a desperate gentleman of the court, who had foiled him, and given him in charge to wait upon his trencher that night. Sir Thomas More answered Sir James that it was no dishonour to be foiled by [an English] gentleman, as Caesar himself was beaten back by their valor. As thus they were descanting of the valour of Englishmen, in came Meg marching in her man's attire. Even as she entered in at the door: "This, Sir Thomas More," quoth Sir James, "is that English gentleman whose prowess I so highly commend, and to whom in all valour I account myself so inferior." "And sir," quoth she, pulling off her hat and her hair falling about her ears, "be that so hurt him today is none other but Long Meg of Westminster, and so you are all welcome." At this all the company fell in a great laughing, and Sir James was amazed, that a woman should so wap him in a whinyard. Well, he as the rest was fain to laugh at the matter, and all that suppertime to wait on her trencher, who has leave of her mistress that she might be master of the feast; where with a good laughter they made good cheer, Sir James playing the proper page, and Meg sitting in her majesty. Thus was Sir James disgraced for his love, and Meg after counted for a proper woman.

Jests by Elite Writers

from Sir Thomas More, A Dialogue Concerning Heresies[1] (1530)

[A] poor man, quoth [the messenger], had found the priest over familiar with his wife, and because he spoke it abroad[2] and could not prove it, the priest sued him before the Bishops' official for defamation, where the poor man, upon pain of cursing, was commanded that in his parish church he should, upon the Sunday at High Mass time, stand up and say, "Mouth, thou liest." Whereupon, for fulfilling of his penance, up was the poor soul set in a pew that the people might wonder on him and hear what he said. And there all aloud, when he had rehearsed what he had reported by the priest,[3] then he set his hands on his mouth and said, "Mouth, mouth thou liest." And by and by thereupon he set his hand upon both his eyes and said, "But eyes, eyes," quoth he, "by the Mass ye lie not a whit." …

If free will serves for naught and every man's deed is his destiny, why do these men complain upon any man except they will say they do it because it is their destiny to do so? And why will they then be angry with them that punish heretics except they will say because it is their destiny to be so? For if they will hold them to their own sect,[4] and say men do them wrong to burn them for their heresies because it was their destiny to be heretics, they may then be well answered with their own words, as one of their sect was served in a good town in Almaine,[1] who when he had robbed a man and was brought before the judges he could not deny the deed, but he said that it was his destiny to steal, and therefore they might not blame him. They answered him after his own doctrine, that if it were his destiny to steal, and that therefore they must hold him excused, then it was also their own destiny to hang him, and therefore he must as well hold them excused again.

[1] Sir Thomas More … Heresies Many of Sir Thomas More's epigrams, written at various times, are versified jokes. His prose jests, a few of which we offer here, often appear in his anti-Protestant polemics or in works he wrote in the Tower of London while awaiting execution in 1535. The texts, here modernized, may be found in the multi-volume Yale edition of More's works.

This dialogue consists of a conversation between "author" and "messenger." In the second excerpt below, "author" argues that when "pestilent" Lutherans deny free will, Catholics can agree and turn the tables.

[3] when he had … the priest That is, after he had said what the priest told him to say—"mouth, thou liest."

[4] hold them to their own sect I.e., stick to their Lutheran belief in predestination.

from Sir Thomas More, The Confutation of Tyndale's Answer[2] (1532)

And indeed they may call it wedlock and they will as Lollards[3] did of late, who put a pig into the water on Good Friday and said, "Go in pig and come out pike," and so when they had changed the name they took it for fish and ate it.[4] And so many these holy new spiritual men, when monks and friars wed nuns, they may call it wedlock and they will. But as the poor plowman said unto the [innkeeper] that gave him water instead of wine, "God thank, master vintner for your good wine, but in good faith saving for the worshipful name of wine I'd have as lief[5] have drunken water."

from Sir Thomas More, A Dialogue of Comfort Against Tribulation[6] (written in the Tower in 1534)

A carver's wife [confronted by] such a frantic fantasy helped her husband, to whom when he would, upon a Good Friday, needs have killed himself for Christ's sake as Christ was killed for him, she would not in vain plead against his mind,[7] but well and wisely put him in remembrance that if he would die for Christ as Christ did for him, it were then convenient[8] for him to die even in the same fashion, and that it might not be by his own hands, but by the hand of some other, for Christ, perdie,[9] killed not himself. And because her husband [rejected any more persuading] she offered him that for God's sake she would secretly crucify him herself upon a great cross that he had made to nail a new carved crucifix upon; whereof, when he was very glad, yet she bethought her that Christ was bound to a pillar and beaten first, and after crowned with thorns, whereupon when she had by his own assent bound him fast to a post she left not[10] beating, with holy exhortation to suffer so much and so long, that ere she ever left work and unbound him, praying nevertheless that she might put on his head, and drive it well down, a crown of thorn that she had wreathed for him and brought him, he said he thought this was enough for that year—he would pray God forbear him of the remnant[11] till Good Friday came again, but when it came again the next year then was his lust[12] past; he longed to follow Christ no further.

from Thomas Wilson, The Art of Rhetoric (1553) from OF DELIGHTING THE HEARERS, AND STIRRING THEM TO LAUGHTER

Considering the dullness of man's nature, that neither it can be attentive to hear, nor yet stirred to like or allow, any tale long told, except it be refreshed, or find some sweet delight: the learned have by wit and labor devised much variety. Therefore sometimes in telling a weighty matter, they bring in some heavy word, and move them to be right sorry, whereby the hearers are more attentive. But after when they are wearied, either with the tediousness of the matter, or heaviness of the report, some pleasant matter is invented both to quicken them again, and also to keep them from satiety. But surely few there be, that have this gift in due time to cheer men. Neither can any do it whom nature hath not framed, and given an aptness thereunto. Some man's countenance will make pastime, though he speak never a word. Yea, a foolish word, uttered by an apt man, or a gesture strangely used by some pleasant body, sets men full oft upon a laughter. And whereas some think it a trifle to have this gift, and so easy, that every varlet or common jester is able to match with the best, yet it appeareth that they which wittily can be pleasant, and when time serveth can give a merry answer or use a nipping taunt, shall be able to abash a right worthy man, and make him at his wit's end, through the sudden quip and unlooked for gibe given. I have known some so hit of the thumbs,[1] that they could not tell in the world whether it were best to fight, chide, or to go their way. And no marvel: for where the jest is aptly applied, the hearers laugh immediately, and who would gladly be laughed to scorn? …

Now to tell you in plain words what laughter is, how it stirreth and occupieth the whole body, how it altereth the countenance, and suddenly brasteth[2] out, that we cannot keep it in: Let some merry man in God's name take this matter in hand, for it passeth my cunning, and I think even they that can best move laughter would rather laugh merrily when such a question is put forth, then give answer earnestly, what, and how laughter is indeed.

The occasion of laughter, and the mean that maketh us merry, … is the fondness, the filthiness, the deformity, and all such evil behavior, as we see to be in other. For we laugh always at those things which either only or chiefly touch handsomely and wittily some especial fault, or fond behavior in some one body, or some one thing. Sometimes we jest at a man's body that is not well proportioned, and laugh at his countenance if either it be not comely by nature or else he through folly cannot well set it. For if his talk be fond, a merry man can want no matter to hit him home, ye may be assured. Some jest is made, when it toucheth no man at all, neither the demander, neither the standers-by, nor yet any other, and yet delighteth as much the hearers as any the other can do. Now when we would abash a man for some words that he hath spoken, and can take no advantage of his person, or making of his body, we either doubt him at the first, and make him believe that he is no wiser then a goose, or else we confute wholly his sayings with some pleasant jest, or else we extenuate and diminish his doings by some pretty means, or else we cast the like in his dish, and with some other device dash him out of countenance—or last of all, we laugh him to scorn outright, and sometimes speak almost never a word but only in countenance show ourselves pleasant. But howsoever we make sport, either the delight is uttered by countenance, or by pointing to some thing, or else shown at large by some tale, or else occasion taken by some word spoken.…

Now the time requireth to show what kinds there are of moving laughter, and making the hearer to be merry: notwithstanding this would first be learned, that out of diverse pleasant speeches ancient sayings also may be gathered. As for example we may by one word both praise a faithful servant and if he be naught we may also jest of him and dispraise him. According to that merry saying of Nero, upon his man that was light fingered: "I have one at home," quoth he, "among all other, to whom there is no coffer locked, nor door shut in all my house," meaning that he was a picklock,[3] and a false varlet, and yet these words might have been spoken of a faithful servant.

We shall delight the hearers when they look for one answer, and we make them a clean contrary, as though we would not seem to understand what they would have. As when one coming from a fair, and being asked in good sadness of another, how horses went there. "Marry," quoth he, "some trot and some amble." And thus being deceived of our looking (for who would have looked for such an answer?) we are oft delighted with our own error.

Words doubtfully spoken give often just occasion of much laughter. "Ah," quoth a certain man, "do you see yonder fellow, and do you know him?" "Yea," quoth the other, "I know him very well." "I shall tell you sir," said the gentleman, "there is not a man of greater understanding within this city than he is." "Tush, it is not so," quoth he. "No?" said the other, "mark well the bought[1] of his leg, and you shall see his understanding worthy to be compared with the best and greatest of them all." …

The turning of a word, and denying that wherewith we are charged, and answering a much worse, doth often move the hearer. There was one Bassus, as Quintilian[2] doth tell, which seeing a Lady called Domitia to be very nigh herself, spake his pleasure of her. Whereupon she being grieved charged him with these words, that he should say she was such a pinch-penny as would sell her old shoe for money; whereupon he answered, "No, forsooth madam … I said not so, but these were my words: I said you bought old shoes, such as you could get best cheap for money." …

Words rehearsed contrary to that which was spoken, and (as a man would say) overthwartly answered, do much abash the opponent and delight the hearers. As when Sergius Galba[3] being sick, and therefore keeping his house, had appointed certain of his friends to hear a matter of one Libo Scribonius, Tribune of the people, a man much noted for his naughty and unclean life. This Libo said to him in this wise: "Good Lord, when shall we see you sir abroad, out of your parlor?" "Marry," quoth he, "when thou keepest thyself out of another man's chamber," meaning that he was over-familiar with another man's wife. Thus we see how and in what manner pleasant saws are gathered and used, upon the occasion of diverse words spoken.

A friar disposed to tell mysteries, opened to the people that the soul of man was so little that eleven thousand might dance upon the nail of his thumb. One, marveling much at that, "I pray you, Master Friar," quoth he, "Where shall the piper stand then, when such a number shall keep so small a room?"

To dissemble sometimes as though we understood not what one meant declareth an apt wit and much delighteth such as hear it. Diogenes was asked on a time what wine he loved best to drink. "Mary," quoth he, "another man's wine," meaning that he loved that drink best that cost him least. The same Diogenes likewise was asked what one should give him to let him have a blow at his head. "Mary, a helmet," quoth he.

The like [comeback] is of one Nasica, who when he came to the poet Ennius,[4] and asking at the gates if Ennius were at home, the maid of the house, being so commanded by her master, made answer that he was not within. And when he [i.e., Nasica] perceived that she so said by her master's commandment, he went straight his way and said no more. Now shortly after, when Ennius came to Nasica and called for him at the door, Nasica cried out aloud and said, "Sirrah, I am not at home." "What, man," quoth Ennius, "I hear thee speak. Do not I know thy voice?" "Then," quoth Nasica, "Ah shameless man that thou art, when I sought thee at thy home I did believe thy maid when she said thou wast not at home, and wilt not thou believe me when I tell thee mine own that I am not at home?"

Those jests are bitter which have a hid understanding in them, whereof also a man may gather much more than is spoken. A homely[5] fellow made his woeful lamentation to Diogenes[6] in most pitiful sort because his wife had hanged herself upon a fig tree, hoping to find some comfort at his hand. But Diogenes, hearing this strange deed, "For the love of God," quoth he, "Give me some slips of that tree that I might set them in some orchard." The fruit liked [i.e., pleased] him well, and belike he thought that such slips would have been as good to dispatch naughty women as lime twigs are thought mete to catch wild birds with.[7]

But among all other kinds of delight there is none that so much comforteth and gladdeth the hearer as a thing spoken contrary to the expectation of [the] other. Augustus, Emperor of Rome, seeing a handsome young man there, which was much like unto himself in countenance, asked him if ever his mother was in Rome, as though he had been his bastard. "No, forsooth," quoth he, "but my father hath been here very often." With that the Emperor was abashed, as though the Emperor's own mother had been an evil woman of her body.[1]

[7] Give me some … birds with The "catching" suggests that the women will hang themselves: the birds that settle on the twigs covered with sticky lime are caught and killed.

A soldier that thought his estimation[2] stood most in the virtue[3] of his handgun made a marvelous brag of it, and said he was able to shoot level[4] a great deal farther than anyone there would believe him to say truth. Whereupon he called for his man[5] to bear witness of the same, and asked him whether it were so or not. "Indeed," quoth his man, "You say truth; but then you must remember, sir, you had the wind with you when you shot so far." Belike he thought there would never come such a wind[6] again.

from Baldassare Castiglione, translated by Thomas Hoby, The Courtier of Count Baldessar Castilio[7] (1561)

After they had ceased laughing, the Lady Emilia[8] said, "Leave now making us laugh with practicing of jests, and teach us how we should use them, and whence they are derived, and whatever else ye know in this matter. And for losing any more time begin out of hand." … Then M. Bernarde turning to the Duchess[9] and to the Lady Emilia: "I will not refuse this labor," quoth he, "although I be wont to marvel at the boldness of them that dare take upon them to sing to the lute, when our James Sansecondo[10] standeth by, even so ought not I in the presence of hearers that have much better understanding in that I have to say, than I myself, take upon me to entreat of jests." …

"He is a living creature that can laugh: because this laughing is perceived only in man, and (in manner) always is a token of a certain jocundness and merry mood that he feeleth inwardly to his mind, which by nature is drawn to pleasantness and coveteth quietness and refreshing, for which cause we see men have invented many matters, as sports, games, and pastimes, and so many sundry sorts of open shows. And because we bear good will to such as are the occasion of this recreation of ours, the manner was among the kings of old time, among the Romans, the Athenians and many others, to get the good will of the people withal, and to feed the eyes and minds of the multitude, to make great theaters, and other public buildings, and there to show new devices of pastimes, running of horses and chariots, fightings of men together, strange beasts, comedies, tragedies, and dances of the antic. Neither did the grave philosophers shun these sights, for many times both in this manner and at banquets they refreshed their wearisome minds, in those high discourses and divine imaginations of theirs. The which in likewise all sorts of men are willing to do, for not only ploughmen, mariners, and all such as are inured with hard and boisterous exercises with hand, but also holy religious men and prisoners that from hour to hour wait for death, go about yet to seek some remedy and medicine to refresh themselves. Whatsoever therefore causeth laughter, the same maketh the mind jocund and giveth pleasure, nor suffereth a man in that instant to mind the troublesome griefs that our life is full of. Therefore, as you see, laughing is very acceptable to all men, and he is much to be commended that can cause it in due time and after a comely sort." …

[1] evil woman of her body I.e., had committed adultery; another old story; perhaps Wilson found it in Macrobius's Saturnalia (4th century CE), which retells many jokes.

[2] estimation I.e., reputation.

[3] virtue I.e., power, capacity.

[4] shoot level I.e., in a straight line, directly.

[5] his man I.e., his manservant.

[6] wind Few of Wilson's readers would doubt that this "wind" came from the shooter's boastful mouth—or from his other end.

[7] The Courtier … Castilio The text is structured as a multi-day conversation among aristocratic men and women who have gathered at the Court of Urbino, where they debate with each other about which talents and attributes make the most perfect courtier.

[8] Lady Emilia Emila Oia, widow of the Duke of Urbino's half-brother.

[9] M. Bernarde Bernardo Dovizi (1470–1520), Italian cardinal and author; the Duchess Elisabetta Gonzaga, Duchess of Urbino (1471–1526), host of the meeting.

"Do you not remember how well the Lord General[1] said the last day, when Johnthomas Galeotto wondered at one that demanded two hundred ducats for a horse? For when Johnthomas said that he was not worth a farthing, because among other ill properties he had, he could not abide weapons, neither was it possible to make him come nigh where he saw any, the Lord General said (willing to reprehend him of cowardice): 'If the horse hath this property that he cannot abide weapons, I marvel he asketh not a thousand ducats.' Also sometime a man speaketh the very same word, but to another end than the common use is. As, when the Duke was passing over a very swift river, he said to the trumpeter, 'Go on.' The trumpeter turned him back with his cap in his hand and after a reverent manner said, 'It shall be yours,[2] my lord.' It is also a pleasant manner of jesting when a man seemeth to take the words and not the meaning of him that speaketh. … M. James Sadoleto said unto Beroaldo,[3] that had told him how he would in any wise go to Bologna, 'What is the cause that maketh you thus to leave Rome where there are so many pleasures, and go to Bologna, full of disquietness?' Beroaldo answered, 'I am forced to go to Bologna for three counts.' And now he had lifted up three fingers of his left hand to allege three causes of his going, when M. James suddenly interrupted him and said, 'The three counts that make you go to Bologna are Count Lewis da San Bonafacio, Count Hercules Rangon, and the Count of Pepoli.' Then they all laughed because these three Counts had been Beroaldo's scholars and were proper young men and applied their study in Bologna. This kind of merry jesting therefore maketh a man laugh much, because it bringeth with it other manner [of] answers than a man looketh for to hear; and our own error doth naturally delight us in these matters, which when it deceiveth us of that we look for, we laugh at it." …

"Although all kind of jests move a man to laugh, yet do they also in this laughter make diverse effects. For some have in them a certain cleanness and modest pleasantness. Other bite sometime privily, otherwhile openly. Other have in them a certain wantonness. Other make one laugh as soon as he heareth them. Other the more a man thinketh upon them. Other in laughing make a man blush withal. Other stir a man somewhat to anger. But in all kinds a man must consider the disposition of the minds of the hearers, because unto persons in adversity oftentimes augment their affliction; and some infirmities there be that the more a man occupieth medicine about them the worse they wax. In case therefore the Courtier in jesting and speaking merry conceits have a respect to the time, to the persons, to his degree, and not use it too often … he may be called pleasant and feat conceited [ingenious]. So he be heedful also that be not so bitter and biting, that a man might conjecture he were an envious person in pricking without a cause, or for plain malice, or men of too great authority (which is lack of discretion) or of too much misery (which is cruelty) or too mischievous (which is vanity) or else in speaking matters that may offend them whom he would not offend (which is ignorance). For some there be that think they are bound to speak and to nip without regard, as often as they can, however the matter go afterwards. And among these kind of persons are they that to speak a word which should seem to come of a readiness of wit, pass not for staining of a worthy gentlewoman's honesty, which is a very naughty matter and worth sore punishment. Because in this point women are in the number of seely souls and persons in misery, and therefore deserve not to be nipped in it, for they have not weapon to defend themselves. But besides these respects he that will be pleasant and full of jesting, must be shaped of a certain nature apt to all kind of pleasantness, and unto that frame his fashions, gestures, and countenance, the which the more grave, steady, and set it is, so much the more maketh it the matters spoken to seem witty and subtle."

from Francis Bacon, Apophthegmes New and Old (1625)

Julius Caesar did write a collection of Apophthegmes, as appears in an epistle of Cicero.[1] I need say no more for the worth of a writing of that nature. It is pity his book is lost, for I imagine they were collected with judgment and choice; whereas that of Plutarch and Stobeus[2] and much more, the modern ones, draw much of the dregs. Certainly they are of excellent use, they are mucrones verborum, pointed speeches. Cicero prettily calls them Salinas, salt pits, that you may extract salt out of, and sprinkle it where you will. They serve to be interlaced in continued speech. They serve to be recited upon occasion of themselves. They serve if you take the kernel out of them and make them your own. I have for my recreation, in my sickness, fanned the old—not omitting any because they are vulgar (for many vulgar ones are excellent good), nor for the meanness of the person, but because they are dull and flat—and added many new, that otherwise would have died.

Henry the fourth of France, his queen was great with child. Count Soissons, that had his expectation upon the crown, when it was twice or thrice thought that the queen was with child before, said to some of his friends, that it was just a pillow. This had some ways come to the King's ear, who kept it till when the queen waxed great; called to the Count of Soissons to him, and said, laying his hand upon the queen's belly, "Come, cousin: it is no pillow." "Yes, Sir," answered the Count of Soissons, "it is a pillow for all of France to sleep upon."

Pace, the bitter fool, was not suffered to come at the Queen because of his bitter humor. Yet at one time some persuaded the Queen that he should come to her, undertaking for him that he should keep compass. So he was brought to her, and the Queen said, "Come on, Pace, now we shall hear of our faults." Saith Pace, "I do not use to talk of that that all the town talks of."

Sir Thomas More,[3] the day he was beheaded, had a barber sent to him, because his hair was long, which was thought would make him more commiserable with the people. The barber came to him and asked him whether he would be pleased to be trimmed. "In good faith, honest fellow," said Sir Thomas, "the King and I have a suit for my head, and till the title be cleared I will do no cost upon it."

There was a young man in Rome, that was very like Augustus Caesar. Augustus took knowledge of it, and sent for the man, and asked him, "Was your mother never at Rome?" He answered, "No, sir, but my father was."

There was a merchant far in debt that died. His goods and household stuff were set forth to sale. There was one that bought only a pillow, and said, "This pillow sure is good to sleep upon, since he could sleep that owed so many debts."

There was an Epicurean vaunted that diverse other sects of philosophers did after turn Epicureans, but there was never any Epicurean that turned to any other sect. Whereupon a philosopher that was of another sect said the reason was plain, for that cocks may be made capons, but capons could never be made cocks.

from Thomas Nash, Quaternio, or A Fourfold Way to a Happy Life (London, 1633)

And Luscinius[4] hath a tale of a fool who by his fooling did his Master more good than all the Physicians could do with their skill and cunning; and this it was: there was a great rich man that lived in Utopia, who was much troubled with the wind cholic,[5]

Cicero Roman politician and orator, Marcus Tullius Cicero (106 BCE–43 BCE).

[2] Plutarch Greek historian (46 CE–120 CE); Stobeus Johannes Stobaeus (fl. 5th century CE), Greek compiler of extracts from ancient Greek authors.

[3] Sir Thomas More Humanist scholar and Lord Chancellor of England, beheaded in 1535 by Henry VIII for refusing to swear an oath acknowledging Henry as head of the Church of England.

[4] Luscinius Ottmar Luscinius, humanist author of Mensa Philosophica (Cologne, 1500?); Thomas More borrowed some of his epigrams from these jests, which may be why Nash sets his scene in Utopia. The Latin in these is translated by Dr. Lydia K. Lake. Note that this Nash (1588–1648) is a different person from the better-known Elizabethan writer Thomas Nashe (1567–1601).

[5] wind cholic I.e., bilious gas trapped in his intestines; colic.

and his daily prayer was, pro Crepitu ventris,[1] to have the wind to be loosed out of his belly; but finding no ease for a long time, and despairing of health, he changed his ditty, and prayed pro regno Caelesti,[2] that God would give him the Kingdome of Heaven. Which his fool hearing, burst out into a great laughter; and when the standers by reproved him for it, and demanded of him why he was so merry, his master being so sick, [he] answered: to think that his Master should be so very a fool as to think that God would give him a Kingdome that denied him so small a matter as a fart. Which when his Master heard to proceed from his fool [he] fell into such a laughter that shook his entrails that he vented forth a little wind; insomuch that the Physician gave out that the venting of that wind was worth a hundred pounds;[3] which the fool hearing he like Boreas[4] blew at his postern cum ingenti sonitu, and to use Chaucer's words let fly a fart as great as if it had been a thunder dent,[5] and demanded of the physician what that was worth, that so far surpassed his Master's;[6] which the Master hearing still to proceed from the fool fell into a second laughter, and vented so much wind that he became a sound and perfect man. So that Morio [Fool] cured his Master, whereas Medicus [Doctor] could not.[7] I shall need no other apology for this my Quaternio, or more truly my Moria.[8] If any man shall rip up[9] those merry gigs which Sir Thomas More made in his youth for his recreation … and say;

He that hath left his hosiers trade, and falleth to maken shun:[10]

The smith that shall to painting fall, his thrift is well me done.

When a hatter shall go smatter in philosophy,
Or a peddler wax a meddler in theology:
A man of law that never saw the ways to buy and sell;
Weening[11] to rise by merchandise, I pray God speed him well.

The Mad-Merry Pranks of Robin Good-fellow (To the Tune of Dulcina[12]), c. 1601–40

From Oberon in Fairy Land,
the king of ghosts and shadows there
Mad Robin I at his command, am sent to view the night-sports here:
what revel rout
is kept about,
In every corner where I go,
I will o'ersee,
and merry be,
And make good sport with, ho ho ho.

More swift then lightning can I fly,
and round about this air welkin° soon, sky
And in a minutes space descry each thing that's done beneath the moon
there's not a hag,
nor ghost shall wag,
Nor cry goblin where I do go,
but Robin I,
their feats will spy,
And fear° them home with, "ho ho ho." scare

[1] pro Crepitu ventris Latin: for rumbling in his belly.

[2] pro regno Caelesti Latin: for the heavenly kingdom.

[3] [Nash's note] "Hunc flatum centum crede valere minas" ("Believe that this fart is worth a hundred minae" [the mina was an ancient Greek currency]).

[4] Boreas The northern wind.

[5] cum ingenti sonitu Latin: with a huge noise; thunder dent Thunder clap; in Chaucer's Miller's Tale, "This Nicholas anon leet fle a fart, / As greet as it had been a thonder-dent."

[6] [Nash's note] "Et tantillus (ait) si fit (te judice) tanti; / Num poterit tantus mille valere libras? / In artem medicorum jocus amarulentus." ["And, he says, if such a small one should be (in your judgment) worth so much, couldn't a big one be worth a thousand pounds? A bitter joke on the medical art."]

[7] [Nash's note] "Quid admiraris opem medicorum, / Si pretiosa magis podice pauper habes?" ["Why admire what doctors can do if you, a poor man, have more valuable stuff thanks to your anus?"]

[8] Moria I.e., "my Folly," recalling Erasmus's Encomium Moriae ("Praise of Folly").

[9] rip up Search and compare.

[10] falleth to maken shun Unclear, but probably the old plural for "shoes," playing on "falleth" from hose to shoes.

[11] Weening Believing, expecting.

[12] Dulcina Presumably, a popular tune of the time.

If any wanderers I meet,
that from their night sports do trudge home
With counterfeiting voice I greet,
and cause them on with me to roam;
through woods, through lakes,
through bogs, through brakes,
O'er bush and brier with them I go,
I call upon them to come on,
And went me laughing, ho ho ho.

Sometimes I meet them like a man,
sometimes an ox, sometimes a hound,
And to a horse I turn me can,
to trip and trot about them round;
but if to ride,
my back they stride,
More swift then wind away I go,
o'er hedge, and lands,
through pools and ponds,
I whirry,° laughing, "ho ho ho." whinny

When lads and lasses merry be,
with possets and with junkets° fine, milk-based desserts
Unseen of all the company,
I eat their cakes and sip the wine,
and to make sport,
I fart and snort,
And out the candles I do blow,
the maids I kiss,
they shriek, "who's this?"
I answer nought but, "ho ho ho."

Yet now and then the maids to please,
I card at midnight up their wool,
And while they sleep, snort, fart, and sneeze,
with wheel to thread their flax I pull,
I grind at mill
their malt up still,
I dress their hemp, I spin their tow,
if any awake
and would me take,
I wend me laughing, ho ho ho.

The second Part, to the same Tune.

When house or hearth doth sluttish lie,
I pinch the maids there black and blue
And from the bed the bedclothes I pull off and lay them naked to view:
twixt sleep and wake
I do them take,
And on the keep cold floor them throw,
if out they cry,
then forth fly I,
And loudly laugh, "ho ho ho."

When any need to borrow ought,
we lend them what they do require,
And for the use demand we nought,
our own is all we do desire;
if to repay
they do delay,
Abroad amongst them then I go,
and night by night,
I them affright,
With pinching, dreams, and ho ho ho.

When lazy queans° have nought to do, prostitutes
but study how to cog° and lie, flatter
To make debate and mischief too,
twixt one another secretly:
I mark their glose° gloss (i.e., lie)
and do disclose
To them that I had wronged so,
when I have done,
I get me gone,
And leave them scolding, ho ho ho.

When men do traps and engines set,
in loopholes where the vermin creep,
That from their folds and houses set,
their ducks and geese, their lambs and sheep
I spy the gin,° trap
and enter in,
And seems a vermin taken so,
but when they there
approach me near,
I leap out laughing, "ho ho ho."

The ſecond part, To the ſame tune.

When houſe or harth doth ſluttiſh lie,

in loope-holes where the vermine creepe,
That from their foulds and houſes ſet their ducks and geeſe, their lambs and ſheepe,
I ſpy the gin
And enter in,
And ſeemes a vermin taken ſo
But when they there

I leape out laughing ho ho ho.

By Wels and Gils in meddowes greene
we nightly dance our heyday guiſe,
And to our fairy king and queene
we chant our moone-light harmonies
When larkes gin ſing
Away we fling
And babes new borne ſteale as we goe,
An elfe in bed
We leave in ſtead,
And wend us laughing ho ho ho.

From Hag-bred Merlins time have I
thus nightly reveld to and fro:
And for my pranks men call me by the name of Robin Good-fellow:
Fiends, ghoſts, and ſprites
That haunt the nights,
The Hags and Goblins doe me know,
And Beldams old
My feats have told,
So Vale, Vale, ho ho ho.

London, Printed for H. G.

Pages from "The mad-merry prankes of Robbin Good-fellow" (early seventeenth century).

By wells and giles in meadow green,
we nightly dance our heyday guise,
And to our fairy king and queen,
we chant our moonlight harmonies:
when larks 'gin sing,
away we fling,
And babes newborn steal as we go,
an elf in bed
we leave instead,
And wend us laughing, "ho ho ho."

From hay-bred Merlin's time have I,
thus mighty reveled to and fro,
And for my pranks men call me by the name of Robin Good-fellow.
Friends, ghosts, and sprites,
that haunt the nights,
The hags and goblins do me know,
and beldams° old, witches
my feats have told,
So Vale,[1] Vale, ho ho ho.

The Cucking of a Scold (To the Tune of The Merchant of Emden[1]), c. 1630

A wedded wife there was,
I wis° of years but young, I know
But if you think she wanted wit,
I'll swear she lacked no tongue.
Just seventeen years of age,
This women was no more,
Yet she would scold with anyone,
From twenty to threescore.
The cucking[2] of a scold,
The cucking of a scold,
Which if you will but stay to hear
The cucking of a scold.

As nimble as an eel,
This woman's tongue did wag,
And faster you shall have it run,
Than any ambling nag.
But without mighty wrong,
She would not show her skill.
But if that she were moved° once provoked
The sport was not so ill.
The cucking, etc.

Each man might quickly know
When as the game begun
But none could tell you for his life,
What time she would have done.
She was a famous scold,
A dainty° scold in grain,° excellent / inherently
A stouter scold was never bred
Nor born in Turnagain Lane.[3]
The cucking, etc.

Upon a time it chanced,
And she did thus allege,
A neighbour's maid had taken half
Her dishcloth from the hedge:
For which great trespass done,
This wrong for to requite,
She scolded very handsomely,
Two days and one whole night.
The cucking, etc.

Which something did molest° bother
The neighbours round about:
But this was nothing to the fits
That she would thunder out.
But once, the truth to tell,
Worse scolding did she keep,
For waking of her little dog,
That in the sun did sleep.
The cucking, etc.

Six winter days together,
From morning eight o'clock,
Until the evening that each one
Their doors began to lock:
She scolded for this wrong,
Which she accounted great,
And unto peace and quietness
No man could her entreat.
The cucking, etc.

So that this little devil,
With her unquiet tongue,
Continually both far and near
Molested old and young.
But yet soon after this
She made a greater brawl,
Against the constable, that did but piss against her wall.
The cucking, etc.

She called him beastly knave
And filthy Jack for this,
And said that every cuckold[4] now
Against her wall must piss:
And in most raging sort,
She railed at him so long.
He made a vow he would revenge
This most outrageous wrong.
The cucking, etc.

[1] The Merchant of Emden Presumably, a popular tune of the time.

[2] cucking As the ballad will illustrate, punishing somebody by tying the victim to a cucking-stool and repeatedly ducking her or him in a pond or river.

[3] Turnagain Lane London street notorious for its scolding fishwives.

[4] cuckold Man with an unfaithful wife.

And first of all behold,
He clapped her in the cage,
Thinking thereby her devilish tongue,
He would full well assuage.
But now worse then before,
She did to brawling fall.
The constable and all the rest
She vilely did miscall.
The cucking, etc.

Thus night and day she sent
Such brawling from her dressed,
That ne'er a neighbour in the town
Could take one hour's rest.
Which when the Justice knew,
This judgment then gave he,
That she upon a cucking stool
Should justly punished be.
The cucking, etc.

Upon three market days,
This penance she should bide,
And every thing fit for the same.
The officers did provide:
An hundred archers good,
Did first before her go,
A hundred and five nimble shot
Went next unto the row.
The cucking, etc.

An hundred armed men
Did also follow there:
The which did guard the gallant scold
With piercing pikes and spears:
And trumpets sounding sweet
In order with them comes
A company most orderly,
With pleasant fifes and drums.
The cucking, etc.

And forty parrots then
On sundry perches high,
Were carried eke° before the scold, also
Most fine and orderly
And last of all a mighty wisp° sign
Was borne before her face.
The perfect tokens of a scold
Well known in every place.
The cucking, etc.

Then was the scold herself
In a wheelbarrow brought.
Stripped naked to the smock
As in that case she ought:
Neats' tongues° about her neck cows' tongues
Were hung in open show;
And thus unto the cucking stool
This famous scold did go.
The cucking, etc.

Then fast within the chair
She was most finely bound,
Which made her scold excessively,
And said she should be drowned.
But every time that she
Was in the water dipped,
The drums and trumpets sounded brave[1]
For joy the people skipped.
The cucking, etc.

Six times when she was ducked
Within the water clear.
That like unto a drowned rat,
She did in sight appear.
The justice thinking then
To send her straight away,
The constable she called knave,
And knaved him all the day.
The cucking etc.

Upon which words, I wot,° know
They ducked her straight again
A dozen times o'er head and ears:
Yet she would not refrain,
But still reviled them all.
Then to't again they go,
Till she at last held up her hands,
Saying, "I'll no more do so."
The cucking etc.

---

[1] sounded brave Made a clamorous noise.

Then was she brought away,
And after for her life,° for all her life
She never durst begin to scold
With either man or wife.
And if that every scold
Might have so good a diet,° remedy
Then should their neighbours every day
Be sure to live in quiet,
The cucking of a scold,
The cucking of a scold
Which if you will but stay to hear
The cucking of a scold.

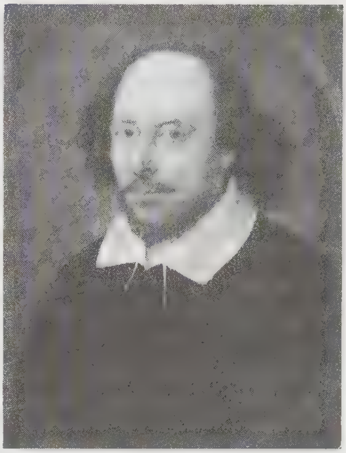
WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE

1564 – 1616



The plays of Shakespeare are foundational works of Western culture; in the English-speaking world they have influenced subsequent literary culture more broadly and more deeply than any other group of texts except the books of the Bible. The language and imagery of the plays; their ways of telling stories; their innovative dramatic qualities; the characters that populate them (and the ways in which these characters are created); the issues and ideas the plays explore (and the ways in which they explore them)—all these have powerfully shaped English literature and culture over the past four centuries. And this shaping influence has continually touched popular culture as well as more "elevated" literary and academic worlds. From the eighteenth century on Shakespeare's plays have held the stage with far greater frequency than those of any other playwright, and in the twentieth century many have been made into popular films (some of the best of which are films in Japanese and in Russian). Even outside the English-speaking world the plays of Shakespeare receive unparalleled exposure; in the Netherlands, for example, his plays have been performed in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries more than twice as often as those of any other playwright. In 2000 he headed the list both on the BBC "person of the millennium" poll and on the World Almanac's poll listing the 10 "most influential people of the second millennium." The fact that a playwright, a member of the popular entertainment industry, has continued to enjoy this kind of cultural status—ranked above the likes of Newton, Churchill, Galileo, and Einstein—is worth pausing over. Why are these plays still performed, read, watched, filmed, studied, and appropriated four centuries after they were written? What is the source of his ongoing cultural currency?

There are many ways to answer this question. One is surely that the plays tell great stories. Fundamental, psychologically sophisticated stories, about love, death, growing up, families, communities, guilt, revenge, jealousy, order and disorder, self-knowledge and identity. Another, just as surely, is that they tell them with extraordinary verbal facility in almost all respects: Shakespeare is generally regarded as unsurpassed in his choice of individual words and his inventiveness in conjuring up striking images; in his structuring of the rhythm of poetic lines; in balancing sentences rhetorically; in shaping long speeches; and in crafting sparkling dialogue. A third is that the characters within the stories are uniquely engaging and memorable. In large part this can be attributed to Shakespeare's ingenuity: within the English literary tradition he more or less invented the psychologically realistic literary character; within the European literary tradition he more or less also invented the strong, independent female character. The bare bones of his characters are typically provided by other sources, but the flesh and blood is of Shakespeare's making. Fourth, and perhaps most important of all, Shakespeare's plays tell their stories in ways that are open-ended emotionally and intellectually: no matter how neatly the threads of story may be knitted together at the end, the threads of idea and of emotion in Shakespeare's plays are never tied off. It is this openness of the plays, their availability for reinterpretation, that enables them to be endlessly re-staged, rewritten, re-interpreted—and to yield fresh ideas and fresh feelings time and time again.

Given the centrality of Shakespeare to Western culture, the wish of many readers to know far more than we do about his life is understandable. In fact we do know a fair amount about the facts of his life—given late sixteenth- and early seventeenth-century norms, perhaps more than we might expect to know of someone of his class and background. But we know a good deal less of Shakespeare than we do of some other leading writers of his era—Ben Jonson, for example, or John Donne. And, perhaps most frustrating of all, we know almost nothing of an intimate or personal nature about Shakespeare.

Shakespeare (whose surname also appears on various documents as Shakespear, Shakspere, Shaxpere, and Shagspere) was baptized in Stratford-upon-Avon on 26 April 1564. Reasonable conjecture, given the customs of the time, suggests that he was born two-to-four days earlier; the date that has been most frequently advanced is 23 April (the same day of the year on which he died in 1616, and also the day on which St. George, England's patron saint, is traditionally honored). His father, John, was a glove-maker and also a local politician: first an alderman and then bailiff, a position equivalent to mayor. Some scholars have argued that he had remained a Catholic in newly-Protestant England, and that Shakespeare thus grew up in a clandestinely Catholic home; though the evidence for this is suggestive, it is not conclusive. (If Shakespeare had grown up Catholic, that background might lead readers to see some of his history plays in a different perspective, and might lend even greater poignancy to images such as that of the "bare ruined choirs" of Sonnet 73, with its suggestion of the destruction of the monasteries destroyed by Henry VIII following the break with Rome.)

Stratford-upon-Avon had a good grammar school, which is generally presumed to have provided William's early education, though no records exist to confirm this. Not surprisingly, he did not go on to university, which at the time would have been unusual for a person from the middle class. (Even Ben Jonson, one of the finest classicists of the period, did not attend university.) Shakespeare's first exposure to theater was probably through the troupes of traveling players that regularly toured the country at that time.

On 28 November 1562, when Shakespeare was eighteen, he was married to Anne Hathaway, who was eight years his senior. Six months later, in May of 1583, Anne gave birth to their first daughter, Susanna; given the timing, it seems reasonable to speculate that an unexpected pregnancy may have prompted a sudden marriage. In February 1585, twins, named Hamnet (Shakespeare's only son, who was to die at the age of eleven) and Judith, were born. Some time later, probably within the next three years, Shakespeare moved to London, leaving his young family behind. There has been considerable speculation as to his reasons for leaving Stratford-upon Avon, but no solid evidence has been found to support any of the numerous theories. Certainly London was then (as now) a magnet for ambitious young men, and in the late 1580s it was effectively the only English city conducive to the pursuit of a career as a writer or in the theater.

It is not known exactly when Shakespeare joined the professional theater in London, but by 1592 several of his plays had reached the stage–the three parts of Henry VI, probably The Comedy of Errors and Titus Andronicus, possibly others. The earliest extant mention of him in print occurs in 1592: a sarcastic jibe by an embittered older playwright, Robert Greene. Greene calls Shakespeare "an upstart crow beautified with our feathers," probably referring to Shakespeare's work on the series of Henry VI plays, which may well have involved the revision of material by other writers who had originally worked on the play. In any case, from 1594 on, Will Shakespeare is listed as a member of the company called The Lord Chamberlain's Men (later called The King's Men, when James I became their patron).

Professional theater in London did not become firmly established until 1576, when the first permanent playhouses opened. By the late 1580s four theaters were in operation—an unprecedented level of activity, and one that in all probability helped to nurture greater sophistication on the part of audiences. Certainly it was a hothouse that nurtured an extraordinary growth of theatrical agility on the part of Elizabethan playwrights. Shakespeare, as both playwright and actor in The Lord Chamberlain's Men, was afforded opportunities of forging, testing and reworking his written work in the heat of rehearsals and performances—opportunities that were not open to other playwrights.[1] And in Christopher Marlowe he had a rival playwright of a most extraordinary sort. It seems safe to conjecture that the two learned a good deal about play construction from each other. In the late 1580s and early 1590s they both adopt virtually simultaneously the practice of having their characters express their intentions in advance of the unfolding action, thereby encouraging the formation of audience expectations; they also begin to make it a practice to interpose some other action between the exit and the re-entry of any character, thereby further fostering the creation of a sense of temporal and spatial illusion of a sort quite new to the English stage.

In his early years in London Shakespeare also established himself as a non-dramatic poet—and sought aristocratic patronage in doing so. In the late sixteenth century the writing of poetry was accorded considerable respect, the writing of plays a good deal less. It was conventional for those not of aristocratic birth themselves to seek a patron for their writing—as Shakespeare evidently did with the Earl of Southampton, a young noble to whom he dedicated two substantial poems of mythological narrative, Venus and Adonis (1593) and The Rape of Lucrece (1594). (It is a measure of the enormity of Shakespeare's achievement that these poems, which would be regarded as major works of almost any other writer of the period, are an afterthought in most considerations of Shakespeare's work.) Before the end of the century Shakespeare was also circulating his sonnets, as we know from the praise of Francis Meres, who wrote in 1598 that the "sweet, witty soul" of the classical poet of love, Ovid, "lives in mellifluous and honey-tongued Shakespeare, witness his Venus and Adonis, his Lucrece, his sugared sonnets among his private friends, etc." Such circulation among "private friends" was common practice at the time, and was not necessarily followed by publication. When Shakespeare's sonnets were finally published, in 1609, the dedication was from the printer rather than the author, suggesting that Shakespeare may not have authorized their publication.

There are thirty-eight extant plays by Shakespeare (if Two Noble Kinsmen is included in the total). Unlike most other playwrights of the age, he wrote in every major dramatic genre. His history plays (most of them written in the 1590s) include Richard III, Henry IV, Part 1 and Part 2, and Henry V. He wrote comedies throughout his playwriting years; the succession of comedies that date from the years 1595–1601, including Much Ado About Nothing, As You Like It and Twelfth Night, may represent his most successful work in this genre, though some have argued that The Merchant of Venice (c. 1596) and the "dark comedies" which date from between 1601 and 1604 (including All's Well That Ends Well and Measure for Measure) resonate even more deeply. The period of the "dark comedies" substantially overlaps with the period in which Shakespeare wrote a succession of great tragedies. Hamlet may have been written as early as 1598–99, but Othello, King Lear, and Macbeth were written in succession between 1601 and1606. Several of his last plays are romance-comedies—notably Cymbeline, The Winter's Tale and The Tempest (all of which date from the period 1608–11).

Shakespeare was a shareholder in The Lord Chamberlain's Men, and it was in that capacity rather than as a playwright or actor that he made a good deal of money. There was at the time no equivalent to modern laws of copyright, or to modern conventions of payment to the authors of published works. Nineteen of Shakespeare's plays were printed individually during Shakespeare's lifetime, but it is clear that many of these publications did not secure his co-operation. It has often been hypothesized that some of the printers of the most obviously defective texts (referred to by scholars as "bad quartos") are pirated editions dictated from memory to publishers by actors; there is some evidence to support this theory, though even if correct it leaves many textual issues unresolved.

[1] From the nineteenth century onwards (though, perhaps tellingly, never before that), the suggestion has occasionally been put forward that Shakespeare never wrote the plays attributed to him, and that someone else–perhaps Francis Bacon, perhaps Edward de Vere, 17th Earl of Oxford–was actually the author. These conspiracy theories have sometimes gained popular currency, but scholars have never found any reason whatsoever to credit any of them. One of the many reasons such theories lack credibility follows from our sure knowledge that Shakespeare was an actor in many of the plays that bear his name as author. If Shakespeare had not written the plays himself it would surely have been impossibly difficult to conceal that fact from all the members of the rest of the company, in rehearsal as well as in performance, over the course of many, many years.

The first publication of Shakespeare's collected works did not occur until 1623, several years after his death, when two of his fellow actors, John Heminges and Henry Condell, arranged to have printed the First Folio, a carefully prepared volume (by the standards of the time) that included thirty-six of Shakespeare's plays. Eighteen of these were appearing for the first time, and four others for the first time in a reliable edition. (Two Noble Kinsmen, which was written in collaboration with a younger playwright, John Fletcher, and Pericles, of which it appears Shakespeare was not the sole author, were both excluded, although the editors did include Henry VIII, which is now generally believed to have been another work in which Fletcher had a hand.)

A vital characteristic of Shakespeare's plays is their extraordinary richness of language. After several centuries of forging a new tongue out of its polyglot sources, the English language in the sixteenth century had entered a period of steady growth in its range, as vocabulary expanded to meet the needs of an increasingly complex society. Yet its structure over this same time (no doubt in connection with the spread of print culture) was becoming increasingly stable. When we compare the enormous difference between the language of Chaucer, who was writing in the late fourteenth century, and that of Shakespeare, writing in the late sixteenth century, it is remarkable to see how greatly the language changed over those two centuries—considerably more than it has changed in the four centuries from Shakespeare's time to our own. English was still effectively a new language in his time, with immense and largely unexplored possibilities for conveying subtleties of meaning. More than any other, Shakespeare embarked on that exploration; his reading was clearly very wide,[1] as was his working vocabulary. But he expanded the language as well as absorbing it; a surprising number of the words Shakespeare used are first recorded as having been used in his work.

The popular image of Shakespeare's last few years is that first expressed by Nicholas Rowe in 1709:

> The latter part of his life was spent, as all men of good sense wish theirs may be, in ease, retirement, and the conversation of his friends. He had the good fortune to gather together an estate equal to his occasion, and, in that, to his wish; and is said to have spent some years before his death at his native Stratford.

We know for a fact that around 1610 Shakespeare moved from London to Stratford, where his family had continued to live throughout the years he had spent in London, and the move has often been referred to as a "retirement." Shakespeare did not immediately give up playwriting, however: The Tempest (1611), Henry VIII (c. 1612) and Two Noble Kinsmen (c. 1613) all date from after his move to Stratford. By the time he left London Shakespeare was indeed a relatively wealthy man, with substantial investments both in real estate and in the tithes of the town (an arrangement that would be comparable to buying government bonds today).

[1] In his early years in London Shakespeare may well have acquired much of his reading material from Richard Field, a man from Stratford-upon-Avon of about Shakespeare's age who was in the book trade. Field printed Shakespeare's early poems, Venus and Adonis and The Rape of Lucrece, and it is certainly possible that the two men had some understanding by which Shakespeare borrowed some of the books he read, which otherwise might have been prohibitively expensive. (Among the works printed by Field was a multi-volume Thomas North translation of Plutarch's Lives, of which Shakespeare made extensive use.) Shakespeare also lodged for a time in London with a French Huguenot family named Montjoy, whose home may have been the source for some of the French books that his plays demonstrate a familiarity with. And he may also have had the use of the libraries of one or more of his aristocratic patrons.

After 1613 we have no record of any further writing; he died on 23 April 1616, aged 52. In his will, Shakespeare left his extensive property to the sons of his daughter, Susanna (described in her epitaph as "witty above her sex"). To his wife, he left his "second-best bed"—a bequest which many have found both puzzling and provocative. He was buried as a respectable citizen in the chancel of the parish church, where his gravestone is marked not with a name, but a simple poem:

> Good friend, for Jesus' sake forbear
> To dig the dust enclosed here.
> Blest be the man that spares these stones,
> And curst be he that moves my bones.

Shakespeare's work appears to have been extremely well regarded in his lifetime; soon after his death a consensus developed that his work—his plays in particular—constitute the highest achievement in English literature. In some generations he has been praised most highly for the depth of his characterization, in others for the dense brilliance of his imagery, in others for the extraordinary intellectual suggestiveness of the ideas that his characters express (and occasionally embody). But in every generation since the mid-seventeenth century a consensus has remained that Shakespeare stands without peer among English authors.

In most generations the study of Shakespeare has also helped to shape the development of literary criticism and theory. From John Dryden and Samuel Johnson to Samuel Taylor Coleridge to Northrop Frye, works central to the development of literary theory and criticism have had Shakespeare as their subject. And in the past 50 years Shakespeare has been a vital test case in the development of feminist literary theory, of post-colonial theory, and of political, cultural, and new historicist criticism: just as with each generation people of the theater develop new ways of playing Shakespeare that yield fresh insight, so too do scholars develop new ways of reading texts through reading Shakespeare.

[Note to instructors: King Lear and Twelfth Night are among over 400 available editions from Broadview, any one of which may be packaged together with this anthology volume at no extra cost to the student.]

Venus and Adonis

London's theaters were among the first public gathering places to close in times of plague. During the 1592–93 outbreak, Shakespeare turned his focus to narrative poetry—The Rape of Lucrece as well as Venus and Adonis—and successfully sought the patronage of Henry Wriothesley, the nineteen-year-old Earl of Southampton. Dedicated to Wriothesley, Venus and Adonis was the first poem that Shakespeare filed with the Stationers' Register, and the first known work of his to appear in printed form.

Venus and Adonis belongs to a sub-genre of poetry often referred to as epyllia (singular: epyllion)—narrative poems based on classical mythology that deal with the subject of love. The source material for this poem appears in Ovid's Metamorphoses (the relevant excerpts are included below, under the heading "In Context"). Like another well-known epyllion of the English Renaissance, Christopher Marlowe's Hero and Leander, Venus and Adonis diverges in interesting ways from its classical source. Shakespeare presents a version that is far longer than the story as it appears in Ovid; that delves in far greater detail into the psyches of its two characters; that posits a distinction between love and lust that is nowhere to be found in the classical source; and that is written in a tone that is quite distinct from that of its source. It is a poem that in some ways goes very much against the grain of the conventions of the love poetry of the time; whereas most Renaissance love poems foreground male desire, in Venus and Adonis it is Venus who pursues Adonis—and her perspective that dominates the poem.

Venus and Adonis was a great success in its time, going through many editions in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries, and being quoted by other writers more frequently than were any of Shakespeare's plays.

Venus and Adonis

'Vilia miretur vulgus; mihi flavus Apollo
Pocula Castalia plena ministret aqua.'[1]

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE HENRY WRIOTHESLEY, EARL OF SOUTHAMPTON, AND BARON OF TICHFIELD.

Right Honourable,

I know not how I shall offend in dedicating my unpolished lines to your lordship, nor how the world will censure me for choosing so strong a prop to support so weak a burden. Only, if your honour seem but pleased, I account myself highly praised, and vow to take advantage of all idle hours till I have honoured you with some graver labour. But if the first heir of my invention prove deformed, I shall be sorry it had so noble a godfather, and never after ear so barren a land, for fear it yield me still so bad a harvest. I leave it to your honourable survey, and your honour to your heart's content, which I wish may always answer your own wish and the world's hopeful expectation.

Your honour's in all duty,
WILLIAM SHAKESPEARE.

Even as the sun with purple-coloured face
Had ta'en his last leave of the weeping morn,
Rose-cheeked Adonis hied him to the chase;
Hunting he loved, but love he laughed to scorn;
Sick-thoughted° Venus makes amain° unto him, love-sick makes haste
And like a bold-faced suitor 'gins to woo him.

"Thrice-fairer than myself," thus she began,
"The fields' chief flower, sweet above compare,
Stain to all nymphs, more lovely than a man,
More white and red than doves or roses are—
Nature that made thee, with herself at strife,
Saith that the world hath ending with thy life.

"Vouchsafe, thou wonder, to alight thy steed,
And rein his proud head to the saddle-bow;[2]
If thou wilt deign this favour, for thy meed[3]
A thousand honey secrets shalt thou know:
Here come and sit, where never serpent hisses,
And being set, I'll smother thee with kisses.

"And yet not cloy° thy lips with loathed satiety, sicken with sweetness
But rather famish them amid their plenty,
Making them red and pale with fresh variety,
Ten kisses short as one, one long as twenty:
A summer's day will seem an hour but short,
Being wasted in such time-beguiling sport."

With this she seizeth on his sweating palm,
The precedent of pith and livelihood,[4]
And trembling in her passion, calls it balm—
Earth's sovereign° salve to do a goddess good: supremely powerful

---

[1] Vilia miretur … aqua Latin: Let the vile multitude treasure garbage: may blonde-haired Apollo / bring me goblets full to the brim with Castalian water. See Ovid, Amores 1.15.

[2] And rein … saddle-bow Horses were tethered to a post, or restrained by tying the reins to the arch of the saddle. This would hold the bit tight in the mouth and keep the horse from extending its neck.

[3] meed Reward. A play on "mead," or "honey," that appears in the following line.

[4] precedent of pith and livelihood Advance sign, indicating strength and liveliness.

Being so enraged, desire doth lend her force
Courageously to pluck him from his horse.

Over one arm the lusty courser's rein;
Under her other was the tender boy,
Who blushed and pouted in a dull disdain,
With leaden appetite, unapt to toy;[1]
She red and hot as coals of glowing fire:
He red for shame, but frosty in desire.

The studded bridle[2] on a ragged bough
Nimbly she fastens:—O, how quick is love!—
The steed is stallèd° up, and even now contained
To tie the rider she begins to prove:
Backward she pushed him, as she would be thrust,
And governed him in strength, though not in lust.

So soon was she along as he was down,
Each leaning on their elbows and their hips:
Now doth she stroke his cheek, now doth he frown,
And 'gins to chide,° but soon she stops his lips; scold
And kissing speaks, with lustful language broken,° interrupted
"If thou wilt chide, thy lips shall never open."

He burns with bashful shame: she with her tears
Doth quench the maiden[3] burning of his cheeks;
Then with her windy sighs and golden hairs
To fan and blow them dry again she seeks:
He saith she is immodest, blames her 'miss;° misbehavior
What follows more she murders with a kiss.

Even as an empty eagle, sharp by fast,
Tires° with her beak on feathers, flesh and bone, tears
Shaking her wings, devouring all in haste,
Till either gorge be stuffed or prey be gone;
Even so she kissed his brow, his cheek, his chin,
And where she ends she doth anew begin.

Forced to content,° but never to obey,° comply / respond
Panting he lies and breatheth in her face;
She feedeth on the steam as on a prey,
And calls it heavenly moisture, air of grace;
Wishing her cheeks were gardens full of flowers,
So they were dewed with such distilling° showers. slowly dripping

Look, how a bird lies tangled in a net,
So fastened in her arms Adonis lies;
Pure shame and awed resistance made him fret,
Which bred more beauty in his angry eyes:
Rain added to a river that is rank° full
Perforce will force it overflow the bank.

Still she entreats,° and prettily entreats, asks earnestly
For to a pretty ear she tunes her tale;
Still is he sullen, still he lours° and frets, glowers, frowns
'Twixt crimson shame and anger ashy-pale:
Being red, she loves him best; and being white,
Her best is bettered with a more delight.

Look how he can, she cannot choose but love;
And by her fair immortal hand she swears
From his soft bosom never to remove,
Till he take truce° with her contending tears, make peace
Which long have rained, making her cheeks all wet;
And one sweet kiss shall pay this comptless° debt. uncountable

Upon this promise did he raise his chin,
Like a divedapper[4] peering through a wave,
Who, being looked on, ducks as quickly in—
So offers he to give what she did crave;
But when her lips were ready for his pay,
He winks,° and turns his lips another way. closes his eyes

Never did passenger° in summer's heat traveler
More thirst for drink than she for this good turn.
Her help she sees, but help she cannot get;
She bathes in water, yet her fire must burn:
"O, pity," 'gan she cry, "flint-hearted boy!
'Tis but a kiss I beg; why art thou coy?

---

[1] unapt to toy Lacking interest in play (of a sexual sort).

[2] studded bridle An ornamented bridle is a show of wealth and status.

[3] maiden A reference to virginity in either sex; in this case, it refers to Adonis.

[4] divedapper Grebe—a long-necked water bird that ducks its head in and out of the water as part of its courting ritual.

"I have been wooed, as I entreat thee now,
Even by the stern and direful god of war,° Mars
Whose sinewy neck in battle ne'er did bow,
Who conquers where he comes in every jar;° disagreement, conflict
Yet hath he been my captive and my slave,
And begged for that which thou unasked shalt have.

"Over my altars hath he hung his lance,
His battered shield, his uncontrollèd crest,
And for my sake hath learned to sport and dance,
To toy, to wanton, dally, smile and jest,
Scorning his churlish drum and ensign red,
Making my arms his field, his tent my bed.

"Thus he that overruled I over-swayed,
Leading him prisoner in a red-rose chain:
Strong-tempered steel his stronger strength obeyed,
Yet was he servile to my coy disdain.
O, be not proud, nor brag not of thy might,
For mast'ring her that foiled the god of fight!

"Touch but my lips with those fair lips of thine,—
Though mine be not so fair, yet are they red—
The kiss shall be thine own as well as mine.
What seest thou in the ground? Hold up thy head:
Look in mine eyeballs, there thy beauty lies;
Then why not lips on lips, since eyes in eyes?

"Art thou ashamed to kiss? Then wink again,
And I will wink; so shall the day seem night;
Love keeps his revels where they are but twain;
Be bold to play—our sport is not in sight:° observed
These blue-veined violets whereon we lean
Never can blab, nor know not what we mean.

"The tender spring° upon thy tempting lip downy hair
Shows thee unripe; yet mayst thou well be tasted:
Make use of time, let not advantage slip;
Beauty within itself should not be wasted:
Fair flowers that are not gathered in their prime
Rot and consume themselves in little time.

"Were I hard-favoured,° foul, or wrinkled-old, unattractive
Ill-nurtured, crooked, churlish,° harsh in voice, rude, mean-spirited
O'erworn, despised, rheumatic° and cold, infected
Thick-sighted, barren, lean, and lacking juice,
Then mightst thou pause, for then I were not for thee,
But having no defects, why dost abhor me?

"Thou canst not see one wrinkle in my brow;
Mine eyes are grey[1] and bright and quick in turning:
My beauty as the spring doth yearly grow,
My flesh is soft and plump, my marrow° burning; inner essence
My smooth moist hand,[2] were it with thy hand felt,
Would in thy palm dissolve, or seem to melt.

"Bid me discourse, I will enchant thine ear,
Or, like a fairy, trip upon the green,
Or, like a nymph, with long dishevelled hair,
Dance on the sands, and yet no footing° seen: footprints
Love is a spirit all compact° of fire, composed
Not gross to sink, but light, and will aspire.° rise up

"Witness this primrose bank whereon I lie:
These forceless° flowers like sturdy trees support me; weak
Two strengthless doves will draw me through the sky,[3]
From morn till night, even where I list to sport me:[4]
Is love so light, sweet boy, and may it be
That thou shouldst think it heavy unto thee?

"Is thine own heart to thine own face affected?° attracted
Can thy right hand seize love upon thy left?
Then woo thyself, be of thyself rejected,
Steal thine own freedom and complain on theft.
Narcissus[5] so himself himself forsook,
And died to kiss his shadow in the brook.

---

[1] grey In Medieval and Renaissance literature, grey eyes are associated with the supernatural.

[2] moist hand A sign of passion.

[3] Two strengthless ... sky Venus's chariot is traditionally pulled by two doves or two swans.

[4] even where I list to sport me Wherever it pleases me to go.

[5] Narcissus Mythological figure who fell in love with his own reflection.

"Torches are made to light, jewels to wear,
Dainties to taste, fresh beauty for the use,
Herbs for their smell, and sappy plants to bear:
Things growing to° themselves are growth's abuse: only for
Seeds spring from seeds and beauty breedeth beauty;
Thou wast begot; to get[1] it is thy duty.

"Upon the earth's increase why shouldst thou feed,
Unless the earth with thy increase be fed?
By law of nature thou art bound to breed,
That thine may live when thou thyself art dead;
And so, in spite of death, thou dost survive,
In that thy likeness still is left alive."

By this,° the love-sick queen began to sweat, by this time
For where they lay the shadow had forsook them,
And Titan,° tired in the midday heat, the sun god
With burning eye did hotly overlook them;
Wishing Adonis had his team[2] to guide,
So he were like him and by Venus' side.

And now Adonis, with a lazy sprite,° spirit
And with a heavy, dark, disliking eye,
His louring brows o'erwhelming his fair sight,[3]
Like misty vapours when they blot the sky,
Souring his cheeks cries "Fie, no more of love!
The sun doth burn my face: I must remove."° depart

"Ay me," quoth Venus, "young, and so unkind?
What bare excuses mak'st thou to be gone!
I'll sigh celestial breath, whose gentle wind
Shall cool the heat of this descending sun:
I'll make a shadow for thee of my hairs;
If they burn too, I'll quench them with my tears.

"The sun that shines from heaven shines but warm,[4]
And, lo, I lie between that sun and thee:
The heat I have from thence doth little harm,
Thine eye darts forth the fire that burneth me;
And were I not immortal, life were done
Between this heavenly and earthly sun.

"Art thou obdurate,° flinty, hard as steel, stubborn
Nay, more than flint, for stone at rain relenteth?[5]
Art thou a woman's son, and canst not feel
What 'tis to love, how want° of love tormenteth? lack
O, had thy mother borne so hard a mind,
She had not brought forth thee, but died unkind.

"What am I, that thou shouldst contemn° me this? deny
Or what great danger dwells upon my suit?
What were thy lips the worse for one poor kiss?
Speak, fair; but speak fair words, or else be mute:
Give me one kiss, I'll give it thee again,
And one for int'rest, if thou wilt have twain.

"Fie,[6] lifeless picture, cold and senseless stone,
Well-painted idol, image dun° and dead, dull grey-brown
Statue contenting but the eye alone,
Thing like a man, but of no woman bred:
Thou art no man, though of a man's complexion,
For men will kiss even by their own direction."[7]

This said, impatience chokes her pleading tongue,
And swelling passion doth provoke a pause;
Red cheeks and fiery eyes blaze forth her wrong;
Being judge in love, she cannot right her cause:
And now she weeps, and now she fain would speak,
And now her sobs do her intendments[8] break.

Sometimes she shakes her head and then his hand;
Now gazeth she on him, now on the ground;
Sometimes her arms enfold him like a band:
She would, he will not in her arms be bound;
And when from thence he struggles to be gone,
She locks her lily fingers one in one.

"Fondling,"° she saith, "since I have hemmed thee here foolish one

---

[1] to get To have children, and thereby create more beauty.

[2] his team The horse-drawn sun chariot.

[3] o'erwhelming his fair sight Hanging over his fair eyes.

[4] shines but warm Only makes me warm.

[5] stone … relenteth Rain-worn stone.

[6] Fie Expression of disgust or outrage.

[7] even by their own direction Even without being directed by someone else to do so.

[8] intendments Intentions, desire to speak.

Within the circuit of this ivory pale,° fence
I'll be a park, and thou shalt be my deer;
Feed where thou wilt, on mountain or in dale:
Graze on my lips; and if those hills be dry,
Stray lower, where the pleasant fountains lie.

"Within this limit is relief[1] enough,
Sweet bottom-grass and high delightful plain,
Round rising hillocks, brakes° obscure and rough, thickets
To shelter thee from tempest and from rain
Then be my deer, since I am such a park;
No dog shall rouse thee, though a thousand bark."

At this Adonis smiles as in disdain,
That in each cheek appears a pretty dimple:
Love made those hollows, if himself were slain,
He might be buried in a tomb so simple;
Foreknowing well, if there he came to lie,
Why, there Love lived and there he could not die.

These lovely caves, these round enchanting pits,
Opened their mouths to swallow Venus' liking.° desire
Being mad before, how doth she now for wits?
Struck dead at first, what needs a second striking?
Poor queen of love, in thine own law forlorn,
To love a cheek that smiles at thee in scorn!

Now which way shall she turn? What shall she say?
Her words are done, her woes are more increasing;
The time is spent, her object will away,
And from her twining arms doth urge releasing.
"Pity," she cries, "some favour, some remorse!"
Away he springs and hasteth to his horse.

But lo, from forth a copse that neighbours by,
A breeding jennet,° lusty, young and proud, mare
Adonis' trampling courser° doth espy, stallion
And forth she rushes, snorts and neighs aloud:
The strong-necked steed, being tied unto a tree,
Breaketh his rein, and to her straight goes he.

Imperiously he leaps, he neighs, he bounds,
And now his woven girths° he breaks asunder; saddle belly-straps
The bearing earth with his hard hoof he wounds,
Whose hollow womb resounds like heaven's thunder;
The iron bit he crusheth 'tween his teeth,
Controlling what he was controllèd with.

His ears up-pricked; his braided hanging mane
Upon his compassed crest° now stand on end; curved neck
His nostrils drink the air, and forth again,
As from a furnace, vapours doth he send:
His eye, which scornfully glisters like fire,
Shows his hot courage and his high desire.

Sometime he trots, as if he told° the steps, counted
With gentle majesty and modest pride;
Anon he rears upright, curvets° and leaps, bounds
As who should say "Lo, thus my strength is tried,
And this I do to captivate the eye
Of the fair breeder that is standing by."

What recketh he his rider's angry stir,[2]
His flattering "Holla," or his "Stand, I say"?
What cares he now for curb or pricking spur?
For rich caparisons° or trapping gay? ornamental saddle covering
He sees his love, and nothing else he sees,
For nothing else with his proud sight agrees.

Look when a painter would surpass the life,
In limning out° a well-proportioned steed, depicting
His art with nature's workmanship at strife,
As if the dead the living should exceed:
So did this horse excel a common one
In shape, in courage, colour, pace and bone.

Round-hoofed, short-jointed, fetlocks shag and long,[3]
Broad breast, full eye, small head and nostril wide,
High crest, short ears, straight legs and passing strong,

---

[1] relief Variation in landscape (hills, valleys, etc.)—but also "relief" with the suggestion of sexual gratification.

[2] What recketh he his rider's angry stir What does the angry noise his rider makes matter to him?

[3] fetlocks shag and long With long, shaggy hair at each fetlock (the joint in the lower leg).

Thin mane, thick tail, broad buttock, tender hide:
Look, what a horse should have he did not lack,
Save a proud rider on so proud a back.

Sometime he scuds° far off and there he stares; moves quickly
Anon he starts at stirring of a feather;
To bid the wind a base[1] he now prepares,
And wh'er he run or fly they know not whether;[2]
For through his mane and tail the high wind sings,
Fanning the hairs, who wave like feathered wings.

He looks upon his love and neighs unto her;
She answers him as if she knew his mind:
Being proud, as females are, to see him woo her,
She puts on outward strangeness,° seems unkind, aloofness
Spurns at his love and scorns the heat he feels,
Beating his kind embracements with her heels.

Then, like a melancholy malcontent,
He vails° his tail that, like a falling plume, lowers
Cool shadow to his melting buttock lent:
He stamps and bites the poor flies in his fume.° fury
His love, perceiving how he is enraged,
Grew kinder, and his fury was assuaged.

His testy master goeth about to take him;
When, lo, the unbacked breeder,° full of fear, riderless mare
Jealous of catching,[3] swiftly doth forsake him,
With her the horse, and left Adonis there:
As° they were mad, unto the wood they hie them,° as if hasten
Out-stripping crows that strive to over-fly them.

All swoll'n with chafing,° down Adonis sits, anger and frustration
Banning° his boist'rous and unruly beast; cursing
And now the happy season once more fits,
That love-sick love by pleading may be blest;
For lovers say, the heart hath treble wrong
When it is barred the aidance of the tongue.

An oven that is stopped, or river stayed,° dammed
Burneth more hotly, swelleth with more rage:
So of concealèd sorrow may be said;
Free vent of words love's fire doth assuage;
But when the heart's attorney° once is mute, advocate
The client breaks, as desperate in his suit.

He sees her coming, and begins to glow,
Even as a dying coal revives with wind,
And with his bonnet° hides his angry brow, cap
Looks on the dull earth with disturbèd mind,
Taking no notice that she is so nigh,
For all askance he holds her in his eye.[4]

O, what a sight it was, wistly° to view intently
How she came stealing to the wayward boy!
To note the fighting conflict of her hue,
How white and red each other did destroy!
But now her cheek was pale, and by and by
It flashed forth fire, as lightning from the sky.

Now was she just before him as he sat,
And like a lowly lover down she kneels;
With one fair hand she heaveth up his hat,
Her other tender hand his fair cheek feels:
His tenderer cheek receives her soft hand's print,
As apt as new-fall'n snow takes any dint.[5]

O, what a war of looks was then between them!
Her eyes petitioners to his eyes suing;
His eyes saw her eyes as they had not seen them;
Her eyes wooed still, his eyes disdained the wooing:
And all this dumb play had his° acts made plain, its
With tears, which, chorus-like, her eyes did rain.[6]

---

[1] bid ... base To challenge the wind to a race.

[2] wh'er he ... whether They do not know whether he runs or flies.

[3] Jealous of catching Fearing being caught.

[4] all askance ... eye He looks at her from the corner of his eye.

[5] As apt ... any dint As readily as new-fallen snow receives an imprint.

[6] And all this dumb play ... did rain The tears raining from Venus's eyes explained her mute actions in the same way as the Chorus in a dumb show explains the play's action to the audience.

Full gently now she takes him by the hand,
A lily prisoned in a jail of snow,
Or ivory in an alabaster band;
So white a friend engirds so white a foe:
This beauteous combat, wilful and unwilling,
Showed like two silver doves that sit a-billing.

Once more the engine of her thoughts° began: tongue, voice
"O fairest mover on this mortal round,
Would thou wert[1] as I am, and I a man,
My heart all whole as thine, thy heart my wound;[2]
For one sweet look thy help I would assure thee,
Though nothing but my body's bane° would cure thee!" ruin

"Give me my hand," saith he, "why dost thou feel it?"
"Give me my heart," saith she, "and thou shalt have it.
Oh give it me lest thy hard heart do steel it,
And being steeled, soft sighs can never grave° it. engrave, mark
Then love's deep groans I never shall regard,
Because Adonis' heart hath made mine hard."

"For shame," he cries, "let go, and let me go;
My day's delight is past, my horse is gone,
And 'tis your fault I am bereft him so:
I pray you hence, and leave me here alone;
For all my mind, my thought, my busy care,
Is how to get my palfrey° from the mare." riding horse

Thus she replies: "Thy palfrey, as he should,
Welcomes the warm approach of sweet desire:
Affection is a coal that must be cooled;
Else, suffered,° it will set the heart on fire: allowed to persist
The sea hath bounds, but deep desire hath none;
Therefore no marvel though thy horse be gone.

"How like a jade° he stood, tied to the tree, worn-out horse
Servilely mastered with a leathern rein!
But when he saw his love, his youth's fair fee,° reward
He held such petty bondage in disdain;
Throwing the base thong from his bending crest,
Enfranchising his mouth, his back, his breast.

"Who sees his true-love in her naked bed,
Teaching the sheets a whiter hue than white,
But, when his glutton eye so full hath fed,
His other agents° aim at like° delight? senses / similar
Who is so faint, that dare not be so bold
To touch the fire, the weather being cold?

"Let me excuse thy courser,° gentle boy; horse
And learn of him, I heartily beseech thee,
To take advantage on° presented joy; of
Though I were dumb, yet his proceedings teach thee;
O, learn to love; the lesson is but plain,
And once made perfect,° never lost again." learned fully

"I know not love," quoth he, "nor will not know it,
Unless it be a boar, and then I chase it;
'Tis much to borrow, and I will not owe it;
My love to love is love but to disgrace it;[3]
For I have heard it is a life in death,
That laughs and weeps, and all but with a breath.

"Who wears a garment shapeless and unfinished?
Who plucks the bud before one leaf put forth?
If springing things be any jot diminished,
They wither in their prime, prove nothing worth:[4]
The colt that's backed° and burdened being young ridden, broken
Loseth his pride and never waxeth strong.

"You hurt my hand with wringing; let us part,
And leave this idle theme, this bootless° chat: pointless
Remove your siege from my unyielding heart;
To love's alarms° it will not ope the gate: attacks
Dismiss your vows, your feignèd tears, your flattery;
For where a heart is hard they make no battery."° breach

"What! canst thou talk?" quoth she, "hast thou a tongue?
O, would thou hadst not, or I had no hearing!

[1] Would thou wert I wish that you were.

[2] thy heart my wound Your heart feeling wounded [as mine does now].

[3] My love … to disgrace it The only thing I love about love is giving love a bad reputation.

[4] prove nothing worth Turn out to be worth nothing.

Thy mermaid's voice[1] hath done me double wrong;
I had my load before, now pressed with bearing:
Melodious discord, heavenly tune harsh sounding,
Ears' deep-sweet music, and heart's deep-sore wounding.

"Had I no eyes but ears, my ears would love
That inward beauty and invisible;
Or were I deaf, thy outward parts would move
Each part in me that were but sensible:° sensing
Though neither eyes nor ears, to hear nor see,
Yet should I be in love by touching thee.

"Say, that the sense of feeling were bereft me,
And that I could not see, nor hear, nor touch,
And nothing but the very smell were left me,
Yet would my love to thee be still as much;
For from the stillitory[2] of thy face excelling
Comes breath perfumed that breedeth love by smelling.

"But, O, what banquet wert thou to the taste,
Being nurse and feeder of the other four!
Would they not wish the feast might ever last,
And bid Suspicion double-lock the door,
Lest Jealousy, that sour unwelcome guest,
Should, by his stealing in, disturb the feast?"

Once more the ruby-coloured portal° opened, mouth
Which to his speech did honey passage yield;
Like a red morn, that ever yet betokened
Wrack° to the seaman, tempest to the field, shipwreck
Sorrow to shepherds, woe unto the birds,
Gusts and foul flaws° to herdsmen and to herds. blasts

This ill presage° advisedly she marketh: omen
Even as the wind is hushed before it raineth,
Or as the wolf doth grin° before he barketh, bare its teeth
Or as the berry breaks before it staineth,
Or like the deadly bullet of a gun,
His meaning struck her ere his words begun.

And at his look she flatly falleth down,
For looks kill love and love by looks reviveth;
A smile recures° the wounding of a frown; makes well
But blessèd bankrupt, that by love so thriveth!
The silly boy, believing she is dead,
Claps her pale cheek, till clapping makes it red.

And, all amazed, brake off his late intent,[3]
For sharply he did think to reprehend her,
Which cunning love did wittily prevent:
Fair fall[4] the wit that can so well defend her!
For on the grass she lies as she were slain,
Till his breath breatheth life in her again.

He wrings her nose, he strikes her on the cheeks,
He bends her fingers, holds her pulses hard,° checks her pulse
He chafes her lips; a thousand ways he seeks
To mend the hurt that his unkindness marred:
He kisses her; and she, by her good will,[5]
Will never rise, so he will kiss her still.

The night of sorrow now is turned to day:
Her two blue windows[6] faintly she upheaveth,
Like the fair sun, when in his fresh array,
He cheers the morn and all the earth relieveth;
And as the bright sun glorifies the sky,
So is her face illumined with her eye.

Whose beams upon his hairless face are fixed,
As if from thence they borrowed all their shine.
Were never four such lamps together mixed,
Had not his clouded with his brow's repine;° discontent
But hers, which through the crystal tears gave light,
Shone like the moon in water seen by night.

"O, where am I?" quoth she, "in earth or heaven,
Or in the ocean drenched, or in the fire?

---

[1] mermaid's voice In Greek mythology, mermaid-like creatures called sirens lure sailors to their deaths with their song.

[2] stillitory Distillation apparatus for perfume.

[3] all amazed, brake off his late intent Completely taken aback, did not do as he had previously intended [i.e., did not speak harshly to her].

[4] Fair fall Good luck befall (with a punning meaning as well).

[5] by her good will Of her own volition.

[6] Her two … windows Her eyes (described as grey earlier in the poem).

What hour is this? or morn or weary even?° evening
Do I delight to die, or life desire?
But now I lived, and life was death's annoy;° painful as death
But now I died, and death was lively° joy. living

"O, thou didst kill me; kill me once again:
Thy eyes' shrewd tutor, that hard heart of thine,
Hath taught them scornful tricks and such disdain
That they have murdered this poor heart of mine;
And these mine eyes, true leaders to their queen,
But for thy piteous lips no more had seen.[1]

"Long may they kiss each other, for this cure!
O, never let their crimson liveries wear,° wear out
And as they last, their verdure° still endure freshness
To drive infection from the dangerous year,[2]
That the star-gazers,° having writ on° death, astrologers predicted
May say the plague is banished by thy breath.

"Pure lips, sweet seals in my soft lips imprinted,
What bargains may I make, still to be sealing?[3]
To sell myself I can be well contented,
So thou wilt buy, and pay, and use good dealing;
Which purchase if thou make, for fear of slips° fraud
Set thy seal-manual° on my wax-red lips. identifying seal

"A thousand kisses buys my heart from me;
And pay them at thy leisure, one by one.
What is ten hundred touches unto thee?
Are they not quickly told° and quickly gone? counted
Say, for non-payment that the debt should double,[4]
Is twenty hundred kisses such a trouble?"

"Fair queen," quoth he, "if any love you owe me,
Measure my strangeness° with my unripe years: aloofness
Before I know myself, seek not to know me;
No fisher but the ungrown fry forbears:[5]
The mellow plum doth fall, the green sticks fast,
Or being early plucked is sour to taste.

"Look, the world's comforter° with weary gait, the sun
His day's hot task hath ended in the west;
The owl, night's herald, shrieks, 'tis very late;
The sheep are gone to fold, birds to their nest,
And coal-black clouds that shadow heaven's light
Do summon us to part and bid good night.

"Now let me say goodnight, and so say you;
If you will say so, you shall have a kiss.
'Goodnight,'" quoth she, and, ere he says "Adieu,"
The honey fee of parting tendered is:
Her arms do lend his neck a sweet embrace;
Incorporate° then they seem; face grows to face. united in one body

Till, breathless, he disjoined, and backward drew
The heavenly moisture, that sweet coral mouth,
Whose precious taste her thirsty lips well knew;
Whereon they surfeit,° yet complain on drouth:° have too much of drought
He with her plenty pressed, she faint with dearth,° scarcity
Their lips together glued, fall to the earth.

Now quick desire hath caught the yielding prey,
And glutton-like she feeds, yet never filleth;
Her lips are conquerors, his lips obey,
Paying what ransom the insulter° willeth, conqueror

[1] But for thy piteous lips no more had seen If it were not for your lips having taken pity on me, [my eyes] would no longer have been able to see.

[2] their verdure … from the dangerous year It was believed that certain fresh plants (notably, parsley) had the power to prevent disease. (Venus and Adonis was written during the London plague of 1592–93.)

[3] seals … sealing The seals referred to here are of the sort used to make a distinctive round imprint, especially on wax. (Corporate seals remain in use today, though their imprint on an official document is now made by pressing into the paper itself rather than into wax.)

[4] for non-payment … double In the event of a debt not being paid by the agreed-upon time, it was common practice for the debt agreement to specify that the amount owed would double. (Though extortionate, this practice was considered to be free from the taint of charging interest, or "usury.")

[5] No fisher but … forbears There is no fisher who doesn't refrain from keeping juvenile fish.

Whose vulture thought doth pitch the price so high,
That she will draw his lips' rich treasure dry:

And having felt the sweetness of the spoil,
With blindfold fury she begins to forage;
Her face doth reek° and smoke, her blood steam
doth boil,
And careless° lust stirs up a desperate courage, reckless Planting oblivion,[1] beating reason back,
Forgetting shame's pure blush and honour's wrack.

Hot, faint, and weary, with her hard embracing,
Like a wild bird being tamed with too much handling,
Or as the fleet-foot roe° that's tired with chasing, deer
Or like the froward° infant stilled with dandling, fretting
He now obeys, and now no more resisteth,
While she takes all she can, not all she listeth.° would like

What wax so frozen but dissolves with temp'ring,° handling
And yields at last to every light impression?
Things out of° hope are compassed° beyond / reached
oft with vent'ring,
Chiefly in love, whose leave exceeds commission:
Affection faints not like a pale-faced coward,
But then woos best when most his choice is froward.° obstinate

When he did frown, O, had she then gave over,
Such nectar from his lips she had not sucked.
Foul° words and frowns must not repel a lover; harsh
What though the rose have prickles, yet 'tis plucked:
Were beauty under twenty locks kept fast,
Yet love breaks through and picks them all at last.

For pity now she can no more detain him;
The poor fool prays her that he may depart:
She is resolved no longer to restrain him,
Bids him farewell, and look well to° her heart, to care for
The which, by Cupid's bow she doth protest,
He carries thence encagèd in his breast.

"Sweet boy," she says, "this night I'll waste in sorrow,
For my sick heart commands mine eyes to watch.
Tell me, Love's master, shall we meet tomorrow?
Say, shall we? shall we? wilt thou make the match?"
He tells her, no; tomorrow he intends
To hunt the boar with certain of his friends.

"The boar!" quoth she; whereat a sudden pale,
Like lawn° being spread upon the blushing white linen
rose,
Usurps her cheek; she trembles at his tale,
And on his neck her yoking arms she throws:
She sinketh down, still hanging by his neck,
He on her belly falls, she on her back.

Now is she in the very lists° enclosed area for tournament
of love,
Her champion mounted for the hot encounter;
All is imaginary, she doth prove,[2]
He will not manage her,[3] although he mount her;
That, worse than Tantalus',[4] is her annoy,
To clip Elysium[5] and to lack her joy.

Even so° poor birds, deceived with painted in this way grapes,
Do surfeit by the eye and pine the maw,° starve the stomach
Even so she languisheth in her mishaps,
As those poor birds that helpless berries saw.
The warm effects which she in him finds missing
She seeks to kindle with continual kissing.

But all in vain, good queen, it will not be:
She hath assayed as much as may be proved;
Her pleading hath deserved a greater fee;° payment
She's Love, she loves, and yet she is not loved.

---

[1] Planting oblivion Implanting obliviousness [to the dictates of reason or modesty].

[2] All is imaginary, she doth prove The "hot encounter" is purely a figment of her imagination, as she discovers when things are here put to the test.

[3] manage her I.e., as one does a horse.

[4] Tantalus Mythological figure who is tormented for eternity; he is immersed in water that recedes when he tries to drink, and with a fruit tree above him that rises out of reach so he can never satisfy his hunger or thirst.

[5] Elysium Home of the gods; associated with bliss.

"Fie, fie," he says, "you crush me; let me go;
You have no reason to withhold me so."

"Thou hadst been gone," quoth she, "sweet boy, ere this,
But that thou told'st me thou wouldst hunt the boar.
O, be advised! thou know'st not what it is
With javelin's point a churlish swine to gore,
Whose tushes° never sheathed he whetteth still,[1] tusks
Like to a mortal° butcher bent to kill. deadly

"On his bow-back he hath a battle set
Of bristly pikes, that ever threat his foes;
His eyes, like glow-worms, shine when he doth fret;
His snout digs sepulchres° where'er he goes; burial places
Being moved,° he strikes whate'er is in his way, when moved [to anger]
And whom he strikes his crooked tushes slay.

"His brawny sides, with hairy bristles armed,
Are better proof than thy spear's point can enter;[2]
His short thick neck cannot be easily harmed,
Being ireful,° on the lion he will venture: angry
The thorny brambles and embracing bushes,
As° fearful of him, part; through whom° he rushes. if them

"Alas, he nought esteems that face of thine,
To which Love's eyes pay tributary gazes,
Nor thy soft hands, sweet lips and crystal eyne,° eyes
Whose full perfection all the world amazes;
But having thee at vantage,—wondrous dread!—
Would root these beauties as he roots the mead.° meadow

"O, let him keep° his loathsome cabin° still; stay inside den
Beauty hath nought to do with such foul fiends:
Come not within his danger by thy will;
They that thrive well take counsel of their friends.
When thou didst name the boar, not to dissemble,[3]
I feared thy fortune,[4] and my joints did tremble.

"Didst thou not mark° my face? was it not white? notice
Saw'st thou not signs of fear lurk in mine eye?
Grew I not faint? and fell I not downright?
Within my bosom, whereon thou dost lie,
My boding° heart pants, beats, and takes no rest, foretelling
But, like an earthquake, shakes thee on my breast.

"For where Love reigns, disturbing Jealousy
Doth call himself Affection's sentinel,
Gives false alarms, suggesteth mutiny,° rebellion
And in a peaceful hour doth cry 'Kill, kill!'
Distemp'ring° gentle Love in his desire, diluting
As air and water do abate the fire.

"This sour informer, this bate°-breeding spy, conflict
This canker that eats up Love's tender spring,° young shoot
This carry-tale, dissentious Jealousy,
That sometime true news, sometime false doth bring,
Knocks at my heat and whispers in mine ear
That if I love thee, I thy death should fear:

"And more than so, presenteth to mine eye
The picture of an angry-chafing boar,
Under whose sharp fangs on his back doth lie
An image like thyself, all stained with gore;
Whose blood upon the fresh flowers being shed,
Doth make them droop with grief and hang the head.

"What should I do, seeing thee so indeed,
That tremble at th' imagination?
The thought of it doth make my faint heart bleed,
And fear doth teach it divination:
I prophesy thy death, my living sorrow,
If thou encounter with the boar to-morrow.

"But if thou needs wilt hunt, be ruled by me;
Uncouple° at the timorous flying hare, release [the dogs]
Or at the fox which lives by subtlety,

---

[1] whetteth still Sharpens continually.

[2] Are better proof … enter Provide such proven protection that your spear cannot pierce them.

[3] not to dissemble I do not lie [to you].

[4] feared thy fortune Was afraid of what would happen to you.

Or at the roe which no encounter dare:
Pursue these fearful creatures o'er the downs,
And on thy well-breathed horse keep with thy hounds.

"And when thou hast on foot the purblind° hare, visually impaired
Mark the poor wretch, to overshoot his troubles,
How he outruns the wind and with what care
He cranks and crosses° with a thousand doubles: twists and turns
The many musits° through the which he goes hedge gaps
Are like a labyrinth to amaze° his foes. confuse

"Sometime he runs among a flock of sheep,
To make the cunning hounds mistake their smell,
And sometime where earth-delving conies° keep, burrowing rabbits
To stop the loud pursuers in their yell,
And sometime sorteth with a herd of deer:
Danger deviseth shifts;° wit waits on fear: tricks

"For there his smell with others being mingled,
The hot scent-snuffing hounds are driven to doubt,
Ceasing their clamorous cry till they have singled
With much ado the cold fault° cleanly out; lost scent
Then do they spend their mouths:° Echo[1] replies, bark
As if another chase were in the skies.

"By this, poor Wat,° far off upon a hill, name for a rabbit
Stands on his hinder legs with listening ear,
To harken if his foes pursue him still:
Anon their loud alarums he doth hear;
And now his grief may be compared well
To one sore sick that hears the passing-bell.[2]

"Then shalt thou see the dew-bedabbled° wretch sprinkled
Turn, and return, indenting° with the way; zigzagging
Each envious° brier his weary legs doth scratch, spiteful
Each shadow makes him stop, each murmur stay:
For misery is trodden on by many,
And being low never relieved by any.

"Lie quietly, and hear a little more;
Nay, do not struggle, for thou shalt not rise.
To make thee hate the hunting of the boar,
Unlike myself[3] thou hear'st me moralize,
Applying this to that, and so to so;
For love can comment upon every woe.

"Where did I leave?" "No matter where," quoth he,
"Leave me, and then the story aptly ends:
The night is spent." "Why, what of that?" quoth she.
"I am," quoth he, "expected of° my friends; by
And now 'tis dark, and going I shall fall."
"In night," quoth she, "desire sees best of all.

"But if thou fall, O, then imagine this,
The earth, in love with thee, thy footing trips,
And all is but to rob thee of a kiss.
Rich preys° make true° men thieves; so do thy lips spoils / honest
Make modest Dian[4] cloudy and forlorn,
Lest she should steal a kiss and die forsworn.[5]

"Now of this dark night I perceive the reason:
Cynthia° for shame obscures her silver shine, Diana
Till forging° Nature be condemned of treason, counterfeiting
For stealing moulds from heaven that were divine;
Wherein she framed thee in high heaven's despite,
To shame the sun by day and her by night.

"And therefore hath she bribed the Destinies
To cross the curious° workmanship of nature, complex
To mingle beauty with infirmities,
And pure perfection with impure defeature,° disfigurement

---

[1] Echo Nymph punished for distracting Hera from Zeus's dalliances by the loss of her voice. She could only repeat the words uttered by others. She fell in love with Narcissus and pined away for him, leaving only her voice behind.

[2] the passing-bell Church bells would toll for the recently deceased.

[3] Unlike myself Though I am not in the habit of doing so.

[4] Dian Diana (also known as Cynthia), the goddess of the moon, of hunting, of light, of wild things, of childbirth, and of chastity.

[5] die forsworn Die having broken her vow (of eternal chastity).

Making it subject to the tyranny
Of mad mischances and much misery;

"As burning fevers, agues pale and faint,
Life-poisoning pestilence and frenzies wood,° mad fits
The marrow-eating sickness,° whose attaint° syphilis / contagion
Disorder breeds by heating of the blood:
Surfeits,° imposthumes,° grief, and damnèd despair, excesses / abscesses
Swear nature's death for framing thee so fair.

"And not the least of all these maladies
But in one minute's fight brings beauty under:
Both favour, savour, hue and qualities,
Whereat the impartial gazer late did wonder,
Are on the sudden wasted,° thawed and done, wasted away
As mountain-snow melts with the midday sun.

"Therefore, despite of fruitless chastity,[1]
Love-lacking vestals[2] and self-loving nuns,
That on the earth would breed a scarcity
And barren dearth of daughters and of sons,
Be prodigal: the lamp that burns by night
Dries up his oil to lend the world his light.

"What is thy body but a swallowing grave,
Seeming to bury that posterity
Which by the rights of time thou needs must have,
If thou destroy them not in dark obscurity?
If so, the world will hold thee in disdain,
Sith° in thy pride so fair a hope is slain. since

"So in thyself, thyself art made away;° destroyed
A mischief worse than civil home-bred strife,
Or theirs whose desperate hands themselves do slay,
Or butcher-sire that reaves° his son of life. robs
Foul-cankering rust the hidden treasure frets,° gnaws away
But gold that's put to use more gold begets."

"Nay, then," quoth Adon, "you will fall again
Into your idle, over-handled theme:
The kiss I gave you is bestowed in vain,
And all in vain you strive against the stream;
For, by this black-faced night, desire's foul nurse,
Your treatise° makes me like you worse and worse. argument

"If love have lent you twenty thousand tongues,
And every tongue more moving than your own,
Bewitching like the wanton mermaids'° songs, sirens
Yet from mine ear the tempting tune is blown
For know, my heart stands armèd in mine ear,
And will not let a false sound enter there;

"Lest the deceiving harmony should run
Into the quiet closure of my breast,
And then my little heart were quite undone,
In his bedchamber to be barred of rest.
No, lady, no: my heart longs not to groan,
But soundly sleeps, while now it sleeps alone.

"What have you urged that I cannot reprove?
The path is smooth that leadeth on to danger:
I hate not love, but your device° in love, conniving
That lends embracements unto every stranger.
You do it for increase:[3] O strange excuse,
When reason is the bawd to lust's abuse!

"Call it not love, for Love to heaven is fled,
Since sweating Lust on earth usurped his name;
Under whose simple semblance° he hath fed innocent appearance
Upon fresh beauty, blotting it with blame;
Which the hot tyrant stains and soon bereaves,
As caterpillars do the tender leaves.

---

[1] despite of fruitless chastity In defiance of useless chastity (with "fruitless" also to be taken literally as "bearing no fruit").

[2] vestals The Vestal Virgins served Vesta, goddess of hearth and home. The Vestals served for thirty years, tending the temple fire and remaining virgin for their term.

[3] You do it for increase You [pretend to] promote love in the interest of procreation.

"Love comforteth like sunshine after rain,
But Lust's effect is tempest after sun;
Love's gentle spring doth always fresh remain,
Lust's winter comes ere summer half be done;
Love surfeits not, Lust like a glutton dies;
Love is all truth, Lust full of forgèd lies.

"More I could tell, but more I dare not say;
The text is old, the orator too green.
Therefore, in sadness, now I will away;
My face is full of shame, my heart of teen:° anger, grief
Mine ears, that to your wanton talk attended,
Do burn themselves for having so offended."

With this, he breaketh from the sweet embrace,
Of those fair arms which bound him to her breast,
And homeward through the dark laund° runs apace; clearing
Leaves Love upon her back, deeply distressed.
Look, how a bright star shooteth from the sky,
So glides he in the night from Venus's eye.

Which after him she darts, as one on shore
Gazing upon a late°-embarkèd friend, recently
Till the wild waves will have him seen no more,
Whose ridges with the meeting clouds contend;
So did the merciless and pitchy night
Fold in the object that did feed her sight.

Whereat amazed, as one that unaware
Hath dropped a precious jewel in the flood,
Or stonished as night-wand'rers often are,
Their light blown out in some mistrustful° wood, frightening
Even so,° confounded in the dark she lay, in the same way
Having lost the fair discovery of her way.° lost her path

And now she beats her heart, whereat it groans,
That all the neighbour caves, as seeming troubled,
Make verbal repetition of her moans;
Passion° on passion deeply is redoubled: mourning
"Ay me!" she cries, and twenty times "Woe, woe!"
And twenty echoes twenty times cry so.

She, marking° them, begins a wailing note, observing
And sings extemporally° a woeful ditty, off-the-cuff
How love makes young men thrall° and old men dote, captive
How love is wise in folly, foolish-witty:
Her heavy anthem still concludes in woe,
And still the choir of echoes answer so.

Her song was tedious and outwore the night,
For lovers' hours are long, though seeming short:
If pleased themselves, others, they think, delight
In such-like circumstance, with such-like sport;
Their copious stories oftentimes begun,
End without audience, and are never done.

For who hath she to spend the night withal,° with
But idle sounds resembling parasites,
Like shrill-tongued tapsters° answering every call, barmen
Soothing the humour of fantastic wits?
She says "'Tis so," they answer all "'Tis so,"
And would say after her, if she said "No."

Lo, here the gentle lark, weary of rest,
From his moist cabinet° mounts up on high, dewy nest
And wakes the morning, from whose silver breast
The sun ariseth in his majesty,
Who doth the world so gloriously behold
That cedar-tops and hills seem burnishèd gold.

Venus salutes him with this fair good-morrow:
"O thou clear° god, and patron of all light, shining
From whom each lamp and shining star doth borrow
The beauteous influence that makes him bright,
There lives a son that sucked an earthly mother,
May lend thee light, as thou dost lend to other."[1]

This said, she hasteth to a myrtle grove,
Musing the morning is so much o'erworn,
And yet she hears no tidings of her love:
She hearkens for his hounds and for his horn;
Anon she hears them chant it lustily,
And all in haste she coasteth° to the cry. proceeds

---

[1] There lives ... to other There exists a son [Adonis] born of an earthly [rather than a heavenly] mother who is able to give off light, even to the sun, just as the sun gives light to other bodies.

And as she runs, the bushes in the way
Some catch her by the neck, some kiss her face,
Some twine about her thigh to make her stay:
She wildly breaketh from their strict° embrace, tight
Like a milch° doe, whose swelling dugs° do ache, milk udders
Hasting to feed her fawn hid in some brake.° brush

By this,° she hears the hounds are at a bay,[1] now
Whereat she starts, like one that spies an adder
Wreathed up in fatal folds just in his way,
The fear whereof doth make him shake and shudder;
Even so the timorous° yelping of the hounds fearful
Appals her senses and her spirit confounds.

For now she knows it is no gentle chase,
But the blunt boar, rough bear, or lion proud,
Because the cry remaineth in one place,
Where fearfully the dogs exclaim aloud:
Finding their enemy to be so curst,° troublesome
They all strain courtesy who shall cope° him first. challenge

This dismal cry rings sadly in her ear,
Through which it enters to surprise her heart;
Who,° overcome by doubt and bloodless fear, which
With cold-pale weakness numbs each feeling part:
Like soldiers, when their captain once doth yield,
They basely fly and dare not stay° the field. stay in

Thus stands she in a trembling ecstasy;° agitation
Till, cheering up her senses all dismayed,
She tells them 'tis a causeless fantasy,
And childish error, that they are afraid;
Bids them leave° quaking, bids them fear no more— cease
And with that word she spied the hunted boar,

Whose frothy mouth, bepainted all with red,
Like milk and blood being mingled both together,
A second fear through all her sinews spread,
Which madly hurries her she knows not whither:
This way runs, and now she will no further,
But back retires to rate° the boar for murder. berate

A thousand spleens° bear her a thousand ways; whims
She treads the path that she untreads° again; retraces
Her more than haste is mated with delays,
Like the proceedings of a drunken brain,
Full of respects,° yet nought at all respecting; considerations
In hand with all things, nought at all effecting.[2]

Here kennelled in a brake° she finds a hound, hiding in the brush
And asks the weary caitiff° for his master, coward
And there another licking of his wound,
'Gainst venom'd sores the only sov'reign plaster;° effective treatment
And here she meets another sadly scowling,
To whom she speaks, and he replies with howling.

When he hath ceased his ill-resounding noise,
Another flap-mouthed mourner, black and grim,
Against the welkin° volleys out his voice; to the sky
Another, and another, answer him,
Clapping their proud tails to the ground below,
Shaking their scratched ears, bleeding as they go.

Look, how the world's poor people are amazed
At apparitions, signs, and prodigies,° wonders
Whereon with fearful eyes they long have gazed,
Infusing them with° dreadful prophecies; seeing in them
So she at these sad signs draws up her breath
And sighing it again, exclaims on° Death: speaks up against

"Hard-favoured tyrant, ugly, meagre, lean,
Hateful divorce of love,"—thus chides she Death—
"Grim-grinning ghost, earth's worm, what dost thou mean
To stifle beauty and to steal his breath,
Who when he lived, his breath and beauty set
Gloss on the rose, smell to the violet?

---

[1] at a bay Facing their prey, which is making a stand and keeping them at bay.

[2] In hand with all … effecting Involved in everything, yet not able to put anything into effect.

"If he be dead,—Oh no, it cannot be,
Seeing his beauty, thou shouldst strike at it:
O yes, it may; thou hast no eyes to see,[1]
But hatefully at random dost thou hit.
  Thy mark° is feeble age, but thy false dart target
  Mistakes that aim and cleaves an infant's heart.

"Hadst thou but bid beware, then he had spoke,[2]
And, hearing him, thy power had lost his° power. would have lost its
The Destinies will curse thee for this stroke;
They bid thee crop a weed, thou pluck'st a flower:
  Love's golden arrow at him should have fled,° flown
  And not Death's ebon° dart, to strike him dead. ebony

"Dost thou drink tears, that thou provok'st such weeping?
What may a heavy groan advantage thee?
Why hast thou cast into eternal sleeping
Those eyes that taught all other eyes to see?
  Now Nature cares not for thy mortal vigour,° lethal power
  Since her best work is ruined with thy rigour."

Here overcome, as one full of despair,
She vailed° her eyelids, who, like sluices, stopped lowered
The crystal tide that from her two cheeks fair
In the sweet channel of her bosom dropped;
  But through the flood-gates breaks the silver rain,
  And with his strong course opens them again.

Oh, how her eyes and tears did lend and borrow!
Her eyes seen in the tears, tears in her eye;
Both crystals, where they viewed each other's sorrow,
Sorrow that friendly sighs sought still to dry;
  But like a stormy day, now wind, now rain,
  Sighs dry her cheeks, tears make them wet again.

Variable passions throng her constant woe,
As striving who should best become° her grief; be suited to
All entertained,° each passion labours so, admitted
That every present sorrow seemeth chief,
  But none is best: then join they all together,
  Like many clouds consulting for° foul weather. coming together to bring

By this, far off she hears some huntsman hollo;° halloo, shout
A nurse's song ne'er pleased her babe so well:
The dire imagination she did follow
This sound of hope doth labour to expel;
  For now reviving joy bids her rejoice,
  And flatters her it is Adonis's voice.

Whereat her tears began to turn their tide,° ebb
Being prisoned in her eye like pearls in glass;
Yet sometimes falls an orient° drop beside, shining
Which her cheek melts, as° scorning it should pass, as if
  To wash the foul face of the sluttish ground,[3]
  Who is but drunken when she seemeth drowned.

O hard-believing love, how strange it seems
Not to believe, and yet too credulous!
Thy weal° and woe are both of them extremes; wealth
Despair and hope makes thee ridiculous:
  The one doth flatter thee in thoughts unlikely,
  In likely thoughts the other kills thee quickly.

Now she unweaves the web that she hath wrought:
Adonis lives, and Death is not to blame;
It was not she that called him all to naught,° everything evil
Now she adds honours to his hateful name;
  She clepes° him king of graves and grave for kings, proclaims
  Imperious supreme of all mortal things.

"No, no," quoth she, "sweet Death, I did but jest;
Yet pardon me, I felt a kind of fear
When as I met the boar, that bloody beast,
Which knows no pity, but is still severe;
  Then, gentle shadow—truth I must confess—
  I railed on° thee, fearing my love's decease. criticized

---

[1] thou shouldst ... see Continuing the image of death as a skull, with no eyes in the sockets.

[2] he had spoke [Adonis] would have spoken.

[3] To wash ... ground To wash the filthy dirt from the dirty face.

"'Tis not my fault: the boar provoked my tongue;
Be wreaked° on him, invisible commander; avenged
'Tis he, foul creature, that hath done thee wrong;
I did but act, he's author of thy slander:
Grief hath two tongues, and never woman yet
Could rule them both without ten women's wit."

Thus hoping that Adonis is alive,
Her rash suspect° she doth extenuate; sudden suspicion
And that his beauty may the better thrive,
With Death she humbly doth insinuate;° ingratiate herself
Tells him of trophies, statues, tombs, and stories
His victories, his triumphs, and his glories.

"O Jove," quoth she, "how much a fool was I,
To be of such a weak and silly mind,
To wail his death who lives and must not die
Till mutual overthrow of mortal kind![1]
For he being dead, with him is beauty slain,
And, beauty dead, black chaos comes again.

"Fie, fie, fond love, thou art so full of fear
As one with treasure laden, hemmed with thieves;
Trifles, unwitnessed with eye or ear,
Thy coward heart with false bethinking° grieves." imagination
Even at this word she hears a merry horn,
Whereat she leaps° that was but late forlorn. jumps for joy

As falcon to the lure,° away she flies; bait
The grass stoops not, she treads on it so light;
And in her haste unfortunately spies
The foul boar's conquest on her fair delight;
Which seen, her eyes, as murdered with the view,
Like stars ashamed of° day, themselves withdrew; put to shame by

Or, as the snail, whose tender horns being hit,
Shrinks backward in his shelly cave with pain,
And there, all smothered up, in shade doth sit,
Long after fearing to creep forth again;
So, at his bloody view, her eyes are fled
Into the deep dark cabins of her head:

Where they resign their office and their light
To the disposing of her troubled brain;
Who bids them still consort° with ugly night. always associate
And never wound the heart with looks again;
Who like a king perplexed° in his throne, distressed
By their suggestion° gives a deadly groan, [the eyes'] provocation

Whereat each tributary subject quakes;
As when the wind, imprisoned in the ground,
Struggling for passage, earth's foundation shakes,[2]
Which with cold terror doth men's minds confound.
This mutiny each part doth so surprise° overcome
That from their dark beds once more leap her eyes;

And, being opened, threw unwilling light
Upon the wide wound that the boar had trenched
In his soft flank; whose wonted° lily white usual
With purple tears, that his wound wept, was drenched:
No flower was nigh, no grass, herb, leaf, or weed,
But stole his blood and seemed with him to bleed.

This solemn sympathy poor Venus noteth;
Over one shoulder doth she hang her head;
Dumbly she passions,° franticly she doteth; mutely she agonizes
She thinks he could not die, he is not dead:
Her voice is stopped, her joints forget to bow;° bend
Her eyes are mad that they have wept till now.[3]

Upon his hurt she looks so steadfastly,
That her sight, dazzling,° makes the wound seem three; blurring
And then she reprehends her mangling eye,
That makes more gashes where no breach should be:
His face seems twain, each several limb is doubled;
For oft the eye mistakes, the brain being troubled.

[1] Till mutual overthrow of mortal kind Until the universal overthrow of mortality.

[2] earth's foundation shakes It was believed that earthquakes could be caused in this way.

[3] Her eyes are mad … till now Her eyes passionately believe they never until now have had cause for weeping.

"My tongue cannot express my grief for one,
And yet," quoth she, "behold two Adons dead!
My sighs are blown away, my salt tears gone,
Mine eyes are turned to fire, my heart to lead:
Heavy heart's lead, melt at mine eyes' red fire!
So shall I die by drops of hot desire.

"Alas, poor world, what treasure hast thou lost!
What face remains alive that's worth the viewing?
Whose tongue is music now? What canst thou boast
Of things long since, or any thing ensuing?
The flowers are sweet, their colours fresh and trim;
But true-sweet beauty lived and died with him.

"Bonnet nor veil henceforth no creature wear!
Nor sun nor wind will ever strive to kiss you:
Having no fair° to lose, you need not fear; beauty
The sun doth scorn you and the wind doth hiss you:
But when Adonis lived, sun and sharp air
Lurked like two thieves, to rob him of his fair.

"And therefore would he put his bonnet on,
Under whose brim the gaudy sun would peep;
The wind would blow it off and, being gone,
Play with his locks: then would Adonis weep;
And straight,° in pity of his tender years, at once
They both would strive who first should dry his tears.

"To see his face the lion walked along
Behind some hedge, because he would not fear° him; didn't want to frighten
To recreate° himself when he hath sung, entertain
The tiger would be tame and gently hear him;
If he had spoke, the wolf would leave his prey
And never fright the silly lamb that day.

"When he beheld his shadow in the brook,
The fishes spread on it their golden gills;
When he was by, the birds such pleasure took,
That some would sing, some other in their bills
Would bring him mulberries and ripe-red cherries;
He fed them with his sight, they him with berries.

"But this foul, grim, and urchin-snouted° boar, hedgehog-snouted
Whose downward eye still looketh for a grave,
Ne'er saw the beauteous livery° that he wore; garment
Witness the entertainment that he gave:
If he did see his face, why then I know
He thought to kiss him, and hath killed him so.

"'Tis true, 'tis true; thus was Adonis slain:
He ran upon the boar with his sharp spear,
Who did not whet his teeth at him again,
But by a kiss thought to persuade him[1] there;
And nuzzling in his flank, the loving swine
Sheathed unaware the tusk in his soft groin.

"Had I been toothed like him, I must confess,
With kissing him I should have killed him first;
But he is dead, and never did he bless
My youth with his; the more am I accursed."
With this, she falleth in the place she stood,
And stains her face with his congealèd blood.

She looks upon his lips, and they are pale;
She takes him by the hand, and that is cold;
She whispers in his ears a heavy tale,
As if they heard the woeful words she told;
She lifts the coffer-lids° that close his eyes, chest-lids
Where, lo, two lamps, burnt out, in darkness lies;

Two glasses, where herself herself beheld
A thousand times, and now no more reflect;
Their virtue° lost, wherein they late excelled, strength
And every beauty robbed of his° effect: its
"Wonder of time," quoth she, "this is my spite,[2]
That, thou being dead, the day should yet be light.

"Since thou art dead, lo, here I prophesy:
Sorrow on love hereafter shall attend:
It° shall be waited on with° jealousy, love / accompanied by
Find sweet beginning, but unsavoury end;
Ne'er settled equally, but high or low,
That all love's pleasure shall not match his woe.

"It shall be fickle, false and full of fraud,
Bud and be blasted in a breathing-while;° moment

---

[1] persuade him Persuade Adonis that he [the boar] was harmless.

[2] spite Source of frustration and torment.

The bottom poison, and the top o'erstrawed° covered
With sweets that shall the truest sight beguile:
The strongest body shall it make most weak,
Strike the wise dumb° and teach the fool to speak. mute

"It shall be sparing° and too full of riot,° stingy / extravagant
Teaching decrepit age to tread the measures;° dance
The staring° ruffian shall it keep in quiet, glaring
Pluck down the rich, enrich the poor with treasures;
It shall be raging-mad and silly-mild,
Make the young old, the old become a child.

"It shall suspect where is no cause of fear;
It shall not fear where it should most mistrust;
It shall be merciful and too severe,
And most deceiving when it seems most just;° honest
Perverse° it shall be where it shows most toward,° resistant obliging
Put fear to valour, courage to the coward.

"It shall be cause of war and dire events,
And set dissension 'twixt the son and sire;
Subject and servile to all discontents,[1]
As dry combustious matter is to fire:
Sith° in his prime Death doth my love destroy, since
They that love best their loves shall not enjoy."

By° this, the boy that by her side lay killed at
Was melted like a vapour from her sight,
And in his blood that on the ground lay spilled,
A purple flower sprung up, chequered with white,
Resembling well his pale cheeks and the blood
Which in round drops upon their whiteness stood.

She bows her head, the new-sprung flower° to smell, anemone
Comparing it to her Adonis's breath,
And says, within her bosom it shall dwell,
Since he himself is reft° from her by death: ripped
She crops the stalk, and in the breach appears
Green dropping sap, which she compares to tears.

"Poor flower," quoth she, "this was thy father's guise—° manner
Sweet issue of a more sweet-smelling sire—
For every little grief to wet his eyes:
To grow unto himself[2] was his desire,
And so 'tis thine; but know, it is as good
To wither in my breast as in his blood.

"Here was thy father's bed, here in my breast;
Thou art the next of blood,° and 'tis thy right: direct heir
Lo, in this hollow cradle take thy rest,
My throbbing heart shall rock thee day and night:
There shall not be one minute in an hour
Wherein I will not kiss my sweet love's flower."

Thus, weary of the world, away she hies,° hurries
And yokes her silver doves; by whose swift aid
Their mistress, mounted through the empty skies
In her light chariot, quickly is conveyed;
Holding their course to Paphos,[3] where their queen
Means to immure° herself and not be seen. seclude

IN CONTEXT

Venus and Adonis

from Ovid, Metamorphoses[1] (c. 8 CE)

There are various versions of the story of Adonis in classical mythology; that of Ovid was the version best known in Elizabethan England. The story is recounted in The Metamorphoses, a poem divided into fifteen books, in which Ovid narrates over two hundred stories, all of them involving some form of transformation.

Ovid's Latin text was first translated into English by William Caxton, who printed it in 1480. The translation most widely read in Shakespeare's time was by Arthur Golding; it was first printed in 1567. But it is very possible that Shakespeare knew the story from Ovid in the original Latin; it was a text frequently taught in school.

from BOOK 10

FABLE 8

[Myrrha has fallen in love with her father, Cinyras, and deceived him into having sex with her.] … Myrrha leaves the bedroom, … bearing Cinyras's seed in her incestuous womb.… The ensuing night repeats the guilty deed; nor is that night an end of it. At last, Cinyras, after so many embraces, longing to know the identity of his lover, brings a light into the bedchamber, and discovers both the crime and his own daughter.

His words stopped by grief, he draws his shining sword from its scabbard. Myrrha flees, and is rescued from death by the gloom of the dark night. She wanders [for a long time] across wide fields, … At length, being weary, she stays in the Sabaean country;[2] with difficulty she supports the heavy burden of her womb. Then, uncertain what to wish for, and torn between weariness of life and the fear of death, she utters a prayer of this sort: "O gods—those of you who favor those who are penitent: I have deserved severe punishment, and I do not shrink from it. If I live I may pollute the living; if I die I may pollute those who are departed. I pray that you expel me from both these realms; transform me, and deny me both life and death." There is always a god who has some regard for the penitent, and the last of Myrrha's prayers now finds gods to carry it out. The earth closes over her legs as she speaks, and a root shoots forth at an angle through her bursting nails, providing firm support to her tall trunk. Her bones become hard wood, and … her blood changes into sap, her arms into great branches, her fingers into smaller ones; her skin grows hard with bark. Now the growing tree has run over her heavy womb, and has covered her breast, and is ready to enclose her neck. She cannot endure delay, and sinks down to meet the approaching wood, and hides her features within the bark. Though she has lost her former senses together with her human shape, she still weeps on, and warm drops fall from the tree. There is a value even in her tears; the myrrh distilled from the bark of the tree retains her name to this day, and will be known to every future age.

The infant conceived in guilt grows beneath the wood, and seeks out a passage, by which he may extricate himself, having left his mother. Her pregnant womb swells in the middle of the tree. The burden distends the mother … the bending tree utters frequent groans, and is moistened with falling tears. Gentle Lucina stands by the moaning boughs, and applies her hands, and utters words that promote the child's delivery. The tree gapes open, in chinks, and through the cleft bark it discharges the living burden. The child cries; the Naiads, laying him on the soft grass, anoint him with the tears of his mother. Envy herself would have praised his face; just as the bodies of naked Cupids are painted in a picture, just so beautiful was he. …

Winged time glides on insensibly and deceives us; and there is nothing more fleeting than years. Adonis, born of his own sister and of his grandfather, who, so recently enclosed in a tree, and then born and just now a most beautiful infant, has now become a youth, and now a man, and is now even more beautiful than he was before. And now he pleases Venus. … She abandons the skies; constantly she pays attention to him. She, who has been always accustomed … to improving her beauty by taking care of herself in shady places, wanders over the tops of mountains, through the woods, and over bushy rocks, bare to the knee and with her robes tucked up. … She hunts animals that are harmless prey, either swift hares, or stags with their lofty horns, or the deer; she keeps far away from the fierce boars, and avoids the hungry wolves, the bears armed with claws, and the lions that slaughter the herds. She tells Adonis to fear these animals too; will her advice make any difference? "Be brave," she says to him, "only against those animals that flee from you. Boldness is not safe against those animals that are bold. Resist the impulse, O youth, to be reckless …; do not attack the wild beasts to which nature has granted weapons, lest your thirst for glory should cost me dear. Neither your age, nor your beauty, nor the other things that have made an impression on Venus will make any impression on lions and bristly boars, and the eyes and the tempers of wild beasts. The fierce boars carry lightning in their curving tusks; there is rage and fury unlimited in the tawny lions; and the whole race is odious to me."

Upon his asking why these animals are odious to her, Venus says, "I will tell you, and you will be surprised at how this resulted from a wrong committed long ago. But this toil to which I am unaccustomed has now fatigued me. Look here, a convenient poplar invites us with its shade, and the soft grass will be like a couch. Here I desire to lie down, together with you." So saying she rests herself on the ground, and presses against the grass and against Adonis at the same time. And with her cheek resting against the youth's chest, she smiles and mingles kisses in among her words as she speaks: "Perhaps you have heard how a certain damsel excelled the swiftest men in the contest of speed. That report was no idle tale; she did indeed do better than the swiftest men. [Venus speak at length, telling Adonis of Atalanta, and also recounting the story of Hippomenes. At length she returns to the theme of the danger that Adonis will be exposed to if he chooses to fight against wild beasts.]

"[Adonis], you who I love, … avoid all kinds of wild beasts which do not turn their backs on you in flight, but turn towards you to fight; otherwise, your courage shall be fatal to us both."

FABLE 10

Venus has indeed given him warning. Harnessing her swans, she wings her way through the air; but his courage stands in opposition to her advice. By chance, his dogs have followed the path of a boar. They rouse the animal, and [Adonis] pierces him as the animal is trying to escape from the wood; the boar is wounded in the side. Immediately the fierce boar, with his crooked snout, knocks out the hunting-spear [that Adonis had pierced him with], now stained with the blood of the boar. The boar then pursues Adonis, who trembles and seeks some way to escape to safety. The boar lodges his tusks deep in the groin of Adonis; the youth stretches out on the yellow sand, and dies.

[Venus], borne in her light chariot through the middle of the air, is not yet arrived at Cyprus upon the wings of her swans. She recognizes from afar the groans of Adonis as he is dying, and turns her white birds towards the place where he lies. And when, from the lofty sky, she sees him half dead, his body bathed in his own blood, she rapidly descends, and tears at her garments and at her hair, and then strikes herself again and again with her distracted hands. She complains to the Fates: "But all things shall not be in your power," she tells them. "Memorials of my sorrow over Adonis shall always remain. Adonis, the representation of your death shall be repeated yearly, and shall be in imitation of my mourning. But your blood shall be changed into a flower." … Having thus said, she sprinkles his blood with sweet-smelling nectar. Touched by it, the blood effervesces, just as the transparent bubbles will rise up in rainy weather. No more than an hour passes before a flower springs up from the blood of [Adonis], a flower of the same color as a pomegranate, which conceals its seeds beneath its tough rind. Yet the enjoyment of this flower, [the anemone,] is short-lived, for the same winds that give it a name[1] beat it down; it has but a slight hold on life, and is so slender that it easily falls.

Henry Peacham, "Adonis Killed by a Boar" (1612)

In this typical emblem (motto, picture, poem) Venus's beloved, beautiful young Adonis, is killed by a boar. Peacham reads the story as condemning sexual love for the laziness, depravity, and brain-damage it can cause, but the image has a curiously erotic look, and most readers would recall Adonis pays dearly for preferring the hunt to Venus. In some versions the boar had fallen in love with Adonis and was merely trying to kiss him in or near his genitals, inadvertently killing him. After his death a sorrowing Venus turns him into an anemone flower. Most famously told in Ovid's Metamorphoses and retold in Shakespeare's Venus and Adonis (1593), the myth was read in various ways, especially as showing the dangers of ignoring the goddess of love and as symbolizing the annual darkening of the sun by the boar of winter. In ancient Athens women mourned the death of Adonis each year, but according to the story, after some months as a flower the young man would revive—only to die and be mourned again the next year. Boars were wintry but also noble, hunted by the aristocracy; the Earl of Oxford had one as his symbol, as did Richard III, imagery that Shakespeare exploits in his play Richard III when the solar Henry Tudor defeats the murderous usurper. A transcription of the poem and a translation of the Latin epigram appear below.

"I much did muse, why Venus could not brook,
The savage boar, and lion cruel fierce,
Since Kings and Princes have such pleasure took
In hunting: haply cause a boar did pierce
Her Adonis fair, who better lik't the sport,
Then spend his days, in wanton pleasure's court.

Which fiction though devised by Poet's brain,
It signifies unto the Reader this;
Such exercise Love will not entertain,
Who liketh best, to live in Idleness:
The foe to virtue, Canker of the Wit,
That brings a thousand miseries with it."

The Latin epigram is unidentified and is perhaps original. It means: "Are you surprised that Venus hates the fleeing hares, / The woodland stags, and the bristly race of boars? / This is either because the Cynarian Hero fell down dead, / Or, instead, because love is unsuited to sports like these" (translated into elegiacs by Lydia K. Lake).

The Sonnets

Begun in the 1590s, intermittently revised, and with some of its contents already circulating, Shakespeare's Sonnets was printed in 1609 under obscure circumstances. Did Shakespeare authorize publication by the printer Thomas Thorpe? Did he organize the sonnets himself? Is there a pattern to them? The 154 sonnets, concluding with two light poems on Cupid, are followed by a long "Lover's Complaint" in a female voice. How does this poem fit the volume, and do we know with any certainty that Shakespeare is the author of it as well?

The volume's structure parallels that of sonnet collections in the 1590s, such as Samuel Daniel's Delia and Spenser's Epithalamion and Amoretti. Is Shakespeare merely following this example or subtly commenting on it? Who is the "W.H." whom the printer Thorpe calls "the only begetter" of the sonnets? No one knows. Nor, despite sometimes wild speculation, do we know the identity of the beautiful but faithless young man to whom many of the sonnets are addressed (or if there is only one young man), or that of the "dark lady" whom the lover treats with erotic admiration and moral contempt, or that of the rival poet to whom some sonnets allude. Is the lady always the same woman? Sonnet 145 seems to pun on "Hathaway," maiden name of Shakespeare's wife, Anne. Who is the presumed speaker of these sonnets? Several sonnets pun on the "Will"—a useful name, for it could also denote a faculty of the soul, sexual desire, and even the genitals.

For many years the sonnets received little attention or respect. The second edition of Shakespeare's poems, a shabby volume published by John Benson (1640), feminizes some pronouns, runs some sonnets together, and plagiarizes some commentary; it did the sonnets' reputation no good, and it was not until relatively recently that their splendor and power was fully acknowledged.

One source of older generations' unease with the sonnets was the passion with which the speaker addresses a younger man. It is conventional to think that the first 126 sonnets are to or about this youth and most of the remainder to or about a "dark lady," but many of the sonnets leave the gender of the addressee unspecified. Some of those undeniably involving the young man are clearly expressive of strong homoerotic desire, but the extent to which such desire is acted upon is much less clear. Sonnet 20 seems to say that a sexual relation between the speaker and his friend is impossible, but for some recent critics the poem's puns hint at the opposite. However we read them, such ardent expressions of love and longing for a fellow man are unusual, although not unparalleled, in the literature either of Renaissance England or the Continent.

Also unusual is the lover's sexually reciprocated but problematic love for a compliant if unfaithful woman. This is another respect in which Shakespeare makes a show of revising the Petrarchan tradition familiar to him from Renaissance poetry, in which the love of the male wooer was typically not reciprocated by his female beloved. Much as Shakespeare was clearly indebted to the Petrarchan tradition, he departed from it in a variety of ways.

In form, Petrarch and most other Italian poets had made it a practice to divide their sonnets formally into an octave followed by a sestet. Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, had been instrumental in the development of an "English" sonnet pattern of three quatrains followed by a couplet. Shakespeare varies the structure of his sonnets in a number of ways, but generally employs rhyme schemes deriving from the "English" pattern (most commonly: abab cdcd efef gg).

Whether or not we read Sonnets as a sequence, certain recurrent motifs are worth noticing: desire and "will" in every sense, the ruinous passage of time together with the physical and poetic means of surmounting its ravages, the cyclical and poignant beauty of the natural world, and the paradoxes involved in loving the unworthy. Just as notable is the language, which offers an astonishing array of puns, syntactic or lexical ambiguities, and metaphors that evolve through associative connections with a logic just below the surface sense of the verse. Note, for example, how Sonnet 60 moves from ocean waves, to crooked eclipses that must involve the moon (which affects the ocean), to the (curved) plow that makes agricultural furrows, that parallels the wrinkles of bent age, and to Time's curved scythe. Shakespeare can also be funny, though—as witness Sonnet 135's bawdy insinuations, or the resigned (bitter? amused?) puns in Sonnet 138 on lying to and lying with a lover.

Sonnets

From fairest creatures we desire increase,° progeny
That thereby beauty's rose might never die,
But as the riper should by time[1] decease
His tender° heir might bear his memory: young
But thou, contracted[2] to thine own bright eyes,
Feed'st thy light's flame with self-substantial fuel,[3]
Making a famine where abundance lies,[4]
Thyself thy foe, to thy sweet self too cruel.
Thou that art now the world's fresh° ornament, unspoiled
And only herald to the gaudy[5] spring,
Within thine own bud buriest thy content,[6]
And, tender churl, mak'st waste in niggarding.[7]
Pity the world, or else this glutton[8] be,
To eat the world's due, by the grave and thee.[9]

When forty[10] winters shall besiege thy brow,
And dig deep trenches in thy beauty's field,
Thy youth's proud livery,° so gazed on now, uniform
Will be a tattered weed° of small worth held: garment
Then being asked, where all thy beauty lies,
Where all the treasure of thy lusty° days, vigorous
To say, within thine own deep-sunken eyes,
Were an all-eating shame and thriftless[11] praise.
How much more praise deserved thy beauty's use[12]
If thou couldst answer, "This fair child of mine
Shall sum my count, and make my old excuse,"[13]
Proving his beauty by succession° thine: legal inheritance
This were to be new made when thou art old,
And see thy blood warm when thou feel'st it cold.

12

When I do count the clock[14] that tells the time,
And see the brave° day sunk in hideous night; splendid
When I behold the violet past prime,
And sable curls all silvered o'er with white:
When lofty trees I see barren of leaves,
Which erst from heat did canopy the herd,[15]
And summer's green all girded° up in sheaves bundled
Borne on the bier with white and bristly beard:[16]

---

[1] But But rather that; riper Older; by time Because of the passage of time.

[2] contracted Betrothed; also confined.

[3] Feed'st … fuel Like a candle, you consume your own substance with self-love; cf. the story of Narcissus in Ovid, Metamorphoses 3.464 ("I am burned by love of myself / I produce and am consumed by flames").

[4] Making … lies Cf. Metamorphoses 3.466 ("my very abundance makes me poor").

[5] only Chief; gaudy Brightly colored, but not in the modern pejorative sense.

[6] content Contentment; also, essence.

[7] churl Here, miser; mak'st … niggarding Cf. Romeo and Juliet 1.1.223; niggarding Behaving in a miserly fashion.

[8] this glutton This kind of glutton.

To … thee What should belong to the world will be consumed first by yourself, then by death.

[10] forty Number signifying many and, in Shakespeare's time, corresponding to late middle age.

[11] thriftless Wasteful or unprofitable.

[12] deserved … use Would thy beauty's use deserve; use Proper employment, also engagement for profit, as in money on loan.

[13] sum my count Display the total of my assets; make … excuse Justify or make reparation for my old age.

[14] count the clock Count the sounds of the clock.

[15] erst Formerly; canopy the herd Provide shade for livestock.

[16] bier Barrow or litter for carrying crops, but more often associated with the bearing of a corpse to the grave; white … beard As on wheat or barley after harvest.

Then of thy beauty do I question make,
That thou among the wastes of time must go,
Since sweets and beauties do themselves forsake,[1]
And die as fast as they see others grow,
And nothing 'gainst time's scythe can make defence
Save breed° to brave° him, when he reproduce / defy takes thee hence.

15

When I consider° everything that grows consider that
Holds in perfection but a little moment;
That this huge stage presenteth naught but shows[2]
Whereon the stars in secret influence[3] comment;
When I perceive that men as plants increase,
Cheered and checked even by the self-same sky,
Vaunt° in their youthful sap, at height decrease, exult
And wear their brave state out of memory:[4]
Then the conceit of this inconstant stay[5]
Sets you, most rich in youth, before my sight,
Where wasteful[6] time debateth with decay
To change your day of youth to sullied[7] night:
And all in war with time for love of you
As he takes from you, I engraft[8] you new.

16

But wherefore° do not you a mightier way why
Make war upon this bloody tyrant, time,
And fortify yourself in your decay
With means more blessed than my barren rhyme?
Now stand you on the top of happy hours,
And many maiden gardens, yet unset,° unplanted
With virtuous wish would bear your living flowers,
Much liker[9] than your painted counterfeit:
So should the lines of life that life repair,[10]
Which this, time's pencil or my pupil pen,
Neither in inward worth nor outward fair,° beauty
Can make you live yourself in eyes of men:
To give away yourself[11] keeps yourself still,° always
And you must live drawn by your own sweet skill.

18

Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?
Thou art more lovely and more temperate:
Rough winds do shake the darling buds of May,
And summer's lease hath all too short a date:
Sometime too hot the eye of heaven shines,
And often is his gold complexion dimmed;
And every fair° from fair sometime declines, beauty
By chance, or nature's changing course, untrimmed:
But thy eternal summer shall not fade,
Nor lose possession of that fair thou ow'st,° own
Nor shall death brag thou wander'st in his shade
When in eternal lines to time thou grow'st:
So long as men can breathe or eyes can see,
So long lives this, and this gives life to thee.

19

Devouring time, blunt thou the lion's paws,
And make the earth devour her own sweet brood;
Pluck the keen teeth from the fierce tiger's jaws,
And burn the long-lived Phoenix in her blood;[12]
Make glad and sorry seasons as thou fleet'st,
And do whate'er thou wilt, swift-footed time,
To the wide world and all her fading sweets:° pleasures
But I forbid thee one most heinous crime,
O carve not with thy hours my love's fair brow,
Nor draw no lines there with thine antique[13] pen;

[1] sweets Pleasures, or people or things affording pleasure; themselves forsake Lose their essence through time.

[2] this huge stage The world as stage was a common notion in the Renaissance; cf. Shakespeare's As You Like It 2.7.139–40: "All the world's a stage / And all the men and women merely players"; shows Theatrical displays.

[3] secret influence The supposed life effects of the stars on human life and temperament.

[4] wear … memory Decay until their glory fades from memory.

[5] conceit Thought; conception; inconstant stay Constant state ("stay") of inconstancy, or change, as in the aging process.

[6] wasteful In the sense of wasting or destructive.

[7] sullied Tarnished; made gloomy or dull.

[8] engraft Insert a scion, or shoot, from one tree into the bark of another, from which it gains sustenance.

[9] liker More like you.

[10] lines of life Bloodlines of your descendants, or the outlines of you reflected in them; repair Restore.

[11] give away yourself Marry.

[12] Phoenix Mythical bird that after living five or six centuries burns itself in a nest of spices and then rises from the ashes renewed to begin another cycle; in her blood Alive.

[13] antique Ancient.

Him in thy course untainted[1] do allow
For beauty's pattern to succeeding men.
Yet do thy worst, old Time, despite thy wrong,
My love shall in my verse ever live young.

20

A woman's face with nature's own hand painted
Hast thou, the master mistress of my passion;
A woman's gentle heart, but not acquainted
With shifting change, as is false women's fashion;
An eye more bright than theirs, less false in rolling,[2]
Gilding the object whereupon it gazeth;
A man in hue,° all hues in his controlling, appearance
Which steals men's eyes and women's souls amazeth;
And for a woman wert thou first created,
Till nature as she wrought thee fell a-doting,
And by addition[3] me of thee defeated,
By adding one thing to my purpose nothing:
But since she pricked[4] thee out for women's pleasure,
Mine be thy love, and thy love's use[5] their treasure.

23

As an unperfect actor[6] on the stage,
Who with his fear is put besides[7] his part;
Or some fierce thing, replete with too much rage,
Whose strength's abundance weakens his own heart;
So I, for fear of trust,[8] forget to say
The perfect ceremony[9] of love's right,° due
And in mine own love's strength seem to decay,
O'ercharged with burden of mine own love's might:
O let my books be then the eloquence
And dumb presagers[10] of my speaking breast,
Who plead for love, and look for recompense,
More than that tongue that more hath more expressed:
O learn to read what silent love hath writ!
To hear with eyes belongs to love's fine wit.[11]

29

When in disgrace with fortune and men's eyes
I all alone beweep my outcast state,
And trouble deaf heav'n with my bootless° cries, unavailing
And look upon myself, and curse my fate,
Wishing me like to one more rich in hope,
Featured like him,[12] like him with friends possessed,
Desiring this man's art° and that man's scope, skill
With what I most enjoy contented least;
Yet in these thoughts myself almost despising,
Haply° I think on thee, and then my state, by chance
Like to the lark at break of day arising,
From sullen° earth sings hymns at heaven's gate; dark, gloomy
For thy sweet love remembered such wealth brings
That then I scorn to change my state with kings.

30

When to the sessions° of sweet silent thought judicial sittings
I summon up remembrance of things past,[13]
I sigh the lack of many a thing I sought,
And with old woes new wail my dear time's waste;
Then can I drown an eye (unused to flow)
For precious friends hid in death's dateless night,
And weep afresh love's long since cancelled woe,
And moan th'expense° of many a vanished sight. loss
Then can I grieve at grievances foregone,° past
And heavily from woe to woe tell° o'er count
The sad account of fore-bemoanéd moan,
Which I new pay, as if not paid before;
But if the while I think on thee, dear friend,
All losses are restored, and sorrows end.

---

[1] untainted Unmarked, unhurt.

[2] rolling Glancing at lovers.

[3] by addition I.e., of male genitals.

[4] pricked Selected; "prick" was also slang for penis.

[5] love's use Sexual pleasure and probably the suggestion of reproduction and increase, with a pun on "usury."

[6] unperfect actor Actor who does not remember his lines accurately.

[7] is put besides Loses track of, forgets.

[8] for … trust Afraid to trust myself, or perhaps afraid of not being trusted.

[9] perfect ceremony Precise words demanded by the situation.

[10] dumb presagers Silent signals.

[11] belongs … wit Is characteristic of love's subtle intelligence.

[12] Featured like him With physical attractions like his.

[13] summon Call to court; remembrance … past Cf. Geneva Bible (1560), Wisdom 11.10: "For their grief was double with mourning, and the remembrance of things past."

33

Full many a glorious morning have I seen
Flatter the mountain tops with sovereign eye,
Kissing with golden face the meadows green,
Gilding pale streams with heavenly alchemy;
Anon° permit the basest clouds to ride soon
With ugly rack[1] on his celestial face,
And from the forlorn world his visage hide,
Stealing unseen to west with this disgrace:
Even so my sun one early morn did shine
With all triumphant splendour on my brow;
But out alack,[2] he was but one hour mine,
The region cloud[3] hath masked him from me now.
Yet him for this, my love no whit[4] disdaineth:
Suns of the world may stain,[5] when heaven's sun staineth.

35

No more be grieved at that which thou hast done;
Roses have thorns, and silver fountains mud;
Clouds and eclipses stain both moon and sun,
And loathsome canker° lives in sweetest bud. caterpillar
All men make faults, and even I, in this,
Authorizing thy trespass with compare,° comparisons
Myself corrupting, salving thy amiss,[6]
Excusing these sins more than these sins are:[7]
For to thy sensual fault I bring in sense;[8]
Thy adverse party is thy advocate,[9]
And 'gainst myself a lawful plea commence:
Such civil war is in my love and hate
That I an accessary needs must be
To that sweet thief which sourly robs from me.

36

Let me confess that we two must be twain,° separate
Although our undivided loves are one;
So shall those blots° that do with me remain, disgraces
Without thy help, by me be borne alone.
In our two loves there is but one respect,[10]
Though in our lives a separable spite;[11]
Which, though it alter not love's sole effect,[12]
Yet doth it steal sweet hours from love's delight.
I may not evermore acknowledge[13] thee,
Lest my bewailed guilt should do thee shame,
Nor thou with public kindness honour me,
Unless thou take[14] that honour from thy name:
But do not so;[15] I love thee in such sort,
As thou being mine, mine is thy good report.

55

Not marble, nor the gilded monuments
Of princes, shall outlive this powerful rhyme;
But you shall shine more bright in these contents[16]
Than unswept stone, besmeared with sluttish time.[17]
When wasteful war shall statues overturn
And broils° root out the work of masonry, violent quarrels
Nor Mars[18] his sword, nor war's quick° fire, shall burn vigorous
The living record of your memory:
'Gainst death, and all oblivious[19] enmity,
Shall you pace forth; your praise shall still find room
Even in the eyes of all posterity
That wear this world out to the ending doom.[20]

---

[1] rack Mass of clouds driven by the wind in the upper air.

[2] out alack An expression of sharp regret.

[3] region cloud Clouds of the upper air.

[4] no whit Not the least bit.

[5] stain Lose luster or brightness.

[6] salving thy amiss Excusing or explaining away your wrong.

[7] Excusing … are My making excuses for your sins is worse than the actual sins themselves.

[8] bring in sense Add spurious reasoning.

[9] adverse party Legal opponent; advocate Legal defender.

[10] one respect A single, and hence mutual, regard.

[11] a separable spite An injury or misfortune capable of separating us.

[12] love's sole effect Our unity in love.

[13] acknowledge Greet or recognize in public.

[14] Unless thou take Without taking.

[15] do not so Do not display such public kindness toward me.

[16] these contents The contents of these poems.

[17] Than … time Than in dust-covered stone dirtied by the passage of time, which is dirty and grimy ("sluttish") in its effects.

[18] Mars Roman god of war.

[19] oblivious Bringing about oblivion.

[20] ending doom Last Judgment at the end of the world.

So till the judgement that yourself arise,[1]
You live in this, and dwell in lovers' eyes.

60

Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore,
So do our minutes hasten to their end,
Each changing place with that which goes before,
In sequent toil all forwards do contend.
Nativity, once in the main° of light, broad expanse
Crawls to maturity; wherewith being crowned
Crooked eclipses 'gainst his glory fight,
And time, that gave, doth now his gift confound.° ruin
Time doth transfix° the flourish set on youth, pierce
And delves the parallels[2] in beauty's brow;
Feeds on the rarities of nature's truth,
And nothing stands[3] but for his scythe to mow.
And yet to times in hope my verse shall stand,
Praising thy worth, despite his cruel hand.

64

When I have seen by time's fell hand defaced
The rich proud cost[4] of outworn buried age;[5]
When sometime lofty towers I see down razed,
And brass eternal slave to mortal rage;[6]
When I have seen the hungry ocean gain
Advantage on the kingdom of the shore,
And the firm soil win of the wat'ry main,° ocean
Increasing store° with loss, and loss with store; gain
When I have seen such interchange of state,
Or state itself confounded,° to decay, ruined
Ruin hath taught me thus to ruminate:
That time will come and take my love away.
This thought is as a death, which cannot choose
But weep[7] to have that which it fears to lose.

65

Since brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea,
But sad mortality o'er-sways° their power, overcomes
How with this rage[8] shall beauty hold a plea,[9]
Whose action is no stronger than a flower?
O how shall summer's honey breath hold out
Against the wrackful° siege of batt'ring days destructive
When rocks impregnable are not so stout,
Nor gates of steel so strong, but time decays?
O fearful meditation! Where, alack,
Shall time's best jewel from time's chest lie hid?
Or what strong hand can hold his swift foot back,
Or who his spoil° o'er beauty can forbid? plunder
O none, unless this miracle have might:
That in black ink my love may still shine bright.

71

No longer mourn for me when I am dead
Than you shall hear[10] the surly sullen bell[11]
Give warning to the world that I am fled
From this vile world, with vilest worms to dwell:
Nay, if you read this line, remember not
The hand that writ it, for I love you so
That I in your sweet thoughts would be forgot,
If thinking on me then should make you woe.[12]
O if (I say) you look upon this verse,
When I, perhaps, compounded am with clay,
Do not so much as my poor name rehearse,° utter
But let your love even° with my life decay; along
Lest the wise world should look into your moan,[13]
And mock you with me[14] after I am gone.

73

That time of year thou mayst in me behold,
When yellow leaves, or none, or few do hang
Upon those boughs which shake against the cold,

---

[1] That … arise When you yourself are resurrected.

[2] delves the parallels Digs the trenches, i.e., forms the wrinkled lines; cf. Sonnet 2.2: "… dig deep trenches in thy beauty's field."

[3] stands Grows to full height, as a plant ready for harvest.

[4] rich … cost Prideful and extravagant splendor.

[5] outworn … age Antiquity worn out and obscured by time.

[6] brass … rage Brass, known for its durability, but also subject ultimately to the fatally destructive effects of time.

[7] cannot … weep Can only weep.

[8] with this rage Against this destructive action.

[9] hold a plea Present a legal case.

[10] you shall hear The span of time during which you hear.

[11] surly … bell Passing-bell, rung solemnly from the church to announce a death, customarily one chime for each year of the deceased's lifespan.

[12] make you woe Cause you grief.

[13] look … moan Question the cause of your grief.

[14] with me Along with me, and perhaps in the same manner.

Bare ruined choirs[1] where late the sweet birds sang;
In me thou seest the twilight of such day
As after sunset fadeth in the west,
Which by and by black night doth take away,
Death's second self[2] that seals up all in rest;
In me thou seest the glowing of such fire
That on the ashes of his youth doth lie,
As the deathbed, whereon it must expire,
Consumed with that which it was nourished by;
This thou perceiv'st, which makes thy love more strong,
To love that well, which thou must leave° ere long. lose

74

But be contented when that fell° arrest cruel
Without all bail shall carry me away.[3]
My life hath in this line[4] some interest,
Which for memorial still[5] with thee shall stay.
When thou reviewest this, thou dost review
The very part was consecrate to thee.
The earth can have but earth, which is his due;
My spirit is thine, the better part of me.
So then thou hast but° lost the dregs of life, only
The prey of worms, my body being dead,
The coward conquest of a wretch's knife,
Too base of thee to be remembered.
The worth of that is that which it contains,[6]
And that is this, and this with thee remains.

80

O how I faint° when I of you do write, lose heart
Knowing a better spirit[7] doth use your name,
And in the praise thereof spends all his might,
To make me tongue-tied speaking of your fame.
But since your worth, wide as the ocean is,
The humble as the proudest sail doth bear,° carry along
My saucy bark,[8] inferior far to his,
On your broad main° doth wilfully appear. ocean
Your shallowest help will hold me up afloat,
Whilst he upon your soundless° deep doth ride; immeasurable
Or, being wracked, I am a worthless boat,
He of tall building, and of goodly pride.
Then if he thrive, and I be cast away,
The worst was this: my love was my decay.

87

Farewell—thou art too dear[9] for my possessing,
And like enough thou know'st thy estimate.° value
The charter of thy worth gives thee releasing;[10]
My bonds in thee are all determinate.° expired
For how do I hold thee but by thy granting,
And for that riches where is my deserving?[11]
The cause of this fair gift in me is wanting,
And so my patent° back again is swerving. title to property
Thyself thou gav'st, thy own worth then not knowing,
Or me to whom thou gav'st it else mistaking;
So thy great gift, upon misprision° growing, error
Comes home again, on better judgement making.
Thus have I had thee as a dream doth flatter:
In sleep a king, but waking no such matter.

93

So shall I live supposing thou art true
Like a deceived husband; so love's face
May still seem love to me, though altered new—
Thy looks with me, thy heart in other place.
For there can live no hatred in thine eye,
Therefore in that I cannot know thy change.[12]
In many's looks the false heart's history
Is writ in moods and frowns and wrinkles strange;

---

[1] choirs Parts of churches designated for singers.

[2] Death's second self Sleep.

[3] But be … away Some modern editors punctuate these lines with a semi-colon after "contented" and a comma after "away."

[4] in this line I.e., in this verse.

[5] for memorial still As a remembrance always.

[6] The worth of that … contains The value of the body is that it contains the spirit.

[7] a better spirit A rival poet of superior gifts, referred to in Sonnet 79.

[8] bark Small boat.

[9] too dear Both "too expensive" and "too much loved."

[10] The charter … releasing The document stating your value releases you (from any associated debts).

[11] for that riches … deserving? How do I deserve the rich reward (of being granted your affection)?

[12] in that … change From your eye I cannot know that your heart has changed.

But heav'n in thy creation did decree
That in thy face sweet love should ever dwell;
Whate'er thy thoughts or thy heart's workings be,
Thy looks should nothing thence but sweetness tell.
How like Eve's apple doth thy beauty grow
If thy sweet virtue answer not thy show![1]

94

They that have power to hurt and will do none,
That do not do the thing they most do show,[2]
Who, moving others, are themselves as stone,
Unmovèd, cold, and to temptation slow—[3]
They rightly do inherit heaven's graces,
And husband° nature's riches from conserve expense;° spending
They are the lords and owners of their faces,
Others but stewards° of their excellence. managers
The summer's flower is to the summer sweet
Though to itself it only live and die,
But if that flower with base infection meet
The basest weed outbraves his dignity;[4]
For sweetest things turn sourest by their deeds:
Lilies that fester smell far worse than weeds.

97

How like a winter hath my absence been
From thee, the pleasure of the fleeting year!
What freezings have I felt, what dark days seen,
What old December's bareness everywhere!
And yet this time removed[5] was summer's time,
The teeming autumn big with[6] rich increase
Bearing the wanton burden of the prime,[7]
Like widowed wombs after their lords' decease:
Yet this abundant issue° seemed to me offspring
But hope of orphans, and unfathered fruit;
For summer and his pleasures wait on thee,[8]
And thou away, the very birds are mute;
Or if they sing, 'tis with so dull a cheer
That leaves look pale, dreading the winter's near.

98

From you have I been absent in the spring,
When proud pied° April, dressed particolored
in all his trim,° adornment
Hath put a spirit of youth in everything,
That° heavy Saturn[9] laughed, and leaped such that with him.
Yet nor the lays° of birds, nor the sweet smell songs
Of different flowers in odour and in hue,
Could make me any summer's story tell,
Or from their proud lap[10] pluck them where they grew;
Nor did I wonder at the lily's white,
Nor praise the deep vermilion in the rose;
They were but° sweet, but figures of delight, merely Drawn after you, you pattern of all those.
Yet seemed it winter still, and, you away,
As with your shadow I with these did play.

105

Let not my love be called idolatry,
Nor my beloved as an idol show,[11]
Since all alike my songs and praises be
To one, of one, still such, and ever so.
Kind is my love today, tomorrow kind,[12]
Still constant in a wondrous excellence.
Therefore my verse, to constancy confined,
One thing expressing, leaves out difference.
"Fair, kind, and true" is all my argument,
"Fair, kind, and true" varying to other words,

[1] How like … thy show How much your beauty grows to resemble the attractiveness of the apple to Eve (i.e., that it will lead to the downfall of the one attracted to it) if your virtue does not match your appearance.

[2] the thing they most do show It is not entirely clear what this thing is, but it probably relates to romantic or sexual activity; "though they inspire love, they do not reciprocate," is one possible paraphrase.

[3] to temptation slow Slow to respond to temptation.

[4] But if that flower … dignity The most common weed will outshine a lovely flower that has been infected by disease.

[5] time removed Time of my absence.

big with Great with, about to give birth to.

[7] burden Contents of a womb; prime Spring.

[8] wait on thee Hold themselves in abeyance until you are present.

[9] Saturn Planetary God associated astrologically with the melancholy humor.

[10] their proud lap The rich earth that nurtures them.

[11] as an idol show Seem to be (perhaps also with a pun on "idle"—"be called an insignificant creature of appearances").

[12] Kind … kind Both "of one sort today, and the same tomorrow," and "kind" in the sense of "having a gentle and sympathetic nature."

And in this change is my invention spent,[1]
Three themes in one, which wondrous scope affords.
Fair, kind, and true have often lived alone,
Which three till now never kept seat in one.

106

When in the chronicle of wasted time[2]
I see descriptions of the fairest wights,[3]
And beauty making beautiful old rhyme,
In praise of ladies dead, and lovely knights;
Then in the blazon[4] of sweet beauties best,
Of hand, of foot, of lip, of eye, of brow,
I see their antique pen would have expressed
Even such a beauty as you master° now: possess
So all their praises are but prophecies
Of this our time, all you prefiguring;
And for° they looked but with divining eyes since
They had not skill enough your worth to sing;
For we which now behold these present days
Have eyes to wonder, but lack tongues to praise.

109

O never say that I was false of heart,
Though absence seemed my flame to qualify;
As easy might I from myself depart
As from my soul which in thy breast doth lie:
That is my home of love; if I have ranged,
Like him that travels I return again,
Just to the time,[5] not with the time exchanged,[6]
So that myself bring water for my stain;[7]
Never believe, though in my nature reigned
All frailties that besiege all kinds of blood,
That it could so preposterously be stained,° corrupted
To leave for nothing all thy sum of good:
For nothing this wide universe I call,
Save thou, my rose; in it thou art my all.

110

Alas, 'tis true, I have gone here and there,
And made myself a motley to the view,[8]
Gored[9] mine own thoughts, sold cheap what is most dear,
Made old offences of affections new.[10]
Most true it is that I have looked on truth° constancy
Askance and strangely;° but by all above, coldly
These blenches[11] gave my heart another youth,[12]
And worse essays[13] proved thee my best of love.
Now all is done, save what shall have no end;
Mine appetite I never more will grind° whet
On newer proof,° to try° an older friend, experience / test
A god in love, to whom I am confined:° devoted
Then give me welcome, next my heaven the best,
Even to thy pure and most most loving breast.

116

Let me not to the marriage of true minds
Admit impediments;[14] love is not love
Which alters when it alteration finds,
Or bends with the remover[15] to remove.
O no, it is an ever-fixed mark,
That looks on tempests and is never shaken;
It is the star to every wand'ring bark,° boat

---

[1] varying ... spent My inventiveness is used up in finding other words (to express the same thought).

[2] wasted time Time gone by, with "chronicles" suggesting previous eras, or "olden times."

[3] fairest wights Most beautiful people, again with an archaic flavor by Shakespeare's time.

[4] blazon Description catalogue of a beloved's body.

[5] Just ... time Exactly on time.

[6] not ... exchanged Not changed during the time spent away.

[7] So ... stain So that my return, unchanged, might erase the fault of my absence; water Possibly, tears of repentence.

[8] motley Fool (from the motley, or particolored clothing traditionally worn by jesters); to the view In appearance, in the eyes of society.

[9] Gored Altered, as a garment is altered by inserting a gore, or wedge-shaped piece of cloth, and perhaps even mutilated, like a person gored by a horned animal.

[10] Made ... new Committed infidelity by pursuing new relationships.

[11] blenches Flinchings or deviations (from constancy).

[12] gave ... youth Rejuvenated my affections for you.

[13] worse essays Experiments with inferior loves.

[14] impediments Cf. the marriage service in the Book of Common Prayer (c. 1552): "If any of you know cause, or just impediment, why these two persons should not be joined together in holy Matrimony, ye are to declare it."

[15] remover One who changes, e.g., ceases to love.

Whose worth's unknown, although his height be taken.[1]
Love's not Time's fool, though rosy lips and cheeks
Within his bending sickle's compass° come; sweep
Love alters not with his brief hours and weeks,
But bears it out even to the edge of doom.
If this be error and upon me proved,
I never writ, nor no man ever loved.

117

Accuse me thus: that I have scanted[2] all
Wherein I should your great deserts repay,
Forgot upon your dearest love to call,
Whereto all bonds do tie me day by day;
That I have frequent been with unknown minds,
And given to time your own dear-purchased right;[3]
That I have hoisted sail to all the winds
Which should transport me farthest from your sight.
Book° both my wilfulness and errors down, record
And on just proof surmise accumulate;[4]
Bring me within the level° of your frown, aim
But shoot not at me in your wakened hate:
Since my appeal says[5] I did strive to prove° test
The constancy and virtue of your love.

127

In the old age[6] black was not counted fair,° beautiful
Or if it were, it bore not beauty's name;
But now is black beauty's successive° heir, legitimate
And beauty slandered with a bastard shame:[7]
For since each hand hath put on nature's power,[8]
Fairing the foul with art's false borrowed face,
Sweet beauty hath no name, no holy bower,[9]
But is profaned, if not lives in disgrace.
Therefore my mistress' eyes are raven black,
Her eyes so suited,° and they mourners seem attired
At such who, not born fair, no beauty lack,[10]
Sland'ring creation with a false esteem;[11]
Yet so they mourn, becoming of[12] their woe,
That every tongue says beauty should look so.

128

How oft when thou, my music, music play'st
Upon that blessed wood[13] whose motion sounds
With thy sweet fingers, when thou gently sway'st° direct
The wiry concord[14] that mine ear confounds,° dazzles
Do I envy those jacks° that nimble leap, keys
To kiss the tender inward° of thy hand, palm
Whilst my poor lips, which should that harvest reap,
At the wood's boldness by thee blushing stand?
To be so tickled they would change their state
And situation with those dancing chips,[15]
O'er whom thy fingers walk with gentle gait,
Making dead wood more blessed than living lips.
Since saucy jacks[16] so happy are in this,
Give them thy fingers, me thy lips to kiss.

129

Th'expense of spirit in a waste° of shame desolation
Is lust in action; and till action, lust
Is perjured, murd'rous, bloody, full of blame,
Savage, extreme, rude, cruel, not to trust;° be trusted
Enjoyed no sooner but despised straight;
Past reason hunted, and no sooner had,

---

[1] Whose … taken Referring to the "star" of the previous line, most likely the North Star, whose altitude can be reckoned for navigation purposes using a sextant, but whose essence remains unknown.

[2] scanted Provided grudgingly or insuffiently for.

[3] given … right Spent elsewhere the time you had a right to expect I should spend with you.

[4] on … accumulate On the basis of my proven misdeeds, add others on suspicion.

[5] my appeal says My defense is that.

[6] the old age Earlier times.

[7] beauty … shame The former (fair) conception of beauty has been discredited as illegitimate and false.

[8] each … power Everyone has assumed the power to mimic natural beauty (through cosmetics).

[9] name Legitimate title; holy bower Sacred dwelling-place.

[10] who … lack (1) Who, lacking natural beauty, have acquired it artificially; (2) Who, not being of fair coloration, are in accord with current ideals of beauty.

[11] Sland'ring … esteem Devaluing natural beauty with false praise accorded to the artificial.

[12] becoming of Suiting well.

[13] blessed wood Probably a virginal, a small, legless harpsichord on which the strings were plucked rather than struck.

[14] wiry concord Harmony produced by the plucking of the strings.

[15] dancing chips The keys.

[16] saucy jacks Common slang for impertinent fellows, but here referring also to the aforementioned keys.

Past reason hated as a swallowed bait,
On purpose laid to make the taker mad;
Mad in pursuit, and in possession so,
Had, having, and in quest to have, extreme;
A bliss in proof,° and proved, a very woe; experience
Before, a joy proposed; behind, a dream.
All this the world well knows, yet none knows well
To shun the heaven that leads men to this hell.

130

My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun;
Coral is far more red than her lips' red;
If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun;
If hairs be wires, black wires grow on her head;
I have seen roses damasked,° red and white, parti-colored
But no such roses see I in her cheeks;
And in some perfumes is there more delight
Than in the breath that from my mistress reeks.
I love to hear her speak, yet well I know
That music hath a far more pleasing sound;
I grant I never saw a goddess go;° walk
My mistress when she walks treads on the ground.
And yet, by heaven, I think my love as rare
As any she[1] belied with false compare.

135

Whoever hath her wish,[2] thou hast thy Will,[3]
And Will to boot, and Will in overplus;° superabundance
More than enough am I, that vex thee still,
To thy sweet will making addition thus.
Wilt thou, whose will is large and spacious,
Not once vouchsafe to hide my will in thine?
Shall will in others seem right gracious,
And in my will no fair acceptance shine?
The sea, all water, yet receives rain still,
And in abundance addeth to his store;
So thou, being rich in Will, add to thy Will
One will of mine, to make thy large Will more:
Let no unkind,° no fair beseechers kill; unkindness
Think all but one,[4] and me in that one Will.

136

If thy soul check[5] thee that I come so near,
Swear to thy blind soul[6] that I was thy Will,
And will, thy soul knows, is admitted there;
Thus far for love my love-suit sweet fulfil.
Will will fulfil the treasure of thy love,
Ay, fill it full with wills, and my will one;
In things of great receipt° with ease we prove capacity
Among a number one is reckoned none.
Then in the number let me pass untold,
Though in thy store's account I one must be.
For nothing hold° me, so it please thee hold regard
That nothing, me, a something sweet to thee.
Make but my name thy love, and love that still;° always
And then thou lov'st me, for my name is Will.

138

When my love swears that she is made of truth,
I do believe her, though I know she lies,
That she might think me some untutored youth
Unlearnèd in the world's false subtleties.
Thus vainly thinking that she thinks me young,
Although she knows my days are past the best,
Simply I credit her false-speaking tongue;
On both sides thus is simple truth suppressed.
But wherefore says she not she is unjust?° unfaithful
And wherefore say not I that I am old?
O love's best habit is in seeming trust,
And age in love[7] loves not t'° have years told: to
Therefore I lie with her, and she with me,
And in our faults by lies we flattered be.

143

Lo, as a careful housewife[8] runs to catch
One of her feathered creatures broke away,

---

[1] any she Any woman.

[2] Whoever … wish No matter what other women may wish for or attain.

[3] Will In Shakespeare's time, the word could also refer to sexual desire and even to the genitals.

[4] Think … one Think of all your suitors as one.

[5] check Restrain or rebuke.

[6] blind soul Blind by nature, being enclosed within the body, or blinded by passion.

[7] age in love An older person in love, or in matters of love.

[8] careful Attentive, but also perhaps "full of cares," or anxious; housewife Pronounced "hussif" in Shakespeare's time.

Sets down her babe, and makes all swift dispatch° haste
In pursuit of the thing she would have stay;
Whilst her neglected child holds her in chase,[1]
Cries to catch her whose busy care is bent° determined
To follow that which flies before her face,
Not prizing° her poor infant's discontent: considering
So run'st thou after that which flies from thee,
Whilst I, thy babe, chase thee afar behind.
But if thou catch thy hope,[2] turn back to me,
And play the mother's part, kiss me, be kind:
So will I pray that thou mayst have thy Will,
If thou turn back and my loud crying still.° soothe

144

Two loves I have, of comfort and despair,
Which, like two spirits, do suggest° me tempt still:° always
The better angel is a man right fair,
The worser spirit a woman coloured ill.[3]
To win me soon to hell[4] my female evil
Tempteth my better angel from my side,
And would corrupt my saint to be a devil,
Wooing his purity with her foul pride;
And whether that[5] my angel be turned fiend
Suspect I may, yet not directly° tell; exactly
But being both from me both to each friend,[6]
I guess one angel in another's hell.
Yet this shall I ne'er know, but live in doubt,
Till my bad angel fire my good one out.[7]

146

Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth,
...[8] these rebel powers that thee array;[9]
Why dost thou pine[10] within and suffer dearth,
Painting thy outward walls so costly gay?
Why so large cost, having so short a lease,
Dost thou upon thy fading mansion spend?
Shall worms, inheritors of this excess,
Eat up thy charge?[11] Is this thy body's end?
Then soul, live thou upon thy servant's loss,
And let that[12] pine to aggravate thy store;[13]
Buy terms[14] divine in selling hours of dross;° scum
Within be fed, without° be rich no more: externally
So shalt thou feed on death, that feeds on men,
And death once dead, there's no more dying then.

147

My love is as a fever, longing still° continually
For that which longer nurseth the disease,
Feeding on that which doth preserve the ill,
Th'uncertain° sickly appetite to please: fitful
My reason, the physician to my love,
Angry that his prescriptions are not kept,
Hath left me, and I, desperate, now approve° accept that
Desire is death, which physic did except.[15]
Past cure I am, now reason is past care,
And frantic mad with ever more unrest;
My thoughts and my discourse as madmen's are,

---

[1] holds ... chase Chases after her.

[2] thy hope The object of your hope.

[3] coloured ill Of a dark or ugly complexion or temperament.

[4] hell For the equation of hell with sexual intercourse, cf. Sonnet 129.14: "... the heaven that leads men to this hell."

[5] whether that Whether or not.

[6] being ... friend Both spirits being apart from me and together (and friendly) with each other.

[7] fire ... out Expel or reject my good angel; to "fire out" meant to drive someone or something away from a place by setting a fire, as, e.g., in fox hunting; fire Possibly "fever," with perhaps a glancing reference to venereal disease.

[8] ... The earliest printed version repeats the words "my sinful earth," an apparent misprint; Shakespeare's words are not known. Possible substitutions include "Rebuke," "Foiled by," or "Fooled by."

[9] these rebel ... thee array I.e., the body that clothes you (which rebels against your soul).

[10] pine Dwindle from longing.

[11] thy charge Your expense; also, a possession for which you are responsible.

[12] that I.e., the body.

[13] aggravate thy store Increase your riches.

[14] terms Periods of time; also agreements.

[15] Desire ... except The sexual desire objected to by my physician is deadly.

At random[1] from the truth vainly expressed:[2]
For I have sworn thee fair, and thought thee bright,
Who art as black as hell, as dark as night.

153

Cupid laid by his brand,[3] and fell asleep;
A maid of Dian's[4] this advantage° found, opportunity
And his love-kindling fire did quickly steep° plunge
In a cold valley-fountain[5] of that ground,
Which borrowed from this holy fire of love
A dateless° lively heat still° to endure, endless / always
And grew° a seething bath, which yet men prove grew into
Against strange maladies a sovereign° cure: potent
But at my mistress' eye love's brand new fired,[6]
The boy for trial needs would[7] touch my breast;
I, sick withal, the help of bath desired,
And thither hied,[8] a sad distempered guest,
But found no cure; the bath for my help lies
Where Cupid got new fire: my mistress' eye.

154

The little love-god° lying once asleep, Cupid
Laid by his side his heart-inflaming brand,[9]
Whilst many nymphs, that vowed chaste life to keep,[10]
Came tripping by; but in her maiden hand
The fairest votary[11] took up that fire
Which many legions of true hearts had warmed;
And so the general of hot desire[12]
Was, sleeping, by a virgin hand disarmed.
This brand she quenched in a cool well by,° nearby
Which from love's fire took heat perpetual,
Growing° a bath and healthful remedy growing into
For men diseased; but I, my mistress' thrall,
Came there for cure, and this by that I prove:
Love's fire heats water, water cools not love.
—1609

---

[1] At random Wandering.

[2] vainly expressed Expressing myself foolishly or fecklessly.

[3] Cupid … brand Cupid, Roman god of love, often pictured as a small boy carrying a torch (brand) used to kindle erotic love in the hearts of mortals; laid by Set aside.

[4] maid of Dian's Diana, Roman goddess of the moon and the hunt, known for her chastity, was attended by young virgin nymphs (maids).

[5] cold valley-fountain One of the cool springs associated with the dwelling-place of Diana.

[6] new fired Reignited.

[7] for trial To test the flame; needs would Wanted to.

[8] thither hied Hastened there.

[9] heart-inflaming brand Torch used by Cupid to kindle erotic love in the hearts of mortals.

[10] nymphs … keep Attendants of the chaste goddess Diana, who themselves took a vow of chastity.

[11] fairest votary Most beautiful of those vowed to chastity.

[12] general … desire Cupid, pictured as the commander of erotic passion.

The pray of wormes, my body being dead,
The coward conqueſt of a wretches knife,

To

ISABELLA WHITNEY

fl. 1566 – 1573

Little record remains of the life of poet Isabella Whitney, and scholars cannot even estimate the dates of her birth and death. It is certain that she was alive and writing between the years 1566 and 1573, and that she spent a significant portion of her life in London, perhaps all of it. By cross-referencing names that appear in her poetry with names that appear in the will of one Geoffrey Whitney (c. 1548–1601), another minor writer, scholars guess that the two writers were siblings.

Although little is known about the woman behind the poetry, it is evident that, as a writer, Whitney was extraordinary for her time. She is the author of the earliest printed volume of secular poetry by a woman in England. While female writers of the sixteenth century were generally noblewomen or women of influence whose verses focused on pious themes, Whitney is not thought to have been well connected, and her verse is characterized by a uniquely public, informal tone. Her poems, often written in popular ballad measure, give easy expression to common secular concerns and engage with popular London literary trends.

The Copy of a Letter (1566–67), Whitney's first known miscellany, contains four jocular complaints from lovers—two female and two male—that play on contemporary debates about the nature of women. The female-narrated poems lament the misuse of women, while the male-narrated poems bemoan female rebelliousness. Whitney's poems play with the genre of the female love lament, which was made popular that year by George Tuberville's (c. 1543–97) translation of Ovid's Heroides. Allowing the female speakers to move out of their traditionally passive roles, she adapts the genre to her own purposes and cautions women not to become victims in men's sporting love affairs. Whitney's second miscellany, A Sweet Nosegay and Certain Familiar Epistles and Friendly Letters by the Author: With Replies (1573), contains a series of exaggerated complaints of the speaker's suffering and illness, including her best known poem, "The Manner of her Will." A mock testament addressed to the city of London, "The Manner of her Will" is one of the most vivid portrayals of daily life in sixteenth-century London to be found in British literature. The unique narrative frame that Whitney gives her mock testament may have influenced contemporary author George Gascoigne (c. 1534–77), whose "Last Will and Testament of Dan Bartholomew of Bath" (1573) uses a similar conceit.

In addition to her two miscellanies, Whitney is the suspected author of numerous additional poems in various miscellanies by other writers. She is the only female to have written the sort of verse that popular male writers of the period, including Gascoigne and Tuberville, often composed, and her poetry is thought to have influenced the work of these male contemporaries. In a time when it was unusual for any but the most privileged women to have even a rudimentary training in rhetoric, much less the sort of familiarity with contemporary literature that Whitney's work demonstrates, her accomplishments are all the more impressive. Despite Whitney's status as a prolific and unique female writer, she has been neglected by scholars until recently.

Is. W. to Her Unconstant Lover

As close° as you your wedding kept, secret
yet now the truth I hear,
Which you (ere now) might me have told—what need you nay to swear?

You know I always wisht you well,
so will I during life;
But sith° you shall a husband be, since
God send you a good wife.

And this (whereso you shall become) full boldly may you boast:
That once you had as true a love,
as dwelt in any coast.

Whose constantness had never quailed° failed
if you had not begon;° left
And yet it is not so far past but might again be won.

If you so would, yea, and not change
so long as life would last,
But if that needs you marry must?
then farewell, hope is past.

And if you cannot be content to lead a single life?
(Although the same right quiet be) then take me to your wife.

So shall the promises be kept that you so firmly made;
Now choose whether ye will be true,
or be of Sinon's trade.[1]

Whose trade if that you long shall use, it shall your kindred stain;[2]
Example take by many a one whose falsehood now is plain.

As by Aeneas first of all,
who did poor Dido[3] leave,
Causing the Queen by his untruth with sword her heart to cleave.

Also I find that Theseus[4] did his faithful love forsake,
Stealing away within the night,
before she did awake.

Jason[5] that came of noble race,
two ladies did beguile.
I muse how he durst show his face,
to them that knew his wile.

For when he by Medea's art had got the Fleece of Gold
And also had of her that time,
all kind of things he wold.° would, wished

He took his ship and fled away, regarding not the vows
That he did make so faithfully unto his loving spouse.

How durst he trust the surging seas knowing himself forsworn?

---

[1] Sinon's trade I.e., treachery. In Homer's Odyssey, Sinon is a Greek who allowed himself to be captured by the Trojans. Then, when the Greeks offered the "gift" of the wooden horse, he convinced the Trojans to accept it, allowing the Greeks hidden inside it to attack the city.

[2] kindred stain Belief that one's ancestors would be punished for one's evil deeds, as a result of the shame attached to the family name.

[3] Aeneas Son of Priam (king of Troy) who escaped the defeated Troy and founded Rome in Virgil's Aeneid; Dido Queen of Carthage, seduced and then abandoned by Aeneas on his way to found Rome.

[4] Theseus King of Athens who slew the monstrous Minotaur. He was able to escape from the Minotaur's labyrinth only by the help of Ariadne, daughter of the king of Crete, whom he brought with him when he left Crete but afterwards abandoned.

[5] Jason Leader of the Argonauts who captured the Golden Fleece with the help of the sorceress Medea. She was his mistress for some time, but he later abandoned her to marry Glauce, daughter of the king of Corinth.

Why did he 'scape safe to the land before the ship was torn?

I think King Aeolus[1] stayed the winds and Neptune[2] ruled the sea;
Then might he boldly pass the waves
no perils could him slee.° slay

But if his falsehood had to them been manifest before,
They would have rent the ship as soon as he had gone from shore.

Now may you hear how falseness is made manifest in time,
Although they that commit the same
think it a venial° crime. pardonable

For they, for their unfaithfulness, did get perpetual fame.
Fame? wherefore did I term it so?
I should have called it shame.

Let Theseus be, let Jason pass,
let Paris[3] also 'scape,
That brought destruction unto Troy
all through the Grecian rape.

And unto me a Troilus[4] be,
if not you may compare
With any of these persons that above expressed are.

But if I cannot please your mind for wants° that rest in me, deficiencies
Wed whom you list;° I am content, desire your refuse for to be.

It shall suffice me, simple soul,
of thee to be forsaken:
And it may chance, although not yet,
you wish you had me taken.

But rather than you should have cause to wish this through° your wife, as a result of
I wish to her, ere you her have,
no more but love of life.

For she that shall so happy be,
of thee to be elect,° chosen
I wish her virtues to be such,
she need not be suspect.

I rather wish her Helen's face than one of Helen's trade,[5]
With chasteness of Penelope,[6]
the which did never fade.

A Lucres[7] for her constancy,
and Thisbie[8] for her truth:
If such thou have, then Peto[9] be,
not Paris, that were ruth.[10]

Perchance ye will think this thing rare
in one woman to find:
Save Helen's beauty, all the rest
the Gods have me assigned.

These words I do not speak, thinking from thy new love to turn thee:

---

[1] King Aeolus God of the winds.

[2] Neptune God of the sea.

[3] Paris Son of Priam, the king of Troy, who stole Helen, the wife of King Menelaus of Greece, thus prompting the Greeks to invade Troy.

[4] Troilus Another son of Priam who was famously faithful to Cressida, who in turn deserted him for a Greek warrior.

[5] one of Helen's trade I.e., a seductress.

[6] Penelope Wife of Odysseus who waited faithfully for several years for his return from the Trojan War.

[7] Lucres Lucretia, a Roman whose husband boasted to his friends that his wife would always remain chaste in his absence. His friend Tarquin, challenged by this declaration, stole into Lucretia's bedchamber and raped her. Lucretia committed suicide out of shame.

[8] Thisbie Woman who killed herself in order to be with her dying lover, Pyramus, in death.

[9] Peto Cardinal William Peto (d. 1558), who openly argued against King Henry VIII's plan to divorce Catherine of Aragon.

[10] ruth Feelings of sorrow or regret.

Thou know'st by proof what I deserve;
I need not to inform thee.

But let that pass. Would God I had Cassandra's gift[1] me lent;
Then either thy ill chance or mine
my foresight might prevent.

But all in vain for this I seek;
wishes may not attain it.
Therefore may hap° to me what shall, happen
and I cannot refrain° it. prevent

Wherefore I pray God be my guide and also thee defend;
No worser than I wish myself,
until thy life shall end.

Which life, I pray God, may again
King Nestor's[2] life renew;
And after that your soul may rest amongst the heavenly crew.

Thereto I wish King Xerxes' wealth or else King Cressus'[3] gold,
With as much rest and quietness
as man may have on mould.° earth

And when you shall this letter have,
let it be kept in store,
For she that sent the same hath sworn as yet to send no more.

And now farewell, for why at large
my mind is here exprest,
The which you may perceive if that you do peruse the rest.

Finis.

The Admonition by the Author to All Young Gentlewomen, and to All Other Kinds of Maids Being in Love

Ye Virgins, ye from Cupid's[4] tents do bear away the foil,[5]
Whose hearts as yet with raging love most painfully do boil.

To you I speak, for you be they that good advice do lack;
Oh, if I could good counsel get,° produce
my tongue should not be slack.° idle

But such as I can give, I will.
Here in few words express,
Which, if you do observe, it will some of your care redress.

Beware of fair and painted° talk, false
beware of flattering tongues:
The mermaids[6] do pretend no good for all their pleasant songs.

Some use the tears of crocodiles,
contrary to their heart,
And if they cannot always weep,
they wet their cheeks by art.

Ovid, within his Art of Love,[7]
doth teach them this same knack,
To wet their hand and touch their eyes,
so oft as tears they lack.

Why have ye such deceit in store?
have you such crafty wile?

---

[1] Cassandra's gift Clairvoyance. Cassandra, the daughter of Priam who had prophetic powers, predicted the fall of Troy but was not believed.

[2] King Nestor Greek king famous for his wisdom and longevity.

[4] Cupid God of love.

[5] foil Sword used in fencing.

[6] mermaids According to myth, these creatures would lure sailors to shore with their beautiful singing, and the sailors' boats would be smashed on rocky shores.

[7] Ovid … Love Ovid's Ars Amatoria (The Art of Love, c. 1 CE), a facetious treatise giving advice on how to woo one's love.

Less craft than this, God knows, would soon us simple souls beguile.

And will ye not leave off? but still delude us in this wise?
Sith° it is so, we trust we shall since take heed to feigned lies.

Trust not a man at the first sight,
but try him well before;
I wish all maids within their breasts to keep this thing in store.

For trial shall declare his truth and show what he doth think,
Whether he be a lover true,
or do intend to shrink.

If Scilla[1] had not trust too much before that she did try,
She could not have been clean forsake when she for help did cry.

Or if she had had good advice,
Nisus had lived long:
How durst she trust a stranger and do her dear father wrong.

King Nisus had a hair by fate, which hair, while he did keep,
He never should be overcome,
neither on land nor deep.

The stranger that the daughter loved did war against the King
And always sought how that he might them in subjection bring.

This Scylla stole away the hair,
for to obtain her will,
And gave it to the stranger that did straight her father kill.

Then she, who thought her self most sure to have her whole desire,
Was clean reject and left behind
when he did home retire.

Or if such falsehood had been once unto Oenone[2] known,
About the fields of Ida wood,
Paris had walkt alone.

Or if Demophoon's[3] deceit
to Phillis had been told,
She had not been transformed so,
as Poets tell of old.[4]

Hero did try Leander's truth[5]
before that she did trust:
Therefore she found him unto her both constant, true, and just.

For he always did swim the sea
when stars in sky did glide,
Till he was drowned by the way near hand unto the side.

She scrat° her face, she tore her hair scratched
(it grieveth me to tell)
When she did know the end of him that she did love so well.

But like Leander there be few,
therefore in time take heed

---

[1] Scilla Daughter of Nisus, the king of Megera whose magical purple locks protected his kingdom against attack. Scilla fell in love with the beseiging enemy King Minos of Crete and cut off a lock of her father's hair for him. Minos then conquered Megaera, but rejected Scilla.

[2] Oenone Nymph who lived on Mount Ida; she loved and was abandoned by Paris, son of the king of Troy.

And always try before ye trust,
so shall you better speed.

The little fish that careless is
within the water clear,
How glad is he, when he doth see,
a bait for to appear.

He thinks his hap° right good to be, luck
that he the same could spy,
And so the simple fool doth trust
too much before he try.

O little fish, what hap hadst thou?
to have such spiteful fate,
To come into one's cruel hands
out of so happy state?

Thou didst suspect no harm when thou upon the bait didst look:
O that thou hadst had Linceus'[1] eyes
for to have seen the hook.

Then hadst thou with thy pretty mates been playing in the streams
Whereas Sir Phoebus[2] daily doth show forth his golden beams.

But sith thy fortune is so ill
to end thy life on shore,
Of this thy most unhappy end
I mind to speak no more.

But of thy fellow's chance that late such pretty° shift° did make, clever / movement
That he from fishers' hook did spirit before he could him take.

And now he pries° on every bait, looks closely suspecting still that prick
(for to lie hid in every thing)
wherewith the fishers strick.° strike

And since the fish that reason lacks once warnèd doth beware,
Why should not we take heed to that that turneth us to care?

And I who was deceived late
by one's unfaithful tears
Trust now for to beware, if that
I live this hundreth years.

A Careful Complaint by the Unfortunate Author[3]

Good Dido[4] stint° thy tears stop and sorrows all resign
To me: that born was to augment, misfortune's luckless line.
Or being still the same,
good Dido do thy best:
In helping to bewail the hap,° occurrence
that furthereth mine unrest.
For though thy Trojan mate that Lord Aeneas hight:° was called Requiting ill thy steadfast love from Carthage took his flight
And foully broke his oath
and promise made before,
Whose falsehood finished thy delight,
before thy hairs were hoar;° gray
Yet greater cause of grief
compels me to complain,
For Fortune fell° converted hath cruel
my health to heaps of pain.
And that she swears my death
too plain it is (alas),
Whose end let malice still attempt to bring the same to pass.

O Dido, thou hadst lived a happy Woman still
If fickle fancy had not thralled° enslaved thy wits: to retchless° will. reckless
For as the man by whom thy deadly dolors° bred, sorrows
Without regard of plighted° troth° pledged / faithfulness
from Carthage city fled,
So might thy cares in time
be banished out of thought:
His absence might well salve° the sore heal
that erst° his presence wrought. first
For fire no longer burns than° Faggots° feed the flame; except when / sticks
The want of things that breed annoy may soon redress the same.
But I unhappy most and gripped with endless griefs,
Despair (alas) amid my hope and hope without relief.
And as the sweltering heat
consumes the War away,
So do the heaps of deadly harms
still threaten my decay.
O Death delay not long thy duty to declare:
Ye Sisters three[1] dispatch my days
and finish all my care.

In Answer to Comfort Her, by Showing His Haps[2] to Be Harder

Friend Is., be now content and let my sorrows quell
the extreme rage and care thou restest in:
For wailing sprites, ne° furies fierce in hell, nor nor grisly souls that still in woe have been,
Have ever felt like storms that I sustain,
frownst so I am, and dulled in deep despair,
That sure (me thinks) my extreme raging pain might gain thee health and set thee free from fear.
For Dido, thou, and many thousands more,
which living feel the pangs of extreme care,
Though tortured much and torn in pieces small:
whom ever griping, death doth never spare,
Nor he that falsely Carthage City fled,
so fraught with wiles, nor the such sorrows taste
By thousand parts as I who rightly said,
do pine as wax before the fire wastes.
I freeze to ICE, I heat with parching SUN,
and torn with teen,° thus languishing in pain, suffering
Do feel my sorrows ever fresher run to flowing cares that endless sorrows gain.
For what, for whom, and why this evil works, friend Is. W., time, nor silence, may it show;
But once ere many days, my care that lurks shall blown be and thou the same shall know.
Till then, with silly Dido be content and rip° no more thy wrongs in such excess: disclose
Thy FORTUNE rather wills thee so lament, with speedy wit, till hope may have redress.

A Reply to the Same

The bitter force of Fortune's frowardness° perversity
Is painted out by B.,[4] his changéd hue:
Report bewrays° that tyrant's doubleness, reveals
Which I by trial prove (alas) too true;
Constrained I am, on thy mishaps to rue
As oft as I consider thine estate.° condition
Which differs far, from that thou wast of late.

Where be thy wonted° lively looks become; customary
Or what mischance hath dimmed thy beauty so?

[2] Haps Mischances.

[3] T.B. Believed to be Whitney's literary friend Thomas Berrie.

[4] B. Thomas Berrie, the author of "In Answer to Comfort her, by Showing his Haps to be Harder."

There is no God that deals such doubtful doom;
No Jupiter[1] hath brought thee down so low:
Thy hapless° fate hath wrought thy overthrow. luckless
For as Saturnus[2] reaves° the Berry's joy, robs
So Fortune strives to further thine annoy.

O Fortune false, O thrice unsteady joys,
Why doth not man mistrust thy subtle shows,
Whose proffers° prove in time to be but toys offers
As this the fruit that from your blossom grows?
Then may you rightly be compared with those Whose painted speech professeth friendship still,
But time bewrays the meaning to be ill.

For time that shows what erst I could not see
Hath brought about that I suspected least:
Complaining still on our simplicity,
Who headlong runs, as doth the careless beast
Till hunter's snares have laid his limbs to rest,
For when we least mistrust and dread deceit,
Then are we snared with unsuspected bait.

As lately unto thee it did befall,
Whose hap enforceth me to rue thy chance,
For thou that florisht erst° at beauty's stall before
Hath felt the force of froward Fortune's lance,
Compelled to furnish out misfortune's dance;
See here the surety that belongeth aye° always
To mortal joys whereon the world doth stay.

But live in hope that better hap may light,
For after storms Sir Phoebus's[3] force is seen;
So when Saturnus hath declared his might,
And Winter stints° to turn the world to teen,° ceases / suffering
Then pleasant Ver° shall clothe the ground in green Spring
And lusty May shall labour to restore
The things that Winter's spit had spoiled before.

Then shall the Berry cleave her wonted hue,
And eke° my B. that long hath tasted pain, also
When Fortune doth her former grace renew,
Shall hoisted be to happy state again
In [4]
Delighting oft among his friends and kin,
To tell what danger erst his life was in.

Which happy sight of mortal creatures, who Shall more rejoice? Than I thy friend to see
And while dame Fortune yielded not thereto
But doth proceed to prove her suite on thee,
Yet shalt thou not so ill belovéd be,
But that thy Fame forever flourish shall
If Is., her pen, may promise ought at all.

Farewell.

The Manner of Her Will

The Author (though loath to leave the City) upon her friend's procurement[5] is constrained to depart: wherefore (she feigneth as she would die) and maketh her will and testament, as followeth, with large legacies of such goods and riches which she most abundantly hath left behind her, and thereof maketh London sole executor to see her legacies performed.

A communication which the Author had to London, before she made her will.

The time is come I must depart,
from thee ah famous city.

did find that thou hadst pity.
Wherefore small cause there is, that I

The Manner of Her Will, and What She Left to London and All Those in It at Her Departing

I whole in body, and in mind,
but very weak in purse,
Do make and write my testament for fear it will be worse.
And first I wholly do commend my soul and body eke,° also
To God the Father and the Son,
so long as I can speak.
And after speech, my soul to him,
and body to the grave,
'Till time that all shall rise again,

And now let me dispose such things
as I shall leave behind,
That those which shall receive the same may know my willing mind.
I first of all to London leave,
because I there was bred,
Brave buildings rare, of churches store,° plenty and Paul's to the head.[2]
Between the same, fair streets there be,
and people goodly store.
Because their keeping craveth° cost, demands
I yet will leave him more.
First for their food, I butchers leave,
that every day shall kill;
By Thames you shall have brewers store,
and bakers at your will.
And such as orders do observe,[3]
and eat fish thrice a week,
I leave two streets,[4] full fraught therewith,
they need not far to seek.
Watling Street, and Canwick° Street, Candlewick
I full of woollen leave:

And those which are of calling such that costlier they require,
I mercers[1] leave, with silk so rich,
as any would desire.
In Cheap of them,[2] they store shall find,
and likewise in that street,
I goldsmiths leave, with jewels such as are for ladies meet.° suitable
And plate[3] to furnish cupboards with, full brave there shall you find,

but nothing from thee took.
Now for the people in thee left,
I have done as I may,
And that the poor, when I am gone,
have cause for me to pray.
I will to prisons portions° leave, amounts
what though but very small;
Yet that they may remember me,
occasion be it shall,
And first the counter° they shall have, debtors' prison
least they should go to wrack.° ruin
Some coggers,° and some honest men, cheats that sergeants draw aback.° restrain

I thither meant to flee.
To shroud° myself amongst the rest, hide
that choose to die in debt,
Rather than any creditor,
should money from them get.
Yet 'cause I feel myself so weak that none me credit[1] dare,
I here revoke, and do it leave,
some bankrupts to his share.
To all the bookbinders by Paul's,[2]
because I like their art,
They every week shall money have,
when they from books depart.
Amongst them all, my printer[3] must have somewhat to his share;
I will° my friends there books to buy desire

And by that means shall marry them,
to set the girls afloat.
And wealthy widows will I leave,
to help young gentlemen,
Which when you have in any case
be courteous to them then,
And see their plate and jewels eke
may not be marred with rust,
Nor let their bags[4] too long be full,
for fear that they do burst.
To every gate under the walls,
that compass thee about,
I fruit-wives[5] leave to entertain such as come in and out.
To Smithfield[6] I must something leave my parents there did dwell;
So careless for to be of it,
none would accompt° it well. account
Wherefore it thrice a week shall have,
of horse and meat° good store, cattle

for that was oft my walk;
I people there too many leave,
that out of tune do talk.
At Bridewell[9] there shall beadles[10] be,
and matrons that shall still See chalk well chopt, and spinning plied, and turning of the mill.
For such as cannot quiet be,
but strive for house or land,
At th'Inns of Court,[11] I lawyers leave to take their cause in hand.
And also leave I at each Inn of Court, or Chancery,° court
Of gentlemen, a youthful root,
full of activity,
For whom I store of books have left,
at each bookbinder's stall,
And part of all that London hath to furnish them withal.° therewith
And when they are with study cloyed,° burdened, tired
to recreate their mind,
Of tennis courts, of dancing schools,
and fence° they store shall find. fencing
And every Sunday at the least,
I leave to make them sport,
In diverse places players, that of wonders shall report.
Now London have I (for thy sake) within thee, and without,
As comes into my memory,
dispersed round about
Such needful things, as they should have,
here left now unto thee.

When I am gone, with conscience
let them dispersed be.
And though I nothing named have,
to bury me withal,
Consider that above the ground,
annoyance be I shall.
And let me have a shrouding sheet[1]
to cover me from shame,
And in oblivion bury me
and never more me name.
Ringings[2] nor other ceremonies,
use you not for cost,
Nor at my burial make no feast;
your money were but lost.
Rejoice in God that I am gone, out of this vale[3] so vile.
And that of each thing, left such store,
as may your wants exile.
I make thee sole executor, because
I loved thee best.
And thee I put in trust, to give the goods unto the rest.
Because thou shalt a helper need,
In this so great a charge,
I wish good Fortune be thy guide, lest thou shouldst run at large.
The happy days and quiet times,
they both her servants be
Which well will serve to fetch and bring,
such things as need to thee.
Wherefore (good London) not° refuse, do not for helper her to take;
Thus being weak and weary both an end here will I make.
To all that ask what end I made,
and how I went away,
Thou answer may'st like those which here,
no longer tarry may.
And unto all that wish me well,
or rue that I am gone,
Do me commend, and bid them cease
my absence for to moan.
And tell them further, if they would,
my presence still have had,
They should have sought to mend my luck,
which ever was too bad.
So fare thou well a thousand times,
God shield thee from thy foe,
And still make thee victorious,
of those that seek thy woe.
And (though I am persuade°) that I persuaded shall never more thee see,
Yet to the last, I shall not cease to wish much good to thee.
This twenty of October, I,
in Anno Domini
A thousand five hundred seventy three,
as almanacs descry,
Did write this will with mine own hand
and it to London gave,
In witness of the standers by,
whose names if you will have,
Paper, Pen, and Standish° were inkpot
at that same present by,
With Time, who promised to reveal,
so fast as she could hie,
The same, lest of my nearer kin
for anything should vary.
So finally I make an end
no longer can I tarry.

“UNCONSTANT WOMEN,” “EXCELLENT WOMEN”: A SEVENTEENTH-CENTURY DEBATE

CONTEXTS

Early Modern England saw a continuation of medieval arguments—sometimes serious, sometimes for rhetorical show—concerning the nature and value of women. Men did not monopolize this debate, which is often called the “querelle des femmes” (the argument over women); as early as Christine de Pizan’s protofeminist Cité des Dames (written in 1405), women had replied in a range of voices from defensive argument to swaggering displays of scorn for those who limited and denigrated them. The “querelle” did not change much until the uproars and changes of the seventeenth century profoundly reshaped European culture. With women playing an increasing role in religious and political conflicts as well as in the world of literature, arguments over their nature took new forms and tones.

Throughout these debates, many women stood their ground against attacks on their sex. Nor did all men denigrate them. In the sixteenth century, women were denied equal status and opportunities and (unless widowed) had few legal rights, yet some did receive excellent educations. In the Humanist tradition of Erasmus and Sir Thomas More, women were legally subordinate but were not thought morally inferior. Thomas More could imagine, for his ideal world of Utopia if not in real life, divorce by mutual consent and an equal punishment for adultery, while Erasmus blamed men disproportionately for trouble between man and wife: “No man,” he asserted, “ever had a shrew for a wife except through his own fault.” In France, Rabelais agreed: the best way to keep a wife faithful, one character is told, is to be faithful yourself. In seventeenth-century Britain, too, men could come to women’s defense, as witness such writers as Daniel Tuvill, whose Asylum Veneris (1616), directed against Joseph Swetnam (see below), describes good and accomplished women from the past. The essayist Owen Felltham, whose work concludes this selection of texts, accepts some Renaissance assumptions about gender but questions many others: he asks commonsense questions and is willing to look beyond stereotypes.

But it remains true that in some ways the situation of women declined during the Renaissance. The closing of the convents removed one possible means by which women could exercise social power; changes in manufacturing would eventually mean less economic independence for women; and later in the period, male doctors began to replace midwives, displacing women from one of their traditional positions of expertise and social power. The horrifying executions of women accused of witchcraft, moreover, took place largely after the Middle Ages. Some scholars have also wondered if religious difference affected arguments over gender. Did the Protestant stress on the role of the family in religious life also shift attitudes toward gender? Certainly some Catholic women who refused to conform to the Church of England experienced, in their own minds, an obligation to dissent from male-dominated authority.

Attacks on women in the seventeenth century could come from several directions. On the one hand, Protestant moralists tended to allocate greater blame to woman than to man for the original sin in the Garden of Eden (although such accusations had ample precedent in earlier centuries). On the other hand, some men, often half-seriously, could adopt a cavalier (in both senses of the word) licentiousness, especially if they had connections at Court or were writing to impress the mostly male worlds of law schools and universities. The latter manner can be seen in the "problems" and "paradoxes" of John Donne, whose misogyny is generally regarded as springing from a playful and rhetorically showy cynicism rather than genuine contempt for women. By contrast, the intemperate polemic of Joseph Swetnam's An Arraignment of Lewd, Idle, Froward, and Unconstant Women seems less playful, although the degree of his seriousness can be hard to gauge—the work's hyperbole seems designed in part for strutting display.

Seventeenth-century attacks such as those of Swetnam were met by strong replies in verse by poets such as Aemilia Lanyer and, later in the century, Katherine Phillips. More directly, Swetnam's essay brought responses in prose from at least two sources. Rachel Speght, nineteen years old, daughter of one clergyman and married to another, and also a poet, uncovered Swetnam's authorship (the work had been published anonymously) and published her reply in 1616. Shortly thereafter another response to Swetnam appeared, under the pen name "Ester Sowernam." Sowernam, whose pseudonym plays her "Sower/Sour" against "Swet/Sweetnam," argues that Speght, though defending women against Swetnam's allegations, was herself too willing to assign them blame; Sowernam's own defense ranges more broadly, and is founded less than is Speght's on overtly Christian arguments. This particular phase of the controversy did not end there. A 1620 play, Swetnam the Woman-hater, Arraigned by Women (attributed to Thomas Heywood), dramatized this pamphlet war, depicting Swetnam and "Amazon Atalanta" as engaged in a court battle with each other.

from PARADOX I, "A DEFENSE OF WOMEN'S INCONSTANCY"

That women are inconstant, I with any man confess, but that inconstancy is a bad quality, I against any man will maintain: for every thing as it is one better than another, so is it fuller of change. The heavens themselves continually turn, the stars move, the moon changeth; fire whirleth, air flyeth, water ebbs and flows, the face of the earth altereth her looks, time stays not; the colour that is most light will take most dyes: so in men, they that have the most reason are the most alterable in their designs, and the darkest or most ignorant do seldomest change; therefore women changing more than men have also more reason. They cannot be immutable like stocks, like stones, like the earth's dull center; gold that lieth still, rusteth; water, corrupteth; air that moveth not, poisoneth; then why should that which is the perfection of other things be imputed to women as greatest imperfection? Because thereby they deceive men. Are not your wits pleased with those jests which cozen[1] your expectation? You can call it pleasure to be beguiled in troubles, and in the most excellent toy in the world, you call it treachery: I would you had your mistresses so constant that they would never change, no not so much as their smocks, then should you see what sluttish virtue constancy were. Inconstancy is a most commendable and cleanly quality, and women in this quality are far more absolute than the heavens, than the stars, moon, or any thing beneath it; for long observation hath picked certainty out of their mutability. The learned are so well acquainted with the stars, signs, and planets that they make them but characters, to read the meaning of the heaven in his own forehead. Every simple fellow can bespeak the change of the moon a great while beforehand: but I would fain have the learnedest man so skilfull as to tell when the simplest woman meaneth to vary....

[1] cozen Cheat, deceive.

PARADOX 6, "THAT IT IS POSSIBLE TO FIND SOME VIRTUE IN SOME WOMEN"

I am not of that seared[1] impudence that I dare defend women, or pronounce them good; yet we see physicians allow some virtue in every poison. Alas! why should we except women? Since certainly, they are good for physic[2] at least, so as some wine is good for a fever. And though they be the occasioners of many sins, they are also the punishers and revengers of the same sins: for I have seldom seen one which consumes his substance and body upon them, escape diseases, or beggary; and this is their justice. And if suum cuique dare[3] be the fulfilling of all civil justice, they are most just; for they deny that which is theirs to no man:

Tanquam non liceat nulla puella negat.[4]

And who may doubt of great wisdom in them, that doth but observe with how much labour and cunning our justicers and other dispensers of the laws study to embrace them: and how zealously our preachers dehort[5] men from them, only by urging their subtleties and policies, and wisdom, which are in them? Or who can deny them a good measure of fortitude, if he consider how valiant men they have overthrown, and being themselves overthrown, how much and how patiently they bear? And though they be most intemperate, I care not, for I undertook to furnish them with some virtue, not with all. Necessity, which makes even bad things good, prevails also for them, for we must say of them, as of some sharp pinching laws: if men were free from infirmities, they were needless. These or none must serve for reasons, and it is my great happiness that examples prove not rules, for to confirm this opinion, the world yields not one example.

PROBLEM 6, "WHY HATH THE COMMON OPINION AFFORDED WOMEN SOULS?"

It is agreed that we have not so much from them as any part of either our mortal souls of sense or growth,[6] and we deny souls to others equal to them in all but in speech for which they are beholding to their bodily instruments: for perchance an ox's heart, or a goat's, or a fox's, or a serpent's would speak just so, if it were in the breast, and could move that tongue and jaws. Have they so many advantages and means to hurt us (for, ever their loving destroyed us) that we dare not displease them, but give them what they will? And so when some call them angels, some goddesses, and the Peputian heretics[7] made them bishops, we descend so much with the stream, to allow them souls? Or do we somewhat (in this dignifying of them) flatter princes and great personages that are so much governed by them? Or do we in that easiness and prodigality, wherein we daily lose our own souls to we care not whom, so labour to persuade ourselves that since a woman hath a soul, a soul is no great matter? Or do we lend them souls but for use,[8] since they for our sakes give their souls again, and their bodies to boot? Or perchance because the Devil (who is all soul) doth most mischief, and for convenience and proportion, because they would come nearer him, we allow them some souls: and so as the Romans naturalized some provinces in revenge, and made them Romans, only for the burthen of the Commonwealth; so we have given women souls only to make them capable of damnation?

from CHAPTER 2

The Second Chapter showeth the manner of such women as live upon evil report: it also showeth that the beauty of women has been the bane of many a man, for it hath overcome valiant and strong men, eloquent and subtle men.

... Men, I say, may live without women, but women cannot live without men. For Venus,[1] whose beauty was excellent fair, yet when she needeth man's help she took Vulcan,[2] a clubfooted smith. And therefore if a woman's face glister, and her gesture pierce the marble wall, or if her tongue be as smooth as oil or as soft as silk, and her words so sweet as honey, or if she were a very ape for wit, or a bag of gold for wealth, or if her personage have stolen away all that nature can afford, and if she be decked up in gorgeous apparel, then a thousand to one she will love to walk where she may get acquaintance, and acquaintance bringeth familiarity, and familiarity setteth all follies abroach,[3] and twenty to one that if a woman love gadding[4] but that she will pawn her honor to please her fantasy.

Man must be at all the cost and yet live by the loss. A man must take all the pains and women will spend all the gains. A man must watch and ward, fight and defend, till the ground, labor in the vineyard, and look what he getteth in seven years; a woman will spread it abroad with a fork in one year, and yet little enough to serve her turn but a great deal too little to get her good will. Nay, if thou give her ever so much and yet if thy person please not her humor, then will I not give a halfpenny for her honesty at the year's end.

For then her breast will be the harborer of an envious heart, and her heart the storehouse of poisoned hatred; her head will devise villainy, and her hands are ready to practice that which their heart desireth. Then who can but say that women are sprung from the devil, whose heads, hands and hearts, minds and souls are evil, for women are called the hook of all evil, because men are taken by them as a fish is taken in with the hook.

For women have a thousand ways to entice thee, and ten thousand ways to deceive thee and all such fools as are suitors unto them; some they keep in hand with promises, and some they feed with flattery, and some they delay with dalliances, and some they please with kisses. They lay out the folds of their hair to entangle men into their love; betwixt their breasts is the vale of destruction, and in their beds there is hell, sorrow, and repentance. Eagles do not eat men till they are dead, but women devour them alive, for a woman will pick thy pocket and empty thy purse, laugh in thy face and cut thy throat. They are ungrateful, perjured, full of fraud, flouting, and deceit, unconstant, waspish, toyish,[5] light, sullen, proud, discourteous and cruel, and yet they were by God created, and by nature formed, and therefore by policy and wisdom to be avoided, for good things abused are to be refused. Or else for a month's pleasure, she may make thee go stark naked. She will give thee roast meat, but she will beat thee with the spit. If thou hast crowns in thy purse, she will be thy heart's gold until she leave thee not a whit of white money. They are like summer birds, for they will abide no storm, but flock about thee in the pride of thy glory, and fly from thee in the storms of affliction; for they aim more at thy wealth than at thy person, and esteem more thy money than any man's virtuous qualities; for they esteem of a man without money as a horse does a fair stable without meat. They are like eagles which will always fly where the carrion is.

They will play the horse-leech to suck away thy wealth, but in the winter of thy misery, she will fly from thee. Not unlike the swallow, which in the summer harboreth herself under the eaves of a house, and against winter flieth away, leaving nothing but dirt behind her....

Plato saith that women are either angels or devils, and that they either love dearly or hate bitterly, for a woman hath no mean in her love, nor mercy in her hate, no pity in revenge, nor patience in her anger; therefore it is said that there is nothing in the world which both pleases and displeases a man more than a woman, for a woman most delighteth a man and yet most deceiveth him, for as there is nothing more sweet to a man than a woman when she smiles, even so there is nothing more odious than the angry countenance of a woman.

from Rachel Speght, A Muzzle for Melastomus,[1] The Cynical Baiter of, and Foul-Mouthed Barker Against Eve's Sex. Or, an Apologetical Answer to that Irreligious and Illiterate Pamphlet made by Joseph Swetnam Entitled The Arraignment of Women (1617)

To all virtuous Ladies, Honorable or Worshipful, and to all other of Eve's sex fearing God, and loving just reputation, grace and peace through Christ, to eternal glory:

It was the simile of that wise and learned Lactantius[2] that if fire, though but with a final spark kindled, be not at the first quenched, it may work great mischief and damage: so likewise may the scandals and defamations of the malevolent in time prove pernicious, if they be not nipped in the head at their first appearance. The consideration of this (right Honorable and Worshipful Ladies) has incited me (though young, and the unworthiest of thousands) to encounter with a furious enemy to our sex, lest if his unjust imputations should continue without answer, he might insult and account himself a victor.…

Not unto the veriest idiot that ever set pen to paper, but to the cynical baiter of women, or metamorphosed misogynes, Joseph Swetnam:

From standing water, which soon putrefies, can no good fish be expected; for it produces no other creatures but those that are venomous or noisome, as snakes, adders, and such like. Semblably,[3] no better stream can we look should issue from your idle corrupt brain, then that whereto the ruff of your fury (to use your own words) has moved you to open the sluice.…

Many propositions have you framed, which (as you think) make much against women, but if one would make a logical assumption, the conclusion would be flat against your own sex. Your dealing wants so much discretion that I doubt whether to bestow so good a name as the dunce upon you: but minority bids me keep within my bounds; and therefore I only say unto you, that your corrupt heart, and railing tongue, has made you a fit scribe for the Devil.

In that you have termed your virulent foam the bear-baiting of women, you have plainly displayed your own disposition to be cynical, in that there appears no other dog or bull to bait them but yourself. Good had it been for you to have put on that muzzle, which Saint James would have all Christians to wear; "Speak not evil one of another":[4] and then had you not seemed so like the serpent Porphirus, as now you do; which, though full of deadly poison, yet being toothless, hurts none so much as himself. For you having gone beyond the limits not of humanity alone, but of Christianity, have done greater harm unto your own soul than unto women, as may plainly appear. First, in dishonoring God by palpable blasphemy, wresting and perverting every place of Scripture that you have alleged; which by the testimony of Saint Peter,[5] is to the destruction of them that so do. Secondly, it appears by your disparaging of, and opprobrious speeches against, that excellent work of God's hands, which in His great love He perfected for the comfort of man. Thirdly, and lastly, by this your hodge-podge of heathenish sentences, similes, and examples, you have set forth yourself in your right colors, unto the view of the world: and I doubt not but the judicious will account of you according to your demerit. As for the vulgar sort, which have no more learning than you have showed in your book, it is likely they will applaud you for your pains.…

In your title leaf you arraign none but the lewd, idle, forward, and inconstant women, but in the sequel (though defect of memory as it seems), forgetting that you had made a distinction of good from bad, condemning all in general, you advise men to beware of, and not to match with, any of these six sorts of women, viz. good and bad, fair and foul, rich and poor. But this doctrine of devils, Saint Paul foreseeing would be broached in the latter times, gives warning of.[1] There also you promise a commendation of wise, virtuous, and honest women, when as in the subsequent, the worst words, and filthiest epithets that you can devise, you bestow on them in general, excepting no sort of women. . . .

Proverbs 18.22: "He that finds a wife, finds a good thing, and receives favor of the Lord."

. . . Almighty God, who is rich in mercy,[2] having made all things of nothing, created man in His own image: that is (as the Apostle expounds it), "In wisdom, righteousness and true holiness,[3] making him Lord over all": to avoid that solitary condition that he was then in, having none to commerce or converse withal but dumb creatures, it seemed good unto the Lord, that as of every creature He had made male and female, and man only being alone without mate, so likewise to form an help meet for him.[4] Adam for this cause being cast into a heavy sleep, God extracting a rib from his side, thereof made, or built, Woman; showing thereby that man was as an imperfect building before woman was made; and, bringing her unto Adam, united and married them together.

Thus the resplendent love of God toward man appeared, in taking care to provide him a helper before he saw his own want, and in providing him such a helper as should be meet[5] for him. Sovereignty had he over all creatures, and they were all serviceable unto him; but yet before woman was formed, there was not a meet help found for Adam. Man's worthiness not meriting this great favor at God's hands, but His mercy only moving him thereunto: I may use those words which the Jews uttered when they saw Christ weep for Lazarus, "Behold how He loved him."[6] Behold, and that with good regard, God's love; yea His great love, which from the beginning He has borne unto man: which, as it appears in all things, so next, His love in Christ Jesus apparently in this; that for man's sake, that he might not be an unity, when all other creatures were for procreation dual, He created woman to be a solace unto him, to participate of his sorrows, partake of his pleasures, and as a good yoke-fellow bear part of his burden. Of the excellencies of this structure, I mean of women, whose foundation and original of creation was God's love, do I intend to dilate.

Of woman's excellency, with the causes of her creation, and of the sympathy which ought to be in man and wife each toward other.

The work of creation being finished, this approbation thereof was given by God Himself, that "All was very good":[7] If all, then woman, who, excepting man, is the most excellent creature under the canopy of heaven. But if it be objected by any: first, that woman, though created good, yet by giving ear to Satan's temptations brought death and misery upon her posterity. . . .

To the first of these objections, I answer that Satan first assailed the woman because where the hedge is lowest, most easy it is to get over, and she being the weaker vessel[8] was with more facility to be seduced—like as a crystal glass sooner receives a crack then a strong stone pot. Yet we shall find the offense of Adam and Eve almost to parallel: for as an ambitious desire of being made like unto God was the motive which caused her to eat, so likewise was it his; as may plainly appear by that ironia,[9] "Behold, man is become as one of us."[10] Not that he was so indeed, but hereby his desire to attain a greater perfection than God had given him was reproved. Woman sinned, it is true, by her infidelity in not believing the word of God, but giving credit to Satan's fair promises that "she should not die"[11]—but so did the man, too. And if Adam had not approved of that deed which Eve had done, and been willing to tread the steps which she had gone, he, being her head, would have reproved her and have made the commandment a bit to restrain him from breaking his Maker's injunction. For if a man burn his hand in the fire, the bellows that blew the fire are not to be blamed, but himself rather, for not being careful to avoid the danger. Yet if the bellows had not blown, the fire had not burnt; no more is woman simply to be condemned for man's transgression: for by the free will, which before his fall he enjoyed, he might have avoided, and been free from, being burnt or singed with that fire which was kindled by Satan and blown by Eve. It therefore served not his turn a whit afterwards to say, "The woman which thou gavest me, gave me of the tree, and I did eat."[1] For a penalty was inflicted upon him, as well as on the woman, the punishment of her transgression being particular to her own sex, and to none but the female kind; but for the sin of man the whole earth was cursed. And he being better able than the woman to have resisted temptation, because the stronger vessel, was first called to account, to show that to whom much is given, of them much is required; and that he who the sovereign of all creatures visible, should have yielded greatest obedience to God.

True it is (as is already confessed) that woman first sinned, yet find we no mention of spiritual nakedness till man sinned: then it is said, "Their eyes were opened,"[2] the eyes of their mind and conscience; and then perceived they themselves naked, that is, not only bereft of that integrity which they originally had, but felt the rebellion and disobedience of their members in the disordered motions of their now corrupt nature, which made them for shame to cover their nakedness. Then (and not before) is it said that they saw it, as if sin were imperfect and unable to bring a deprivation of a blessing received, or death on all mankind, till man (in whom lay the active power of generation) had transgressed. The offense, therefore, of Adam and Eve is by Saint Austin[3] thus distinguished: "the man sinned against God and himself, the woman against God, herself, and her husband"; yet in her giving of the fruit to eat had she no malicious intent towards him, but did therein show a desire to make her husband partaker of that happiness which she thought by their eating they should both have enjoyed. This her giving Adam of the sauce, wherewith Satan had served her, whose sourness, afore he had eaten, she did not perceive, was that which made her sin to exceed his. Wherefore, that she might not of him who ought to honor her be abhorred,[4] the first promise that was made in Paradise, God makes to woman, that by her seed should the serpent's head be broken.[5] Whereupon Adam calls her Hevah, Life, that as the woman had been an occasion of his sin, so should woman bring forth the Savior from sin, which was in the fullness of time accomplished;[6] by which was manifested that he is a Savior of believing women no less than of men, that so the blame of sin may not be imputed to his creature which is good, but to the will by which Eve sinned; and yet by Christ's assuming the shape of a man was it declared that His mercy was equivalent to both sexes. So that by Hevah's blessed Seed (as Saint Paul affirms), it is brought to pass, that "male and female are all one in Christ Jesus."[7] …

The Epilogue or Upshot of the Premises

… Ingratitude is, and always has been, accounted so odious a vice that Cicero[8] said, "If one doubt what name to give a wicked man, let him call him an ungrateful person, and then he had said enough." It was so detested among the Persians, as that by a law they provided that such should suffer death as felons, which proved unthankful for any gift received. And "love" (said the Apostle) "is the fulfilling of the law."[9] But where ingratitude is harbored, there love is banished. Let men therefore beware of all unthankfulness, but especially of the superlative ingratitude—that which is towards God—which is no way more palpably declared than by the contemning of, and railing against, women; which sin of some men (if to be termed men) no doubt but God will one day avenge, when they shall plainly perceive that it had been better for them to have been born dumb and lame than to have used their tongues and hands, the one in repugning, the other in writing against God's handiwork, their own flesh—women I mean, whom God has made equal with themselves in dignity, both temporally and eternally, if they continue in the faith. Which God for His mercy sake grant they always may, to the glory of their Creator, and comfort of their own souls, through Christ. Amen.

from Ester Sowernam, Ester Hath Hanged Haman: An Answer to a Lewd Pamphlet, Entitled The Arraignment of Women (1617)

To all right honorable, noble, and worthy ladies, gentlewomen, and others, virtuously disposed, of the feminine sex.

Right honorable, and all others of our sex, upon my repair to London this last Michaelmas term,[1] being at supper among friends, where the number of each sex were equal, as nothing is more usual for table-talk, there fell out a discourse concerning women, some defending, others objecting against our sex. Upon which occasion, there happened a mention of a pamphlet entitled The Arraignment of Women, which I was desirous to see. The next day a gentleman brought me the book, which when I had superficially run over, I found the discourse as far off from performing what the title promised as I found it scandalous and blasphemous. For where the author pretended to write against lewd, idle, and unconstant women, he doth most impudently rage and rail generally against all the whole sex of women. Whereupon, I, in defense of our sex, began an answer to that full pamphlet, in which, after I had spent some small time, word was brought me that an apology for women was already undertaken, and ready for the press, by a minister's daughter. Upon this news, I stayed my pen, as I did expect some fitting performance of what was undertaken. At last the maiden's book was brought me, which when I had likewise run over, I did observe that whereas the maid doth many times excuse her tenderness of years, I found it to be true in the slenderness of her answer. For she, undertaking to defend women, doth rather charge and condemn women, as in the ensuing discourse shall appear. So that, whereas I expected to be eased of what I began, I do now find myself double charged, as well to make reply to the one, as to add supply to the other.

In this my apology, right honorable, right worshipful, and all others of our sex, I do in the first part of it plainly and resolutely deliver the worthiness and worth of women, both in respect of their creation, as in the work of redemption. Next I do show, in examples out of both Testaments, what blessed and happy choice has been made of women, as gracious instruments to derive God's blessings and benefits to mankind.

In my second part I do deliver of what estimate women have been valued in all ancient and modern times, which I prove by authorities, customs, and daily experiences. Lastly, I do answer all material objections which have or can be alleged against our sex; in which also I do arraign such kind of men which correspond the humor and disposition of the author—lewd, idle, furious, and beastly disposed persons.

This being performed, I doubt not but such as heretofore have been so froward and lavish against women will hereafter pull in their horns, and have as little desire, and less cause, so scandalously and slanderously to write against us than formerly they have.…

CHAPTER 2

What incomparable and excellent prerogatives God hath bestowed upon women, in their first creation.

In this ensuing chapter I determine briefly to observe (not curiously to discourse at large) the singular benefits and graces bestowed upon women. In regard of which, it is first to be considered that the Almighty God, in the world's frame in His divine wisdom, designed to Himself a main end to which He ordained all the works of His Creation, in which He being a most excellent workmaster, did so create His works, that every succeeding work was more excellent than what was formerly created. He wrought by degrees, providing in all for that which was and should be the end.

[1] Michaelmas term Term of the High Court of Justice in England and of schools and universities, starting soon after Michaelmas (the feast of St. Michael, on 29 September).

It appeareth, by that sovereignty which God gave to Adam over all the creatures of sea and land, that man was the end of God's Creation, whereupon it doth necessarily, without exception, follow that Adam, being the last work, is therefore the most excellent work of Creation. Yet Adam was not so absolutely perfect, but that in the sight of God he wanted an helper; whereupon God created the woman His last work, as to supply and make absolute that imperfect building which was unperfected in man, as all Divines do hold, till the happy creation of the woman. Now, of what estimate that creature is and ought to be which is the last work, upon whom the Almighty set up His last rest, whom He made to add perfection to the end of all Creation, I leave rather to be acknowledged by others, than resolved by myself.

Chapter 4

What excellent blessings and graces have been bestowed upon women in the Law of Grace

The first which cometh in this place to be mentioned is that blessed mother and mirror of all womanhood, the Virgin Mary, who was magnified in the birth of Jesus, glorified by angels, chosen by the Almighty to bear in her womb the Savior of mankind....

I might hereunto add those wives, widows, and virgins, which flourished in the primitive church and all succeeding ages since, who in all virtues have excelled, and honored both their sex in general, and themselves in particular, who in their martyrdoms, in their confession of Jesus, and in all Christian and divine virtues, have in no respect been inferior unto men.

Thus out of the second and third chapters of Genesis, and out of the Old and New Testaments, I have observed in proof of the worthiness of our sex. First, that woman was the last work of Creation, I dare say the best. She was created out of the chosen and best refined substance. She was created in a more worthy country. She was married by a most holy priest. She was given by a most gracious Father. Her husband was enjoined to a most inseparable and affectionate care over her. The first promise of salvation was made to a woman. There is inseparable hatred and enmity put betwixt the woman and the serpent. Her first name, Eve, does presage the nature and disposition of all women, not only in respect of their bearing, but further, for the life and delight of heart and soul to all mankind.

Chapter 6

The arraignment of Joseph Swetnam, who was the author of the Arraignment of Women; and under his person, the arraignment of all idle frantic, froward, and lewd men.

Joseph Swetnam having written his rash, idle, furious, and shameful discourse against women, it was at last delivered into my hands. Presently I did acquaint some of our sex with the accident, with whom I did advise what course we should take with him.... As he had arraigned women at the bar of fame and report, we resolved, at the same bar where he did us the wrong, to arraign him, that thereby we might defend our assured right: and withal (respecting ourselves) we resolved to favor him so far in his trial that the world might take notice there was no partial or indirect dealing, but that he had as much favor as he could desire, and far more than he did or could deserve.

So that we brought him before two judges, Reason and Experience, who being in place, no man can suspect them with any indirect proceedings: For, albeit Reason of itself may be blinded by passion, yet when she is joined with Experience she is known to be absolute, and without compare. As for Experience, she is known of herself to be admirable excellent in her courses. She knoweth how to use every man in her courses; she will whip the fool to learn him more wit; she will punish the knave to practice more honestly; she will curb in the prodigal, and teach him to be wary; she will trip up the heels of such as are rash and giddy, and bid them hereafter look before they leap. To be sure, there is not in all the world, for all estates, degrees, qualities, and conditions of men, so singular a mistress, or so fit to be a judgess as she. Only one property she hath above the rest: no man cometh before her but she maketh him ashamed, and she will call and prove almost every man a fool, especially such who are wise in their own conceits.

Joseph Swetnam his Indictment

Joseph Swetnam, thou art indicted by the name of Joseph Swetnam of Bedlemmore, in the County of Onopolie, for that thou the twentieth day of December, in the year &c. diddest most wickedly, blasphemously, falsely, and scandalously publish a lewd pamphlet, entitled the Arraignment of Women, in which, albeit, thou diddest honestly pretend to arraign lewd, idle, froward, and inconstant women, yet contrary to thy pretended promise thou diddest rashly and maliciously rail and rage against all women, generally writing and publishing most blasphemously that women by their Creator were made for helpers, for helpers (thou sayest) "to spend and consume that which man painfully getteth." Furthermore, thou dost write, "That being made of a rib, which was crooked, they are therefore crooked and froward in conditions, and that woman was no sooner made, but her heart was set upon mischief," which thou doest derive to all the sex generally, in these words: "And therefore ever since they have been a woe unto man, and follow the line of their first leader." Further than all this, thou dost affirm an impudent lie upon Almighty God, in saying that God calleth them "necessary evils, and that therefore they were created to be a plague unto man." Thou writest also, "That women are proud, lascivious, froward, curst, unconstant, idle, impudent, shameless, and that they deck and dress themselves to tempt and allure men to lewdness," with much and many more foul, intemperate, and scandalous speeches, &c.

CHAPTER 8

The answer to all objections which are material, made against women

Right honourable and worshipful, and you of all degrees, it hath ever been a common custom amongst idle and humorous poets, pamphleteers, and rhymers, out of passionate discontents, or having little otherwise to employ themselves about, to write some bitter satire-pamphlet or rhyme against women, in which argument he who could devise anything more bitterly or spitefully against our sex hath never wanted the liking, allowance, and applause of giddy headed people.... I will at this present examine all the objections which are most material, which our adversary hath vomited out against woman....

It is the main end that our adversary aimeth at in all his discourse, to prove and say that women are bad. If he should offer this upon particulars, no one would deny it; but to lavish generally against all women, who can endure it? You might, Mr. Swetnam, with some show of honesty have said some women are bad, both by custom and company, but you cannot avoid the brand both of blasphemy and dishonesty to say of women generally they are all naught, both in their creation and by nature, and to ground your inferences upon Scriptures....

A man and a woman talk in the fields together. An honest mind will imagine of their talk answerable to his own disposition, whereas an evil disposed mind will censure according to his lewd inclination. When men complain of beauty and say, "That women's dressings and attire are provocations to wantonness, and baits to allure men," it is a direct means to know of what disposition they are. It is a shame for men in censuring of women to condemn themselves; but a common inn cannot be without a common sign; it is a common sign to know a lecher by complaining upon the cause and occasion of his surfeit. Who had known his disease but by his own complaint? It is extreme folly to complain of another when the root of all resteth within himself. Purge an infected heart, and turn away a lascivious eye, and then neither their dressings nor their beauty can any ways hurt you.... Bad minds are discovered by bad thoughts and hearts. Do not say and rail at women to be the cause of men's overthrow, when the original root and cause is in yourselves. If you be so affected that you cannot look but you must forthwith be infected, I do marvel, Joseph Swetnam, you set down no remedies for that torment of love, as you call it. You bid men shun and avoid it, but those be common and ordinary rules and instructions; yet not so ordinary, as able to restrain the extraordinary humors of your giddy company....

And experience proveth. It is a shame for a man to complain of a froward woman, in many respects all concerning himself. It is a shame he hath no more government over the weaker vessel. It is a shame he hath hardened her tender sides and gentle heart with his boisterous and northern blasts. It is a shame for a man to publish and proclaim household secrets, which is a common practice amongst men, especially drunkards, lechers, and prodigal spend-thrifts. These, when they come home drunk, or are called in question for their riotous misdemeanors, they presently show themselves, the right children of Adam. They will excuse themselves by their wives, and say that their unquietness and frowardness at home is the cause that they run abroad. …

And this shall appear in the imputation which our adversary chargeth upon our sex, to be lascivious, wanton and lustful. He sayeth, "Women tempt, allure, and provoke men." How rare a thing is it for women to prostitute and offer themselves? How common a practice is it for men to seek and solicit women to lewdness? What charge do they spare? What travel do they bestow? What vows, oaths, and protestations do they spend, to make them dishonest? They hire panders,[1] they write letters, they seal them with damnations and execrations, to assure them of love, when the end proves but lust. They know the flexible disposition of women, and, the sooner to overreach them, some will pretend they are so plunged in love that except they obtain their desire they will seem to drown, hang, stab, poison, or banish themselves from friends and country. What motives are these to tender dispositions? Some will pretend marriage, another offer continual maintenance, but when they have obtained their purpose, what shall a woman find? Just that which is her everlasting shame and grief: she hath made herself the unhappy subject to a lustful body, and the shameful stall of a lascivious tongue. Men may with foul shame charge women with this sin which they had never committed if she had not trusted, nor had ever trusted if she had not been deceived with vows, oaths, and protestations. To bring a woman to offend in one sin, how many damnable sins do they commit? I appeal to their own consciences.…

Our adversary bringeth many examples of men which have been overthrown by women. It is answered, before the fault is their own. But I would have him, or anyone living, to show any woman that offended in this sin of lust, but that she was first solicited by a man.

Helen was the cause of Troy's burning. First, Paris did solicit her; next, how many knaves and fools of the male kind had Troy, which to maintain whoredom would bring their city to confusion?…

Hitherto I have so answered all your objections against women, that as I have not defended the wickedness of any, so I have set down the true state of the question. As Eve did not offend without the temptation of a serpent, so women do seldom offend but it is by provocation of men. Let not your impudence, nor your consorts' dishonesty, charge our sex hereafter with those sins of which you yourselves were the first procurers. I have, in my discourse, touched you and all yours to the quick. I have taxed you with bitter speeches; you will (perhaps) say I am a railing scold. In this objection, Joseph Swetnam, I will teach you both wit and honesty. The difference betwixt a railing scold and an honest accuser is this: the first rageth upon passionate fury without bringing cause or proof, the other bringeth direct proof for what she allegeth. You charge women with clamorous words and bring no proof; I charge you with blasphemy, with impudence, scurrility, foolery, and the like. I show just and direct proof for what I say. It is not my desire to speak so much; it is your desert to provoke me upon just cause so far. It is no railing to call a crow black, or a wolf a ravener, or a drunkard a beast; the report of the truth is never to be blamed. The deserver of such a report deserveth the shame.

Now, for this time to draw to an end, let me ask according to the question of Cassian, "Cui bono?"[2] What have you gotten by publishing your pamphlet? Good I know you can get none. You have (perhaps) pleased the humors of some giddy, idle, conceited persons, but you have dyed yourself in the colours of shame, lying, slandering, blasphemy, ignorance, and the like.

[1] panders Go-betweens in clandestine love affairs; pimps.

[2] Cassian … bono Cassian (360–435 CE) was an Eastern Christian monk who brought Eastern spirituality to the West. Cui bono Latin: To whom is the good?

The shortness of time and the weight of business call me away and urge me to leave off thus abruptly; but assure yourself, where I leave now, I will by God's grace supply the next term, to your small content. You have exceeded in your fury against widows, whose defense you shall hear of at the time aforesaid. In the mean space recollect your wits, write out of deliberation, not out of fury; write out of advice, not out of idleness; forbear to charge women with faults which come from the contagion of masculine serpents.

from Owen Felltham, Resolves (1628)[1]

OF WOMAN

Some are so uncharitable, as to think all women bad; and others are so credulous, as they believe they all are good. Sure: though every man speaks as he finds, there is reason to direct our opinion without experience of the whole sex; which in a strict examination, makes more for their honour than most men have acknowledged. At first, she was created his equal, only the difference was in the sex: otherwise, they both were Man. If we argue from the text, that male and female made man, so the man being put first was worthier: I answer, "So the evening and the morning was the first day," yet few will think the night the better.[2] That man is made her governor, and so above her, I believe rather the punishment of her sin, than the prerogative of his worth. Had they both stood, it may be thought, she had never been in that subjection: for then had it been no curse, but a continuance of her former estate: which had nothing but blessedness in it. Peter Martyr indeed is of opinion that man before the fall had priority. But Chrysostom,[3] he says, does doubt it.

All will grant her body more admirable, more beautiful than man's: fuller of curiosities, and noble nature's wonders: both for conception, and fostering the producted birth. And can we think God would put a worser soul into a better body? When man was created, 'tis said, "God made man": but when woman, 'tis said, "God builded her": as if he had then been about a frame of rarer rooms, and more exact composition.[4] And, without doubt, in her body, she is much more wonderful: and by this, we may think her so in her mind. Philosophy tells us, though the soul be not caused by the body, yet in the general it follows the temperament of it: so the comeliest outsides are naturally (for the most part) more virtuous within. If place can be any privilege, we shall find her built in Paradise, when man was made without it.[5]

'Tis certain, they are by constitution colder than the boiling man:[6] so by this, more temperate: 'tis heat that transports man to immoderation and fury: 'tis that, which hurries him to a savage and libidinous violence. Women are naturally the more modest: and modesty is the seat and dwelling place of virtue. Whence proceed the most abhorred villainies, but from a masculine unblushing impudence? What a deal of sweetness do we find in a mild disposition? When a woman grows bold and daring, we dislike her, and say, "she is too like a man": yet in our selves, we magnify what we condemn in her. Is not this injustice? Every man is so much the better, by how much he comes nearer to God. Man in nothing is more like Him, than in being merciful. Yet woman is far more merciful than man: it being a sex, wherein pity and compassion have dispersed far brighter rays. God is said to be love; and I am sure, everywhere woman is spoken of, for transcending in that quality. It was never found, but in two men only,[7] that their love exceeded that of the feminine sex: and if you observe them, you shall find they were both of melting dispositions.

[1] Resolves Owen Felltham (1604?–68) published the first edition of Resolves in 1623, before he was twenty years old. The essays in this collection, which he revised and expanded over subsequent years, played an important role in the development of the English essay.

[2] So the evening ... better See Genesis 1.27 and 1.5.

[3] Peter ... Chrysostom Peter Martyr Vermigli (1500–62), Italian theologian and religious reformer; Saint John Chrysostom (347?–407), Patriarch of Constantinople.

[4] When man ... composition Felltham quotes Genesis 2.22, using the Geneva translation, which glossed "made he a woman" as "built."

[5] without it I.e., outside Paradise.

[6] colder than the boiling man In medieval and Renaissance physiology, women were associated with cold and moist qualities, men with hot and dry.

[7] two men only The biblical friends David and Jonathan; see especially 2 Samuel 1.26.

I know, when they prove bad, they are a sort of the vilest creatures: yet still the same reason gives it: for, Optima corrupta, pessima: the best things corrupted, become the worst. They are things, whose souls are of a more ductible[1] temper than the harder metal of man: so may be made both better and worse. The representations of Sophocles and Euripides[2] may be both true: and for the tongue-vice, talkativeness, I see not but at meetings men may very well vie words with them. 'Tis true, they are not of so tumultuous a spirit, so not so fit for great actions. Natural heat does more actuate the stirring genius of man. Their easy natures make them somewhat more unresolute; whereby men have argued them of fear and inconstancy. But men have always held the Parliament, and have enacted their own wills, without ever hearing them speak: and then, how easy is it to conclude them guilty? Besides, education makes more difference between men and them, than nature: and all their aspersions are less noble, for that they are only from their enemies, men.

Diogenes[3] snarled bitterly when, walking with another, he spied two women talking, and said, "See, the viper and the asp are changing poison." The poet[4] was conceited that said, after they were made ill, that God made them fearful, that man might rule them; otherwise they had been past dealing with. Catullus[5] his conclusion was too general, to collect a deceit in all women, because he was not confident of his own:

> Nulli se dicit mulier mea nubere malle
> Quàm mihi: non si se Jupiter ipse petat.
> Dicit: sed mulier Cupido quod dicit amanti,
> In vento, & rapida scribere oportet aqua.
> My mistress swears, she'd leave all men for me:
> Yea, though that Jove himself should suitor be.
> She says it: but, what women swear to kind
> Loves, may be writ in rapid streams, and wind.

I am resolved to honour virtue, in what sex soever I find it. And I think, in the general, I shall find it more in women, than men; though weaker, and more infirmly guarded. I believe, they are better, and may be wrought to be worse. Neither shall the faults of many, make me uncharitable to all: nor the goodness of some, make me credulous of the rest. Though hitherto, I confess, I have not found more sweet and constant goodness in man than I have found in woman: and yet of these, I have not found a number.

[1] ductible Malleable, pliable.

[2] representations of Sophocles and Euripides Probably referring to the differing characterizations by these ancient Greek playwrights of the tragic figure of Electra, who is more sympathetic in Sophocles's tragedy of that name than in Euripides's.

[3] Diogenes Classical Greek philosopher.

[4] The poet Unidentified; probably classical. Felltham often does not identify his sources; he believed that the essay was like a conversation in which notes would be pedantic.

[5] Catullus Roman lyric poet (first century BCE). Feltham quotes Poems lxx and provides his own translation.

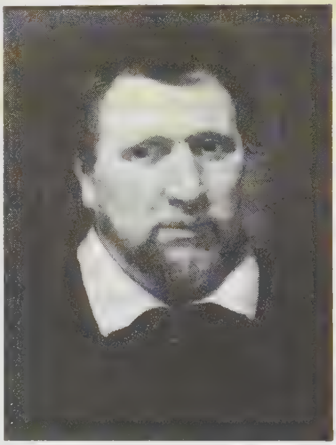
BEN JONSON

1572 – 1637

Ben Jonson was an innovator in poetry, drama, and criticism. In 1616 he became the first Englishman to edit and publish not just his own poetry but his own drama. King James I awarded him a pension and he was, in effect, England's Poet Laureate although there was as yet no such official position. He presided over a literary following that in one poem he calls the "tribe of Ben," members of which included some of the best Cavalier poets. Like Shakespeare a pioneer in the transition from verse to prose in comic dialogue, with a particular talent for shaping social and moral satire into comedy, Jonson also preferred to create his own plots rather than to borrow stories from earlier sources, as was a common practice. With inventive and lyrical virtuosity, he also accumulated a supple and diverse body of poetry. His reputation came to be partially eclipsed by that of Shakespeare, for his humanist erudition and the frequent comic realism of his drama made him seem flat and pedantic beside what was read as Shakespeare's genial inspiration (what Milton called his "native woodnotes wild")—a writer for scholars, to be respected and admired sooner than loved and enjoyed. The twentieth century, though, felt an affinity for what appeared to be the anticipatory modern elements in Jonson—his "plain style," his acute social observation, and his audacity in manipulating dramatic and classical conventions. T.S. Eliot, one of the first to sense this affinity, called Jonson's works "a part of our literary inheritance that craves further expression."



Jonson's grounding in the classics began in adolescence at Westminster School under the noted scholar and antiquarian William Camden, a lifelong friend whom Jonson later praised as the teacher "to whom I owe all that I am in arts." After brief stints as an apprentice bricklayer and a soldier, Jonson (like Shakespeare) joined the developing theater world as an actor. Every Man in his Humour (1598), in which Shakespeare acted, established Jonson as master of the new "comedy of humors," which lampoons eccentricities of character, called "humors" because diagnosable as an imbalance of the four humors that make up the body and affect the mind. Jonson also announced himself as an innovator with a mission. His prologue to the play—one of many such overt statements and justifications of his art that he eventually learned to dramatize more indirectly—sets out what remained the core of his dramatic philosophy; in it he advocates direct and realistic language ("deeds and language such as men do use") and a return to classical unities of time and space, eschewing the elaborate fantasies and distortions common in Elizabethan comedy and even more common in Jacobean romance and tragicomedy. A more satirical sequel, Every Man out of his Humour (1599), proved so popular that Jonson took the unorthodox step of personally supervising its publication, thereby establishing a double precedent—the play as property of its author rather than of the acting company, and the popular stage play as literary document.

Jonson's high opinion of his art proved justified; his plays Volpone (1606) and The Alchemist (1610) remain two of the best-loved comedies in British literature. Volpone chronicles a scheming miser's deception of a series of legacy hunters; in The Alchemist, various vain and gullible types are exploited by three servants posing as musicians in their master's absence. Both are comedies of intrigue, and in both Jonson set new standards in incisive, naturalistic dialogue and intricate plot construction. (Coleridge judged the plot of The Alchemist "absolute perfection.") These comedies show Jonson able to turn his ferocious satirical gifts to a coherent purpose, what he called "high moral" comedy, and, in the case of The Alchemist, to attain perfect classical unities of time and space: its action takes place in real time in a set built to actual size.

Jonson also scored hits with Epicoene (1612), a sportive exploration of sexual politics, and Bartholomew Fair (1614), a broad, slice-of-life portrait of London holiday street life. His attempts at tragedy, Sejanus (1603) and Catiline (1612), were judged too ponderous and pedantic, though Jonson, who well understood the power of print, was convinced his reading public would overleap what he saw as the deficiencies of his playgoing audiences. In the case of Catiline, he was right: though never a performance success, it was the most-quoted English play of the seventeenth century.

Posterity has since consigned Jonson's tragedies to relative obscurity but has shown increased regard for the limpid and clever verse he contributed to the Jacobean court masques. These were entertainments, commissioned to celebrate special events, that were danced and acted by members of the court. They featured increasingly elaborate costumes, scenery, and special effects, all designed by Jonson's collaborator, the court architect Inigo Jones. Such spectacles as the Masque of Blackness (1605) and the Masque of Beauty (1608) played off antique myths, providing a venue for Jonson to display his classical learning and sharpen his lyrical gifts. Jonson also introduced, in such flattering yet admonitory court masques as Pleasure Reconciled to Virtue and Love Restored (1612), the intriguing device of the "antimasque," a more rough-and-tumble moment with comic images of irrationality or grotesquerie that the surrounding masque both absorbs and exorcizes. Between them, Jonson and Jones took the masque from transitory amusement into a high art that in its multimedia form in some ways anticipates the opera and even film.

Jonson considered himself above all a poet. His poetry follows his dramas and masques in the 1616 folio of his collected works, which was the culmination of his career to that point, "the ripest of my studies." When, in his "Epistle to the Countess of Rutland" (1600), he introduced his "strange poems, which as yet / Had not their form touched by an English wit," Jonson was referring to such classical forms as the ode, epistle, epitaph, and epigram that he intended to revive or invigorate with a more crystalline yet colloquial style. His two best-loved lyrics, "To Celia" and "Drink to Me Only With Thine Eyes," written for Volpone, are not mere translations of Catullus and Philostrates; they are quintessentially Jonsonian, bringing to mind Oscar Wilde's assertion that Jonson "made the poets of Greece and Rome terribly modern."

These classical poetic genres were well suited to the intensely personal and yet social nature of Jonson's poetry, and it is here that his turbulent life and personality are reflected most vividly. We see in his many commissioned occasional pieces the cultivation of the aristocratic patronage on which he depended—as in "To Penshurst," his eloquent tribute to the estate of the Sidney family. We witness his capacity for generous friendship in his epigrams to John Donne and his preface to Shakespeare's First Folio, and his capacity for grief in the restrained eloquence of his epitaphs on his young son and infant daughter. We even glean hints of his legendary appetite for food and drink in "Inviting a Friend to Supper," which celebrates the sort of literary camaraderie Jonson found (and read about in his beloved Horace) in his early years, at the Mermaid Tavern, where he held court with a coterie of wits and fellow writers. Other early literary friends included Ralegh, Bacon, Chapman, Beaumont, and Fletcher, while later in his career, he mentored younger poets such as Herrick, Suckling, and Carew, presiding over a literary cult of sorts, the "sons [or sometimes "tribe"] of Ben," at the Devil Tavern in the 1620s. Jonson had enemies, too; he could be vain, arrogant and quarrelsome, especially in defense of his literary principles and reputation, as in his legendary feud with his rival playwrights Dekker and Marston early in his career. Indeed, in 1598 he got into a fight with an actor and killed him (a crime for which he was branded and sent for a while to prison, where he became a Catholic, reconverting some years later).

The royal pension bestowed on him in 1616 enabled Jonson to leave the stage and concentrate largely on his poetry for a decade. In 1618, he traveled to Scotland, where he visited the poet William Drummond, who left a record of their conversations and Jonson's often imperious opinions. The following year he was awarded an honorary M.A. from Oxford. Such triumphs and his "tribe" or "sons" notwithstanding, the 1620s brought a gradual decline in Jonson's health and fortunes. A fire destroyed his library, along with several manuscripts, in 1623. The death of King James in 1625 left him without a place at court, necessitating a return to the stage in 1626 with The Staple of News, a satire on the emerging newspaper business; it was not well-received. In fact, he was never again to attain success as a playwright; Dryden was later to refer to these late plays as "Jonson's dotages." His masque-writing career ended with the culmination in 1631 of a long-running feud with Inigo Jones. Even though disabled and confined to his house after a stroke in 1628, however, and though no longer the influential lion of his youth, Jonson did not lack for admirers or companionship. When he died in August 1637, most of London's literary and social elite attended his funeral.

Ben Jonson did not leave the world of letters as he found it. His assertion of ownership and careful editing of his own works affected the development of modern authorship and certainly influenced the publication of Shakespeare's First Folio. His satirical comedies provided a significant model for Restoration and eighteenth-century drama, and even for later comic writers in other genres such as Fielding and Dickens. In numerous justificatory prologues to his plays, and in his commonplace book, Timber, or Discoveries, he left behind a striking record of a writer's mind at work. And, just as important, the muscular yet supple "plain style" of his poetry was pivotal in deflecting a late Elizabethan taste for the highly wrought and decorative towards a more direct and colloquial manner that became one major strand of late seventeenth-century (and modern) aesthetics.

To the Reader

Pray thee take care, that tak'st my book in hand,
To read it well: that is, to understand.
—1616

To My Book

It will be looked for, book, when some but see
Thy title, Epigrams, and named of me,
Thou should'st be bold, licentious, full of gall,
Wormwood and sulphur, sharp and toothed withal;[1]
Become a petulant thing, hurl ink and wit
As madmen stones, not caring whom they hit.
Deceive their malice who could wish it so,
And by thy wiser temper let men know
Thou are not covetous of least self-fame
Made from the hazard of another's shame;
Much less with lewd, profane and beastly phrase,
To catch the world's loose laughter or vain gaze.
He that departs with his own honesty
For vulgar praise, doth it too dearly buy.
—1616

On Something that Walks Somewhere

At court I met it, in clothes brave enough
To be a courtier, and looks grave enough
To seem a statesman: as I near it came,
It made me a great face; I asked the name.
"A lord," it cried, "buried in flesh and blood,
And such from whom let no man hope least good,
For I will do none; and as little ill,
For I will dare none." Good lord, walk dead still.
—1616

[1] Thou should'st ... toothed withal Characteristics of late Elizabethan verse satire, a mode of poetry with which epigrams were associated.

To William Camden[1]

Camden, most reverend head, to whom I owe
All that I am in arts, all that I know
(How nothing's that?), to whom my country owes
The great renown and name[2] wherewith she goes;
Than thee the age sees not that thing more grave,
More high, more holy, that she more would crave.
What name, what skill, what faith hast thou in things!
What sight in searching the most antique springs!
What weight, and what authority in thy speech!
Man scarce can make that doubt, but thou canst teach.
Pardon free truth, and let thy modesty,
Which conquers all, be once overcome by thee.
Many of thine this better could than I;
But for their powers, accept my piety.
—1616

On My First Daughter

Here lies, to each her parents' ruth,
Mary, the daughter of their youth;
Yet, all heaven's gifts being heaven's due,
It makes the father less to rue.
At six months' end she parted hence
With safety of her innocence;
Whose soul heaven's queen (whose name she bears)
In comfort of her mother's tears,
Hath placed amongst her virgin train:
Where, while that severed doth remain,[3]
This grave partakes the fleshly birth;
Which cover lightly, gentle earth.
—1616

To John Donne[4]

Donne, the delight of Phoebus[5] and each muse,
Who, to thy one, all other brains refuse;[6]
Whose every work of thy most early wit
Came forth example, and remains so yet;
Longer a-knowing than most wits do live,
And which no affection praise enough can give!
To it, thy language, letters, arts, best life,
Which might with half mankind maintain a strife;
All which I meant to praise, and yet I would,
But leave, because I cannot as I should.
—1616

On My First Son

Farewell, thou child of my right hand,[7] and joy;
My sin was too much hope of thee, loved boy.
Seven years thou wert lent to me, and I thee pay,
Exacted by thy fate, on the just day.[8]
Oh, could I lose all father, now! For why
Will man lament the state he should envy?
To have so soon 'scaped world's and flesh's rage,
And, if no other misery, yet age?
Rest in soft peace, and, asked, say here doth lie
Ben Jonson his best piece of poetry;
For whose sake, henceforth, all his vows be such,
As what he loves may never like too much.
—1616 (written 1603)

To honour, serve and love, as poets use.
I meant to make her fair, and free,° and wise, generous
Of greatest blood, and yet more good than great;
I meant the day-star[2] should not brighter rise,
Nor lend like influence from his lucent° seat. shining
I meant she should be courteous, facile,° sweet, affable
Hating that solemn vice of greatness, pride;
I meant each softest virtue there should meet,
Fit in that softer bosom to reside.
Only a learnèd and a manly soul
I purposed her; that should, with even powers,
The rock, the spindle and the shears control
Of destiny,[3] and spin her own free hours.
Such when I meant to feign, and wished to see,
My muse bade, Bedford write, and that was she.

Inviting a Friend to Supper

Tonight, grave sir, both my poor house and I
Do equally desire your company:
Not that we think us worthy such a guest,
But that your worth will dignify our feast
With those that come; whose grace may make that seem Something, which else could hope for no esteem.
It is the fair acceptance, sir, creates
The entertainment perfect, not the cates.° food
Yet shall you have, to rectify your palate,
An olive, capers, or some better salad
Ushering the mutton; with a short-legged hen,
If we can get her, full of eggs, and then
Lemons, and wine for sauce; to these, a coney° rabbit
Is not to be despaired of, for our money;
And though fowl now be scarce, yet there are clerks,[4]
The sky not falling, think we may have larks.[5]
I'll tell you of more, and lie, so you will come:
Of partridge, pheasant, woodcock, of which some
May yet be there; and godwit, if we can;
Knat, rail and ruff, too.[6] Howsoe'er, my man
Shall read a piece of Virgil, Tacitus,
Livy, or of some better book to us,
Of which we'll speak our minds, amidst our meat;
And I'll profess no verses to repeat;
To this, if aught appear which I not know of,
That will the pastry, not my paper, show of.[7]
Digestive cheese and fruit there sure will be;
But that which most doth take my muse and me
Is a pure cup of rich Canary wine,[8]
Which is the Mermaid's[9] now, but shall be mine;
Of which had Horace or Anacreon[10] tasted,
Their lives, as do their lines, till now had lasted.
Tobacco,[11] nectar, or the Thespian Spring[12]

---

[1] Lucy, Countess of Bedford (1581–1627), friend and patron of Ben Jonson and other writers, including John Donne, Samuel Daniel, and Michael Drayton.

[2] day-star Often the morning star or planet Venus, but sometimes, as here, the sun (the next line indicates that this day-star is figured as masculine).

[3] The rock … Of destiny Referring to the three Fates of classical myth: Clotho spun the thread of life (a "rock" is a distaff), Lachesis measured its length on her spindle, and Atropos cut the thread. Jonson's ideal patron controls her own destiny, and so spins for herself her "free" (unmeasured) hours.

[4] clerks Pronounced "clarks."

[5] larks Playing on a proverb: "if the sky falls, we shall have larks." Here, some "clerks" (knowledgeable people) think Jonson's supper will feature larks even if the sky does not fall. Not figurative: to "have larks" in the sense of to "have fun" first appears in the nineteenth century.

[6] Knat … too All edible birds. Jonson is not offering his guest an expensive feast: by the standards of the gentry of the time, the food on offer is simple and inexpensive, though well chosen.

[7] if aught appear … show of That is, if Jonson's own poems do make a surprise appearance, it will only be because they are on paper used to wrap the pastries.

[8] Canary wine Light, sweet wine from the Canary Islands, off the west coast of Africa.

[9] Mermaid's The Mermaid Tavern in Cheapside, Jonson's favorite place to meet friends and drink.

[10] Horace or Anacreon Respectively, a Roman and an ancient Greek lyric poet; both wrote in praise of wine.

[11] Tobacco Tobacco was described as being "drunk" rather than "smoked" in the period.

[12] Thespian Spring Stream at the foot of Mount Helicon sacred to the classical Muses.

Are all but Luther's beer[1] to this I sing.
Of this we will sup free, but moderately;
And we will have no Poley or Parrot[2] by;
Nor shall our cups make any guilty men,
But at our parting we will be as when
We innocently met. No simple word
That shall be uttered at our mirthful board
Shall make us sad next morning, or affright
The liberty that we'll enjoy tonight.

To Penshurst[3]

Thou art not, Penshurst, built to envious show
Of touch° or marble, nor canst boast a row black stone
Of polished pillars, or a roof of gold;
Thou hast no lantern[4] whereof tales are told,
Or stair, or courts; but standst an ancient pile,
And these grudged at, art reverenced the while.
Thou joy'st in better marks, of soil, of air,
Of wood, of water; therein thou art fair.
Thou hast thy walks for health as well as sport:
Thy Mount, to which the dryads° do resort, wood nymphs
Where Pan and Bacchus[5] their high feasts have made,
Beneath the broad beech and the chestnut shade;
That taller tree, which of a nut was set
At his great birth,[6] where all the Muses met.
There, in the writhèd° bark, are cut the names twisted
Of many a sylvan,[7] taken with his flames;
And thence the ruddy satyrs oft provoke
The lighter fauns to reach thy lady's oak.[8]
Thy copse, too, named of Gamage,[9] thou hast there,
That never fails to serve thee seasoned° deer of suitable age
When thou wouldst feast or exercise thy friends.
The lower land, that to the river bends,
Thy sheep, thy bullocks, kine and calves do feed;
The middle grounds thy mares and horses breed.
Each bank doth yield thee conies,° and the tops, rabbits
Fertile of wood, Ashour and Sidney's copse,[10]
To crown thy open table, doth provide
The purpled pheasant with the speckled side;
The painted partridge lies in every field,
And for thy mess° is willing to be killed. meal
And if the high-swoll'n Medway[11] fail thy dish,
Thou hast thy ponds that pay thee tribute fish:
Fat, agèd carps, that run into thy net;
And pikes, now weary their own kind to eat,[12]
As loath the second draught or cast to stay,
Officiously,° at first, themselves betray; obligingly
Bright eels, that emulate them, and leap on land
Before the fisher, or into his hand.
Then hath thy orchard fruit, thy garden flowers,
Fresh as the air and new as are the hours:
The early cherry, with the later plum,
Fig, grape and quince, each in his time doth come;

---

[1] Luther's beer Beer brewed in Germany and thought to be weaker than and inferior to English beer.

[2] Poley or Parrot Two well known government spies or informers; Robert Poley (or Pooly) and Henry Parrot. Pooly was present when Christopher Marlowe was fatally stabbed in a Deptford tavern. Jonson also plays on these men's names: a "Polly" or Parrot is a talkative bird.

[3] To Penshurst Penshurst Place, in Kent, was the home of Sir Robert Sidney, Viscount Lisle (1563–1626) and his wife, Barbara Gamage (c. 1559–1621); Robert was the younger brother of Sir Philip Sidney (1554–86) and, in 1618, was made Earl of Leicester. Penshurst had been given to the Sidney family by King Edward VI in 1552, but, as Jonson points out, parts of the manor were much older: the Great Hall was built in 1340–41, and remains today as one of England's finest examples of fourteenth-century domestic architecture.

[4] lantern Windowed turret or similar structure; the new, lavish manors with which Jonson compares Penshurst featured such "talked about" architectural features.

[5] Pan and Bacchus Greek gods: Pan was the half man, half goat deity of the pastoral world; Bacchus was the god of wine. Both were also associated with song and poetic inspiration, and their presence is an implicit tribute to the Sidneys as a family of poets (Philip in particular; see line 14) and patrons of poetry.

[6] his great birth Sir Philip Sidney (b. 1554).

[7] sylvan Rural lover, inspired by the flames of love (or by the passions in Sidney's love poetry).

[8] satyrs … lady's oak Satyrs and fauns are ancient woodland deities: the satyrs challenge the (smaller) fauns in races to an oak tree named for a Lady Leicester who went into labor while sitting under it.

[9] Gamage Named for Barbara Gamage, Lady Leicester.

[10] tops … copse Like other parts of the estate, nature in the "tops" (high grounds) bears the names of people.

[11] Medway River near the estate.

[12] And pikes … to eat Pikes were reputed to be particularly voracious fish.

The blushing apricot and woolly peach
Hang on thy walls, that every child may reach.
And though thy walls be of the country° stone, local
They're reared with no man's ruin, no man's groan;
There's none that dwell about them wish them down,
But all come in, the farmer and the clown,° rustic
And no one empty-handed, to salute
Thy lord and lady, though they have no suit.° request
Some bring a capon, some a rural cake,
Some nuts, some apples; some that think they make
The better cheeses, bring 'em; or else send
By their ripe daughters, whom they would commend
This way to husbands; and whose baskets bear
An emblem of themselves, in plum or pear.
But what can this (more than express their love)
Add to thy free provisions, far above
The need of such? whose liberal board doth flow
With all that hospitality doth know!
Where comes no guest but is allowed to eat
Without his fear, and of thy lord's own meat;
Where the same beer and bread and self-same wine
That is his lordship's shall be also mine;
And I not fain to sit, as some this day
At great men's tables, and yet dine away.
Here no man tells° my cups, nor, standing by, counts
A waiter, doth my gluttony envy,
But gives me what I call, and lets me eat;
He knows below he shall find plenty of meat,
Thy tables hoard not up for the next day.
Nor, when I take my lodging, need I pray
For fire or lights or livery:° all is there, provisions
As if thou then wert mine, or I reigned here;
There's nothing I can wish, for which I stay.° wait
That found King James, when, hunting late this way
With his brave son, the Prince,[1] they saw thy fires
Shine bright on every hearth as the desires
Of thy Penates[2] had been set on flame
To entertain them; or the country came
With all their zeal to warm their welcome here.
What (great, I will not say, but) sudden cheer
Didst thou then make 'em! and what praise was heaped
On thy good lady then! who therein reaped
The just reward of her high housewifery:
To have her linen, plate, and all things nigh
When she was far; and not a room but dressed
As if it had expected such a guest!
These, Penshurst, are thy praise, and yet not all.
Thy lady's noble, fruitful, chaste withal;
His children thy great lord may call his own,
A fortune in this age but rarely known.
They are and have been taught religion; thence
Their gentler spirits have sucked innocence.
Each morn and even they are taught to pray
With the whole household, and may every day
Read in their virtuous parents' noble parts
The mysteries of manners, arms, and arts.
Now, Penshurst, they that will proportion° thee compare
With other edifices, when they see
Those proud, ambitious heaps, and nothing else,
May say, their lords have built, but thy lord dwells.

Song: To Celia[3]

Drink to me only, with thine eyes,
And I will pledge with mine;
Or leave a kiss but in the cup,
And I'll not look for wine.
The thirst that from the soul doth rise
Doth ask a drink divine;
But might I of Jove's nectar sup,
I would not change for thine.
I sent thee late a rosy wreath,
Not so much honouring thee
As giving it a hope that there
It could not withered be.
But thou thereon didst only breathe,
And sent'st it back to me;
Since when it grows, and smells, I swear,
Not of itself, but thee.

the Prince Prince Henry; he died in November 1612.

[2] Penates Roman household divinities.

[3] Song: To Celia Much of this poem consists of Jonson's translations of prose fragments by the ancient Greek writer Philostratus.

To the Memory of My Beloved, The Author, Mr. William Shakespeare, And What He Hath Left Us[1]

To draw no envy, Shakespeare, on thy name,
Am I thus ample to thy book and fame;
While I confess thy writings to be such
As neither man nor Muse can praise too much:
'Tis true, and all men's suffrage. But these ways
Were not the paths I meant unto thy praise:
For silliest ignorance on these may light,
Which, when it sounds at best, but echoes right;
Or blind affection, which doth ne'er advance
The truth, but gropes, and urgeth all by chance;
Or crafty malice might pretend this praise,
And think to ruin where it seemed to raise.
These are as some infamous bawd or whore
Should praise a matron: what could hurt her more?
But thou art proof against them, and indeed
Above the ill fortune of them, or the need.
I therefore will begin. Soul of the age!
The applause, delight, the wonder of our stage!
My Shakespeare, rise: I will not lodge thee by Chaucer or Spenser, or bid Beaumont[2] lie
A little further, to make thee a room;
Thou art a monument without a tomb,
And art alive still while thy book doth live,
And we have wits to read, and praise to give.
That I not mix thee so, my brain excuses:
I mean with great, but disproportioned, Muses;
For if I thought my judgement were of years
I should commit thee surely with thy peers:
And tell how far thou didst our Lyly outshine,
Or sporting Kyd, or Marlowe's mighty line.[3]
And though thou hadst small Latin, and less Greek,[4]
From thence to honour thee I would not seek
For names, but call forth thundering Aeschylus,
Euripides, and Sophocles[5] to us,
Pacuvius, Accius, him of Cordova dead,[6]
To life again, to hear thy buskin[7] tread
And shake a stage; or, when thy socks[8] were on,
Leave thee alone for the comparison
Of all that insolent Greece or haughty Rome
Sent forth, or since did from their ashes come.
Triumph, my Britain, thou hast one to show
To whom all scenes of Europe homage owe.
He was not of an age, but for all time!
And all the Muses still were in their prime
When like Apollo he came forth to warm
Our ears, or like a Mercury[9] to charm!
Nature herself was proud of his designs,
And joyed to wear the dressing of his lines,
Which were so richly spun and woven so fit
As, since, she will vouchsafe no other wit.
The merry Greek, tart Aristophanes,
Neat Terence, witty Plautus,[10] now not please,
But antiquated and deserted lie
As they were not of nature's family.
Yet must I not give nature all: thy art,
My gentle Shakespeare, must enjoy a part.
For though the poet's matter nature be,
His art doth give the fashion. And that he
Who casts to write a living line must sweat
(Such as thine are) and strike the second heat
Upon the Muses' anvil: turn the same
(And himself with it) that he thinks to frame;
Or for the laurel he may gain a scorn:
For a good poet's made, as well as born;
And such wert thou.[11] Look how the father's face

[1] To the Memory ... Left Us Published in the first folio edition of Shakespeare's Works (1623).

[2] Beaumont Playwright Francis Beaumont (1584–1616), buried, like Chaucer and Spenser, in Westminster Abbey.

[3] our Lyly ... mighty line Playwrights John Lyly (c. 1554–1606), Thomas Kyd (1558–94), and Christopher Marlowe (1564–93).

[4] small Latin, and less Greek By Jonson's standards, this means something less than erudite and expert fluency.

[5] Aeschylus, Euripides, and Sophocles Ancient Greek dramatists.

[6] Pacuvius ... Cordova dead Ancient Roman playwrights. No works are extant by Pacuvius or Accius; "him of Cordova" is Seneca.

[7] buskin Boot worn by actors in Greek tragedies, and so a metonym for tragic drama.

[8] socks Shoes worn by actors in Greek and Roman comedies, and so a metonym for comic drama.

[9] Apollo ... Mercury Gods of poetry and eloquence.

[10] tart Aristophanes ... Plautus Aristophanes was a Greek dramatist known for satirical comedies; Plautus and Terence were both Roman playwrights known for comedies.

[11] thy art ... wert thou Jonson in fact seems to have resented the ease with which Shakespeare wrote: see his comments in the "Conversations with Drummond" and Timber, or, Discoveries.

Lives in his issue: even so, the race
Of Shakespeare's mind and manners brightly shines
In his well-turned and true-filed lines:
In each of which he seems to shake a lance,
As brandished at the eyes of ignorance.
Sweet swan of Avon! What a sight it were
To see thee in our waters yet appear,
And make those flights upon the banks of Thames
That so did take Eliza, and our James![1]
But stay, I see thee in the hemisphere
Advanced, and made a constellation there!
Shine forth, thou star of poets, and with rage
Or influence chide or cheer the drooping stage;
Which, since thy flight from hence, hath mourned like night
And despairs day, but for thy volume's light.
—1623

Ode to Himself[2]

Come leave the loathèd stage,
And the more loathsome age,
Where pride and impudence, in faction knit,
Usurp the chair of wit:
Indicting and arraigning every day
Something they call a play.
Let their fastidious, vain
Commission of the brain
Run on, and rage, sweat, censure, and condemn:
They were not made for thee, less thou for them.

Say that thou pour'st them wheat,
And they will acorns eat:
'Twere simple fury, still, thyself to waste
On such as have no taste:
To offer them a surfeit of pure bread,
Whose appetites are dead.
No, give them grains their fill,
Husks, draff° to drink and swill. dregs
If they love lees, and leave the lusty wine,
Envy them not, their palate's with the swine.

No doubt some mouldy tale,
Like Pericles,[3] and stale
As the shrieve's crusts,[4] and nasty as his fish-
Scraps out of every dish
Thrown forth, and raked into the common tub,
May keep up the play-club:
There, sweepings do as well
As the best ordered meal.
For, who the relish of these guests will fit,
Needs set them but the alms-basket of wit.

And much good do't you then:
Brave plush and velvet-men;
Can feed on orts:° and safe in your stage-clothes, scraps
Dare quit, upon your oaths,
The stagers and the stage-wrights too (your peers)
Of larding your large ears
With their foul comic socks,
Wrought upon twenty blocks:
Which if they are torn, and turned, and patched enough,
The gamesters share your guilt, and you their stuff.

Leave things so prostitute,
And take the Alcaic lute;
Or thine own Horace or Anacreon's lyre;
Warm thee by Pindar's[5] fire:
And though thy nerves be shrunk, and blood be cold,
Ere years have made thee old,
Strike that disdainful heat
Throughout, to their defeat:

---

[1] Eliza … James I.e., Queen Elizabeth I and King James I of England.

[2] Ode to Himself Written in response to the poor reception of his play The New Inn, which was hissed off stage in 1629. Jonson first published this ode with the printed version of the play in 1631; the version here, slightly revised, appeared in his 1640 Works.

[3] Pericles Usually read as a reference to the play by Shakespeare, performed in 1607–08; Jonson would have disapproved of the play (a romance with a very loose structure, based on old narrative elements), but he also refers to the taste of his audience, which apparently still preferred to watch a play first performed two decades earlier.

[4] shrieve's crusts Sheriff's crusts; referring to the leftover food collected to feed poor prisoners.

[5] Alcaic … Pindar's Jonson tells himself to return to classical literary genres, as represented by such renowned ancient poets as the Greeks Alcaeus, Pindar, and Anacreon, and the Roman Horace.

As curious fools, and envious of thy strain,
May, blushing, swear no palsy's in thy brain.

But when they hear thee sing
The glories of thy King,
His zeal to God, and his just awe o'er men:
They may, blood-shaken, then,
Feel such a flesh-quake to possess their powers
As they shall cry, "Like ours
In sound of peace or wars,
No harp e'er hit the stars,
In tuning forth the acts of his sweet reign:
And raising Charles's chariot 'bove his Wain."[1]

My Picture Left in Scotland

I now think Love is rather deaf than blind,
For else it could not be,
That she
Whom I adore so much, should so slight me,
And cast my suit behind:
I'm sure my language to her was as sweet,
And every close[2] did meet
In sentence of as subtle feet,
As hath the youngest he
That sits in shadow of Apollo's tree.

Oh, but my conscious fears,
That fly my thoughts between,
Tell me that she hath seen
My hundreds of gray hairs
Told seven and forty years,
Read so much waist, as she cannot embrace
My mountain belly, and my rocky face,
And all these, through her eyes, have stopped her ears.

To the Immortal Memory and Friendship of That Noble Pair, Sir Lucius Cary and Sir H. Morison[3]

The Turn[4]

Brave infant of Saguntum,[5] clear° explain
Thy coming forth in that great year
When the prodigious Hannibal did crown
His rage with razing your immortal town.
Thou, looking then about,
Ere thou wert half got out,
Wise child, didst hastily return,
And mad'st thy mother's womb thine urn.
How summed° a circle didst thou leave mankind complete
Of deepest lore, could we the centre find!

The Counter-Turn

Did wiser nature draw thee back
From out the horror of that sack?
Where shame, faith, honour, and regard of right
Lay trampled on; the deeds of death and night
Urged, hurried forth, and hurled
Upon the affrighted world:
Sword, fire, and famine with fell fury met,

---

[1] Charles's ... his Wain "Charles's Wain" is the constellation the Big Dipper, named for Charlemagne; a "wain" is a chariot or cart. Jonson's poetry will elevate King Charles above the stars.

[2] close Conclusion of a musical theme or phrase

[3] Noble Pair ... Morison Sir Lucius Cary (1609/10–43), second Viscount Falkland, famed for his learning and for the intellectual and literary circle that met at his estate of Great Tew, outside of Oxford. A peaceable, moderate Royalist who fell into despair with the outbreak of civil war, Cary would die in battle when he more or less deliberately exposed himself to enemy fire. Sir Henry Morison (1608–29), Cary's brother-in-law, probably died of smallpox.

[4] The Turn This poem is one of the earliest attempts in English to imitate the Greek Pindaric ode, and the most successful. Pindar (518–438 BCE) composed choral odes that commemorate winners at the Olympic games. His language is allusive and his form and meter complex. His structure is tripartite: the chorus sings a "strophe" (Jonson's "turn") while moving in one direction, then reverses direction and sings a structurally identical "antistrophe" (Jonson's "counter-turn"), then stops and sings the "epode" (Jonson's "stand"), which differs structurally from the other parts.

[5] infant of Saguntum According to the Roman writer Pliny, an infant born in Sagunto (in Spain) while it was being sacked by the Carthaginian general Hannibal in 219 BCE returned immediately to its mother's womb.

And all on utmost ruin set;
As, could they but life's miseries foresee,
No doubt all infants would return like thee?

The Stand

For what is life, if measured by the space,
Not by the act?
Or maskèd man, if valued by his face
Above his fact?
Here's one outlived his peers
And told forth fourscore years;
He vexèd time, and busied the whole state;
Troubled both foes and friends,
But ever to no ends;
What did this stirrer,° but die late? agitator
How well at twenty had he fallen or stood!
For three of his fourscore he did no good.

The Turn

He entered well by virtuous parts,
Got up and thrived with honest arts;
He purchased friends and fame and honours then,
And had his noble name advanced with men;
But weary of that flight,
He stooped in all men's sight
To sordid flatteries, acts of strife,
And sunk in that dead sea of life
So deep, as he did then death's waters sup,
But that the cork of title buoyed him up.

The Counter-Turn

Alas, but Morison fell young!
He never fell: thou fall'st, my tongue.
He stood, a soldier to the last right end,
A perfect patriot, and a noble friend;
But most, a virtuous son.
All offices were done
By him so ample, full, and round,
In weight, in measure, number, sound,
As, though his age imperfect might appear,
His life was of humanity the sphere.

The Stand

Go now, and tell out days summed up with fears,
And make them years;
Produce thy mass of miseries on the stage,
To swell thine age;
Repeat of things a throng,
To show thou hast been long,
Not lived; for life doth her great actions spell
By what was done and wrought
In season, and so brought
To light: her measures are, how well
Each syllabe answered, and was formed, how fair;
These make the lines of life, and that's her air.

The Turn

It is not growing like a tree
In bulk, doth make man better be;
Or standing long an oak, three hundred year,
To fall a log at last, dry, bald, and sere:
A lily of a day
Is fairer far, in May,
Although it fall and die that night;
It was the plant and flower of light.
In small proportions we just beauty see,
And in short measures life may perfect be.

The Counter-Turn

Call, noble Lucius, then for wine,
And let thy looks with gladness shine;
Accept this garland, plant it on thy head;
And think, nay know, thy Morison's not dead.
He leaped the present age,
Possessed with holy rage
To see that bright eternal day,
Of which we priests and poets say
Such truths as we expect for happy men;
And there he lives with memory, and Ben

The Stand

Jonson, who sung this of him, ere he went
Himself to rest,

Or taste a part of that full joy he meant
To have expressed
In this bright asterism;° constellation
Where it were friendship's schism
(Were not his Lucius long with us to tarry)
To separate these twi-
Lights, the Dioscuri;[1]
And keep the one half from his Harry.
But fate doth so alternate the design,
Whilst that in heaven, this light on earth must shine.

The Turn

And shine as you exalted are;
Two names of friendship, but one star:
Of hearts the union. And those not by chance
Made, or indentured, or leased out to advance
The profits for a time.
No pleasures vain did chime,
Of rhymes, or riots, at your feasts,
Orgies of drink, or feigned protests:
But simple love of greatness, and of good;
That knits brave minds and manners, more than blood.

The Counter-Turn

This made you first to know the why
You liked; then after to apply
That liking; and approach so one the t'other,
Till either grew a portion of the other:
Each styled, by his end,
The copy of his friend.
You lived to be the great surnames
And titles by which all made claims
Unto the virtue. Nothing perfect done
But as a Cary, or a Morison.

The Stand

And such a force the fair example had,
As they that saw
The good and durst not practise it, were glad
That such a law
Was left yet to mankind;
Where they might read and find
Friendship in deed was written, not in words;
And with the heart, not pen,
Of two so early men
Whose lines her rolls were, and records.
Who, ere the first down bloomèd on the chin,
Had sowed these fruits, and got the harvest in.

Karolin's Song[2]

Though I am young, and cannot tell
Either what Death or Love is well,
Yet I have heard they both bear darts,
And both do aim at human hearts;
And then again, I have been told,
Love wounds with heat, as Death with cold;
So that I fear they do but bring
Extremes to touch, and mean one thing.

As in a ruin we it call
One thing to be blown up, or fall;
Or to our end, like way may have,
By flash of lightning, or a wave:
So Love's inflamèd shaft or brand,
May kill as soon as Death's cold hand;
Except Love's fires the virtue have
To fright the frost out of the grave.

Seated in thy silver chair,

---

[1] Dioscuri Castor and Pollux, twins set among the stars as the constellation Gemini.

[2] Karolin's Song From Jonson's final, unfinished play The Sad Shepherd (1640), 1.5; the speaker, Karolin, is a kind but naive shepherd.

[3] Hymn to Cynthia From Jonson's play Cynthia's Revels (1601), 5.6. Cynthia is Diana, goddess of the moon, of chastity, and of hunting; in the literature of the English Renaissance generally, and in this poem, Diana is also a figure for Queen Elizabeth.

State in wonted manner keep:
  Hesperus[1] entreats thy light,
  Goddess excellently bright.

Earth, let not thy envious shade
Dare itself to interpose;
Cynthia's shining orb was made
Heaven to clear, when day did close:
  Bless us then with wishèd sight,
  Goddess excellently bright.

Lay thy bow of pearl apart,
And thy crystal-shining quiver;
Give unto the flying hart° deer
Space to breathe, how short soever:
  Thou that mak'st a day of night,
  Goddess excellently bright.
—1601

Clerimont's Song[2]

Still° to be neat, still to be dressed, always
As you° were going to a feast; as if you
Still to be powdered, still perfumed:
Lady, it is to be presumed,
Though Art's hid causes are not found,
All is not sweet, all is not sound.

Give me a look, give me a face,
That makes simplicity a grace;
Robes loosely flowing, hair as free:
Such sweet neglect more taketh me,
Than all the adulteries of Art;
They strike mine eyes, but not my heart.
—1609

Volpone

If Jonson is to be believed, Volpone was written in a few weeks in very early 1606. If so, the result is nevertheless remarkably polished. It has also been remarkably popular: Jonson's career as a playwright took off after the warm reception of Volpone, and the play has continued to be produced through the English-speaking world in every century since, if sometimes in a modernized form.

The play contains an abundance of both classical and contemporary references. Virtually all of the former are drawn from texts that would have been familiar, in the original or in translation, to any Englishman who attended a good grammar school in the 1590s: the verse satires of Horace and Juvenal, the Greek dialogues and prose satires by Lucian, and the fables of Aesop. These influences run throughout the play; Jonson drew the idea for his legacy-hunting plot out of Horace, while the intolerable Lady Politic Would-be recalls Juvenal's misogynist sixth satire. Animal names are used for nearly all the characters (even Sir Politic's nickname "Pol" suggests a parrot), although Bonario and Celia, as decent people, are exempt; the naming owes something to medieval bestiaries, Erasmus's Praise of Folly and the medieval legends of Raynard the Fox, as well as to Aesop. Some of the characters and scenes appear modeled on those of the Italian commedia dell'arte; in Act 2, for example, Corbaccio directly compares himself to the stock character Pantalone.

The lasting appeal of the play rests less on its dense web of allusion than on its humor, which is both subtle and broad. The play does not shy away from scatological invective, as in Act 2's reference to "turdy-facy-nasty-paty-lousy-fartical rogues," but its effective satire is more pointedly witty. And doubtless some of the play's enduring attraction rests on a tension between the infectious allure of Volpone's machinations against corrupt victims and our abhorrence of his amorality. To see a fox outfoxed is deeply satisfying even if the play also discourages easy moralizing.

The play was published in 1607 in a quarto edition dedicated to the universities of Cambridge and Oxford. With only a few changes, it was reprinted in Jonson's 1616 Works.

Hesperus The planet Venus (when it appears after sunset); in the play, the song is sung by Hesperus.

[2] Clerimont's Song From Jonson's play Epicoene: or, The Silent Woman (1609), 1.1; in the play, the song is written by Clerimont, a young male gallant, about a woman named Lady Haughty.

THE ARGUMENT

V olpone, childless, rich, feigns sick, despairs,° is despaired of
O ffers his state° to hopes of several heirs, estate
L ies languishing: his parasite receives
P resents of all, assures, deludes; then weaves
O ther cross plots, which ope themselves, are told.° exposed
N ew tricks for safety are sought; they thrive: when bold,
E ach tempts the other again, and all are sold.° betrayed

PROLOGUE[13]

Now, luck yet[14] send us, and a little wit
Will serve to make our play hit;
(According to the palates of the season)
Here is rhyme, not empty of reason.[15]
This we were bid to credit from our poet,
Whose true scope, if you would know it,
In all his poems still hath been this measure,
To mix profit with your pleasure;
And not as some, whose throats their envy failing,
Cry hoarsely, "All he writes is railing,"
And when his plays come forth, think they can flout them,
With saying, 'He was a year about them.'[16]
To this there needs no lie,[17] but this his creature,
Which was two months since no feature;
And though he dares give them five lives to mend it,
'Tis known, five weeks fully penned it,
From his own hand; without a co-adjutor,° collaborator
Novice, journey-man, or tutor.
Yet thus much I can give you as a token

---

[1] Volpone Old fox.

[2] magnifico Rich, distinguished man.

[3] Mosca Italian form of the Latin "musca," meaning fly or parasite. Flies were often associated with carrion and sometimes with the devil.

[4] Voltore Vulture.

[5] advocate Lawyer, barrister.

[6] Corbaccio Raven.

[7] Corvino Crow.

[8] Avocatori These officials were not magistrates in early modern Venice, but rather public prosecutors.

[9] Grege From the Latin, grex, gregis.

[10] Peregrine Hunting hawk.

[11] Bonario Honest.

[12] Celia Heavenly one.

[13] PROLOGUE Volpone was also prefaced in its original publication by a substantial dedication to "the two famous universities." The full text of the dedication is available on the adjunct website associated with this anthology.

[14] yet This appears in the 1606 Quarto as "God," and was possibly amended to abide by the 1606 Act against Blasphemy.

[15] Now … reason I.e., "Given public taste, we need only luck and a little cunning to make our play a hit, so here is a rhyme not empty of reason."

[16] He was … them Jonson was a notoriously slow writer.

[17] needs no lie Needs no challenge or nothing to show that they lie.

Of his play's worth, no eggs are broken,
Nor quaking custards with fierce teeth affrighted,
Wherewith your rout are so delighted;
Nor hales he in a gull old ends reciting,
To stop gaps in his loose writing;[1]
With such a deal of monstrous and forced action,
As might make Bedlam[2] a faction:
Nor made he his play for jests stolen from each table,[3]
But makes jests to fit his fable;
And so presents quick comedy refined,
As best critics have designed;
The laws of time, place, persons he observeth,
From no needful rule he swerveth.
All gall and copperas[4] from his ink he draineth,
Only a little salt remaineth,
Wherewith he'll rub your cheeks, till red, with laughter,
They shall look fresh a week after.

ACT 1, SCENE 1

(Enter Volpone and Mosca.)

VOLPONE. Good morning to the day; and next, my gold!—
Open the shrine, that I may see my saint.

[Mosca reveals the treasure.]

Hail the world's soul,[5] and mine! more glad than is
The teeming earth to see the longed-for sun
Peep through the horns of the celestial Ram,[6]
Am I, to view thy splendour darkening his;
That lying here, amongst my other hoards,
Show'st like a flame by night, or like the day
Struck out of chaos,[7] when all darkness fled
Unto the centre. O thou son of Sol,
But brighter than thy father, let me kiss,
With adoration, thee, and every relic
Of sacred treasure in this blessed room.
Well did wise poets, by thy glorious name,
Title that age[8] which they would have the best;
Thou being the best of things, and far transcending
All style of joy, in children, parents, friends,
Or any other waking dream on earth:
Thy looks when they to Venus did ascribe,
They should have given her twenty thousand Cupids;
Such are thy beauties and our loves! Dear saint,
Riches, the dumb god, that giv'st all men tongues,
Thou canst do naught, and yet mak'st men do all things;[9]
The price of souls; even hell, with thee to boot,[10]
Is made worth heaven. Thou art virtue, fame,
Honour, and all things else. Who can get thee,
He shall be noble valiant, honest, wise—

MOSCA. And what he will, sir. Riches are in fortune
A greater good than wisdom is in nature.[11]

VOLPONE. True, my beloved Mosca. Yet I glory
More in the cunning purchase° of my wealth, acquisition
Than in the glad possession, since I gain
No common way; I use no trade, no venture;
I wound no earth with plough-shares, fat no beasts,
To feed the shambles;° have no mills for iron, slaughterhouse
Oil, corn, or men, to grind them into powder:
I blow no subtle glass, expose no ships
To threat'nings of the furrow-faced sea;
I turn no monies in the public bank,[12]
Nor usure private.[13]

---

[1] Nor hales... writing He does not fill in the empty spaces in his writing with old jokes.

[2] Bedlam St. Mary's of Bethlehem, "Bedlam," a lunatic asylum.

[3] Nor ... table I.e., nor does the poet steal jokes from others.

[4] gall and copperas Oak-apple and iron sulphate used in the manufacture of ink; also rancor and bitterness.

[5] world's soul Perhaps with a pun on the Latin Sol, sun, and sol, a gold coin.

[6] celestial Ram As it moves north the sun enters the constellation Aries (the "Ram") at the Spring equinox.

[7] day ... chaos The creation of the world. See Genesis 1.2–4.

[8] that age The Golden Age.

[9] Thou canst ... do all things Reference to Aristotle's concept of the Unmoved Mover, from which all things in the universe get their motion.

[10] to boot Into the bargain. The New Testament emphasizes that the rich will find it difficult to enter heaven.

[11] Riches are in fortune... in nature I.e., it is better to be rich by chance than wise by nature.

[12] public bank The Banco della Piazza di Rialto was the first public bank, opened in Venice in 1587.

[13] usure private Lend money privately.

MOSCA. No, sir, nor devour
Soft prodigals. You shall have some will swallow
A melting heir as glibly° as your Dutch readily
Will pills of butter,[1] and ne'er purge for it;
Tear forth the fathers of poor families
Out of their beds, and coffin them alive
In some kind clasping prison, where their bones
May be forthcoming, when the flesh is rotten:
But your sweet nature doth abhor these courses;
You loathe the widow's or the orphan's tears
Should wash your pavements, or their piteous cries
Ring in your roofs, and beat the air for vengeance.
VOLPONE. Right, Mosca; I do loathe it.
MOSCA. And besides, sir,
You are not like the thresher that doth stand
With a huge flail, watching a heap of corn,
And, hungry, dares not taste the smallest grain,
But feeds on mallows, and such bitter herbs;
Nor like the merchant, who hath filled his vaults
With Romagnia,[2] and rich Candian[3] wines,
Yet drinks the lees of Lombard's vinegar:[4]
You will lie not in straw, whilst moths and worms
Feed on your sumptuous hangings and soft beds;
You know the use of riches, and dare give now
From that bright heap, to me, your poor observer,
Or to your dwarf, or your hermaphrodite,
Your eunuch, or what other household trifle° worthless person
Your pleasure allows maintenance—
VOLPONE. Hold thee, Mosca,

[Gives him money.]

Take of my hand; thou strik'st on truth in all,
And they are envious term° thee parasite. who term
Call forth my dwarf, my eunuch, and my fool,
And let them make me sport. [Exit Mosca.] What should I do,
But cocker up my genius,[5] and live free
To all delights my fortune calls me to?
I have no wife, no parent, child, ally,
To give my substance to; but whom I make° designate
Must be my heir: and this makes men observe° me: be submissive to
This draws new clients daily to my house,
Women and men of every sex and age,
That bring me presents, send me plate, coin, jewels,
With hope that when I die (which they expect
Each greedy minute) it shall then return
Ten-fold upon them; whilst some, covetous
Above the rest, seek to engross me whole,[6]
And counter-work the one unto the other,
Contend in gifts, as they would seem in love:
All which I suffer,° playing with their hopes, allow
And am content to coin them into profit,
And look upon their kindness, and take more,
And look on that; still bearing them in hand,[7]
Letting the cherry knock against their lips,[8]
And draw it by their mouths, and back again.—How now!

ACT 1, SCENE 2

(Enter Mosca with Nano, Androgyno, and Castrone.)

NANO. Now, room° for fresh gamester, who make room
do will you to know,
They do bring you neither play nor university show;[9]
And therefore do entreat you, that whatsoever they rehearse,° recite

---

[1] Dutch … of butter Cheese and butter were famously produced by the Dutch, so the Dutch were often mocked as "butter-eaters."

[2] Romagnia Sweet wine from Greece, also known as Rumney.

[3] Candian Wines from Candia in Crete, commonly shortened to "Candy" by the Elizabethans.

[4] Lombard's vinegar The wines of Lombardy in northern Italy were of notoriously poor quality.

[5] cocker up my genius Indulge my inclination and nature.

[6] engross me whole Take advantage of me completely. "Engrossers" monopolized or purchased commodities in large quantities.

[7] bearing them in hand Leading them on.

[8] Letting the cherry … their lips The game of bob-cherry or chop-cherry involved players trying to bite a dangling cherry.

[9] neither play nor university show Not a play intended for public theaters or as an entertainment for the university.

May not fare a whit the worse, for the false pace of the verse.[1]
If you wonder at this, you will wonder more ere we pass,
For know, here is enclosed the soul of Pythagoras,[2]
That juggler divine, as hereafter shall follow;
Which soul, fast and loose,[3] sir, came first from Apollo,
And was breathed into Aethalides,[4] Mercurius, his son,
Where it had the gift to remember all that ever was done.
From thence it fled forth, and made quick transmigration
To goldilocked Euphorbus,[5] who was killed in good fashion,
At the siege of old Troy, by the cuckold of Sparta.[6]
Hermotimus[7] was next (I find it in my charta)[8]
To whom it did pass, where no sooner it was missing
But with one Pyrrhus of Delos[9] it learned to go a-fishing;
And thence did it enter the sophist of Greece.[10]
From Pythagore, she went into a beautiful piece,
Hight° Aspasia, the meretrix;[11] and the next toss of her named
Was again of° a whore, she became a philosopher, became
Crates the cynic,[12] as itself[13] doth relate it:
Since kings, knights, and beggars, knaves, lords, and fools gat it,
Besides ox and ass, camel, mule, goat, and brock,
In all which it hath spoke, as in the cobbler's cock.[14]
But I come not here to discourse of that matter,
Or his one, two, or three, or his great oath, "By quarter!"[15]
His musics, his trigon,[16] his golden thigh,[17]
Or his telling how elements shift,[18] but I
Would ask, how of late thou hast suffered translation,
And shifted thy coat in these days of reformation.[19]

ANDROGYNO. Like one of the reformed, a fool, as you see,
Counting all old doctrine heresy.

NANO. But not on thine own forbid meats hast thou ventured?

ANDROGYNO. On fish, when first a Carthusian I entered.[20]

NANO. Why, then thy dogmatical silence hath left thee?[21]

---

[1] false pace of the verse Irregular poetic meter and line length. Nano's verse here is reminiscent of that of Tudor "Interludes." On the other hand, the dense classical references here suggest university comedies, known for their learned parodies.

[2] Pythagoras Greek mathematician and philosopher known for his doctrine of the transmigration of souls. The entirety of Nano's interlude is an indictment of such thought. Nano is referring to Androgyno as the receptacle of Pythagoras's soul.

[3] fast and loose Hard to catch. From a gambling trick where a leather belt with a hidden layer was folded several times and then the mark was asked to thrust a dagger through the belt. The extra layer made it next to impossible to thrust the dagger "fast."

[4] Aethalides Herald to the Argonauts, famed for his memory.

[5] goldilocked Euphorbus Trojan who wounded Patroclus, favorite of Achilles.

[6] cuckold of Sparta Menelaus, whose wife, Helen, left him for the Trojan prince, Paris, thus starting the Trojan War.

[7] Hermotimus Greek philosopher and prophet.

[8] charta Latin: letter, paper, i.e., document.

Pyrrhus of Delos Greek philosopher, who started life as a fisher.

[10] sophist of Greece Pythagoras.

[11] Aspasia, the meretrix The mistress of Pericles, leader of Athens.

[12] Crates the cynic Crates of Thebes, founder of the Cynic school of philosophy.

[13] itself According to Pythagorean thought the soul is neuter and may be either sex when it is incarnated.

[14] cobbler's cock A cock is the narrator of Lucian's The Dream.

[15] By quarter Pythagorean thought held that the all of the universe could be understood in terms of a permutation of the numeric series 1, 2, 3, 4. Thus, Pythagoreans swore their most important oaths by the sign of the quarter.

[16] trigon Triangle. The famous "Pythagorean theorem" defines the relation of the hypotenuse to the other two sides of a right triangle.

[17] golden thigh Pythagoras was supposed to have had a thigh made of gold.

[18] elements shift In Pythagorean thought, each of the four elements was held to be transmutable into any of the others.

[19] reformation It is not clear whether the reference here is to the Protestant Reformation as a whole (Jonson was still a Catholic in 1606), or the further reformation of Protestantism that Puritans were striving for in the early seventeenth century.

[20] But not on … I entered Pythagoras forbade his followers to eat fish, flesh and beans. Carthusians were allowed to eat only fish, no meat.

[21] dogmatical silence hath left thee Pythagoreans supposedly were to undergo a period of five years of silence.

ANDROGYNO. Of that an obstreperous lawyer bereft me.
NANO. O wonderful change, when sir lawyer forsook thee!
For Pythagore's sake, what body then took thee?[1]
ANDROGYNO. A good dull mule.
NANO. And how! by that means
Thou wert brought to allow of the eating of beans?[2]
ANDROGYNO. Yes.
NANO. But from the mule into whom didst thou pass?
ANDROGYNO. Into a very strange beast, by some writers called an ass;
By others, a precise, pure, illuminate brother,
Of those° devour flesh, and sometimes one another; those that
And will drop you forth a libel, or a sanctified lie,
Betwixt every spoonful of a nativity-pie.[3]
NANO. Now quit thee, for heaven, of that profane nation,
And gently report thy next transmigration.
ANDROGYNO. To the same that I am.
NANO. A creature of delight,
And, what is more than a fool, an hermaphrodite!
Now, prithee, sweet soul, in all thy variation,
Which body would'st thou choose, to keep up thy station?
ANDROGYNO. Troth, this I am in: even here would I tarry.
NANO. 'Cause here the delight of each sex thou canst vary?
ANDROGYNO. Alas, those pleasures be stale and forsaken;
No, 'tis your fool wherewith I am so taken,
The only one creature that I can call blessed;
For all other forms I have proved most distressed.
NANO. Spoke true, as thou wert in Pythagoras still.
This learned opinion we celebrate will,
Fellow eunuch, as behoves us, with all our wit and art,
To dignify that whereof ourselves are so great and special a part.
VOLPONE. Now, very, very pretty! Mosca, this
Was thy invention?
MOSCA. If it please my patron,
Not else.
VOLPONE. It doth, good Mosca.
MOSCA. Then it was, sir.

(Song.)

Fools, they are the only nation° tribe
Worth men's envy or admiration:
Free from care or sorrow-taking,
Selves and others merry making:
All they speak or do is sterling.° accepted as excellent
Your fool he is your great man's darling,
And your ladies' sport and pleasure;
Tongue and bauble are his treasure.
E'en his face begetteth laughter,
And he speaks truth free from slaughter;[4]
He's the grace of every feast,
And sometimes the chiefest guest;
Hath his trencher and his stool,
When wit waits upon the fool.[5]
O, who would not be
He, he, he?

(One knocks wihout.)

VOLPONE. Who's that? Away!

[Exeunt Nano and Castrone.]

Look, Mosca.

[Exit Androgyno.]

MOSCA. Fool, begone!
'Tis Signior Voltore, the advocate;

---

[1] what body then took thee? A pun. Lawyers would travel in their robes to the courts at Westminster on the backs of mules.

[2] beans See above note. Eating beans was forbidden by Pythagoras.

[3] Into a very strange … nativity-pie This whole speech is an indictment of English Puritans. They were often attacked for their allegedly libelous publishing practices, their sense of religious superiority, and their refusal to use the word "Mass" even in compound words such as Christmas—hence, Nativity.

[4] free from slaughter Free from punishment.

[5] wit waits upon the fool The fool is served by the wit, as at the Feast of Fools. Also, when the witty attend to the words of the foolish.

I know him by his knock.
VOLPONE. Fetch me my gown,
My furs[1] and night-caps; say, my couch is changing,
And let him entertain himself awhile
Without i' the gallery. [Exit Mosca.] Now, now, my clients
Begin their visitation! Vulture, kite,
Raven, and gor-crow,° all my birds of prey, carrion crow
That think me turning carcass, now they come;
I am not for them yet—

[Re-enter Mosca, with the gown, etc.]

How now! the news?
MOSCA. A piece of plate,[2] sir.
VOLPONE. Of what bigness?
MOSCA. Huge,
Massy, and antique, with your name inscribed,
And arms engraven.
VOLPONE. Good! and not a fox
Stretched on the earth, with fine delusive sleights,
Mocking a gaping crow? ha, Mosca!
MOSCA. Sharp, sir.
VOLPONE. Give me my furs. Why dost thou laugh so, man?
MOSCA. I cannot choose, sir, when I apprehend
What thoughts he has without now, as he walks:
That this might be the last gift he should give;
That this would fetch you; if you died to-day,
And gave him all, what he should be to-morrow;
What large return would come of all his ventures;
How he should worshipped be, and reverenced;
Ride with his furs, and foot-cloths;[3] waited on
By herds of fools, and clients; have clear way
Made for his mule, as lettered as himself;
Be called the great and learned advocate:
And then concludes, there's naught impossible.
VOLPONE. Yes, to be learned, Mosca.
MOSCA. O, no: rich
Implies it. Hood an ass with reverend purple,[4]
So you can hide his two ambitious ears,
And he shall pass for a cathedral doctor.
VOLPONE. My caps, my caps, good Mosca. Fetch him in.
MOSCA. Stay, sir; your ointment[5] for your eyes.
VOLPONE. That's true;
Dispatch, dispatch: I long to have possession
Of my new present.
MOSCA. That, and thousands more,
I hope to see you lord of.
VOLPONE. Thanks, kind Mosca.
MOSCA. And that, when I am lost in blended dust,
And hundred such as I am, in succession—
VOLPONE. Nay, that were too much, Mosca.
MOSCA. You shall live,
Still, to delude these harpies.
VOLPONE. Loving Mosca!
'Tis well: my pillow now, and let him enter.

[Exit Mosca.]

Now, my feigned cough, my phthisic,° and my gout, asthma
My apoplexy,[6] palsy, and catarrhs,[7]
Help, with your forced functions, this my posture,
Wherein, this three year, I have milked their hopes.
He comes; I hear him—Uh! [Coughing.] uh! uh! uh! O—

ACT 1, SCENE 3

[Enter Mosca, ushering in Voltore, carrying a platter.]

MOSCA. You still are what you were, sir. Only you,
Of all the rest, are he° commands his love, he who
And you do wisely to preserve it thus,
With early visitation, and kind notes° indications
Of your good meaning to him, which, I know,
Cannot but come most grateful. Patron! sir!
Here's Signior Voltore is come—
VOLPONE. [Faintly.] What say you?
MOSCA. Sir, Signior Voltore is come this morning
To visit you.

---

[1] furs Worn by the sick for warmth.

[2] plate Gold or silver plated vessels, platters, tableware, etc.

[3] foot-cloths Pageant draperies for a horse.

[4] reverend purple The crimson robes of a Doctor of Divinity.

[5] ointment To make his eyes run.

[6] apoplexy Stroke.

[7] catarrhs Inflammations of the nose and eyes.

VOLPONE. I thank him.
MOSCA. And hath brought
A piece of antique plate, bought of St. Mark,[1]
With which he here presents you.
VOLPONE. He is welcome.
Pray him to come more often.
MOSCA. Yes.
VOLTORE. What says he?
MOSCA. He thanks you, and desires you see him often.
VOLPONE. Mosca.
MOSCA. My patron!
VOLPONE. Bring him near, where is he?
I long to feel his hand.
MOSCA. The plate is here, sir.
VOLTORE. How fare you, sir?
VOLPONE. I thank you, Signior Voltore;
Where is the plate? Mine eyes are bad.
VOLTORE. [Putting it into his hands.] I'm sorry,
To see you still thus weak.
MOSCA. [Aside.] That he's not weaker.
VOLPONE. [Taking hold of the platter.] You are too munificent.
VOLTORE. No, sir; would to heaven,
I could as well give health to you, as that plate!
VOLPONE. You give, sir, what you can: I thank you. Your love
Hath taste in this, and shall not be unanswered:
I pray you see me often.
VOLTORE. Yes, I shall, sir.
VOLPONE. Be not far from me.
MOSCA. [To Voltore.] Do you observe that, sir?
VOLPONE. Hearken unto me still; it will concern you.
MOSCA. [To Voltore.] You are a happy man, sir; know your good.
VOLPONE. I cannot now last long—
MOSCA. (To Voltore.) You are his heir, sir.
VOLTORE. Am I?
VOLPONE. I feel me going; uh! uh! uh! uh!
I'm sailing to my port, uh! uh! uh! uh![2]
And I am glad I am so near my haven.
MOSCA. Alas, kind gentleman! Well, we must all go—
VOLTORE. But, Mosca—
MOSCA. Age will conquer.
VOLTORE. Pray thee, hear me:
Am I inscribed his heir[3] for certain?
MOSCA. Are you!
I do beseech you, sir, you will vouchsafe
To write me in your family.[4] All my hopes
Depend upon your worship: I am lost,
Except the rising sun do shine on me.
VOLTORE. It shall both shine, and warm thee, Mosca.
MOSCA. Sir,
I am a man, that hath not done your love
All the worst offices: here I wear your keys,[5]
See all your coffers and your caskets locked,
Keep the poor inventory of your jewels,
Your plate and monies; am your steward, sir,
Husband your goods here.
VOLTORE. But am I sole heir?
MOSCA. Without a partner, sir; confirmed this morning:
The wax[6] is warm yet, and the ink scarce dry
Upon the parchment.
VOLTORE. Happy, happy, me!
By what good chance, sweet Mosca?
MOSCA. Your desert, sir;
I know no second cause.
VOLTORE. Thy modesty
Is not to know it; well, we shall requite it.
MOSCA. He ever liked your course,° sir; that first took him. course of action
I oft have heard him say, how he admired
Men of your large profession, that could speak
To every cause, and things mere contraries,[7]
Till they were hoarse again, yet all be law;
That, with most quick agility, could turn,
And return; make knots, and undo them;
Give forkèd° counsel; take provoking gold equivocal
On either hand, and put it up:[8] these men,

---

[1] bought of St. Mark The goldsmith shops in the Piazza di San Marco were famous.

[2] uh! uh! uh! uh! Volpone is feigning his last breath.

[3] inscribed his heir Officially entered as his heir in a will.

[4] write me in your family Admit me to your household (as a servant).

[5] your keys By looking after Volpone's property Mosca is supposedly looking after Voltore's.

[6] wax Used to seal the will.

[7] that could speak ... mere contraries That are able to argue any cause, even contradictory ones.

[8] put it up Pocket it.

He knew, would thrive with their humility.[1]
And, for his part, he thought he should be blest
To have his heir of such a suffering spirit,
So wise, so grave, of so perplexed a tongue,[2]
And loud withal, that would not wag, nor scarce
Lie still, without a fee; when every word
Your worship but lets fall, is a cecchine![3]

(Another knocks.)

Who's that? one knocks; I would not have you seen, sir.
And yet—pretend you came, and went in haste:
I'll fashion an excuse—and, gentle sir,
When you do come to swim in golden lard,
Up to the arms in honey, that your chin
Is borne up stiff, with fatness of the flood,
Think on your vassal; but remember me:
I have not been your worst of clients.
VOLTORE. Mosca!—
MOSCA. When will you have your inventory brought, sir?
Or see a copy of the will?—Anon!—° coming, immediately
I'll bring them to you, sir. Away, be gone,
Put business in your face.

[Exit Voltore.]

VOLPONE. [Springing up.] Excellent Mosca!
Come hither, let me kiss thee.
MOSCA. Keep you still, sir.
Here is Corbaccio.
VOLPONE. Set the plate away:
The vulture's gone, and the old raven's come!

ACT 1, SCENE 4

(MOSCA.) Betake you to your silence, and your sleep.
[Putting the plate aside.] Stand there and multiply.
Now, we shall see
A wretch who is indeed more impotent
Than this can feign to be; yet hopes to hop
Over his grave—

(Enter Corbaccio.)

Signior Corbaccio!
You're very welcome, sir.
CORBACCIO. How does your patron?
MOSCA. Troth, as he did, sir; no amends.
CORBACCIO. What! mends he?
MOSCA. No, sir: he's rather worse.
CORBACCIO. That's well. Where is he?
MOSCA. Upon his couch, sir, newly fallen asleep.
CORBACCIO. Does he sleep well?
MOSCA. No wink, sir, all this night.
Nor yesterday; but slumbers.
CORBACCIO. Good! He should take
Some counsel of physicians: I have brought him
An opiate here, from mine own doctor.
MOSCA. He will not hear of drugs.
CORBACCIO. Why? I myself
Stood by while it was made, saw all the ingredients:
And know, it cannot but most gently work:
My life for his, 'tis but to make him sleep.
VOLPONE. [Aside.] Aye, his last sleep, if he would take it.
MOSCA. Sir,
He has no faith in physic.
CORBACCIO. Say you, say you?
MOSCA. He has no faith in physic: he does think
Most of your doctors are the greater danger,
And worse disease, to escape. I often have Heard him protest, that your physician
Should never be his heir.
CORBACCIO. Not I his heir?
MOSCA. Not your physician, sir.
CORBACCIO. O, no, no, no,
I do not mean it.
MOSCA. No, sir, nor their fees
He cannot brook: he says, they flay a man,
Before they kill him.
CORBACCIO. Right, I do conceive° you. understand
MOSCA. And then they do it by experiment;[4]

---

[1] humility Pun based on the Latin humilitas, meaning "close to the ground."

[2] perplexed a tongue Intricate way of speaking.

[3] cecchine Sequin or zecchino, a Venetian gold coin worth about seven shillings.

[4] experiment I.e., by experimenting upon the patient.

For which the law not only doth absolve them,
But gives them great reward: and he is loath
To hire his death, so.
CORBACCIO. It is true, they kill
With as much license as a judge.
MOSCA. Nay, more;
For he but kills, sir, where the law condemns,
And these can kill him too.
CORBACCIO. Aye, or me;
Or any man. How does his apoplex?
Is that strong on him still?
MOSCA. Most violent.
His speech is broken, and his eyes are set,
His face drawn longer than 'twas wont—
CORBACCIO. How! how!
Stronger than he was wont?
MOSCA. No, sir: his face
Drawn longer than 'twas wont.
CORBACCIO. O, good!
MOSCA. His mouth
Is ever gaping, and his eyelids hang.
CORBACCIO. Good.
MOSCA. A freezing numbness stiffens all his joints,
And makes the colour of his flesh like lead.
CORBACCIO. 'Tis good.
MOSCA. His pulse beats slow, and dull.
CORBACCIO. Good symptoms still.
MOSCA. And from his brain—[1]
CORBACCIO. Ha? how? not from his brain?
MOSCA. Yes, sir, and from his brain—
CORBACCIO. I conceive you; good.
MOSCA. Flows a cold sweat, with a continual rheum,
Forth the resolved corners of his eyes.
CORBACCIO. Is't possible? Yet° I am better, ha! again
How does he, with the swimming of his head?
MOSCA. O, sir, 'tis past the scotomy;° he now dizziness from poor eyesight
Hath lost his feeling, and hath left° to snort: ceased
You hardly can perceive him, that he breathes.
CORBACCIO. Excellent, excellent! sure I shall outlast him:
This makes me young again, a score of years.
MOSCA. I was a coming for you, sir.
CORBACCIO. Has he made his will?
What has he given me?
MOSCA. No, sir.
CORBACCIO. Nothing! ha?
MOSCA. He has not made his will, sir.
CORBACCIO. Oh, oh, oh!
What then did Voltore, the lawyer, here?
MOSCA. He smelt a carcass, sir, when he but heard
My master was about his testament;
As I did urge him to it for your good—
CORBACCIO. He came unto him, did he? I thought so.
MOSCA. Yes, and presented him this piece of plate.
CORBACCIO. To be his heir?
MOSCA. I do not know, sir.
CORBACCIO. True:
I know it too.
MOSCA. [Aside.] By your own scale,[2] sir.
CORBACCIO. Well,
I shall prevent him, yet. See, Mosca, look,
Here, I have brought a bag of bright cecchines,
Will quite weigh down[3] his plate.
MOSCA. (Taking the bag.) Yea, marry, sir.
This is true physic, this your sacred medicine;
No talk of opiates, to this great elixir!
CORBACCIO. 'Tis aurum palpabile, if not potabile.[4]
MOSCA. It shall be ministered to him, in his bowl.
CORBACCIO. Aye, do, do, do.
MOSCA. Most blessed cordial!° medicine
This will recover him.
CORBACCIO. Yes, do, do, do.
MOSCA. I think it were not best, sir.
CORBACCIO. What?
MOSCA. To recover him.
CORBACCIO. O, no, no, no; by no means.
MOSCA. Why, sir, this
Will work some strange effect, if he but feel it.
CORBACCIO. 'Tis true, therefore forbear; I'll take my venture:
Give me it again.
MOSCA. At no hand; pardon me:
You shall not do yourself that wrong, sir. I

---

[1] from his brain The last stage of apoplexy was held to be marked by fluid leaking from the brain.

[2] By your own scale In your own estimation.

[3] weigh down Outweigh, overpower.

[4] aurum palpabile … potabile Latin: gold that can be touched, if not drunk. (Potions infused with gold were commonly prescribed for a bad heart.)

Will so advise you, you shall have it all.
CORBACCIO. How?
MOSCA. All, sir; 'tis your right, your own: no man
Can claim a part: 'tis yours, without a rival,
Decreed by destiny.
CORBACCIO. How, how, good Mosca?
MOSCA. I'll tell you, sir. This fit he shall recover.
CORBACCIO. I do conceive you.
MOSCA. And, on first advantage° opportunity
Of his gained° sense, will I re-importune him regained
Unto the making of his testament:
And show him this.

[Pointing to the money.]

CORBACCIO. Good, good.
MOSCA. 'Tis better yet,
If you will hear, sir.
CORBACCIO. Yes, with all my heart.
MOSCA. Now, would I counsel you, make home with speed;
There, frame° a will; whereto you shall inscribe create
My master your sole heir.
CORBACCIO. And disinherit
My son!
MOSCA. O, sir, the better: for that colour° semblance
Shall make it much more taking.° attractive
CORBACCIO. O, but colour?
MOSCA. This will, sir, you shall send it unto me.
Now, when I come to enforce,° as I will do, urge
Your cares, your watchings, and your many prayers,
Your more than many gifts, your this day's present,
And last, produce your will; where, without thought,
Or least regard, unto your proper issue,° own offspring
A son so brave, and highly meriting,
The stream of your diverted love hath thrown you
Upon my master, and made him your heir:
He cannot be so stupid, or stone-dead,
But out of conscience, and mere gratitude—
CORBACCIO. He must pronounce me his?
MOSCA. 'Tis true.
CORBACCIO. This plot
Did I think on before.
MOSCA. I do believe it.
CORBACCIO. Do you not believe it?
MOSCA. Yes, sir.
CORBACCIO. Mine own project.
MOSCA. Which, when he hath done, sir—
CORBACCIO. Published me his heir?
MOSCA. And you so certain to survive him—
CORBACCIO. Aye.
MOSCA. Being so lusty a man—
CORBACCIO. 'Tis true.
MOSCA. Yes, sir—
CORBACCIO. I thought on that too. See, how he should be
The very organ to express my thoughts!
MOSCA. You have not only done yourself a good—
CORBACCIO. But multiplied it on my son.
MOSCA. 'Tis right, sir.
CORBACCIO. Still, my invention.[1]
MOSCA. 'Las,° sir! heaven knows, alas
It hath been all my study, all my care
(I e'en grow gray withal), how to work things—
CORBACCIO. I do conceive, sweet Mosca.
MOSCA. You are he,
For whom I labour here.
CORBACCIO. Aye, do, do, do:
I'll straight about it.

[Going.]

MOSCA. [Aside.] Rook go with you,[2] raven!
CORBACCIO. I know thee honest.
MOSCA. You do lie, sir!
CORBACCIO. And—
MOSCA. Your knowledge is no better than your ears, sir.[3]
CORBACCIO. I do not doubt, to be a father to thee.
MOSCA. Nor I to gull my brother of his blessing.[4]
CORBACCIO. I may have my youth restored to me, why not?
MOSCA. Your worship is a precious ass!

---

[1] Still my invention Corbaccio claims Mosca's ideas as his own.

[2] Rook go with you May you be cheated, cheat. This plays on the fact that both "to rook" and "raven" were terms for cheat.

[3] Your knowledge is … ears, sir This is both a taunt and a strict truth.

[4] gull my brother … blessing Reference to Genesis 27, in which Jacob cheats Esau out of his inheritance.

CORBACCIO. What say'st thou?
MOSCA. I do desire your worship to make haste, sir.
CORBACCIO. 'Tis done, 'tis done; I go.

[Exit.]

VOLPONE. [Leaping up.] O, I shall burst!
Let out my sides, let out my sides—
MOSCA. Contain
Your flux° of laughter, sir: you know this hope flow
Is such a bait, it covers any hook.
VOLPONE. O, but thy working, and thy placing it!
I cannot hold; good rascal, let me kiss thee:
I never knew thee in so rare a humour.[1]
MOSCA. Alas, sir, I but do as I am taught;
Follow your grave instructions; give them words;[2]
Pour oil° into their ears, and send them hence. flattery
VOLPONE. 'Tis true, 'tis true. What a rare punishment
Is avarice to itself!
MOSCA. Aye, with our help, sir.
VOLPONE. So many cares, so many maladies,
So many fears attending on old age,
Yea, death so often called on, as no wish
Can be more frequent with them, their limbs faint,
Their senses dull, their seeing, hearing, going,
All dead before them; yea, their very teeth,
Their instruments of eating, failing them:
Yet this is reckoned life! nay, here was one,
Is now gone home, that wishes to live longer!
Feels not his gout, nor palsy; feigns himself
Younger by scores of years, flatters his age
With confident belying it, hopes he may,
With charms, like Aeson,[3] have his youth restored:
And with these thoughts so battens,° as if fate prospers
Would be as easily cheated on, as he,
And all turns air! (Another knocks.) Who's that there, now? a third!
MOSCA. Close, to your couch again; I hear his voice:
It is Corvino, our spruce° merchant. dapper
VOLPONE. Dead.
MOSCA. Another bout, sir, with your eyes.[4] Who's there?

ACT 1, SCENE 5

(Enter Corvino.)

MOSCA Signior Corvino! Come most wished for! O,
How happy were you, if you knew it, now!
CORVINO Why? what? wherein?
MOSCA. The tardy hour is come, sir.
CORVINO He is not dead?
MOSCA. Not dead, sir, but as good;
He knows no man.
CORVINO. How shall I do then?
MOSCA. Why, sir?
CORVINO. I have brought him here a pearl.[5]
MOSCA. Perhaps he has
So much remembrance left, as to know you, sir:
He still calls on you; nothing but your name
Is in his mouth. Is your pearl orient,[6] sir?
CORVINO. Venice was never owner of the like.
VOLPONE. (Faintly.) Signior Corvino!
MOSCA. Hark.
VOLPONE. Signior Corvino!
MOSCA. He calls you; step and give it him.—He's here, sir,
And he has brought you a rich pearl.
CORVINO. [To Volpone.] How do you, sir?
[To Mosca.] Tell him, it doubles the twelfth carat.
MOSCA. Sir,
He cannot understand, his hearing's gone;
And yet it comforts him to see you—
CORVINO. Say,
I have a diamond for him, too.
MOSCA. Best show it, sir;
Put it into his hand; 'tis only there
He apprehends: he has his feeling, yet.

---

[1] so rare a humour So inventive a mood.

[2] give them words I.e., deceive them with words.

[3] Aeson Jason's father, who was given his youth back by the magic of Medea.

[4] Another bout … your eyes Mosca reapplies the ointment to Volpone's eyes.

[5] pearl The gifts of the three "heirs" reflect their characters: the socially aspiring lawyer gives a plate with Volpone's coat of arms, the miser gives coins, and the cuckold gives his family jewels.

[6] orient Asian pearls were considered of superior value.

See how he grasps it!
CORVINO. 'Las, good gentleman!
How pitiful the sight is!
MOSCA. Tut! forget, sir.
The weeping of an heir should still be laughter
Under a visor.° mask
CORVINO. Why, am I his heir?
MOSCA. Sir, I am sworn, I may not show the will
Till he be dead; but here has been Corbaccio,
Here has been Voltore, here were others too,
I cannot number 'em, they were so many;
All gaping here for legacies: but I,
Taking the vantage of his naming you,
"Signior Corvino, Signior Corvino," took
Paper, and pen, and ink, and there I asked him, Whom he would have his heir. "Corvino." Who Should be executor? "Corvino." And,
To any question he was silent to,
I still interpreted the nods he made,
Through weakness, for consent: and sent home th' others,
Nothing bequeathed them, but to cry and curse.

[They embrace.]

CORVINO. O, my dear Mosca! Does he not perceive us?
MOSCA. No more than a blind harper.[1] He knows no man,
No face of friend, nor name of any servant,
Who 'twas that fed him last, or gave him drink:
Not those he hath begotten, or brought up,
Can he remember.
CORVINO. Has he children?
MOSCA. Bastards,
Some dozen, or more, that he begot on beggars,
Gypsies, and Jews, and black-moors,[2] when he was drunk.
Knew you not that, sir? 'tis the common fable.[3]
The dwarf, the fool, the eunuch, are all his;
He's the true father of his family,° household
In all, save me:—but he has given them nothing.
CORVINO. That's well, that's well! Art sure he does not hear us?
MOSCA. Sure, sir! why, look you, credit your own sense.

[Shouts in Volpone's ear.]

The pox° approach, and add to your diseases, syphilis
If it would send you hence the sooner, sir,
For your incontinence, it hath deserved it
Thoroughly, and thoroughly, and the plague to boot!—[4]
You may come near, sir.—Would you would once close
Those filthy eyes of yours, that flow with slime,
Like two frog-pits; and those same hanging cheeks,
Covered with hide instead of skin—Nay, help, sir—
That look like frozen dish-clouts set on end!
CORVINO. Or like an old smoked wall, on which the rain
Ran down in streaks!
MOSCA. Excellent, sir! speak out:
You may be louder yet; a culverin° handgun
Discharged in his ear would hardly bore° it. penetrate
CORVINO. His nose is like a common sewer, still running.
MOSCA. 'Tis good! And what° his mouth? what of CORVINO. A very draught.° cesspool
MOSCA. O, stop it up—
CORVINO. By no means.
MOSCA. 'Pray you, let me:
Faith, I could stifle him rarely° with a pillow, excellently
As well as any woman that should keep him.
CORVINO. Do as you will; but I'll begone.
MOSCA. Be so:
It is your presence makes him last so long.

[1] blind harper The image of a blind harp player was evidently intended to suggest both randomness and incompetence; it was something of a proverbial expression in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries.

[2] beggars … black-moors Lines such as these are illuminating markers of the various cultural, racial, and religious prejudices that held sway in the sixteenth and early seventeenth century; here the categories of beggar, gypsy, Jew, and "black-moor" are all evidently regarded as equally deserving of derision. The term "moor" more often than not was assumed in itself to imply darkness of skin; sometimes, however, distinctions were made between "black-moors" and Africans of lighter skin, who were referred to as "white moors" or occasionally as "tawny moors."

[3] 'tis the common fable That is the story generally told.

[4] For your incontinence … to boot You have deserved to get syphilis—and the plague as well—on account of your loose sexual behavior.

Corvino. I pray you, use no violence.
Mosca. No, sir! Why?
Why should you be thus scrupulous, pray you, sir?
Corvino. Nay, at your discretion.
Mosca. Well, good sir, begone.
Corvino. I will not trouble him now, to take my pearl.[1]
Mosca. Puh! nor your diamond. What a needless care
Is this afflicts you? Is not all here yours?
Am not I here, whom you have made your creature?
That owe my being to you?
Corvino. Grateful Mosca!
Thou art my friend, my fellow, my companion,
My partner, and shalt share in all my fortunes.
Mosca. Excepting one.
Corvino. What's that?
Mosca. Your gallant° wife, sir,— beautiful

[Exit Corvino]

Now is he gone: we had no other means
To shoot him hence, but this.
Volpone. My divine Mosca!
Thou hast to-day outgone thyself. (Another knocks.)
Who's there?
I will be troubled with no more. Prepare
Me music, dances, banquets, all delights;
The Turk is not more sensual in his pleasures,
Than will Volpone. [Exit Mosca.] Let me see; a pearl!
A diamond! plate! cecchines! Good morning's purchase.° haul
Why, this better than rob churches, yet;
Or fat, by eating, once a month, a man—

[Re-enter Mosca.]

Who is't?
Mosca. The beauteous Lady Would-be, sir,
Wife to the English knight, Sir Politic Would-be,
(This is the style, sir, is directed me,)[2]
Hath sent to know how you have slept to-night,
And if you would be visited?
Volpone. Not now:
Some three hours hence—
Mosca. I told the squire so much.
Volpone. When I am high with mirth and wine;
then, then:
'Fore heaven, I wonder at the desperate valour
Of the bold English, that they dare let loose
Their wives to all encounters![3]
Mosca. Sir, this knight
Had not his name for nothing, he is politic,
And knows, howe'er his wife affect strange airs,
She hath not yet the face to be dishonest:[4]
But had she Signior Corvino's wife's face—
Volpone. Has she so rare a face?
Mosca. O, sir, the wonder,
The blazing star of Italy! a wench
Of the first year! a beauty ripe as harvest!
Whose skin is whiter than a swan all over,
Than silver, snow, or lilies! a soft lip,
Would tempt you to eternity of kissing!
And flesh that melteth in the touch to blood!
Bright as your gold, and lovely as your gold!
Volpone. Why had not I known this before?
Mosca. Alas, sir,
Myself but yesterday discovered it.
Volpone. How might I see her?
Mosca. O, not possible;
She's kept as warily as is your gold;
Never does come abroad,[5] never takes air,
But at a window. All her looks are sweet,
As the first grapes or cherries, and are watched
As near° as they are. closely
Volpone. I must see her.
Mosca. Sir,
There is a guard of spies ten thick upon her,
All his whole household; each of which is set
Upon his fellow, and have all their charge,
When he goes out, when he comes in, examined.
Volpone. I will go see her, though but at her window.
Mosca. In some disguise, then.
Volpone. That is true; I must

---

[1] take my pearl Volpone already has the pearl and the diamond.

[2] This is the style … directed me This is the way in which I have been directed to refer to them.

[3] 'Fore heaven … all encounters English women were considered by the Italians to have too much freedom.

[4] She hath not … dishonest She is too ugly to be unfaithful.

[5] come abroad Go out of the house.

Maintain mine own shape° still the same: we'll think. disguise

[Exeunt.]

ACT 2, SCENE 1

(Enter Sir Politic Would-be, Peregrine.)

Sir Politic. Sir, to a wise man, all the world's his soil:
It is not Italy, nor France, nor Europe,
That must bound me, if my fates call me forth.
Yet, I protest, it is no salt° desire wanton
Of seeing countries, shifting a religion,
Nor any disaffection to the state
Where I was bred, and unto which I owe
My dearest plots, hath brought me out; much less,
That idle, antique, stale, gray-headed project
Of knowing men's minds and manners, with Ulysses![1]
But a peculiar humour of my wife's
Laid for this height of Venice, to observe,
To quote, to learn the language, and so forth—
I hope you travel, sir, with license?[2]
Peregrine. Yes.
Sir Politic. I dare the safelier converse—How long, sir,
Since you left England?
Peregrine. Seven weeks.
Sir Politic. So lately!
You have not been with my Lord Ambassador?
Peregrine. Not yet, sir.
Sir Politic. Pray you, what news, sir, vents our climate?[3]
I heard last night a most strange thing reported
By some of my lord's followers, and I long
To hear how 'twill be seconded.
Peregrine. What was't, sir?
Sir Politic. Marry, sir, of a raven that should[4] build
In a ship royal of the king's.
Peregrine. [Aside.] This fellow,
Does he gull° me, trow? or is gulled?—Your name, sir? fool
Sir Politic. My name is Politic Would-be.
Peregrine. [Aside.] O, that speaks him.—
A knight, sir?
Sir Politic. A poor knight, sir.
Peregrine. Your lady
Lies° here in Venice, for intelligence stays
Of tires,° and fashions, and behaviour, clothing
Among the courtesans? The fine Lady Would-be?
Sir Politic. Yes, sir; the spider and the bee, oft times,
Suck from one flower.
Peregrine. Good Sir Politic,
I cry you mercy; I have heard much of you:
'Tis true, sir, of your raven.
Sir Politic. On your knowledge?
Peregrine. Yes, and your lion's whelping in the Tower.[5]
Sir Politic. Another whelp!
Peregrine. Another, sir.
Sir Politic. Now heaven!
What prodigies be these? The fires at Berwick![6]
And the new star![7] These things concurring, strange,
And full of omen! Saw you those meteors?
Peregrine. I did, sir.
Sir Politic. Fearful! Pray you, sir, confirm me,
Were there three porpoises[8] seen above the Bridge,° London Bridge
As they give out?
Peregrine. Six, and a sturgeon,[9] sir.
Sir Politic. I am astonished.
Peregrine. Nay, sir, be not so;
I'll tell you a greater prodigy than these.

---

[1] Ulysses Roman form of Odysseus, protagonist of The Odyssey.

[2] license Passport issued from the Privy Council.

[3] vents our climate Comes out of our country.

[4] should I.e., that a raven is said to have built.

[5] whelping in the Tower King James's lionesses at the menagerie of the Tower of London gave birth to cubs on 5 August 1604 and 26 February 1605.

[6] fires at Berwick The town of Berwick on the Scottish border witnessed a ghostly battle on a nearby hill in 1604. The phenomenon, probably the result of particularly violent aurora borealis, was reported throughout the land, and provided fuel for the witch craze.

[7] new star In 1604 a supernova appeared in the constellation Serpens; it lasted for two years.

[8] three porpoises On 19 January 1606, a porpoise was discovered in a small creek in West Ham (well below London Bridge), and shortly afterwards, a whale swam up the Thames to within sight of London.

[9] and a sturgeon The sturgeon was a common fish in the Thames at the time; hence the joke.

SIR POLITIC. What should these things portend?
PEREGRINE. The very day
(Let me be sure) that I put forth from London,
There was a whale discovered in the river,
As high as Woolwich, that had waited there,
Few know how many months, for the subversion
Of the Stade fleet.[1]
SIR POLITIC. Is't possible? believe it,
'Twas either sent from Spain, or the archdukes:[2]
Spinola's whale,[3] upon my life, my credit!
Will they not leave these projects? Worthy sir,
Some other news.
PEREGRINE. Faith, Stone the fool[4] is dead,
And they do lack a tavern fool extremely.
SIR POLITIC. Is Mas'° Stone dead? master
PEREGRINE. He's dead, sir; why, I hope
You thought him not immortal? [Aside.] O, this knight,
Were he well known, would be a precious thing
To fit our English stage: he that should write
But such a fellow, should be thought to feign
Extremely, if not maliciously.
SIR POLITIC. Stone dead!
PEREGRINE. Dead.—Lord! how deeply, sir, you apprehend° it? feel
He was no kinsman to you?
SIR POLITIC. That° I know of. not that
Well! that same fellow was an unknown fool.[5]
PEREGRINE. And yet you knew him, it seems?
SIR POLITIC. I did so. Sir,
I knew him one of the most dangerous heads
Living within the state, and so I held him.
PEREGRINE. Indeed, sir?
SIR POLITIC. While he lived, in action,[6]
He has received weekly intelligence,
Upon my knowledge, out of the Low Countries,
For all parts of the world, in cabbages;[7]
And those dispensed again to ambassadors,
In oranges, musk-melons,° apricots, common melons
Lemons, pome-citrons,° and such-like; sometimes limes
In Colchester oysters, and your Selsey cockles.[8]
PEREGRINE. You make me wonder.
SIR POLITIC. Sir, upon my knowledge.
Nay, I've observed him, at your public ordinary,[9]
Take his advertisement from a traveller,
A concealed statesman, in a trencher of meat;
And instantly, before the meal was done,
Convey an answer in a tooth-pick.
PEREGRINE. Strange!
How could this be, sir?
SIR POLITIC. Why, the meat was cut
So like his character,° and so laid, as he code, cipher
Must easily read the cipher.
PEREGRINE. I have heard,
He could not read, sir.
SIR POLITIC. So 'twas given out,
In policy, by those that did employ him:
But he could read, and had your languages,[10]
And to't, as sound a noddle—° head
PEREGRINE. I have heard, sir,
That your baboons were spies, and that they were
A kind of subtle nation near to China.
SIR POLITIC. Aye, aye, your Mamaluchi.[11] Faith, they had Their hand in a French plot or two; but they

[1] the Stade fleet The Company of the English Merchant Adventurers anchored their fleet at Stade on the Elbe. In 1602, on their way back to England, the fleet famously met a pod of whales that appeared to be impervious to gunshot. This was considered an ominous portent.

[2] archdukes I.e., rulers of the Spanish Netherlands, Archduchess Isabella and Archduke Albert.

[3] Spinola's whale Ambrosio Spinola, general of the Spanish army in the Netherlands, famed for his use of ingenious secret weapons. One of these was supposed to be (in the words of Charles Herle) "Spinola's whale that should have been hir'd to have drown'd London by snuffing up the Thames and spouting it upon the City."

[4] Stone the fool A real person, Stone was whipped to death in spring 1605 for mocking the Earl of Nottingham.

[5] unknown fool A fool not appreciated for what he really was. I.e., Sir Politic thinks Stone was a government agent.

[6] in action Implying that he was an intelligence agent.

[7] cabbages Often exported from Holland at the time.

[8] Colchester oysters ... Selsey cockles Colchester has been famous for its oysters since Roman times and Selsey is noted for its shellfish.

[9] ordinary Eating house.

[10] had your languages Could speak foreign languages.

[11] Mamaluchi The Italianate plural of "Mameluk," the ruling dynasty of Egypt from 1254. Peregrine's apparent ignorance of geography and zoology is a device to trick Sir Politic into revealing his own ignorance.

Were so extremely given to women,[1] as
They made discovery of all: yet I
Had my advices here, on Wednesday last.
From one of their own coat,° they were returned, livery
Made their relations, as the fashion is,
And now stand fair for fresh employment.
PEREGRINE. [Aside.] 'Heart!° God's heart!
This Sir Pol will be ignorant of nothing.
It seems, sir, you know all.
SIR POLITIC. Not all, sir, but
I have some general notions. I do love
To note and to observe: though I live out,
Free from the active torrent,[2] yet I'd mark
The currents and the passages of things,
For mine own private use; and know the ebbs
And flows of state.
PEREGRINE. Believe it, sir, I hold
Myself in no small tie° unto my fortunes, obligation
For casting me thus luckily upon you,
Whose knowledge, if your bounty equal it,
May do me great assistance, in instruction
For my behaviour, and my bearing, which
Is yet so rude and raw.
SIR POLITIC. Why, came you forth
Empty of rules for travel?
PEREGRINE. Faith, I had
Some common ones, from out that vulgar grammar,
Which he that cried° Italian to me, taught me. spoke
SIR POLITIC. Why this it is that spoils all our brave bloods,° gallants
Trusting our hopeful gentry unto pedants.
Fellows of outside, and mere bark. You seem
To be a gentleman, of ingenuous race:—
I not profess it, but my fate hath been
To be, where I have been consulted with,
In this high kind,[3] touching some great men's sons,
Persons of blood and honour.—
PEREGRINE. Who be these, sir?

ACT 2, SCENE 2

(Enter Mosca, Nano followed by Grege.)

MOSCA. Under that window, there it must be. The same. [They set out a platform.]
SIR POLITIC. Fellows, to mount a bank.[4] Did your instructor
In the dear tongues, never discourse to you
Of the Italian mountebanks?
PEREGRINE. Yes, sir.
SIR POLITIC. Why,
Here you shall see one.
PEREGRINE. They are quacksalvers;° quacks
Fellows, that live by vending oils and drugs.
SIR POLITIC. Was that the character he gave you of them?
PEREGRINE. As I remember.
SIR POLITIC. Pity his ignorance.
They are the only knowing men of Europe!
Great general scholars, excellent physicians,
Most admired statesmen, professed favourites,
And cabinet° counsellors to the greatest princes; private
The only languaged men of all the world!
PEREGRINE. And I have heard, they are most lewd° impostors; ignorant
Made all of terms and shreds;[5] no less beliers
Of great men's favours, than their own vile med'cines;
Which they will utter upon monstrous oaths:
Selling that drug for two-pence, ere they part,
Which they have valued at twelve crowns before.
SIR POLITIC. Sir, calumnies are answered best with silence.
Yourself shall judge.—Who is it mounts, my friends?
MOSCA. Scoto of Mantua,[6] sir.
SIR POLITIC. Is't he? Nay, then
I'll proudly promise, sir, you shall behold
Another man than has been phant'sied[7] to you.
I wonder yet, that he should mount his bank,

---

[1] given to women Baboons were proverbially taken to be lustful creatures.

[2] I live . . . torrent I.e., I do not engage in politics.

[3] In this high kind Regarding important matters of this sort.

[4] mount a bank Referring to the Italian monta in banco, "mount a bench." Figuratively, an itinerant quack.

[5] terms and shreds Jargon and snatches of medical language.

[6] Scoto of Mantua Italian actor of the commedia dell' arte who visited England between 1576–83.

[7] phant'sied Suggested to your fancy.

Here in this nook, that has been wont t'appear
In face of the Piazza!—Here he comes.

[Enter Volpone, disguised as a mountebank doctor, and followed by a crowd of people.]

VOLPONE. (To Nano.) Mount, zany.° clown, buffoon
GREGE. Follow, follow, follow, follow, follow!
SIR POLITIC. See how the people follow him! He's a man
May write ten thousand crowns in bank here. Note,

[Volpone mounts the platform.]

Mark but his gesture:—I do use to observe
The state° he keeps in getting up. ceremony
PEREGRINE. 'Tis worth it, sir.

VOLPONE. Most noble gentlemen, and my worthy patrons! It may seem strange, that I, your Scoto Mantuano, who was ever wont to fix my bank in face of the public Piazza, near the shelter of the Portico to the Procuratia,[1] should now, after eight months' absence from this illustrious city of Venice, humbly retire myself into an obscure nook of the Piazza.

SIR POLITIC. Did not I now object the same?
PEREGRINE. Peace, sir.

VOLPONE. Let me tell you: I am not, as your Lombard proverb saith, cold on my feet;[2] or content to part with my commodities at a cheaper rate, than I accustomed: look not for it. Nor that the calumnious reports of that impudent detractor, and shame to our profession (Alessandro Buttone, I mean), who gave out, in public, I was condemned a sforzato[3] to the galleys, for poisoning the cardinal Bembo's … cook,[4] hath at all attached, much less dejected me. No, no, worthy gentlemen; to tell you true, I cannot endure to see the rabble of these ground ciarlitani,[5] that spread their cloaks on the pavement, as if they meant to do feats of activity, and then come in lamely, with their mouldy tales out of Boccacio, like stale Tabarine,[6] the fabulist: some of them discoursing their travels, and of their tedious captivity in the Turks' galleys, when, indeed, were the truth known, they were the Christians' galleys, where very temperately they eat bread, and drunk water, as a wholesome penance, enjoined them by their confessors, for base pilferies.

SIR POLITIC. Note but his bearing, and contempt of these.

VOLPONE. These turdy-facy-nasty-paty-lousy-fartical rogues, with one poor groat's-worth of unprepared antimony,[7] finely wrapped up in several scartoccios,[8] are able, very well, to kill their twenty a week, and play; yet, these meagre, starved spirits, who have half stopped the organs of their minds with earthy oppilations,[9] want not their favourers among your shrivelled salad-eating artisans, who are overjoyed that they may have their half-pe'rth[10] of physic; though it purge them into another world, it makes no matter.

SIR POLITIC. Excellent! have you heard better language, sir?

VOLPONE. Well, let them go. And, gentlemen, honourable gentlemen, know, that for this time, our bank, being thus removed from the clamours of the canaglia,[11] shall be the scene of pleasure and delight; for I have nothing to sell, little or nothing to sell.

SIR POLITIC. I told you, sir, his end.
PEREGRINE. You did so, sir.

VOLPONE. I protest, I, and my six servants, are not able to make of this precious liquor, so fast as it is fetched away from my lodging by gentlemen of your city; strangers of the terra-firma; worshipful merchants; aye, and senators too: who, ever since my arrival, have detained me to their uses, by their splendidous[12] liberalities. And worthily; for, what avails your rich man to have his magazines[13] stuffed with moscadelli,[14] or of the purest grape, when his physicians prescribe him, on pain of death, to drink nothing but water cocted[1] with aniseeds? O, health! Health! The blessing of the rich! the riches of the poor! Who can buy thee at too dear a rate, since there is no enjoying this world without thee? Be not then so sparing of your purses, honourable gentlemen, as to abridge the natural course of life—

---

[1] Portico to the Procuratia Arcade in the Piazza di San Marco in front of the houses of the rich, in this case, Corvino's house.

[2] cold on my feet Forced by poverty to sell cheaply.

[3] a sforzato Italian: against my will.

[4] cardinal Bembo's … cook The pause suggests that "mistress" will be said instead of "cook."

[5] ciarlitani Italian: charlatans.

[6] Tabarine Famous clown from an Italian touring acting troupe.

[7] groat's worth … antimony A groat was a four penny piece. Antimony was a white metal used in alchemy.

[8] scartoccios Paper package for spices used by apothecaries.

[9] earthly oppilations Gross obstructions.

[10] half-pe'rth Half-penny worth.

[11] canaglia Italian: rascals.

[12] splendidous Superlative of "splendid."

[13] magazines Storehouses.

[14] moscadelli Muscadine wine.

PEREGRINE. You see his end.

SIR POLITIC. Aye, is't not good?

VOLPONE. For, when a humid flux, or catarrh, by the mutability of air, falls from your head into an arm or shoulder, or any other part; take you a ducat,[2] or your cecchine of gold, and apply to the place affected: see what good effect it can work. No, no, 'tis this blessed unguento,[3] this rare extraction, that hath only power to disperse all malignant humours, that proceed either of hot, cold, moist, or windy causes—

PEREGRINE. I would he had put in dry too.

SIR POLITIC. Pray you, observe.

VOLPONE. To fortify the most indigest and crude stomach, aye, were it of one that, through extreme weakness, vomited blood, applying only a warm napkin to the place, after the unction and fricace;[4]—for the vertigine[5] in the head, putting but a drop into your nostrils, likewise behind the ears; a most sovereign and approved remedy: the mal caduco,[6] cramps, convulsions, paralyses, epilepsies, tremor-cordia,[7] retired nerves, ill vapours of the spleen, stopping of the liver, the stone, the strangury,[8] hernia ventosa,[9] iliaca passio;[10] stops a dysenteria immediately; easeth the torsion of the small guts; and cures melancholia hypondriaca,[11] being taken and applied according to my printed receipt. (Pointing to his bill and his glass.) For, this is the physician, this the medicine; this counsels, this cures; this gives the direction, this works the effect; and, in sum, both together may be termed an abstract of the theoric and practic in the Aesculapian[12] art. 'Twill cost you eight crowns. And,—Zan Fritada,[13] prithee sing a verse extempore in honour of it.

SIR POLITIC. How do you like him, sir?

PEREGRINE. Most strangely, I!

SIR POLITIC. Is not his language rare?

PEREGRINE. But° alchemy, excepting
I never heard the like; or Broughton's[14] books.

(Song.)

NANO. Had old Hippocrates or Galen,[15]
(That to their books put med'cines all in,)
But known this secret, they had never
(Of which they will be guilty ever)
Been murderers of so much paper,
Or wasted many a hurtless taper;
No Indian drug had e'er been famed,
Tobacco, sassafras not named;
Ne yet, of guacum[16] one small stick, sir,
Nor Raymond Lully's[17] great elixir.
Ne had been known the Danish Gonswart,
Or Paracelsus, with his long sword.[18]

PEREGRINE. All this, yet, will not do; eight crowns is high.

---

[1] cocted Boiled.

[2] ducat Gold coin.

[3] ungento Italian: ointment.

[4] fricace Massage.

[5] vertingine Dizziness.

[6] mal caduco Epilepsy.

[7] tremor-cordia Heart palpitations.

[8] strangury Impeded and painful urination.

[9] hernia ventosa Hernia caused by flatulence.

[10] iliaca passio Colic.

[11] melancholia hypocondriaca The melancholic humor, once thought to derive from the area immediately under the lower ribs (the hypochondria) that includes the spleen and liver.

[12] Aesculapian Referring to Aesculapius, the classical god of medicine.

[13] Zan Fritada Volpone refers to Nano by the name of a famous clown, literally, "Jack Pancake."

[14] Broughton Hugh Broughton (1549–1612), a scholar of Hebrew and noted Puritan.

[15] Hippocrates or Galen European medical practice was primarily founded on the theories of Hippocrates (460–377 BCE) and Galen (131–201 CE).

[16] Tobacco, sassafras … guacum "New World" plants considered to have medicinal properties.

[17] Raymond Lully Raymond Lull, a thirteenth-century philosopher and alchemist said to have found the Elixir of Life.

[18] Paracelsus … long sword Paracelsus, a famous and controversial medical scholar and occultist, kept his purest elixirs in his sword's pommel.

VOLPONE. No more. Gentlemen, if I had but time to discourse to you the miraculous effects of this my oil, surnamed Oglio del Scoto; with the countless catalogue of those I have cured of the aforesaid, and many more diseases; the patents and privileges of all the princes and commonwealths of Christendom; or but the depositions of those that appeared on my part, before the Signiory of the Sanita[1] and most learned College of Physicians; where I was authorized, upon notice taken of the admirable virtues of my medicaments, and mine own excellency in matter of rare and unknown secrets, not only to disperse them publicly in this famous city, but in all the territories, that happily joy under the government of the most pious and magnificent states of Italy. But may some other gallant fellow say, O, there be diverse that make profession to have as good, and as experimented receipts as yours: indeed, very many have assayed, like apes, in imitation of that, which is really and essentially in me, to make of this oil; bestowed great cost in furnaces, stills, alembics,[2] continual fires, and preparation of the ingredients (as indeed there goes to it six hundred several simples,[3] besides some quantity of human fat, for the conglutination,[4] which we buy of the anatomists), but, when these practitioners come to the last decoction, blow, blow, puff, puff, and all flies in fumo:[5] ha, ha, ha! Poor wretches! I rather pity their folly and indiscretion, than their loss of time and money; for these may be recovered by industry: but to be a fool born, is a disease incurable. For myself, I always from my youth have endeavoured to get the rarest secrets, and book them, either in exchange, or for money: I spared nor cost nor labour, where anything was worthy to be learned. And, gentlemen, honourable gentlemen, I will undertake, by virtue of chemical art, out of the honourable hat that covers your head, to extract the four elements; that is to say, the fire, air, water, and earth, and return you your felt without burn or stain. For, whilst others have been at the Balloo,[6] I have been at my book; and am now past the craggy paths of study, and come to the flowery plains of honour and reputation.

SIR POLITIC. I do assure you, sir, that is his aim.

VOLPONE. But to our price—

PEREGRINE. And that withal, Sir Politic.

VOLPONE. You all know, honourable gentlemen, I never valued this ampulla, or vial, at less than eight crowns; but for this time, I am content to be deprived of it for six: six crowns is the price, and less in courtesy I know you cannot offer me; take it or leave it, howsoever, both it and I am at your service. I ask you not as the value of the thing, for then I should demand of you a thousand crowns, so the Cardinals Montalto, Fernese, the great Duke of Tuscany,[7] my gossip,[8] with diverse other princes, have given me; but I despise money. Only to show my affection to you, honourable gentlemen, and your illustrious state here, I have neglected the messages of these princes, mine own offices, framed my journey hither, only to present you with the fruits of my travels. Tune your voices once more to the touch of your instruments, and give the honourable assembly some delightful recreation.

PEREGRINE. What monstrous and most painful circumstance
Is here, to get some three or four gazets,[9]
Some three-pence in the whole! for that 'twill come to.

(Song.)

NANO. You that would last long, list to my song,
Make no more coil,° but buy of this oil. fuss
Would you be ever fair and young?
Stout of teeth, and strong of tongue?
Tart of palate? quick of ear?
Sharp of sight? of nostril clear?
Moist of hand? and light of foot?
Or, I will come nearer to't,
Would you live free from all diseases?
Do the act your mistress pleases,

---

[1] Signiory of the Sanita Board of Health.

[2] alembics Alchemical apparatus.

[3] simples Unmixed and medicinal herbal ingredients.

[4] conglutination Gluing together.

[5] in fumo Up in smoke.

[6] Balloo Venetian game.

[7] Cardinals Montalto … Tuscany The two cardinals mentioned both became popes, Sixtus V and Paul III respectively. Cosimo de Medici, the famed aristocrat and patron of the arts, was the Archduke of Tuscany.

[8] gossip Godparent for one's child.

[9] gazets Venetian coin worth just under a penny.

Yet fright all aches from your bones?
Here's a medicine for the nones.° occasion

VOLPONE. Well, I am in a humour at this time to make a present of the small quantity my coffer contains; to the rich in courtesy, and to the poor for God's sake. Wherefore now mark: I asked you six crowns; and six crowns, at other times, you have paid me; you shall not give me six crowns, nor five, nor four, nor three, nor two, nor one; nor half a ducat; no, nor a moccenigo.[1] Six—pence[2] it will cost you, or six hundred pound—expect no lower price, for, by the banner of my front, I will not bate a bagatine,[3]—that I will have, only, a pledge of your loves, to carry something from amongst you, to show I am not contemned by you. Therefore, now, toss your handkerchiefs, cheerfully, cheerfully; and be advertised, that the first heroic spirit that deigns to grace me with a handkerchief, I will give it a little remembrance of something, beside, shall please it better, than if I had presented it with a double pistolet.[4]

PEREGRINE. Will you be that heroic spark,° gallant
Sir Politic?

[Celia throws down her handkerchief[5] from the window above.]

O, see! the window has prevented° you. anticipated

VOLPONE. Lady, I kiss your bounty; and for this timely grace you have done your poor Scoto of Mantua, I will return you, over and above my oil, a secret of that high and inestimable nature, shall make you for ever enamoured on that minute, wherein your eye first descended on so mean, yet not altogether to be despised, an object. Here is a powder concealed in this paper, of which, if I should speak to the worth, nine thousand volumes were but as one page, that page as a line, that line as a word; so short is this pilgrimage of man (which some call life) to the expressing of it. Would I reflect on the price? Why, the whole world is but as an empire, that empire as a province, that province as a bank, that bank as a private purse to the purchase of it. I will only tell you; it is the powder that made Venus a goddess (given her by Apollo), that kept her perpetually young, cleared her wrinkles, firmed her gums, filled her skin, coloured her hair; from her derived to Helen, and at the sack of Troy unfortunately lost: till now, in this our age, it was as happily recovered, by a studious antiquary, out of some ruins of Asia, who sent a moiety[6] of it to the court of France (but much sophisticated), wherewith the ladies there, now, colour their hair. The rest, at this present, remains with me; extracted to a quintessence: so that, wherever it but touches, in youth it perpetually preserves, in age restores the complexion; seats your teeth, did they dance like virginal jacks,[7] firm as a wall; makes them white as ivory, that were black as—

ACT 2, SCENE 3

(Enter Corvino.)

CORVINO. Spite o' the devil, and my shame! Come down here;
Come down;—No house but mine to make your scene?
Signior Flaminio, will you down, sir? Down?
What, is my wife your Franciscina,[8] sir?
No windows on the whole Piazza, here,
To make your properties, but mine? but mine?

[Beats away Volpone, Nano, etc.]

Heart! ere tomorrow I shall be new-christened,
And called the Pantalone di Besogniosi,[9]
About the town.

PEREGRINE. What should this mean, Sir Pol?
SIR POLITIC. Some trick of state, believe it; I will home.
PEREGRINE. It may be some design on you.

---

[1] moccenigo Venetian coin worth about nine pence.

[2] Six—pence The dash indicates that Volpone has recognized Sir Politic and Peregrine for Englishmen and switches his appeals to English currency.

[3] bagatine Italian coin worth 1/12 of a penny.

[4] pistolet Venetian coin worth six shillings.

[5] her handkerchief With the money tied into the corner, to effect a purchase.

[6] moiety Part or share; often a half.

[7] virginal jacks Keys of a virginal, a harpsichord-like instrument.

[8] Flaminio … Franciscina Stock characters from commedia dell' arte plays, a young lover and a saucy maid.

[9] Pantalone di Besogniosi Pantalone is the avaricious old man and often cuckolded husband of commedia dell' arte.

Sir Politic. I know not,
I'll stand upon my guard.
Peregrine. It is your best, sir.
Sir Politic. This three weeks, all my advices, all my letters.
They have been intercepted.
Peregrine. Indeed, sir!
Best have a care.
Sir Politic. Nay, so I will.
Peregrine. This knight,
I may not lose him, for my mirth, till night.

[Exeunt.]

ACT 2 , Scene 4

(Enter Volpone, Mosca.)

Volpone. O, I am wounded!
Mosca. Where, sir?
Volpone. Not without;
Those blows were nothing: I could bear them ever.
But angry Cupid, bolting° from her eyes, shooting arrows
Hath shot himself into me like a flame;
Where, now, he flings about his burning heat,
As in a furnace an ambitious fire,
Whose vent is stopped. The fight is all within me.
I cannot live, except thou help me, Mosca;
My liver[1] melts, and I, without the hope
Of some soft air, from her refreshing breath,
Am but a heap of cinders.
Mosca. 'Las, good sir,
Would you had never seen her!
Volpone. Nay, would thou
Had'st never told me of her!
Mosca. Sir, 'tis true;
I do confess I was unfortunate,
And you unhappy: but I'm bound in conscience,
No less than duty, to effect my best
To your release of torment, and I will, sir.
Volpone. Dear Mosca, shall I hope?
Mosca. Sir, more than dear,
I will not bid you to despair of aught
Within a human compass.
Volpone. O, there spoke
My better angel. Mosca, take my keys,
Gold, plate, and jewels, all's at thy devotion;
Employ them how thou wilt; nay, coin me too:
So thou, in this, but crown my longings, Mosca.
Mosca. Use but your patience.
Volpone. So I have.
Mosca. I doubt not
To bring success to your desires.
Volpone. Nay, then,
I not repent me of my late disguise.
Mosca. If you can horn° him, sir, you need not. cuckold
Volpone. True:
Besides, I never meant him for my heir.
Is not the colour of my beard and eyebrows[2]
To make me known?
Mosca. No jot.
Volpone. I did it well.
Mosca. So well, would I could follow you in mine,
With half the happiness!—and yet I would Escape your epilogue.
Volpone. But were they gulled
With a belief that I was Scoto?
Mosca. Sir,
Scoto himself could hardly have distinguished!
I have not time to flatter you now; we'll part;
And as I prosper, so applaud my art.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 2, Scene 5

(Enter Corvino, Celia.)

Corvino. Death of mine honour, with the city's fool!
A juggling, tooth-drawing,[3] prating mountebank!
And at a public window! where, whilst he,
With his strained° action, and his dole of faces, extravagant
To his drug-lecture draws your itching ears,

---

[1] liver Thought to be the seat of passion.

[2] colour of … eyebrows I.e., red, the color of a fox.

[3] tooth-drawing Dentistry was sometimes performed by mountebanks.

A crew of old, unmarried, noted lechers,
Stood leering up like satyrs; and you smile
Most graciously, and fan your favours forth,
To give your hot spectators satisfaction!
What, was your mountebank their call? Their whistle?
Or were you enamoured on his copper rings,
His saffron jewel, with the toad-stone in't,
Or his embroidered suit, with the cope-stitch,[1]
Made of a hearse cloth?[2] Or his old tilt-feather?[3]
Or his starched beard?[4] Well, you shall have him, yes!
He shall come home, and minister unto you
The fricace for the mother. Or, let me see,
I think you'd rather mount;[5] would you not mount?
Why, if you'll mount, you may; yes, truly, you may:
And so you may be seen, down to the foot.
Get you a cittern,[6] Lady Vanity,[7]
And be a dealer° with the virtuous man; prostitute
Make one: I'll but protest myself a cuckold,
And save your dowry.[8] I'm a Dutchman, I!
For, if you thought me an Italian,
You would be damned, ere you did this, you whore!
Thou'ldst tremble, to imagine, that the murder
Of father, mother, brother, all thy race,
Should follow, as the subject of my justice.
CELIA. Good sir, have patience.
CORVINO. What couldst thou propose
Less to thyself, than in this heat of wrath.
And stung with my dishonour, I should strike [draws his sword]
This steel into thee, with as many stabs,
As thou wert gazed upon with goatish eyes?
CELIA. Alas, sir, be appeased! I could not think
My being at the window should more now
Move your impatience, than at other times.
CORVINO. No! not to seek and entertain a parley
With a known knave, before a multitude!
You were an actor with your handkerchief,
Which he most sweetly kissed in the receipt,
And might, no doubt, return it with a letter,
And point the place where you might meet; your sister's,
Your mother's, or your aunt's° might serve the turn.[9] bawd, pimp
CELIA. Why, dear sir, when do I make these excuses,
Or ever stir abroad, but to the church?
And that so seldom—
CORVINO. Well, it shall be less;
And thy restraint before was liberty,
To what I now decree: and therefore mark me.
First, I will have this bawdy light dammed up;
And till't be done, some two or three yards off,
I'll chalk a line: o'er which if thou but chance
To set thy desperate foot, more hell, more horror,
More wild remorseless rage shall seize on thee,
Than on a conjuror, that had heedless left
His circle's safety ere his devil was laid.
Then here's a lock° which I will hang upon thee, chastity belt
And, now I think on't, I will keep thee backwards;[10]
Thy lodging shall be backwards; thy walks backwards;
Thy prospect, all be backwards; and no pleasure,
That thou shalt know but backwards: nay, since you force
My honest nature, know, it is your own,
Being too open, makes me use you thus:
Since you will not contain your subtle nostrils
In a sweet room, but they must snuff the air
Of rank and sweaty passengers° [knocking]— One knocks. passers-by
Away, and be not seen, pain° of thy life; on pain
Nor look toward the window: if thou dost—
Nay, stay, hear this—let me not prosper, whore,

---

[1] cope-stitch Embroidered stitch used to border a cope or long cloak.

[2] hearse cloth Coffin drapery, funeral pall.

[3] tilt-feather Plume worn in the helmet used when jousting.

[4] starched beard Gummed and waxed beards were the height of fashion.

[5] rather mount The mountebank's platform and also the mountebank himself.

[6] cittern Kind of guitar.

[7] Lady Vanity Character from morality plays.

[8] save your dowry An adulteress forfeited her dowry to her husband.

[9] serve the turn Be to the purpose; also sexually, witness the congress.

[10] keep thee backwards Keep at the back of the house, also a pun with the suggestion of buggery.

But I will make thee an anatomy,[1]
Dissect thee mine own self, and read a lecture
Upon thee to the city, and in public.
Away!—

[Exit Celia.]

Who's there?

[Enter Servitore.]

SERVITORE. 'Tis Signior Mosca, sir.

ACT 2 , SCENE 6

CORVINO. Let him come in. His master's dead: there's yet
Some good to help the bad.—

(Enter Mosca.)

My Mosca, welcome!
I guess your news.
MOSCA. I fear you cannot, sir.
CORVINO. Is't not his death?
MOSCA. Rather the contrary.
CORVINO. Not his recovery?
MOSCA. Yes, sir.
CORVINO. I am cursed,
I am bewitched, my crosses° meet to vex me. afflictions
How? how? how? how?
MOSCA. Why, sir, with Scoto's oil;
Corbaccio and Voltore brought of it,
Whilst I was busy in an inner room—
CORVINO. Death! that damned mountebank; but for the law
Now, I could kill the rascal: it cannot be,
His oil should have that virtue. Have not I
Known him a common rogue, come fiddling in
To the osteria,° with a tumbling whore, inn
And, when he has done all his forced tricks, been glad
Of a poor spoonful of dead wine, with flies in't?
It cannot be. All his ingredients
Are a sheep's gall, a roasted bitch's marrow,
Some few sod° earwigs, pounded caterpillars, boiled
A little capon's grease, and fasting spittle:[2]
I know them to a dram.
MOSCA. I know not, sir;
But some on't, there, they poured into his ears,
Some in his nostrils, and recovered him;
Applying but the fricace.
CORVINO. Pox o' that fricace!
MOSCA. And since, to seem the more officious
And flattering of his health, there, they have had,
At extreme fees, the College of Physicians
Consulting on him, how they might restore him;
Where one would have a cataplasm° of spices, poultice
Another a flayed ape clapped to his breast,
A third would have it a dog, a fourth an oil,
With wild cats' skins: at last, they all resolved
That, to preserve him, was no other means,
But some young woman must be straight sought out,
Lusty, and full of juice, to sleep by him;
And to this service, most unhappily,
And most unwillingly, am I now employed,
Which here I thought to pre-acquaint you with,
For your advice, since it concerns you most;
Because, I would not do that thing might cross
Your ends, on whom I have my whole dependence, sir:
Yet, if I do it not, they may delate° denounce
My slackness to my patron, work me out
Of his opinion; and there all your hopes,
Ventures, or whatsoever, are all frustrate!
I do but tell you, sir. Besides, they are all
Now striving, who shall first present him; therefore—
I could entreat you, briefly conclude somewhat;
Prevent° them if you can. go before
CORVINO. Death to my hopes,
This is my villainous fortune! Best to hire
Some common courtesan?
MOSCA. Aye, I thought on that, sir;
But they are all so subtle, full of art—
And age again doting and flexible,
So as—I cannot tell—we may, perchance,
Light on a quean° may cheat us all. prostitute

---

[1] make thee an anatomy Executed criminals were given to schools to be anatomically studied; also, here, to give a public moral analysis on Celia's failings.

[2] fasting spittle Spittle of someone who has been fasting.

CORVINO. 'Tis true.
MOSCA. No, no: it must be one that has no tricks, sir,
Some simple thing, a creature made unto it;
Some wench you may command. Have you no kinswoman?
God's so° — Think, think, think, think, think, think, think, sir. soul
One o' the doctors offered there his daughter.
CORVINO. How!
MOSCA. Yes, Signior Lupo,° the physician. wolf
CORVINO. His daughter?
MOSCA. And a virgin, sir. Why, alas,
He knows the state of's body, what it is;
That naught can warm his blood, sir, but a fever;
Nor any incantation raise his spirit:
A long forgetfulness hath seized that part.
Besides sir, who shall know it? Some one or two—
CORVINO. I pray thee give me leave. [Walks aside.] If any man
But I had had this luck—The thing in itself,
I know, is nothing—Wherefore should not I
As well command my blood and my affections,
As this dull doctor? In the point of honour,
The cases are all one of wife and daughter.
MOSCA. [Aside.] I hear him coming.
CORVINO. She shall do't: 'tis done.
'Slight!° if this doctor, who is not engaged, God's light
Unless it be for his counsel, which is nothing,
Offer his daughter, what should I, that am
So deeply in? I will prevent him—Wretch!
Covetous wretch! Mosca, I have determined.
MOSCA. How, sir?
CORVINO. We'll make all sure. The party you wot of Shall be mine own wife, Mosca.
MOSCA. Sir, the thing,
But that I would not seem to counsel you,
I should have motioned° to you, at the first: suggested
And make your count,° you have cut all their throats. count on it
Why, 'tis directly taking a possession!
And in his next fit, we may let him go.
'Tis but to pull the pillow from his head,
And he is throttled: it had been done before,
But for your scrupulous doubts.
CORVINO. Aye, a plague on't,
My conscience fools my wit! Well, I'll be brief,
And so be thou, lest they should be before us:
Go home, prepare him, tell him with what zeal
And willingness I do it; swear it was
On the first hearing, as thou may'st do, truly,
Mine own free motion.
MOSCA. Sir, I warrant you,
I'll so possess him with it, that the rest
Of his starved clients shall be banished all;
And, only you received. But come not, sir,
Until I send, for I have something else
To ripen for your good—you must not know't.
CORVINO. But do not you forget to send now.
MOSCA. Fear not.

[Exit Mosca.]

ACT 2, SCENE 7

CORVINO. Where are you, wife? my Celia! wife!

[Enter Celia.]

—What, blubbering
Come, dry those tears. I think thou thought'st me in earnest;
Ha! By this light I talked so but to try thee:
Methinks the lightness of the occasion
Should have confirmed thee. Come, I am not jealous.
CELIA. No!
CORVINO. Faith I am not, I, nor never was;
It is a poor unprofitable humour.
Do not I know, if women have a will,° sexual appetite
They'll do 'gainst all the watches of the world,
And that the fiercest spies are tamed with gold?
Tut, I am confident in thee, thou shalt see't;
And see I'll give thee cause too, to believe it.
Come kiss me. Go, and make thee ready, straight,
In all thy best attire, thy choicest jewels,
Put them all on, and, with them, thy best looks:
We are invited to a solemn feast,
At old Volpone's, where it shall appear
How far I am free from jealousy or fear.

[Exeunt.]

ACT 3, SCENE 1

[Enter Mosca.]

MOSCA. I fear, I shall begin to grow in love
With my dear self, and my most prosperous parts,° abilities
They do so spring and burgeon; I can feel
A whimsy° in my blood: I know not how, giddiness
Success hath made me wanton. I could skip
Out of my skin, now, like a subtle snake,
I am so limber. O! your parasite
Is a most precious thing, dropt from above,
Not bred 'mongst clods and clotpoles,° here on earth. idiots
I muse, the mystery was not made a science,
It is so liberally professed! Almost
All the wise world is little else, in nature,
But parasites or sub-parasites. And yet,
I mean not those that have your bare town-art,[1]
To know who's fit to feed them; have no house,
No family, no care, and therefore mould
Tales[2] for men's ears, to bait that sense; or get Kitchen-invention,° and some stale receipts elaborate recipes
To please the belly, and the groin; nor those,
With their court dog-tricks,[3] that can fawn and fleer,° smile
Make their revenue out of legs and faces,
Echo my lord, and lick away a moth:° mote, speck
But your fine elegant rascal, that can rise,
And stoop, almost together, like an arrow;
Shoot through the air as nimbly as a star;° meteor
Turn short as doth a swallow, and be here,
And there, and here, and yonder, all at once;
Present to any humour, all occasion;
And change a visor, swifter than a thought!
This is the creature had the art born with him;
Toils not to learn it, but doth practice it
Out of most excellent nature: and such sparks
Are the true parasites, others but their zanies.

ACT 3, SCENE 2

[Enter Bonario.]

MOSCA. Who's this? Bonario, old Corbaccio's son?
The person I was bound° to seek.—Fair sir, on my way
You are happily met.
BONARIO. That cannot be by thee.
MOSCA. Why, sir?
BONARIO. Nay, pray thee, know thy way, and leave me:
I would be loath to interchange discourse
With such a mate° as thou art. fellow
MOSCA. Courteous sir,
Scorn not my poverty.
BONARIO. Not I, by heaven;
But thou shalt give me leave to hate thy baseness.
MOSCA. Baseness!
BONARIO. Aye; answer me, is not thy sloth
Sufficient argument?° Thy flattery? evidence
Thy means of feeding?
MOSCA. Heaven be good to me!
These imputations are too common, sir,
And easily stuck on virtue when she's poor.
You are unequal to me, and however
Your sentence may be righteous, yet you are not
That, ere you know me, thus proceed in censure:
St. Mark bear witness 'gainst you, 'tis inhuman.

[Weeps.]

BONARIO. What! does he weep? the sign is soft and good:
I do repent me that I was so harsh.
MOSCA. 'Tis true, that, swayed by strong necessity,
I am enforced to eat my careful bread
With too much obsequy;° 'tis true, beside, humility
That I am fain° to spin mine own poor raiment compelled
Out of my mere observance, being not born
To a free fortune: but that I have done
Base offices, in rending friends asunder,
Dividing families, betraying counsels,
Whispering false lies, or mining° men with praises, undermining
Trained° their credulity with perjuries, led on

---

[1] bare town-art Negligible skills of a street parasite, learned in towns.

[2] mould / Tales Invent scandals.

[3] court dog-tricks To beg like a dog as courtiers do.

Corrupted chastity, or am in love
With mine own tender ease, but would not rather Prove the most rugged, and laborious course,
That might redeem my present estimation,
Let me here perish, in all hope of goodness.
BONARIO. [Aside.] This cannot be a personated° passion! feigned
I was to blame, so to mistake thy nature;
Prithee, forgive me: and speak out thy business.
MOSCA. Sir, it concerns you; and though I may seem,
At first to make a main offence in manners,
And in my gratitude unto my master;
Yet, for the pure love, which I bear all right,
And hatred of the wrong, I must reveal it.
This very hour your father is in purpose
To disinherit you—
BONARIO. How!
MOSCA. And thrust you forth,
As a mere stranger to his blood; 'tis true, sir,
The work no way engageth° me, but, as concerns
I claim an interest in the general state
Of goodness and true virtue, which I hear
To abound in you: and, for which mere respect,
Without a second aim, sir, I have done it.
BONARIO. This tale hath lost thee much of the late trust
Thou hadst with me; it is impossible:
I know not how to lend it any thought,
My father should be so unnatural.
MOSCA. It is a confidence that well becomes,
Your piety;° and formed, no doubt, it is filial obligation
From your own simple innocence: which makes
Your wrong more monstrous and abhorred. But, sir,
I now will tell you more. This very minute,
It is, or will be doing; and, if you
Shall be but pleased to go with me, I'll bring you,
I dare not say where you shall see, but where
Your ear shall be a witness of the deed;
Hear yourself written bastard, and professed
The common issue of the earth.
BONARIO. I'm 'mazed!° amazed
MOSCA. Sir, if I do it not, draw your just sword,
And score° your vengeance on my front and face: mark
Mark me your villain: you have too much wrong,
And I do suffer for you, sir. My heart
Weeps blood in anguish—
BONARIO. Lead; I follow thee.

[Exeunt.]

ACT 3, SCENE 3

(Enter Volpone, Nano, Androgyno, and Castrone.)

VOLPONE. Mosca stays long, methinks. Bring forth your sports,
And help to make the wretched time more sweet.
NANO. Dwarf, fool, and eunuch, well met here we be.
A question it were now, whether of us three,
Being all the known delicates° of a rich man, favorites
In pleasing him, claim the precedency can?
CASTRONE. I claim for myself.
ANDROGYNO. And so doth the fool.
NANO. 'Tis foolish indeed: let me set you both to school.
First for your dwarf, he's little and witty,
And every thing, as it is little, is pretty;
Else why do men say to a creature of my shape,
So soon as they see him, It's a pretty little ape?
And why a pretty ape, but for pleasing imitation
Of greater men's actions, in a ridiculous fashion?
Beside, this feat° body of mine doth not crave dainty
Half the meat, drink, and cloth, one of your bulks will have.
Admit your fool's face be the mother of laughter,
Yet, for his brain, it must always come after:[1]
And though that do feed him, it's a pitiful case,
His body is beholding to such a bad face.

(One knocks.)

VOLPONE. Who's there? my couch; away! look! Nano, see:
Give me my caps, first—go, enquire. [Exeunt Nano, Androgyno and Castrone.] Now, Cupid
Send it be Mosca, and with fair return![2]
NANO. (Within.) It is the beauteous madam—
VOLPONE. Would-be—is it?

---

[1] come after Be of less importance.

[2] fair return I.e., from a profitable business venture.

NANO. The same.
VOLPONE. Now torment on me! Squire her in;
For she will enter, or dwell here for ever;
Nay, quickly. That my fit were past! I fear
A second hell too, that my loathing this
Will quite expel my appetite to the other:
Would she were taking now her tedious leave.
Lord, how it threats me what I am to suffer!

ACT 3, SCENE 4

(Re-enter Nano, with Lady Politic Would-be.)

LADY POLITIC. I thank you, good sir. Pray you signify Unto your patron, I am here.—This band° collar
Shows not my neck enough.—I trouble you, sir;
Let me request you, bid one of my women
Come hither to me.—In good faith, I am dressed
Most favourably° to-day! It is no matter: pleasantly
'Tis well enough.—

[Enter 1 Woman.]

Look, see, these petulant things,
How they have done this!
VOLPONE. [Aside.] I do feel the fever
Entering in at mine ears; O, for a charm,
To fright it hence!
LADY POLITIC. Come nearer: is this curl
In his° right place, or this? Why is this higher its
Than all the rest? You have not washed your eyes, yet!
Or do they not stand even in your head?
Where is your fellow? Call her.

[Exit 1 Woman.]

NANO. Now, St. Mark
Deliver us! anon, she'll beat her women,
Because her nose is red.

[Re-enter 1 with 2 Woman.]

LADY POLITIC. I pray you, view
This tire, forsooth:° are all things apt, or no? a refined oath
1 WOM. One hair a little, here, sticks out, forsooth.
LADY POLITIC. Does't so, forsooth! and where was your dear sight,
When it did so, forsooth! What now! Bird-eyed?[1]
And you, too? Pray you, both approach and mend it.
Now, by that light, I muse you are not ashamed!
I, that have preached these things so oft unto you,
Read you the principles, argued all the grounds,
Disputed every fitness, every grace,
Called you to counsel of so frequent dressings—
NANO. [Aside.] More carefully than of your fame or honour.
LADY POLITIC. Made you acquainted, what an ample dowry
The knowledge of these things would be unto you,
Able, alone, to get you noble husbands
At your return:[2] and you thus to neglect it!
Besides you seeing what a curious nation
The Italians are, what will they say of me?
"The English lady cannot dress herself."
Here's a fine imputation to our country!
Well, go your ways, and stay in the next room.
This fucus° was too coarse too; it's no matter.— cosmetic paste
Good sir, you'll give them entertainment?

[Exeunt Nano and Waiting-women.]

VOLPONE. The storm comes toward me.
LADY POLITIC. How does my Volp?
VOLPONE. Troubled with noise, I cannot sleep; I dreamt
That a strange fury entered, now, my house,
And, with the dreadful tempest of her breath,
Did cleave my roof asunder.
LADY POLITIC. Believe me, and I
Had the most fearful dream, could I remember't—
VOLPONE. [Aside.] Out on my fate! I have given her the occasion
How to torment me: she will tell me hers.
LADY POLITIC. Me thought, the golden mediocrity,
Polite and delicate—
VOLPONE. O, if you do love me,
No more: I sweat, and suffer, at the mention

---

[1] Bird-eyed Startled, but possibly short-sighted or timid.

[2] return To England.

Of any dream; feel how I tremble yet.
Lady Politic. Alas, good soul! the passion of the heart.° heartburn
Seed-pearl[1] were good now, boiled with syrup of apples,
Tincture of gold, and coral, citron-pills,
Your elecampane root, myrobalans—[2]
Volpone. [Aside.] Ah me, I have ta'en a grasshopper by the wing!
Lady Politic. Burnt silk,[3] and amber:° ambergris
You have muscadel
Good i'the house—
Volpone. You will not drink, and part?
Lady Politic. No, fear not that. I doubt, we shall not get
Some English saffron, half a dram would serve;
Your sixteen cloves, a little musk, dried mints,
Bugloss,[4] and barley-meal—
Volpone. [Aside.] She's in again!
Before I feigned diseases, now I have one.
Lady Politic. And these applied with a right scarlet cloth.[5]
Volpone. [Aside.] Another flood of words! a very torrent!
Lady Politic. Shall I, sir, make you a poultice?
Volpone. No, no, no,
I'm very well, you need prescribe no more.
Lady Politic. I have a little studied physic; but now,
I'm all for music, save, in the forenoons,
An hour or two for painting. I would have
A lady, indeed, to have all, letters and arts,
Be able to discourse, to write, to paint,
But principal, as Plato holds, your music,
And so does wise Pythagoras, I take it,
Is your true rapture: when there is concent
In face, in voice, and clothes: and is, indeed,
Our sex's chiefest ornament.
Volpone. The poet
As old in time as Plato, and as knowing,
Says, that your highest female grace is silence.
Lady Politic. Which of your poets? Petrarch, or Tasso, or Dante?
Guarini? Ariosto? Aretine?[6]
Cieco di Hadria?[7] I have read them all.
Volpone. [Aside.] Is every thing a cause to my destruction?
Lady Politic. I think I have two or three of them about me.
Volpone. [Aside.] The sun, the sea, will sooner both stand still
Than her eternal tongue! nothing can 'scape it.
Lady Politic. Here's Pastor Fido—[8]
Volpone. [Aside.] Profess obstinate silence;
That's now my safest.
Lady Politic. All our English writers,
I mean such as are happy in the Italian,° to know Italian
Will deign to steal out of this author, mainly:
Almost as much as from Montagnié:[9]
He has so modern and facile a vein,
Fitting the time, and catching the court-ear!
Your Petrarch is more passionate, yet he,
In days of sonnetting, trusted them with much:
Dante is hard, and few can understand him.
But, for a desperate wit, there's Aretine;
Only, his pictures are a little obscene—
You mark me not.
Volpone. Alas, my mind's perturbed.
Lady Politic. Why, in such cases, we must cure ourselves,
Make use of our philosophy—
Volpone. Ohimè![10]
Lady Politic. And as we find our passions do rebel,

---

[1] Seed-pearl Home remedy for heart stimulation.

[2] elecampane … myrobalans Alecampane is also known as horse-heal, the leaves of which were used as a stimulant tonic. Myrobalans is a plum-like fruit from India hailed for its efficacy in curing melancholy and agues.

[3] Burnt silk Considered a cure for smallpox when boiled in water.

[4] Bugloss Herb used as a heart stimulant.

[5] scarlet cloth Believed to be a cure for small pox when the patient was wrapped in it.

[6] Aretine I.e., Pietro Aretino (1492–1557), Italian satirical poet noted for his lewd writing.

[7] Cieco di Hadria Luigi Groto, "The Blind Man of Adria," a minor poet compared to the others listed.

[8] Pastor Fido A pastoral tragic-comedy by G.B. Guarini, translated into English as The Faithful Shepherd in 1602.

[9] Montagnié The terminal accent shows Lady Politic's ignorance of the proper pronunciation of the name (Montaigne, i.e., Michel de Montaigne), but fits with the meter of the line.

[10] Ohimè! Italian: Alas!

Encounter them with reason, or divert them,
By giving scope unto some other humour
Of lesser danger: as, in politic bodies,° astute men
There's nothing more doth overwhelm the judgment,
And cloud the understanding, than too much
Settling and fixing, and, as 'twere, subsiding[1]
Upon one object. For the incorporating
Of these same outward things, into that part,
Which we call mental, leaves some certain fæces
That stop the organs, and as Plato says,
Assassinates our knowledge.
VOLPONE. [Aside.] Now, the spirit
Of patience help me!
LADY POLITIC. Come, in faith, I must
Visit you more a days; and make you well:
Laugh and be lusty.
VOLPONE. [Aside.] My good angel save me!
LADY POLITIC. There was but one sole man in all the world,
With whom I e'er could sympathize; and he Would lie you,° often, three, four hours together stay
To hear me speak; and be sometimes so rapt,
As he would answer me quite from the purpose,
Like you, and you are like him, just. I'll discourse,
An't be but only, sir, to bring you asleep,
How we did spend our time and loves together,
For some six years.
VOLPONE. Oh, oh, oh, oh, oh, oh!
LADY POLITIC. For we were coætanei,[2] and brought up—
VOLPONE. Some power, some fate, some fortune rescue me!

ACT 3, SCENE 5

(Enter Mosca.)

MOSCA. God save you, madam!
LADY POLITIC. Good sir.
VOLPONE. Mosca! welcome,
Welcome to my redemption.
MOSCA. Why, sir?
VOLPONE. Oh,
Rid me of this my torture, quickly, there;
My madam, with the everlasting voice:
The bells, in time of pestilence, ne'er made
Like noise,[3] or were in that perpetual motion!
The cock-pit comes not near it. All my house,
But now, steamed like a bath with her thick breath,
A lawyer could not have been heard; nor scarce
Another woman, such a hail of words
She has let fall. For hell's sake, rid her hence.
MOSCA. Has she presented?° given a present
VOLPONE. O, I do not care;
I'll take her absence, upon any price,
With any loss.
MOSCA. Madam—
LADY POLITIC. I have brought your patron
A toy,° a cap here, of mine own work. trifle
MOSCA. 'Tis well.
I had forgot to tell you, I saw your knight.
Where you would little think it.—
LADY POLITIC. Where?
MOSCA. Marry,
Where yet, if you make haste, you may apprehend
Rowing upon the water in a gondola
With the most cunning courtesan of Venice.
LADY POLITIC. Is't true?
MOSCA. Pursue them, and believe your eyes:
Leave me, to make your gift. [Exit Lady Politic.] I knew 'twould take:
For, lightly,° they that use themselves most license, commonly
Are still most jealous.
VOLPONE. Mosca, hearty thanks,
For thy quick fiction, and delivery of me.
Now to my hopes, what say'st thou?

[Re-enter Lady Politic.]

LADY POLITIC. But do you hear, Sir?—
VOLPONE. Again! I fear a paroxysm.
LADY POLITIC. Which way
Rowed they together?

---

[1] Settling ... fixing ... subsiding Alchemical jargon.

[2] coætanei Contemporaries.

[3] The bells ... Like noise During outbreaks of the plague, church bells rang once for each year of the life of every victim, resulting in almost continual ringing.

MOSCA. Toward the Rialto.[1]
LADY POLITIC. I pray you lend me your dwarf.
MOSCA. I pray you, take him.—

[Exit Lady Politic.]

Your hopes, sir, are like happy blossoms, fair,
And promise timely fruit, if you will stay
But the maturing; keep you at your couch,
Corbaccio will arrive straight, with the will;
When he is gone, I'll tell you more.

[Exit Mosca.]

VOLPONE. My blood,
My spirits are returned; I am alive:
And, like your wanton gamester at primero,[2]
Whose thought had whispered to him, not go less,
Methinks I lie, and draw—for an encounter.

[Volpone draws the curtains around his bed.]

ACT 3, SCENE 6

[Mosca leads Bonario in and hides him.]

MOSCA. Sir, here concealed, you may hear all. But, pray you,
Have patience, sir. (One knocks.) The same's your father knocks:
I am compelled to leave you.

[Exit.]

BONARIO. Do so ... Yet
Cannot my thought imagine this a truth.

ACT 3, SCENE 7

[Enter Mosca and Corvino, Celia following.]

MOSCA. Death on me! you are come too soon, what meant you?
Did not I say, I would send?
CORVINO. Yes, but I feared
You might forget it, and then they prevent us.° get there first
MOSCA. [Aside.] Prevent! Did e'er man haste so, for his horns?[3]
A courtier would not ply it so, for a place.° place at court
Well, now there is no helping it, stay here;
I'll presently return.
CORVINO. Where are you, Celia?
You know not wherefore I have brought you hither?
CELIA. Not well, except you told me.
CORVINO. Now, I will:
Hark hither.
MOSCA. [To Bonario.] Sir, your father hath sent word,
It will be half an hour ere he come;
And therefore, if you please to walk the while
Into that gallery°—at the upper end, study, library
There are some books to entertain the time:
And I'll take care no man shall come unto you, sir.
BONARIO. Yes, I will stay there. [Aside.] I do doubt this fellow.
MOSCA. There; he is far enough; he can hear nothing:
And, for his father, I can keep him off.
CORVINO. Nay, now, there is no starting back, and therefore,
Resolve upon it: I have so decreed.
It must be done. Nor would I move't° afore, have urged it
Because I would avoid all shifts° and tricks, evasions
That might deny me.
CELIA. Sir, let me beseech you,
Affect° not these strange trials; if you doubt seek
My chastity, why, lock me up for ever;
Make me the heir of darkness. Let me live,
Where I may please your fears, if not your trust.
CORVINO. Believe it, I have no such humour, I.
All that I speak I mean; yet I'm not mad;

---

[1] Rialto Rialto Bridge, center of commerce in Venice.

[2] primero Card game rather like poker where "go less," "lie," "draw," and "encounter" were all game terms.

[3] horns Cuckold's horns.

Nor horn-mad,[1] see you? Go to, show yourself
Obedient, and a wife.
CELIA. O heaven!
CORVINO. I say it,
Do so.
CELIA. Was this the train?° trick
CORVINO. I've told you reasons;
What the physicians have set down: how much
It may concern me; what my engagements are;
My means; and the necessity of those means,
For my recovery: wherefore, if you be
Loyal, and mine, be won, respect my venture.
CELIA. Before your honour?
CORVINO. Honour! Tut, a breath.
There's no such thing in nature; a mere term
Invented to awe fools. What is my gold
The worse for touching, clothes for being looked on?
Why, this is no more. An old decrepit wretch,
That has no sense, no sinew; takes his meat
With others' fingers; only knows to gape,
When you do scald his gums; a voice, a shadow;
And, what can this man hurt you?
CELIA. [Aside.] Lord! what spirit
Is this hath entered him?
CORVINO. And for your fame,
That's such a jig;° as if I would go tell it, trifle
Cry it on the Piazza! Who shall know it,
But he that cannot speak it, and this fellow,
Whose lips are in my pocket? Save yourself.
If you'll proclaim't, you may! I know no other
Shall come to know it.
CELIA. Are heaven and saints then nothing?
Will they be blind or stupid?
CORVINO. How!
CELIA. Good sir,
Be jealous still, emulate them; and think
What hate they burn with toward every sin.
CORVINO. I grant you: if I thought it were a sin,
I would not urge you. Should I offer this
To some young Frenchman, or hot Tuscan blood
That had read Aretine, conned all his prints,[2]
Knew every quirk° within lust's labyrinth, sudden turn
And were professed critic° in lechery; qualified expert
And I would look upon him, and applaud him,
This were a sin: but here, 'tis contrary,
A pious work, mere charity for physic,
And honest polity,[3] to assure mine own.
CELIA. O heaven! canst thou suffer such a change?
VOLPONE. Thou art mine honour, Mosca, and my pride,
My joy, my tickling, my delight! Go bring them.
MOSCA. Please you draw near, sir.
CORVINO. Come on, what—
You will not be rebellious? by that light—
MOSCA. Sir, Signior Corvino, here, is come to see you.
VOLPONE. Oh!
MOSCA. And hearing of the consultation had,
So lately, for your health, is come to offer,
Or rather, sir, to prostitute—[4]
CORVINO. Thanks, sweet Mosca.
MOSCA. Freely, unasked, or unentreated—
CORVINO. Well.
MOSCA. As the true fervent instance of his love,
His own most fair and proper wife; the beauty,
Only of price in Venice—
CORVINO. 'Tis well urged.
MOSCA. To be your comfortress, and to preserve you.
VOLPONE. Alas, I am past, already! Pray you, thank him
For his good care and promptness. But, for that,
'Tis a vain labour; e'en to fight 'gainst heaven.
Applying fire to stone—uh, uh, uh, uh—
Making a dead leaf grow again. I take
His wishes gently, though; and you may tell him,
What I have done for him. Marry, my state is hopeless!
Will him to pray for me; and to use his fortune
With reverence, when he comes to't.
MOSCA. Do you hear, sir?
Go to him with your wife.
CORVINO. Heart of my father!
Wilt thou persist thus? Come, I pray thee, come.

---

[1] horn-mad Pun; horn-mad means being angry, so here, also, means being angry at being made a cuckold as well as jealous ("horn-madded").

[2] prints Specifically, the erotic illustrations that accompanied Aretino's sexual explicit Sixteen Postures, by Guilio Romano.

[3] polity Policy, skillful management.

[4] prostitute Both the sexual sense and to offer with total submission and devotion.

Thou seest 'tis nothing, Celia. By this hand,
I shall grow violent. Come, do't, I say.
CELIA. Sir, kill me, rather: I will take down poison,
Eat burning coals,[1] do anything—
CORVINO. Be damned!
Heart, I will drag thee hence, home, by the hair;
Cry thee a strumpet through the streets; rip up
Thy mouth unto thine ears; and slit thy nose,
Like a raw rochet![2]—Do not tempt me; come,
Yield, I am loath. Death! I will buy some slave
Whom I will kill, and bind thee to him, alive;[3]
And at my window hang you forth, devising
Some monstrous crime, which I, in capital letters,
Will eat into thy flesh with aquafortis,° nitric acid
And burning corsives,° on this stubborn breast. corrosives
Now, by the blood thou hast incensed, I'll do it!
CELIA. Sir, what you please, you may, I am your martyr.
CORVINO. Be not thus obstinate, I have not deserved it:
Think who it is entreats you. 'Prithee, sweet;
Good faith, thou shalt have jewels, gowns, attires,
What thou wilt think, and ask. Do but go kiss him.
Or touch him, but. For my sake. At my suit.
This once. No! not! I shall remember this.
Will you disgrace me thus? Do you thirst my undoing?
MOSCA. Nay, gentle lady, be advised.
CORVINO. No, no.
She has watched her time.[4] God's precious,[5] this is scurvy,
'Tis very scurvy; and you are—
MOSCA. Nay, good sir.
CORVINO. An arrant locust, by heaven, a locust!
Whore, crocodile, that hast thy tears prepared,[6]
Expecting how thou'lt bid them flow—
MOSCA. Nay, pray you, sir!
She will consider.
CELIA. Would my life would serve
To satisfy—
CORVINO. S'death! if she would but speak to him,
And save my reputation, it were somewhat;
But spitefully to affect my utter ruin!
MOSCA. Aye, now you have put your fortune in her hands.
Why i'faith, it is her modesty, I must quit° her. acquit
If you were absent, she would be more coming;° flirtatious
I know it: and dare undertake for her.
What woman can before her husband? Pray you,
Let us depart, and leave her here.
CORVINO. Sweet Celia,
Thou may'st redeem all, yet; I'll say no more:
If not, esteem yourself as lost. (Celia starts to leave.) Nay, stay there.

[Exeunt Corvino, Mosca.]

CELIA. O God, and his good angels! whither, whither,
Is shame fled human breasts? that with such ease,
Men dare put off your honours, and their own?
Is that, which ever was a cause of° life, purpose for
Now placed beneath the basest circumstance,
And modesty an exile made, for money?
VOLPONE. Aye, in Corvino, and such earth-fed minds,
(He leaps off from his couch.) That never tasted the true heaven of love.
Assure thee, Celia, he that would sell thee,
Only for hope of gain, and that uncertain,
He would have sold his part of Paradise
For ready money, had he met a copeman.[7]
Why art thou mazed to see me thus revived?
Rather applaud thy beauty's miracle;
'Tis thy great work: that hath, not now alone,
But sundry times raised me, in several shapes,
And, but this morning, like a mountebank,
To see thee at thy window: aye, before
I would have left my practice,° for thy love, schemes
In varying figures, I would have contended
With the blue Proteus,[8] or the horned flood.
Now art thou welcome.
CELIA. Sir!
VOLPONE. Nay, fly me not.
Nor let thy false imagination

[1] Eat burning coals Proverbial for the actions of a faithful wife, from the death of Portia, Brutus's wife.

[2] rochet Red Gurnard, a fish.

[3] some slave... alive Tarquin threatens Lucrece in this way in Shakespeare's Rape of Lucrece, ll. 515–671.

[4] watched her time Waited for the right time to do me a bad turn.

[5] God's precious I.e., God's precious blood.

[6] crocodile... tears prepared Crocodiles were believed to lure their victims with feigned tears.

[7] copeman Merchant, chapman.

[8] blue Proteus Proteus was a shape-changing sea god.

That I was bed-rid, make thee think I am so:
Thou shalt not find it. I am, now, as fresh,
As hot, as high, and in as jovial plight,
As when, in that so celebrated scene,
At recitation of our comedy,
For entertainment of the great Valois,[1]
I acted young Antinous;[2] and attracted
The eyes and ears of all the ladies present,
To admire each graceful gesture, note, and footing.° dancing

(Song.)

Come, my Celia, let us prove,
While we can, the sports of love,
Time will not be ours for ever,
He, at length, our good will sever;
Spend not then his gifts in vain;
Suns, that set, may rise again;
But if once we lose this light,
'Tis with us perpetual night.
Why should we defer our joys?
Fame and rumour are but toys.
Cannot we delude the eyes
Of a few poor household spies?
Or his easier ears beguile,
Thus removed by our wile?—
'Tis no sin love's fruits to steal:
But the sweet thefts to reveal;
To be taken, to be seen,
These have crimes accounted been.

CELIA. Some serene[3] blast me, or dire lightning strike
This my offending face!

VOLPONE. Why droops my Celia?
Thou hast, in place of a base husband, found
A worthy lover: use thy fortune well,
With secrecy and pleasure. See, behold,
What thou art queen of; not in expectation,
As I feed others: but possessed and crowned.
See, here, a rope of pearl; and each, more orient
Than that the brave Egyptian queen caroused:[4]
Dissolve and drink them. See, a carbuncle,° garnet
May put out both the eyes of our St. Mark;
A diamond, would have bought Lollia Paulina,[5]
When she came in like star-light, hid with jewels,
That were the spoils of provinces; take these,
And wear, and lose them: yet remains an ear-ring
To purchase them again, and this whole state.
A gem but worth a private patrimony,
Is nothing: we will eat such at a meal.
The heads of parrots, tongues of nightingales,
The brains of peacocks, and of ostriches,
Shall be our food: and, could we get the phoenix,
Though nature lost her kind,[6] she were our dish.

CELIA. Good sir, these things might move a mind affected
With such delights; but I, whose innocence
Is all I can think wealthy, or worth the enjoying,
And which, once lost, I have naught to lose beyond it,
Cannot be taken with these sensual baits:
If you have conscience—

VOLPONE. 'Tis the beggar's virtue;
If thou hast wisdom, hear me, Celia.
Thy baths shall be the juice of July-flowers,° gillyflowers
Spirit of roses, and of violets,
The milk of unicorns, and panthers' breath[7]
Gathered in bags, and mixed with Cretan wines.
Our drink shall be prepared gold and amber;
Which we will take, until my roof whirl round
With the vertigo: and my dwarf shall dance,
My eunuch sing, my fool make up the antic,° grotesque dance
Whilst we, in changed shapes, act Ovid's tales,
Thou, like Europa now, and I like Jove,[8]

---

[1] Valois France's ruling family in the sixteenth century; Henry de Valois II passed through Venice on his way home to be crowned king in 1574.

[2] Antinous Chief suitor for Penelope in Homer's Odyssey.

[3] serene Noxious mist.

[4] Egyptian queen caroused Pliny tells of how, to win a bet with Mark Antony, Cleopatra drank a pearl, worth ten million sesterces, dissolved in vinegar.

[5] Lollia Paulina Notoriously avaricious mistress of the Emperor Caligula.

[6] Though nature lost her kind There is only one phoenix, so eating it would cause its extinction from nature.

[7] panther's breath The panther was said to attract its victims with its sweet breath, and then to kill them.

[8] Europa … Jove Jupiter (Jove), in the form of a bull, wooed Europa.

Then I like Mars, and thou like Erycine:[1]
So, of the rest, till we have quite run through,
And wearied all the fables of the gods.
Then will I have thee in more modern forms,
Attired like some sprightly dame of France,
Brave Tuscan lady, or proud Spanish beauty;
Sometimes, unto the Persian Sophy's[2] wife;
Or the Grand Signior's[3] mistress; and, for change,
To one of our most artful courtesans,
Or some quick Negro, or cold Russian;
And I will meet thee in as many shapes:
Where we may so transfuse our wandering souls
Out at our lips, and score up sums of pleasures,

[Sings.]

That the curious shall not know
How to tell° them as they flow; count
And the envious, when they find
What their number is, be pined.

CELIA. If you have ears that will be pierced—or eyes
That can be opened—a heart that may be touched—
Or any part that yet sounds man about you—
If you have touch of holy saints—or heaven—
Do me the grace to let me 'scape—if not,
Be bountiful and kill me. You do know,
I am a creature, hither ill betrayed,
By one, whose shame I would forget it were. —
If you will deign me neither of these graces,
Yet feed your wrath, sir, rather than your lust —
(It is a vice comes nearer manliness) —
And punish that unhappy crime of nature,
Which you miscall my beauty—flay my face,
Or poison it with ointments, for seducing
Your blood to this rebellion. —Rub these hands,
With what may cause an eating leprosy,
E'en to my bones and marrow— any thing,
That may disfavour° me, save in my honour— disfigure
And I will kneel to you, pray for you, pay down
A thousand hourly vows, sir, for your health;
Report, and think you virtuous—

VOLPONE. Think me cold,
Frozen and impotent, and so report me?
That I had Nestor's[4] hernia, thou wouldst think.
I do degenerate, and abuse my nation,
To play with opportunity thus long;
I should have done the act, and then have parleyed.
Yield, or I'll force thee.

CELIA. O! just God!

VOLPONE. In vain—

BONARIO. (He leaps out from where Mosca had placed him.)
Forbear, foul ravisher, libidinous swine!
Free the forced lady, or thou diest, impostor.
But that I'm loath to snatch thy punishment
Out of the hand of justice, thou shouldst, yet,
Be made the timely sacrifice of vengeance,
Before this altar, and this dross,[5] thy idol.—
Lady, let's quit the place, it is the den
Of villainy; fear naught, you have a guard:
And he, ere long, shall meet his just reward.

[Exeunt Bonario, Celia.]

VOLPONE. Fall on me, roof, and bury me in ruin!
Become my grave, that wert my shelter! O!
I am unmasked, unspirited,° undone, dejected
Betrayed to beggary, to infamy—

ACT 3, SCENE 8

[Enter Mosca, bleeding.]

MOSCA. Where shall I run, most wretched shame of men,
To beat out my unlucky brains?

VOLPONE. Here, here.
What! dost thou bleed?

MOSCA. O that his well-driven sword
Had been so courteous to have cleft me down
Unto the navel, ere I lived to see
My life, my hopes, my spirits, my patron, all
Thus desperately engagèd, by my error!

VOLPONE. Woe on thy fortune!

MOSCA. And my follies, sir.

---

[1] Mars ... Erycine Venus (Erycine, after Eryx in Sicily) and Mars were adulterous lovers.

[2] Sophy The Persian Shah or Supreme Ruler.

[3] Grand Signior Great Sultan of Turkey.

[4] Nestor Elderly king in Homer's Iliad; "Nestor's hernia" suggests impotence.

[5] dross The scum shaven off metal during the smelting process. In this case, Bonario seems to be referring to Volpone's gold.

VOLPONE. Thou hast made me miserable.
MOSCA. And myself, sir.
Who would have thought he would have hearkened so?
VOLPONE. What shall we do?
MOSCA. I know not; if my heart
Could expiate the mischance, I'd pluck it out.
Will you be pleased to hang me, or cut my throat?
And I'll requite you, sir. Let's die like Romans,
Since we have lived like Grecians.[1]

[They knock without.]

VOLPONE. Hark! who's there?
I hear some footing; officers, the Saffi,° bailiffs
Come to apprehend us! I do feel the brand
Hissing already at my forehead; now,
Mine ears are boring.[2]
MOSCA. To your couch, sir, you,
Make that place good, however. [Volpone lies down.]
Guilty men
Suspect what they deserve still. [Opens door.] Signior
Corbaccio!

ACT 3, SCENE 9

[Enter Corbaccio.]

CORBACCIO. Why, how now, Mosca?

[Enter Voltore, behind.]

MOSCA. O, undone, amazed, sir.
Your son, I know not by what accident,
Acquainted with your purpose to my patron,
Touching your will, and making him your heir,
Entered our house with violence, his sword drawn
Sought for you, called you wretch, unnatural,
Vowed he would kill you.
CORBACCIO. Me!
MOSCA. Yes, and my patron.
CORBACCIO. This act shall disinherit him indeed;
Here is the will.
MOSCA. 'Tis well, sir.
CORBACCIO. Right and well:
Be you as careful now for me.
MOSCA. My life, sir,
Is not more tendered; I am only yours.
CORBACCIO. How does he? will he die shortly, think'st thou?
MOSCA. I fear
He'll outlast May.
CORBACCIO. To-day?
MOSCA. No, last out May, sir.
CORBACCIO. Could'st thou not give him a dram?[3]
MOSCA. O, by no means, sir.
CORBACCIO. Nay, I'll not bid you.
VOLTORE. [Aside.] This is a knave, I see.
MOSCA. [Aside.] How! Signior Voltore! Did he hear me?
VOLTORE. Parasite!
MOSCA. Who's that?—O, sir, most timely welcome—[joins Voltore]
Voltore. Scarce,
To the discovery of your tricks, I fear.
You are his, only? And mine also, are you not?
MOSCA. Who? I, sir?
VOLTORE. You, sir. What device is this
About a will?
MOSCA. A plot for you, sir.
VOLTORE. Come,
Put not your foists[4] upon me; I shall scent them.
MOSCA. Did you not hear it?
VOLTORE. Yes, I hear Corbaccio
Hath made your patron there his heir.
MOSCA. 'Tis true,
By my device, drawn to it by my plot,
With hope—
VOLTORE. Your patron should reciprocate?
And you have promised?
MOSCA. For your good, I did, sir.
Nay, more, I told his son, brought, hid him here,

---

[1] Romans… Grecians Ancient Romans were characterized as being willing to commit suicide rather than face dishonor. Ancient Greeks were often depicted as dissolute and histrionic.

[2] the brand… boring Branding on the forehead and cropping the ears were common punishments. Jonson himself had been branded on the thumb for killing the actor Gabriel Spencer in a duel.

[3] a dram Dose of poison.

[4] foists Knaveries.

Where he might hear his father pass the deed:
Being persuaded to it by this thought, sir,
That the unnaturalness, first, of the act,
And then his father's oft disclaiming° in him disowning
(Which I did mean t'help on), would sure enrage him
To do some violence upon his parent,
On which the law should take sufficient hold,
And you be stated° in a double hope:[1] instated
Truth be my comfort, and my conscience,
My only aim was to dig you a fortune
Out of these two old rotten sepulchres—
VOLTORE. I cry thee mercy, Mosca.
MOSCA. Worth your patience,
And your great merit, sir. And see the change!
VOLTORE. Why, what success?
MOSCA. Most hapless! you must help, sir.
Whilst we expected the old raven, in comes
Corvino's wife, sent hither by her husband—
VOLTORE. What, with a present?
MOSCA. No, sir, on visitation—
I'll tell you how anon— and staying long,
The youth he grows impatient, rushes forth,
Seizeth the lady, wounds me, makes her swear—
Or he would murder her, that was his vow—
To affirm my patron to have done her rape:
Which how unlike it is, you see! and hence,
With that pretext he's gone, to accuse his father,
Defame my patron, defeat you—
VOLTORE. Where is her husband?
Let him be sent for straight.
MOSCA. Sir, I'll go fetch him.
VOLTORE. Bring him to the Scrutineo.[2]
MOSCA. Sir, I will.
VOLTORE. This must be stopped.
MOSCA. O you do nobly, sir.
Alas, 'twas laboured all, sir, for your good;
Nor was there want of counsel° in the plot: deliberation
But fortune can, at any time, o'erthrow
The projects of a hundred learned clerks, sir.
CORBACCIO. [Listening.] What's that?
VOLTORE. Will't please you, sir, to go along?

[Exit Voltore, Corbaccio.]

MOSCA. Patron, go in, and pray for our success.
VOLPONE. Need makes devotion: heaven your labour bless!

[Exeunt.]

ACT 4, SCENE 1

(Enter Sir Politic Would-be and Peregrine.)

SIR POLITIC. I told you, sir, it was a plot:[3] you see
What observation is! You mentioned° me asked
For some instructions: I will tell you, sir (Since we are met here in this height° latitude of Venice),
Some few particulars I have set down,
Only for this meridian, fit to be known
Of your crude° traveller; and they are inexperienced
these.
I will not touch, sir, at your[4] phrase, or clothes,
For they are old.
PEREGRINE. Sir, I have better.
SIR POLITIC. Pardon,
I meant, as they are themes.° topics
PEREGRINE. O, sir, proceed:
I'll slander you no more of wit, good sir.
SIR POLITIC. First, for your garb,° it demeanour must be grave and serious,
Very reserved and locked;° not tell a secret enigmatic
On any terms, not to your father; scarce
A fable, but with caution: make sure choice
Both of your company, and discourse; beware
You never speak a truth—
PEREGRINE. How!
SIR POLITIC. Not to strangers,
For those be they you must converse with most;
Others I would not know,° sir, but at acknowledge distance,
So as I still might be a saver in them:
You shall have tricks else passed upon you hourly.
And then, for your religion, profess none,

---

[1] double hope I.e., Both Volpone and Corbaccio's fortunes.

[2] Scrutineo The Venetian law courts.

[3] it was a plot The mountebank scene, Act 2, Scene 2.

[4] your Used impersonally, which Peregrine pretends to misinterpret.

But wonder at the diversity of all:
And, for your part, protest, were there no other
But simply the laws o' the land, you could content you,
Nick Machiavel,[1] and Monsieur Bodin,[2] both
Were of this mind. Then must you learn the use
And handling of your silver fork[3] at meals,
The metal[4] of your glass; (these are main matters
With your Italian;) and to know the hour
When you must eat your melons, and your figs.
Peregrine. Is that a point of state too?
Sir Politic. Here it is:
For your Venetian, if he see a man
Preposterous in the least, he has him straight;[5]
He has: he strips° him. I'll acquaint you, sir, ridicules
I now have lived here, 'tis some fourteen months
Within the first week of my landing here,
All took me for a citizen of Venice,
I knew the forms so well—
Peregrine. [Aside.] And nothing else.
Sir Politic. I had read Contarine,[6] took me a house, Dealt with my Jews[7] to furnish it with moveables—° furniture
Well, if I could but find one man, one man
To mine own heart, whom I durst trust, I would—
Peregrine. What, what, sir?
Sir Politic. Make him rich; make him a fortune:
He should not think again. I would command it.
Peregrine. As how?
Sir Politic. With certain projects that I have;
Which I may not discover.° reveal
Peregrine. [Aside.] If I had
But one to wager with, I would lay odds now,
He tells me instantly.
Sir Politic. One is, and that
I care not greatly who knows, to serve the state
Of Venice with red herrings[8] for three years,
And at a certain rate, from Rotterdam,
Where I have correspondence. There's a letter,
Sent me from one o' the states, and to that purpose:
He cannot write his name, but that's his mark.
Peregrine. He is a chandler?[9]
Sir Politic. No, a cheesemonger.
There are some others too with whom I treat
About the same negotiation;
And I will undertake it: for, 'tis thus.
I'll do't with ease, I have cast° it all: Your hoy[10] reckoned
Carries but three men in her, and a boy;
And she shall make me three returns a year:
So, if there come but one of three, I save;
If two, I can defalk.° But this is now, allow a deduction
If my main project fail.
Peregrine. Then you have others?
Sir Politic. I should be loath to draw the subtle air
Of such a place, without my thousand aims.
I'll not dissemble, sir: where'er I come,
I love to be considerative;° and 'tis true, thoughtful
I have at my free hours thought upon
Some certain goods unto the state of Venice,
Which I do call my cautions; and, sir, which
I mean, in hope of pension, to propound
To the Great Council, then unto the Forty,
So to the Ten.[11] My means° are made already— contacts
Peregrine. By whom?
Sir Politic. Sir, one that, though his place be obscure,
Yet he can sway, and they will hear him. He's A commandatore.
Peregrine. What, a common sergeant?° bailiff

---

[1] Nick Machiavel Niccolò Machiavelli, author of The Prince.

[2] Monsieur Bodin Jean Bodin advocated religious toleration as imposition of orthodoxy was liable to undermine the state.

[3] fork Forks were still rarely used in England.

[4] metal Lead is employed in the making of fine crystal glassware.

[5] if he see … him straight I.e., if a Venetian comes across a man whose fashion is disordered, he spots him at once for a foreigner.

[6] Contarine Translated into English in 1599, De Magistratibus et Republica Venetorum was a book on Venetian history and culture, written by Cardinal Gasparo Contarini.

[7] my Jews Remarks such as this, which we now consider racist and offensive, were casually made at this time. Jews were frequently associated with the lending of money (for centuries one of the few occupations they were not restricted from entering) and thus with pressing to be paid amounts owed.

[8] red herrings Herrings turned red when prepared by smoking. The modern idiomatic use of "red herring" was not current at the time of writing.

[9] chandler Candle maker.

[10] hoy Small vessel for passengers and goods.

[11] Great Council … the Ten The administrative and political hierarchy of Venice.

SIR POLITIC. Sir, such as they are, put it in their mouths,° the mouths of the great
What they should say, sometimes; as well as greater:
I think I have my notes to show you—
PEREGRINE. Good sir.
SIR POLITIC. But you shall swear unto me, on your gentry,
Not to anticipate—
PEREGRINE. I, sir!
SIR POLITIC. Nor reveal
A circumstance—My paper is not with me.
PEREGRINE. O, but you can remember, sir.
SIR POLITIC. My first is Concerning tinder-boxes. You must know,
No family is here without its box.
Now, sir, it being so portable a thing,
Put case, that you or I were ill affected
Unto the state, sir; with it in our pockets,
Might not I go into the Arsenale,[1]
Or you, come out again, and none the wiser?
PEREGRINE. Except yourself, sir.
SIR POLITIC. Go to, then. I therefore
Advertise to the state, how fit it were,
That none but such as were known patriots,
Sound lovers of their country, should be suffered
To enjoy them in their houses; and even those Sealed at some office, and at such a bigness
As might not lurk in pockets.
PEREGRINE. Admirable!
SIR POLITIC. My next is, how to enquire, and be resolved,
By present demonstration, whether a ship,
Newly arrived from Soria,[2] or from
Any suspected part of all the Levant,[3]
Be guilty of the plague: and where they use
To lie out forty, fifty days, sometimes,
About the Lazaretto,[4] for their trial;
I'll save that charge and loss unto the merchant,
And in an hour clear the doubt.
PEREGRINE. Indeed, sir!
SIR POLITIC. Or—I will lose my labour.
PEREGRINE. My faith, that's much.
SIR POLITIC. Nay, sir, conceive me. It will cost me in onions,[5]
Some thirty livres—[6]
PEREGRINE. Which is one pound sterling.
SIR POLITIC. Beside my water-works: for this I do, sir,
First, I bring in your ship 'twixt two brick walls;
But those the state shall venture: On the one
I strain me a fair tarpaulin, and in that
I stick my onions, cut in halves: the other
Is full of loop-holes, out at which I thrust
The noses of my bellows; and those bellows
I keep, with water-works, in perpetual motion,
Which is the easiest matter of a hundred.
Now, sir, your onion, which doth naturally
Attract the infection, and your bellows blowing
The air upon him, will show, instantly,
By his changed colour, if there be contagion;
Or else remain as fair as at the first.
—Now it is known, 'tis nothing.
PEREGRINE. You are right, sir.
SIR POLITIC. I would I had my note.
PEREGRINE. Faith, so would I:
But you have done well for once, sir.
SIR POLITIC. Were I false,
Or would be made so, I could show you reasons
How I could sell this state now to the Turk,
Spite of their galleys, or their—
PEREGRINE. Pray you, Sir Politic.
SIR POLITIC. I have them not about me.
PEREGRINE. That I feared:
They are there, sir.
SIR POLITIC. No, this is my diary,
Wherein I note my actions of the day.
PEREGRINE. Pray you, let's see, sir. What is here?
"Notandum,
A rat had gnawn my spur-leathers; notwithstanding,
I put on new, and did go forth: but first
I threw three beans over the threshold. Item,

---

[1] Arsenale Sir Politic affects the Italian pronunciation here with four syllables. The Arsenal was the storehouse of all the ships and weapons of Venice.

[2] Soria Italian pronunciation of "Syria," affected by Sir Politic.

[3] the Levant Area including modern day Syria, Lebanon, Israel, Palestine, and Jordan.

[4] Lazaretto Literally, leprosy house. One of two quarantined islands where ships suspected of carrying the plague were sent for a period.

[5] onions Supposed to protect against the plague.

[6] livres French coins.

I went and bought two toothpicks,[1] whereof one
I burst[2] immediately, in a discourse
With a Dutch merchant, 'bout ragion del stato.[3]
From him I went and paid a mocenigo[4]
For piecing[5] my silk stockings; by the way
I cheapened sprats;[6] and at St. Mark's I urined."° urinated
'Faith these are politic[7] notes!
SIR POLITIC. Sir, I do slip
No action of my life, but thus I quote it.
PEREGRINE. Believe me, it is wise!
SIR POLITIC. Nay, sir, read forth.

ACT 4, SCENE 2

(Enter Lady Politic Would-be, Nano, and two Women.)

LADY POLITIC. Where should this loose knight be, trow?[8] Sure he's housed.[9]
NANO. Why, then he's fast.[10]
LADY POLITIC. Aye, he plays both with me.
I pray you stay. This heat will do more harm
To my complexion, than his heart is worth.
I do not care to hinder, but to take him.—
How it comes off!
1 WOM. My master's yonder.
LADY POLITIC. Where?
2 WOM. With a young gentleman.
LADY POLITIC. That same's the party;
In man's apparel! Pray you, sir, jog my knight:
I will be tender to his reputation,
However he demerit.° merits blame
SIR POLITIC. My lady!
PEREGRINE. Where?
SIR POLITIC. 'Tis she indeed, sir; you shall know her.
She is,
Were she not mine, a lady of that merit,
For fashion and behaviour; and for beauty
I durst compare—
PEREGRINE. It seems you are not jealous,
That dare commend her.
SIR POLITIC. Nay, and for discourse—
PEREGRINE. Being your wife, she cannot miss that.
SIR POLITIC. Madam,
Here is a gentleman, pray you, use him fairly;
He seems a youth, but he is—
LADY POLITIC. None.
SIR POLITIC. Yes, one
Has put his face as soon into the world—
LADY POLITIC. You mean, as early? but to-day?
SIR POLITIC. How's this?
LADY POLITIC. Why, in this habit, sir; you apprehend
me:—
Well, Master Would-be,[11] this doth not become you;
I had thought the odour, sir, of your good name
Had been more precious to you; that you would not
Have done this dire massacre on your honour;
One of your gravity and rank besides!
But knights, I see, care little for the oath
They make to ladies; chiefly, their own ladies.
SIR POLITIC. Now, by my spurs, the symbol of my knighthood,— PEREGRINE. [Aside.] Lord, how his brain is humbled for an oath!
SIR POLITIC. I reach° you not. understand
LADY POLITIC. Right, sir, your policy
May bear it through thus. [To Peregrine.] —Sir, a word with you.
I would be loath to contest publicly
With any gentlewoman, or to seem
Froward,° or violent, as The Courtier[12] says; unreasonable
It comes too near rusticity in a lady,
Which I would shun by all means: and however
I may deserve from master Would-be, yet

---

[1] toothpicks People carried their own toothpicks at this time. They were sometimes made of gold, silver, or other fine materials.

[2] burst Broke.

[3] ragion del stato Reason of state (here political affairs).

[4] mocenigo Venetian coin.

[5] piecing Mending.

[6] cheapened sprats Bartered for fish.

[7] politic A play on Sir Politic and politically astute.

[8] trow Do you suppose?

[9] housed I.e., at a bawdy house.

[10] loose … fast The game "fast and loose" is being punned on.

[11] Master Would-be This form of address indicates that the Sir Pol only recently bought his knighthood.

[12] The Courtier Baldassare Castiglione's courtesy book, The Courtier, was immensely popular.

T'have one fair gentlewoman thus be made
The unkind instrument to wrong another,
And one she knows not, aye, and to persévér;° persevere
In my poor judgment, is not warranted
From being a solecism[1] in our sex,
If not in manners.
PEREGRINE. How is this!
SIR POLITIC. Sweet madam,
Come nearer to your aim.
LADY POLITIC. Marry, and will, sir.
Since you provoke me with your impudence,
And laughter of your light° land-siren[2] here, immoral
Your Sporus,[3] your hermaphrodite—
PEREGRINE. What's here?
Poetic fury, and historic storms!
SIR POLITIC. The gentleman, believe it, is of worth,
And of our nation.
LADY POLITIC. Aye, your Whitefriars[4] nation.
Come, I blush for you, Master Would-be, I:
And am ashamed you should have no more forehead,[5]
Than thus to be the patron, or St. George,
To a lewd harlot, a base fricatrice,° prostitute
A female devil, in a male outside.
SIR POLITIC. Nay,
An you be such a one, I must bid adieu
To your delights. The case appears too liquid.

[Exit.]

LADY POLITIC. Aye, you may carry't clear, with your state-face!—
But for your carnival concupiscence,° lust
Who here is fled for liberty of conscience,
From furious persecution of the marshal,° prison officer
Her will I disple.° discipline
PEREGRINE. This is fine, i'faith!
And do you use this° often? Is this part act this way
Of your wit's exercise, 'gainst° you have occasion? whenever Madam—
LADY POLITIC. Go to, sir.
PEREGRINE. Do you hear me, lady?
Why, if your knight have set you to beg shirts,
Or to invite me home, you might have done it
A nearer way, by far.
LADY POLITIC. This cannot work you
Out of my snare.
PEREGRINE. Why, am I in it, then?
Indeed your husband told me you were fair.
And so you are; only your nose inclines,
That side that's next the sun, to the queen-apple.° early variety of apple
LADY POLITIC. This cannot be endured by any patience.

ACT 4, SCENE 3

(Enter Mosca.)

MOSCA. What is the matter, madam?
LADY POLITIC. If the Senate
Right not my quest in this, I will protest them
To all the world, no aristocracy.
MOSCA. What is the injury, lady?
LADY POLITIC. Why, the callet° prostitute
You told me of, here I have ta'en disguised.
MOSCA. Who? This! What means your ladyship? The creature
I mentioned to you is apprehended now,
Before the senate; you shall see her—
LADY POLITIC. Where?
MOSCA. I'll bring you to her. This young gentleman,
I saw him land this morning at the port.
LADY POLITIC. Is't possible? How has my judgment wandered?
Sir, I must, blushing, say to you, I have erred;
And plead your pardon.
PEREGRINE. What, more changes yet!
LADY POLITIC. I hope you have not the malice to remember
A gentlewoman's passion. If you stay

---

[1] solecism Impropriety.

[2] land-siren The Sirens were mythical seductresses of the sea.

[3] Sporus Favorite of Nero. Nero castrated Sporus, dressed him as a woman, and married him publicly.

[4] Whitefriars Notorious abode of criminals within the city of London.

[5] forehead Capacity to blush.

In Venice here, please you to use me,[1] sir—
MOSCA. Will you go, madam?
LADY POLITIC. Pray you, sir, use me; in faith,
The more you see me, the more I shall conceive
You have forgot our quarrel.

[Exeunt Lady Politic, Mosca, Nano, and Waiting-women.]

PEREGRINE. This is rare!
Sir Politic Would-be? No; Sir Politic Bawd,
To bring me thus acquainted with his wife!
Well, wise Sir Pol, since you have practised thus
Upon my freshmanship,[2] I'll try your salt-head,[3]
What proof it is against a counter-plot.

ACT 4, SCENE 4

(Enter Voltore, Corbaccio, Corvino.)

VOLTORE. Well, now you know the carriage of the business,
Your constancy is all that is required
Unto the safety of it.
MOSCA. Is the lie
Safely conveyed amongst us? is that sure?
Knows every man his burden?° part in the lie
CORVINO. Yes.
MOSCA. Then shrink not.
CORVINO. But knows the advocate the truth?
MOSCA. O, sir,
By no means; I devised a formal° tale, elaborate
That salved° your reputation. But be valiant, sir. saved
CORVINO. I fear no one but him, that this his pleading
Should make him stand for a co-heir—
MOSCA. Co-halter!
Hang him; we will but use his tongue, his noise,
As we do Croaker's[4] here.
CORVINO. Aye, what shall he do?
MOSCA. When we have done, you mean?
CORVINO. Yes.
MOSCA. Why, we'll think:
Sell him for mummia;[5] he's half dust already.
[To Voltore.] Do you not smile, to see this buffalo,
How he doth sport it with his head?[6] (Aside.) I should,
If all were well and past. (To Corbaccio.) Sir, only you
Are he that shall enjoy the crop of all,
And these not know for whom they toil.
CORBACCIO. Aye, peace.
MOSCA. [To Corvino.] But you shall eat it.[7] Much!
[Then to Voltore again.]—Worshipful sir,
Mercury[8] sit upon your thundering tongue,
Or the French Hercules,[9] and make your language
As conquering as his club, to beat along,
As with a tempest, flat, our adversaries;
But much more yours, sir.
VOLTORE. Here they come, have done.
MOSCA. I have another witness, if you need, sir,
I can produce.
VOLTORE. Who is it?
MOSCA. Sir, I have her.

ACT 4, SCENE 5

(Enter 4 Avocatori, Bonario, Celia, Notario, Commandatori, and Others.)

1 AVOCATORI. The like of this the Senate never heard of.
2 AVOCATORI. 'Twill come most strange to them when we report it.
4 AVOCATORI. The gentlewoman has been ever held
Of unreproved name.
3 AVOCATORI. So, the young man.

---

[1] use me Be socially useful, but also with the suggestion of sexual licentiousness.

[2] practiced thus... freshmanship Contrived against my inexperience. Peregrine mistakenly believes Sir Politic has attempted to trick him.

[3] salt-head Experienced head; also, bawdy mind.

[4] Croaker's Indicating Corbaccio.

[5] mummia Pulverized dust made of supposed Egyptian mummies was thought to have medicinal powers.

[6] see this buffalo... head Alluding to the horns of a cuckold (and said while pointing to Corvino).

[7] eat it Enjoy Volpone's legacy.

[8] Mercury God of eloquence and thieves.

[9] French Hercules While returning from his tenth labour, Hercules was supposed to have fathered the Celts in Gaul (modern France). The Gallic Hercules was a symbol of eloquence.

4 AVOCATORI. The more unnatural part that of his father.
2 AVOCATORI. More of the husband.
1 AVOCATORI. I not know to give
His act a name, it is so monstrous!
4 AVOCATORI. But the impostor, he's a thing created
To exceed example!
1 AVOCATORI. And all after-times!° future examples
2 AVOCATORI. I never heard a true voluptuary
Described, but him.
3 AVOCATORI. Appear yet those were cited?° summoned
NOTARIO. All but the old magnifico, Volpone.
1 AVOCATORI. Why is not he here?
MOSCA. Please your fatherhoods,
Here is his advocate: himself's so weak,
So feeble—
4 AVOCATORI. What are you?
BONARIO. His parasite,
His knave, his pander. I beseech the court,
He may be forced to come, that your grave eyes
May bear strong witness of his strange impostures.
VOLTORE. Upon my faith and credit with your virtues,
He is not able to endure the air.
2 AVOCATORI. Bring him, however.
3 AVOCATORI. We will see him.
4 AVOCATORI. Fetch him.
VOLTORE. Your fatherhoods'[1] fit pleasures be obeyed;
But sure, the sight will rather move your pities,
Than indignation. May it please the court,
In the mean time, he may be heard in me;
I know this place most void of prejudice,
And therefore crave it, since we have no reason
To fear our truth should hurt our cause.
3 AVOCATORI. Speak free.
VOLTORE. Then know, most honoured fathers,
I must now
Discover to your strangely abusèd° ears, deceived
The most prodigious and most frontless° piece shameless
Of solid impudence, and treachery,
That ever vicious nature yet brought forth
To shame the state of Venice. This lewd woman,
That wants no artificial looks or tears
To help the visor° she has now put on, mask
Hath long been known a close° adulteress secret
To that lascivious youth there; not suspected,
I say, but known, and taken in the act
With him; and by this man, the easy husband,
Pardoned; whose timeless° bounty makes unwise
him now
Stand here, the most unhappy, innocent person,
That ever man's own goodness made accused.
For these not knowing how to owe° a gift own
Of that dear grace, but with their shame; being placed
So above all powers of their gratitude,
Began to hate the benefit; and, in place
Of thanks, devise to extirpe° the memory extirpate
Of such an act: wherein I pray your fatherhoods
To observe the malice, yea, the rage of creatures
Discovered in their evils; and what heart° boldness
Such take, even from their crimes:—but that anon
Will more appear.—This gentleman, the father,
Hearing of this foul fact, with many others,
Which daily struck at his too tender ears,
And grieved in nothing more than that he could not Preserve himself a parent, (his son's ills Growing to that strange flood,) at last decreed
To disinherit him.
1 AVOCATORI. These be strange turns!
2 AVOCATORI. The young man's fame was ever fair and honest.
VOLTORE. So much more full of danger is his vice,
That can beguile so under shade of virtue.
But, as I said, my honoured sires, his father
Having this settled purpose, by what means
To him betrayed, we know not, and this day
Appointed for the deed; that parricide,
I cannot style him better, by confederacy° conspiracy
Preparing this his paramour to be there,
Entered Volpone's house, (who was the man,
Your fatherhoods must understand, designed
For the inheritance,) there sought his father:—
But with what purpose sought he him, my lords?
(I tremble to pronounce it, that a son
Unto a father, and to such a father,
Should have so foul, felonious intent)
It was to murder him. When, being prevented
By his more happy absence, what then did he?

---

[1] fatherhoods' The correct form of address, but Volpone later mocks it as pretentious in 5.2.

Not check his wicked thoughts: no, now new deeds:
(Mischief doth never end where it begins)
An act of horror, fathers! he dragged forth
The agèd gentleman that had there lain bed-rid
Three years and more, out of his innocent couch,
Naked upon the floor, there left him; wounded
His servant in the face: and, with this strumpet
The stale[1] to his forged practice, who was glad
To be so active, (I shall here desire
Your fatherhoods to note but my collections,
As most remarkable) thought, at once, to stop
His father's ends;° discredit his free choice, aims
In the old gentleman; redeem themselves,
By laying infamy upon this man,
To whom, with blushing, they should owe their lives.
1 AVOCATORI. What proofs have you of this?
BONARIO. Most honoured fathers,
I humbly crave there be no credit given
To this man's mercenary tongue.
2 AVOCATORI. Forbear.
BONARIO. His soul moves in his fee.
3 AVOCATORI. O, sir.
BONARIO. This fellow,
For six sols more, would plead against his maker.
1 AVOCATORI. You do forget yourself.
VOLTORE. Nay, nay, grave fathers,
Let him have scope: can any man imagine
That he will spare his accuser, that would not
Have spared his parent?
1 AVOCATORI. Well, produce your proofs.
CELIA. I would I could forget I were a creature.
VOLTORE. Signior Corbaccio!
4 AVOCATORI. What is he?
VOLTORE. The father.
2 AVOCATORI. Has he had an oath?
NOTARIO. Yes.
CORBACCIO. What must I do now?
NOTARIO. Your testimony's craved.
CORBACCIO. Speak to the knave?
I'll have my mouth first stopped with earth; my heart
Abhors his knowledge: I disclaim in him.
1 AVOCATORI. But for what cause?
CORBACCIO. The mere portent° of nature! signs
He is an utter stranger to my loins.
BONARIO. Have they made° you to this? forced
CORBACCIO. I will not hear thee,
Monster of men, swine, goat, wolf, parricide!
Speak not, thou viper.
BONARIO. Sir, I will sit down,
And rather wish my innocence should suffer,
Than I resist the authority of a father.
VOLTORE. Signior Corvino!
2 AVOCATORI. This is strange.
1 AVOCATORI. Who's this?
NOTARIO. The husband.
4 AVOCATORI. Is he sworn?
NOTARIO. He is.
3 AVOCATORI. Speak, then.
CORVINO. This woman, please your fatherhoods, is a whore,
Of most hot exercise, more than a partridge,[2]
Upon record—
1 AVOCATORI. No more.
CORVINO. Neighs like a jennet.° horse
NOTARIO. Preserve the honour of the court.
CORVINO. I shall,
And modesty of your most reverend ears.
And yet I hope that I may say, these eyes
Have seen her glued unto that piece of cedar,
That fine well-timbered gallant; and that here
The letters may be read, thorough the horn,[3]
That make the story perfect.
MOSCA. Excellent! sir.
CORVINO. There is no shame in this now, is there?
MOSCA. None.
CORVINO. Or if I said, I hoped that she were onward
To her damnation, if there be a hell
Greater than whore and woman; a good Christian
May make the doubt.
3 AVOCATORI. His grief hath made him frantic.
1 AVOCATORI. Remove him hence.

---

[1] stale Lure; also, a kind of prostitute used by thieves as a decoy.

[2] partridge Supposed to be the most lecherous bird.

[3] thorough the horn Pun based on the horns of the cuckold and the hornbooks, early grammars and primers, from which children learned to read. Corvino holds his forked fingers up to his head, displaying the horns of the cuckold, thus making himself a "hornbook."

(Celia swoons.)

2 AVOCATORI. Look to the woman.
CORVINO. Rare!
Prettily feigned, again!
4 AVOCATORI. Stand from about her.
1 AVOCATORI. Give her the air.
3 AVOCATORI. (To Mosca.) What can you say?
MOSCA. My wound,
May it please your wisdoms, speaks for me, received
In aid of my good patron, when he missed
His sought-for father, when that well-taught dame
Had her cue given her, to cry out, "A rape!"
BONARIO. O most laid° impudence! Fathers— plotted
3 AVOCATORI. Sir, be silent;
You had your hearing free, so must they theirs.
2 AVOCATORI. I do begin to doubt the imposture here.
4 AVOCATORI. This woman has too many moods.
VOLTORE. Grave fathers,
She is a creature of a most professed
And prostituted lewdness.
CORVINO. Most impetuous,
Unsatisfied, grave fathers!
VOLTORE. May her feignings
Not take your wisdoms: but this day she baited
A stranger, a grave knight, with her loose eyes,
And more lascivious kisses. This man saw them
Together on the water, in a gondola.
MOSCA. Here is the lady herself, that saw them too;
Without; who then had in the open streets
Pursued them, but for saving her knight's honour.
1 AVOCATORI. Produce that lady.
2 AVOCATORI. Let her come.

[Exit Mosca.]

4 AVOCATORI. These things,
They strike with wonder!
3 AVOCATORI. I am turned a stone!

ACT 4, SCENE 6

(Enter Mosca with Lady Politic Would-be.)

MOSCA. Be resolute, madam.
LADY POLITIC. Aye, this same is she.
Out, thou chameleon harlot! Now thine eyes
Vie tears with the hyena.[1] Dar'st thou look Upon my wronged face?—I cry your pardons,
I fear I have forgettingly transgressed
Against the dignity of the court—
2 AVOCATORI. No, madam.
LADY POLITIC. And been exorbitant—° outrageous
2 AVOCATORI. You have not, lady.
4 AVOCATORI. These proofs are strong.
LADY POLITIC. Surely, I had no purpose
To scandalize your honours, or my sex's.
3 AVOCATORI. We do believe it.
LADY POLITIC. Surely, you may believe it.
2 AVOCATORI. Madam, we do.
LADY POLITIC. Indeed you may; my breeding
Is not so coarse—
4 AVOCATORI. We know it.
LADY POLITIC. To offend
With pertinacy—[2]
3 AVOCATORI. Lady—
LADY POLITIC. Such a presence!
No surely.
1 AVOCATORI. We well think it.
LADY POLITIC. You may think it.
1 AVOCATORI. Let her o'ercome.° have the last word
What witnesses have you
To make good your report?
BONARIO. Our consciences.
CELIA. And heaven, that never fails the innocent.
4 AVOCATORI. These are no testimonies.
BONARIO. Not in your courts,
Where multitude,° and clamour overcomes. numbers
1 AVOCATORI. Nay, then you do wax insolent.

---

[1] tears with the hyena Crocodiles were supposed to shed tears to lure their prey, while hyenas lured prey with their human voices. Lady Politic here confuses the two.

[2] pertinacy It seems that Lady Politic means "impertinence."

(Volpone is brought in, as impotent.[1])

VOLTORE. Here, here,
The testimony comes, that will convince,
And put to utter dumbness their bold tongues:
See here, grave fathers, here's the ravisher,
The rider on men's wives, the great impostor,
The grand voluptuary! Do you not think
These limbs should affect venery?° Or these eyes pursuit of sexual pleasure
Covet a concubine? Pray you mark these hands;
Are they not fit to stroke a lady's breasts?—
Perhaps he doth dissemble!
BONARIO. So he does.
VOLTORE. Would you have him tortured?
BONARIO. I would have him proved.° tested
VOLTORE. Best try him then with goads, or burning irons;
Put him to the strappado:[2] I have heard
The rack hath cured the gout;[3] faith, give it him,
And help him of a malady; be courteous.
I'll undertake, before these honoured fathers,
He shall have yet as many left diseases,
As she has known° adulterers, or thou known carnally
strumpets.
O, my most equal° hearers, if these deeds, unbiased
Acts of this bold and most exorbitant strain,
May pass with sufferance, what one citizen
But owes the forfeit of his life, yea, fame,
To him that dares traduce him? Which of you
Are safe, my honoured fathers? I would ask,
With leave of your grave fatherhoods, if their plot
Have any face or colour like to truth?
Or if, unto the dullest nostril here,
It smell not rank, and most abhorrèd slander?
I crave your care of this good gentleman,
Whose life is much endangered by their fable;
And as for them, I will conclude with this,
That vicious persons, when they're hot and fleshed
In impious acts, their constancy° abounds: resolution
Damned deeds are done with greatest confidence.
1 AVOCATORI. Take them to custody, and sever them.
2 AVOCATORI. 'Tis pity two such prodigies° monsters should live.
1 AVOCATORI. Let the old gentleman be returned with care.
I'm sorry our credulity hath wronged him.

[Exeunt Officers with Volpone.]

4 AVOCATORI. These are two creatures!
3 AVOCATORI. I've an earthquake in me.
2 AVOCATORI. Their shame, even in their cradles, fled their faces.
4 AVOCATORI. [To Voltore.] You have done a worthy service to the state, sir,
In their discovery.
1 AVOCATORI. You shall hear, ere night,
What punishment the court decrees upon them.
VOLTORE. We thank your fatherhoods.

[Exeunt Avocatori, Notario, and Officers with Bonario and Celia.]

How like you it?
MOSCA. Rare.
I'd have your tongue, sir, tipped with gold for this;
I'd have you be the heir to the whole city;
The earth I'd have want men, ere you want living:° lack livelihood
They're bound to erect your statue in St. Mark's.
Signior Corvino, I would have you go
And show yourself, that you have conquered.
CORVINO. Yes.
MOSCA. It was much better that you should profess
Yourself a cuckold thus, than that the other[4]
Should have been proved.
CORVINO. Nay, I considered that:
Now it is her fault.
MOSCA. Then it had been yours.
CORVINO. True; I do doubt this advocate still.
MOSCA. I'faith
You need not, I dare ease you of that care.

---

[1] impotent I.e., disabled.

[2] strappado Form of torture in which the victim's hands were tied behind his back and secured to a pulley, with which the victim was then lifted.

[3] rack hath cured the gout Both a popular belief and a joke, as gout affected the joints in the legs.

[4] the other I.e., procuring his wife for Volpone.

CORVINO. I trust thee, Mosca.
MOSCA. As your own soul, sir.

[Exit Corvino.]

CORBACCIO. Mosca!
MOSCA. Now for your business, sir.
CORBACCIO. How! Have you business?
MOSCA. Yes, yours, sir.
CORBACCIO. O, none else?
MOSCA. None else, not I.
CORBACCIO. Be careful, then.
MOSCA. Rest you with both your eyes, sir.
CORBACCIO. Dispatch it.
MOSCA. Instantly.
CORBACCIO. And look that all,
Whatever, be put in, jewels, plate, moneys.
Household stuff, bedding, curtains.
MOSCA. Curtain-rings, sir:
Only the advocate's fee must be deducted.
CORBACCIO. I'll pay him now; you'll be too prodigal.
MOSCA. Sir, I must tender it.
CORBACCIO. Two cecchines is well.
MOSCA. No, six, sir.
CORBACCIO. 'Tis too much.
MOSCA. He talked a great while;
You must consider that, sir.
CORBACCIO. Well, there's three—
MOSCA. I'll give it him.
CORBACCIO. Do so, and there's for thee.

[Exit Corbaccio.]

MOSCA. Bountiful bones![1] What horrid strange offence
Did he commit 'gainst nature, in his youth,
Worthy this age?[2] (To Voltore.) You see, sir, how I work
Unto your ends: take you no notice.
VOLTORE. No,
I'll leave you.

[Exit Voltore.]

MOSCA. All is yours, the devil and all:
Good advocate!—Madam, I'll bring you home.
LADY POLITIC. No, I'll go see your patron.
MOSCA. That you shall not:
I'll tell you why. My purpose is to urge
My patron to reform° his will; and for rewrite
The zeal you have shown to-day, whereas before
You were but third or fourth, you shall be now
Put in the first: which would appear as begged,
If you were present. Therefore—
LADY POLITIC. You shall sway° me. persuade

[Exeunt.]

ACT 5 , SCENE 1

(Enter Volpone.)

VOLPONE. Well, I am here, and all this brunt° crisis is past.
I ne'er was in dislike with my disguise
Till this fled° moment: here 'twas good, in past private;
But in your public,—cavè° whilst I breathe. beware
'Fore God, my left leg 'gan to have the cramp,
And I apprehended straight some power had struck me
With a dead palsy: well, I must be merry,
And shake it off. A many of these fears
Would put me into some villainous disease,
Should they come thick upon me: I'll prevent 'em.
Give me a bowl of lusty wine, to fright
This humour from my heart. (He drinks.) Hum, hum, hum!
'Tis almost gone already; I shall conquer.
Any device, now, of rare ingenious knavery,
That would possess me with a violent laughter,
Would make me up again. (Drinks again.) So, so, so, so.
This heat is life; 'tis blood by this time:—Mosca!

---

[1] Beautiful bones Mosca notes Corbaccio's leanness, avarice and age.

[2] Worthy this age To deserve an old age like this.

ACT 5, SCENE 2

(Enter Mosca.)

MOSCA. How now, sir? Does the day look clear again?
Are we recovered, and wrought out of error,
Into our way, to see our path before us?
Is our trade free once more?
VOLPONE. Exquisite Mosca!
MOSCA. Was it not carried learnedly?
VOLPONE. And stoutly:
Good wits are greatest in extremities.
MOSCA. It were a folly beyond thought, to trust
Any grand act unto a cowardly spirit:
You are not taken° with it enough, methinks. pleased
VOLPONE. O, more than if I had enjoyed the wench:
The pleasure of all woman-kind's not like it.
MOSCA. Why now you speak, sir. We must here be fixed;
Here we must rest; this is our master-piece;
We cannot think to go beyond this.
VOLPONE. True,
Thou hast played thy prize, my precious Mosca.
MOSCA. Nay, sir,
To gull° the court— deceive
VOLPONE. And quite divert the torrent
Upon the innocent.
MOSCA. Yes, and to make
So rare a music out of discords—
VOLPONE. Right.
That yet to me's the strangest, how thou hast borne° it! managed
That these, being so divided 'mongst themselves,
Should not scent somewhat, or in me or thee,
Or doubt their own side.
MOSCA. True, they will not see't.[1]
Too much light blinds them, I think. Each of them
Is so possessed[2] and stuffed with his own hopes,
That any thing unto the contrary,
Never so true, or never so apparent,
Never so palpable, they will resist it—
VOLPONE. Like a temptation of the devil.
MOSCA. Right, sir.
Merchants may talk of trade, and your great signiors
Of land that yields well; but if Italy
Have any glebe° more fruitful than these fellows, soil
I am deceived. Did not your advocate rare?[3]
VOLPONE. O—'My most honoured fathers, my grave fathers,
Under correction of your fatherhoods,
What face of truth is here? If these strange deeds
May pass, most honoured fathers'—I had much ado
To forbear laughing.
MOSCA. It seemed to me, you sweat, sir.
VOLPONE. In troth, I did a little.
MOSCA. But confess, sir,
Were you not daunted?° dazed
VOLPONE. In good faith, I was
A little in a mist, but not dejected;
Never, but still my self.
MOSCA. I think° it, sir. believe
Now, so truth help me, I must needs say this, sir,
And out of conscience for your advocate,
He has taken pains, in faith, sir, and deserved,
In my poor judgment, I speak it under favour,° with permission
Not to contrary° you, sir, very richly— contradict
Well—to be cozened.° cheated
VOLPONE. Troth, and I think so too,
By that I heard him, in the latter end.
MOSCA. O, but before, sir: had you heard him first
Draw it to certain heads, then aggravate,[4]
Then use his vehement figures—I looked still
When he would shift a shirt:[5] and, doing this
Out of pure love, no hope of gain—
VOLPONE. 'Tis right.
I cannot answer° him, Mosca, as I would, repay
Not yet; but for thy sake, at thy entreaty,
I will begin, even now—to vex them all,
This very instant.
MOSCA. Good sir.
VOLPONE. Call the dwarf

---

[1] they will not see't Proverbial: there is none so blind as a person who will not see.

[2] possessed Both "in possession of," and "being possessed by."

[3] rare I.e., rear up, attack the case eagerly.

[4] aggravate Put weight upon; emphasize through seriousness of tone.

[5] shift a shirt Mosca intimates that Voltore's violent gesticulation will cause him to need to change his shirt.

And eunuch forth.
MOSCA. Castrone, Nano!

[Enter Castrone and Nano.]

NANO. Here.
VOLPONE. Shall we have a jig now?
MOSCA. What you please, sir.
VOLPONE. Go, straight give out about the streets, you two,
That I am dead; do it with constancy,° conviction
Sadly, do you hear? Impute it to the grief
Of this late slander.

[Exeunt Castrone and Nano.]

MOSCA. What do you mean, sir?
VOLPONE. O,
I shall have instantly my Vulture, Crow,
Raven, come flying hither, on the news,
To peck for carrion, my she-wolf, and all,
Greedy, and full of expectation—
MOSCA. And then to have it ravished from their mouths?
VOLPONE. 'Tis true. I will have thee put on a gown,
And take upon thee, as thou wert mine heir:
Show them a will: open that chest, and reach
Forth one of those that has the blanks;[1] I'll straight
Put in thy name.
MOSCA. [Getting a blank will.] It will be rare,[2] sir.
VOLPONE. Aye,
When they ev'n gape, and find themselves deluded—
MOSCA. Yes.
VOLPONE. And thou use them scurvily!
Dispatch, get on thy gown.
MOSCA. [Dressing.] But what, sir, if they ask
After the body?
VOLPONE. Say, it was corrupted.
MOSCA. I'll say, it stunk, sir; and was fain° to have it obliged
Coffined up instantly, and sent away.
VOLPONE. Any thing; what thou wilt. Hold, here's my will.
Get thee a cap, a count-book,° pen and ink, ledger
Papers afore thee; sit as thou wert taking
An inventory of parcels. I'll get up
Behind the curtain, on a stool, and hearken;
Sometime peep over, see how they do look,
With what degrees their blood doth leave their faces,
O, 'twill afford me a rare meal of laughter!
MOSCA. Your advocate will turn stark dull upon it.
VOLPONE. It will take off his oratory's edge.
MOSCA. But your clarissimo,° old round-back, he Venetian nobleman
Will crump you like a hog-louse,° with the touch. wood louse
VOLPONE. And what Corvino?
MOSCA. O, sir, look for him,
To-morrow morning, with a rope and dagger,[3]
To visit all the streets; he must run mad.
My lady too, that came into the court,
To bear false witness for your worship—
VOLPONE. Yes,
And kissed me 'fore the fathers, when my face
Flowed all with oils.
MOSCA. And sweat — sir. Why, your gold
Is such another med'cine, it dries up
All those offensive savours: it transforms
The most deformed, and restores them lovely,
As 'twere the strange poetical girdle.[4] Jove
Could not invent t'himself a shroud more subtle
To pass Acrisius' guards.[5] It is the thing
Makes all the world her grace, her youth, her beauty.
VOLPONE. I think she loves me.
MOSCA. Who? the lady, sir?
She's jealous of you.[6]
VOLPONE. Dost thou say so?

[Knocking outside.]

---

[1] blanks In pre-made legal documents like wills, spaces were left for the names of heirs to be filled in.

[2] rare Here, splendid, fine, i.e., a splendid joke.

[3] rope and dagger Stock symbols of suicidal madness.

[4] poetical girdle Jonson himself glosses this as "Cestus," or Venus's girdle, which had magical powers to make the wearer irresistible.

[5] Acrisius' guards Acrisius was the King of Argos, father of Danaë. According to legend, to keep his daughter from becoming pregnant with a son who had been prophesied to kill him, he locked her in a tower. Zeus then came to Danaë in a shower of gold and impregnated her, and the gold of the shower corrupted Acrisius's guards.

[6] jealous of you Devoted to your well being.

MOSCA. Hark,
There's some already.
VOLPONE. Look.
MOSCA. It is the Vulture;
He has the quickest scent.
VOLPONE. I'll to my place,
Thou to thy posture.° pretence

[Conceals himself.]

MOSCA. I am set.
VOLPONE. But, Mosca,
Play the artificer now, torture them rarely.

ACT 5, SCENE 3

(Enter Voltore.)

VOLTORE. How now, my Mosca?
MOSCA. Turkey carpets,[1] nine—
VOLTORE. Taking an inventory! That is well.
MOSCA. Two suits of bedding, tissue—[2]
VOLTORE. Where's the will?
Let me read that the while.

[Enter Corbaccio in a sedan chair.]

CORBACCIO. So, set me down,
And get you home.

[Exeunt Servants.]

VOLTORE. Is he come now, to trouble us!
MOSCA. Of cloth of gold, two more—
CORBACCIO. Is it done, Mosca?
MOSCA. Of several velvets° eight— velvet hangings
VOLTORE. I like his care.
CORBACCIO. Dost thou not hear?

[Enter Corvino.]

CORBACCIO. Ha! Is the hour come, Mosca?

(Volpone peeps from behind a traverse.)[3]

VOLPONE. (Aside.) Aye, now they muster.
CORVINO. What does the advocate here,
Or this Corbaccio?
CORBACCIO. What do these here?

[Enter Lady Politic Would-be.]

LADY POLITIC. Mosca!
Is his thread spun?[4]
MOSCA. Eight chests of linen—
VOLPONE. O,
My fine dame Would-be, too!
CORVINO. Mosca, the will,
That I may show it these, and rid them hence.
MOSCA. Six chests of diaper,[5] four of damask.[6]—
There.

[Gives Corvino the will.]

CORBACCIO. Is that the will?
MOSCA. Down-beds and bolsters—
VOLPONE. [Aside.] Rare!
Be busy still. Now they begin to flutter:
They never think of me. Look, see, see, see!
How their swift eyes run over the long deed,
Unto the name, and to the legacies,
What is bequeathed them there—
MOSCA. Ten suits of hangings—
VOLPONE. [Aside.] Aye, in their garters,[7] Mosca. Now their hopes
Are at the gasp.
VOLTORE. Mosca the heir!
CORBACCIO. What's that?

---

[1] Turkey carpets Used as tapestries and table covers.

[2] suits of bedding Bed curtains and hangings in expensive materials; tissue Rich cloth woven with gold or silver threads.

[3] traverse Curtain.

[4] Is his thread spun? I.e., is he dead? Reference to the Fates, who spin the thread of life, determine its length, and cut it.

[5] diaper Linen with a diamond pattern weave.

[6] damask Fabric with designs figured into its weave.

[7] in their garters Volpone puns on the saying, "Hang yourself in your own garters."

VOLPONE. [Aside.] My advocate is dumb; look to my merchant,
He has heard of some strange storm, a ship is lost,
He faints; my lady will swoon. Old glazen-eyes,[1]
He hath not reached his despair yet.
CORBACCIO. All these
Are out of hope; I am, sure, the man.
CORVINO. But, Mosca—
MOSCA. Two cabinets.
CORVINO. Is this in earnest?
MOSCA. One
Of ebony—
CORVINO. Or do you but delude me?
MOSCA. The other, mother of pearl—I am very busy.
Good faith, it is a fortune thrown° upon me— thrust
Item, one salt° of agate—not my seeking. salt-cellar
LADY POLITIC. Do you hear, sir?
MOSCA. A perfumed box—Pray you forbear,
You see I'm troubled°—made of an onyx— busy
LADY POLITIC. How?
MOSCA. Tomorrow or next day, I shall be at leisure
To talk with you all.
CORVINO. Is this my large hope's issue?
LADY POLITIC. Sir, I must have a fairer answer.
MOSCA. Madam!
Marry, and shall: pray you, fairly° quit my house. peacefully
Nay, raise no tempest with your looks; but hark you,
Remember what your ladyship offered me
To put you in an heir; go to, think on it:
And what you said e'en your best madams did
For maintenance; and why not you? Enough.
Go home, and use the poor Sir Pol, your knight, well,
For fear I tell some riddles;° go, be melancholy. secrets

[Exit Lady Politic Would-be.]

VOLPONE. O, my fine devil!
CORVINO. Mosca, pray you a word.
MOSCA. Lord! Will you not take your dispatch hence yet?
Methinks, of all, you should have been the example.
Why should you stay here? With what thought, what promise?
Hear you; do you not know, I know you an ass,
And that you would most fain have been a wittol,° willing cuckold
If fortune would have let you? That you are
A declared cuckold, on good terms? This pearl,
You'll say, was yours? Right. This diamond?
I'll not deny't, but thank you. Much here else?
It may be so. Why, think that these good works
May help to hide your bad. I'll not betray you;
Although you be but extraordinary,
And have it only in title, it sufficeth:
Go home, be melancholy too, or mad.

[Exit Corvino.]

VOLPONE. [Aside.] Rare Mosca! How his villainy becomes him!
VOLTORE. Certain he doth delude all these for me.
CORBACCIO. Mosca the heir!
VOLPONE. [Aside.] O, his four eyes have found it.
CORBACCIO. I am cozened, cheated, by a parasite slave;
Harlot,° thou hast gulled me. rascal
MOSCA. Yes, sir. Stop your mouth,
Or I shall draw the only tooth is left.
Are not you he, that filthy covetous wretch,
With the three legs,° that here, in hope of prey, two legs and a cane
Have, any time this three years, snuffed about,
With your most grovelling nose, and would have hired
Me to the poisoning of my patron, sir?
Are not you he that have to-day in court
Professed the disinheriting of your son?
Perjured yourself? Go home, and die, and stink.
If you but croak a syllable, all comes out:
Away, and call your porters! Go, go, stink.

[Exit Corbaccio.]

VOLPONE. [Aside.] Excellent varlet!
VOLTORE. Now, my faithful Mosca,
I find thy constancy.
MOSCA. Sir?
VOLTORE. Sincere.
MOSCA. A table

---

[1] glazen-eyes Corbaccio wears glasses.

Of porphyry—I mar'l° you'll be thus troublesome. marvel
VOLTORE. Nay, leave off now, they are gone.
MOSCA. Why, who are you?
What! who did send for you? O, cry you mercy,
Reverend sir! Good faith, I am grieved for you,
That any chance of mine should thus defeat
Your (I must needs say) most deserving travails:
But I protest, sir, it was cast upon me,
And I could almost wish to be without it,
But that the will o' the dead must be observed.
Marry, my joy is that you need it not;
You have a gift, sir (thank your education),
Will never let you want, while there are men,
And malice, to breed causes.° Would I had law-suits
But half the like, for all my fortune, sir!
If I have any suits, as I do hope,
Things being so easy and direct, I shall not,
I will make bold with your obstreperous aid,
Conceive me,—for your fee, sir. In mean time,
You that have so much law, I know have the conscience
Not to be covetous of what is mine.
Good sir, I thank you for my plate; 'twill help
To set up a young man. Good faith, you look
As you were costive; best go home and purge, sir.

[Exit Voltore.]

VOLPONE. [Coming forward.] Bid him eat lettuce[1] well. My witty mischief,
Let me embrace thee. O that I could now
Transform thee to a Venus!—Mosca, go,
Straight take my habit of clarissimo,[2]
And walk the streets; be seen, torment them more:
We must pursue, as well as plot. Who would
Have lost this feast?
MOSCA. I doubt it will lose them.
VOLPONE. O, my recovery shall recover all.
That I could now but think on some disguise
To meet them in, and ask them questions:
How I would vex them still at every turn!
MOSCA. Sir, I can fit you.
VOLPONE. Canst thou?
MOSCA. Yes, I know
One o' the Commandatori, sir, so like you;
Him will I straight make drunk, and bring you his habit.
VOLPONE. A rare disguise, and answering thy brain!
O, I will be a sharp disease unto them.
MOSCA. Sir, you must look for curses—
VOLPONE. Till they burst;
The Fox fares ever best when he is cursed.

[Exeunt.]

ACT 5, SCENE 4

[Enter Peregrine disguised, and three Merchants.]

PEREGRINE. Am I enough disguised?
1 MERCHANT. I warrant° you. assure
PEREGRINE. All my ambition is to fright him only.
2 MERCHANT. If you could ship him away, 'twere excellent.
3 MERCHANT. To Zant, or to Aleppo?[3]
PEREGRINE. Yes, and have his
Adventures put i'th' Book of Voyages,[4]
And his gulled story° registered for truth. story of his deceiving
Well, gentlemen, when I am in a while,
And that you think us warm in our discourse,
Know your approaches.
1 MERCHANT. Trust it to our care.

[Exeunt Merchants. Enter Waiting-woman.]

PEREGRINE. Save you, fair lady! Is Sir Pol within?
WOMAN. I do not know, sir.
PEREGRINE. Pray you say unto him,
Here is a merchant, upon earnest° business, important
Desires to speak with him.
WOMAN. I will see, sir.
PEREGRINE. Pray you.

---

[1] Bid him eat lettuce Lettuce was considered to be a remedy both for constipation and for frenzy.

[2] habit of clarissimo Clothing of a gentleman.

[4] Book of Voyages Possibly referring to Hakluyt's Principal Navigations, published in 1598–1600; books of voyages were popular throughout the period.

[Aside.] I see the family is all female here.[1]
WOMAN. He says, sir, he has weighty affairs of state,
That now require him whole; some other time
You may possess him.
PEREGRINE. Pray you say again,
If those require him whole, these will exact him,° demand his attention
Whereof I bring him tidings. [Exit Woman.] What might be
His grave affair of state now! How to make Bolognian sausages here in Venice, sparing
One o' the ingredients?

[Re-enter Woman.]

WOMAN. Sir, he says, he knows
By your word "tidings," that you are no statesman,° agent of the state, spy
And therefore wills you stay.
PEREGRINE. Sweet, pray you return him;
I have not read so many proclamations,
And studied them for words, as he has done—
But—here he deigns to come.

[Enter Sir Politic.]

SIR POLITIC. Sir, I must crave
Your courteous pardon. There hath chanced to-day,
Unkind disaster 'twixt my lady and me;
And I was penning my apology,
To give her satisfaction, as you came now.
PEREGRINE. Sir, I am grieved I bring you worse disaster:
The gentleman you met at the port to-day,
That told you, he was newly arrived—
SIR POLITIC. Aye, was
A fugitive punk?° prostitute
PEREGRINE. No, sir, a spy set on you;
And he has made relation to the Senate,
That you professed to him to have a plot
To sell the state of Venice to the Turk.
SIR POLITIC. O me!
PEREGRINE. For which, warrants are signed by this time,
To apprehend you, and to search your study
For papers—
SIR POLITIC. Alas, sir, I have none, but notes
Drawn out of play-books—
PEREGRINE. All the better, sir.[2]
SIR POLITIC. And some essays.[3] What shall I do?
PEREGRINE. Sir, best
Convey yourself into a sugar-chest;
Or, if you could lie round,° a frail[4] were rare, curl up
And I could send you aboard.
SIR POLITIC. Sir, I but talked so,
For discourse sake merely.

(They knock without.)

PEREGRINE. Hark! they are there.
SIR POLITIC. I am a wretch, a wretch!
PEREGRINE. What will you do, sir?
Have you ne'er a currant-butt° to leap into? cask for currants
They'll put you to the rack; you must be sudden.° quick
SIR POLITIC. Sir, I have an engine—
3 MERCHANT. Sir Politic Would-be!
2 MERCHANT. Where is he?
SIR POLITIC. That I have thought upon before time.
PEREGRINE. What is it?
SIR POLITIC. I shall ne'er endure the torture.
Marry, it is, sir, of a tortoise-shell,
Fitted for these extremities: Pray you, sir, help me.
[Gets into the shell.] Here I've a place, sir, to put back my legs,
Please you to lay it on, sir. With this cap,
And my black gloves. I'll lie, sir, like a tortoise,
'Till they are gone.
PEREGRINE. And call you this an engine?
SIR POLITIC. Mine own device°— invention
Good sir, bid my wife's women
To burn my papers.

---

[1] the family...here Peregrine thinks he has stumbled upon a brothel.

[2] All the better, sir Writeres risked imprisonment on evidenced by the authorities "deciphering" their texts. Jonson had been imprisoned twice for "seditious" comments in his plays.

[3] essays The essay was a new genre, one that Jonson loathed.

[4] frail Basket for raisins and figs.

[Exit Peregrine and Woman. The three merchants rush in.]

1 MERCHANT. Where is he hid?
3 MERCHANT We must,
And will sure find him.
2 MERCHANT. Which is his study?

[Re-enter Peregrine.]

1 MERCHANT. What
Are you, sir?
PEREGRINE. I am a merchant, that came here
To look upon this tortoise.
3 MERCHANT. How!
1 MERCHANT. St. Mark!
What beast is this!
PEREGRINE. It is a fish.
2 MERCHANT. Come out here!
PEREGRINE. Nay, you may strike him, sir, and tread upon him;
He'll bear a cart.
1 MERCHANT. What, to run over him?
PEREGRINE. Yes.
3 MERCHANT. Let's jump upon him.
2 MERCHANT. Can he not go?
PEREGRINE. He creeps, sir.
1 MERCHANT. Let's see him creep.
PEREGRINE. No, good sir, you will hurt him.
2 MERCHANT. Heart, I will see him creep, or prick his guts.
3 MERCHANT. Come out here!
PEREGRINE. Pray you, sir! (To Sir Politic.) Creep a little.
1 MERCHANT. Forth.
2 MERCHANT. Yet farther.
PEREGRINE. Good sir!—Creep.
2 MERCHANT. We'll see his legs.

[They pull off the shell and discover him.]

3 MERCHANT. Godso,° he has garters! God's soul
1 MERCHANT. Aye, and gloves!
2 MERCHANT. Is this
Your fearful tortoise?
PEREGRINE. Now, Sir Pol, we are even;
For your next project I shall be prepared:
I am sorry for the funeral of your notes, sir.
1 MERCHANT. 'Twere a rare motion° to be seen in Fleet-street. puppet-show
2 MERCHANT. Aye, in the Term.[1]
1 MERCHANT. Or Smithfield,[2] in the fair.
3 MERCHANT. Methinks 'tis but a melancholy sight.
PEREGRINE. Farewell, most politic tortoise!

[Exeunt Peregrine and Merchants. Re-enter Waiting-woman.]

SIR POLITIC. Where's my lady?
Knows she of this?
WOMAN. I know not, sir.
SIR POLITIC. Enquire.—
O, I shall be the fable of all feasts,
The freight of the gazetti,° ship-boy's tale; topic of news reports
And, which is worst, even talk for ordinaries.° taverns
WOMAN. My lady's come most melancholy home,
And says, sir, she will straight to sea, for physic.° her health
SIR POLITIC. And I to shun this place and clime for ever,
Creeping with house on back, and think it well
To shrink my poor head in my politic shell.

[Exeunt.]

ACT 5, SCENE 5

(Enter Volpone, Mosca; the first, in the habit of a Commandatore, and the other, of a Clarissimo.)

VOLPONE. Am I then like him?[3]
MOSCA. O, sir, you are he:
No man can sever° you. distinguish
VOLPONE. Good.
MOSCA. But what am I?
VOLPONE. 'Fore heaven, a brave clarissimo; thou

becom'st it!
Pity thou wert not born one.
MOSCA. If I hold° keep
My made one,° 'twill be well. feigned status
VOLPONE. I'll go and see
What news first at the court.

[Exit.]

MOSCA. Do so. My Fox
Is out of his hole, and ere he shall re-enter,
I'll make him languish in his borrowed case,
Except he come to composition° with me. an agreement
Androgyno, Castrone, Nano!

[Enter Androgyno, Castrone, and Nano.]

ALL. Here.
MOSCA. Go, recreate yourselves abroad;° go sport. outside

[Exeunt Androgyno, Castrone, and Nano.]

So, now I have the keys, and am possessed.
Since he will needs be dead afore his time,
I'll bury him, or gain by him: I am his heir,
And so will keep me,° till he share at least. remain
To cozen him of all, were but a cheat
Well placed; no man would construe it a sin:
Let his sport pay for't. This is called the Fox-trap.

[Exit.]

ACT 5, SCENE 6

(Enter Corbaccio and Corvino.)

CORBACCIO. They say, the court is set.
CORVINO. We must maintain
Our first tale good, for both our reputations.
CORBACCIO. Why, mine's no tale: my son would there have killed me.
CORVINO. That's true, I had forgot. Mine is, I'm sure.
But for your will, sir.
CORBACCIO. Aye, I'll come upon him
For that hereafter, now his patron's dead.

[Enter Volpone.]

VOLPONE. Signior Corvino! And Corbaccio! sir,
Much joy unto you.
CORVINO. Of what?
VOLPONE. The sudden good
Dropped down upon you—
CORBACCIO. Where?
VOLPONE. And none knows how,
From old Volpone, sir.
CORBACCIO. Out, arrant knave!
VOLPONE. Let not your too much wealth, sir, make you furious.
CORBACCIO. Away, thou varlet!
VOLPONE. Why, sir?
CORBACCIO. Dost thou mock me?
VOLPONE. You mock the world, sir; did you not change wills?
CORBACCIO. Out, harlot!
VOLPONE. O! Belike you are the man,
Signior Corvino? Faith, you carry it well;
You grow not mad withal; I love your spirit:
You are not over-leavened° with your fortune. over inflated
You should have some would swell now, like a wine-vat,
With such an autumn—Did he give you all, sir?
CORVINO. Avoid,° you rascal! go away
VOLPONE. Troth, your wife has shown
Herself a very woman; but you are well,
You need not care, you have a good estate,
To bear it out, sir, better by this chance:
Except° Corbaccio have a share. unless CORBACCIO. Hence, varlet.
VOLPONE. You will not be aknown,° acknowledged
sir; why, 'tis wise.
Thus do all gamesters, at all games, dissemble:
No man will seem to win. [Exeunt Corvino and Corbaccio.]
Here comes my vulture,
Heaving his beak up in the air, and snuffing.

ACT 5, SCENE 7

(Enter Voltore.)

VOLTORE. Outstripped thus, by a parasite! a slave,
Would run on errands, and make legs for crumbs!
Well, what I'll do—
VOLPONE. The court stays for your worship.
I e'en rejoice, sir, at your worship's happiness,
And that it fell into so learned hands,
That understand the fingering—
VOLTORE. What do you mean?
VOLPONE. I mean to be a suitor to your worship,
For the small tenement, out of reparations,
That, to the end of your long row of houses,
By the Piscaria:[1] it was, in Volpone's time,
Your predecessor, ere he grew diseased,
A handsome, pretty, customed° bawdy-house patronized
As any was in Venice, none dispraised;
But fell with him: his body and that house
Decayed together.
VOLTORE. Come, sir, leave your prating.
VOLPONE. Why, if your worship give me but your hand,° handshake
That I may have the refusal, I have done.
'Tis a mere toy to you, sir; candle-rents;[2]
As your learned worship knows—
VOLTORE. What do I know?
VOLPONE. Marry, no end of your wealth, sir;
God decrease it!
VOLTORE. Mistaking knave! what, mock'st thou my misfortune?
VOLPONE: His blessing on your heart, sir; would
'twere more!—

[Exit Voltore.]

Now to my first again, at the next corner.

ACT 5, SCENE 8

(Enter Corbaccio, Corvino, Mosca passant.)[3]

CORBACCIO. See, in our habit! See the impudent varlet!
CORVINO. That I could shoot mine eyes at him like gunstones!° cannonballs
VOLPONE. But is this true, sir, of the parasite?
CORBACCIO. Again, to afflict us! Monster!
VOLPONE. In good faith, sir,
I'm heartily grieved, a beard of your grave length[4]
Should be so over-reached. I never brooked° endured
That parasite's hair; methought his nose should cozen:
There still was somewhat in his look, did promise
The bane of a clarissimo.
CORBACCIO. Knave—
VOLPONE. Methinks
Yet you, that are so traded in the world,
A witty merchant, the fine bird, Corvino,
That have such moral emblems[5] on your name,
Should not have sung your shame, and dropped your cheese,
To let the fox laugh at your emptiness.
CORVINO. Sirrah, you think the privilege of the place,[6]
And your red saucy cap, that seems to me
Nailed to your jolt-head° with those two blockhead
cecchines,[7]
Can warrant your abuses; come you hither:
You shall perceive, sir, I dare beat you; approach.
VOLPONE. No haste, sir, I do know your valour well,
Since you durst publish what you are,[8] sir.
CORVINO. Tarry,
I'd speak with you.
VOLPONE. Sir, sir, another time—
CORVINO. Nay, now.
VOLPONE. O lord, sir! I were a wise man,

[2] candle-rents Rent from properties that are deteriorating (as a candle burns itself out).

[4] a beard of … length I am as old as yourself.

[5] moral emblems Allegorical drawings of animals with accompanying verses, on themes such as greed, lechery, love, etc.

[6] privilege of the place The commandatore uniform that disguises Volpone also protects him.

[7] red saucy cap … two cecchines A commandatore wore a red hat with two medallions of St. Mark hanging from either side.

[8] what you are I.e., a cuckold.

Would stand the fury of a distracted cuckold.

(Mosca walks by 'em.)

CORBACCIO. What, come again!
VOLPONE. Upon 'em, Mosca; save me.
CORBACCIO. The air's infected where he breathes.
CORVINO. Let's fly him.

[Exeunt Corvino and Corbaccio.]

VOLPONE. Excellent basilisk![1] Turn upon the vulture.

ACT 5, SCENE 9

(Enter Voltore.)

VOLTORE. Well, flesh-fly,° it is summer with you now; blow-fly
Your winter will come on.
MOSCA. Good advocate,
Prithee not rail, nor threaten out of place thus;
Thou'lt make a solecism, as madam says.
Get you a biggin° more, your brain breaks loose. a lawyer's cap

[Exit.]

VOLTORE. Well, sir.
VOLPONE. Would you have me beat the insolent slave,
Throw dirt upon his first good clothes?
VOLTORE. This same
Is doubtless some familiar.
VOLPONE. Sir, the court,
In troth, stays for you. I am mad, a mule
That never read Justinian,[2] should get up,
And ride an advocate. Had you no quirk° trick
To avoid gullage,° sir, by such a creature? being made a fool
I hope you do but jest; he has not done it,
'Tis but confederacy, to blind the rest.
You are the heir.
VOLTORE. A strange, officious,
Troublesome knave! Thou dost torment me.
VOLPONE. I know—
It cannot be, sir, that you should be cozened;
'Tis not within the wit of man to do it;
You are so wise, so prudent—and 'tis fit
That wealth and wisdom still should go together.—

ACT 5, SCENE 10

(Enter Avocatori, Notario, Bonario, Celia, Corbaccio, Corvino, Commandatori, Saffi, etc.)

1 AVOCATORI. Are all the parties here?
NOTARIO. All but the advocate.
2 AVOCATORI. And here he comes.
1 AVOCATORI.[3] Then bring them forth to sentence.
VOLTORE. O, my most honoured fathers, let your mercy
Once win upon° your justice, to forgive— override
I am distracted—
VOLPONE. [Aside.] What will he do now?
VOLTORE. O,
I know not which to address myself to first;
Whether your fatherhoods, or these innocents—
CORVINO. [Aside.] Will he betray himself?
VOLTORE. Whom equally
I have abused, out of most covetous ends—
CORVINO. The man is mad!
CORBACCIO. What's that?
CORVINO. He is possessed.[4]
VOLTORE. For which, now struck in conscience, here, I prostrate Myself at your offended feet, for pardon.
1, 2 AVOCATORI. Arise.
CELIA. O heaven, how just thou art!
VOLPONE. [Aside.] I am caught
In mine own noose—
CORVINO. [To Corbaccio.] Be constant, sir: naught now
Can help, but impudence.

---

[1] basilisk Mythical reptile that could kill with its gaze.

[2] Justinian Roman law code compiled by Justinian.

[3] 1 AVOCATORI Both quarto and folio are ambiguous over who should speak this line and it is possible that it was intended for all Avocatori to speak chorally.

[4] possessed I.e., by a devil.

1 AVOCATORI. [To Voltore.] Speak forward.° continue speaking
COMMANDATORI. Silence!
VOLTORE. It is not passion in me, reverend fathers,
But only conscience, conscience, my good sires,
That makes me now tell truth. That parasite,
That knave, hath been the instrument of all.
2 AVOCATORI. Where is that knave? Fetch him.
VOLPONE. I go.

[Exit.]

CORVINO. Grave fathers,
This man's distracted; he confessed it now:
For, hoping to be old Volpone's heir,
Who now is dead—
3 AVOCATORI. How?
2 AVOCATORI. Is Volpone dead?
CORVINO. Dead since,[1] grave fathers.
BONARIO. O sure vengeance!
1 AVOCATORI. Stay,
Then he was no deceiver.
VOLTORE. O no, none:
The parasite, grave fathers.
CORVINO. He does speak
Out of mere envy, 'cause the servant's made
The thing he gaped° for: please your fatherhoods, gasped
This is the truth, though I'll not justify
The other, but he may be some-deal° faulty. somewhat
VOLTORE. Aye, to your hopes, as well as mine, Corvino:
But I'll use modesty.° Pleaseth your wisdoms, moderation
To view these certain notes, and but confer° them; compare
As I hope favour, they shall speak clear truth.
CORVINO. The devil has entered him!
BONARIO. Or bides in you.
4 AVOCATORI. We have done ill, by a public officer[2]
To send for him, if he be heir.
2 AVOCATORI. For whom?
4 AVOCATORI. Him that they call the parasite.
3 AVOCATORI. 'Tis true,
He is a man of great estate, now left.
4 AVOCATORI. [To Notario.] Go you, and learn his name, and say, the court
Entreats his presence here, but to the clearing
Of some few doubts.

[Exit Notario.]

2 AVOCATORI. This same's a labyrinth!
1 AVOCATORI. Stand you unto your first report?
CORVINO. My state,° estate
My life, my fame—
BONARIO. Where is it?
CORVINO. Are at the stake.
1 AVOCATORI. Is yours so too?
CORBACCIO. The advocate's a knave,
And has a forkèd tongue—
2 AVOCATORI. Speak to the point.
CORBACCIO. So is the parasite too.
1 AVOCATORI. This is confusion.
VOLTORE. I do beseech your fatherhoods, read but those—
CORVINO. And credit nothing the false spirit hath writ:
It cannot be, but he's possessed, grave fathers.

ACT 5, SCENE 11[3]

(Enter Volpone.)

VOLPONE. To make a snare for mine own neck!
And run
My head into it, wilfully! With laughter!
When I had newly 'scaped, was free, and clear,
Out of mere wantonness! O, the dull devil° devil of stupidity
Was in this brain of mine, when I devised it,
And Mosca gave it second; he must now
Help to sear° up this vein, or we bleed dead. cauterize

[Enter Nano, Androgyno, and Castrone.]

How now! Who let you loose? Whither go you now?
What, to buy gingerbread, or to drown kitlings?° kittens
NANO. Sir, master Mosca called us out of doors,
And bid us all go play, and took the keys.

---

[1] since Since the last time the court convened.

[2] public officer Volpone, disguised as a commandatore.

[3] ACT 5, SCENE 11 Jonson seems to be using split staging here, with two parts of the city represented. No one leaves the stage, but the action of the courtroom scene is not resumed until Scene 12.

ANDROGYNO. Yes.
VOLPONE. Did master Mosca take the keys? Why so!
I'm farther in. These are my fine conceits!
I must be merry, with a mischief to me!
What a vile wretch was I, that could not bear
My fortune soberly? I must have my crotchets,° whimsical fantasies
And my conundrums! Well, go you, and seek him:
His meaning may be truer than my fear.
Bid him, he straight come to me to the court;
Thither will I, and, if't be possible,
Unscrew[1] my advocate, upon° new hopes: by means of
When I provoked him, then I lost myself.

[Exeunt.]

ACT 5, SCENE 12

[Avocatori, Bonario, Celia, Corbaccio, Corvino, Commandatori, Saffi, etc., as before.]

1 AVOCATORI. [Reading Voltore's notes.] These things can ne'er be reconciled. He, here,
Professeth, that the gentleman was wronged,
And that the gentlewoman was brought thither,
Forced by her husband, and there left.
VOLTORE. Most true.
CELIA. How ready is heaven to those that pray!
1 AVOCATORI. But that
Volpone would have ravished her, he holds
Utterly false, knowing his impotence.
CORVINO. Grave fathers, he's possessed; again, I say,
Possessed: nay, if there be possession, and
Obsession,[2] he has both.
3 AVOCATORI. Here comes our officer.

[Enter Volpone.]

VOLPONE. The parasite will straight be here, grave fathers.
4 AVOCATORI. You might invent some other name, sir varlet.
3 AVOCATORI. Did not the notary meet him?
VOLPONE. Not that I know.
4 AVOCATORI. His coming will clear all.
2 AVOCATORI. Yet,° it is misty. for now
VOLTORE. May't please your fatherhoods—

(Volpone whispers [to] the Advocate.)

VOLPONE. Sir, the parasite
Willed me to tell you, that his master lives;
That you are still the man; your hopes the same;
And this was only a jest—
VOLTORE. How?
VOLPONE. Sir, to try
If you were firm, and how you stood affected.
VOLTORE. Art sure he lives?
VOLPONE. Do I live, sir?
VOLTORE. O me!
I was too violent.
VOLPONE. Sir, you may redeem it.
They said, you were possessed; fall down, and seem so:
I'll help to make it good. [Voltore falls.]—God bless the man!—
Stop your wind° hard, and swell— hold your breath
See, see, see, see!
He vomits crooked pins! his eyes are set,
Like a dead hare's hung in a poulter's° shop! poulterer
His mouth's running away! Do you see, Signior?
Now it is in his belly.[3]
CORVINO. Aye, the devil!
VOLPONE. Now in his throat.
CORVINO. Aye, I perceive it plain.
VOLPONE. 'Twill out, 'twill out! Stand clear. See where it flies,
In shape of a blue toad, with a bat's wings!
Do you not see it, sir?

---

[1] Unscrew Tell him to change his present course of action.

[2] Obsession Distinct from possession in that obsession was an attack by a devil from without, whereas possession is an attack from within.

[3] They said … his belly Volpone alternates between coaching Voltore to appear possessed and addressing the court. Accounts of possession and the symptoms thereof were widely available in texts published during the period.

CORBACCIO. What? I think I do.
CORVINO. 'Tis too manifest.
VOLPONE. Look! He comes to himself!
VOLTORE. Where am I?
VOLPONE. Take good heart, the worst is past, sir.
You are dispossessed.
1 AVOCATORI. What accident° is this! unforeseen event
2 AVOCATORI. Sudden, and full of wonder!
3 AVOCATORI. If he were
Possessed, as it appears, all this is nothing.
CORVINO. He has been often subject to these fits.
1 AVOCATORI. Show him that writing:—do you know it, sir?
VOLPONE. [To Voltore.] Deny it, sir, forswear it; know it not.
VOLTORE. Yes, I do know it well, it is my hand;
But all that it contains is false.
BONARIO. O practice!° trickery
2 AVOCATORI. What maze is this!
1 AVOCATORI. Is he not guilty then,
Whom you there name the parasite?
VOLTORE. Grave fathers,
No more than his good patron, old Volpone.
4 AVOCATORI. Why, he is dead.
VOLTORE. O no, my honoured fathers,
He lives.—
1 AVOCATORI. How! lives?
VOLTORE. Lives.
2 AVOCATORI. This is subtler yet!
3 AVOCATORI. You said he was dead.
VOLTORE. Never.
3 AVOCATORI. You said so.
CORVINO. I heard so.
4 AVOCATORI. Here comes the gentleman; make him way.

[Enter Mosca dressed as a clarissimo.]

3 AVOCATORI. A stool!
4 AVOCATORI. A proper° man. [Aside.] handsome
And, were Volpone dead,
A fit match for my daughter.
3 AVOCATORI. Give him way.
VOLPONE. [To Mosca.] Mosca, I was almost lost; the advocate
Had betrayed all; but now it is recovered;
All's o'the hinge° again—Say, I am living. running smoothly

(Aside to Mosca.)

MOSCA. What busy knave is this! Most reverend fathers,
I sooner had attended your grave pleasures,
But that my order for the funeral
Of my dear patron, did require me—
VOLPONE. Mosca!
MOSCA. Whom I intend to bury like a gentleman.
VOLPONE. Aye, quick,° and cozen me of all. alive
2 AVOCATORI. Still stranger!
More intricate!
1 AVOCATORI. And come about[1] again!
4 AVOCATORI. It is a match, my daughter is bestowed.
MOSCA. [To Volpone.] Will you give me half?
VOLPONE. [To Mosca.] First, I'll be hanged.
MOSCA. I know
Your voice is good, cry not so loud.
1 AVOCATORI. Demand° ask
The advocate.—Sir, did you not affirm
Volpone was alive?
VOLPONE. Yes, and he is;
This gentleman told me so. [To Mosca.] Thou shalt have half.—
MOSCA. Whose drunkard is this same? Speak, some that know him:
I never saw his face. [To Volpone.] I cannot now
Afford it you so cheap.
VOLPONE. No!
1 AVOCATORI. What say you?
VOLTORE. The officer told me.
VOLTORE. I did, grave fathers,
And will maintain he lives, with mine own life,
And that this creature told me. [Aside.] I was born
With all good stars my enemies.

---

[1] come about Turned around. 1 Avocatori expresses frustration that Volpone is dead, then alive, now dead again.

MOSCA. Most grave fathers,
If such an insolence as this must pass° be allowed
Upon me, I am silent: 'twas not this
For which you sent, I hope.
2 AVOCATORI. Take him away.
VOLPONE. [To Mosca.] Mosca!
3 AVOCATORI. Let him be whipped.
VOLPONE. Wilt thou betray me?
Cozen me?
3 AVOCATORI. And taught to bear himself
Toward a person of his rank.
4 AVOCATORI. Away.

[Volpone is seized.]

MOSCA. I humbly thank your fatherhoods.
VOLPONE. Soft, soft: Whipped!
And lose all that I have! (Aside.) If I confess,
It cannot be much more.
4 AVOCATORI. Sir, are you married?
VOLPONE. They'll be allied anon;° I must married soon be resolute:
The fox shall here
uncase.° remove his disguise (figuratively his fox's pelt)

(He puts off his disguise.)

MOSCA. Patron![1]
VOLPONE. Nay, now
My ruins shall not come alone; your match
I'll hinder sure: my substance shall not glue you,
Nor screw you into a family.[2]
MOSCA. Why, patron!
VOLPONE. I am Volpone, and this is my knave;

[Pointing to Mosca, Voltore, Corbaccio, Corvino, in turn.]

This, his own knave; this, avarice's fool;
This, a chimera of wittol, fool, and knave:
And, reverend fathers, since we all can hope
Naught but a sentence, let's not now despair it.
You hear me brief.
CORVINO. May it please your fatherhoods—
COMMANDATORI. Silence.
1 AVOCATORI. The knot is now undone by miracle.
2 AVOCATORI. Nothing can be more clear.
3 AVOCATORI. Or can more prove
These innocent.
1 AVOCATORI. Give them their liberty.
BONARIO. Heaven could not long let such gross crimes be hid.
2 AVOCATORI. If this be held the high-way to get riches,
May I be poor!
3 AVOCATORI. This is not the gain, but torment.
1 AVOCATORI. These possess wealth, as sick men possess fevers,
Which trulier may be said to possess them.
2 AVOCATORI. Disrobe that parasite.
CORVINO, MOSCA. Most honoured fathers!—
1 AVOCATORI. Can you plead aught to stay the course of justice!
If you, can speak.
CORVINO, VOLTORE. We beg favour.
CELIA. And mercy.
1 AVOCATORI. You hurt your innocence, suing for the guilty.
Stand forth; and first the parasite: You appear
T'have been the chiefest minister, if not plotter,
In all these lewd impostures; and now, lastly,
Have with your impudence abused the court,
And habit of a gentleman of Venice,
Being a fellow of no birth or blood:
For which our sentence is, first, thou be whipped;
Then live perpetual prisoner in our galleys.
VOLPONE. I thank you for him.
MOSCA. Bane to thy wolvish nature!
1 AVOCATORI. Deliver him to the Saffi.[3] By blood and rank a gentleman, canst not fall
Under like censure; but our judgment on thee
Is, that thy substance all be straight confiscate
To the hospital of the Incurabili:[4]
And, since the most was gotten by imposture,

---

[1] Patron Mosca pretends to be startled back into a servile role.

[2] my substance ... family You will not use my wealth to insinuate yourself into a marriage by sympathy or guile.

[3] Deliver him ... Saffi There is no indication that Mosca or Volpone exit here; tradition has Volpone remain onstage throughout the sentencing.

[4] Incurabili The Hospital for Incurables was created for the treatment of sexually transmitted diseases in 1522.

By feigning lame, gout, palsy, and such diseases,
Thou art to lie in prison, cramped with irons,
Till thou be'st sick and lame indeed.—Remove him.
VOLPONE. This is called mortifying[1] of a Fox.
1 AVOCATORI. Thou, Voltore, to take away the scandal
Thou hast given all worthy men of thy profession,
Art banished from their fellowship, and our state.
Corbaccio—bring him near—we here possess
Thy son of all thy state, and confine thee
To the monastery of San Spirito;[2]
Where, since thou knew'st not how to live well here,
Thou shalt be learned to die well.
CORBACCIO. Ah! What said he?
COMMANDATORI. You shall know anon, sir.
1 AVOCATORI. Thou, Corvino, shalt
Be straight embarked from thine own house, and rowed
Round about Venice, through the Grand Canale,[3]
Wearing a cap, with fair long ass's ears,
Instead of horns; and so to mount, a paper
Pinned on thy breast, to the Berlino—° pillory
CORVINO. Yes,
And have mine eyes beat out with stinking fish,
Bruised fruit, and rotten eggs—'Tis well. I am glad
I shall not see my shame yet.
1 AVOCATORI. And to expiate
Thy wrongs done to thy wife, thou art to send her
Home to her father, with her dowry trebled:
And these are all your judgments—
ALL. Honoured fathers!
1 AVOCATORI. Which may not be revoked. Now you begin,
When crimes are done, and past, and to be punished,
To think what your crimes are: away with them.
Let all that see these vices thus rewarded,
Take heart and love to study 'em! Mischiefs feed
Like beasts, till they be fat, and then they bleed.

[Exeunt.]

VOLPONE. The seasoning of a play, is the applause.
Now, though the Fox be punished by the laws,
He yet doth hope, there is no suffering due,
For any fact° which he hath done 'gainst you; crime
If there be, censure him; here he doubtful stands.
If not, fare jovially, and clap your hands.

[Exit.]

[1] mortifying A pun: Humiliating; sentencing to death; tenderizing game by hanging it or keeping it alive before slaughtering it; disposing of property for religious or charitable purposes; rendering the flesh dead by spiritual discipline; giving one gangrene.

[2] San Spirito The monastery of the Holy Spirit.

[3] Canale The Italian pronunciation, with three syllables.

IN CONTEXT

Sources for Volpone

The fox as a trickster is a character with deep roots in the stories of many cultures (Aesop himself was said to have been a slave from Africa, eventually freed because of his talent). In writing Volpone Jonson also drew on a variety of other classical texts, including Horace's Satires (for his portrayals of hunting and of old age); "The Cock" by Lucian, Syrian author of satires in Greek (for the treatment of Pythagoras in the comic byplay of Act 1); and the anti-feminist Latin satires of Juvenal (for the character of Lady Politic Would-be).

from Aesop, Fables (6th century BCE)

The raven seized a piece of cheese and carried his spoils up to his perch high in a tree. A fox came up and walked in circles around the raven, planning a trick. "What is this," cried the fox. "O raven, the elegant proportions of your body are remarkable and you have a complexion that is worthy of the king of birds. If only you had a voice to match, you would be the first among the fowl!" The fox said these things to trick the raven, and the raven fell for it; he let out a great squawk and dropped his cheese. By showing off his voice, the raven let go of his spoils. The fox grabbed the cheese and said, "O raven, you do have a voice, but no brains to go with it!"

If you follow your enemies' advice, you will get hurt.

from Thomas Wilson, Art of Rhetoric (1553)

Themisticles persuaded the Athenians not to change their officers by rehearsing the fable of the scabbed Fox. For (quoth he) when many flies stood feeding upon his raw flesh and had well fed themselves, he was contented at another's persuasion to have slapped them away: whereupon there ensued such hungry flies afterwards that the sorry Fox, being all alone, was eaten up almost to the hard bone, and therefore cursed the time that ever he agreed to any such evil counsel.

from Horace, Satires, 2.5.48–63 (c. 35 BCE)

Then again, if a sickly son,
Has been born the one to be reared in a wealthy household,
Worm your way into the father's good graces, in the hope
Of being named second heir—you mustn't make it obvious
That you specialize mainly in bachelors—and also in the hope
That if some chance spirits the child off to the hereafter,
You may come into the property. This kind of gambit
Seldom fails.
If someone gives you his will to read,
Refuse, and push the tablets away, with a sidelong
Glance at the second line on page one. Run your eyes
Swiftly across it to see if you are the sole heir

Or share with many co-heirs. Some night-court judge,
Newly tricked out in the professional robes of a scribe,
Will often be able to outwit the ravenous crow,
The way Coranus made a fool of the legacy hunter,
Nasica.

from Lucian, Gallus (2nd century CE)

COCK

Have you ever heard of a man named Pythagoras, the son of Mnesarchus, of Samos?

MICYLLUS

You mean the sophist, the quack, who made laws against tasting meat and eating beans, banishing from the table the food that I for my part like the best of all, and then trying to persuade people that before he became Pythagoras he was Euphorbus (well fed)? They say he was a conjurer and a miracle worker, Cock.

COCK

I am that very Pythagoras, Micyllus, so stop abusing me, my good friend, especially as you do not know what sort of man I really was....

COCK

How my soul originally left Apollo, flew down to earth and entered a human body and what sin it was condemned to expiate in that way would make a long story: besides, it is impious either for me to tell or for you to hear such things. But when I became Euphorbus ... In brief, Micyllus, I was a sophist, for I must tell the truth, I suppose. However, I was not uneducated or unacquainted with the noblest sciences. I even went to Egypt to study with the prophets, penetrated into their sanctuaries and learned the books of Horus and Isis by heart, and then I sailed away to Italy and worked upon the Greeks in that quarter of the world to such an extent that they thought me a god.

MICYLLUS

So I have heard, and I have also heard that you were thought to have come to life again after dying, and that you once showed them that your thigh was of gold. But, look here, tell me how it occurred to you to make a law against eating either meat or beans?

COCK

It was nothing sensible or wise, but I perceived that if I made laws that were ordinary and just like those of the run of legislators I should not induce men to wonder at me, whereas the more I departed from precedent, the more of a figure I should cut, I thought, in their eyes.... Look here, you are laughing at me, now.

MICYLLUS

... But after you put off the part of Pythagoras what other did you assume?

COCK

Aspasia, the courtesan from Miletus....

MICYLLUS

But what man or woman did you become after Aspasia?

COCK

The Cynic Crates.

MICYLLUS

Twin brethren! what ups and downs! First a courtesan, then a philosopher!

COCK

Then a king, then a poor man, and soon a satrap; then a horse, a jackdaw, a frog, and a thousand things besides; it would take too long to enumerate them all. But of late I have often been a cock, for I liked that sort of life …

from Juvenal, Satires, Satire 10, 2.188–241; 2.434–56 (2nd century CE)

"Grant us a long life, Jupiter, O grant us many years!"
In the bloom of youth it's this which, pale with anxiety,
You pray for, and this alone. Yet how grisly, how unrelenting
Are longevity's ills! Look first at your face, you'll see an ugly
And shapeless caricature of its former self: your skin
Has become a scaly hide, you're all chapfallen, the wrinkles
Scored down your cheeks now make you resemble nothing so much
As some elderly female baboon in darkest Africa.
Young men are all individuals: A will have better looks
Or brains than B, while B will beat A on muscle;
But old men all look alike, all share the same bald pate,
Their noses all drip like an infant's, their voices tremble
As much as their limbs, they mumble their bread with toothless
Gums. It's a wretched life for them, they become a burden
To their wives, their children, themselves; the noblest and best of them
Become so loathsome a sight that even legacy-hunters
Turn queasy. Their taste-buds are ruined, they get scant pleasure
From food or wine, sex lies in long oblivion—
Or if they try, it's hopeless: though they labour all night long
At that limp and shrivelled object, limp it remains.
What can the future hold for these impotent dodderers?
Nothing very exciting. Sex is a pretty dead loss—
The old tag's true—when desire outruns performance.
The other senses deteriorate: take hearing, for instance.
How can the deaf appreciate music? The standard
Of the performance eludes them: a top-line soloist,
Massed choirs in their golden robes, all mean less than nothing.
What does it matter to them where they sit in the concert-hall
When a brass band blowing its guts out is barely audible?
The slave who announces the time, or a visitor, must bawl
At the top of his lungs before they take in the message.

The blood runs thin with age, too: now nothing but fever
Can warm that frigid hulk, while diseases of every type Assault it by battalions. (If you asked me their names
I'd find it less trouble to list all of Oppia's lovers,
The number of patients Doc Themison kills each autumn,
The partners that X, the wards that Y has defrauded,
The times tall Maura goes down in a day, the pupils
Hamillus has off; I could sooner list all the country houses Owned by the barber who shaved me when I was a lad.)
One has an arthritic hip, another sciatica,
Lumbago plagues a third, while the totally sightless
Envy the one-eyed. Here's a fellow whose jaws would open
Wide, once long ago, at the prospect of dinner—but now
Those leaden lips must mumble the tit-bits another hand
Feeds to him; when he gapes today, he's like a baby
Swallow that sees its mother approaching, her beak
Well-crammed with grubs. But worse than all bodily ills
Is the senescent mind. Men forget what their own servants
Are called, they can't recognize yesterday's host at dinner,
Or, finally, the children they begot and brought up. A heartless
Codicil to the will disinherits their flesh and blood,
And the whole estate is entailed to some whore, whose expert mouth—
After years in that narrow archway—earns her a rich reward....

Worse still is the well-read menace, who's hardly settled for dinner
Before she starts praising Virgil, making a moral case
For Dido (death justifies all), comparing, evaluating
In opposite scales, weighed up one against the other.
Critics surrender, academics are routed, all
Fall silent, not a word from lawyer or auctioneer—
Or even another woman. Such a rattle or talk,
You'd think all the pots and bells were being clashed together
When the moon's in eclipse. No need now for trumpets or brass:
One woman can act, single-handed, as lunar midwife.
But wisdom imposes limits, even on virtue, and if
She's so determined to prove herself eloquent, learned,
She should hoist up her skirts and gird them above the knee,
Offer a pig to Silvanus (female worshippers banned) and Scrub off in the penny baths. So avoid a dinner partner
With an argumentative style, who hurls well rounded
Syllogisms like slingshots, who has all history pat:
Choose someone rather who doesn't understand all she reads.
I hate these authority-citers, the sort who are always thumbing
Some standard grammatical treatise, whose every utterance
Observes all the laws of syntax, who with antiquarian zeal
Quote poets I've never heard of. Such matters are men's concerns.
If she wants to correct someone's language, she can always Start with her unlettered girl-friends. A husband should be allowed
His solecisms in peace.

IN CONTEXT

Venice: Mountebanks and Courtesans

Venice occupied a unique place in the Renaissance imagination and travel narratives that involved Venice were highly popular. These excerpts below are from a travelogue published a few years after Volpone appeared.

from Thomas Coryate, Coryat's Crudities[1] (1611)

... I hope it will not be esteemed for an impertinency to my discourse, if I next speak of the mountebanks of Venice, seeing amongst many other things that do much famous this city, these two sorts of people, namely the courtesans and the mountebanks are not the least: for although there are Mountebanks also in other cities of Italy; yet because there is a greater concourse of them in Venice than elsewhere, and also for that there is a larger toleration of them here than in other cities (for in Rome, &c. they are restrained from certain matters as I have heard which are here allowed them) therefore they use to name a Venetian mountebank χατ' έζοχηυ for the corphaeus and principal mountebank of all Italy: neither do I much doubt but that this treatise of them will be acceptable to some readers, as being a mere novelty never before heard of (I think) by thousands of our English gallants. Surely the principal reason that hath induced me to make mention of them is, because when I was in Venice, they oftentimes ministered infinite pleasure unto me.

The principal place where they act, is the first part of Saint Mark's Street that reacheth betwixt the west front of St. Mark's Church, and the opposite front of Saint Geminian's Church. In which, twice a day, that is, in the morning and in the afternoon, you may see five or six several stages erected for them: those that act upon the ground, even the foresaid charlatans being the poorer sort of them, stand most commonly in the second part of St. Mark's, not far from the gate of the Duke's Palace. These mountebanks at one end of their stage place their trunk, which is replenished with a world of new fangled trumperies. After the whole rabble of them is gotten up to the stage, whereof some wear vizards being disguised like fools in a play, some that are women (for there are diverse women also amongst them) are attired with habits according to that person that they sustain; after (I say) they are all upon the stage, the music begins. Sometimes vocal, sometimes instrumental, and sometimes both together. This music is a preamble and introduction to the ensuing matter: in the meantime while the music plays, the principal mountebank which is the captain and ring-leader of all the rest, opens his trunk, and sets abroach his wares; after the music hath ceased, he maketh an oration to the audience of half an hour long, or almost an hour. Wherein he doth most hyperbolically extol the virtue of his drugs and confections:

[1] Coryat's Crudities Please note that a larger selection of material from Coryat's Crudities is available in the online component of this anthology. A stand-alone volume is also available as part of over 400 editions from Broadview.

[2] Laudat ... merces From Horace, Epistles 2.2.11: "He who praises his merchandise is trying to get rid of it."

Though many of them are very counterfeit and false. Truly I often wondered at many of these natural orators. For they would tell their tales with such admirable volubility and plausible grace, even extempore, and seasoned with that singular variety of elegant jests and witty conceits, that they did often strike great admiration into strangers that never heard them before: and by how much more eloquent these naturalists are, by so much the greater audience they draw unto them, and the more ware they sell. After the chiefest mountebank's first speech is ended, he delivereth out his commodities by little and little, the jester still playing his part, and the musicians singing and playing upon their instruments. The principal things that they sell are oils, sovereign waters, amorous songs printed, apothecary drugs, and a commonweal of other trifles. The head mountebank at every time that he delivereth out any thing, maketh an extemporal speech, which he doth eftsoons intermingle with such savory jests (but spiced now and then with singular scurrility) that they minister passing mirth and laughter to the whole company, which perhaps may consist of a thousand people that flock together about one of their stages....

As for the number of these Venetian courtesans it is very great ... A most ungodly thing without doubt that there should be a toleration of such licentious wantons in so glorious, so potent, so renowned a city ... For they think that the chastity of their wives would be the sooner assaulted, and so consequently they should be capricornified (which of all the indignities in the world the Venetian cannot patiently endure), were it not for these places of evacuation. But I marvel how that should be true though these courtesans were utterly rooted out of the city. For the gentlemen do even coop up their wives always within the walls of their houses for fear of these inconveniences, as much as if there were no courtesans at all in the city. So that you shall very seldom see a Venetian gentleman's wife but either at a solemnization of a great marriage, or at the christening of a Jew, or late in the evening rowing in a gondola.

THOMAS DEKKER

c. 1572 – 1632

A writer whose more than thirty-five year career spanned the reigns of Elizabeth I, James I, and Charles I, Thomas Dekker was a highly productive playwright and the author of a rich body of pamphlets, with over seventy separately issued publications on record. It is for comedy that Dekker is currently best known—most notably as author of The Shoemaker's Holiday (c. 1599) and as co-author of The Roaring Girl (c. 1607).

A reflection of the social and economic situation in London at the time as well as of popular cultural responses to urban life, Dekker's writing is lively and diverse. Its value is far more than historical; Dekker's portraits of Londoners in the late sixteenth and early seventeenth centuries are consistently vivid, each with illuminating attention to class and gender, work and leisure, and marriage and money. His writing is as thought-provoking and emotionally engaging as it is entertaining, offering an oddly graceful blend of the outlandish and the everyday, the serious and the grotesquely amusing.

As is the case for most people of the time, there are no records regarding Dekker's early life. He is believed to have been born around 1572, likely in London, where it seems from his writings that he lived most of his life. If he was a commoner, as suggested by his writing, he would not have attended university, but his frequent use of Latin and extensive knowledge of Classical authors indicate that he attended grammar school.

By the early 1590s, evidence suggests, Dekker had become active as a dramatist in London: for example, the play Sir Thomas More (c. 1592–94) survives in a manuscript composed of six handwriting styles, of which Dekker's has been identified as one. (The others are thought to include Anthony Munday, Henry Chettle, and William Shakespeare.) The first named record of Dekker appears in the diary of theater manager Philip Henslowe, under a list of payments to dramatists in 1603.

From 1598 to 1602, Dekker appears to have worked consistently for Henslowe and the Admiral's Men theater company. Over this time he was involved in the writing of at least forty plays, including collaborative work, revisions, and the composition of prologues or epilogues. Among the plays that survive from this period, some of the more notable include Patient Grissel (1599), a collaboratively written comedy based on a tale that appears in both Boccaccio's Decameron and Chaucer's Canterbury Tales; the comic allegory Old Fortunatus (1599), written solely by Dekker, which tells of the beggar Fortunatus's life after lady Fortune allows him a choice between either riches or wisdom, good health, and longevity, and he chooses riches; and the play that has become his best-known work, The Shoemaker's Holiday, or The Gentle Craft (1599), a city comedy relating the story of a young nobleman who hides his identity and apprentices as a shoemaker in his efforts to win the love of Rose, a young woman of humble background whom his father forbids him to marry. The play touches on the politics of war as well as that of class—provocative subject matter at a time when Elizabeth's expenditures on the military were controversial, and apprentices had rioted in London in the face of economic hardship. At the end of the play, the shoemaker Simon Eyre becomes Lord Mayor of London—a conclusion inspired by history (the chronicles record one Simon Eyre, draper, as mayor in 1445).

From 1599 through 1601 Dekker was also involved in what came to be known as "the war of the theatres." The "war" began at the hand of the playwright John Marston, who insulted Ben Jonson in a 1599 play. Jonson responded to Marston in another play the same year; Marston responded in a play from 1600; and then in another play that year Jonson took aim both at Marston and at Dekker, portraying the latter as a "strange, arrogating puff" of a character. The attacks continued through at least three other plays, ending with Dekker's attacks on Jonson in the 1601 play Satiromastix. It is difficult to determine to what extent this "war" was animated by genuine hostility; for example, it is noteworthy that Jonson later collaborated both with Marston (in playwriting) and with Dekker (on pageants and speeches for the coronation of James I), and it would not be surprising generally if these playwrights devised this battle of wits as a means to drum up business, and perhaps to engage in a bit of what we would now call literary criticism. With respect to Dekker's personal life in these years, he married and had three daughters, Dorcas, Elizabeth, and Anne, and perhaps a son named Thomas. He was also imprisoned for debt.

In 1603 to 1604, the theaters closed for an extended period, first to mark the death of Queen Elizabeth I, and then as a result of an outbreak of the plague. During such times playwrights often turned to other genres in order to support themselves. (Shakespeare, for example, composed the long poem Venus and Adonis during a period of plague in 1593.) In 1603 Dekker published The Wonderful Year, a pamphlet that depicted "London, lying sick of the plague," while also eulogizing Elizabeth I.

When the theaters reopened in 1604, Dekker returned to playwriting, bringing out another play that has become very well-known, The Roaring Girl (c. 1607–10, co-written with Thomas Middleton). The play, which is still sometimes performed, is a comedy concerning the respectable young Sebastian, who pretends to be smitten by the "man-woman" Moll Cutpurse (the "roaring girl"), a cross-dressing inhabitant of London's disreputable underworld. Also during these years, on the heels of the Gunpowder Plot of 1605, Dekker authored two works of anti-Catholic sentiment: the brief pamphlet The Double PP and the play The Whore of Babylon (both c. 1606).

For some years thereafter, Dekker focused on non-dramatic writing. Of his many pamphlets, two of the most successful were The Bellman of London (1608) and its sequel Lantern and Candlelight (1608)—both lurid accounts of crimes, which he would continue to revise and re-issue for many years. During this period, Dekker was again imprisoned for debt, serving in the King's Bench Prison for nearly seven years, during which time his wife Mary died. Dekker managed to continue writing pamphlets and revising his work while imprisoned. Upon his release he issued Dekker in His Dream (1620), a poetical pamphlet inspired by his prison experience that was "dreamlike" in that it offered a personal vision of the Last Judgment and Hell.

Over the next decade Dekker's career as a dramatist enjoyed a modest revival. He contributed to The Witch of Edmonton (1621)—a notable domestic tragedy co-written with William Rowley and John Ford, based on the real trial and execution of a woman for witchcraft that same year. In this decade, Dekker also wrote two more pamphlets, occasioned by the arrival of another plague soon after the 1625 death of James I.

In the last years of Dekker's life, it appears that he remarried. "Thomas Decker, householder," was buried in 1632 at St. James, Clerkenwell; it is likely that this is our dramatist and pamphleteer, whose diverse portraits of life in early modern London are suffused with warm understanding of human weakness, peculiarities, and the need for cheer in difficult times.

from The Wonderful Year, Wherein Is Showed the Picture of London, Lying Sick of the Plague[1]

… Such was the fashion[2] of this land, when the great Landlady[3] thereof left it: she came in with the fall of the leaf, and went away in the spring, her life (which was dedicated to virginity) both beginning and closing up a miraculous maiden circle, … her nativity and death being memorable by this wonder, the first and last years of her reign by this: that a Lee was Lord Mayor when she came to the crown, and a Lee Lord Mayor when she departed from it. Three places are made famous by her for three things: Greenwich for her birth, Richmond for her death, Whitehall for her funeral—upon her removing from whence (to lend our tiring[4] prose a breathing time), stay, and look upon these epigrams, being composed.

1. Upon the Queen's last remove, being dead
The Queen's removed in solemn sort
Yet this was strange, and seldom seen,
The Queen used to remove the Court,
But now the Court removed the Queen.[5]

2. Upon her bringing by water to Whitehall
The Queen was brought by water to Whitehall
At every stroke the oars' tears let fall.
More clung about the barge: fish under water
Wept out their eyes of pearl, and swum blind after. …

3. Upon her lying dead at Whitehall
The Queen now lies at Whitehall dead
And now at Whitehall living,
To make this rough objection even,
Dead at Whitehall[6] in Westminster,
But living at Whitehall in heaven.

Thus you see that both in her life and her death she was appointed to be the mirror of her time. And surely, if … there was ever a year ordained to be wondered at [as much as is 1603], it is only this: … that same terrible '88, which came sailing hither in the Spanish Armada, and made men's hearts colder than the frozen zone, when they heard but an inkling of it—that '88 by whose horrible predictions almanac-makers stood in terrible fear [that] their trade would be utterly overthrown, … that same '88 which had more prophecies waiting at his heels than ever Merlin the Magician had in his head—was a year of Jubilee to this[7] … for that title of wonderful[8] is bestowed upon 1603. …

At first, to begin with the Queen's death, then the kingdom's falling into an ague[9] upon that. Next follows the curing of that fever by the wholesome receipt[10] of a proclaimed king. That wonder begat more, for in an hour two mighty nations were made one: wild Ireland became tame on the sudden, and some English great ones that before seemed tame, on the sudden turned wild. … And last of all (if that wonder be the last and shut up the year), a most dreadful plague. This is the abstract. … while I have the quill in my hand, let me blow them bigger. …

A stiff and freezing horror sucks up the rivers of my blood: my hair stands on end with the panting of my brains: my eyeballs are ready to start out, being beaten with the billows of my tears: out of my weeping pen does the ink mournfully and more bitterly than gall drop on the pale-faced paper, even when I do but think how the bowels of my sick country have been torn, Apollo therefore and you bewitching silver-tonged muses, get you gone, invocate none of your names: sorrow and truth, sit you on each side of me, while I am delivered of this deadly burden: prompt me that I may utter ruthful and passionate condolement:[1] arm my trembling hand, that it may boldly rip up and anatomize[2] the ulcerous body of this Anthropophagized[3] plague: lend me art (without any counterfeit shadowing) to paint and delineate to the life the whole story of this mortal and pestiferous battle, & you the ghosts of those more (by many) than 40000 that with the virulent poison of infection have been driven out of your earthly dwellings: you desolate hand-wringing widows, that beat your bosoms over your departing husbands: you woefully distracted mothers that with dishevelled hair fallen into swounds,[4] while you lie kissing the insensible cold lips of your breathless infants: you outcast and downtrodden orphans, that shall many a year hence remember more freshly to mourn, when your mourning garments shall look old and be forgotten: and you the Genii[5] of all those emptied families whose habitations now among the Antipodes: join your hands together, and with your bodies cast a ring about me: let me behold your ghastly visages,[6] that my paper may receive their true pictures: echo forth your groans through the hollow trunk of my pen, and rain down your gummy tears into my ink, that even marble bosoms may be shaken with terror, and hearts of adamant[7] melt into compassion.

[1] The Wonderful Year … the Plague Like all editions, the present text, which has been edited for this anthology by John Geddert and Rebecca Totaro, derives ultimately from the sole known copy of the 1603 pamphlet, in the Bodleian Library. Spelling and punctuation are here modernized, in accordance with the practice of this anthology.

[2] fashion State, condition.

[3] great Landlady Elizabeth I.

[4] tiring Becoming weak or exhausted from exertion.

[5] Queen used … the Queen The Queen used to issue instructions for her court to move from one place to another, but now the members of the Court are moving her [dead body] about.

[6] Whitehall The street known as Whitehall in the area of Westminster in London was (and still is) the location of the most important government buildings.

[7] Jubilee to this Jubilation by comparison with this year.

[8] wonderful To be wondered at (lacking clearly positive connotation).

[9] ague Sickness with fever.

[10] receipt Reception. James VI of Scotland was crowned James I of England following Elizabeth's death. A "receipt" at the time also meant "recipe," which was another word for a medical preparation, the contents of which were typically herbs and other products a housewife could prepare. The arrival of James is a healthful remedy.

What an unmatchable torment were it for a man to be barred up every night in a vast silent charnel house?[8] Hung (to make it more hideous) with lamps dimly & slowly burning, in hollow and glimmering corners: where all the pavement should instead of green rushes,[9] be strewed with blasted rosemary: withered hyacinths, fatal cypress and yew,[10] thickly mingled with heaps of dead men's bones: the bare ribs of a father that begat him, lying there: here the chapless[11] hollow skull of a mother that bore him: round about him a thousand corpses, some standing bolt upright in their knotted winding sheets: others half mouldered[12] in rotted coffins, that should suddenly yawn wide open, filling his nostrils with noisome stench, and his eyes with the sight of nothing but crawling worms. And to keep such a poor wretch waking, he should hear no noise but of toads croaking, screech-owls howling, mandrakes shrieking:[13] were not this an infernal prison? Would not the strongest hearted man (beset with such a ghastly horror) look wild and run mad? And die? And even such a formidable shape did the diseased city appear in: for he that dares (in the dead hour of gloomy midnight) have been so valiant, as to have walked through the still and melancholy streets, what think you should have been his music? Surely the loud groans of raving sick men; the struggling pangs of souls departing: in every house grief striking up an alarm: servants crying out for masters: wives for husbands, parents for children, children for their mothers: here he should have met some frantically running to knock up sextons;[14] there, others fearfully sweating with coffins, to steal forth dead bodies, lest the fatal handwriting of death should seal up their doors.[15] And to make this dismal consort more full, round about him bells heavily tolling in one place, and ringing out in another: the dreadfulness of such an hour, is unutterable: let us go further.

[1] condolement Lamentation.

[2] anatomize Dissect.

[3] Anthropophagized Turned cannibal.

[4] swounds Swoons.

[5] Genii Plural of the "genius" of classical pagan belief, protective spirit who governs an individual's fortune and eventually provides an escort to the afterlife.

[6] visages Faces.

[7] adamant Stone of extraordinary hardness.

[8] charnel house Vault or house for storage of dead bodies.

[9] rushes Plant commonly scattered as a floor covering in Elizabethan households.

[10] rosemary … yew The plants mentioned were commonly used at funerals.

[11] chapless Without the lower jaw.

[12] half mouldered Half turned to dust; decayed.

[13] mandrakes shrieking The mandrake plant, which was credited with having medicinal properties, would purportedly shriek when pulled from the ground, killing whoever heard the sound.

[14] sextons Church officers who oversee material affairs, especially, in this context, ringing bells and digging graves.

[15] steal forth … their doors Sneak bodies out of the house so as to avoid being quarantined.

If some poor man, suddenly starting out of a sweet and golden slumber, should behold his house flaming about his ears, all his family destroyed in their sleep by the merciless fire; himself in the very midst of it, woefully and like a madman calling for help: would not the misery of such a distressed soul appear the greater, if the rich usurer dwelling next door to him should not stir, (though he felt part of the danger) but suffer him to perish, when the thrusting out of an arm might have saved him? O how many thousands of wretched people have acted this poor man's part? How often has the amazed husband waking, found the comfort of his bed lying breathless by his side! His children at the same instant gasping for life! And his servants, mortally wounded at the heart by sickness! The distracted creature, beats at death's door, exclaims at windows, his cries are sharp enough to pierce heaven, but on earth no ear is opened to receive them.

And in this manner do the tedious minutes of the night stretch out the sorrows of ten thousand: It is now day, let us look forth and try what consolation rises with the sun: not any, not any: for before the jewel of the morning be fully set in silver, hundred hungry graves stand gaping, and every one of them (as at a breakfast) has swallowed down ten or eleven lifeless carcasses: before dinner, in the same gulf are twice so many more devoured: and before the sun takes his rest, those numbers are doubled: threescore that not many hours before had every one several lodgings very delicately furnished, are now thrust altogether into one close room: a little, little noisome room: not fully ten foot square. Does not this strike coldly to your heart of a worldly miser? To some, the very sound of death's name is instead of a passing-bell:[1] what shall become of such a coward, being told that the selfsame body of his, which now is so pampered with superfluous fare, so perfumed and bathed in odoriferous waters,[2] and so gaily apparelled in variety of fashions, must one day be thrown (like stinking carrion) into a rank & rotten grave; where his goodly eyes, that did once shoot forth such amorous glances, must be eaten out of his head: his locks that hang wantonly dangling, trodden in dirt underfoot: this doubtless (like thunder) must needs strike him into the earth. But (wretched man!) when you shall see, and be assured (by tokens sent to you from heaven) that tomorrow you must be tumbled into a muck-pit, and suffer your body to be bruised and pressed with threescore dead men, lying slovenly upon you, and you to be undermost of all! Yea and perhaps half of that number were your enemies! (And see how they may be revenged, for the worms that breed out of their putrefying carcasses, shall crawl in huge swarms from them, and quite devour you.) What agonies will this strange news drive you into? If you are in love with yourself, this cannot choose but possess you with frenzy. But you are gotten safe (out of the civil city calamity) to your parks and palaces in the country, loading your asses and your mules with your gold, (your god), your plate, and your jewels: and the fruits of your womb thriftily growing up but in one only son, (the young Landlord of all your careful labours) him also have you rescued from the arrows of infection; now is your soul jocund, and your senses merry. But open your eyes, you fool! And behold that darling of your eye, (your son) turned suddenly into a lump of clay; the hand of pestilence has smote him even under your wing: now do you rent your hair, blaspheme your Creator, curse your creation, and basely descend into brutish & unmanly passions, threatening in spite of death & his plague to maintain the memory of your child, in the everlasting breast of marble: a tomb must now defend him from tempests: and for that purpose, the sweaty hind[3] (that digs the rent he pays you out of the entrails of the earth) he is sent for, to convey forth that burden of your sorrow: but note how your pride is disdained: that weather-beaten sun-burnt drudge, that not a month since fawned upon your worship like a spaniel, and like a bond-slave, would have stooped lower than your feet, does now stop his nose at thy presence, and is ready to set his mastiff as high as your throat, to drive you from his door: all your gold and silver cannot hire one of those (whom before you did scorn) to carry the dead body to his last home: the country round about you shun you, as a basilisk,[1] and therefore to London (from whose arms you cowardly fled away) post upon post must be galloping, to fetch from thence those that may perform that funeral office: but there are they so full of grave-matters of their own, that they have no leisure to attend yours: does not this cut your very heartstrings in sunder? If that does not, the shutting up of the tragic act I am sure will: for you must be enforced with your own hands, to wind up (that blasted flower of youth) in the last linen, that he shall wear: upon your own shoulders must you bear part of him, your amazed servant the other: with your own hands must you dig his grave, (not in the Church, or common place of burial,) you have not favour (for all thy riches) to be so happy, but in your orchard, or in the proud walks of your garden, wringing your palsy-shaking hands instead of bells, (most miserable father) must you search him out a sepulchre.[2]

[1] passing-bell I.e., a bell rung for a death or funeral.

[2] odoriferous waters Fragrant perfumes.

[3] hind Household servant.

My spirit grows faint with rowing in this Stygian ferry,[3] it can no longer endure the transportation of souls in this doleful manner: let us therefore shift a point of our compass, and (since there is no remedy, but that we must still be tossed up and down in this Mare mortuum[4]) hoist up all our sails, and on the merry wings of a lustier wind seek to arrive on some prosperous shore.

Let us … return back to the siege of the city, for the enemy … planted his ordinance against the walls: here the cannons (their great bells) roared: the plague took sore pains for a breach: he laid about him cruelly ere he could get it, but at length his tyrannous band entered: his purple colours[5] were … advanced, and joined to the standard of the city; he marched even through Cheapside … the only blot of dishonour that struck upon this invader being this, that he played the tyrant, not the conqueror, making havoc of all, when he had all lying at the foot of his mercy. Men, women, & children dropped down before him: houses were rifled, streets ransacked, beautiful maidens thrown on their beds, and ravished by sickness: rich men's coffers broken open, and shared amongst prodigal heirs and unthrifty servants, poor men used poorly, but not pitifully; he did very much hurt, yet some say he did very much good. Howsoever he behaved himself this intelligence runs current, that every house looked like S. Bartholomew's Hospital … Lazarus[6] lay groaning at every man's door. Marry, no Dives[7] was within to send him a crumb, … nor a dog left to lick up his sores, for they (like curs) were knocked down like oxen, and fell thicker than acorns.

I am amazed to remember what dead marches were made of three thousand trooping together; husbands, wives & children, being led as ordinarily to one grave, as if they had gone to one bed. And those that could shift for a time, and shrink their heads out of the collar[8] (as many did) yet went they (most bitterly) miching[9] and muffled up & down with rue and wormwood stuffed into their ears and nostrils, looking like so many boar's heads stuck with branches of rosemary, to be served in for brawn[10] at Christmas.

This was a rare world for the Church, who had wont to complain for want of living, and now had more living thrust upon her, than she knew how to bestow.… Sextons gave out, if they might (as they hoped) continue these doings but a twelvemonth longer, they and their posterity would all ride upon footcloths[11] to the end of the world … Cursed they were I am sure by some to the pity of hell, for tearing money out of their throats, that had not a cross in their purses. But alas! they must have it, it is their fee, and therefore give the devil his due:

[1] basilisk Mythical reptile whose breath and gaze are lethal.

[2] sepulchre Burial place; building or vault made for the interment of a body.

[3] Stygian ferry Boat of Charon, the mythic ferryman who guided dead souls across the river Styx to the underworld.

[4] Mare mortuum Latin: Sea of dead.

[5] colours Military flags.

[6] Lazarus Biblical dead man resurrected by Christ. Used to refer to a leper or beggar.

[7] Marry Variant of Mary, as in the Virgin Mary, used as an expression of surprise, outrage, or for emphasis; Dives Latin: Rich. Refers to the "rich man" of the parable in Luke 16, but also used generically.

[8] collar Noose.

[9] miching Lurking, skulking.

[10] brawn Dish of fattened boar.

[11] footcloth Decorative covering placed on the back of a horse or mule—a sign of status.

only herb-wives[1] and gardeners (that never prayed before, unless it were for rain or fair weather,) were now day and night upon their marrowbone,[2] that God would bless the labours of those mole-catchers,[3] because they suck sweetness by this; for the price of flowers, herbs, and garlands, rose wonderfully, in so much that rosemary which had wont to be sold for twelve pence an armful, went now for six shillings a handful. …

In this pitiful (or rather pitiless) perplexity stood London, forsaken like a lover, forlorn like a widow, and disarmed of all comfort: disarmed I may well say, for five rapiers[4] were not stirring all this time, and those that were worn, had never been seen, if any money could have been lent upon them, so hungry is the ostrich[5] disease, that it will devour even iron: let us therefore with bag & baggage march away from this dangerous sore city, and visit those that are fled into the country. But alas! … you are peppered[6] if you visit them, for they are visited already: the broad arrow of death, flies there up & down, as swiftly as it does here: they that rode on the lustiest geldings,[7] could not out-gallop the Plague. It overtook them, and overturned them too, horse and foot.

You whom the arrows of pestilence have reached at eighteen and twenty score … you that sickening in the highway, would have been glad of a bed in an hospital, and dying in the open fields, have been buried like dogs, how much better had it been for you, to have lain fuller of boils and plague sores than ever did Job,[8] so you might in that extremity have received both bodily & spiritual comfort, which there was denied you? For those misbelieving pagans, the plough-drivers, those worse than infidels, that (like their swine) never look up so high as Heaven: when citizens boarded them[9] they wrung their hands, and wished rather they had fallen into the hands of Spaniards: for the sight of a flat-cap was more dreadful to a lob, then the discharging of a caliver[10]. …

Never let any man ask me what became of our physicians in this massacre, they hid their synodical[11] heads as well as the proudest: and I cannot blame them, … their drugs turned to dirt, their simples[12] were simple things … all their succeeding rabble of doctors and water-casters,[13] were at their wit's end, or I think rather at the world's end, for not one of them dared peep abroad; or if any one did take upon him to play the venturous knight, the Plague put him to his nonplus; in such strange, and such changeable shapes did the chameleon-like sickness appear, that they could not (with all the cunning in their budgets) make purse nets[14] to take him napping.

Only a band of desperviews, some few empirical madcaps (for they could never be worth velvet caps[15]) turned themselves into bees (or more properly into drones) and went humming up and down, with honey-bags[16] in their mouths, sucking the sweetness of silver and now and then of aurum potable[17] out of the poison of blains and carbuncles:[18] and these jolly mountebanks[1] clapped up their bills upon every post (like a fencer's challenge) threatening to canvas[2] the Plague, and to fight with him at all his own several weapons: I know not how they speed, but some they speed I am sure, for I have heard them band[3] for the heavens, because they sent those thither, that were wished to tarry longer upon earth.

[1] herb-wives Women who sells herbs.

[2] upon their marrowbone On their knees in prayer.

[3] mole-catchers Here referring to the sextons—a derogatory term, as "mole" was slang for vagina.

[4] rapiers Long, thin swords.

[5] ostrich Having the fabled behaviors of ostriches, which include a willingness to eat almost anything, especially hard objects.

[6] peppered Pelted with shot, or infected with a disease that gives its victims spotted sores (like syphilis or plague).

[7] lustiest geldings Most vigorous castrated male horses.

[8] Job Eponymous protagonist of the Old Testament book of Job, who was struck by God with extreme poverty, disease, and destitution, to be later saved and restored for his faith and patience.

[9] boarded them Provided them with lodging and food.

[10] flat-cap Cap worn by citizens of London; lob Lout or country bumpkin; caliver Light sort of musket.

[11] synodical Pertaining to a synod, or general council. The term, often synonymous with ecclesiastical, is here used disparagingly.

[12] simples Medicinal plants.

[13] water-casters Phony doctors who claim to be able to diagnose patients by examining their urine.

[14] purse nets Figure of speech referring to a net used for catching rabbits and fish.

[15] desperviews Poor beggars; empirical madcaps Medical quacks lacking formal academic training; velvet caps Typically worn by physicians of the era as signs of wealth.

[16] honeybags Sac in which bees carry nectar.

[17] aurum potable Gold in a drinkable form (rendered into minute subdivision within oil), reputed to be a cure-all.

[18] blains and carbuncles Blisters, pustules, or boils.

I could in this place make your cheeks look pale, and your hearts shake, with telling how some have had 18 sores at one time running upon them, others 10 and 12, many 4 and 5, and how those that have been four times wounded by this year's infection, have died of the last wound, while others (that were hurt as often) go up and down now with sounder limbs, than many that come out of France, and the Netherlands. And descending from these, I could draw forth a catalogue of many poor wretches, that in fields, in ditches, in common cages, and under stalls (being either thrust by cruel masters outdoors, or wanting[4] all worldly succor but the common benefit of earth and air have most miserably perished). But to chronicle these would weary a second Fabian.[5] …

It is plain … that death, like a thief, sets upon men in the highway, dogs them into their own houses, breaks into their bed chambers by night, assaults them by day, and yet no law can take hold of him: he devours man and wife: offers violence to their fair daughters: kills their youthful sons, and deceives them of their servants: yea, so full of treachery is he grown (since this Plague took his part) that no lovers dare trust him, nor by their good wills would come near him, for he works their downfall, even when their delights are at the highest.

Too ripe a proof have we of this, in a pair of lovers; the maid was in the pride of fresh blood and beauty: she was that which to be now is a wonder, young and yet chaste: the gifts of her mind were great, yet those which fortune bestowed upon her (as being well descended) were not much inferior: on this lovely creature did a young man so steadfastly fix his eye, that her looks kindled in his bosom a desire, whose flames burnt the most brightly, because they were fed with sweet and modest thoughts: Hymen[6] was the God to whom he prayed day and night that he might marry her: his prayers were received, at length (after many tempests of her denial and frowns of kinsfolk) the element[7] grew clear & he saw the happy landing place, where he had long sought to arrive: the prize of her youth was made his own, and the solemn day appointed when it should be delivered to him. Glad of which blessedness (for to a lover it is a blessedness) he wrought by all the possible art he could use to shorten the expected hour, and bring it nearer: for, whether he feared the interception of parents, or that his own soul, with excess of joy, was drowned in strange passions, he would often, with sighs mingled with kisses, and kisses half sinking in tears, prophetically tell her, that sure he should never live to enjoy her. To discredit which opinion of his, behold, the sun has made haste and wakened the bridal morning. Now does he call his heart traitor, that did so falsely conspire against him: lively blood leaps into his cheeks: he is got up, and gaily attired to play the bridegroom, she likewise does as cunningly turn herself into a bride: kindred and friends are met together, sops and muscadine[8] run sweating up and down till they drop again, to comfort their hearts, and because so many coffins pestered London Churches, that there was no room left for weddings, coaches are provided, and away rides all the train into the country. On a Monday morning are the lusty lovers on their journey, and before noon are they alighted, entering (instead of an inn) for more state into a Church, where they no sooner appeared, but the priest fell to his business, the holy knot was a tying, but be that should fasten it, coming to this, "In sickness and in health," there he stopped, for suddenly the bride took hold of, "in sickness," for "in health" all that stood by were in fear she should never be kept. The maiden-blush into which her cheeks were lately dyed, now began to lose colour: her voice (like a coward) would have shrunk away, but that her lover reaching her a hand, which he brought thither to give her, (for he was not yet made a full husband) did with that touch somewhat revive her; on went they again so far, till they met with "For better, for worse," there was she worse than before, and had not the holy officer made haste, the ground on which she stood to be married might easily have been broken up for her burial. All ceremonies being finished, she was led between two, not like a bride, but rather like a corpse, to her bed. That must now be the table, on which the wedding dinner is to be served up (being at this time, nothing but tears, and sighs, and lamentation) and Death is chief waiter, yet at length her weak heart wrestling with the pangs, gave them a fall, so that up she stood again, and in the fatal funeral coach that carried her forth, was she brought back (as upon a bier[1]) to the city: but see the malice of her enemy that had her in chase, upon the Wednesday following being overtaken, was her life overcome, Death rudely lay with her, and spoiled her of a maidenhead in spite of her husband. Oh the sorrow that did round beset him! Now was his divination true, she was a wife, yet continued a maid: he was a husband and a widower, yet never knew his wife: she was his own, yet he had her not: she had him, yet never enjoyed him: here is a strange alteration, for the rosemary that was washed in sweet water to set out the bridal, is now wet in tears to furnish her burial: the music that was heard to sound forth dances, cannot now be heard for the ringing of bells: all the comfort that happened to either side being this, that he lost her, before she had time to be an ill wife, and she left him, before he was able to be a bad husband....

[1] mountebanks Swindlers who sold false medicines and scammed people through entertaining advertisements.

[2] canvas Assault, with a pun referencing the posting of bills.

[3] band Join together in a purpose or pursuit.

[4] wanting Lacking.

[5] Fabian Robert Fabian, author of New Chronicles of England and France (c. 1504), also known as Fabian's Chronicle.

[6] Hymen God of marriage in Greek mythology.

[7] element Sky; here, metaphorically, the faces of those responding to the young man's persistence in wooing the maid.

[8] sops Bread soaked in wine prior to being eaten or cooked; muscadine Wine made from muscat grapes.

About twelve of the clock at midnight, when spirits walk, and not a mouse dare stir, because cats go a caterwauling:[2] Sin, that all day dares not show his head, came reeling out of an alehouse, in the shape of a drunkard, who no sooner smelled the wind, but he thought the ground under him danced the Canaries:[3] houses seemed to turn on the toe, and all things went round: insomuch, that his legges drew a pair of indentures,[4] between his body and the earth, the principal covenant being that he for his part would stand to nothing whatever he saw: every tree that came in his way, did he jostle, and yet challenged it the next day to fight with him. If he had clipped but a quarter so much of the King's silver, as he did of the King's English,[5] his carcass had long before this been carrion for crows. But he lived by gaming, and had excellent casting,[6] yet seldom won, for he drew reasonable good hands, but had very bad feet, that were not able to carry it away. This setter-up of malt-men,[7] being troubled with the staggers, fell into the self-same grave, that stood gaping wide open for a breakfast next morning, and imagining (when he was in) that he had stumbled into his own house, and that all his bedfellows (as they were indeed) were in their dead sleep, he, (never complaining of cold, nor calling for more sheets) soundly takes a nap till he snores again: in the morning the sexton comes plodding along, and casting upon his fingers ends what he hopes the dead pay of that day will come too, by that which he received the day before, (for sextons now had better doings than either taverns or bawdy-houses): in that silver contemplation, shrugging his shoulders together, he steps ere he be aware on the brims of that pit, into which this worshipper of Bacchus[8] was fallen, where finding some dead men's bones, and a skull or two, that lay scattered here and there; before he looked into this coffer of worms, those he takes up, and flings them in: one of the skulls battered the sconce[9] of the sleeper, while the bones played with his nose; whose blows waking his musty worship, the first word that he cast up, was an oath, and thinking the cans had flown about, cried zounds,[1] what do you mean to crack my mazer?[2] The sexton smelling a voice, (fear being stronger than his heart) believed verily some of the corpses spoke to him, upon which, feeling himself in a cold sweat, took his heels, while the goblin scrambled up and ran after him: but it appears the sexton had the lighter foot, for he ran so fast, that he ran out of his wits, which being left behind him, he had like to have died presently after.

[1] bier Stretcher on which a corpse is carried to the grave.

[2] caterwauling Shrieking and wailing while in heat.

[3] the Canaries Il Canario, a vibrant Spanish dance style supposedly based on a dance performed by the aboriginals of the Canary Islands.

[4] legges Legs, with a possible pun on "lieges"; pair of indentures Identical contracts, which were produced in pairs so that both parties could keep one.

[5] If he ... English A pun on the word "clip," meaning "to slur one's speech," and the practice of coin clipping, shaving precious metals from the edges of coins to make a profit—a crime that was punishable by execution.

[6] casting Counting; in this usage, of cards.

[7] malt-men Makers of malt (in this case, clearly, malt for beer).

[8] Bacchus Roman god of wine.

[9] sconce Head.

A merrier bargain than the poor sexton's did a tinker[3] meet with, all in a country town, through which a citizen of London being driven (to keep himself under the lee-shore in this tempestuous contagion) and casting up his eye for some harbour, spied a bush at the end of a pole (the ancient badge of a country ale-house, into which … he struck in. The host had been a mad Greek (marry, he could now speak nothing but English); a goodly fat burgher he was, with a belly arching out like a beer-barrel. …

At last a tinker came sounding through the town, my host's house being the ancient watering place where he did use to cast anchor. You must understand he was none of those base rascally tinkers, that with a bandog and a drab at their tails, and a pikestaff[4] on their necks, [who] will take a purse sooner than stop a kettle: no, this was a devout tinker, he did honour god Pan:[5] a musical tinker, that upon his kettledrum could play any country dance you called for, and upon holidays had earned money by it, when no fiddler could be heard of. He was only feared when he stalked through some towns where bees were, for he struck so sweetly on the bottom of his copper instrument, that he would empty whole hives, and lead the swarms after him only by the sound.

This excellent egregious[6] tinker calls for his draught[7] (being a double jug) it was filled for him, but before it came to his nose, the lamentable tale of the Londoner was told, the chamber door (where he lay) being thrust open with a long pole, (because none dared touch it with their hands) and the tinker bidden (if he had the heart) to go and see if he knew him. The tinker being not to learn what virtue the medicine had which he held at his lips poured it down his throat merrily, and crying trilill,[8] he feared no plagues. In he stepped, tossing the dead body to and fro, and was sorry he knew him not: my host that with grief began to fall away villainously, looking very ruthfully on the tinker, and thinking him a fit instrument to be played upon, offered a crown out of his own purse, if he would bury the party. A crown was a shrewd temptation to a tinker; many a hole might he stop, before he could pick a crown of it, yet being a subtle tinker (& to make all sextons pray for him, because he would raise their fees) an angel[9] he wanted to be his guide, and under ten shillings (by his ten bones) he would not put his finger into the fire. The whole parish had warning of this presently, thirty shillings was saved by the bargain, and the town like to be saved too, therefore ten shillings was laid out of hand, put into a rag, which was tied to the end of a long pole and delivered (in sight of all the parish, who stood aloof stopping their noses) by the headborough's[10] own self in proper person, to the tinker, who with one hand received the money, and with the other struck the board, crying hey, a fresh double pot. Which armor of proof being fitted to his body, up he hoists the Londoner on his back (like a schoolboy) a shovel and pickaxe standing ready for him; and thus furnished, into a field some good distance from the town he bears his deadly load, and there throws it down, falling roundly to his tools, upon which the strong beer having set an edge, they quickly cut out a lodging in the earth for the citizen. But the tinker knowing that worms needed no apparel, saving only sheets, stripped him stark naked, but first dived nimbly into his pocket, to see what linings they had, assuring himself, that a Londoner would not wander so far without silver: his hopes were of the right stamp, for from out of his pockets he drew a leather bag

[1] zounds An abbreviation of the oath "by God's wounds."

[2] mazer Humorous word for head.

[3] tinker Traveling beggar, trader, or performer.

[4] bandog Guard dog; drab Dirty or promiscuous woman; pikestaff Walking stick.

[5] Pan Greek god who is a skilled flute player.

[6] egregious Remarkable.

[7] draught The word "draught" was used with reference to both medicine and beer.

[8] crying trilill I.e., drinking with a trilling sound.

[9] angel An early English coin bearing the image of Saint Michael the Archangel and valued at ten shillings.

[10] headborough Parish officer of a town; constable.

Lord, haue mercy on London.
I follow.
We fly.
Wee dye.
Keepe out.

Illustration from Thomas Dekker, A Rod for Runaways, 1625. This woodcut appeared in one of Dekker's several pamphlets on the plague. The top of the image reads "Lord, have mercy on London." The illustration shows dying citizens on the left (next to the phrase "We die"); in the center is a skeleton (labeled "I follow") pursuing a group of citizens (marked "We fly") who are attempting to flee the city, as members of the upper classes often did in times of plague. In this case, however, they are prevented from leaving by a mob of armed country-dwellers (saying "Keep out").

with seven pounds in it: this music made the tinker's heart dance, he quickly tumbled his man into the grave, hid him over head and ears in dust, bound up his clothes in a bundle, & carrying that at the end of his staff on his shoulder, with the purse of seven pounds in his hand, back again comes he through the town, crying aloud, "Have you any more Londoners to bury, hey down a down derry, have you any more Londoners to bury": the hobbinolls[1] running away from him, as if he had been the dead citizen's ghost, & he marching away from them in all the haste he could, with the song still in his mouth.

You see therefore how dreadful a fellow Death is, making fools even of wisemen, and cowards of the most valiant; yea, in such a base slavery has it bound men's senses, that they have no power to look higher than their own roofs, but seem by their Turkish and barbarous actions to believe that there is no felicity after this life, and that (like beasts) their souls shall perish with their bodies.… I could fill a large volume, and call it the second part of the hundred merry tales.[2] …

… Hic finis Priami,[3] here's an end of an old song.
Et iam tempus Equum fumantia soluere colla[4]
Finis

—1603

[1] hobbinolls Country folk.

[2] hundred merry tales Popular sixteenth-century jestbook (collection of short comic stories).

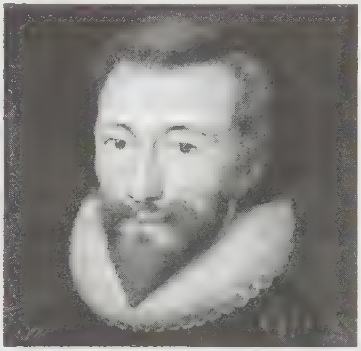
[3] Hic finis Priami Latin: literally, "Here is the end of Priam," from Virgil's Aeneid (2.554), a statement on the abrupt end to human achievement in the death of the beloved king Priam; here it makes a witty comparison between the abrupt end of humans, dying of plague, and of the tales Dekker is telling.

[4] Et iam … colla Latin: But we have covered an enormous distance and it is now time to release the smoking necks of the horses from their yokes.

JOHN DONNE

1572 – 1631

John Donne was an innovator: his work represented something new in poetry, and his contemporaries knew it. Donne set out to startle his readers with his disdain for convention, writing poems that challenged expectations about what was appropriate in poetic subject, form, tone, language, and imagery. He was not afraid of being difficult, or ambiguous, or contradictory from one poem to another: like the speaker of his "Holy Sonnet 19," in Donne "contraries meet in one." Some critics and readers try to smooth out these "contraries" by separating Donne's works into the secular verse written by "Jack Donne" (Donne's own phrase), the witty young man-about-London whose love poems combine erotic energy with high-minded argument; and the religious verse written later in life by Dr. John Donne, Dean of St. Paul's Cathedral, the learned Anglican minister famous for his electrifying sermons. But this neat division is complicated by the fact that many of his poems are impossible to date. Donne wrote primarily for manuscript circulation: only a handful of his poems were printed before he died. Some religious poetry may therefore have been written earlier than once thought, and some love lyrics later. In any case, Donne frequently blurs any differences between the sacred and the secular, erotic love and divine love: he can present erotic love as a form of religious experience, and religious devotion as an erotic experience. Donne's voice, moreover, ranges across a multitude of roles and postures, from misogynist cynicism and self-mocking sophistry to tender idealism and devout if still painfully self-conscious religious passion.



With his colloquial language, rough meter, sometimes swaggeringly masculine persona, and elaborately worked out philosophical (or wittily pseudo-philosophical) conceits, Donne's poetry breaks with the late Elizabethan poets: even when expressing difficult or ambiguous thoughts, they tended to prefer lines of smooth and highly decorated elegance. Donne's new manner caught the imagination of many poets, and his work was immensely influential for much of the seventeenth century. Times and tastes change, however, and what had been thought wit in 1600 by 1700 had come to seem mere fancy, unrestrained by judgment. In 1693, for example, John Dryden argued that Donne "affects the metaphysics … where nature only should reign," claiming that his love poetry "perplexes [women's minds] … with nice speculations of philosophy, when he should engage their hearts." In the eighteenth century, Samuel Johnson labeled Donne and his followers "Metaphysical Poets" who "ransacked" nature to create startling and strained conceits. (Because of the objections of scholars who point out that the term is misleading, the long-popular term "metaphysical" is currently losing ground.) Thanks to further shifts in sensibility, and thanks also to the praise of T.S. Eliot, who found in Donne's difficulty and intellectual dazzle a model for modernist poetic practice, Donne's work moved again in the twentieth century to the center of the English poetic canon.

Born in London in 1572, Donne was the son of a prosperous ironmonger. The family was Catholic at a time when the government viewed all Catholics with suspicion and prosecuted those it thought seditious. Donne's mother, Elizabeth, was related to Thomas More and was beheaded as a traitor for refusing to support Henry VIII's rejection of the Pope's authority. Two of her uncles lived in exile; another, a Jesuit, was incarcerated; and in 1593 Donne's brother Henry died of a fever while imprisoned for harboring a priest. Thus, Donne well understood religious persecution, which is why some have speculated that his conversion to the Church of England, however sincere, must have felt at times like a betrayal. First educated by Jesuits, at age eleven Donne entered Oxford, and then studied at Cambridge. He took no degree, perhaps because graduation required accepting the Church of England's thirty-nine "articles of religion." In 1592 he began legal studies at Lincoln's Inn, and over the next few years wrote many of the love lyrics that were known at first to a few friends and then, especially in the next century, found a large readership. A set of five satires mocking English life, laws, and mores (including those of courtiers) also dates from these years; they helped intensify a fashion in the late 1590s for biting verse satire. The most powerful, "Satire III," explores with surprising candor, if no conclusion, the risks and dilemmas of choosing a version of Christianity to follow.

After taking part in the 1596 and 1597 anti-Spanish expeditions to Cadiz and the Azores, in 1598 Donne was appointed secretary to Sir Thomas Egerton, Lord Keeper of the Great Seal. By now his future seemed assured—he had distanced himself from the Roman Catholic Church and had served in Parliament. In 1601, however, he nearly wrecked his prospects by a secret marriage to Egerton's 17-year-old-niece, Ann More. When the marriage was discovered, Donne wrote to her father, Sir George More, begging that Ann not "feel the terror of your sudden anger," but Sir George disinherited his daughter and had Donne dismissed from his position and briefly imprisoned. Years of poverty and unemployment lay before the couple and their family (Ann eventually had twelve children, seven of whom survived). Donne found some support, however, from various friends and patrons, among them Sir Robert Drury, for whom he wrote two long "Anniversary" poems (1611–12) lamenting the death of Sir Robert's daughter, Elizabeth.

During this difficult period Donne finally renounced his Roman Catholicism and within a few years published two anti-Catholic tracts: Pseudo-Martyr (1610), which argues that Catholics should take the Oath of Allegiance to the crown, and the satirical Ignatius His Conclave (1611), which describes a meeting of Jesuits in Hell. King James was pleased but insisted that Donne be ordained before receiving an appointment. Donne complied and was shortly thereafter made a royal chaplain and a Reader in Divinity at Lincoln's Inn. He soon suffered a personal loss, however, when his wife died during childbirth at age 33, a sorrow to which Donne probably alludes in his seventeenth "Holy Sonnet," when he mentions that "she whom I loved hath paid her last debt." Most of his "Holy Sonnets," however (including "Death Be not Proud"), seem to have been written before his ordination and reflect earlier hopes and anguish. In 1621 Donne was appointed Dean of St. Paul's, and attracted large audiences for his intellectually challenging and emotionally stirring sermons, many of which were published, both during and after his life.

During a grave illness in the mid-1620s, Donne wrote his popular Devotions upon Emergent Occasions (1624), a series of prose meditations that include his famous assertion of human interconnectedness ("No man is an island"). Donne survived, but he never lost his fascination with death. He delivered his last sermon, "Death's Duel," early in 1631 before Charles I. His audience, it was later said, sensed that he was in effect preaching his own funeral sermon; he died that March. Donne is buried at St. Paul's Cathedral; his monument is modeled on a portrait of himself taken while he was still alive and dressed for the occasion in his shroud. His collected Poems were printed in 1633 and was reprinted several times before his reputation faded with the coming of the Restoration and a new generation's taste for neoclassical poetry.

The Good-Morrow

I wonder by my troth, what thou, and I
Did, till we loved? were we not weaned till then?
But sucked on country pleasures, childishly?
Or snorted we in the seven sleepers' den?[2]
'Twas so; but° this, all pleasures fancies be except for
If ever any beauty I did see,
Which I desired, and got, 'twas but a dream of thee.

And now good-morrow to our waking souls,
Which watch not one another out of fear;
For love, all love of other sights controls,
And makes one little room, an every where.
Let sea-discoverers to new worlds have gone,
Let maps[3] to others, worlds on worlds have shown,
Let us possess one world,[4] each hath one, and is one.

My face in thine eye, thine in mine appears,
And true plain hearts do in the faces rest,
Where can we find two better hemispheres,
Without sharp North, without declining West?
What ever dies, was not mixed equally;[5]
If our two loves be one, or, thou and I
Love so alike that none do slacken, none can die.
—1633[6]

Song ("Go, and catch a falling star")

Go, and catch a falling star,
Get with child a mandrake root,[7]
Tell me, where all past years are,
Or who cleft the Devil's foot,
Teach me to hear mermaids singing,
Or to keep off envy's stinging,
And find
What wind
Serves to advance an honest mind.

If thou be'st born to strange sights,
Things invisible to see,
Ride ten thousand days and nights,
Till age snow white hairs on thee,
Thou, when thou return'st, wilt tell me
All strange wonders that befell thee,
And swear,
No where
Lives a woman true, and fair.

If thou find'st one, let me know,
Such a pilgrimage were sweet;
Yet do not, I would not go,
Though at next door we might meet;
Though she were true, when you met her,
And last, till you write your letter,
Yet she
Will be False, ere I come, to two, or three.
—1633

Woman's Constancy

Now thou hast loved me one whole day,
To-morrow when thou leavest, what wilt thou say?
Wilt thou then antedate some new-made vow?
Or, say that now
We are not just those persons, which we were?
Or, that oaths made in reverential fear
Of Love, and his wrath, any may forswear?
Or, as true deaths, true marriages untie,

---

[1] Sonnets Donne uses the term as a general one for love poems or love songs, rather than referring specifically to the 14-line sonnet; his secular love poetry includes no traditional 14-line sonnets.

[2] seven sleepers' den In early Christian legend, seven youths walled up in a cave during a persecution who slept for nearly 200 years.

[3] maps Probably astronomical maps.

[4] one world Many manuscript versions have "our world."

[5] What ever … equally Classical medical theory held that disease was the result of improper balance among the body's elements.

[6] 1633 Much uncertainty and inconsistency surrounds the dates of composition and publication for Donne's work. We do not follow our usual format here of organizing the author's works chronologically by publication date; the texts are sorted instead by traditional categories.

[7] mandrake root Plant whose forked root resembles a human body.

So lovers' contracts, images of those,
Bind but till sleep, death's image, them unloose?
Or, your own end to justify,
For having purposed change, and falsehood, you
Can have no way but falsehood to be true?
Vain lunatic,[1] against these 'scapes I could Dispute, and conquer, if I would;
Which I abstain to do,
For by to-morrow, I may think so too.
—1633

The Sun Rising

Busy old fool, unruly Sun,
Why dost thou thus,
Through windows, and through curtains call on us?
Must to thy motions lovers' seasons run?
Saucy pedantic wretch, go chide
Late schoolboys and sour prentices,
Go tell court-huntsmen that the King will ride,
Call country ants to harvest offices;
Love, all alike, no season knows, nor clime,
Nor hours, days, months, which are the rags of time.

Thy beams, so reverend, and strong
Why shouldst thou think?
I could eclipse and cloud them with a wink,
But that I would not lose her sight so long:
If her eyes have not blinded thine,
Look, and tomorrow late, tell me,
Whether both the Indias of spice and mine[2]
Be where thou leftst them, or lie here with me.
Ask for those kings whom thou saw'st yesterday,
And thou shalt hear, All here in one bed lay.

She's all states, and all princes, I,
Nothing else is.
Princes do but play us; compared to this,
All honor's mimic, all wealth alchemy.[3]
Thou sun art half as happy as we,
In that the world's contracted thus:
Thine age asks ease, and since thy duties be
To warm the world, that's done in warming us.
Shine here to us, and thou art everywhere;
This bed thy center is, these walls, thy sphere.
—1633

The Canonization

For God's sake hold your tongue, and let me love,
Or chide my palsy, or my gout,
My five gray hairs, or ruined fortune flout,
With wealth your state, your mind with arts improve,
Take you a course, get you a place,[4]
Observe his honour, or his grace,[5]
And the King's real, or his stamped face
Contemplate;[6] what you will, approve,[7]
So you will let me love.

Alas, alas, who's injured by my love?
What merchant's ships have my sighs drowned?
Who says my tears have overflowed his ground?
When did my colds a forward spring remove?
When did the heats which my veins fill
Add one more to the plaguy bill?[8]
Soldiers find wars, and lawyers find out still Litigious men, which quarrels move,
Though she and I do love.

Call us what you will, we are made such by love;
Call her one, me another fly,[9]

---

[1] lunatic Under the control of the moon, thus inconstant, subject to change.

[2] Indias of spice and mine The East Indies (source of spice and perfume) and West Indies (source of gold and precious metals).

[3] alchemy Here, flashy rubbish.

[4] course ... place Take a course of action; get yourself a position.

[5] his honour ... his grace Cultivate contacts with political or religious dignitaries.

[6] stamped face / Contemplate Look at the king's face stamped on coins: in effect, "go think about money."

[7] what you will, approve Do whatever you want.

[8] plaguy bill Weekly list of those who had died of the plague.

[9] me another fly Call her a fly (butterfly or moth), and call me one too.

We're tapers too, and at our own cost die,[1]
And we in us find the eagle and the dove.[2]
The phoenix riddle[3] hath more wit
By us; we two being one, are it.
So, to one neutral thing both sexes fit,
We die and rise the same, and prove
Mysterious by this love.

We can die by it, if not live by love,
And if unfit for tombs and hearse
Our legend be, it will be fit for verse;
And if no piece of chronicle° we prove, history
We'll build in sonnets° pretty rooms;[4] love poems
As well a well wrought urn becomes
The greatest ashes, as half-acre tombs,
And by these hymns, all shall approve
Us canonized for love.

And thus invoke us: You whom reverend love
Made one another's hermitage;
You, to whom love was peace, that now is rage;
Who did the whole world's soul contract,[5]
and drove
Into the glasses of your eyes
(So made such mirrors, and such spies,
That they did all to you epitomize)
Countries, towns, courts: beg from above
A pattern of your love.
—1633

Song ("Sweetest love, I do not go")

Sweetest love, I do not go
For weariness of thee,
Nor in hope the world can show
A fitter love for me;
But since that I
Must die at last, 'tis best
To use my self in jest
Thus by feigned deaths[6] to die.

Yesternight the sun went hence,
And yet is here today,
He hath no desire nor sense,
Nor half so short a way:
Then fear not me,
But believe that I shall make Speedier journeys, since I take
More wings and spurs than he.

O how feeble is man's power,
That if good fortune fall,
Cannot add another hour,
Nor a lost hour recall!
But come bad chance,
And we join to it our strength,
And we teach it art and length,
Itself o'er us to advance.

When thou sigh'st, thou sigh'st not wind,
But sigh'st my soul away,
When thou weep'st, unkindly kind,
My life's blood doth decay.
It cannot be
That thou lov'st me, as thou say'st,
If in thine my life thou waste,
Thou art the best of me.

Let not thy divining heart
Forethink me any ill,
Destiny may take thy part,
And may thy fears fulfil;
But think that we

---

[1] We're tapers … die "To die" was slang for reaching orgasm, and each sexual act was popularly believed to shorten one's life by one day. The two lovers are compared to moths attracted to a candle, and to the self-consuming candle (taper) itself: moths, candle, and lovers all pay for doing what they do by their very nature.

[2] eagle and the dove Symbols of (masculine) strength and (feminine) gentleness, now united in the lovers.

[3] phoenix riddle Only one mythical phoenix ever lived at a time; the bird mysteriously renewed itself by rising from the ashes of its own funeral pyre. The "riddle" of its unisex existence makes better sense (has "more wit") when compared with the two lovers: like the phoenix, they combine "both sexes" to make "one neutral thing" which dies, then rises the same (with the traditional play on the sexual resonances of dying and rising).

[4] rooms In Italian, "stanza" means "room."

[5] contract Manuscript versions have "extract."

[6] feigned deaths Separations from the beloved.

Are but turned aside to sleep;
They who one another keep Alive, ne'er parted be.

Air and Angels

Twice or thrice had I loved thee,
Before I knew thy face or name;
So in a voice, so in a shapeless flame,[1]
Angels affect us oft, and worshipped be;
Still when, to where thou wert, I came,
Some lovely glorious nothing I did see.
But since my soul, whose child love is,
Takes limbs of flesh, and else could nothing do,
More subtle than the parent is
Love must not be, but take a body too;
And therefore what thou wert, and who,
I bid Love ask, and now
That it assume thy body, I allow,
And fix itself in thy lip, eye, and brow.

Whilst thus to ballast love, I thought,
And so more steadily to have gone,
With wares which would sink admiration,
I saw I had love's pinnace[2] overfraught;
Ev'ry thy hair for love to work upon
Is much too much, some fitter must be sought;
For, nor in nothing, nor in things
Extreme, and scatt'ring bright, can love inhere;
Then as an angel, face and wings
Of air, not pure as it, yet pure doth wear,
So thy love may be my love's sphere;
Just such disparity
As is 'twixt air and angels' purity,
'Twixt women's love, and men's will ever be.
—1633

Break of Day[3]

'Tis true, 'tis day; what though it be?
O wilt thou therefore rise from me?
Why should we rise because 'tis light?
Did we lie down because 'twas night?
Love, which in spite of darkness brought us hither,
Should in despite of light keep us together.

Light hath no tongue, but is all eye;
If it could speak as well as spy,
This were the worst that it could say,
That being well, I fain would stay,
And that I loved my heart and honor so,
That I would not from him, that had them, go.

Must business thee from hence remove?
Oh that's the worst disease of love,
The poor, the foul, the false, love can
Admit, but not the busied man.
He which hath business, and makes love, doth do
Such wrong, as when a married man doth woo.
—1612, 1633

The Anniversary

All kings, and all their favourites,
All glory of honours, beauties, wits,
The sun itself, which makes times, as they pass,
Is elder by a year, now, than it was
When thou and I first one another saw:
All other things to their destruction draw,
Only our love hath no decay;
This, no tomorrow hath, nor yesterday,
Running it never runs from us away,
But truly keeps his first, last, everlasting day.

Two graves must hide thine and my corse,° corpse
If one might, death were no divorce:
Alas, as well as other princes, we (Who prince enough in one another be)

---

[1] shapeless flame Unsteady, or suddenly flaring, flame.

[2] pinnace Small, light ship, unsuited for carrying the figurative cargo of the beloved's many beauties.

[3] Break of Day First printed, with a musical setting, in William Corkine's Second Book of Airs (1612). The speaker is a woman.

Must leave at last in death, these eyes, and ears,
Oft fed with true oaths, and with sweet salt tears;
But souls where nothing dwells but love
(All other thoughts being inmates) then shall prove
This, or a love increased there above,
When bodies to their graves, souls from their graves remove.

And then we shall be throughly° blest, thoroughly
But we no more than all the rest,
Here upon earth, we're kings, and none but we
Can be such kings, nor of such subjects be;
Who is so safe as we? where none can do
Treason to us, except one of us two.
True and false fears let us refrain,
Let us love nobly, and live, and add again
Years and years unto years, till we attain
To write threescore: this is the second of our reign.

Twicknam Garden[1]

Blasted with sighs, and surrounded with tears,
Hither I come to seek the spring,
And at mine eyes, and at mine ears,
Receive such balms, as else cure everything;
But O, self traitor, I do bring
The spider[2] love, which transubstantiates all,
And can convert manna to gall,
And that this place may thoroughly be thought
True Paradise, I have the serpent[3] brought.

'Twere wholesomer for me, that winter did
Benight the glory of this place,
And that a grave frost did forbid
These trees to laugh and mock me to my face;
But that I may not this disgrace
Endure, nor leave this garden, Love, let me
Some senseless piece of this place be;
Make me a mandrake, so I may groan here,[4]
Or a stone fountain weeping out my year.

Hither with crystal vials, lovers come,
And take my tears, which are love's wine,
And try° your mistress' tears at home, test
For all are false, that taste not just like mine;
Alas, hearts do not in eyes shine,
Nor can you more judge woman's thoughts by tears,
Than by her shadow, what she wears.
O perverse sex, where none is true but she,
Who's therefore true, because her truth kills me.
—1633

A Valediction: of Weeping

Let me pour forth
My tears before thy face, whil'st I stay here,
For thy face coins them, and thy stamp they bear,
And by this mintage they are something worth,
For thus they be
Pregnant of thee;
Fruits of much grief they are, emblems of more,
When a tear falls, that thou falls which it bore,
So thou and I are nothing then, when on a diverse shore.

On a round ball[5]
A workman that hath copies by, can lay
An Europe, Afric, and an Asia,[6]
And quickly make that, which was nothing, All,
So doth each tear,
Which thee doth wear,
A globe, yea world by that impression grow,
Till thy tears mixed with mine do overflow

---

[1] Twicknam Garden Twickenham Park (pronounced, and often in the period spelled, Twicknam) was the home of Lucy, Countess of Bedford (1581–1627), a friend and patron of Donne and other writers, including Ben Jonson, Samuel Daniel, and Michael Drayton.

[2] spider Spiders were believed to transform everything they ate into poison.

[3] serpent Emblem of envy, and of temptation.

[4] mandrake … groan here Plant whose forked root was thought to resemble the human body, and reputed to shriek or groan; the printed edition has "grow," but many manuscripts have "groan," which better parallels the weeping fountain in the next line.

[5] round ball Blank globe, on which printed maps could be placed to make a world.

[6] Asia Pronounced in the period as a three-syllable word.

This world, by waters sent from thee, my heaven dissolved so.

O more than Moon,
Draw not up seas to drown me in thy sphere,
Weep me not dead, in thine arms, but forbear
To teach the sea what it may do too soon;
Let not the wind
Example find,
To do me more harm than it purposeth;
Since thou and I sigh one another's breath,
Who e'r sighs most is cruellest, and hastes the other's death.[1]

The Flea

Mark but this flea, and mark in this, a
How little that which thou deny'st me is; a
It sucked me first,[2] and now sucks thee, b
And in this flea our two bloods mingled be;[3] b
Thou know'st that[4] this cannot be said c
A sin, nor shame, nor loss of maidenhead, c
Yet this enjoys before it woo, d
And pampered swells with one blood made of two, d
And this, alas, is more than we would do. d

Oh stay, three lives in one flea spare,
Where we almost, nay more than married are:
This flea is you and I, and this
Our marriage bed, and marriage temple is;
Though parents grudge, and you, we're met
And cloistered in these living walls of jet.° black stone
Though use° make you apt to kill me, habit
Let not to that, self murder added be,
And sacrilege, three sins in killing three.

Cruel and sudden, hast thou since
Purpled thy nail in blood of innocence?
Wherein could this flea guilty be,
Except in that drop which it sucked from thee?
Yet thou triumph'st, and say'st that thou
Find'st not thy self, nor me the weaker now;
'Tis true, then learn how false, fears be;
Just so much honor, when thou yield'st to me,
Will waste, as this flea's death took life from thee.

A Nocturnal upon St. Lucy's Day, Being the Shortest Day[5]

'Tis the year's midnight, and it is the day's,
Lucy's, who scarce seven hours herself unmasks;
The sun is spent, and now his flasks° the stars
Send forth light squibs, no constant rays;
The world's whole sap is sunk:
The general balm[6] the hydroptic° earth hath drunk, thirsty
Whither, as to the bed's-feet, life is shrunk,
Dead and interred; yet all these seem to laugh,
Compared with me, who am their epitaph.

Study me then, you who shall lovers be
At the next world, that is, at the next spring:
For I am every dead thing,
In whom Love wrought new alchemy.
For his art did express° extract
A quintessence even from nothingness,
From dull privations, and lean emptiness;
He ruined me, and I am re-begot
Of absence, darkness, death; things which are not.

All others, from all things, draw all that's good,
Life, soul, form, spirit, whence they being have;
I, by love's limbeck,[7] am the grave
Of all that's nothing. Oft a flood
Have we two wept, and so

---

[1] Who e'r sighs ... death According to folklore, sighing shortened life (each sigh was said to cost one drop of blood).

[2] It sucked me first "Me it sucked first" in many manuscripts.

[3] mingled be The speaker's subsequent argument hinges on the traditional belief that blood mixed during sexual intercourse.

[4] Thou know'st that "Confess it" in many manuscripts.

[5] St Lucy's Day, Being the Shortest Day 13 December, the shortest day of the year in the old Julian calendar.

[6] general balm The innate, vital sap believed to preserve all things.

[7] limbeck Retort, or still (apparatus for distillation).

Drowned the whole world, us two; oft did we grow
To be two chaoses, when we did show
Care to aught else; and often absences
Withdrew our souls, and made us carcasses.

But I am by her death (which word wrongs her)
Of the first nothing the elixir grown;
Were I a man, that I were one
I needs must know; I should prefer,
If I were any beast,
Some ends, some means; yea plants, yea stones detest,
And love; all, all some properties invest;
If I an ordinary nothing were,
As shadow, a light and body must be here.

But I am none; nor will my sun renew.
You lovers, for whose sake the lesser sun
At this time to the Goat[1] is run
To fetch new lust, and give it you,
Enjoy your summer all;
Since she enjoys her long night's festival,
Let me prepare towards her, and let me call
This hour her vigil, and her eve, since this Both the year's, and the day's deep midnight is.
—1633

The Bait

Come live with me, and be my love,
And we will some new pleasures prove
Of golden sands, and crystal brooks,
With silken lines, and silver hooks.

There will the river whispering run
Warmed by thy eyes, more than the sun.
And there the enamoured fish will stay,
Begging themselves they may betray.

When thou wilt swim in that live bath,
Each fish, which every channel hath,
Will amorously to thee swim,
Gladder to catch thee, than thou him.

If thou, to be so seen, be'st loth,
By sun or moon, thou dark'nest both,
And if myself have leave to see,
I need not their light, having thee.

Let others freeze with angling reeds,
And cut their legs with shells and weeds,
Or treacherously poor fish beset,
With strangling snare, or windowy net.

Let coarse bold hands, from slimy nest
The bedded fish in banks out-wrest,
Or curious traitors, sleave-silk[2] flies,
Bewitch poor fishes' wand'ring eyes.

For thee, thou need'st no such deceit,
For thou thyself art thine own bait;
That fish, that is not catched thereby,
Alas, is wiser far than I.
—1633

The Apparition

When by thy scorn, O murd'ress, I am dead,
And that thou thinkst thee free
From all solicitation from me,
Then shall my ghost come to thy bed,
And thee, feigned vestal,[3] in worse arms shall see;
Then thy sick taper will begin to wink,
And he, whose thou art then, being tired before,
Will, if thou stir, or pinch to wake him, think
Thou call'st for more,
And in false sleep will from thee shrink,
And then, poor aspen° wretch, neglected thou trembling
Bathed in a cold quicksilver sweat[4] wilt lie,
A verier ghost than I;

---

[1] Goat The constellation Capricorn, into whose sign the sun enters at the winter solstice; goats were associated with lust.

[2] sleave-silk Silk in the form of fine filaments.

[3] feigned vestal Pretended virgin. The original has "fained," the common variant spelling in the period; many editions retain "fained" (eager, glad).

[4] quicksilver sweat Shiny coating of sweat; from quicksilvering, the application of a thin coat of an alloy using mercury (quicksilver). That mercury was also used to relieve the symptoms of syphilis adds to Donne's insult.

What I will say, I will not tell thee now,
Lest that preserve thee; and since my love is spent,
I'd rather thou shouldst painfully repent,
Than by my threatnings rest still innocent.
—1633

A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning

As virtuous men pass mildly away,
And whisper to their souls to go,
Whilst some of their sad friends do say,
The breath goes now, and some say, no:

So let us melt, and make no noise,
No tear-floods, nor sigh-tempests move,
'Twere profanation of our joys,
To tell the laity our love.

Moving of the earth° brings harms and fears, earthquakes
Men reckon what it did and meant,
But trepidation of the spheres,[1]
Though greater far, is innocent.

Dull sublunary[2] lovers' love
(Whose soul is sense) cannot admit
Absence, because it doth remove
Those things which elemented it.

But we by a love, so much refined
That our selves know not what it is,
Inter-assured of the mind,
Care less, eyes, lips, and hands to miss.

Our two souls therefore, which are one,
Though I must go, endure not yet
A breach, but an expansion,
Like gold to airy thinness beat.

If they be two, they are two so
As stiff twin compasses[3] are two:
Thy soul, the fixed foot, makes no show
To move, but doth, if the other do.

And though it in the center sit,
Yet when the other far doth roam,
It leans, and hearkens after it,
And grows erect, as that comes home.

Such wilt thou be to me, who must
Like the other foot, obliquely run;
Thy firmness makes my circle just,
And makes me end, where I begun.
—1633

The Ecstasy

Where, like a pillow on a bed,
A pregnant bank swelled up, to rest
The violet's reclining head,
Sat we two, one another's best.
Our hands were firmly cemented
With a fast balm, which thence did spring;
Our eye-beams twisted, and did thread
Our eyes upon one double string.
So to engraft our hands, as yet
Was all our means to make us one,
And pictures in our eyes to get° beget
Was all our propagation.
As 'twixt two equal armies, Fate
Suspends uncertain victory,
Our souls (which to advance their state,
Were gone out) hung 'twixt her and me.
And whilst our souls negotiate there,
We like sepulchral statues lay;
All day, the same our postures were,
And we said nothing, all the day.
If any, so by love refined,
That he soul's language understood,
And by good love were grown all mind,
Within convenient distance stood,

---

[1] trepidation of the spheres The precession of the equinox, thought to be caused by movements in the celestial spheres.

[2] sublunary Beneath the moon, hence corruptible and subject to change (because subject to the consequences of the Fall from Paradise).

[3] twin compasses Single drawing compass (with twin "feet").

He (though he knew not which soul spake,
Because both meant, both spake the same)
Might thence a new concoction take,[1]
And part far purer than he came.
This ecstasy doth unperplex
(We said) and tell us what we love;
We see by this, it was not sex;
We see, we saw not what did move:
But as all several souls contain
Mixture of things, they know not what,
Love, these mixed souls doth mix again,
And makes both one, each this, and that.
A single violet transplant,
The strength, the colour, and the size
(All which before was poor and scant)
Redoubles still, and multiplies.
When love with one another so
Interinanimates two souls,
That abler soul, which thence doth flow,
Defects of loneliness controls.
We then, who are this new soul, know
Of what we are composed, and made,
For the atomies of which we grow
Are souls, whom no change can invade.
But O alas, so long, so far
Our bodies why do we forbear?
They're ours, though they're not we, we are
The intelligences, they the sphere.
We owe them thanks, because they thus
Did us, to us, at first convey,
Yielded their forces, sense, to us,
Nor are dross to us, but allay.° alloy
On man heaven's influence works not so,
But that it first imprints the air;
So soul into the soul may flow,
Though it to body first repair.
As our blood labours to beget
Spirits, as like souls as it can,
Because such fingers need to knit
That subtle knot, which makes us man:
So must pure lovers' souls descend
To affections, and to faculties,
Which sense may reach and apprehend,
Else a great prince in prison lies.
To our bodies turn we then, that so
Weak men on love revealed may look;
Love's mysteries in souls do grow,
But yet the body is his book.
And if some lover, such as we,
Have heard this dialogue of one,
Let him still mark us, he shall see
Small change when we're to bodies gone.

The Relic

When my grave is broke up again
Some second guest to entertain
(For graves have learned that woman-head[2]
To be to more than one a bed)
And he that digs it, spies
A bracelet of bright° hair about the bone, fair
Will he not let us alone,
And think that there a loving couple lies,
Who thought that this device might be some way
To make their souls, at the last busy day,
Meet at this grave, and make a little stay?

If this fall in a time, or land,
Where mis-devotion doth command,[3]
Then he that digs us up will bring
Us to the Bishop, and the King,
To make us relics; then
Thou shalt be a Mary Magdalen, and I
A something else thereby;
All women shall adore us, and some men;
And since at such times miracles are sought,
I would have that age by this paper taught
What miracles we harmless lovers wrought.

First, we loved well and faithfully,
Yet knew not what we loved, nor why,
Difference of sex no more we knew,
Than our guardian angels do;
Coming and going, we

---

[1] new concoction take Be even further refined.

[2] woman-head Womanishness (a play on "maidenhead").

[3] If this fall … command That is, in a time or place where people prayed to saints and venerated relics: in effect, were Roman Catholic.

Perchance might kiss, but not between those meals;
Our hands ne'er touched the seals,
Which nature, injured by late law,[1] sets free:
These miracles we did; but now, alas,
All measure, and all language, I should pass,
Should I tell what a miracle she was.

from Elegies

Elegy 1. Jealousy[2]

Fond° woman, which wouldst have thy husband die, foolish
And yet complain'st of his great jealousy.
If swollen with poison, he lay in his last bed,
His body with a sere-bark° covered, dry crust
Drawing his breath as thick and short as can
The nimblest crocheting[3] musician,
Ready with loathsome vomiting to spew
His soul out of one hell into a new,
Made deaf with his poor kindred's howling cries,
Begging with few feigned tears great legacies,
Thou wouldst not weep, but jolly and frolic be,
As a slave which to-morrow should be free.
Yet weep'st thou when thou seest him hungerly
Swallow his own death, heart's-bane jealousy.
Oh give him many thanks, he's courteous,
That in suspecting kindly warneth us.
We must not, as we used, flout openly
In scoffing riddles his deformity;
Nor at his board, together being sat,
With words, nor touch, scarce looks, adulterate.
Nor when he, swol'n and pampered with great fare,
Sits down and snorts, caged in his basket chair,
Must we usurp his own bed any more,
Nor kiss and play in his house, as before.
Now I see many dangers; for that is
His realm, his castle, and his diocese.
But if, as envious men which would revile
Their prince, or coin his gold, themselves exile
Into another country, and do it there,
We play in another house, what should we fear?
There we will scorn his household policies,
His silly plots and pensionary spies,° servants
As the inhabitants of Thames' right side[4]
Do London's mayor, or Germans, the Pope's pride.[5]
—1633

Elegy 8. The Comparison[6]

As the sweet sweat of roses in a still,
As that which from chafed musk cat's pores doth trill,° flow
As the almighty balm° of the early East, morning dew
Such are the sweat drops of my mistress' breast,
And on her neck her skin such lustre sets,
They seem no sweat drops, but pearl carcanets.° necklaces
Rank sweaty froth thy mistress' brow defiles,
Like spermatic issue of ripe menstruous boils,
Or like that scum, which, by need's lawless law
Enforced, Sanserra's starved men did draw
From parboiled shoes, and boots, and all the rest
Which were with any sovereign fatness blest,[7]
And like vile lying stones in saffroned tin,[8]
Or warts, or weals, they hang upon her skin.
Round as the world's her head, on every side,
Like to that fatal ball which fell on Ide,[9]

---

[1] late law Human law, which came after the original "law" of nature.

[2] Elegy 1. Jealousy Numbered "Elegy 4" in some modern editions.

[3] crotcheting Crotchets are grace notes; in effect, "quick-fingered."

[4] Thames' right side Southwark, where the theaters were, was outside the jurisdiction of London authorities.

[5] Pope's pride Germany was the birthplace of the Reformation, which challenged the authority of the Pope.

[6] Elegy 8. The Comparison Numbered "Elegy 2" in some modern editions.

[7] From parboiled shoes … fatness blest The King's Catholic army laid siege to the Protestants of Sancerre, France, for nine months in 1573; the town's inhabitants were reduced to eating anything made out of leather.

[8] lying stones in saffroned tin Artificial jewels set in false gold (gilded tin).

[9] fatal ball which fell on Ide The golden apple inscribed "To the fairest" that Eris, goddess of discord, brought to a wedding in revenge for not being invited. Hera, Athena, and Aphrodite competed for the prize, and Paris, a herdsman

Or that whereof God had such jealousy,
As, for the ravishing thereof we die.[1]
Thy head[2] is like a rough-hewn statue of jet,° black stone
Where marks for eyes, nose, mouth, are yet scarce set;
Like the first Chaos, or flat seeming face
Of Cynthia,° where the earth's shadows her embrace. the moon
Like Proserpine's white beauty-keeping chest,[3]
Or Jove's best fortune's urn,[4] is her fair breast.
Thine's like worm eaten trunks, clothed in seal's skin,
Or grave, that's dirt without, and stink within.
And like that slender stalk, at whose end stands
The woodbine quivering, are her arms and hands,
Like rough-barked elmboughs, or the russet skin
Of men late scourged for madness, or for sin,
Like sun-parched quarters on the city gate,[5]
Such is thy tanned skin's lamentable state.
And like a bunch of ragged carrots stand
The short swoll'n fingers of thy gouty hand.
Then like the chemic's masculine equal° fire, evenly heating
Which in the limbeck's[6] warm womb doth inspire
Into the earth's worthless dirt a soul of gold,
Such cherishing heat her best loved part doth hold.
Thine's like the dread mouth of a fired gun,
Or like hot liquid metals newly run
Into clay moulds, or like to that Aetna[7]
Where round about the grass is burnt away.
Are not your kisses then as filthy, and more,
As a worm sucking an envenomed sore?
Doth not thy fearful hand in feeling quake,
As one which gath'ring flowers, still fears a snake?
Is not your last act harsh, and violent,
As when a plough a stony ground doth rent?
So kiss good turtles,° so devoutly nice turtledoves
Are priests in handling reverent sacrifice,
And such in searching wounds the surgeon is
As we, when we embrace, or touch, or kiss.
Leave her, and I will leave comparing thus,
She, and comparisons are odious.

Elegy 19. To His Mistress Going to Bed[8]

Come Madam, come, all rest my powers defy,
Until I labour, I in labour lie.
The foe oft-times, having the foe in sight,
Is tired with standing though they never fight.
Off with that girdle, like heaven's zone glistering,
But a far fairer world encompassing.
Unpin that spangled breastplate,[9] which you wear
That the eyes of busy fools may be stopped there.
Unlace your self: for that harmonious chime[10]
Tells me from you that now 'tis your bed time.
Off with that happy busk,° which I envy, corset
That still can be, and still can stand so nigh.
Your gown's going off, such beauteous state reveals,
As when from flowr'y meads the hill's shadow steals.
Off with that wiry coronet and show
The hairy diadem which on you doth grow.
Now off with those shoes, and then softly tread
In this love's hallowed temple, this soft bed.
In such white robes, Heaven's angels used to be on Mount Ida (near Troy), had to choose the winner. His choice of Aphrodite led to the Trojan war. The elegy invites the reader to compare that beauty competition with the one it offers.

---

[1] ravishing … we die The forbidden fruit of the Tree of the Knowledge of Good and Evil in Eden.

[2] Thy head That is, the head of thy mistress, as opposed to "her head" (the speaker's mistress) of line 15. The poem proceeds to contrast the qualities of the speaker's "her" with those of "thy" or "thine" mistress.

[3] beauty-keeping chest In classical story, Psyche was required to travel to the underworld and ask Prosperina (Persephone) to place in a box a gift of beauty for Venus.

[4] Jove's best fortune's urn From Homer, Iliad: Zeus (Jove) kept two urns in his palace, one filled with good gifts, the other with evil ones.

[5] Like sun-parched … city gate The dessicated body parts of "quartered" criminals, impaled as warning to would-be offenders on city gates.

[6] limbeck Alchemical still or retort.

[7] Aetna Volcano in Sicily.

[8] Elegy 19. To His Mistress Going to Bed Censoring authorities refused to let the publisher include this elegy in early collections of Donne's poems; it was first printed in an anthology, The Harmony of the Muses (1654), and did not appear in an edition of Donne's poems until 1669. It is numbered "Elegy 8" in some modern editions.

[9] spangled breastplate The stomacher; it covered the chest and was often richly ornamented.

[10] chime The lady wears a chiming watch.

Received by men: thou, angel, bringst with thee
A heaven like Mahomet's Paradise,[1] and though
Ill spirits walk in white, we easily know
By this these angels from an evil sprite:
Those set our hairs, but these our flesh upright.
    Licence my roving hands, and let them go,
Behind, before, above, between, below.[2]
Oh my America, my newfound land,
My kingdom, safeliest when with one man manned,
My mine of precious stones: my empery,° empire
How blest am I in this discovering thee!
To enter in these bonds, is to be free;
Then where my hand is set, my seal shall be.
    Full nakedness, all joys are due to thee;
As souls unbodied, bodies unclothed must be
To taste whole joys. Gems which you women use
Are like Atlanta's balls,[3] cast in men's views,
That when a fool's eye lighteth on a gem,
His earthly soul may covet theirs, not them.
Like pictures, or like books' gay coverings, made
For lay-men,[4] are all women thus arrayed;
Themselves are mystic books, which only we (Whom their imputed grace[5] will dignify)
Must see revealed. Then since I may know,
As liberally as to a midwife show
Thyself: cast all, yea, this white linen hence,
There is no penance, much less innocence.[6]
    To teach thee, I am naked first; why then
What needst thou have more covering than a man.

from Satires

Satire 3

Kind pity chokes my spleen; brave scorn forbids
Those tears to issue which swell my eye-lids;
I must not laugh, nor weep sins, and be wise,
Can railing then cure these worn maladies?
Is not our mistress, fair Religion,
As worthy of all our soul's devotion,
As virtue was to the first blinded age?
Are not heaven's joys as valiant to assuage
Lusts, as earth's honour was to them?[7] Alas,
As we do them in means, shall they surpass
Us in the end, and shall thy father's spirit
Meet blind philosophers in heaven, whose merit
Of strict life may be imputed faith,[8] and hear
Thee, whom he taught so easy ways and near
To follow, damned? Oh if thou dar'st, fear this;
This fear great courage, and high valour is.
Dar'st thou aid mutinous Dutch,[9] and dar'st thou lay
Thee in ships, wooden sepulchers, a prey
To leaders' rage, to storms, to shot, to dearth?
Dar'st thou dive seas, and dungeons of the earth?
Hast thou courageous fire to thaw the ice
Of frozen North discoveries? and thrice

[1] Mahomet's Paradise Heaven of erotic bliss. The sensual aspects of the Islamic version of Paradise are described in the Koran sura 55, 54–56, sura 56, 12–40, and sura 76, 12–22.

[2] Behind, before ... below The order of the words in this line varies in the manuscripts and printed editions.

[3] Atlanta's balls In classical legend, Atalanta said she would only marry a man who could defeat her in footrace. Her suitor Hippomenes won the challenge by dropping three golden balls as he ran; Atalanta stopped to pick them up. The speaker here reverses the story's gender dynamic.

[4] lay-men Referring to the traditional use of images to instruct non-clerics ("lay-men") who could not read the Bible itself; and to the ornate bindings commissioned by wealthy owners to cover books they probably would never read. The speaker proceeds to argue that women are like these kinds of pictures or books: externally beautiful, but only a favored few may "read" what lies inside.

[5] imputed grace Theological term associated with Protestantism: the justifying grace ascribed to a person through Christ's righteousness.

[6] this white ... innocence The color white is associated with both penitence and innocence. In some manuscripts and in the 1654 and 1669 printed editions, this line reads "There is no penance due to innocence," a more theologically conventional reading. Some manuscripts read "Here is no penance, much less innocence."

[7] them The virtuous ancients who lived in the "blinded age" before the Christian revelation; their motive for virtue was earthly fame.

[8] imputed faith The speaker daringly uses a key term from Protestant theology to suggest that ancient philosophers might be "saved" as a result of their own merits, which might constitute an "imputed faith."

[9] mutinous Dutch The (Protestant) Dutch had been in revolt against their (Catholic) Spanish occupiers since 1568.

Colder than salamanders,[1] like divine
Children in the oven,[2] fires of Spain, and the line,[3]
Whose countries' limbecks to our bodies be,[4]
Canst thou for gain bear? and must every he
Which cries not "Goddess" to thy Mistress, draw,
Or eat thy poisonous words? courage of straw!
Oh desperate coward, wilt thou seem bold, and
To thy foes and his (who made thee to stand Sentinel in his world's garrison) thus yield,
And for forbidden wars, leave the appointed field?
Know thy foes: the foul devil, whom thou
Striv'st to please, for hate, not love, would allow Thee fain his whole realm to be quit; and as
The world's all parts wither away and pass,
So the world's self, thy other loved foe, is
In her decrepit wane, and thou loving this,
Dost love a withered and worn strumpet; last,
Flesh (itself's death) and joys which flesh can taste,
Thou lovest; and thy fair goodly soul, which doth
Give this flesh power to taste joy, thou dost loathe.
Seek true religion. Oh where? Mirreus[5]
Thinking her unhoused here, and fled from us,
Seeks her at Rome;[6] there, because he doth know
That she was there a thousand years ago;
He loves her rags so, as we here obey
The statecloth[7] where the Prince sat yesterday.
Crants to such brave loves will not be enthralled,
But loves her only, who at Geneva is called Religion,[8] plain, simple, sullen, young,
Contemptuous, yet unhandsome: as among
Lecherous humors, there is one that judges
No wenches wholesome, but coarse country drudges.
Graius stays still at home here,[9] and because
Some preachers, vile ambitious bauds, and laws
Still new like fashions, bid him think that she
Which dwells with us, is only perfect, he Embraceth her whom his godfathers will Tender to him, being tender, as wards still Take such wives as their guardians offer, or Pay values.[10] Careless Phrygius doth abhor
All, because all cannot be good, as one
Knowing some women whores, dares marry none.
Graccus loves all as one, and thinks that so
As women do in diverse countries go
In diverse habits, yet are still one kind,
So doth, so is Religion; and this blindness too much light breeds; but unmoved thou
Of force must one, and forced but one allow;
And the right; ask thy father which is she,
Let him ask his; though truth and falsehood be Near twins, yet truth a little elder is;
Be busy to seek her, believe me this,
He's not of none, nor worst, that seeks the best.
To adore, or scorn an image, or protest,
May all be bad; doubt wisely; in strange way
To stand inquiring right, is not to stray;
To sleep, or run wrong, is. On a huge hill,
Cragged and steep, Truth stands, and he that will Reach her, about must, and about must go;
And what the hill's suddenness resists, win so;
Yet strive so, that before age, death's twilight,
Thy soul rest, for none can work in that night.
To will implies delay, therefore now do.
Hard deeds, the body's pains; hard knowledge too
The mind's endeavours reach, and mysteries
Are like the sun, dazzling, yet plain to all eyes.

---

[1] salamanders Reputed to be so naturally cold that they could extinguish fires by contact.

[2] Children in the oven Children who survived in the fiery furnace into which Nebuchadnezzar cast them. See Daniel 3.11–30.

[3] fires of Spain, and the line The tropical heat of the Spanish Main and the equatorial line; possibly also a reference to the "fires" of the Spanish inquisition.

[4] limbecks to our bodies be Because they make our bodies sweat: a limbeck is an alchemical still.

[5] Mirreus Some of the proper names the poem assigns to characters who hold various opinions (Mirreus, Graius, Graccus, Phrygius) have classical resonances; "Crants" (l. 49) sounds vaguely Dutch or German; but none appears to hold any particular significance.

[6] Seeks her at Rome Mirreus finds "true religion" in Catholicism.

[7] statecloth The canopy over the throne, or chair of state, respected as an emblem of the monarch's power.

[8] But loves … called / Religion "Crants" seeks "true religion" in the austere Protestantism of Genevan Calvinism.

[9] Graius stays still at home here "Graius" settles for the Church of England, but does so only because those around him do likewise.

[10] Pay values A ward who refused a marriage arranged by his or her guardian had to pay the guardian a compensatory fine.

Keep the truth which thou hast found; men do not stand
In so ill case here, that God hath with his hand
Signed kings blank-charters[1] to kill whom they hate,
Nor are they vicars, but hangmen to fate.
Fool and wretch, wilt thou let thy soul be tied
To man's laws, by which she shall not be tried
At the last day? Will it then boot thee
To say a Philip, or a Gregory,
A Harry, or a Martin taught thee this?[2]
Is not this excuse for mere contraries
Equally strong? Cannot both sides say so?
That thou mayest rightly obey power, her bounds know;
Those passed, her nature and name is changed; to be
Then humble to her is idolatry;
As streams are, Power is; those blest flowers that dwell
At the rough stream's calm head, thrive and do well,
But having left their roots, and themselves given
To the stream's tyrannous rage, alas are driven
Through mills, and rocks, and woods, and at last, almost Consumed in going, in the sea are lost:
So perish souls, which more choose men's unjust
Power from God claimed, than God himself to trust.

from Verse Letters

To Sir Henry Wotton[3]

Sir, more than kisses, letters mingle souls;
For thus, friends absent speak. This ease controls
The tediousness of my life: but for these
I could ideate nothing which could please,
But I should wither in one day, and pass
To a bottle° of hay, that am a lock of grass. bundle
Life is a voyage, and in our life's ways
Countries, courts, towns are rocks, or remoras;[4]
They break or stop all ships, yet our state's such,
That though than pitch they stain worse, we must touch.
If in the furnace of the even line,° the equator
Or under the adverse icy pole thou pine,
Thou know'st two temperate regions, girded in,
Dwell there: But Oh, what refuge canst thou win
Parched in the court, and in the country frozen?
Shall cities, built of both extremes, be chosen?
Can dung or garlic be a perfume? Or can
A scorpion and torpedo[5] cure a man?
Cities are worst of all three; of all three
(O knotty riddle) each is worst equally.
Cities are sepulchres; they who dwell there
Are carcasses, as if no such there were.
And courts are theatres, where some men play
Princes, some slaves, all to one end, and of one clay.
The country is a desert, where no good,
Gained (as habits, not born), is understood.
There men become beasts, and prone to more evils;
In cities blocks, and in a lewd court, devils.
As in the first chaos, confusedly,
Each element's qualities were in the other three,
So pride, lust, covetise,° being several covetousness
To these three places, yet all are in all,
And mingled thus, their issue is incestuous.
Falsehood is denizened.[6] Virtue is barbarous.
Let no man say there, "Virtue's flinty wall
Shall lock vice in me, I'll do none, but know all."
Men are sponges, which to pour out, receive,
Who know false play, rather than lose, deceive.
For in best understandings sin began,
Angels sinned first, then devils, and then man.
Only perchance beasts sin not; wretched we
Are beasts in all, but white integrity.
I think if men, which in these place live,
Durst look in themselves, and themselves retrieve,

[1] blank-charters Originally, legal papers that recorded a promise to supply the king with money: the amount of money was left blank, to be filled in by the king after it was signed. Here, warrants to have people killed, with the space for the victim's name left blank.

[2] a Philip ... thee this Respectively, King Philip II of Spain, Pope Gregory (either XIII or XIV), King Henry VIII, and Martin Luther: the group balances two Roman Catholic leaders against two Reformation leaders.

[3] To Sir Henry Wotton Administrator, diplomat, poet, and writer, Sir Henry Wotton (1568–1639) met Donne at Oxford and was a close friend. This poem appears to have been written in the late 1590s, when both men were looking to win positions at court.

[4] remoras Parasitical fish that could attach themselves to the bottom of ships and were thought to slow them down.

[5] torpedo Also known as the numbfish or crampfish; the electric ray.

[6] denizined Naturalized (as in a "naturalized citizen").

They would like strangers greet themselves, seeing then
Utopian youth, grown old Italian.[1]
  Be then thine own home, and in thyself dwell;
Inn anywhere; continuance maketh hell.
And seeing the snail, which everywhere doth roam,
Carrying his own house still, still is at home,
Follow (for he is easy paced) this snail,
Be thine own palace, or the world's thy jail.
And in the world's sea, do not like cork sleep
Upon the water's face; nor in the deep Sink like a lead without a line; but as
Fishes glide, leaving no print where they pass,
Nor making sound, so closely thy course go,
Let men dispute, whether thou breathe, or no.
Only in this be no Galenist:[2] to make Courts' hot ambitions wholesome, do not take
A dram of country's dullness; do not add
Correctives, but, as chemics, purge the bad.
But, sir, I advise not you, I rather do
Say o'er those lessons, which I learned of you:
Whom, free from German schisms, and lightness
Of France, and fair Italy's faithlessness,
Having from these sucked all they had of worth,
And brought home that faith which you carried forth,
I throughly° love; but if myself I've won thoroughly
To know my rules, I have, and you have

An Anatomy of the World

Wherein, by occasion of the untimely death of mistress Elizabeth Drury,[3] the frailty and the decay of this whole world is represented.

THE FIRST ANNIVERSARY

When that rich soul which to her heaven is gone,
Whom all they celebrate, who know they have one,
(For who is sure he hath a soul, unless
It see, and judge, and follow worthiness,
And by deeds praise it? he who doth not this,
May lodge an inmate soul, but 'tis not his.)
When that Queen ended here her progress time,[4]
And, as t' her standing house, to heaven did climb,
Where, loth to make the saints attend her long,
She's now a part both of the choir, and song,
This world, in that great earthquake languished;
For in a common bath of tears it bled,
Which drew the strongest vital spirits out:
But succoured then with a perplexed doubt,
Whether the world did lose or gain in this,
(Because since now no other way there is
But goodness, to see her, whom all would see,
All must endeavour to be good as she,)
This great consumption to a fever turned,
And so the world had fits; it joyed, it mourned;
And, as men think, that agues physic are,
And th' ague being spent, give over care,
So thou, sick world, mistak'st thyself to be
Well, when alas, thou'rt in a lethargy.
Her death did wound and tame thee then, and then
Thou mightst have better spared the sun, or man.
That wound was deep, but 'tis more misery,
That thou hast lost thy sense and memory.
'Twas heavy then to hear thy voice of moan,
But this is worse, that thou art speechless grown.
Thou has forgot thy name thou hadst; thou wast
Nothing but she, and her thou hast o'erpast.
For as a child kept from the font,[5] until
A prince, expected long, come to fulfil
The ceremonies, thou unnamed hadst laid,
Had not her coming, thee her palace made:
Her name defined thee, gave thee form, and frame,
And thou forget'st to celebrate thy name.
Some months she hath been dead (but being dead,

[1] Utopian youth ... Italian That is, an ideal youth turned old and depraved (from proverbial expressions concerning Italianate Englishmen, and Machiavelli).

[2] Galenist Follower of the ancient Roman doctor Galen, who believed that illness was a result of imbalance among the body's four "humors" and who cured an imbalance of one quality with a dose of its opposite.

[3] Elizabeth Drury The daughter of Sir Robert Drury; she died in December 1610, aged 14. Donne had never met her, but his sister Anne knew the family and possibly encouraged Donne to write the poem in hopes (ultimately successful) of patronage. A year later, Donne wrote a second poem to commemorate Elizabeth, The Second Anniversary. They are two of the few poems Donne published in his lifetime.

[4] progress time Monarch's ceremonial journey through the kingdom.

[5] font Baptismal font.

Measures of times are all determined)
But long she hath been away, long, long, yet none
Offers to tell us who it is that's gone.
But as in states doubtful of future heirs,
When sickness without remedy impairs
The present prince, they're loth it should be said,
The prince doth languish, or the prince is dead:
So mankind feeling now a general thaw,
A strong example gone, equal to law,
The cement which did faithfully compact
And glue all virtues, now resolved, and slacked,
Thought it some blasphemy to say sh' was dead;
Or that our weakness was discovered
In that confession; therefore spoke no more
Than tongues, the soul being gone, the loss deplore.
But though it be too late to succour thee,
Sick world, yea dead, yea putrefied, since she
Thy intrinsic balm, and thy preservative,
Can never be renewed, thou never live,
I (since no man can make thee live) will try,
What we may gain by thy anatomy.
Her death hath taught us dearly, that thou art
Corrupt and mortal in thy purest part.
Let no man say, the world itself being dead,
'Tis labour lost to have discovered
The world's infirmities, since there is none
Alive to study this dissection;
For there's a kind of world remaining still,
Though she which did inanimate and fill
The world, be gone, yet in this last long night,
Her ghost doth walk; that is, a glimmering light,
A faint weak love of virtue and of good
Reflects from her, on them which understood
Her worth; and though she have shut in all day,
The twilight of her memory doth stay;
Which, from the carcass of the old world, free,
Creates a new world; and new creatures be Produced: the matter and the stuff of this,
Her virtue, and the form our practice is.
And though to be thus elemented, arm
These creatures, from home-born intrinsic harm,
(For all assumed unto this dignity,
So many weedless paradises be,
Which of themselves produce no venomous sin,
Except some foreign serpent bring it in)
Yet, because outward storms the strongest break,
And strength itself by confidence grows weak,
This new world may be safer, being told
The dangers and diseases of the old:
For with due temper men do then forgo,
Or covet things, when they their true worth know.
There is no health; physicians say that we
At best, enjoy but a neutrality.
And can there be worse sickness, than to know
That we are never well, nor can be so?
We are born ruinous: poor mothers cry,
That children come not right, nor orderly,
Except they headlong come, and fall upon
An ominous precipitation.
How witty's ruin! how importunate
Upon mankind! it laboured to frustrate
Even God's purpose: and made woman, sent
For man's relief, cause of his languishment.
They were to good ends, and they are so still,
But accessory, and principal in ill.
For that first marriage was our funeral:
One woman at one blow, then killed us all,
And singly, one by one, they kill us now.
We do delightfully ourselves allow
To that consumption; and profusely blind,
We kill ourselves,[1] to propagate our kind.
And yet we do not that; we are not men:
There is not now that mankind, which was then,
When as the sun, and man, did seem to strive,
(Joint tenants of the world) who should survive.
When stag, and raven, and the long-lived tree,
Compared with man, died in minority;
When, if a slow-paced star had stol'n away
From the observer's marking, he might stay
Two or three hundred years to see't again,
And then make up his observation plain;
When, as the age was long, the size was great:
Man's growth confessed, and recompensed the meat:
So spacious and large, that every soul
Did a fair kingdom, and large realm control:
And when the very stature thus erect,
Did that soul a good way towards heaven direct.
Where is this mankind now? who lives to age,

---

[1] We kill ourselves Sex was believed to shorten life.

Fit to be made Methusalem[1] his page?
Alas, we scarce live long enough to try
Whether a new made clock run right, or lie.
Old grandsires talk of yesterday with sorrow,
And for our children we reserve tomorrow.
So short is life, that every peasant strives,
In a torn house, or field, to have three lives.[2]
And as in lasting, so in length is man
Contracted to an inch, who was a span;
For had a man at first in forests strayed,
Or shipwrecked in the sea, one would have laid
A wager, that an elephant, or whale,
That met him, would not hastily assail
A thing so equal to him: now alas,
The fairies and the pygmies well may pass
As credible; mankind decays so soon,
We're scarce our fathers' shadows cast at noon.
Only death adds to our length: nor are we grown
In stature to be men, till we are none.
But this were light, did our less volume hold
All the old text; or had we changed to gold
Their silver; or disposed into less glass
Spirits of virtue, which then scattered was.
But 'tis not so: we're not retired, but damped;
And as our bodies, so our minds are cramped:
'Tis shrinking, not close weaving that hath thus,
In mind and body both bedwarfed us.
We seem ambitious, God's whole work to undo;
Of nothing he made us, and we strive too,
To bring ourselves to nothing back; and we
Do what we can, to do 't so soon as he.
With new diseases on ourselves we war,
And with new physic, a worse engine far.
Thus man, this world's vice-emperor, in whom
All faculties, all graces are at home;
And if in other creatures they appear,
They're but man's ministers, and legates there,
To work on their rebellions, and reduce
Them to civility, and to man's use.
This man, whom God did woo, and loth t'attend
Till man came up, did down to man descend,
This man, so great, that all that is, is his,
Oh what a trifle, and poor thing he is!
If man were anything, he's nothing now:
Help, or at least some time to waste, allow
T' his other wants, yet when he did depart
With her whom we lament, he lost his heart.
She, of whom th' ancients seemed to prophesy,
When they called virtues by the name of she;
She in whom virtue was so much refined,
That for allay unto so pure a mind
She took the weaker sex, she that could drive
The poisonous tincture,[3] and the stain of Eve,
Out of her thoughts, and deeds; and purify
All, by a true religious alchemy;
She, she is dead; she's dead: when thou know'st this,
Thou know'st how poor a trifling thing man is.
And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
The heart being perished, no part can be free.
And that except thou feed (not banquet)[4] on
The supernatural food, religion,
Thy better growth grows withered, and scant;
Be more than man, or thou'rt less than an ant.
Then, as mankind, so is the world's whole frame
Quite out of joint, almost created lame:
For, before God had made up all the rest,
Corruption entered, and depraved the best:
It seized the angels, and then first of all
The world did in her cradle take a fall,
And turned her brains, and took a general maim
Wronging each joint of th' universal frame.
The noblest part, man, felt it first; and then
Both beasts and plants, cursed in the curse of man.
So did the world from the first hour decay,
That evening was beginning of the day,
And now the springs and summers which we see,
Like sons of women after fifty be.
And new philosophy calls all in doubt,
The element of fire is quite put out;[5]
The sun is lost, and th' earth, and no man's wit

---

[1] Methusalem I.e., Methuselah, who lived 969 years (Genesis 5.27).

[2] three lives Probably referring to certain kinds of leases, which lasted until the death of three named leasees.

[3] poisonous tincture Original sin.

[4] banquet That is, feed rather than snack or nibble: a banquet in the period could refer to an appetizer or dessert course.

[5] The element of fire … put out The astronomer Johannes Kepler (1571–1630) disproved the traditional belief that the earth was surrounded by a sphere of fire.

Can well direct him where to look for it.[1]
And freely men confess that this world's spent,
When in the planets, and the firmament
They seek so many new; they see that this
Is crumbled out again to his atomies.
'Tis all in pieces, all coherence gone;
All just supply, and all relation:
Prince, subject, father, son, are things forgot,
For every man alone thinks he hath got
To be a phoenix, and that there can be
None of that kind, of which he is, but he.
This is the world's condition now, and now
She that should all parts to reunion bow,
She that had all magnetic force alone,
To draw, and fasten sundered parts in one;
She whom wise nature had invented then
When she observed that every sort of men
Did in their voyage in this world's sea stray,
And needed a new compass for their way;
She that was best, and first original
Of all fair copies; and the general
Steward to Fate; she whose rich eyes, and breast,
Gilt the West Indies, and perfumed the East;
Whose having breathed in this world, did bestow
Spice on those isles, and bade them still smell so,
And that rich Indy which doth gold inter,
Is but as single money, coined from her:
She to whom this world must itself refer,
As suburbs, or the microcosm of her,
She, she is dead; she's dead: when thou know'st this,
Thou know'st how lame a cripple this world is.
And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
That this world's general sickness doth not lie
In any humour, or one certain part;
But as thou sawest it rotten at the heart,
Thou seest a hectic fever hath got hold
Of the whole substance, not to be controlled,
And that thou hast but one way, not to admit
The world's infection, to be none of it.
For the world's subtlest immaterial parts
Feel this consuming wound, and age's darts.
For the world's beauty is decayed, or gone,
Beauty, that's colour, and proportion.
We think the heavens enjoy their spherical,
Their round proportion embracing all.[2]
But yet their various and perplexed course,
Observed in diverse ages, doth enforce
Men to find out so many eccentric parts,
Such diverse down-right lines, such overthwarts,
As disproportion that pure form. It tears
The firmament in eight and forty shares,
And in these constellations then arise
New stars,[3] and old do vanish from our eyes:
As though heaven suffered earthquakes, peace or war,
When new towns rise, and old demolished are.
They have impaled within a zodiac
The free-born sun, and keep twelve signs awake
To watch his steps; the goat and crab control,
And fright him back, who else to either pole
(Did not these tropics fetter him) might run:
For his course is not round; nor can the sun
Perfect a circle, or maintain his way
One inch direct; but where he rose today
He comes no more, but with a cozening line,
Steals by that point, and so is serpentine:
And seeming weary with his reeling thus,
He means to sleep, being now fall'n nearer us.
So, of the stars which boast that they do run
In circle still, none ends where he begun.
All their proportion's lame, it sinks, it swells.
For of meridians, and parallels,
Man hath weaved out a net, and this net thrown
Upon the heavens, and now they are his own.
Loth to go up the hill, or labour thus
To go to heaven, we make heaven come to us.
We spur, we rein the stars, and in their race

[1] The sun is lost … look for it Referring to the cosmological uncertainty created by the new, heliocentric theories of Copernicus, Brahe, and Kepler.

[2] Their round proportion embracing all Beginning in line 251, Donne points to changes in astronomical models as a sign of universal change. Plato had suggested that planetary orbits were perfect circles (lines 251–52); Ptolemy had constructed a more complex model, still geocentric, that accounted for observed movements (line 253 forward). Ptolemy's model was itself under challenge in Donne's time by the work of astronomers such as Copernicus.

[3] New stars Brahe and Kepler had observed the appearance of new stars, and Galileo had discovered the moons of Jupiter; these observations all challenged belief in the unchangeableness of the firmament above the moon.

They're diversely content t' obey our pace.
But keeps the earth her round proportion still?
Doth not a Tenerife,[1] or higher hill
Rise so high like a rock, that one might think
The floating moon would shipwreck there, and sink?
Seas are so deep, that whales being struck today,
Perchance tomorrow, scarce at middle way
Of their wished journey's end, the bottom, die.
And men, to sound depths, so much line untie,
As one might justly think that there would rise
At end thereof, one of th' Antipodes:
If under all, a vault infernal be,
(Which sure is spacious, except that we
Invent another torment, that there must Millions into a strait hot room be thrust)
Then solidness, and roundness have no place.
Are these but warts, and pock-holes in the face
Of th' earth? Think so: but yet confess, in this
The world's proportion disfigured is,
That those two legs whereon it doth rely,
Reward and punishment are bent awry.
And, oh, it can no more be questioned,
That beauty's best, proportion, is dead,
Since even grief itself, which now alone
Is left us, is without proportion.
She by whose lines proportion should be Examined, measure of all symmetry,
Whom had that ancient[2] seen, who thought souls made
Of harmony, he would at next have said
That harmony was she, and thence infer,
That souls were but resultances from her,
And did from her into our bodies go,
As to our eyes, the forms from objects flow:
She, who if those great Doctors[3] truly said
That the Ark to man's proportions was made,
Had been a type for that, as that might be
A type of her in this, that contrary
Both elements, and passions lived at peace
In her, who caused all civil war to cease.
She, after whom what form soe'er we see
Is discord, and rude incongruity;
She, she is dead, she's dead; when thou know'st this
Thou know'st how ugly a monster this world is:
And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
That here is nothing to enamour thee:
And that, not only faults in inward parts,
Corruptions in our brains, or in our hearts,
Poisoning the fountains, whence our actions spring,
Endanger us: but that if everything
Be not done fitly and in proportion,
To satisfy wise, and good lookers-on,
(Since most men be such as most think they be)
They're loathsome too, by this deformity.
For good, and well, must in our actions meet;
Wicked is not much worse than indiscreet.
But beauty's other second element,
Colour, and lustre now, is as near spent.
And had the world his just proportion,
Were it a ring still, yet the stone is gone.
As a compassionate turquoise[4] which doth tell
By looking pale, the wearer is not well,
As gold falls sick[5] being stung with mercury,
All the world's parts of such complexion be.
When nature was most busy, the first week,
Swaddling the new born earth, God seemed to like
That she should sport herself sometimes, and play,
To mingle, and vary colours every day:
And then, as though she could not make enow,
Himself his various rainbow did allow.
Sight is the noblest sense of any one,
Yet sight hath only colour to feed on,
And colour is decayed: summer's robe grows
Dusky, and like an oft dyed garment shows.
Our blushing red, which used in cheeks to spread,
Is inward sunk, and only our souls are red.
Perchance the world might have recovered,
If she whom we lament had not been dead:
But she, in whom all white, and red, and blue
(Beauty's ingredients) voluntary grew,

---

[1] Tenerife Mountain on the island of Teneriffe, in the Canary Islands; it rises over 12,000 feet, but was often considered much higher in the period.

[2] that ancient Probably the ancient Greek mathematician and philosopher Pythagoras (born c. 560 BCE).

[3] great Doctors Church doctors or fathers, the patristic writers; Augustine and Ambrose both make this claim.

[4] compassionate turquoise Turquoise was reputed to change luster according to the health of the wearer.

[5] gold falls sick Gold amalgam, a mixture of gold with mercury, is paler than gold.

As in an unvexed paradise; from whom
Did all things verdure, and their lustre come,
Whose composition was miraculous,
Being all colour, all diaphanous,
(For air, and fire but thick gross bodies were
And liveliest stones but drowsy, and pale to her),
She, she, is dead; she's dead: when thou know'st this,
Thou know'st how wan a ghost this our world is:
And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
That it should more affright, than pleasure thee.
And that, since all fair colour then did sink,
'Tis now but wicked vanity, to think
To colour vicious deeds with good pretense,
Or with bought colours to elude men's sense.
Nor in aught more this world's decay appears,
Than that her influence the heaven forbears,
Or that the elements do not feel this,
The father, or the mother barren is.
The clouds conceive not rain, or do not pour
In the due birth time, down the balmy shower.
Th' air doth not motherly sit on the earth,
To hatch her seasons, and give all things birth.
Spring-times were common cradles, but are tombs;
And false conceptions fill the general wombs.
Th' air shows such meteors, as none can see,
Not only what they mean, but what they be.
Earth such new worms, as would have troubled much
Th' Egyptian Mages[1] to have made more such.
What artist now dares boast that he can bring
Heaven hither, or constellate anything,
So as the influence of those stars may be Imprisoned in an herb, or charm, or tree,
And do by touch, all which those stars could do?
The art is lost, and correspondence too.
For heaven gives little, and the earth takes less,
And man least knows their trade, and purposes.
If this commerce 'twixt heaven and earth were not
Embarred, and all this traffic quite forgot,
She, for whose loss we have lamented thus,
Would work more fully and powerfully on us.
Since herbs, and roots by dying, lose not all,
But they, yea ashes too, are medicinal,
Death could not quench her virtue so, but that
It would be (if not followed) wondered at:
And all the world would be one dying swan,
To sing her funeral praise, and vanish then.
But as some serpents' poison hurteth not,
Except it be from the live serpent shot,
So doth her virtue need her here, to fit
That unto us; she working more than it.
But she, in whom to such maturity
Virtue was grown, past growth, that it must die,
She, from whose influence all impressions came,
But, by receivers' impotencies, lame,
Who, though she could not transubstantiate
All states to gold, yet gilded every state,
So that some princes have some temperance;
Some counsellors some purpose to advance
The common profit; and some people have
Some stay, no more than kings should give, to crave;
Some women have some taciturnity,
Some nunneries, some grains of chastity.
She that did thus much, and much more could do,
But that our age was iron, and rusty too,
She, she is dead; she 's dead; when thou know'st this,
Thou know'st how dry a cinder this world is.
And learn'st thus much by our anatomy,
That 'tis in vain to dew, or mollify
It with thy tears, or sweat, or blood: nothing
Is worth our travail, grief, or perishing,
But those rich joys, which did possess her heart,
Of which she's now partaker, and a part.
But as in cutting up a man that's dead,
The body will not last out to have read
On every part, and therefore men direct
Their speech to parts, that are of most effect;
So the world's carcass would not last, if I
Were punctual in this anatomy.
Nor smells it well to hearers, if one tell
Them their disease, who fain would think they're well.
Here therefore be the end: and, blessed maid,
Of whom is meant whatever hath been said,
Or shall be spoken well by any tongue,
Whose name refines coarse lines, and makes prose song,
Accept this tribute, and his first year's rent,
Who till his dark short taper's end be spent,
As oft as thy feast sees this widowed earth,

Egyptian Mages From Exodus 7.10–12; Donne refers to the new snakes ("worms") that explorers in Africa and America were encountering.

Will yearly celebrate thy second birth,
That is, thy death. For though the soul of man
Be got when man is made, 'tis born but then
When man doth die. Our body's as the womb,
And as a midwife death directs it home.
And you her creatures, whom she works upon
And have your last, and best concoction
From her example, and her virtue, if you
In reverence to her, do think it due,
That no one should her praises thus rehearse,
As matter fit for chronicle, not verse,
Vouchsafe to call to mind, that God did make
A last, and lasting'st piece, a song. He spake
To Moses, to deliver unto all,
That song: because he knew they would let fall
The Law, the prophets, and the history,
But keep the song[1] still in their memory.
Such an opinion (in due measure) made
Me this great office boldly to invade.
Nor could incomprehensibleness deter
Me, from thus trying to imprison her.
Which when I saw that a strict grave could do,
I saw not why verse might not do so too.
Verse hath a middle nature: heaven keeps souls,
The grave keeps bodies, verse the fame enrols.

from Holy Sonnets

2[2]

As due by many titles I resign
Myself to thee, O God, first I was made
By thee, and for Thee, and when I was decayed
Thy blood bought that, the which before was Thine;
I am Thy son, made with Thyself to shine,
Thy servant, whose pains Thou hast still repaid,
Thy sheep, Thine image, and, till I betrayed
Myself, a temple of Thy Spirit divine;
Why doth the devil then usurp on me?
Why doth he steal, nay ravish, that's Thy right?
Except Thou rise and for Thine own work fight,
Oh I shall soon despair, when I do see
That Thou lov'st mankind well, yet wilt not choose me,
And Satan hates me, yet is loth to lose me.
—1633

5[3]

I am a little world made cunningly
Of elements, and an angelic sprite,
But black sin hath betrayed to endless night
My world's both parts, and (oh) both parts must die.
You which beyond that heaven which was most high
Have found new spheres, and of new lands can write,
Pour new seas in mine eyes, that so I might Drown my world with my weeping earnestly,
Or wash it, if it must be drowned no more:
But oh it must be burnt; alas the fire
Of lust and envy have burnt it heretofore,
And made it fouler; let their flames retire,
And burn me O Lord, with a fiery zeal
Of Thee and Thy house, which doth in eating heal.
—1635

6[4]

This is my play's last scene, here heavens appoint
My pilgrimage's last mile; and my race
Idly, yet quickly run, hath this last pace,
My span's last inch, my minute's last point,
And gluttonous death will instantly unjoint
My body and soul, and I shall sleep a space,
But my ever-waking part shall see that face
Whose fear already shakes my every joint:
Then, as my soul, to heaven her first seat, takes flight,
And earth-born body in the earth shall dwell,
So, fall my sins, that all may have their right,
To where they're bred, and would press me, to hell.
Impute me righteous,[5] thus purged of evil,
For thus I leave the world, the flesh, and devil.

7[1]

At the round earth's imagined corners, blow
Your trumpets, angels, and arise, arise
From death, you numberless infinities
Of souls, and to your scattered bodies go,
All whom the flood did, and fire shall o'erthrow,
All whom war, dearth, age, agues, tyrannies,
Despair, law, chance, hath slain, and you whose eyes
Shall behold God and never taste death's woe.[2]
But let them sleep, Lord, and me mourn a space,
For if above all these my sins abound,
'Tis late to ask abundance of Thy grace
When we are there; here on this lowly ground,
Teach me how to repent; for that's as good
As if Thou hadst sealed my pardon with Thy blood.
—1633

9[3]

If poisonous minerals, and if that tree,
Whose fruit threw death on else immortal us,
If lecherous goats, if serpents envious
Cannot be damned, alas, why should I be?
Why should intent or reason, born in me,
Make sins, else equal, in me more heinous?
And mercy being easy, and glorious
To God, in His stern wrath, why threatens He?
But who am I, that dare dispute with Thee?
O God, oh! of Thine only worthy blood
And my tears, make a heavenly Lethean flood,[4]
And drown in it my sins' black memory.
That Thou remember them, some claim as debt,
I think it mercy, if Thou wilt forget.

Death be not proud, though some have called thee
Mighty and dreadful, for thou are not so;
For those whom thou think'st thou dost overthrow
Die not, poor death, nor yet canst thou kill me.
From rest and sleep, which but thy pictures be,
Much pleasure; then from thee, much more must flow,
And soonest our best men with thee do go,
Rest of their bones, and soul's delivery.
Thou art slave to fate, chance, kings, and desperate men,
And dost with poison, war, and sickness dwell;
And poppy, or charms, can make us sleep as well
And better than thy stroke; why swell'st thou then?
One short sleep past, we wake eternally,
And death shall be no more; death, thou shalt die.

What if this present were the world's last night?
Mark in my heart, O soul, where thou dost dwell,
The picture of Christ crucified, and tell
Whether that countenance can thee affright,
Tears in His eyes quench the amazing light,
Blood fills His frowns, which from His pierced head fell,
And can that tongue adjudge thee unto hell,
Which prayed forgiveness for His foes' fierce spite?
No, no; but as in my idolatry
I said to all my profane mistresses,
Beauty, of pity, foulness only is
A sign of rigour:[7] so I say to thee,
To wicked spirits are horrid shapes assigned,
This beauteous form assures a piteous mind.

Show me, dear Christ, Thy spouse, so bright and clear.
What, is it she which on the other shore
Goes richly painted?[3] or which, robbed and tore,
Laments and mourns in Germany and here?[4]
Sleeps she a thousand, then peeps up one year?
Is she self-truth and errs? now new, now outwore?
Doth she, and did she, and shall she evermore
On one, on seven, or on no hill appear?[5]
Dwells she with us, or like adventuring knights
First travail we to seek and then make love?
Betray, kind husband, Thy spouse to our sights,
And let mine amorous soul court Thy mild dove,
Who is most true and pleasing to Thee then
When she's embraced and open to most men.

19[6]

Oh, to vex me, contraries meet in one:
Inconstancy unnaturally hath begot
A constant habit; that when I would not
I change in vows, and in devotion.
As humorous[7] is my contrition
As my profane love, and as soon forgot:
As riddlingly distempered, cold and hot,
As praying, as mute; as infinite, as none.
I durst not view heaven yesterday; and today
In prayers and flattering speeches I court God:
Tomorrow I quake with true fear of His rod.
So my devout fits come and go away
Like a fantastic ague: save that here
Those are my best days, when I shake with fear.

[7] humorous To be "humorous" in this context is to be affected by an imbalance of the four "humors" that affect body and mind; Donne's speaker oscillates between cold (melancholy and phlegm) hot (choler and sanguine), make him "distempered," unharmonious, in these mood swings.

Good Friday, 1613. Riding Westward

Let man's soul be a sphere, and then, in this,
The intelligence that moves, devotion is,[1]
And as the other spheres, by being grown
Subject to foreign motions, lose their own,
And being by others hurried every day,
Scarce in a year their natural form obey:
Pleasure or business, so our souls admit
For their First Mover, and are whirled by it.
Hence is't, that I am carried towards the West
This day, when my soul's form bends towards the East.
There I should see a sun, by rising set,
And by that setting endless day beget;
But that Christ on this cross did rise and fall,
Sin had eternally benighted all.
Yet dare I almost be glad, I do not see
That spectacle of too much weight for me.
Who sees God's face, that is self life, must die;
What a death were it then to see God die?
It made His own lieutenant, Nature, shrink,
It made His footstool crack, and the sun wink.
Could I behold those hands which span the poles,
And tune all spheres at once, pierced with those holes?
Could I behold that endless height which is
Zenith to us, and to our antipodes,
Humbled below us? or that blood which is
The seat of all our souls, if not of His,
Made dirt of dust, or that flesh which was worn
By God, for His apparel, ragged and torn?
If on these things I durst not look, durst I
Upon His miserable mother cast mine eye,
Who was God's partner here, and furnished thus
Half of that sacrifice, which ransomed us?
Though these things, as I ride, be from mine eye,
They are present yet unto my memory,
For that looks towards them; and thou look'st towards me,
O Saviour, as Thou hang'st upon the tree;
I turn my back to Thee, but to receive
Corrections, till Thy mercies bid Thee leave.
O think me worth Thine anger, punish me,
Burn off my rusts, and my deformity,
Restore Thine image, so much, by Thy grace,
That Thou may'st know me, and I'll turn my face.

A Hymn to God the Father

Wilt Thou forgive that sin where I begun,
Which is my sin, though it were done before?
Wilt Thou forgive those sins through which I run,
And do them still, though still I do deplore?
When Thou hast done, Thou hast not done,
For I have more.

Wilt Thou forgive that sin which I have won
Others to sin? and made my sin their door?
Wilt Thou forgive that sin which I did shun
A year, or two, but wallowed in, a score?
When Thou hast done, Thou hast not done,
For I have more.

I have a sin of fear, that when I have spun
My last thread, I shall perish on the shore;
But swear by Thyself, that at my death Thy sun
Shall shine as he shines now, and heretofore;
And, having done that, Thou hast done,
I have no more.[2]

[1] The intelligence … devotion is Donne invokes traditional cosmography, in which each heavenly sphere was controlled by its "intelligence" or spirit.

[2] I have no more "I fear no more" in the printed version; "have" in the manuscripts.

Hymn to God, My God, in My Sickness

Since I am coming to that holy room,[1]
Where, with thy choir of saints for evermore,
I shall be made thy music; as I come
I tune the instrument here at the door,
And what I must do then, think here before;

Whilst my physicians by their love are grown
Cosmographers,[2] and I their map, who lie
Flat on this bed, that by them may be shown
That this is my south-west discovery,
Per fretum febris, by these straits[3] to die;

I joy, that in these straits I see my west;
For, though those currents yield return to none,
What shall my west hurt me? As west and east
In all flat maps (and I am one) are one,[4]
So death doth touch the resurrection.

Is the Pacific Sea my home? Or are
The eastern riches?[5] Is Jerusalem?
Anian, and Magellan, and Gibraltar?[6]
All straits, and none but straits, are ways to them,
Whether where Japhet dwelt, or Cham, or Shem.[7]

We think that Paradise and Calvary,
Christ's cross and Adam's tree, stood in one place;[8]
Look, Lord, and find both Adams[9] met in me;
As the first Adam's sweat surrounds my face,
May the last Adam's blood my soul embrace.

So, in his purple wrapped, receive me, Lord,
By these his thorns give me his other crown;
And as to others' souls I preached thy word,
Be this my text, my sermon to mine own:
Therefore° that he may raise, the Lord throws down. so

MEDITATION 17

Nunc Lento Sonitu Dicunt, Morieris
Now, this bell tolling softly for another, says to me:
Thou must die

Perchance he for whom this bell tolls may be so ill, as that he knows not it tolls for him; and perchance I may think myself so much better than I am, as that they who are about me, and see my state, may have caused it to toll for me, and I know not that. The Church is catholic, universal, so are all her actions; all that she does belongs to all. When she baptizes a child, that action concerns me; for that child is thereby connected to that body which is my head too, and ingrafted into that body whereof I am a member. And when she buries a man, that action concerns me: all mankind is of one author, and is one volume; when one man dies, one chapter is not torn out of the book, but translated into a better language; and every chapter must be so translated; God employs several translators; some pieces are translated by age, some by sickness, some by war, some by justice; but God's hand is in every translation, and His hand shall bind up all our scattered leaves again for that library where every book shall lie open to one another. As therefore the bell that rings to a sermon calls not upon the preacher only, but upon the congregation to come, so this bell calls us all; but how much more me, who am brought so near the door by this sickness. There was a contention as far as a suit (in which both piety and dignity, religion and estimation, were mingled), which of the religious orders should ring to prayers first in the morning; and it was determined, that they should ring first that rose earliest. If we understand aright the dignity of this bell that tolls for our evening prayer, we would be glad to make it ours by rising early, in that application, that it might be ours as well as his, whose indeed it is. The bell doth toll for him that thinks it doth; and though it intermit again, yet from that minute that that occasion wrought upon him, he is united to God. Who casts not up his eye to the sun when it rises? but who takes off his eye from a comet when that breaks out? Who bends not his ear to any bell which upon any occasion rings? but who can remove it from that bell which is passing a piece of himself out of this world? No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the continent, a part of the main. If a clod be washed away by the sea, Europe is the less, as well as if a promontory were, as well as if a manor of thy friend's or of thine own were: any man's death diminishes me, because I am involved in mankind, and therefore never send to know for whom the bells tolls; it tolls for thee. Neither can we call this a begging of misery, or a borrowing of misery, as though we were not miserable enough of ourselves, but must fetch in more from the next house, in taking upon us the misery of our neighbours. Truly it were an excusable covetousness if we did, for affliction is a treasure, and scarce any man hath enough of it. No man hath affliction enough that is not matured and ripened by it, and made fit for God by that affliction. If a man carry treasure in bullion, or in a wedge of gold, and have none coined into current money, his treasure will not defray him as he travels. Tribulation is treasure in the nature of it, but it is not current money in the use of it, except we get nearer and nearer our home, heaven, by it. Another man may be sick too, and sick to death, and this affliction may lie in his bowels, as gold in a mine, and be of no use to him; but this bell, that tells me of his affliction, digs out and applies that gold to me: if by this consideration of another's danger I take mine own into contemplation, and so secure myself, by making my recourse to my God, who is our only security.

[1] Devotions Donne wrote Devotions (1624) during his convalescence from a dangerous illness. The book consists of 23 "stations," each consisting of a meditation, an expostulation, and a concluding prayer. Each of the meditations explores a stage of his illness (that is, a stage in the story of the little world of the body), by looking for correspondences to and implications of that stage in the larger world.

John Webster

c. 1578 – c. 1634 or 1638

John Webster's dark brooding tragedies, The White Devil and The Duchess of Malfi, continue to intrigue readers and playgoers. Webster is often called the last of the great dramatists of the English Renaissance, for after his death in the early 1630s there were no immediate successors who could match his dramatic skill—and in 1642, the authorities, under Puritan influence, closed the theaters.

Little is known about Webster himself. In 1666 the Great Fire of London destroyed many records, including those of St. Sepulchre Parish, which presumably documented Webster's birth, baptism, marriage, and death. Similarly, only three plays have survived that we know to be entirely of his own composition, although there is evidence that he wrote others. We do know that Webster was born some time around 1578, the son of a London carriage maker. His father, also John Webster, occasionally provided local theater companies with transportation for their productions; these business transactions might have provided the young Webster with the first taste of his future career. The elder Webster presumably belonged to the Merchant Taylors' Guild, so his son was educated at the prestigious Merchant Taylors' School. There he would have learned Latin and Greek and read a number of classical works. It is also probable that as a young man Webster studied law at the Middle Temple, a background that helps explain the playwright's frequent references to the law as well as the title of his tragicomedy, The Devil's Law Case (c. 1618).

By 1602, Webster had been hired by Philip Henslowe, London's most important theater producer. Henslowe's diaries indicate that he had engaged Webster to work with Thomas Dekker and Thomas Middleton on a play entitled Caesar's Fall. Throughout the early stages of his career Webster worked mostly in collaboration with others. But his reputation rests on the first two plays he wrote on his own. In The White Devil (c. 1612), a searing tragedy that seems to be based on an actual episode in Italian history, a beautiful but ruthless aristocrat has an adulterous affair and then murders her husband. The Duchess of Malfi (c. 1614) dramatizes an independent-minded if imprudent woman's destruction at the hands of her vengeful and selfish brothers. Disturbing, violent, and bloody, these tragedies raise metaphysical questions to which they give no clear answers.

In March of 1606 Webster married sixteen-year-old Sara Peniall. A son, John, was born less than two months later. The marriage appears to have been happy, and three daughters (Margery, Sara, and Elizabeth) followed. Though we know little of Webster's later life, he seems to have remained active as a playwright through much of the 1620s. Webster also wrote the pageant Monuments of Honour (1624) and collaborated on other dramatic works with such writers as William Rowley, Thomas Middleton, Thomas Heywood, John Fletcher, Philip Massinger, and John Ford.

As is the case with so many details of Webster's life, we have no reliable information about his death or burial. It is assumed that he died in the mid or late 1630s.

The Duchess of Malfi

TO THE RIGHT HONOURABLE GEORGE HARDING,
BARON BERKELEY, OF BERKELEY CASTLE AND KNIGHT
OF THE ORDER OF THE BATH TO THE ILLUSTRIOUS PRINCE CHARLES

My Noble Lord,

That I may present my excuse why, being a stranger to your Lordship, I offer this poem to your patronage, I plead this warrant: men who never saw the sea, yet desire to behold that regiment of waters, choose some eminent river to guide them thither, and make that, as it were, their conduct or postilion:[1] by the like ingenious means has your fame arrived at my knowledge, receiving it from some of worth, who both in contemplation and practice owe to your honour their clearest service. I do not altogether look up at your title; the ancientest nobility being but a relic of time past, and the truest honour indeed being for a man to confer honour on himself, which your learning strives to propagate, and shall make you arrive at the dignity of a great example. I am confident this work is not unworthy your honour's perusal, for by such poems as this poets have kissed the hands of great princes, and drawn their gentle eyes to look down upon their sheets of paper, when the poets themselves were bound up in their winding-sheets.[2] The like courtesy from your Lordship shall make you live in your grave, and laurel spring out of it, when the ignorant scorners of the Muses, that like worms in libraries seem to live only to destroy learning, shall wither neglected and forgotten. This work and myself I humbly present to your approved censure, it being the utmost of my wishes to have your honourable self my weighty and perspicuous[3] comment; which grace so done me shall ever be acknowledged

By your Lordship's in all duty and observance,
John Webster.

ACT 1, SCENE 1

(Enter Antonio and Delio.)

DELIO. You are welcome to your country, dear Antonio;
You have been long in France, and you return
A very formal Frenchman in your habit.° dress
How do you like the French court?
ANTONIO. I admire it;
In seeking to reduce both state and people
To a fixed order, their judicious king
Begins at home; quits° first his royal palace rids
Of flattering sycophants, of dissolute
And infamous persons, which he sweetly terms
His master's masterpiece, the work of heaven;
Consid'ring duly, that a prince's court
Is like a common fountain, whence should flow
Pure silver drops in general,[4] but if't chance

[2] winding-sheets Burial shrouds.

[3] perspicuous Distinguished.

[4] in general Everywhere.

Some cursed example poison't near the head,[1]
Death and diseases through the whole land spread.
And what is't makes this blessed government,
But a most provident council, who dare freely
Inform him the corruption of the times?
Though some o' th' court hold it presumption
To instruct princes what they ought to do,
It is a noble duty to inform them
What they ought to foresee. Here comes Bosola,
The only court-gall;[2] yet I observe his railing
Is not for simple love of piety:
Indeed he rails at those things which he wants;
Would be as lecherous, covetous, or proud,
Bloody, or envious, as any man,
If he had means to be so. Here's the Cardinal.

(Enter Bosola and Cardinal.)

BOSOLA. I do haunt you still.

CARDINAL. So.

BOSOLA. I have done you better service than to be slighted thus. Miserable age, where only the reward of doing well, is the doing of it!

CARDINAL. You enforce[3] your merit too much.

BOSOLA. I fell into the galleys in your service, where, for two years together, I wore two towels instead of a shirt, with a knot on the shoulder, after the fashion of a Roman mantle.[4] Slighted thus! I will thrive some way: black-birds fatten best in hard[5] weather; why not I in these dog-days?[6]

CARDINAL. Would you could become honest!

BOSOLA. With all your divinity do but direct me the way to it. I have known many travel far for it, and yet return as arrant knaves as they went forth, because they carried themselves always along with them.

(Exit Cardinal.)

Are you gone? Some fellows, they say, are possessed with the devil, but this great fellow were able to possess the greatest devil, and make him worse.

ANTONIO. He hath denied thee some suit?

BOSOLA. He and his brother are like plum-trees that grow crooked over standing-pools;[7] they are rich, and o'erladen with fruit, but none but crows, pies,[8] and caterpillars feed on them. Could I be one of their flattering panders,[9] I would hang on their ears like a horseleech, till I were full, and then drop off. I pray leave me. Who would rely upon these miserable dependencies, in expectation to be advanced to-morrow? What creature ever fed worse, than hoping Tantalus?[10] Nor ever died any man more fearfully, than he that hoped for a pardon. There are rewards for hawks and dogs, when they have done us service; but for a soldier that hazards his limbs in a battle, nothing but a kind of geometry is his last supportation.[11]

DELIO. Geometry!

BOSOLA. Ay, to hang in a fair pair of slings, take his latter swing in the world upon an honourable pair of crutches, from hospital to hospital. Fare ye well, sir. And yet do not you scorn us, for places in the court are but like beds in the hospital, where this man's head lies at that man's foot, and so lower and lower.

(Exit Bosola.)

DELIO. I knew this fellow seven years in the galleys
For a notorious murder; and 'twas thought
The Cardinal suborned[12] it: he was released

[11] nothing … supportation His last reward is a stiff and crooked body.

[12] suborned Arranged through devious means.

By the French general, Gaston de Foix,[1]
When he recovered Naples.
ANTONIO. 'Tis great pity
He should be thus neglected: I have heard
He's very valiant. This foul melancholy
Will poison all his goodness; for, I'll tell you,
If too immoderate sleep be truly said
To be an inward rust unto the soul,
It then doth follow want of action
Breeds all black malcontents, and their close rearing,[2]
Like moths in cloth, do hurt for want of wearing.

ACT 1, SCENE 2

(Enter Castruccio, Roderigo, Silvio, and Grisolan.)

DELIO. The presence[3] 'gins to fill: you promised me
To make me the partaker of the natures[4]
Of some of your great courtiers.
ANTONIO. The Lord Cardinal's,
And other strangers, that are now in court?
I shall: here comes the great Calabrian[5] Duke.

(Enter Ferdinand.)

FERDINAND. Who took the ring[6] oftenest?

SILVIO. Antonio Bologna, my Lord.

FERDINAND. Our sister Duchess's great master[7] of her household: give him the jewel. When shall we leave this sportive action and fall to action indeed?

CASTRUCCIO. Methinks, my Lord, you should not desire to go to war in person.

FERDINAND. Now, for some gravity; why, my Lord?

CASTRUCCIO. It is fitting a soldier arise to be a prince, but not necessary a prince descend to be a captain.

FERDINAND. No?

CASTRUCCIO. No, my Lord; he were far better do it by a deputy.

FERDINAND. Why should he not as well sleep, or eat by a deputy? This might take idle, offensive, and base office[8] from him, whereas the other deprives him of honour.

CASTRUCCIO. Believe my experience: that realm is never long in quiet, where the ruler is a soldier.

FERDINAND. Thou toldest me thy wife could not endure fighting.

CASTRUCCIO. True, my Lord.

FERDINAND. And of a jest she broke[9] of a captain she met full of wounds: I have forgot it.

CASTRUCCIO. She told him, my Lord, he was a pitiful fellow, to lie like the children of Ismael,[10] all in tents.[11]

FERDINAND. Why, there's a wit were able to undo all the chirurgeons[12] o' th' city, for although gallants[13] should quarrel, and had drawn their weapons, and were ready to go to it, yet her persuasions would make them put up.[14]

CASTRUCCIO. That she would, my Lord. How do you like my Spanish jennet?[15]

RODERIGO. He is all fire.

FERDINAND. I am of Pliny's[16] opinion, I think he was begot by the wind; he runs as if he were ballassed with quicksilver.[17]

SILVIO. True, my Lord, he reels from the tilt[18] often.

RODERIGO AND GRISOLAN. Ha, ha, ha!

[1] Gaston de Foix General (1489–1512) who served in the Italian wars (1494–1559).

[2] their … rearing Having been nurtured close at hand.

[3] presence Presence chamber, used for reception ceremonies.

[4] make … natures Tell me about the characters.

[5] Calabrian Calabria is a region in the southernmost "toe" of Italy.

[6] took the ring In jousting, where the goal is to thread a lance through a ring.

[7] great master Steward.

[8] base office Low tasks.

[9] broke Made.

[10] children of Ismael I.e., the children of Ishmael, a common name for Arabs.

[11] tents Reference to Genesis 16.12, concerning a prophecy that Ishmael would become a wild man and live in a tent. "Tents" can also mean "bandages."

[12] chirurgeons Surgeons.

[13] gallants Gentlemen.

[14] put up Sheathe their swords.

[15] jennet Horse.

[16] Pliny Pliny the Elder (23–79 CE), Roman author and scientist. In his Naturalis Historia he states that Portuguese mares were impregnated by the west wind.

[17] ballassed … quicksilver Ballasted with mercury.

[18] reels … tilt Resists running at the ring in jousting.

FERDINAND. Why do you laugh? Methinks you that are courtiers should be my touchwood,[1] take fire when I give fire; that is, not laugh but when I laugh, were the subject never so witty.

CASTRUCCIO. True, my Lord; I myself have heard a very good jest, and have scorned to seem to have so silly[2] a wit, as to understand it.

FERDINAND. But I can laugh at your fool, my Lord.

CASTRUCCIO. He cannot speak, you know, but he makes faces: my lady cannot abide him.

FERDINAND. No?

CASTRUCCIO. Nor endure to be in merry company; for she says too much laughing, and too much company, fills her too full of the wrinkle.

FERDINAND. I would then have a mathematical instrument made for her face, that she might not laugh out of compass.[3] I shall shortly visit you at Milan, Lord Silvio.

SILVIO. Your Grace shall arrive most welcome.

FERDINAND. You are a good horseman, Antonio: you have excellent riders in France. What do you think of good horsemanship?

ANTONIO. Nobly, my Lord: as out of the Grecian horse issued many famous princes,[4] so out of brave horsemanship arise the first sparks of growing resolution, that raise the mind to noble action.

FERDINAND. You have bespoke it worthily.

SILVIO. Your brother, the Lord Cardinal, and sister Duchess.

(Enter Cardinal, Duchess, Cariola, and Julia.)

CARDINAL. Are the galleys come about?

GRISOLAN. They are, my Lord.

FERDINAND. Here's the Lord Silvio is come to take his leave.

DELIO. Now, sir, your promise: what's that Cardinal? I mean his temper?[5] They say he's a brave fellow, will play his five thousand crowns at tennis, dance, court ladies, and one that hath fought single combats.

ANTONIO. Some such flashes[6] superficially hang on him, for form; but observe his inward character: he is a melancholy churchman; the spring[7] in his face is nothing but the engendering[8] of toads; where he is jealous of any man, he lays worse plots for him than ever was imposed on Hercules,[9] for he strews in his way flatterers, panders, intelligencers,[10] atheists, and a thousand such political[11] monsters. He should have been Pope, but instead of coming to it by the primitive decency of the Church, he did bestow bribes so largely, and so impudently, as if he would have carried it away[12] without heaven's knowledge. Some good he hath done—

DELIO. You have given[13] too much of him: what's his brother?

ANTONIO. The Duke there? A most perverse and turbulent nature:
What appears in him mirth is merely outside;
If he laugh heartily, it is to laugh
All honesty out of fashion.

DELIO. Twins?

ANTONIO. In quality.
He speaks with others' tongues, and hears men's suits
With others' ears; will seem to sleep o' th' bench[14]
Only to entrap offenders in their answers;
Dooms men to death by information,[15]
Rewards by hearsay.

DELIO. Then the law to him
Is like a foul black cobweb to a spider,
He makes it his dwelling and a prison
To entangle those shall feed him.

[2] silly Simple.

[3] out of compass Immoderately.

[4] Grecian … princes The Trojan horse containing Greek soldiers who crept out at night and sacked Troy.

[5] temper Disposition.

[6] flashes Instances of showy behavior.

[7] spring I.e., of water: his tears.

[8] engendering Birthplace.

[9] Hercules From Greek and Roman mythology. Hercules was required to complete a series of twelve arduous tasks as penance for murdering his wife and children in a fit of madness.

[10] intelligencers Spies.

[11] political Scheming.

[12] carried it away Done it.

[13] given Told.

[14] bench Judge's seat.

[15] information Testimony provided by paid informants.

ANTONIO. Most true:
He never pays debts unless they be shrewd turns,[1]
And those he will confess that he doth owe.
Last, for his brother there, the Cardinal,
They that do flatter him most say oracles[2]
Hang at his lips; and verily I believe them,
For the devil speaks in them.
But for their sister, the right noble Duchess,
You never fixed your eye on three fair medals
Cast in one figure, of so different temper.
For her discourse, it is so full of rapture,
You only will begin then to be sorry
When she doth end her speech, and wish, in wonder,
She held it less vain-glory,[3] to talk much,
Than your penance to hear her: whilst she speaks,
She throws upon a man so sweet a look,
That it were able to raise one to a galliard[4]
That lay in a dead palsy,° and to dote paralysis
On that sweet countenance; but in that look
There speaketh so divine a continence,
As cuts off all lascivious and vain hope.
Her days are practised in such noble virtue,
That sure her nights, nay more, her very sleeps,
Are more in heaven, than other ladies' shrifts.° confessions
Let all sweet ladies break their flattering glasses,° mirrors
And dress themselves in her.
DELIO. Fie, Antonio,
You play the wire-drawer with her commendation.[5]
ANTONIO. I'll case the picture up: only thus much,
All her particular worth, grows to this sum;
She stains° the time past, lights the time to come. eclipses
CARIOLA. You must attend my lady in the gallery,
Some half an hour hence.
ANTONIO. I shall.

(Exeunt Antonio and Delio.)

FERDINAND. Sister, I have a suit to you.[6]
DUCHESS. To me, sir?
FERDINAND. A gentleman here, Daniel de Bosola,
One that was in the galleys—
DUCHESS. Yes, I know him.
FERDINAND. A worthy fellow h'is: pray let me entreat for
The provisorship of your horse.[7]
DUCHESS. Your knowledge of him
Commends him and prefers him.
FERDINAND. Call him hither.

(Exit attendant.)

We are now upon parting. Good Lord Silvio,
Do us commend to all our noble friends
At the leaguer.° camp
SILVIO. Sir, I shall.
FERDINAND. You are for Milan?
SILVIO. I am.
DUCHESS. Bring the carroches:° we'll bring carriages
you down to the haven.° harbor

(Exeunt all but the Cardinal and Ferdinand.)

CARDINAL. Be sure you entertain that Bosola
For your intelligence:[8] I would not be seen in't;
And therefore many times I have slighted him,
When he did court our furtherance,° as this morning. help
FERDINAND. Antonio, the great master of her household,
Had been far fitter.
CARDINAL. You are deceived in him:
His nature is too honest for such business.
He comes: I'll leave you.

(Exit Cardinal. Enter Bosola.)

BOSOLA. I was lured to you.
FERDINAND. My brother here, the Cardinal could never Abide you.
BOSOLA. Never since he was in my debt.
FERDINAND. Maybe some oblique character[9] in your face
Made him suspect you.
BOSOLA. Doth he study physiognomy?

---

[1] shrewd turns Malicious acts.

[2] oracles Words of wisdom.

[3] vain-glory Empty pride.

[4] galliard Quick dance.

[5] You … commendation You draw out your praise of her unnecessarily.

[6] suit to you Favor to ask you.

[7] let … horse Let me ask you to make him the groom of your horse.

[8] entertain … intelligence Use Bosola as your spy.

[9] oblique character Hidden expression.

There's no more credit to be given to th' face,
Than to a sick man's urine, which some call
The physician's whore, because she cozens° him. fools
He did suspect me wrongfully.
FERDINAND. For that
You must give great men leave to take their times.
Distrust doth cause us seldom be deceived:
You see, the oft shaking of the cedar-tree
Fastens it more at root.
BOSOLA. Yet, take heed;
For to suspect a friend unworthily,
Instructs him the next way to suspect you,
And prompts him to deceive you.
FERDINAND. There's gold.
BOSOLA. So,
What follows? Never rained such showers as these Without thunderbolts i' th' tail of them:[1]
Whose throat must I cut?
FERDINAND. Your inclination to shed blood rides post
Before my occasion to use you. I give you that
To live i' th' court here, and observe the Duchess;
To note all the particulars of her 'haviour,
What suitors do solicit her for marriage,
And whom she best affects. She's a young widow:
I would not have her marry again.
BOSOLA. No, sir?
FERDINAND. Do not you ask the reason; but be satisfied
I say I would not.
BOSOLA. It seems you would create me
One of your familiars.
FERDINAND. Familiar! What's that?
BOSOLA. Why, a very quaint invisible devil in flesh;
An intelligencer.
FERDINAND. Such a kind of thriving thing
I would wish thee; and ere long, thou may'st arrive
At a higher place by't.
BOSOLA. Take your devils,
Which hell calls angels:[2] these cursed gifts would make
You a corrupter, me an impudent traitor;
And should I take these, they'd take me to hell.
FERDINAND. Sir, I'll take nothing from you, that I have given:
There is a place that I procured for you
This morning, the provisorship o' th' horse;
Have you heard on't?
BOSOLA. No.
FERDINAND. 'Tis yours: is't not worth thanks?
BOSOLA. I would have you curse yourself now, that your bounty
(Which makes men truly noble)[3] e'er should make Me a villain. O, that to avoid ingratitude
For the good deed you have done me, I must do
All the ill man can invent! Thus the devil
Candies all sins o'er; and what heaven terms vile
That names he complemental.° admirable
FERDINAND. Be yourself;
Keep your old garb of melancholy; 'twill express
You envy those that stand above your reach,
Yet strive not to come near 'em: this will gain
Access to private lodgings, where yourself
May, like a politic dormouse—
BOSOLA. As I have seen some,
Feed in a lord's dish, half asleep, not seeming
To listen to any talk; and yet these rogues
Have cut his throat in a dream. What's my place?
The provisorship o' th' horse? Say, then, my corruption
Grew out of horse-dung: I am your creature.
FERDINAND. Away.
BOSOLA. Let good men, for good deeds, covet good fame,
Since place[4] and riches, oft are bribes of shame:
Sometimes the devil doth preach.

(Exit Bosola. Enter Duchess, Cardinal, and Cariola.)

CARDINAL. We are to part from you; and your own discretion
Must now be your director.
FERDINAND. You are a widow:
You know already what man is; and therefore
Let not youth, high promotion, eloquence—
CARDINAL. No, nor anything without the addition, honour, Sway your high blood.

---

[1] Never ... them Reference to classical mythology. Zeus, god of sky and thunder, changes himself into a shower of gold in order to reach Danae, who is confined to a tower.

[2] angels Gold coins with an image of the Archangel Michael on them.

[3] noble I.e., money grants nobility.

[4] place I.e., place at court; office or position.

FERDINAND. Marry! They are most luxurious,[1]
Will wed twice.
CARDINAL. O, fie!
FERDINAND. Their livers[2] are more spotted
Than Laban's sheep.[3]
DUCHESS. Diamonds are of most value,
They say, that have past through most jewellers' hands.
FERDINAND. Whores, by that rule, are precious.
DUCHESS. Will you hear me?
I'll never marry.
CARDINAL. So most widows say;
But commonly that motion lasts no longer
Than the turning of an hour-glass: the funeral sermon
And it, end both together.
FERDINAND. Now hear me:
You live in a rank° pasture here, i' th' court; lustful
There is a kind of honey-dew[4] that's deadly;
'Twill poison your fame; look to't: be not cunning;
For they whose faces do belie their hearts,
Are witches ere they arrive at twenty years,
Ay, and give the devil suck.
DUCHESS. This is terrible good counsel.
FERDINAND. Hypocrisy is woven of a fine small thread,
Subtler than Vulcan's[5] engine: yet, believ't,
Your darkest actions, nay, your privat'st thoughts,
Will come to light.
CARDINAL. You may flatter yourself,
And take your own choice; privately be married
Under the eaves of night—
FERDINAND. Think't the best voyage
That e'er you made; like the irregular crab,
Which, though't goes backward, thinks that it goes right,
Because it goes its own way: but observe,
Such weddings may more properly be said
To be executed, than celebrated.
CARDINAL. The marriage night
Is the entrance into some prison.
FERDINAND. And those joys,
Those lustful pleasures, are like heavy sleeps
Which do forerun man's mischief.° misfortune
CARDINAL. Fare you well.
Wisdom begins at the end: remember it.

(Exit Cardinal.)

DUCHESS. I think this speech between you both was studied,
It came so roundly off.[6]
FERDINAND. You are my sister;
This was my father's poniard,° do you see? dagger
I'd be loath to see't look rusty, 'cause 'twas his.
I would have you to give o'er these chargeable revels,[7]
A visor and a mask[8] are whispering rooms
That were never built for goodness—fare ye well,
And beware that part, which like the lamprey,
Hath never a bone in't.
DUCHESS. Fie, sir.
FERDINAND. Nay,
I mean the tongue; variety of courtship;
What cannot a neat knave with a smooth tale
Make a woman believe: Farewell, lusty widow.

(Exit Ferdinand.)

DUCHESS. Shall this move me? If all my royal kindred
Lay in my way unto this marriage,
I'd make them my low footsteps; and even now,
Even in this hate, as men in some great battles,
By apprehending danger, have achieved
Almost impossible actions—I have heard soldiers say so—
So I through frights and threatenings will assay° try
This dangerous venture. Let old wives report
I winked,[9] and chose a husband. Cariola,
To thy known secrecy I have given up
More than my life—my fame.
CARIOLA. Both shall be safe:

---

[1] luxurious Unchaste.

[2] livers The liver was believed to be the source of passion.

[3] Laban's sheep Reference to Genesis 30.29–43, in which Jacob creates his own herd by taking the spotted sheep from Laban's herd.

[4] honey-dew Substance secreted by some plants which entraps insects.

[5] Vulcan In Roman mythology, Vulcan, the god of fire, created a net to catch his wife, Venus, and her lover, Mars. The net was made of threads so fine (or "subtle") that they could not be seen.

[6] It … off It was said with such straightforwardness.

[7] give … revels Abandon these expensive amusements.

[8] visor … mask Disguises worn at revels or masques.

[9] winked Turned a blind eye to a misdeed. From an old saying: "let the cat wink and let the mice play."

For I'll conceal this secret from the world,
As warily as those that trade in poison
Keep poison from their children.
DUCHESS. Thy protestation
Is ingenious and hearty: I believe it.
Is Antonio come?
CARIOLA. He attends you.
DUCHESS. Good dear soul,
Leave me; but place thyself behind the arras,[1]
Where thou may'st overhear us. Wish me good speed,
For I am going into a wilderness
Where I shall find no path, nor friendly clew,[2]
To be my guide.

(Exit Cariola. Enter Antonio.)

I sent for you: sit down;
Take pen and ink, and write: are you ready?
ANTONIO. Yes.
DUCHESS. What did I say?
ANTONIO. That I should write somewhat.
DUCHESS. O, I remember.
After these triumphs and this large expense,
It's fit, like thrifty husbands,[3] we inquire
What's laid up for tomorrow.
ANTONIO. So please your beauteous excellence.
DUCHESS. Beauteous!
Indeed I thank you: I look young for your sake;
You have ta'en my cares upon you.
ANTONIO. I'll fetch your Grace
The particulars of your revenue and expense.
DUCHESS. O, you are an upright treasurer; but you mistook:
For when I said I meant to make inquiry
What's laid up for to-morrow, I did mean
What's laid up yonder for me.
ANTONIO. Where?
DUCHESS. In heaven.
I am making my will, (as 'tis fit princes should,
In perfect memory,) and, I pray, sir, tell me
Were not one better make it smiling, thus,
Than in deep groans, and terrible ghastly looks,
As if the gifts we parted with procured
That violent distraction?
ANTONIO. O, much better.
DUCHESS. If I had a husband now, this care were quit:° gone
But I intend to make you overseer.
What good deed shall we first remember? Say.
ANTONIO. Begin with that first good deed begun i' th' world
After man's creation, the sacrament of marriage:
I'd have you first provide for a good husband;
Give him all.
DUCHESS. All?
ANTONIO. Yes, your excellent self.
DUCHESS. In a winding-sheet?
ANTONIO. In a couple.
DUCHESS. St. Winifred,[4] that were a strange will!
ANTONIO. 'Twere strange
If there were no will in you to marry again.
DUCHESS. What do you think of marriage?
ANTONIO. I take't, as those that deny purgatory,
It locally contains, or heaven, or hell,
There's no third place in't.
DUCHESS. How do you affect[5] it?
ANTONIO. My banishment, feeding my melancholy,
Would often reason thus.
DUCHESS. Pray, let's hear it.
ANTONIO. Say a man never marry, nor have children,
What takes that from him? Only the bare name
Of being a father, or the weak delight
To see the little wanton[6] ride a cock-horse° hobby-horse
Upon a painted stick, or hear him chatter
Like a taught starling.
DUCHESS. Fie, fie, what's all this?
One of your eyes is blood-shot; use my ring to't,
They say 'tis very sovereign: 'twas my wedding ring,
And I did vow never to part with it
But to my second husband.
ANTONIO. You have parted with it now.
DUCHESS. Yes, to help your eye-sight.
ANTONIO. You have made me stark blind.
DUCHESS. How?

---

[1] arras Hanging tapestry.

[2] clew Ball of thread used by Theseus to find his way through the labyrinth. From Greek mythology.

[3] husbands Stewards (with an obvious double meaning).

[4] St. Winifred Seventh-century Welsh saint, beheaded for rejecting the sexual propositions of Caradog of Hawarden.

[5] affect Like.

[6] wanton Brat (a term of affection).

ANTONIO. There is a saucy and ambitious devil,
Is dancing in this circle.
DUCHESS. Remove him.
ANTONIO. How?
DUCHESS. There needs small conjuration, when your finger
May do it; thus; is it fit?

(He kneels.)

ANTONIO. What said you?
DUCHESS. Sir,
This goodly roof of yours, is too low built;
I cannot stand upright in't nor discourse,
Without° I raise it higher; raise yourself; unless
Or, if you please, my hand to help you: so.

(He stands.)

ANTONIO. Ambition, madam, is a great man's madness,
That is not kept in chains, and close-pent rooms,
But in fair lightsome lodgings, and is girt° surrounded
With the wild noise of prattling visitants,° visitors
Which makes it lunatic beyond all cure.
Conceive not I am so stupid but I aim
Whereto your favours tend: but he's a fool,
That being a-cold, would thrust his hands i' th' fire
To warm them.
DUCHESS. So now the ground's broke,
You may discover what a wealthy mine
I make you lord of.
ANTONIO. O, my unworthiness!
DUCHESS. You were ill to sell yourself:
This darkening of your worth is not like that
Which tradesmen use i' th' city; their false lights
Are to rid bad wares off;[1] and I must tell you,
If you will know where breathes a complete man,
(I speak it without flattery,) turn your eyes,
And progress through yourself.
ANTONIO. Were there nor heaven nor hell,
I should be honest: I have long served virtue,
And ne'er ta'en wages of her.
DUCHESS. Now she pays it.
The misery of us that are born great!
We are forced to woo, because none dare woo us;
And as a tyrant doubles with his words,
And fearfully equivocates, so we
Are forced to express our violent passions
In riddles, and in dreams, and leave the path
Of simple virtue, which was never made
To seem the thing it is not. Go, go brag
You have left me heartless; mine is in your bosom:
I hope 'twill multiply love there. You do tremble:
Make not your heart so dead a piece of flesh,
To fear, more than to love me. Sir, be confident:
What is't distracts you? This is flesh and blood sir;
'Tis not the figure[2] cut in alabaster,
Kneels at my husbands tomb. Awake, awake, man!
I do here put off all vain ceremony,
And only do appear to you a young widow
That claims you for her husband, and like a widow,
I use but half a blush in't.[3]
ANTONIO. Truth speak for me:
I will remain the constant sanctuary
Of your good name.
DUCHESS. I thank you, gentle love:
And 'cause you shall not come to me in debt,
Being now my steward, here upon your lips
I sign your Quietus est.[4] This you should have begged now;
I have seen children oft eat sweetmeats thus,
As fearful to devour them too soon.
ANTONIO. But for your brothers?
DUCHESS. Do not think of them:
All discord without this circumference[5]
Is only to be pitied, and not feared:
Yet, should they know it, time will easily
Scatter the tempest.
ANTONIO. These words should be mine,
And all the parts you have spoke, if some part of it
Would not have savoured° flattery. resembled
DUCHESS. Kneel.

---

[1] darkening … off Reference to shops that kept their lights dim so that their customers would not notice shoddy wares.

[2] figure Statue.

[3] widow … in't I am less than embarrassed, having been married before.

[4] Quietus est Latin: It is finished, an accounting term indicating that all figures are correct, but also a metaphor for death.

[5] without this circumference Outside of the circle of the two of us.

(Enter Cariola.)

ANTONIO. Ha!
DUCHESS. Be not amazed, this woman's of my counsel:
I have heard lawyers say, a contract in a chamber
Per verba presenti[1] is absolute marriage.
Bless, heaven, this sacred Gordian,[2] which let violence
Never untwine!
ANTONIO. And may our sweet affections, like the spheres,[3]
Be still° in motion. always
DUCHESS. Quickening,[4] and make
The like soft music.
ANTONIO. That we may imitate the loving palms,[5]
Best emblem of a peaceful marriage
That never bore fruit divided.
DUCHESS. What can the Church force more?
ANTONIO. That fortune may not know an accident
Either of joy, or sorrow, to divide
Our fixed wishes.
DUCHESS. How can the Church build faster?
We now are man and wife, and 'tis the Church
That must but echo this.[6] Maid, stand apart:
I now am blind.
ANTONIO. What's your conceit° in this? idea
DUCHESS. I would have you lead your fortune by the hand
Unto your marriage bed:
(You speak in me this, for we now are one:)[7]
We'll only lie, and talk together, and plot
T'appease my humourous° kindred; and if you please, volatile
Like the old tale in Alexander and Lodowick,
Lay a naked sword between us, keep us chaste.[8]
O, let me shroud my blushes in your bosom,
Since 'tis the treasury of all my secrets!

(Exeunt.)

CARIOLA. Whether the spirit of greatness, or of woman
Reign most in her, I know not; but it shows
A fearful madness: I owe her much of pity.

(Exit.)

ACT 2, SCENE 1

(Enter Bosola and Castruccio.)

BOSOLA. You say, you would fain[9] be taken for an eminent courtier?

CASTRUCCIO. 'Tis the very main[10] of my ambition.

BOSOLA. Let me see: you have a reasonable good face for't already, and your night-cap[11] expresses your ears sufficient largely. I would have you learn to twirl the strings of your band[12] with a good grace, and in a set speech, at th' end of every sentence, to hum three or four times, or blow your nose till it smart again, to recover your memory. When you come to be a president[13] in criminal causes, if you smile upon a prisoner, hang him, but if you frown upon him, and threaten him, let him be sure to 'scape the gallows.

CASTRUCCIO. I would be a very merry president.

BOSOLA. Do not sup a' nights; 'twill beget you an admirable wit.

CASTRUCCIO. Rather it would make me have a good stomach to quarrel; for they say, your roaring boys[14] eat meat seldom, and that makes them so valiant. But how shall I know whether the people take me for an eminent fellow?

---

[1] Per verba present Latin: Through words in the present (tense)—a legal verbal contract.

[2] Gordian I.e., a Gordian knot, one that is exceedingly difficult to untie. Gordius, king of Phyrgia, was said to have tied a knot so intricate that it remained tied until cut by Alexander the Great.

[3] spheres Planets, whose harmonious orbits were thought to make sweet music.

[4] Quickening Coming to life.

[5] palms Palm trees, it was thought, needed to be fertilized by male palms in order to bear fruit.

[6] the Church … echo this The marriage will be confirmed by a church ceremony.

[7] we … one Reference to Ephesians 5.31, in which a married couple is said to have become one flesh.

[8] Alexander and Lodowick … chaste Old tale about two friends so alike as to be indistinguishable. Lodowick marries the Princess of Hungaria in Alexander's name, but places a sword between himself and his bride in bed, so as not to cuckold Alexander.

[9] fain Rather.

[10] main Goal.

[11] night-cap Skullcup, worn by lawyers.

[12] band Neck bank or ruff.

[13] president Magistrate.

[14] roaring boys Raucous young men, bullies.

BOSOLA. I will teach a trick to know it: give out you lie a-dying, and if you hear the common people curse you, be sure you are taken for one of the prime night-caps.[1]

(Enter an old lady.)

You come from painting now.

OLD LADY. From what?

BOSOLA. Why, from your scurvy face-physic.[2] To behold thee not painted, inclines somewhat near a miracle: these in thy face here, were deep ruts, and foul sloughs, the last progress. There was a lady in France, that having the small-pox, flayed the skin off her face, to make it more level; and whereas before she looked like a nutmeg-grater, after she resembled an abortive hedgehog.

OLD LADY. Do you call this painting?

BOSOLA. No, no, but you call't careening[3] of an old morphewed[4] lady, to make her disembogue[5] again: there's rough-cast phrase to your plastic.[6]

OLD LADY. It seems you are well acquainted with my closet.

BOSOLA. One would suspect it for a shop of witchcraft, to find in it the fat of serpents, spawn of snakes, Jews' spittle, and their young children's ordure;[7] and all these for the face. I would sooner eat a dead pigeon, taken from the soles of the feet of one sick of the plague, than kiss one of you fasting. Here are two of you, whose sin of your youth is the very patrimony[8] of the physician; makes him renew his foot-cloth[9] with the spring, and change his high-priced courtesan with the fall of the leaf. I do wonder you do not loathe yourselves. Observe my meditation now:

What thing is in this outward form of man
To be beloved? We account it ominous,
If nature do produce a colt, or lamb,
A fawn, or goat, in any limb resembling
A man, and fly from't as a prodigy.
Man stands amazed to see his deformity
In any other creature but himself.
But in our own flesh, though we bear diseases
Which have their true names only ta'en from beasts,
As the most ulcerous wolf and swinish measle,
Though we are eaten up of lice and worms,
And though continually we bear about us
A rotten and dead body, we delight
To hide it in rich tissue; all our fear,
Nay all our terror, is, lest our physician
Should put us in the ground, to be made sweet.
Your wife's gone to Rome: you two couple, and get you
To the wells at Lucca,[10] to recover your aches.

(Exeunt Castruccio and the old lady.)

I have other work on foot. I observe our Duchess
Is sick a-days, she pukes, her stomach seethes,
The fins° of her eyelids look most teeming blue,[11] edges
She wanes i' th' cheek, and waxes fat i' th' flank,
And, contrary to our Italian fashion,
Wears a loose-bodied gown; there's something in't.
I have a trick may chance discover it,
A pretty one: I have bought some apricocks,[12]
The first our spring yields—

(Enter Antonio and Delio.)

DELIO. And so long since married!
You amaze me.
ANTONIO. Let me seal your lips for ever:
For did I think, that anything but th' air

---

[1] prime night-caps Eminent lawyers.

[2] face-physic Healing your face; i.e., putting makeup on.

[3] careening Scraping paint off a ship.

[4] morphewed Skin-diseased.

[5] disembogue Leave the harbor for another journey.

[6] there's ... plastic In contrast to your changeable (or "plastic") face, here is some straight-talking.

[7] ordure Feces.

[8] patrimony Inheritance.

[9] foot-cloth Richly ornamented cloth laid over the back of a horse—a mark of wealth and dignity.

[10] Lucca Site of hot springs near Pisa.

[11] teeming blue Pregnant women's eyelids were thought to have a blue tinge to them.

[12] apricocks I.e., apricots, meant to discover the Duchess's pregnancy by revealing a craving for fruit.

Could carry these words from you, I should wish
You had no breath at all.

(To Bosola.)

Now, sir, in your contemplation?
You are studying to become a great wise fellow.

BOSOLA. O, sir, the opinion of wisdom, is a foul tetter,[1] that runs all over a man's body: if simplicity direct us to have no evil, it directs us to a happy being: for the subtlest folly proceeds from the subtlest wisdom: let me be simply honest.

ANTONIO. I do understand your inside.

BOSOLA. Do you so?

ANTONIO. Because you would not seem to appear to th' world
Puffed up with your preferment, you continue
This out-of-fashion melancholy: leave it, leave it.

BOSOLA. Give me leave to be honest in any phrase, in any complement whatsoever. Shall I confess myself to you? I look no higher than I can reach: they are the gods that must ride on winged horses. A lawyer's mule, of a slow pace, will both suit my disposition and business: for, mark me, when a man's mind rides faster than his horse can gallop, they quickly both tire.

ANTONIO. You would look up to heaven, but I think
The devil that rules i' th' air stands in your light.

BOSOLA. O, sir, you are lord of the ascendant, chief man with the Duchess; a Duke was your cousin-german removed.[2] Say you were lineally descended from King Pepin,[3] or he himself, what of this? Search the heads[4] of the greatest rivers in the world, you shall find them but bubbles of water. Some would think the souls of princes were brought forth by some more weighty cause, than those of meaner persons: they are deceived, there's the same hand to them; the like passions sway them; the same reason that makes a vicar to go to law for a tithe-pig,[5] and undo his neighbours, makes them spoil a whole province, and batter down goodly cities with the cannon.

(Enter Duchess and ladies.)

DUCHESS. Your arm, Antonio: do I not grow fat?
I am exceeding short-winded. Bosola,
I would have you, sir, provide for me a litter;
Such a one as the Duchess of Florence rode in.

BOSOLA. The Duchess used one when she was great with child.

DUCHESS. I think she did. Come hither, mend my ruff:
Here, when?[6] Thou art such a tedious lady; and
Thy breath smells of lemon pills:[7] would thou hadst done!
Shall I swoon under thy fingers? I am
So troubled with the mother.[8]

BOSOLA. (Aside.) I fear too much.

DUCHESS. I have heard you say, that the French courtiers
Wear their hats on 'fore the king.

ANTONIO. I have seen it.

DUCHESS. In the presence?

ANTONIO. Yes.

DUCHESS. Why should not we bring up that fashion?
'Tis ceremony more than duty, that consists
In the removing of a piece of felt:
Be you the example to the rest o' th' court,
Put on your hat first.

ANTONIO. You must pardon me:
I have seen, in colder countries than in France,
Nobles stand bare to th' prince; and the distinction
Methought showed reverently.

BOSOLA. I have a present for your Grace.

DUCHESS. For me, sir?

BOSOLA. Apricocks, madam.

DUCHESS. O, sir, where are they?
I have heard of none to year.[9]

BOSOLA. (Aside.) Good, her colour rises.

DUCHESS. Indeed I thank you: they are wondrous fair ones:

---

[1] tetter Skin disease.

[2] cousin-german removed First cousin once removed.

[3] King Pepin Pippin III (714–768), King of the Franks, and the father of Charlemagne.

[4] heads Headwaters.

[5] go … tithe-pig Go to court for a pig taken as a tithe (i.e., for nothing).

[6] when An expression of impatience.

[7] lemon pills Remedy for bad breath. Possibly "lemon peels."

[8] the mother Type of hysteria in which the victim feels choked.

[9] to year This year.

What an unskilful fellow is our gardner!
We shall have none this month.
BOSOLA. Will not your Grace pare° them? peel
DUCHESS. No: they taste of musk,[1] methinks; indeed they do.
BOSOLA. I know not: yet I wish your Grace had pared 'em.
DUCHESS. Why?
BOSOLA. I forgot to tell you, the knave gardener,
Only to raise his profit by them the sooner,
Did ripen them in horse-dung.
DUCHESS. O, you jest.

(To Antonio.)

You shall judge: pray, taste one.
ANTONIO. Indeed, madam,
I do not love the fruit.
DUCHESS. Sir, you are loath
To rob us of our dainties: 'tis a delicate fruit;
They say they are restorative.
BOSOLA. 'Tis a pretty art,
This grafting.
DUCHESS. 'Tis so: a bettering of nature.
BOSOLA. To make a pippin grow upon a crab,[2]
A damson on a black-thorn.[3] (Aside.) How greedily she eats them!
A whirlwind strike off these bawd farthingales!° petticoats
For, but for that, and the loose-bodied gown,
I should have discovered apparently
The young springal cutting a caper[4] in her belly.
DUCHESS. I thank you, Bosola: they were right good ones,
If they do not make me sick.
ANTONIO. How now, madam?
DUCHESS. This green fruit and my stomach are not friends:
How they swell me!
BOSOLA. (Aside.) Nay, you are too much swelled already.
DUCHESS. O, I am in an extreme cold sweat!
BOSOLA. I am very sorry.

(Exit.)

DUCHESS. Lights to my chamber. O, good Antonio,
I fear I am undone!
DELIO. Lights there, lights.

(Exit Duchess.)

ANTONIO. O my most trusty Delio, we are lost!
I fear she's fallen in labour; and there's left
No time for her remove.
DELIO. Have you prepared
Those ladies to attend her? And procured
That politic safe conveyance for the midwife,
Your Duchess plotted?
ANTONIO. I have.
DELIO. Make use then of this forced occasion:
Give out that Bosola hath poisoned her
With these apricocks; that will give some colour° reason
For her keeping close.[5]
ANTONIO. Fie, fie, the physicians
Will then flock to her.
DELIO. For that you may pretend
She'll use some prepared antidote of her own,
Lest the physicians should re-poison her.
ANTONIO. I am lost in amazement: I know not what to think on't.

(Exeunt.)

---

[1] musk Animal scent.

[2] pippin … crab Two types of apples.

[3] damson … black-thorn Two types of plums.

[4] young … caper Child dancing.

[5] keeping close Staying hidden away.

ACT 2, SCENE 2

(Enter Bosola.)

BOSOLA. So, so, there's no question but her tetchiness[1] and most vulturous eating of the apricocks, are apparent signs of breeding.

(Enter an old lady.)

Now?

OLD LADY. I am in haste, sir.

BOSOLA. There was a young waiting-woman, had a monstrous desire to see the glass-house—[2]

OLD LADY. Nay, pray let me go.

BOSOLA. And it was only to know what strange instrument it was, should swell up a glass to the fashion of a woman's belly.

OLD LADY. I will hear no more of the glass house. You are still abusing women.

BOSOLA. Who I? No, only, by the way, now and then, mention your frailties. The orange-tree bears ripe and green fruit and blossoms, altogether: and some of you give entertainment for pure love, but more, for precious reward. The lusty spring smells well; but drooping autumn tastes well. If we have the same golden showers, that rained in the time of Jupiter[3] the thunderer, you have the same Danaes still, to hold up their laps to receive them. Didst thou never study the mathematics?

OLD LADY. What's that, sir?

BOSOLA. Why, to know the trick how to make a many lines meet in one centre. Go, go, give your foster-daughters good counsel: tell them, that the devil takes delight to hang at a woman's girdle, like a false rusty watch, that she cannot discern how the time passes.

(Exit old lady. Enter Antonio, Roderigo, Delio, and Grisolan.)

ANTONIO. Shut up the court-gates.
RODERIGO. Why, sir? What's the danger?
ANTONIO. Shut up the posterns presently,° and call immediately
All the officers o' th' court.
GRISOLAN. I shall instantly.

(Exit.)

ANTONIO. Who keeps the key o' th' park gate?
RODERIGO. Forobosco.
ANTONIO. Let him bring't presently.

(Enter Grisolan and servants.)

1ST SERVANT. O, gentlemen o' th' court, the foulest treason!

BOSOLA. (Aside.) If that these apricocks should be poisoned now, without my knowledge!

1ST SERVANT. There was taken even now
A Switzer[4] in the Duchess's bed-chamber—
2ND SERVANT. A Switzer!
1ST SERVANT. With a pistol in his great cod-piece.[5]
BOSOLA. Ha, ha, ha!
1ST SERVANT. The cod-piece was the case for't.

2ND SERVANT. There was a cunning traitor; who would have searched his cod-piece?

1ST SERVANT. True, if he had kept out of the ladies' chambers: And all the moulds of his buttons were leaden bullets.

2ND SERVANT. O, wicked cannibal! A firelock in's codpiece!

1ST SERVANT. 'Twas a French plot, upon my life.
2ND SERVANT. To see what the devil can do!
ANTONIO. All the officers here?
SERVANTS. We are.
ANTONIO. Gentlemen,
We have lost much plate° you know; and but this evening money
Jewels, to the value of four thousand ducats,
Are missing in the Duchess's cabinet.° boudoir
Are the gates shut?
1ST SERVANT. Yes.
ANTONIO. 'Tis the Duchess's pleasure

---

[1] tetchiness Irritability.

[2] glass-house Workshop in which glass is produced.

[3] Jupiter Jupiter became a shower of gold to impregnate the imprisoned Danae.

[4] Switzer Soldier, mercenary from Switzerland.

[5] cod-piece Protruding bag on men's tightss, which covered the genitals.

Each officer be locked into his chamber
Till the sun-rising; and to send the keys
Of all their chests, and of their outward doors
Into her bed-chamber. She is very sick.
RODERIGO. At her pleasure.
ANTONIO. She entreats you take 't not ill: the innocent
Shall be the more approved by it.
BOSOLA. Gentlemen o' th' wood-yard,[1] where's your Switzer now?
1ST SERVANT. By this hand 'twas credibly reported by one o' th' blackguard.[2]

(Exeunt Gentlemen.)

DELIO. How fares it with the Duchess?
ANTONIO. She's exposed
Unto the worst of torture, pain and fear.
DELIO. Speak to her all happy comfort.
ANTONIO. How I do play the fool with mine own danger!
You are this night, dear friend, to post to Rome:
My life lies in your service.
DELIO. Do not doubt me.
ANTONIO. O, 'tis far from me! And yet fear presents me
Somewhat that looks like danger.
DELIO. Believe it,
'Tis but the shadow of your fear, no more:
How superstitiously we mind our evils!
The throwing down salt, or crossing of a hare,
Bleeding at nose, the stumbling of a horse,
Or singing of a cricket, are of power
To daunt whole man in us.[3] Sir, fare you well:
I wish you all the joys of a blest father;
And, for my faith, lay this unto your breast,
Old friends, like old swords, still are trusted best.

(Exit Delio. Enter Cariola with a child.)

CARIOLA. Sir, you are the happy father of a son:
Your wife commends him to you.
ANTONIO. Blessed comfort!
For heaven's sake tend her well: I'll presently
Go set a figure[4] for's nativity.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 2, SCENE 3

(Enter Bosola, with a dark lantern.)[5]

BOSOLA. Sure I did hear a woman shriek: list, ha!
And the sound came, if I received it right,
From the Duchess's lodgings. There's some stratagem
In the confining all our courtiers
To their several wards: I must have part of it;
My intelligence will freeze else. List, again!
It may be 'twas the melancholy bird,
Best friend of silence and of solitariness,
The owl, that screamed so. Ha! Antonio!

(Enter Antonio.)

ANTONIO. I heard some noise. Who's there? What art thou? Speak.
BOSOLA. Antonio? Put not your face nor body
To such a forced expression of fear:
I am Bosola, your friend.
ANTONIO. Bosola!
(Aside.) This mole does undermine me. Heard you not
A noise even now?
BOSOLA. From whence?
ANTONIO. From the Duchess's lodging.
BOSOLA. Not I: did you?
ANTONIO. I did, or else I dreamed.
BOSOLA. Let's walk towards it.
ANTONIO. No: it may be 'twas
But the rising of the wind.
BOSOLA. Very likely:
Methinks 'tis very cold, and yet you sweat.
You look wildly.
ANTONIO. I have been setting a figure[6]
For the Duchess's jewels.

---

[1] Gentlemen … wood-yard Men who work in the area where firewood is cut. Generally, "servants."

[2] blackguard Kitchen servants.

[3] daunt … us Make us afraid.

[4] set a figure Create a horoscope.

[5] dark lantern Lantern with shutters that open and close to control the amount of light emitted.

[6] setting a figure Casting a horoscope.

BOSOLA. Ah, and how falls your question?
Do you find it radical?[1]
ANTONIO. What's that to you?
'Tis rather to be questioned what design,° intention
When all men were commanded to their lodgings,
Makes you a night-walker.
BOSOLA. In sooth I'll tell you:
Now all the court's asleep, I thought the devil
Had least to do here; I came to say my prayers,
And if it do offend you I do so,
You are a fine courtier.
ANTONIO. (Aside.) This fellow will undo me.
You gave the Duchess apricocks today:
Pray heaven they were not poisoned.
BOSOLA. Poisoned! A Spanish fig[2]
For the imputation.° accusation
ANTONIO. Traitors are ever confident,
Till they are discovered. There were jewels stol'n too:
In my conceit, none are to be suspected
More than yourself.
BOSOLA. You are a false steward.
ANTONIO. Saucy slave, I'll pull thee up by the roots.
BOSOLA. Maybe the ruin will crush you to pieces.
ANTONIO. You are an impudent snake indeed, sir.
Are you scarce warm, and do you show your sting?[3]
BOSOLA.—[4]
ANTONIO. You libel well, sir.
BOSOLA. No, sir: copy it out,
And I will set my hand to't.
ANTONIO. My nose bleeds.
One that were superstitious would count
This ominous, when it merely comes by chance:
Two letters, that are wrote here for my name,[5]
Are drowned in blood!
Mere accident. For you, sir, I'll take order
I' th' morn you shall be safe—(Aside.) 'tis that must colour
Her lying in—sir, this door you pass not:
I do not hold it fit that you come near
The Duchess's lodgings, till you have quit° acquitted yourself.
(Aside.) The great are like the base; nay, they are the same,
When they seek shameful ways to avoid shame.

(Exit.)

BOSOLA. Antonio hereabout did drop a paper.
Some of your help, false friend. O, here it is:
What's here? A child's nativity calculated!
(Reading.) "The Duchess was delivered of a son, 'tween the hours twelve and one in the night, Anno Dom. 1504," (that's this year) "decimo nono Decembris," (that's this night,) taken according to the Meridian of Malfi" (that's our Duchess: happy discovery!) "The Lord of the first house being combust in the ascendant, signifies short life;[6] and Mars being in a human sign, joined to the tail of the Dragon,[7] in the eighth house, doth threaten a violent death. Caetera non scrutantur."[8]
Why, now 'tis most apparent: this precise fellow
Is the Duchess's bawd—I have it to my wish!
This is a parcel of intelligency
Our courtiers were cased up for: it needs must follow,
That I must be committed, on pretence
Of poisoning her; which I'll endure, and laugh at.
If one could find the father now! But that
Time will discover. Old Castruccio
I' th' morning posts to Rome: by him I'll send
A letter, that shall make her brothers' galls
O'erflow their livers. This was a thrifty way.[9]
Though lust do mask in ne'er so strange disguise,
She's oft found witty, but is never wise.

(Exit.)

---

[1] radical Solvable (through astrology).

[2] Spanish fig Term of contempt, accompanied by an obscene gesture.

[3] You … sting Reference to Aesop's fable "The Countryman and the Snake." The countryman brings home a nearly-frozen snake out of pity; when the snake revives, it attacks his family.

[4] Line missing.

[5] Two … name Either Antonio's initials embroidered on a handkerchief or two written letters addressed to him.

[6] The … life Astrological terms. The planet dominant at birth on 19 December is too near the sun and hence seemingly burnt up.

[7] Dragon No the constellation Draco, but one of the points at which the orbit of the moon intersects that of the sun.

[8] Caetera non scrutantur Latin: The rest do not determine.

[9] thrifty way Shrewd plan.

ACT 2, SCENE 4

(Enter Cardinal and Julia.)

CARDINAL. Sit: thou art my best of wishes. Prithee tell me,
What trick didst thou invent to come to Rome
Without thy husband?
JULIA. Why, my Lord, I told him
I came to visit an old anchorite° hermit
Here, for devotion.
CARDINAL. Thou art a witty false one;
I mean, to him.
JULIA. You have prevailed with me
Beyond my strongest thoughts: I would not now
Find you inconstant.
CARDINAL. Do not put thyself
To such a voluntary torture, which proceeds
Out of your own guilt.
JULIA. How, my Lord?
CARDINAL. You fear
My constancy, because you have approved
Those giddy and wild turnings in yourself.
JULIA. Did you ever find them?
CARDINAL. Sooth, generally; for women,
A man might strive to make glass malleable,
Ere he should make them fixed.
JULIA. So, my Lord.
CARDINAL. We had need go borrow that fantastic glass,
Invented by Galileo the Florentine,[1]
To view another spacious world i' th' moon,
And look to find a constant woman there.
JULIA. This is very well, my Lord.
CARDINAL. Why do you weep?
Are tears your justification? The self-same tears
Will fall into your husband's bosom, lady,
With a loud protestation that you love him
Above the world. Come, I'll love you wisely:
That's jealousy; since I am very certain
You cannot make me cuckold.
JULIA. I'll go home
To my husband.
CARDINAL. You may thank me, lady:
I have taken you off your melancholy perch,
Bore you upon my fist, and showed you game,
And let you fly at it.[2] I pray thee kiss me.
When thou was't with thy husband, thou was't watched
Like a tame elephant—still you are to thank me—
Thou hadst only kisses from him, and high feeding;[3]
But what delight was that? 'Twas just like one
That hath a little fingering on the lute,
Yet cannot tune° it—still you are to thank me. play
JULIA. You told me of a piteous wound i' th' heart,
And a sick liver, when you wooed me first,
And spake like one in physic.[4]
CARDINAL. Who's that?

(Enter servant.)

Rest firm, for my affection to thee,
Lightning moves slow to't.
SERVANT. Madam, a gentleman,
That's come post from Malfi, desires to see you.
CARDINAL. Let him enter: I'll withdraw.

(Exit.)

SERVANT. He says,
Your husband, old Castruccio, is come to Rome,
Most pitifully tired with riding post.

(Exit. Enter Delio.)

JULIA. Signior Delio! (Aside.) 'Tis one of my old suitors.
DELIO. I was bold to come and see you.
JULIA. Sir, you are welcome.
DELIO. Do you lie here?
JULIA. Sure, your own experience
Will satisfy you, no: our Roman prelates[5]
Do not keep lodging for ladies.
DELIO. Very well:

---

[1] fantastic … Florentine Telescope, credited here to Galileo Galilei (1564–1642), although not actually invented by him. Its mention here is an anachronism—Galileo did not publish his improvements of the telescope until around 1610.

[2] I … it The metaphor is drawn from falconry.

[3] high feeding Rich food.

[4] in physic Receiving medical treatment.

[5] Roman prelates Catholic leaders.

I have brought you no commendations from your husband,
For I know none by him.
JULIA. I hear he's come to Rome.
DELIO. I never knew man and beast, of a horse and a knight,
So weary of each other; if he had had a good back,
He would have undertook to have borne his horse,
His breech° was so pitifully sore. rump
JULIA. Your laughter
Is my pity.
DELIO. Lady, I know not whether
You want money, but I have bought you some.
JULIA. From my husband?
DELIO. No, from mine own allowance.
JULIA. I must hear the condition, ere I be bound to take it.
DELIO. Look on't, 'tis gold; hath it not a fine colour?
JULIA. I have a bird more beautiful.
DELIO. Try the sound on't.
JULIA. A lute-spring far exceeds it:
It hath no smell, like cassia,° or civet;° cinnamon / musk
Nor is it physical, though some fond doctors
Persuade us seethe't in cullises.[1] I'll tell you,
This is a creature bred by—

(Enter servant.)

SERVANT. Your husband's come,
Hath delivered a letter to the Duke of Calabria,
That to my thinking, hath put him out of his wits.

(Exit.)

JULIA. Sir, you hear:
Pray let me know your business, and your suit,
As briefly as can be.
DELIO. With good speed, I would wish you,
At such time as you are non-resident
With your husband, my mistress.
JULIA. Sir, I'll go ask my husband if I shall,
And straight return your answer.

(Exit.)

DELIO. Very fine.
Is this her wit, or honesty, that speaks thus?
I heard one say the Duke was highly moved
With a letter sent from Malfi. I do fear
Antonio is betrayed: how fearfully
Shows his ambition now! Unfortunate fortune!
They pass through whirlpools, and deep woes do shun,
Who the event weigh, ere the action's done.

(Exit.)

ACT 2, SCENE 5

(Enter Cardinal, and Ferdinand with a letter.)

FERDINAND. I have this night digged up a mandrake.[2]
CARDINAL. Say you?
FERDINAND. And I am grown mad with't.
CARDINAL. What's the prodigy?° omen
FERDINAND. Read there, a sister damned: she's loose i' th' hilts;[3]
Grown a notorious strumpet.
CARDINAL. Speak lower.
FERDINAND. Lower!
Rogues do not whisper't now, but seek to publish't
(As servants do the bounty of their lords)
Aloud; and with a covetous searching eye,
To mark who note them. O, confusion seize her!
She hath had most cunning bawds to serve her turn,
And more secure conveyances for lust,
Than towns of garrison for service.
CARDINAL. Is't possible?
Can this be certain?
FERDINAND. Rhubarb, O, for rhubarb,[4]
To purge this choler!° Here's the cursed day anger
To prompt my memory; and here't shall stick
Till of her bleeding heart I make a sponge
To wipe it out.
CARDINAL. Why do you make yourself
So wild a tempest?
FERDINAND. Would I could be one,

---

[1] cullises Broths, especially for the sick.

[2] mandrake Plant with magical powers, thought to provoke madness or death when uprooted.

[3] loose i' th' hilts Promiscuous.

[4] rhubarb Thought to purge anger.

That I might toss her palace 'bout her ears,
Root up her goodly forests, blast her meads,° meadows
And lay her general territory as waste,
As she hath done her honours.
CARDINAL. Shall our blood,
The royal blood of Aragon and Castile,
Be thus attainted?
FERDINAND. Apply desperate physic:
We must not now use balsamum,° but fire, balm
The smarting cupping-glass,[1] for that's the mean
To purge infected blood, such blood as hers.
There is a kind of pity in mine eye,
I'll give it to my handkerchief; and now 'tis here
I'll bequeath this to her bastard.
CARDINAL. What to do?
FERDINAND. Why, to make soft lint° for his mother's wounds, bandages
When I have hewed her to pieces.
CARDINAL. Cursed creature!
Unequal nature, to place women's hearts
So far upon the left side![2]
FERDINAND. Foolish men,
That e'er will trust their honour in a bark° small ship
Made of so slight weak bulrush as is woman,
Apt every minute to sink it!
CARDINAL. Thus ignorance, when it hath purchased honour,
It cannot wield it.
FERDINAND. Methinks I see her laughing:
Excellent hyena! Talk to me somewhat, quickly,
Or my imagination will carry me
To see her in the shameful act of sin.
CARDINAL. With whom?
FERDINAND. Happily° with some strong-thighed bargeman, perhaps
Or one o' th' wood-yard, that can quoit the sledge,[3]
Or toss the bar, or else some lovely squire
That carries coals up to her privy lodgings.
CARDINAL. You fly beyond your reason.
FERDINAND. Go to, mistress!
'Tis not your whore's milk that shall quench my wild-fire,
But your whore's blood.
CARDINAL. How idly shows this rage, which carries you,
As men conveyed by witches through the air,
On violent whirlwinds! This intemperate noise
Fitly resembles deaf men's shrill discourse,
Who talk aloud, thinking all other men
To have their imperfection.
FERDINAND. Have not you
My palsy?
CARDINAL. Yes; I can be angry
Without this rupture: there is not in nature
A thing that makes man so deformed, so beastly,
As doth intemperate anger. Chide yourself.
You have divers men, who never yet expressed
Their strong desire of rest, but by unrest,
By vexing of themselves. Come, put yourself
In tune.
FERDINAND. So, I will not only study to seem
The thing I am not. I could kill her now,
In you, or in myself; for I do think
It is some sin in us, heaven doth revenge
By her.
CARDINAL. Are you stark mad?
FERDINAND. I would have their bodies
Burnt in a coal-pit with the ventage° stopped, chimney
That their cursed smoke might not ascend to heaven;
Or dip the sheets they lie in in pitch or sulphur,
Wrap them in't, and then light them like a match;
Or else to boil their bastard to a cullis
And give't his lecherous father, to renew
The sin of his back.
CARDINAL. I'll leave you.
FERDINAND. Nay, I have done.
I am confident, had I been damned in hell,
And should have heard of this, it would have put me
Into a cold sweat. In, in, I'll go sleep.
Till I know who leaps my sister, I'll not stir:
That known, I'll find scorpions to string my whips,
And fix her in a general eclipse.[4]

(Exeunt.)

---

[1] cupping-glass Heated glass vessel used to draw blood, in this period a remedy for illness.

[2] hearts … side Deceitful people were believed to have their hearts farther to the left or "sinister" (Latin for "left") side.

[3] quoit the sledge Throw the hammer.

[4] fix … eclipse Put her into a state of darkness.

ACT 3, SCENE 1

(Enter Antonio and Delio.)

ANTONIO. Our noble friend, my most beloved Delio!
O, you have been a stranger long at court:
Came you along with the Lord Ferdinand?
DELIO. I did, sir: and how fares your noble Duchess?
ANTONIO. Right fortunately well: she's an excellent
Feeder of pedigrees; since you last saw her,
She hath had two children more, a son and daughter.
DELIO. Methinks 'twas yesterday; but let me wink,
And not behold your face—which to mine eye
Is somewhat leaner—verily I should dream
It were within this half hour.
ANTONIO. You have not been in law,° friend Delio, court
Nor in prison, nor a suitor at the court,
Nor begged the reversion° of some great man's place, inheritance
Nor troubled with an old wife, which doth make
Your time so insensibly hasten.
DELIO. Pray, sir, tell me,
Hath not this news arrived yet to the ear
Of the Lord Cardinal?
ANTONIO. I fear it hath:
The Lord Ferdinand, that's newly come to court,
Doth bear himself right dangerously.
DELIO. Pray, why?
ANTONIO. He is so quiet, that he seems to sleep
The tempest out, as dormice do in winter:
These houses that are haunted, are most still
Till the devil be up.
DELIO. What say the common people?
ANTONIO. The common rabble do directly say
She is a strumpet.
DELIO. And your graver heads,
Which would be politic, what censure° they? judge
ANTONIO. They do observe, I grow to infinite purchase,° wealth
The left hand way; and all suppose the Duchess
Would amend it, if she could: for, say they,
Great princes, though they grudge their officers
Should have such large and unconfined means
To get wealth under them, will not complain,
Lest thereby they should make them odious
Unto the people; for other obligation
Of love or marriage, between her and me,
They never dream of.
DELIO. The Lord Ferdinand
Is going to bed.

(Enter Duchess, Ferdinand, and Bosola.)

FERDINAND. I'll instantly to bed,
For I am weary. I am to bespeak° recommend
A husband for you.
DUCHESS. For me, sir! Pray who is't?
FERDINAND. The great Count Malateste.
DUCHESS. Fie upon him:
A count! He's a mere stick of sugar-candy;
You may look quite through him. When I choose
A husband, I will marry for your honour.
FERDINAND. You shall do well in't. How is't, worthy Antonio?
DUCHESS. But, sir, I am to have private conference with you
About a scandalous report is spread
Touching mine honour.
FERDINAND. Let me be ever deaf to't:
One of Pasquil's paper-bullets,[1] court-calumny,° slander
A pestilent air, which princes' palaces
Are seldom purged of. Yet, say that it were true,
I pour it in your bosom: my fixed love
Would strongly excuse, extenuate, nay, deny
Faults, were they apparent in you. Go, be safe
In your own innocency.
DUCHESS. O blessed comfort!
This deadly air is purged.

(Exeunt all but Ferdinand and Bosola.)

FERDINAND. Her guilt treads on Hot burning culters.[2] Now, Bosola,
How thrives our intelligence?
BOSOLA. Sir, uncertainly:

---

[1] Pasquil's paper-bullets Anonymous written satirical attacks, affixed to Pasquil or Pasquin, and hence "by"an Italian statue.

[2] culters Cultures, or plough blades. In medieval England, the ability to walk unharmed on red-hot plough blades was an indication of innocence.

'Tis rumoured she hath had three bastards, but
By whom, we may go read i' th' stars.
FERDINAND. Why some
Hold opinion, all things are written there.
BOSOLA. Yes, if we could find spectacles to read them.
I do suspect, there hath been some sorcery
Used on the Duchess.
FERDINAND. Sorcery! To what purpose?
BOSOLA. To make her dote on some desertless° fellow, undeserving
She shames to acknowledge.
FERDINAND. Can your faith give way
To think there's power in potions, or in charms,
To make us love whether we will or no?
BOSOLA. Most certainly.
FERDINAND. Away, these are mere gulleries,° deceptions
horrid things,
Invented by some cheating mountebanks,[1]
To abuse us. Do you think that herbs, or charms,
Can force the will? Some trials have been made
In this foolish practice, but the ingredients
Were lenitive poisons,[2] such as are of force
To make the patient mad; and straight the witch
Swears by equivocation[3] they are in love.
The witch-craft lies in her[4] rank blood. This night
I will force confession from her. You told me
You had got, within these two days, a false key
Into her bed-chamber.
BOSOLA. I have.
FERDINAND. As I would wish.
BOSOLA. What do you intend to do?
FERDINAND. Can you guess?
BOSOLA. No.
FERDINAND. Do not ask then:
He that can compass me, and know my drifts,° intentions
May say he hath put a girdle 'bout the world,
And sounded all her quicksands.
BOSOLA. I do not Think so.
FERDINAND. What do you think, then, pray?
BOSOLA. That you
Are your own chronicle too much, and grossly
Flatter yourself.
FERDINAND. Give me thy hand; I thank thee:
I never gave pension° but to flatterers, rewards, wages
Till I entertained thee. Farewell.
That friend a great man's ruin strongly checks,
Who rails into his belief all his defects.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 2

(Enter Duchess, Antonio, and Cariola.)

DUCHESS. Bring me the casket hither, and the glass.° mirror
You get no lodging here to night, my Lord.
ANTONIO. Indeed, I must persuade one.
DUCHESS. Very good:
I hope in time 'twill grow into a custom,
That noblemen shall come with cap and knee,[5]
To purchase a night's lodging of their wives.
ANTONIO. I must lie here.
DUCHESS. Must! You are a lord of misrule.[6]
ANTONIO. Indeed, my rule is only in the night.
DUCHESS. To what use will you put me?
ANTONIO. We'll sleep together.
DUCHESS. Alas, what pleasure can two lovers find in sleep!
CARIOLA. My Lord, I lie with her often; and I know
She'll much disquiet you.
ANTONIO. See, you are complained of.
CARIOLA. For she's the sprawlingest bedfellow.
ANTONIO. I shall like her the better for that.
CARIOLA. Sir, shall I ask you a question?
ANTONIO. Ay, pray thee, Cariola.
CARIOLA. Wherefore still, when you lie with my lady,
Do you rise so early?
ANTONIO. Labouring men
Count the clock oftenest, Cariola;
Are glad when their task's ended.
DUCHESS. I'll stop your mouth.

---

[1] mountebanks Itinerant peddlers of useless remedies.

[2] lenitive poisons Powerful drugs.

[3] equivocation Swearing that love and madness are the same thing.

[4] her I.e., the Duchess's.

[5] with cap and knee Kneeling, with cap in hand.

[6] lord of misrule Man of low rank chosen to preside over games at Christmas festivities. The reversal of roles was an important aspect of the revelry.

(She kisses him.)

ANTONIO. Nay, that's but one; Venus had two soft doves
To draw her chariot; I must have another.

(He kisses her.)

When wilt thou marry, Cariola?
CARIOLA. Never, my Lord.
ANTONIO. O, fie upon this single life! Forego it.
We read how Daphne, for her peevish flight,
Became a fruitless bay-tree; Syrinx turned
To the pale empty reed; Anaxarete[1]
Was frozen into marble: whereas those
Which married, or proved kind unto their friends,
Were by a gracious influence, transhaped
Into the olive, pomegranate, mulberry,
Became flowers, precious stones, or eminent stars.
CARIOLA. This is a vain poetry; but I pray you tell me,
If there were proposed me wisdom, riches, and beauty,
In three several young men, which should I choose?
ANTONIO. 'Tis a hard question: this was Paris's case,[2]
And he was blind in't, and there was great cause;
For how was't possible he could judge right,
Having three amorous goddesses in view,
And they stark naked? 'Twas a motion
Were able to benight the apprehension[3]
Of the severest counsellor of Europe.
Now I look on both your faces so well formed,
It puts me in mind of a question I would ask.
CARIOLA. What is't?
ANTONIO. I do wonder why hard-favoured° ladies, ugly
For the most part, keep worse-favoured waiting women,
To attend them, and cannot endure fair ones.
DUCHESS. O, that's soon answered.
Did you ever in your life know an ill painter
Desire to have his dwelling next door to the shop
Of an excellent picture-maker? 'Twould disgrace
His face-making, and undo him. I prithee,
When were we so merry? My hair tangles.
ANTONIO (Aside to Cariola.) Pray thee, Cariola, let's steal forth the room,
And let her talk to herself: I have divers times
Served her the like, when she hath chafed extremely.
I love to see her angry. Softly, Cariola.

(Exeunt Antonio and Cariola.)

DUCHESS. Doth not the colour of my hair 'gin to change?
When I wax gray, I shall have all the court
Powder their hair with arras[4] to be like me.
You have cause to love me; I entered you into my heart
Before you would vouchsafe to call for the keys.

(Enter Ferdinand unseen.)

We shall one day have my brothers take you napping:
Methinks his presence, being now in court,
Should make you keep your own bed; but you'll say
Love mixed with fear is sweetest. I'll assure you,
You shall get no more children till my brothers
Consent to be your gossips. Have you lost your tongue?

(She sees that Ferdinand holds a poniard.)

'Tis welcome:
For know, whether I am doomed to live or die,
I can do both like a prince.
FERDINAND. Die then quickly.

(Ferdinand gives her a poniard.)

Virtue, where art thou hid? What hideous thing
Is it that doth eclipse thee?
DUCHESS. Pray, sir, hear me.
FERDINAND. Or is it true thou art but a bare name,
And no essential thing?
DUCHESS. Sir—
FERDINAND. Do not speak.
DUCHESS. No, sir:
I will plant my soul in mine ears, to hear you.

---

[1] Daphne In Greek mythology, Daphne fled Apollo's advances, and asked to be changed into a laurel tree; Syrinx Spurned Pan's love and was turned into a reed; Anaxarete Rejected the shepherd Iphis. In despair, he killed himself, yet she did nothing to stop him. Aphrodite punished her by turning her to stone.

[2] Paris's case Paris was asked to choose which goddess was most beautiful, Hera, Athena, or Aphrodite; he chose Aphrodite.

[3] benight the apprehension Cloud the understanding.

[4] arras I.e., orris powder, made from ground orris-root.

FERDINAND. O, most imperfect light of human reason,
That mak'st us so unhappy to foresee
What we can least prevent! Pursue thy wishes,
And glory in them: there's in shame no comfort,
But to be past all bounds and sense of shame.
DUCHESS. I pray, sir, hear me: I am married.
FERDINAND. So.
DUCHESS. Happily, not to your liking: but for that,
Alas, your shears do come untimely now
To clip the bird's wings, that's already flown!
Will you see my husband?
FERDINAND. Yes. If I could change
Eyes with a basilisk.[1]
DUCHESS. Sure, you came hither
By his confederacy.
FERDINAND. The howling of a wolf
Is music to thee, screech-owl: prithee, peace.
Whate'er thou art that hast enjoyed my sister,
For I am sure thou hears't me, for thine own sake
Let me not know thee. I come hither prepared
To work thy discovery; yet am now persuaded
It would beget such violent effects
As would damn us both. I would not for ten millions
I had beheld thee: therefore use all means
I never may have knowledge of thy name;
Enjoy thy lust still, and a wretched life,
On that condition. And for thee, vile woman,
If thou do wish thy lecher may grow old
In thy embracements, I would have thee build
Such a room for him as our anchorites
To holier use inhabit. Let not the sun
Shine on him, till he's dead; let dogs and monkeys
Only converse with him, and such dumb things
To whom nature denies use to sound his name;
Do not keep a paraquito,° lest she learn it; parrot
It thou do love him, cut out thine own tongue
Lest it bewray° him. expose
DUCHESS. Why might not I marry?
I have not gone about in this to create
Any new world or custom.
FERDINAND. Thou art undone;
And thou hast ta'en that massy sheet of lead[2]
That hid thy husband's bones, and folded it
About my heart.
DUCHESS. Mine bleeds for't!
FERDINAND. Thine! Thy heart!
What should I name't, unless a hollow bullet° cannonball
Filled with unquenchable wild-fire?
DUCHESS. You are in this
Too strict; and were you not my princely brother,
I would say, too wilful: my reputation
Is safe.
FERDINAND. Dost thou know what reputation is?
I'll tell thee, to small purpose, since th' instruction
Comes now too late:
Upon a time Reputation, Love, and Death
Would travel o'er the world; and it was concluded
That they should part, and take three several ways.
Death told them, they should find him in great battles,
Or cities plagued with plagues. Love gives them counsel
To enquire for him 'mongst unambitious shepherds,
Where dowries were not talked of, and sometimes
'Mongst quiet kindred, that had nothing left
By their dead parents. "Stay," quoth Reputation,
"Do not forsake me; for it is my nature
If once I part from any man I meet,
I am never found again." And so, for you:
You have shook hands with Reputation,
And made him invisible. So fare you well:
I will never see you more.

(Exit. Enter Cariola and Antonio with a pistol.)

DUCHESS. You saw this apparition?
ANTONIO. Yes: we are Betrayed. How come he hither? I should turn
This to thee, for that.

(He points the pistol at Cariola.)

CARIOLA. Pray, sir, do; and when
That you have cleft my heart, you shall read there
Mine innocence.
DUCHESS. That gallery gave him entrance.
ANTONIO. I would this terrible thing would come again,
That, standing on my guard, I might relate
My warrantable° love! Ha! What means this? genuine

[1] change … basilisk Looking into the eyes of a basilisk was believed to cause death.

[2] massy … lead Lead lining of her first husband's coffin.

(She shows the poniard.)

DUCHESS. He left this with me.
ANTONIO. And it seems, did wish
You would use it on yourself.
DUCHESS. His action seemed
To intend so much.
ANTONIO. This hath a handle to't,
As well as a point: turn it towards him,
And so fasten the keen edge in his rank gall.

(Knocking.)

How now! Who knocks? More earthquakes!
DUCHESS. I stand
As if a mine beneath my feet were ready
To be blown up.
CARIOLA. 'Tis Bosola.
DUCHESS. Away.
O misery! Methinks unjust actions
Should wear these masks and curtains, and not we.
You must instantly part hence: I have fashioned it already.

(Exit Antonio. Enter Bosola.)

BOSOLA. The Duke your brother is ta'en up in a whirlwind;
Hath took horse, and 's rid post to Rome.
DUCHESS. So late!
BOSOLA. He told me, as he mounted into th' saddle,
You were undone.
DUCHESS. Indeed, I am very near it.
BOSOLA. What's the matter?
DUCHESS. Antonio, the master of our household,
Hath dealt so falsely with me in's accounts:
My brother stood engaged° with me for money committed
Ta'en up of[1] certain Neapolitan Jews,[2]
And Antonio lets the bonds be forfeit.
BOSOLA. Strange—(Aside.) this is cunning!
DUCHESS. And hereupon
My brother's bills at Naples are protested
Against.[3] Call up our officers.
BOSOLA. I shall.

(Exit Bosola. Enter Antonio.)

DUCHESS. The place that you must fly to, is Ancona:
Hire a house there; I'll send after you
My treasure, and my jewels. Our weak safety
Runs upon enginous° wheels: short syllables, devious
Must stand for periods.[4] I must now accuse you
Of such a feigned crime, as Tasso[5] calls
Magnanima menzogna, a noble lie,
'Cause it must shield our honours—hark, they are coming!

(Enter Bosola and officers.)

ANTONIO. Will your Grace hear me?
DUCHESS. I have got well by[6] you; you have yielded me
A million of loss: I am like to inherit
The people's curses for your stewardship.
You had the trick in audit-time to be sick,
Till I had signed your Quietus; and that cured you
Without help of a doctor. Gentlemen,
I would have this man be an example to you all,
So shall you hold my favour; I pray, let° him; release
For h'as done that, alas! You would not think of,
And, because I intend to be rid of him,
I mean not to publish. Use your fortune elsewhere.
ANTONIO. I am strongly armed to brook° endure
my overthrow:
As commonly men bear with a hard year,
I will not blame the cause on't; but do think
The necessity of my malevolent star
Procures this, not her humour. O, the inconstant
And rotten ground of service! You may see,
'Tis even like him, that in a winter night,
Takes a long slumber o'er a dying fire,
A-loath to part from't; yet parts thence as cold,
As when he first sat down.

---

[1] Ta'en up of Loaned from.

[2] Jews Throughout much of Western European history Jews were excluded from many occupations; money lending, widely considered by Christians to be inherently sinful, was an exception.

[3] protested /Against Called due.

[4] periods Full sentences.

[5] Tasso Torquato Tasso (1544–95), Italian epic poet.

[6] got well by Had enough of.

DUCHESS. We do confiscate
Towards the satisfying of your accounts,
All that you have.
ANTONIO. I am all yours; and 'tis very fit
All mine should be so.
DUCHESS. So, sir, you have your pass.
ANTONIO. You may see, gentlemen, what it is to serve
A prince with body and soul.

(Exit.)

BOSOLA. Here's an example for extortion: what moisture is drawn out of the sea, when foul weather comes pours down, and runs into the sea again.

DUCHESS. I would know what are your opinions
Of this Antonio.

2ND OFFICER. He could not abide to see a pig's head gaping: I thought your Grace would find him a Jew.

3RD OFFICER. I would you had been his officer, for your own sake.

4TH OFFICER. He stopped his ears with black wool, and to those came to him for money, said he was thick of hearing.

2ND OFFICER. Some said he was an hermaphrodite, for he could not abide a woman.

4TH OFFICER. How scurvy proud he would look, when the treasury was full! Well, let him go.

1ST OFFICER. Yes, and the chippings of the buttery[1] fly after him, to scour his gold chain.[2]

DUCHESS. Leave us.

(Exeunt officers.)

What do you think of these?
BOSOLA. That these are rogues, that in's prosperity,
But to have waited on his fortune, could have wished
His dirty stirrup rivetted through their noses;[3]
And followed after 's mule, like a bear in a ring.
Would have prostituted their daughters to his lust;
Made their first-born intelligencers; thought none happy
But such as were born under his blest planet,
And wore his livery:[4] and do these lice drop off now?
Well, never look to have the like again:
He hath left a sort of flattering rogues behind him;
Their doom must follow. Princes pay flatterers
In their own money, flatterers dissemble their vices,
And they dissemble their lies;[5] that's justice.
Alas, poor gentleman!
DUCHESS. Poor! He hath amply filled his coffers.
BOSOLA. Sure he was too honest. Plutus,[6] the god of riches,
When he's sent by Jupiter to any man,
He goes limping, to signify that wealth
That comes on God's name, comes slowly; but when he's sent
On the devil's errand, he rides post and comes in by scuttles.[7]
Let me show you, what a most unvalued jewel
You have in a wanton humour thrown away,
To bless the man shall find him. He was an excellent
Courtier, and most faithful; a soldier, that thought it
As beastly to know his own value too little,
As devilish to acknowledge it too much.
Both his virtue and form deserved a far better fortune.
His discourse° rather delighted to judge itself, than show itself: conversation
His breast was filled with all perfection,
And yet it seemed a private whispering-room,
It made so little noise of 't.
DUCHESS. But he was basely descended.
BOSOLA. Will you make yourself a mercenary herald,
Rather to examine men's pedigrees, than virtues?
You shall want him:
For know an honest statesman to a prince,
Is like a cedar planted by a spring:
The spring bathes the tree's root, the grateful tree
Rewards it with his shadow—you have not done so.
I would sooner swim to the Bermoothes[8] on
Two politicians' rotten bladders, tied

---

[1] chippings of the buttery Bread crumbs, used to polish gold.

[2] gold chain Indicating the office of steward.

[3] rivetted … noses Bears used for bear-baiting were controlled by rings in their noses.

[4] wore his livery Were in his service.

[5] flatterers … lies Flatterers lie about princes' vices, and princes lie about the flatterers' deceptions.

[6] Plutus The Greek personification of riches.

[7] by scuttles In a hurried run.

[8] Bermoothes Bermudas.

Together with an intelligencer's heart-string,
Than depend on so changeable a prince's favour.
Fare thee well, Antonio! Since the malice of the world
Would needs down with thee, it cannot be said yet
That any ill happened unto thee, considering thy fall
Was accompanied with virtue.
DUCHESS. O, you render me excellent music!
BOSOLA. Say you?
DUCHESS. This good one that you speak of, is my husband.
BOSOLA. Do I not dream? Can this ambitious age
Have so much goodness in't, as to prefer
A man merely for worth, without these shadows
Of wealth and painted honours? Possible?
DUCHESS. I have had three children by him.
BOSOLA. Fortunate lady!
For you have made your private nuptial bed
The humble and fair seminary° of peace: seed bed
No question but many an unbeneficed° scholar unsponsored
Shall pray for you for this deed, and rejoice
That some preferment in the world can yet
Arise from merit. The virgins of your land
That have no dowries, shall hope your example
Will raise them to rich husbands. Should you want
Soldiers, 'twould make the very Turks and Moors
Turn Christians, and serve you for this act.
Last, the neglected poets of your time,
In honour of this trophy of a man,
Raised by that curious engine, your white hand,
Shall thank you, in your grave, for't; and make that
More reverend than all the cabinets
Of living princes. For Antonio,
His fame shall likewise flow from many a pen,
When heralds shall want coats to sell to men.
DUCHESS. As I taste comfort in this friendly speech,
So would I find concealment.
BOSOLA. O, the secret of my prince,
Which I will wear on th' inside of my heart!
DUCHESS. You shall take charge of all my coin and jewels,
And follow him; for he retires himself
To Ancona.
BOSOLA. So.
DUCHESS. Whither, within few days,
I mean to follow thee.
BOSOLA. Let me think:
I would wish your Grace to feign a pilgrimage
To our lady of Loretto,[1] scarce seven leagues
From fair Ancona; so may you depart
Your country with more honour, and your flight
Will seem a princely progress, retaining
Your usual train about you.
DUCHESS. Sir, your direction
Shall lead me by the hand.
CARIOLA. In my opinion,
She were better progress to the baths at Lucca,
Or go visit the Spa
In Germany:[2] for, if you will believe me,
I do not like this jesting with religion,
This feigned pilgrimage.
DUCHESS. Thou art a superstitious fool!
Prepare us instantly for our departure.
Past sorrows, let us moderately lament them,
For those to come, seek wisely to prevent them.

(Exeunt Duchess and Cariola.)

BOSOLA. A politician is the devil's quilted anvil;
He fashions all sins on him, and the blows
Are never heard: he may work in a lady's chamber,
As here for proof. What rests° but I reveal remains
All to my Lord? O, this base quality
Of intelligencer! Why, every quality i' th' world
Prefers but[3] gain or commendation.
Now, for this act I am certain to be raised,
And men that paint weeds to the life,[4] are praised.

(Exit.)

ACT 3, SCENE 3

(Enter Cardinal, Ferdinand, Malateste, Pescara, Delio, and Silvio.)

---

[1] our lady of Loretto Shrine a few miles south of Ancona.

[2] Spa / In Germany Town in what is now Belgium near the German border from which the spa derives its name. Its waters are said to be medicinal.

[3] Prefers but Looks for only.

[4] to the life That look life-like.

Cardinal. Must we turn soldier then?
Malateste. The Emperor,[1]
Hearing your worth that way, ere you attained
This reverend garment, joins you in commission
With the right fortunate soldier, the Marquess of Pescara,
And the famous Lannoy.[2]
Cardinal. He that had the honour
Of taking the French king prisoner?
Malateste. The same.
Here's a plot drawn for a new fortification
At Naples.
Ferdinand. This great Count Malateste, I perceive,
Hath got employment?
Delio. No employment, my Lord;
A marginal note in the muster-book,[3] that he is
A voluntary lord.
Ferdinand. He's no soldier.
Delio. He has worn gunpowder in's hollow tooth,
For the tooth-ache.
Silvio. He comes to the leaguer with a full intent
To eat fresh beef and garlic, means to stay
Till the scent be gone, and straight return to court.
Delio. He hath read all the late service,[4]
As the City Chronicle[5] relates it:
And keeps two pewterers[6] going, only to express
Battles in model.
Silvio. Then he'll fight by the book.
Delio. By the almanac, I think,
To choose good days, and shun the critical;
That's his mistress's scarf.
Silvio. Yes, he protests
He would do much for that taffeta.
Delio. I think he would run away from a battle,
To save it from taking prisoner.
Silvio. He is horribly afraid
Gunpowder will spoil the perfume on't.
Delio. I saw a Dutchman break his pate° once head
For calling him pot-gun;[7] he made his head
Have a bore in't like a musket.
Silvio. I would he had made a touchhole[8] to't.
He is indeed a guarded sumpter-cloth,[9]
Only for the remove of the court.

(Enter Bosola.)

Pescara. Bosola arrived! What should be the business?
Some falling out amongst the Cardinals.
These factions amongst great men, they are like
Foxes, when their heads are divided,
They carry fire in their tails, and all the country
About them goes to wrack for't.[10]
Silvio. What's that Bosola?

Delio. I knew him in Padua—a fantastical scholar, like such, who study how many knots was in Hercules' club, of what colour Achilles' beard was, or whether Hector were not troubled with the tooth-ache. He hath studied himself half blear-eyed to know the true symmetry of Caesar's nose by a shoeing-horn;[11] and this he did to gain the name of a speculative man.

Pescara. Mark Prince Ferdinand:
A very salamander[12] lives in's eye,
To mock the eager violence of fire.

Silvio. That cardinal hath made more bad faces with his oppression than ever Michael Angelo[13] made good ones: he lifts up's nose, like a foul porpoise before a storm.

Pescara. The Lord Ferdinand laughs.
Delio. Like a deadly cannon, that lightens ere it

---

[1] Emperor Charles V (1500–58), Holy Roman Emperor from 1519–58.

[2] Marquess of Pescara Fernando Francesco Davalos (1489–1525), a hero of the Italian wars who captured Francis I of France in 1525; Lannoy Charles de Lannoy (1482–1527), appointed Viceroy of Naples by Charles V in 1522.

[3] muster-book Register of military personnel.

[4] late service Recent military developments.

[5] City Chronicle Official report about the affairs of the city.

[6] pewterers Workers in pewter, here as makers of figurines.

[7] pot-gun Boaster. Literally, a pop gun.

[8] touchhole Part of a gun to which fire was applied for ignition.

[9] sumpter-cloth Valuable blanket laid over the back of a horse.

[10] Foxes … for't Reference to Judges 15.4–5, in which Samson ties pairs of foxes together by their tails. He attaches lit torches to the tails and sets the foxes loose in the Philistines' fields, burning them.

[11] symmetry … shoeing-horn How Caesar's nose compared in symmetry to a shoe-horn.

[12] salamander Reptile thought to be able to live in fire.

[13] Michael Angelo Michaelangelo Buonarroti (1475–1564), Italian painter, sculptor, and poet.

smokes.
PESCARA. These are your true pangs of death,
The pangs of life, that struggle with great statesmen.
DELIO. In such a deformed silence, witches whisper their charms.
CARDINAL. Doth she make religion her riding hood
To keep her from the sun and tempest?
FERDINAND. That,
That damns her. Methinks her fault and beauty,
Blended together, show like leprosy,
The whiter, the fouler. I make it a question
Whether her beggarly brats were ever christened.
CARDINAL. I will instantly solicit the state of Ancona
To have them banished.
FERDINAND. You are for[1] Loretto:
I shall not be at your ceremony; fare you well.
Write to the Duke of Malfi, my young nephew
She had by her first husband, and acquaint him
With's mother's honesty.
BOSOLA. I will.
FERDINAND. Antonio!
A slave that only smelled of ink and counters
And never in's life looked like a gentleman,
But in the audit-time. Go, go presently,
Draw me out an hundred and fifty of our horse,
And meet me at the fort-bridge.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 4

(Enter two pilgrims to the Shrine of our Lady of Loretto.)

1ST PILGRIM. I have not seen a goodlier shrine than this,
Yet I have visited many.
2ND PILGRIM. The Cardinal of Aragon
Is this day to resign his cardinal's hat:
His sister duchess likewise is arrived
To pay her vow of pilgrimage. I expect
A noble ceremony.
1ST PILGRIM. No question. They come.

(Here the ceremony of the Cardinal's installment, in the habit of a soldier, performed in delivering up his cross, hat, robes, and ring, at the shrine, and investing him with sword, helmet, shield, and spurs: then Antonio, the Duchess, and their children, having presented themselves at the shrine, are [by a form of banishment in dumb-show expressed towards them by the Cardinal and the state of Ancona] banished. During all which ceremony, this ditty is sung, to very solemn music, by diverse churchmen, and then Exeunt all but the two pilgrims, who sing:)

Arms, and honours deck thy story,
To thy fame's eternal glory:
Adverse fortune ever fly thee;
No disastrous fate come nigh thee.

I alone will sing thy praises,
Whom to honour virtue raises;
And thy study, that divine is,
Bent to martial discipline is.
Lay aside all those robes lie by thee;
Crown thy arts with arms, they'll beautify thee.

O, worthy of worthiest name, adorned in this manner,
Lead bravely thy forces on, under war's warlike banner!
O, may'st thou prove fortunate in all martial courses!
Guide thou still by skill in arts and forces:
Victory attend thee nigh, whilst fame sings loud thy powers;
Triumphant conquest crown thy head, and blessings pour down showers![2]

1ST PILGRIM. Here's a strange turn of state! Who would have thought
So great a lady would have matched herself
Unto so mean a person? Yet the Cardinal
Bears him much too cruel.
2ND PILGRIM. They are banished.
1ST PILGRIM. But I would ask what power hath this state
Of Ancona, to determine of[3] a free prince?
2ND PILGRIM. They are a free state, sir, and her brother showed How that the Pope fore-hearing of her looseness,
Hath seized into the protection of the Church

[1] for Leaving for.

[2] Arms ... showers In the original printings of the play, this song was accompanied by a text note, which read "The Author disclaims this Ditty to be his." The authorship of the song is unknown.

[3] determine of Pass judgment on.

The Dukedom, which she held as dowager.
1ST PILGRIM. But by what justice?
2ND PILGRIM. Sure I think by none,
Only her brother's instigation.
1ST PILGRIM. What was it with such violence he took Off from her finger?
2ND PILGRIM. 'Twas her wedding ring.
Which he vowed shortly he would sacrifice
To his revenge.
1ST PILGRIM. Alas, Antonio!
If that a man be thrust into a well,
No matter who sets hand to't, his own weight
Will bring him sooner to th' bottom. Come, let's hence.
Fortune makes this conclusion general,
All things do help th' unhappy man to fall.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 3, SCENE 5

(Enter Duchess, Antonio, children, Cariola and servants.)

DUCHESS. Banished Ancona!
ANTONIO. Yes, you see what power
Lightens in great men's breath.
DUCHESS. Is all our train° entourage
Shrunk to this poor remainder?
ANTONIO. These poor men,
Which have got little in service, vow
To take your fortune: but your wiser buntings,[1]
Now they are fledged,[2] are gone.
DUCHESS. They have done wisely.
This puts me in mind of death: physicians thus,
With their hands full of money, use to give o'er
Their patients.
ANTONIO. Right° the fashion of the world: such is
From decayed fortunes every flatterer shrinks;
Men cease to build where the foundation sinks.
DUCHESS. I had a very strange dream tonight.
ANTONIO. What was't?
DUCHESS. Methought I wore my coronet[3] of state,
And on a sudden[4] all the diamonds
Were changed to pearls.
ANTONIO. My interpretation
Is, you'll weep shortly; for to me the pearls
Do signify your tears.
DUCHESS. The birds that live i' th' field
On the wild benefit of nature, live
Happier than we; for they may choose their mates,
And carol their sweet pleasures to the spring.

(Enter Bosola with a letter.)

BOSOLA. You are happily o'erta'en.
DUCHESS. From my brother?
BOSOLA. Yes, from the Lord Ferdinand, your brother.
All love and safety.
DUCHESS. Thou dost blanch° mischief, hide
Would'st make it white. See, see, like to calm weather
At sea before a tempest, false hearts speak fair
To those they intend most mischief.

(She reads the letter.)

"Send Antonio to me; I want his head in a business."
A politic equivocation!
He doth not want your counsel, but your head;
That is, he cannot sleep till you be dead.
And here's another pitfall that's strewed o'er
With roses; mark it, 'tis a cunning one;
"I stand engaged for your husband, for several debts at Naples: let not that trouble him; I had rather have his heart than his money."
And I believe so too.
BOSOLA. What do you believe?
DUCHESS. That he so much distrusts my husband's love,
He will by no means believe his heart is with him,
Until he see it: the devil is not cunning enough
To circumvent us in riddles.
BOSOLA. Will you reject that noble and free league
Of amity and love, which I present you?
DUCHESS. Their league is like that of some politic kings,
Only to make themselves of strength and power

---

[1] buntings Small birds.

[2] are fledged Have grown their adult feathers.

[3] coronet Small crown.

[4] on a sudden All of a sudden.

To be our after-ruin: tell them so.
BOSOLA. And what from you?
ANTONIO. Thus tell him; I will not come.
BOSOLA. And what of this?
ANTONIO. My brothers have dispersed
Blood-hounds abroad; which till I hear are muzzled,
No truce, though hatched with ne'er such politic skill,
Is safe, that hangs upon our enemies' will.
I'll not come at them.
BOSOLA. This proclaims your breeding:
Every small thing draws a base mind to fear,
As the adamant[1] draws iron. Fare you well, sir:
You shall shortly hear from 's.

(Exit.)

DUCHESS. I suspect some ambush:
Therefore by all my love I do conjure you
To take your eldest son, and fly towards Milan.
Let us not venture all this poor remainder,
In one unlucky bottom.[2]
ANTONIO. You counsel safely.
Best of my life, farewell, since we must part:
Heaven hath a hand in't: but no otherwise,
Than as some curious artist[3] takes in sunder
A clock, or watch, when it is out of frame,
To bring't in better order.
DUCHESS. I know not which is best,
To see you dead, or part with you. Farewell, boy:
Thou art happy, that thou hast not understanding
To know thy misery; for all our wit
And reading brings us to a truer sense
Of sorrow. In the eternal Church, sir,
I do hope we shall not part thus.
ANTONIO. O, be of comfort!
Make patience a noble fortitude,
And think not how unkindly we are used:
Man, like to cassia,[4] is proved best, being bruised.
DUCHESS. Must I, like to a slave-born Russian,
Account it praise to suffer tyranny?
And yet, O heaven, thy heavy hand is in't!
I have seen my little boy oft scourge his top,
And compared myself to't: nought made me e'er go right
But heaven's scourge-stick.
ANTONIO. Do not weep:
Heaven fashioned us out of nothing; and we strive
To bring ourselves to nothing. Farewell, Cariola,
And thy sweet armful. (To Duchess.) If I do never see thee more,
Be a good mother to your little ones,
And save them from the tiger: fare you well.
DUCHESS. Let me look upon you once more, for that speech
Came from a dying father: your kiss is colder
Than that I have seen an holy anchorite
Give to a dead man's skull.
ANTONIO. My heart is turned to a heavy lump of lead,
With which I sound my danger:[5] fare you well.

(Exit.)

DUCHESS. My laurel is all withered.
CARIOLA. Look, madam, what a troop of armed men
Make toward us.

(Enter Bosola and soldiers, with vizards.)

DUCHESS. O, they are very welcome!
When fortune's wheel is over-charged° overloaded
with princes,
The weight makes it move swift: I would have my ruin
Be sudden. I am your adventure,° am I not? prey
BOSOLA. You are: you must see your husband no more.
DUCHESS. What devil art thou, that counterfeits heaven's thunder?
BOSOLA. Is that terrible? I would have you tell me
Whether is that note worse that frights the silly birds
Out of the corn, or that which doth allure them
To the nets? You have hearkened to the last too much.
DUCHESS. O misery! Like to a rusty o'er-charged cannon.[6]
Shall I ne'er fly in pieces? Come, to what prison?
BOSOLA. To none.

---

[1] adamant Lodestone, a stone with magnetic properties.

[2] bottom Hold of a ship.

[3] artist Artisan, workman.

[4] cassia Cinnamon, which must be pounded out of bark.

[5] lead ... danger Sailors used to lower lumps of lead overboard to check depths, particularly in dangerous shallows.

[6] o'er-charged cannon Cannons would explode if packed with too much gunpowder.

Duchess. Whither, then?
Bosola. To your palace.
Duchess. I have heard that Charon's boat[1] serves to convey
All o'er the dismal lake, but brings none back again.
Bosola. Your brothers mean you safety and pity.
Duchess. Pity!
With such a pity men preserve alive
Pheasants and quails, when they are not fat enough
To be eaten.
Bosola. These are your children?
Duchess. Yes.
Bosola. Can they prattle?° talk
Duchess. No:
But I intend, since they were born accursed,
Curses shall be their first language.
Bosola. Fie, madam,
Forget this base, low fellow.
Duchess. Were I a man,
I'd beat that counterfeit face[2] into thy other.
Bosola. One of no birth.
Duchess. Say that he was born mean,
Man is most happy when's own actions
Be arguments and examples of his virtue.
Bosola. A barren, beggarly virtue.
Duchess. I prithee who is greatest, can you tell?
Sad tales befit my woe: I'll tell you one.
A salmon, as she swam unto the sea,
Met with a dog-fish, who encounters her
With this rough language: Why art thou so bold
To mix thyself with our high state of floods,
Being no eminent courtier, but one
That for the calmest, and fresh time o' th' year
Dost live in shallow rivers, rank'st thyself
With silly smelts and shrimps? And darest thou
Pass by our dog-ship without reverence?
O, quoth the salmon, sister, be at peace:
Thank Jupiter, we both have passed the net!
Our value never can be truly known,
Till in the fisher's basket we be shown:
I' th' market then my price may be the higher,
Even when I am nearest to the cook and fire.
So, to great men the moral may be stretched;
Men oft are valued high, when th' are most wretched.
But come, whither you please. I am armed 'gainst misery;
Bent to all sways of the oppressor's will:
There's no deep valley but near some great hill.

(Exeunt.)

Act 4, Scene 1

(Enter Ferdinand and Bosola.)

Ferdinand. How doth our sister Duchess bear herself
In her imprisonment?
Bosola. Nobly: I'll describe her.
She's sad, as one long used to't, and she seems
Rather to welcome the end of misery,
Than shun it; a behaviour so noble,
As gives a majesty to adversity:
You may discern the shape of loveliness
More perfect in her tears than in her smiles:
She will muse for hours together; and her silence,
Methinks, expresseth more than if she spake.
Ferdinand. Her melancholy seems to be fortified
With a strange disdain.
Bosola. 'Tis so; and this restraint,
Like English mastiffs[3] that grow fierce with tying,
Makes her too passionately apprehend
Those pleasures she's kept from.
Ferdinand. Curse upon her!
I will no longer study in the book
Of another's heart. Inform her what I told you.

(Exit. Enter Duchess with servants.)

Bosola. All comfort to your Grace.
Duchess. I will have none.
Pray thee, why dost thou wrap thy poisoned pills
In gold and sugar?
Bosola. Your elder brother, the Lord Ferdinand,
Is come to visit you, and sends you word,
'Cause once he rashly made a solemn vow

---

[1] Charon's boat In classical mythology, Charon is the ferryman of Hades, bringing the dead from one side of the River Styx to the other.

[2] counterfeit face I.e., masked face.

[3] mastiffs Large dogs.

Never to see you more, he comes i' th' night;
And prays you gently neither torch nor taper
Shine in your chamber: he will kiss your hand,
And reconcile himself; but, for his vow,
He dares not see you.
DUCHESS. At his pleasure.
Take hence the lights; he's come.

(Exit servants with the lights. Enter Ferdinand.)

FERDINAND. Where are you?
DUCHESS. Here, sir.
FERDINAND. This darkness suits you well.
DUCHESS. I would ask you pardon.
FERDINAND. You have it;
For I account it the honorabl'st revenge,
Where I may kill, to pardon. Where are your cubs?
DUCHESS. Whom?
FERDINAND. Call them your children,
For though our national law distinguish bastards
From true legitimate issue, compassionate nature
Makes them all equal.
DUCHESS. Do you visit me for this?
You violate a sacrament o' th' Church[1]
Shall make you howl in hell for't.
FERDINAND. It had been well,
Could you have lived thus always; for indeed,
You were too much i' th' light[2]—but no more;
I come to seal my peace with you. Here's a hand,

(He gives her a dead man's hand.)

To which you have vowed much love; the ring upon't
You gave.
DUCHESS. I affectionately kiss it.
FERDINAND. Pray do, and bury the print of it in your heart.
I will leave this ring with you, for a love-token;
And the hand, as sure as the ring; and do not doubt
But you shall have the heart too: when you need a friend,
Send it to him that owned° it: you shall see
Whether he can aid you.
DUCHESS. You are very cold:
I fear you are not well after your travel.
Ha! Lights! O, horrible!
FERDINAND. Let her have lights enough.

(Exit. Enter servants with lights.)

DUCHESS. What witchcraft[3] doth he practise, that he hath left
A dead man's hand here?

(Here is discovered, behind a traverse, the artificial figures of Antonio and his children,[4] appearing as if they were dead.)

BOSOLA. Look you, here's the piece, from which 'twas ta'en.
He doth present you this sad spectacle,
That, now you know directly they are dead,
Hereafter you may wisely cease to grieve
For that which cannot be recovered.
DUCHESS. There is not between heaven and earth one wish
I stay for after this: it wastes me more
Than were't my picture,° fashioned out of wax, image
Stuck with a magical needle, and then buried
In some foul dunghill; and yond's an excellent property
For a tyrant, which I would account mercy.
BOSOLA. What's that?
DUCHESS. If they would bind me to that lifeless trunk,[5]
And let me freeze to death.
BOSOLA. Come, you must live.
DUCHESS. That's the greatest torture souls feel in hell,
In hell that they must live, and cannot die.
Portia, I'll new kindle thy coals again,
And revive the rare and almost dead example

---

[1] sacrament ... Church I.e., her marriage to Antonio.

[2] i' th' light In the public eye.

[3] witchcraft A dead man's hand was thought to be used in witchcraft as a charm to fend off madness.

[4] traverse Stage curtain; Antonio and his children A discrepancy—their older son went with Antonio, but the rest have apparently remained with the Duchess (see Act 4, scene 2).

[5] lifeless trunk I.e., the dead body of Antonio.

Of a loving wife.[1]
BOSOLA. O fie! Despair? Remember
You are a Christian.
DUCHESS. The Church enjoins fasting:
I'll starve myself to death.
BOSOLA. Leave this vain sorrow.
Things being at the worst, begin to mend: the bee
When he hath shot his sting into your hand,
May then play with your eyelid.[2]
DUCHESS. Good comfortable fellow!
Persuade a wretch that's broke upon the wheel[3]
To have all his bones new set; entreat him live
To be executed again. Who must dispatch me?
I account this world a tedious theatre,
For I do play a part in't 'gainst my will.
BOSOLA. Come, be of comfort; I will save your life.
DUCHESS. Indeed I have not leisure to tend so small a business.
BOSOLA. Now, by my life, I pity you.
DUCHESS. Thou art a fool then,
To waste thy pity on a thing so wretched
As cannot pity itself. I am full of daggers.
Puff, let me blow those vipers from me.

(Enter servant.)

What are you?
SERVANT. One that wishes you long life.
DUCHESS. I would thou wert hanged for the horrible curse
Thou hast given me: I shall shortly grow° one become
Of the miracles of pity. I'll go pray, no,
I'll go curse.
BOSOLA. O, fie!
DUCHESS. I could curse the stars.
BOSOLA. O, fearful!
DUCHESS. And those three smiling seasons of the year
Into a Russian winter: nay the world
To its first chaos.
BOSOLA. Look you, the stars shine still.
DUCHESS. O, but you must
Remember, my curse hath a great way to go:
Plagues, that make lanes through largest families,
Consume them.
BOSOLA. Fie, lady!
DUCHESS. Let them like tyrants
Never be remembered, but for the ill they have done;
Let all the zealous prayers of mortified
Churchmen forget them,—
BOSOLA. O, uncharitable!
DUCHESS. Let heaven, a little while, cease crowning martyrs,
To punish them. Go, howl them this, and say, I long to bleed:
It is some mercy when men kill with speed.

(Exit Bosola and servant. Enter Ferdinand.)

FERDINAND. Excellent, as I would wish; she's plagued in art:[4]
These presentations are but framed in wax,
By the curious master in that quality,
Vincentio Lauriola, and she takes them
For true substantial bodies.
BOSOLA. Why do you do this?
FERDINAND. To bring her to despair.
BOSOLA. 'Faith, end here,
And go no farther in your cruelty;
Send her a penitential garment to put on
Next to her delicate skin, and furnish her
With beads, and prayer-books.
FERDINAND. Damn her! That body of hers,
While that my blood ran pure in't, was more worth
Than that which thou wouldst comfort, called a soul.
I will send her masks of common courtesans,
Have her meat served up by bawds and ruffians,
And, 'cause she'll needs be mad, I am resolved
To remove forth the common hospital
All the mad-folk, and place them near her lodging;
There let them practise together, sing and dance,
And set their gambols to the full o' th' moon:[5]

---

[1] Portia ... loving wife Portia Catones (d. 42 BCE), wife of Brutus killed herself by swallowing hot coals in despair over her husband's defeat.

[2] bee ... eyelid Once the bee has stung, it poses no more threat.

[3] broke ... wheel Method of torture in which a victim's bones are broken.

[4] plagued in art Tormented by the false figures.

[5] full o'th' moon The time when lunatics were thought to be at their worst.

If she can sleep the better for it, let her.
Your work is almost ended.
BOSOLA. Must I see her again?
FERDINAND. Yes.
BOSOLA. Never.
FERDINAND. You must.
BOSOLA. Never in mine own shape;
That's forfeited by my intelligence,° spying
And this last cruel lie: when you send me next,
The business shall be comfort.
FERDINAND. Very likely;
Thy pity is nothing of kin to thee. Antonio
Lurks about Milan: thou shalt shortly thither,
To feed a fire as great as my revenge,
Which never will slack till it have spent his fuel:
Intemperate agues[1] make physicians cruel.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 4, SCENE 2

(Enter Duchess and Cariola.)

DUCHESS. What hideous noise was that?
CARIOLA. 'Tis the wild consort
Of madmen, lady, which your tyrant brother
Hath placed about your lodging: this tyranny,
I think, was never practised till this hour.
DUCHESS. Indeed, I thank him: nothing but noise and folly
Can keep me in my right wits; whereas reason
And silence make me stark mad. Sit down;
Discourse to me some dismal tragedy.
CARIOLA. O, 'twill increase your melancholy.
DUCHESS. Thou art deceived:
To hear of greater grief would lessen mine.
This is a prison.
CARIOLA. Yes, but you shall live
To shake this durance° off. imprisonment
DUCHESS. Thou art a fool:
The robin-red-breast and the nightingale
Never live long in cages.
CARIOLA. Pray, dry your eyes:
What think you of, madam?
DUCHESS. Of nothing;
When I muse thus, I sleep.
CARIOLA. Like a madman, with your eyes open?
DUCHESS. Dost thou think we shall know one another
In th' other world?
CARIOLA. Yes, out of question.
DUCHESS. O, that it were possible we might
But hold some two days' conference with the dead!
From them I should learn somewhat,° I am sure, something
I never shall know here. I'll tell thee a miracle;
I am not mad yet, to my cause of sorrow:[2]
Th' heaven o'er my head seems made of molten brass,
The earth of flaming sulphur, yet I am not mad.
I am acquainted with sad misery,
As the tanned galley-slave is with his oar;
Necessity makes me suffer constantly,
And custom makes it easy. Whom do I look like now?
CARIOLA. Like to your picture in the gallery,
A deal of life in show, but none in practice;
Or rather like some reverend monument
Whose ruins are even pitied.
DUCHESS. Very proper;
And fortune seems only to have her eyesight,
To behold my tragedy. How now!
What noise is that?

(Enter servant.)

SERVANT. I am come to tell you,
Your brother hath intended you some sport.
A great physician, when the pope was sick
Of a deep melancholy, presented him
With several sorts of madmen, which wild object
Being full of change and sport,° forced him to laugh, entertainment
And so th' imposthume° broke: the selfsame cure illness
The Duke intends on you.
DUCHESS. Let them come in.

(Enter madmen.)

SERVANT. There's a mad lawyer; and a secular priest;
A doctor, that hath forfeited his wits
By jealousy; an astrologian

---

[1] Intemperate agues Severe fevers.

[2] to … sorrow And this gives me sorrow.

That in his works said, such a day o' th' month
Should be the day of doom, and failing of't,
Ran mad; an English tailor, crazed i' th' brain
With the study of new fashion; a gentleman usher,[1]
Quite beside himself with care to keep in mind
The number of his lady's salutations,
Or "How do you," she employed him in each morning;
A farmer too, an excellent knave in grain,
Mad 'cause he was hindered transportation;° export
And let one broker° that's mad loose to these, pawnbroker
You'd think the devil were among them.

DUCHESS. Sit, Cariola. Let them loose when you please,
For I am chained to endure all your tyranny.

(Here by a madman this song is sung, to a dismal kind of music:)

O, let us howl some heavy note,
Some deadly dogged howl,
Sounding, as from the threatening throat
Of beasts and fatal fowl!
As ravens, screech-owls, bulls, and bears,
We'll bell,° and bawl our parts, bellow
Till irksome noise have cloyed° your ears, overloaded
And corrosived your hearts.
At last, when as our quire° wants breath, choir
Our bodies being blest,
We'll sing, like swans, to welcome death,
And die in love and rest.

1ST MADMAN. Doomsday not come yet! I'll draw it nearer by a perspective,[2] or make a glass that shall set all the world on fire upon an instant. I cannot sleep; my pillow is stuffed with a litter of porcupines.

2ND MADMAN. Hell is a mere glass-house, where the devils are continually blowing up women's souls on hollow irons, and the fire never goes out.

3RD MADMAN. I will lie with every woman in my parish the tenth night; I will tithe them over like haycocks.[3]

4TH MADMAN. Shall my 'pothecary[4] outgo me,[5] because I am a cuckold? I have found out his roguery; he makes alum of his wife's urine, and sells it to Puritans that have sore throats with overstraining.[6]

1ST MADMAN. I have skill in heraldry.

2ND MADMAN. Hast?

1ST MADMAN. You do give for your crest a woodcock's head, with the brains picked out on't; you are a very ancient gentleman.

3RD MADMAN. Greek is turned Turk: we are only to be saved by the Helvetian translation.[7]

1ST MADMAN. Come on, sir, I will lay the law to you.

2ND MADMAN. O, rather lay a corrosive; the law will eat to the bone.

3RD MADMAN. He that drinks but to satisfy nature, is damned.

4TH MADMAN. If I had my glass here, I would show a sight should make all the women here call me mad doctor.

1ST MADMAN. What's he, a rope-maker?

2ND MADMAN. No, no, no, a snuffling knave, that while he shows the tombs, will have his hand in a wench's placket.[8]

3RD MADMAN. Woe to the caroch,[9] that brought home my wife from the mask at three a'clock in the morning! It had a large featherbed in it.

4TH MADMAN. I have pared the devil's nails forty time, roasted them in ravens' eggs, and cured agues with them.

3RD MADMAN. Get me three hundred milch[10] bats, to make possets[11] to procure sleep.

4TH MADMAN. All the college may throw their caps at me; I have made a soapboiler costive:[12] it was my masterpiece.

---

[1] gentleman usher Gentleman who acts as usher to a person of higher rank.

[2] perspective Telescope.

[3] haycocks Haystacks.

[4] 'pothecary I.e., apothecary, druggist.

[5] outgo me Get the better of me.

[6] Puritans … overstraining English Protestants, known for strict reformist views and supposedly nasal singing and preaching voices.

[7] Greek … translation The priest decries the new (1611) Authorized or King James translation, preferring instead the Helvetian or "Geneva" Bible, with its "puritan" marginal notes.

[8] placket Petticoat.

[9] caroch Carriage.

[10] milch Milking.

[11] possets Curative drinks made of hot milk curdled with liquor.

[12] costive Constipated.

(Here the dance, consisting of eight madmen, with musicians answerable[1] thereunto; after which, Bosola, like an old man, enters.)

Duchess. Is he mad too?
1st Servant. Pray question him. I'll leave you.

(Exeunt all but the Duchess and Bosola.)

Bosola. I am come to make thy tomb.
Duchess. Ha! My tomb!
Thou speak'st as if I lay upon my death-bed,
Gasping for breath: dost thou perceive me sick?

Bosola. Yes, and the more dangerously, since thy sickness is insensible.

Duchess. Thou art not mad sure: dost thou know me?
Bosola. Yes.
Duchess. Who am I?

Bosola. Thou art a box of worm-seed,[2] at best but a salvatory of green mummy.[3] What's this flesh? A little cruded[4] milk, fantastical puff-paste.[5] Our bodies are weaker than those paper-prisons boys use to keep flies in; more contemptible, since ours is to preserve earth-worms. Didst thou ever see a lark in a cage? Such is the soul in the body; this world is like her little turf of grass, and the heaven o'er our heads, like her looking-glass, only gives us a miserable knowledge of the small compass of our prison.

Duchess. Am not I thy Duchess?

Bosola. Thou art some great woman sure, for riot begins to sit on thy forehead (clad in gray hairs) twenty years sooner than on a merry milkmaid's. Thou sleepest worse than if a mouse should be forced to take up her lodging in a cat's ear: a little infant that breeds its teeth, should it lie with thee, would cry out, as if thou wert the more unquiet bedfellow.

Duchess. I am Duchess of Malfi still.
Bosola. That makes thy sleep so broken:
Glories, like glowworms afar off shine bright,
But looked to near, have neither heat nor light.
Duchess. Thou art very plain.
Bosola. My trade is to flatter the dead, not the living;
I am a tomb-maker.
Duchess. And thou com'st to make my tomb?
Bosola. Yes.
Duchess. Let me be a little merry:
Of what stuff wilt thou make it?
Bosola. Nay, resolve me first, of what fashion?
Duchess. Why, do we grow fantastical[6] in our death-bed?
Do we affect fashion in the grave?
Bosola. Most ambitiously. Princes' images on their tombs
Do not lie, as they were wont, seeming to pray
Up to heaven; but with their hands under their cheeks,
As if they died of the tooth-ache: they are not carved
With their eyes fixed upon the stars; but
As their minds were wholly bent upon the world,
The selfsame way they seem to turn their faces.
Duchess. Let me know fully, therefore, the effect
Of this thy dismal preparation,
This talk, fit for a charnel.[7]
Bosola. Now I shall;

(Enter executioners with a coffin, cords, and a bell.)

Here is a present from your princely brothers,
And may it arrive welcome, for it brings
Last benefit, last sorrow.
Duchess. Let me see it:
I have so much obedience in my blood,
I wish it in their veins to do them good.
Bosola. This is your last presence-chamber.
Cariola. O, my sweet lady!
Duchess. Peace; it affrights not me.
Bosola. I am the common bellman,[8]

---

[1] answerable Appropriate.

[2] worm-seed Drugs that fend off intestinal worms, with a double entendre that alludes to a dead body eaten by worms.

[3] salvatory … mummy Another double entendre, meaning both a salve supposedly made from Egyptian mummies and a box containing a mummy.

[4] cruded Curdled.

[5] puff-paste Puff-pastry.

[6] fantastical Preoccupied with fantasies.

[7] charnel House of the dead.

[8] bellman Person who, at funerals, rings a bell to frighten evil spirits away from the departing soul.

That usually is sent to condemned persons
The night before they suffer.
DUCHESS. Even now thou said'st
Thou wast a tomb-maker.
BOSOLA. 'Twas to bring you
By degrees to mortification.[1] Listen:

(He rings the bell.)

Hark, now everything is still,
The screech-owl, and the whistler[2] shrill,
Call upon our dame aloud,
And bid her quickly don her shroud!
Much you had of land and rent;
Your length in clay's now competent:
A long war disturbed your mind;
Here your perfect peace is signed.
Of what is't fools make such vain keeping? ° concern
Sin their conception, their birth weeping;
Their life a general mist of error,
Their death a hideous storm of terror.
Strew your hair with powders sweet,
Don clean linen, bathe your feet,
And (the foul fiend more to check)
A crucifix let bless your neck:
'Tis now full tide 'tween night and day;
End your groan, and come away.

(The executioners approach.)

CARIOLA. Hence, villains, tyrants, murderers! Alas!
What will you do with my lady? Call for help.
DUCHESS. To whom, to our next neighbours? They are mad-folks.
BOSOLA. Remove that noise.
DUCHESS. Farewell, Cariola.
In my last will, I have not much to give:
A many hungry guests have fed upon me;
Thine will be a poor reversion.
CARIOLA. I will die with her.
DUCHESS. I pray thee, look thou giv'st my little boy
Some syrup for his cold, and let the girl
Say her prayers ere she sleep.

(Cariola is forced out.)

Now what you please:
What death?
BOSOLA. Strangling; here are your executioners.
DUCHESS. I forgive them:
The apoplexy, catarrh, or cough o' th' lungs,
Would do as much as they do.
BOSOLA. Doth not death fright you?
DUCHESS. Who would be afraid on't,
Knowing to meet such excellent company
In th' other world?
BOSOLA. Yet, methinks,
The manner of your death should much afflict you;
This cord should terrify you.
DUCHESS. Not a whit:
What would it pleasure me to have my throat cut
With diamonds? Or to be smothered
With cassia? Or to be shot to death with pearls?
I know death hath ten thousand several doors
For men to take their exits; and 'tis found
They go on such strange geometrical hinges,
You may open them both ways:[3] any way, for heaven sake,
So I were out of your whispering. Tell my brothers,
That I perceive death, now I am well awake,
Best gift is they can give, or I can take.
I would fain put off my last woman's fault,[4]
I'd not be tedious to you.
EXECUTIONERS. We are ready.
DUCHESS. Dispose my breath how please you, but my body
Bestow upon my women, will you?
EXECUTIONERS. Yes.
DUCHESS. Pull, and pull strongly, for your able strength,
Must pull down heaven upon me:
Yet stay, heaven-gates are not so highly arched
As princes' palaces; they that enter there,
Must go upon their knees. Come, violent death,
Serve for mandragora,[5] to make me sleep:
Go, tell my brothers, when I am laid out,
They then may feed in quiet.

---

[1] bring … mortification Bring you to penitence.

[2] whistler Bird whose shrill cry was considered a bad omen.

[3] both ways Either through unwilled death or suicide.

[4] woman's fault Too much talking.

[5] mandragora Sedative made from mandrake root.

(They strangle her.)

BOSOLA. Where's the waiting-woman?
Fetch her: some other strangle the children.

(Exeunt executioners. One enters with Cariola.)

Look you, there sleeps your mistress.
CARIOLA. O, you are damned
Perpetually for this! My turn is next;
Is't not so ordered?
BOSOLA. Yes, and I am glad
You are so well prepared for't.
CARIOLA. You are deceived, sir,
I am not prepared for't; I will not die:
I will first come to my answer, and know
How I have offended.
BOSOLA. Come, dispatch her.
You kept her counsel, now you shall keep ours.
CARIOLA. I will not die, I must not; I am contracted° engaged
To a young gentleman.
EXECUTIONER. Here's your wedding-ring.
CARIOLA. Let me but speak with the Duke; I'll discover
Treason to his person.
BOSOLA. Delays: throttle her.
EXECUTIONER. She bites and scratches.
CARIOLA. If you kill me now,
I am damned; I have not been at confession
This two years.
BOSOLA. When?
CARIOLA. I am quick with child.[1]
BOSOLA. Why then,
Your credit's saved.[2]

(Cariola is strangled.)

Bear her into the next room;
Let this lie still.

(Exeunt executioners with Cariola's body. Enter Ferdinand.)

FERDINAND. Is she dead?
BOSOLA. She is what
You'd have her. But here begin your pity:

(Shows the children strangled.)

Alas! How have these offended?
FERDINAND. The death
Of young wolves is never to be pitied.
BOSOLA. Fix your eye here.
FERDINAND. Constantly.
BOSOLA. Do you not weep?
Other sins only speak; murder shrieks out:
The element of water moistens the earth,
But blood flies upwards and bedews the heavens.
FERDINAND. Cover her face; mine eyes dazzle: she died young.
BOSOLA. I think not so; her infelicity
Seemed to have years too many.
FERDINAND. She and I were twins;
And should I die this instant, I had lived
Her time to a minute.
BOSOLA. It seems she was born first:
You have bloodily approved the ancient truth,
That kindred commonly do worse agree
Than remote strangers.
FERDINAND. Let me see her face again.
Why didst not thou pity her? What an excellent Honest man might'st thou have been
If thou hadst borne her to some sanctuary;
Or, bold in a good cause, opposed thyself,
With thy advanced sword above thy head,
Between her innocence and my revenge.
I had thee, when I was distracted of my wits,
Go kill my dearest friend, and thou hast done't.
For let me but examine well the cause:
What was the meanness of her match to me?
Only I must confess I had a hope,
Had she continued widow, to have gained
An infinite mass of treasure by her death;
And that was the main cause, her marriage,
That drew a stream of gall quite through my heart.
For thee, as we observe in tragedies
That a good actor many times is cursed
For playing a villain's part, I hate thee for't,

---

[1] quick with child Pregnant women were not executed until they had given birth.

[2] credit's saved Your reputation is saved (because you will not bear an illegitimate child).

And for my sake say thou hast done much ill, well.
BOSOLA. Let me quicken your memory, for I perceive
You are falling into ingratitude; I challenge
The reward due to my service.
FERDINAND. I'll tell thee
What I'll give thee.
BOSOLA. Do.
FERDINAND. I'll give thee a pardon
For this murder.
BOSOLA. Ha!
FERDINAND. Yes, and 'tis
The largest bounty I can study to do thee.
By what authority didst thou execute
This bloody sentence?
BOSOLA. By yours.
FERDINAND. Mine! Was I her judge?
Did any ceremonial form of law,
Doom her to not being? Did a complete jury
Deliver her conviction up i' th' court?
Where shalt thou find this judgment registered,
Unless in hell? See, like a bloody fool,
Th' hast forfeited thy life, and thou shalt die for't.
BOSOLA. The office of justice is perverted quite,
When one thief hangs another. Who shall dare
To reveal this?
FERDINAND. O, I'll tell thee;
The wolf shall find her grave, and scrape it up,
Not to devour the corpse, but to discover
The horrid murder.
BOSOLA. You, not I, shall quake for't.
FERDINAND. Leave me.
BOSOLA. I will first receive my pension.
FERDINAND. You are a villain.
BOSOLA. When your ingratitude
Is judge, I am so.
FERDINAND. O horror,
That not the fear of him, which binds the devils,[1]
Can prescribe man obedience!
Never look upon me more.
BOSOLA. Why, fare thee well:
Your brother and yourself are worthy men:
You have a pair of hearts are hollow graves,
Rotten, and rotting others; and your vengeance,
Like two chained bullets,[2] still goes arm in arm.
You may be brothers; for treason, like the plague,
Doth take much in a blood.[3] I stand like one
That long hath ta'en a sweet and golden dream:
I am angry with myself, now that I wake.
FERDINAND. Get thee into some unknown part o' th' world,
That I may never see thee.
BOSOLA. Let me know
Wherefore I should be thus neglected? Sir,
I served your tyranny, and rather strove,
To satisfy yourself, than all the world:
And though I loathed the evil, yet I loved
You that did counsel it; and rather sought
To appear a true servant, than an honest man.
FERDINAND. I'll go hunt the badger by owl-light:
'Tis a deed of darkness.

(Exit.)

BOSOLA. He's much distracted. Off, my painted honour!
While with vain hopes our faculties we tire,
We seem to sweat in ice and freeze in fire.
What would I do, were this to do again?
I would not change my peace of conscience
For all the wealth of Europe. She stirs; here's life—
Return, fair soul, from darkness, and lead mine
Out of this sensible hell—she's warm, she breathes—
Upon thy pale lips I will melt my heart,
To store them with fresh colour. Who's there!
Some cordial drink![4] Alas! I dare not call:
So pity would destroy pity. Her eye opes,
And heaven in it seems to ope, that late was shut,
To take me up to mercy.
DUCHESS. Antonio!
BOSOLA. Yes, madam, he is living;
The dead bodies you saw, were but feigned statues;
He's reconciled to your brothers; the Pope hath wrought
The atonement.
DUCHESS. Mercy!

(She dies.)

---

[1] him … devils God.

[2] two chained bullets Cannonballs chained together for greater destruction.

[3] Doth … blood Runs in the family.

[4] cordial drink Reviving medicine.

BOSOLA. O, she's gone again! There the cords of life broke.
O, sacred innocence, that sweetly sleeps
On turtles'° feathers, whilst a guilty conscience turtledoves'
Is a black register, wherein is writ
All our good deeds and bad, a perspective
That shows us hell! That we cannot be suffered
To do good when we have a mind to it!
This is manly sorrow;
These tears, I am very certain, never grew
In my mother's milk: my estate is sunk
Below the degree of fear: where were
These penitent fountains, while she was living?
O, they were frozen up! Here is a sight
As direful to my soul, as is the sword
Unto a wretch hath slain his father. Come,
I'll bear thee hence,
And execute thy last will; that's deliver
Thy body to the reverend dispose
Of some good women: that, the cruel tyrant
Shall not deny me. Then I'll post to Milan,
Where somewhat I will speedily enact
Worth my dejection.

(Exit with the Duchess's body.)

ACT 5, SCENE 1

(Enter Antonio and Delio.)

ANTONIO. What think you of my hope of reconcilement
To the Aragonian brethren?
DELIO. I misdoubt it;
For though they have sent letter of safe conduct
For your repair° to Milan, they appear return
But nets to entrap you. The Marquis of Pescara,
Under whom you hold certain land in cheat,[1]
Much 'gainst his noble nature hath been moved
To seize those lands, and some of his dependents
Are at this instant making it their suit
To be invested in[2] your revenues.
I cannot think they mean well to you life,
That do deprive you of your means of life,
Your living.
ANTONIO. You are still an heretic° skeptic
To any safety I can shape myself.
DELIO. Here comes the Marquis: I will make myself
Petitioner for some part of your land,
To know whither it is flying.[3]
ANTONIO. I pray do.

(Enter Pescara.)

DELIO. Sir, I have a suit to you.
PESCARA. To me?
DELIO. An easy one:
There is the citadel of St. Bennet,[4]
With some demesnes,[5] of late in the possession
Of Antonio Bologna—please you bestow them on me.
PESCARA. You are my friend; but this is such a suit,
Nor fit for me to give, nor you to take.
DELIO. No, sir?
PESCARA. I will give you ample reason for't,
Soon in private: here's the Cardinal's mistress.

(Enter Julia.)

JULIA. My Lord, I am grown your poor petitioner,
And should be an ill beggar, had I not
A great man's letter here, the Cardinal's,
To court you in my favour.

(She gives him a letter.)

PESCARA. He entreats for you
The citadel of St. Bennet, that belonged
To the banished Bologna.
JULIA. Yes.
PESCARA. I could not have thought of a friend I could
Rather pleasure with it: 'tis yours.
JULIA. Sir, I thank you;

---

[1] in cheat In "escheat": lands held which would revert to the original lord's possession should the holder be convicted of a crime or die without an heir.

[2] be invested in Take over.

[3] whither … flying How it is being given away.

[4] St. Bennet I.e., St. Benedict.

[5] demesnes Attached land.

And he shall know how doubly I am engaged
Both in your gift, and speediness of giving,
Which makes your grant the greater.

(Exit.)

ANTONIO. (Aside.) How they fortify
Themselves with my ruin!
DELIO. Sir, I am
Little bound to you.
PESCARA. Why?
DELIO. Because you denied this suit to me, and gave't
To such a creature.
PESCARA. Do you know what it was?
It was Antonio's land; not forfeited
By course of law, but ravished from his throat
By the Cardinal's entreaty: it were not fit
I should bestow so main° a piece of wrong great
Upon my friend; 'tis a gratification
Only due to a strumpet, for it is injustice.
Shall I sprinkle the pure blood of innocents
To make those followers I call my friends
Look ruddier upon me? I am glad
This land, ta'en from the owner by such a wrong,
Returns again unto so foul an use,
As salary for his lust. Learn, good Delio,
To ask noble things of me, and you shall find
I'll be a noble giver.
DELIO. You instruct me well.
ANTONIO. (Aside.) Why, here's a man now, would fright impudence
From sauciest beggars.
PESCARA. Prince Ferdinand's come to Milan,
Sick, as they give out, of an apoplexy;
But some say, 'tis a frenzy: I am going
To visit him.

(Exit.)

ANTONIO. 'Tis a noble old fellow.[1]
DELIO. What course do you mean to take, Antonio?
ANTONIO. This night I mean to venture all my fortune,
Which is no more than a poor lingering life,
To the Cardinal's worst of malice: I have got Private access to his chamber; and intend
To visit him about the mid of night,
As once his brother did our noble Duchess.
It may be that the sudden apprehension
Of danger, for I'll go in mine own shape,
When he shall see it fraight with[2] love and duty,
May draw the poison out of him, and work
A friendly reconcilement: if it fail,
Yet it shall rid me of this infamous calling;
For better fall once, than be ever falling.
DELIO. I'll second you in all danger, and, howe'er;
My life keeps rank with yours.
ANTONIO. You are still my loved and best friend.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 5, SCENE 2

(Enter Pescara and a doctor.)

PESCARA. Now, doctor, may I visit your patient?
DOCTOR. If't please your Lordship: but he's instantly
To take the air here in the gallery
By my direction.
PESCARA. Pray thee, what's his disease?
DOCTOR. A very pestilent disease, my Lord,
They call lycanthropia.
PESCARA. What's that?
I need a dictionary to't.
DOCTOR. I'll tell you.
In those that are possessed with't there o'erflows
Such melancholy humour, they imagine
Themselves to be transformed into wolves;
Steal forth to church-yards in the dead of night,
And dig dead bodies up: as two nights since
One met the Duke 'bout midnight in a lane
Behind St. Mark's Church, with the leg of a man
Upon his shoulder, and he howled fearfully;
Said he was a wolf, only the difference
Was, a wolf's skin was hairy on the outside,
His on the inside; bade them take their swords,
Rip up his flesh, and try: straight, I was sent for,
And having ministered unto him, found his Grace
Very well recovered.

---

[1] old fellow The historical Pescara died at age 36.

[2] fraight with Full of.

PESCARA. I am glad on't.
DOCTOR. Yet not without some fear
Of a relapse. If he grow to his fit again,
I'll go a nearer[1] way to work with him
Than ever Paracelsus[2] dreamed of; if They'll give me leave, I'll buffet his madness out of him.
Stand aside; he comes.

(Enter Ferdinand, Malateste, Cardinal, and Bosola.)

FERDINAND. Leave me.
MALATESTE. Why doth your Lordship love this solitariness?
FERDINAND. Eagles commonly fly alone: they are crows, daws, and starlings that flock together. Look, what's that follows me?
MALATESTE. Nothing, my Lord.
FERDINAND. Yes.
MALATESTE. 'Tis your shadow.
FERDINAND. Stay it; let it not haunt me.
MALATESTE. Impossible, if you move, and the sun shine.
FERDINAND. I will throttle it.

(He throws himself on his shadow.)

MALATESTE. O, my Lord, you are angry with nothing.
FERDINAND. You are a fool: how is't possible I should catch my shadow, unless I fall upon't? When I go to hell, I mean to carry a bribe; for, look you, good gifts evermore make way for the worst persons.
PESCARA. Rise, good my Lord.
FERDINAND. I am studying the art of patience.
PESCARA. 'Tis a noble virtue.
FERDINAND. To drive six snails before me from this town to Moscow; neither use goad nor whip to them, but let them take their own time—the patient'st man i' th' world match me for an experiment—and I'll crawl after like a sheep-biter.[3]
CARDINAL. Force him up.

(They pick up Ferdinand.)

FERDINAND. Use me well, you were best.
What I have done, I have done: I'll confess nothing.
DOCTOR. Now let me come to him. Are you mad,
My Lord, are you out of your princely wits?
FERDINAND. What's he?
PESCARA. Your doctor.
FERDINAND. Let me have his beard sawed off, and his eye-brows
Filed more civil.[4]
DOCTOR. I must do mad tricks with him,
For that's the only way on't. I have brought
Your Grace a salamander's skin, to keep you
From sun-burning.
FERDINAND. I have cruel sore eyes.
DOCTOR. The white of a cockatrix's[5] egg is present remedy.
FERDINAND. Let it be new-laid one, you were best.
Hide me from him: physicians are like kings,
They brook no contradiction.
DOCTOR. Now he begins to fear me:
Now let me be alone with him.

(Ferdinand begins taking off his gown. The Cardinal stops him.)

CARDINAL. How now? Put off your gown?
DOCTOR. Let me have some forty urinals[6] filled with rose-water: he and I'll go pelt one another with them. Now he begins to fear me. Can you fetch a frisk,[7] sir? Let him go, let him go upon my peril: I find by his eye he stands in awe of me; I'll make him as tame as a dormouse.

(The Cardinal lets go of Ferdinand.)

---

[1] nearer More direct.

[2] Paracelsus Theophrastus von Hohenheim (1493–1541), an eminent Swiss doctor and alchemist also interested in chemistry and spirits.

[3] sheep-biter Dog that bites sheep. Also a woman-chaser.

[4] Filed more civil Shaped into a more polite expression.

[5] cockatrix Cockatrice, a mythical beast combining rooster and snake. As with the basilisk, looking at it is thought to cause death.

[6] urinals Bottles used to collect urine samples.

[7] fetch a frisk Dance.

FERDINAND. Can you fetch your frisks, sir! I will stamp him into a cullis, flay off his skin, to cover one of the anatomies this rogue hath set i' th' cold yonder in Barber-Chirurgeon's-hall.[1]

(He attacks the doctor.)

Hence, hence! You are all of you like beasts for sacrifice: there's nothing left of you, but tongue and belly, flattery and lechery.

(Exit.)

PESCARA. Doctor, he did not fear you thoroughly.
DOCTOR. True; I was somewhat too forward.
BOSOLA. (Aside.) Mercy upon me, what a fatal judgement
Hath fall'n upon this Ferdinand!
PESCARA. Knows your Grace
What accident hath brought unto the prince
This strange distraction?
CARDINAL. (Aside.) I must feign somewhat. Thus they say it grew:
You have heard it rumoured for these many years,
None of our family dies but there is seen
The shape of an old woman, which is given
By tradition to us to have been murdered
By her nephews, for her riches. Such a figure
One night, as the prince sat up late at's book,
Appeared to him; when, crying out for help,
The gentleman of's chamber, found his Grace
All on a cold sweat, altered much in face
And language: since which apparition,
He hath grown worse and worse, and I much fear
He cannot live.
BOSOLA. Sir, I would speak with you.
PESCARA. We'll leave your Grace,
Wishing to the sick prince, our noble Lord,
All health of mind and body.
CARDINAL. You are most welcome.

(Exeunt all but the Cardinal and Bosola.)

(Aside.) Are you come? So—this fellow must not know
By any means I had intelligence
In our Duchess' death; for though I counselled it,
The full of all th' engagement[2] seemed to grow
From Ferdinand. Now, sir, how fares our sister?
I do not think but sorrow makes her look
Like to an oft-dyed garment: she shall now
Taste comfort from me. Why do you look so wildly?
O, the fortune of your master here, the prince,
Dejects you; but be you of happy comfort:
If you'll do one thing for me, I'll entreat,
Though he had a cold tombstone o'er his bones,
I'd make you what you would be.
BOSOLA. Anything,
Give it me in a breath, and fly to't:
They that think long, small expedition win,
For musing much o' th' end, cannot begin.

(Enter Julia.)

JULIA. Sir, will you come in to supper?
CARDINAL. I am busy; leave me.
JULIA. (Aside.) What an excellent shape hath that fellow!

(Exit.)

CARDINAL. 'Tis thus. Antonio lurks here in Milan:
Enquire him out, and kill him. While he lives,
Our sister cannot marry, and I have thought
Of an excellent match for her. Do this, and style me
Thy advancement.
BOSOLA. But by what means shall I find him out?
CARDINAL. There is a gentleman called Delio,
Here in the camp, that hath been long approved[3]
His loyal friend. Set eye upon that fellow;
Follow him to mass; maybe Antonio,
Although he do account religion
But a school-name,[4] for fashion of the world
May accompany him; or else go enquire out
Delio's confessor, and see if you can bribe
Him to reveal it. There are a thousand ways
A man might find to trace him; as to know
What fellows haunt the Jews, for taking up

---

[1] Barber-Chirurgeon's-hall Contained a museum dedicated to human anatomy.

[2] The full … engagement Most of the plot.

[3] approved Proved to be.

[4] But a school-name Only a theory.

Great sums of money, for sure he's in want;
Or else to go to th' picture-makers, and learn
Who bought her picture lately: some of these Happily may take.
BOSOLA. Well, I'll not freeze i' th' business:
I would see that wretched thing, Antonio,
Above all sights i' th' world.
CARDINAL. Do, and be happy.

(Exit.)

BOSOLA. This fellow doth breed basilisks in's eyes,
He's nothing else but murder; yet he seems
Not to have notice of the Duchess's death.
'Tis his cunning: I must follow his example;
There cannot be a surer way to trace[1]
Than that of an old fox.

(Enter Julia, with a pistol.)

JULIA. So, sir, you are well met.
BOSOLA. How now?
JULIA. Nay, the doors are fast enough:
Now, sir, I will make you confess your treachery.
BOSOLA. Treachery!
JULIA. Yes, confess to me
Which of my women 'twas you hired to put
Love-powder into my drink?
BOSOLA. Love-powder!
JULIA. Yes, when I was at Malfi.
Why should I fall in love with such a face else?
I have already suffered for thee so much pain,
The only remedy to do me good,
Is to kill my longing.
BOSOLA. Sure your pistol holds
Nothing but perfumes, or kissing-comforts.[2] Excellent lady!
You have a pretty way on't to discover° reveal
Your longing. Come, come, I'll disarm you,
And arm you thus: yet this is wondrous strange.
JULIA. Compare thy form and my eyes together,
You'll find my love no such great miracle.

(She kisses him.)

Now you'll say
I am wanton: this nice modesty in ladies
Is but a troublesome familiar
That haunts them.
BOSOLA. Know you me, I am a blunt soldier.
JULIA. The better;
Sure, there wants fire, where there are no lively sparks
Of roughness.
BOSOLA. And I want[3] compliment.
JULIA. Why, ignorance
In courtship cannot make you do amiss,
If you have a heart to do well.
BOSOLA. You are very fair.
JULIA. Nay, if you lay beauty to my charge,
I must plead unguilty.
BOSOLA. Your bright eyes
Carry a quiver of darts in them, sharper
Than sun-beams.
JULIA. You will mar me with commendation,
Put yourself to the charge of courting me,
Whereas now I woo you.
BOSOLA. (Aside.) I have it; I will work upon this creature.
Let us grow most amorously familiar:
If the great Cardinal should see me thus,
Would he not count me a villain?
JULIA. No, he might count me a wanton,
Not lay a scruple° of offence on you; tiny amount
For if I see, and steal a diamond,
The fault is not i' th' stone, but in me the thief
That purloins it. I am sudden with you:
We that are great women of pleasure, use to cut off
These uncertain wishes and unquiet longings,
And in an instant join the sweet delight
And the pretty excuse together. Had you been i' th' street
Under my chamber window, even there
I should have courted you.
BOSOLA. O, you are an excellent lady!
JULIA. Bid me do somewhat for you presently,
To express I love you.
BOSOLA. I will, and if you love me,

---

[1] surer ... trace Better way to follow.

kissing-comforts Breath sweeteners.

[3] want Lack.

Fail not to effect it.
The Cardinal is grown wondrous melancholy:
Demand the cause, let him not put you off
With feigned excuse; discover the main ground on't.
JULIA. Why would you know this?
BOSOLA. I have depended on him,
And I hear that he is fall'n in some disgrace
With the emperor; if he be, like the mice
That forsake falling houses, I would shift
To other dependence.
JULIA. You shall not need follow the wars:[1]
I'll be your maintenance.[2]
BOSOLA. And I your loyal servant;
But I cannot leave my calling.
JULIA. Not leave
An ungrateful general, for the love of a sweet lady!
You are like some cannot sleep in feather-beds,
But must have blocks for their pillows.
BOSOLA. Will you do this?
JULIA. Cunningly.
BOSOLA. Tomorrow, I'll expect th' intelligence.
JULIA. Tomorrow! Get you into my cabinet;
You shall have it with you. Do not delay me,
No more than I do you: I am like one
That is condemned; I have my pardon promised,
But I would see it sealed. Go, get you in:
You shall see me wind my tongue about his heart,
Like a skein of silk.[3]

(Exit Bosola. Enter Cardinal and servants.)

CARDINAL. Where are you?
SERVANT. Here.
CARDINAL. Let none, upon your lives
Have conference with the prince Ferdinand,
Unless I know it.

(Exeunt servants.)

In this distraction, he may reveal the murder.
Yond's my lingering consumption:° disease
I am weary of her, and by any means
Would be quit of.
JULIA. How now, my Lord,
What ails you?
CARDINAL. Nothing.
JULIA. O, you are much altered!
Come, I must be your secretary,° and remove confidante
This lead from off your bosom: what's the matter?
CARDINAL. I may not tell you.
JULIA. Are you so far in love with sorrow,
You cannot part with part of it? Or think you
I cannot love your Grace when you are sad
As well as merry? Or do you suspect
I, that have been a secret to your heart
These many winters, cannot be the same
Unto your tongue?
CARDINAL. Satisfy thy longing:
The only way to make thee keep my counsel
Is not to tell thee.
JULIA. Tell your echo this,
Or flatterers, that like echoes still report
What they hear though most imperfect, and not me;
For, if that you be true unto yourself, I'll know.
CARDINAL. Will you rack me?[4]
JULIA. No, judgment shall
Draw it from you: it is an equal fault,
To tell one's secrets unto all or none.
CARDINAL. The first argues folly.
JULIA. But the last tyranny.
CARDINAL. Very well; why, imagine I have committed
Some secret deed, which I desire the world
May not hear of.
JULIA. Therefore may not I know it?
You have concealed for me as great a sin
As adultery. Sir, never was occasion
For perfect trial of my constancy
Till now: sir, I beseech you—
CARDINAL. You'll repent it.
JULIA. Never.
CARDINAL. It hurries thee to ruin: I'll not tell thee.
Be well advised, and think what danger 'tis
To receive a prince's secrets: they that do,
Had need have their breasts hooped with adamant
To contain them. I pray thee yet be satisfied;
Examine thine own frailty; 'tis more easy

---

[1] need ... wars Be a mercenary.

[2] maintenance Source of income.

[3] skein of silk Length of silk thread.

[4] rack me Torture me for an answer.

To tie knots, than unloose them: 'tis a secret
That, like a lingering poison, may chance lie
Spread in thy veins, and kill thee seven year hence.
JULIA. Now you dally with me.
CARDINAL. No more, thou shalt know it.
By my appointment, the great Duchess of Malfi,
And two of her young children, four nights since,
Were strangled.
JULIA. O heaven! Sir, what have you done?
CARDINAL. How now! How settles this?[1] Think you
Your bosom will be a grave dark and obscure enough
For such a secret?
JULIA. You have undone yourself, sir.
CARDINAL. Why?
JULIA. It lies not in me to conceal it.
CARDINAL. No?
Come, I will swear you to't upon this book.[2]
JULIA. Most religiously.
CARDINAL. Kiss it.

(She kisses the book.)

Now you shall never utter it; thy curiosity
Hath undone thee: thou art poisoned with that book.
Because I knew thou couldst not keep my counsel,
I have bound thee to't by death.

(Enter Bosola.)

BOSOLA. For pity sake, hold.
CARDINAL. Ha, Bosola!
JULIA. I forgive you
This equal piece of justice you have done;
For I betrayed your counsel to that fellow:
He overheard it; that was the cause I said
It lay not in me to conceal it.
BOSOLA. O, foolish woman,
Couldst not thou have poisoned him?
JULIA. 'Tis weakness,
Too much to think what should have been done.
I go, I know not whither.

(Dies.)

CARDINAL. Wherefore com'st thou hither?
BOSOLA. That I might find a great man, like yourself,
Not out of his wits, as the Lord Ferdinand,
To remember my service.
CARDINAL. I'll have thee hewed in pieces.
BOSOLA. Make not yourself such a promise of that life,
Which is not yours to dispose of.
CARDINAL. Who placed thee here?
BOSOLA. Her lust, as she intended.
CARDINAL. Very well:
Now you know me for your fellow-murderer.
BOSOLA. And wherefore should you lay your fair marble colours[3]
Upon your rotten purposes to me?
Unless you imitate some that do plot great treasons,
And when they have done, go hide themselves i' th' graves
Of those were actors in't?
CARDINAL. No more: there is a fortune attends thee.
BOSOLA. Shall I go sue to fortune any longer?
'Tis the fool's pilgrimage.
CARDINAL. I have honours in store for thee.
BOSOLA. There are a many ways that conduct to seeming
Honour, and some of them very dirty ones.
CARDINAL. Throw to the devil
Thy melancholy. The fire burns well;
What need we keep a stirring of't, and make
A greater smother? Thou wilt kill Antonio?
BOSOLA. Yes.
CARDINAL. Take up that body.
BOSOLA. I think I shall
Shortly grow the common bier[4] for church-yards.
CARDINAL. I will allow thee some dozen of attendants,
To aid thee in the murder.
BOSOLA. O, by no means. Physicians that apply horseleeches to any rank swelling, use to cut off their tails, that the blood may run through them the faster: let me have no train when I go to shed blood, lest it make me have a greater when I ride to the gallows.
CARDINAL. Come to me after midnight, to help to remove that body
To her own lodging: I'll give out she died o' th' plague;
'Twill breed the less enquiry after her death.

---

[1] How settles this? How does this strike you?

[2] this book The Bible.

[3] lay ... colours Paint over wood to make it appear to be marble.

[4] bier Platform used to carry bodies to graveyards.

Bosola. Where's Castruccio, her husband?
Cardinal. He's rode to Naples, to take possession
Of Antonio's citadel.
Bosola. Believe me, you have done a very happy turn.
Cardinal. Fail not to come: there is the master-key
Of our lodgings; and by that you may conceive
What trust I plant in you.
Bosola. You shall find me ready.

(Exit Cardinal.)

O, poor, Antonio, though nothing be so needful
To thy estate as pity, yet I find
Nothing so dangerous! I must look to my footing:
In such slippery ice-pavements, men had need
To be frost-nailed[1] well, they may break their necks else;
The precedent's here afore me. How this man
Bears up in blood! Seems fearless! Why, 'tis well:
Security some men call the suburbs of hell,
Only a dead wall between. Well, good Antonio,
I'll seek thee out; and all my cares shall be
To put thee into safety from the reach
Of these most cruel biters, that have got
Some of thy blood already. It may be,
I'll join with thee, in a most just revenge:
The weakest arm is strong enough, that strikes
With the sword of justice. Still methinks the Duchess
Haunts me: there, there! 'Tis nothing but my melancholy.
O Penitence, let me truly taste thy cup,
That throws men down, only to raise them up!

(Exit.)

ACT 5, SCENE 3

(Enter Antonio and Delio.)

Delio. Yond's the Cardinal's window. This fortification
Grew from the ruins of an ancient abbey;
And to yond side o' th' river lies a wall,
Piece of a cloister, which in my opinion
Gives the best echo that you ever heard,
So hollow and so dismal, and withal
So plain in the distinction of our words,
That many have supposed it is a spirit
That answers.
Antonio. I do love these ancient ruins.
We never tread upon them, but we set
Our foot upon some reverend history:
And, questionless, here in this open court,
Which now lies naked to the injuries
Of stormy weather, some men lie interred
Loved the church so well, and gave so largely to't,
They thought it should have canopied their bones
Till doom's-day; but all things have their end:
Churches and cities, which have diseases like to men,
Must have like death that we have.
Echo. (From the Duchess' grave.) Like death that we have.
Delio. Now the echo hath caught you.
Antonio. It groaned,
Methought, and gave a very deadly accent.
Echo. Deadly accent.
Delio. I told you 'twas a pretty one: you may make it
A huntsman, or a falconer, a musician,
Or a thing of sorrow.
Echo. A thing of sorrow.
Antonio. Ay sure, that suits it best.
Echo. That suits it best.
Antonio. 'Tis very like my wife's voice.
Echo. Ay, wife's voice.
Delio. Come, let us walk farther from't.
I would not have you go to th' Cardinal's to-night:
Do not.
Echo. Do not.
Delio. Wisdom doth not more moderate wasting sorrow,
Than time: take time for't: be mindful of thy safety.
Echo. Be mindful of thy safety.
Antonio. Necessity compels me:
Make scrutiny throughout the passes° events
Of your own life, you'll find it impossible
To fly° your fate. flee
Echo. O fly your fate!
Delio. Hark! The dead stones seem to have pity on you,
And give you good counsel.
Antonio. Echo, I will not talk with thee,
For thou art a dead thing.
Echo. Thou art a dead thing.

---

[1] frost-nailed Shoes with nails driven into the soles to prevent slipping.

ANTONIO. My Duchess is a-sleep now,
And her little ones, I hope sweetly: O heaven,
Shall I never see her more?
ECHO. Never see her more.
ANTONIO. I marked not one repetition of the echo
But that; and on the sudden, a clear light
Presented me a face folded in sorrow.
DELIO. Your fancy merely.
ANTONIO. Come, I'll be out of this ague,
For to live thus, is not indeed to live;
It is a mockery and abuse of life:
I will not henceforth save myself by halves;[1]
Lose all, or nothing.
DELIO. Your own virtue save you!
I'll fetch your eldest son, and second you:
It may be that the sight of his own blood
Spread in so sweet a figure, may beget
The more compassion.
ANTIONIO: However, fare you well.
Though in our miseries fortune have a part,
Yet in our noble sufferings she hath none;
Contempt of pain, that we may call our own.

(Exeunt.)

ACT 5, SCENE 4

(Enter Cardinal, Pescara, Malateste, Roderigo, and Grisolan.)

CARDINAL. You shall not watch to-night by the sick prince;
His Grace is very well recovered.
MALATESTE. Good, my Lord, suffer° us. allow CARDINAL. O, by no means:
The noise and change of object in his eye
Doth more distract him: I pray, all to bed;
And though you hear him in his violent fit,
Do not rise, I entreat you.
PESCARA. So, sir; we shall not.
CARDINAL. Nay, I must have you promise
Upon your honours, for I was enjoined to't[2]
By himself; and he seemed to urge it sensibly.
PESCARA. Let our honours bind this trifle.
CARDINAL. Nor any of your followers.
MALATESTE. Neither.
CARDINAL. It may be, to make trial of your promise,
When he's asleep, myself will rise and feign
Some of his mad tricks, and cry out for help,
And feign myself in danger.
MALATESTE. If your throat were cutting,
I'd not come at you, now I have protested against it.
CARDINAL. Why, I thank you.
GRISOLAN. 'Twas a foul storm tonight.
RODERIGO. The Lord Ferdinand's chamber shook like an osier.[3]
MALATESTE. 'Twas nothing but pure kindness in the devil,
To rock his own child.

(Exeunt all but the Cardinal.)

CARDINAL. The reason why I would not suffer these
About my brother is because at midnight
I may with better privacy convey
Julia's body to her own lodging. O, my conscience!
I would pray now; but the devil takes away my heart
For having any confidence in prayer.
About this hour I appointed Bosola
To fetch the body: when he hath served my turn,
He dies.

(Exit. Enter Bosola.)

BOSOLA. Ha! 'Twas the Cardinal's voice; I heard him name
Bosola, and my death: listen, I hear one's footing.

(Enter Ferdinand.)

FERDINAND. Strangling is a very quiet death.
BOSOLA. Nay then, I see I must stand upon my guard.
FERDINAND. What say to that? Whisper softly; do you agree to't?
So, it must be done i' th' dark; the Cardinal
Would not for a thousand pounds the doctor should see it.

---

[1] I … halves I will not try to remedy my situation bit by bit.

[2] enjoined to't Made to promise it.

[3] osier Willow tree.

(Exit.)

BOSOLA. My death is plotted; here's the consequence of murder.
We value not desert nor Christian breath,
When we know black deeds must be cured with death.

(Enter servant and Antonio.)

SERVANT. Here stay, sir, and be confident, I pray:
I'll fetch you a dark lantern.

(Exit.)

ANTONIO. Could I take him
At his prayers, there were hope of pardon.
BOSOLA. Fall right my sword:

(He strikes Antonio.)

I'll not give thee so much leisure as to pray.
ANTONIO. O, I am gone! Thou hast ended a long suit
In a minute.
BOSOLA. What art thou?
ANTONIO. A most wretched thing,
That only have the benefit in death,
To appear myself.

(Enter servant with a light.)

SERVANT. Where are you, sir?
ANTONIO. Very near my home. Bosola!
SERVANT. O, misfortune!
BOSOLA. Smother thy pity, thou art dead else. Antonio!
The man I would have saved 'bove mine own life!
We are merely the stars' tennis-balls, struck and banded
Which way please them. O good Antonio,
I'll whisper one thing in thy dying ear,
Shall make thy heart break quickly! Thy fair Duchess
And two sweet children—
ANTONIO. Their very names
Kindle a little life in me.
BOSOLA. Are murdered.
ANTONIO. Some men have wished to die
At the hearing of sad tidings; I am glad
That I shall do't in sadness: I would not now
Wish my wounds balmed nor healed, for I have no use
To put my life to. In all our quest of greatness,
Like wanton boys, whose pastime is their care,
We follow after bubbles blown in th' air.
Pleasure of life, what is't? Only the good hours
Of an ague—merely a preparative to rest,
To endure vexation. I do not ask
The process of my death; only commend me
To Delio.
BOSOLA. Break, heart!
ANTONIO. And let my son fly the courts of princes.

(Dies.)

BOSOLA. Thou seem'st to have loved Antonio?
SERVANT. I brought him hither,
To have reconciled him to the Cardinal.
BOSOLA. I do not ask thee that:
Take him up, if thou tender° thy own life, value
And bear him where the lady Julia
Was wont to lodge. O my fate moves swift!
I have this Cardinal in the forge already,
Now I'll bring him to th' hammer. O direful misprision!° mistake
I will not imitate things glorious,
No more than base; I'll be mine own example.
On, on, and look thou represent, for silence,
The thing thou bear'st.[1]

(Exeunt.)

ACT 5, SCENE 5

(Enter Cardinal, with a book.)

CARDINAL. I am puzzled in a question about hell:
He says, in hell there's one material fire,
And yet it shall not burn all men alike.
Lay him by. How tedious is a guilty conscience!
When I look into the fish-ponds in my garden,
Methinks I see a thing armed with a rake,
That seems to strike at me.

---

[1] thing thou bear'st I.e., the body of Antonio.

(Enter Bosola and the servant with Antonio's body.)

Now, art thou come? Thou look'st ghastly;
There sits in thy face some great determination,
Mixed with some fear.
BOSOLA. Thus it lightens° into action: flares
I am come to kill thee.
CARDINAL. Ha! Help! Our guard!
BOSOLA. Thou art deceived;
They are out of thy howling.
CARDINAL. Hold; and I will faithfully divide
Revenues with thee.
BOSOLA. Thy prayers and proffers
Are both unseasonable.
CARDINAL. Raise the watch!
We are betrayed.
BOSOLA. I have confined your flight:
I'll suffer your retreat to Julia's chamber,
But no further.
CARDINAL. Help! We are betrayed.

(Enter Malateste, Pescara, Roderigo, and Grisolan, above.)

MALATESTE. Listen.
CARDINAL. My Dukedom for rescue!
RODERIGO. Fie upon his counterfeiting.
MALATESTE. Why, 'tis not the Cardinal.
RODERIGO. Yes, yes, 'tis he:
But I'll see him hanged ere I'll go down to him.
CARDINAL. Here's a plot upon me; I am assaulted! I am lost
Unless some rescue!
GRISOLAN. He doth this pretty well;
But it will not serve to laugh me out of mine honour.
CARDINAL. The sword's at my throat!
RODERIGO. You would not bawl so loud then.
MALATESTE. Come, come,
Let's go to bed: he told us thus much aforehand.
PESCARA. He wished you should not come at him; but believe't,
The accent of the voice sounds not in jest:
I'll down to him, howsoever, and with engines° tools
Force ope the doors.

(Exit.)

RODERIGO. Let's follow him aloof,
And note how the Cardinal will laugh at him.

(Exeunt, above, Malateste, Roderigo, and Grisolan.)

BOSOLA. There's for you first,
'Cause you shall not unbarricade the door
To let in rescue.

(He kills the servant.)

CARDINAL. What cause hast thou to pursue my life?
BOSOLA. Look there.
CARDINAL. Antonio!
BOSOLA. Slain by my hand unwittingly:
Pray, and be sudden: when thou killed'st thy sister,
Thou took'st from justice her most equal balance,
And left her nought but her sword.[1]
CARDINAL. O mercy!
BOSOLA. Now it seems thy greatness was only outward;
For thou fall'st faster of thyself, than calamity
Can drive thee: I'll not waste longer time; there.

(He stabs the Cardinal.)

CARDINAL. Thou hast hurt me.
BOSOLA. Again.

(He stabs him again.)

CARDINAL. Shall I die like a leveret,° hare
Without any resistance? Help, help, help!
I am slain.

(Enter Ferdinand.)

FERDINAND. Th' alarum! Give me a fresh horse;
Rally the vaunt-guard,[2] or the day is lost.
Yield, yield: I give you the honours of arms,[3]
Shake my sword over you; will you yield?

---

[1] justice ... sword Commonly portrayed as a blindfolded woman standing with a set of scales in one hand and a sword in the other.

[2] vaunt-guard Forward troops, vanguard.

[3] honours of arms Right to retain your weapons after you have surrendered.

Cardinal. Help me, I am your brother!
Ferdinand. The devil?
My brother fight upon the adverse party?

(He wounds the Cardinal, and [in the scuffle] gives Bosola his death wound.)

There flies your ransom.[1]
Cardinal. O justice!
I suffer now for what hath former been:
Sorrow is held the eldest child of sin.

Ferdinand. Now you're brave fellows. Caesar's fortune was harder than Pompey's; Caesar died in the arms of prosperity, Pompey at the feet of disgrace. You both died in the field. The pain's nothing: pain many time is taken away with the apprehension of greater, as the tooth-ache with the sight of a barber[2] that comes to pull it out: there's philosophy for you.

Bosola. Now my revenge is perfect. Sink, thou main cause
Of my undoing. The last part of my life
Hath done me best service.

(He stabs Ferdinand.)

Ferdinand. Give me some wet hay,[3] I am broken-winded.
I do account° this world but a dog-kennel: consider
I will vault credit[4] and affect high pleasures,
Beyond death.
Bosola. He seems to come to himself,
Now he's so near the bottom.
Ferdinand. My sister, O my sister! There's the cause on't.
Whether we fall by ambition, blood, or lust,
Like diamonds, we are cut with our own dust.

(Dies.)

Cardinal. Thou hast thy payment too.
Bosola. Yes, I hold my weary soul in my teeth;
'Tis ready to part from me. I do glory
That thou, which stood'st like a huge pyramid
Begun upon a large and ample base,
Shalt end in a little point, a kind of nothing.

(Enter Pescara, Malateste, Roderigo and Grisolan.)

Pescara. How now, my Lord!
Malateste. O, sad disaster!
Roderigo. How comes this?
Bosola. Revenge for the Duchess of Malfi, murdered
By the Aragonian brethren; for Antonio,
Slain by this hand; for lustful Julia,
Poisoned by this man; and lastly for myself,
That was an actor in the main of all
Much 'gainst mine own good nature, yet i' th' end Neglected.
Pescara. How now, my Lord!
Cardinal. Look to my brother:
He gave us these large wounds, as we were struggling
Here i' th' rushes.[5] And now, I pray, let me
Be laid by and never thought of.

(Dies.)

Pescara. How fatally, it seems, he did withstand
His own rescue!
Malateste. Thou wretched thing of blood,
How came Antonio by his death?
Bosola. In a mist: I know not how:
Such a mistake as I have often seen
In a play. O, I am gone!
We are only like dead walls, or vaulted graves,
That ruined, yield no Echo. Fare you well.
It may be pain, but no harm to me to die,
In so good a quarrel. O, this gloomy world!
In what a shadow, or deep pit of darkness,
Doth womanish and feaful mankind live!
Let worthy minds ne'er stagger in distrust
To suffer death or shame for what is just:
Mine is another voyage.

(Dies.)

---

[1] There … ransom There goes your chance to be ransomed.

[2] barber Barbers were also surgeons and dentists.

[3] wet hay Considered a good remedy for a winded horse.

[4] vault credit See Matthew 6.19–21.

[5] rushes Reeds were often used to cover castle floors.

PESCARA. The noble Delio, as I came to th' palace,
Told me of Antonio's being here, and showed me
A pretty gentleman, his son and heir.

(Enter Delio and Antonio's son.)

MALATESTE. O sir, you come too late!
DELIO. I heard so, and
Was armed for't, ere I came. Let us make noble use
Of this great ruin; and join all our force
To establish this young hopeful gentleman
In's mother's right. These wretched eminent things
Leave no more fame behind 'em, than should one
Fall in a frost, and leave his print in snow:
As soon as the sun shines, it ever melts,
Both form and matter. I have ever thought
Nature doth nothing so great for great men,
As when she's pleased to make them lords of truth:
Integrity of life is fame's best friend,
Which nobly, beyond death, shall crown the end.

(Exeunt.)

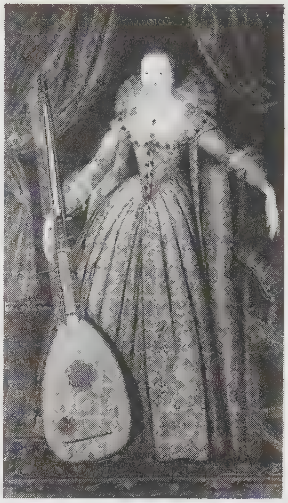
THE END

—1623 (WRITTEN C. 1614)

LADY MARY WROTH

1587 – 1651



Lady Mary Wroth wrote the first work of prose fiction and the first amatory sonnet sequence published by a woman in English. Her court romance, The Countess of Montgomery's Urania (1621) exploits multiple Renaissance genres—sonnet, ballad, madrigal, pastoral narrative and song, among others—with penetrating observation, worldly skepticism, and emotional subtlety. Wroth's work was admired by a number of poets of her day—Ben Jonson, who dedicated his play The Alchemist (1610) to her, proclaimed that her verse had made him "a better lover, and much better poet"—and although her reputation faded during the ensuing centuries, today Mary Wroth is recognized as a significant Jacobean writer and pioneer.

Born Mary Sidney in 1587, Wroth was a member of an illustrious political and literary family that included her uncle, Sir Philip Sidney, her aunt, Mary Sidney Herbert, Countess of Pembroke (herself a poet and patron of poets), and her father, Sir Robert Sidney, a statesman and minor poet. Educated by tutors, Mary was already an accomplished scholar, musician, and dancer by the time of her arranged marriage in 1604 to a wealthy landowner, Sir Robert Wroth. The union was not a happy one, but it did propel Lady Mary further into the life of the Jacobean court, where she performed in Ben Jonson's Masque of Blackness in 1605 and Masque of Beauty in 1608, and, in her family's tradition, bestowed friendship and patronage on poets such as Jonson and George Chapman.

On her husband's death in 1614, Wroth was left with an infant son (who died in 1616) and crushing debts. She was also free to pursue more openly a long-time illicit affair with her cousin, William Herbert, with whom she eventually had two illegitimate children. This affair, and financial constraints, may have limited Wroth's access to court and spurred her to write more seriously. She polished her sonnets, already circulating in manuscript as early as 1605, and in 1621 appended them to a 558-page prose romance, Urania, dedicated to the Countess of Montgomery. Because of its fictionalized allusions to actual court personages and events, the book offended those who saw themselves depicted too transparently. One such person, Sir William Denny, complained to the King and circulated a scathing poem criticizing Wroth as a "hermaphrodite" and "monster," an "oyster" gaping open to every tide. Denny's attack sparked a wittily vigorous reply in which Wroth mimicked the exact form of Denny's verse, rewriting his lines one by one. But in the end the attacks on her found their mark; she withdrew the edition of Urania and published no more work during her lifetime. (A second part of Urania, a few other poems, and a pastoral drama, Love's Victory, remained unpublished until our own time.)

Scandalous elements aside, Urania is a groundbreaking work because it uses genres traditionally written by men—episodic pastoral narrative of the sort we find in Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia, and the digressive adventures of the Alexandrian romance—in untraditional ways to examine the social situation of women in actual court society. Wroth's prose is plainer than Sidney's and her outlook even more skeptical of romantic ideals. ("Credit no thing" is a typical warning.) Centering on the friendship of the shepherdess Urania (modeled on the Countess of Montgomery) with the princess Pamphilia (modeled on Wroth herself) and Pamphilia's frustrated love for the faithless Amphilanthus (whose name means "lover of two"), the story branches into multiple episodes and characters, interspersed with over fifty poems and songs in various genres. While celebrating the power of female desire, Wroth does not shrink from depicting the casual brutality of relations between the sexes: women seduced and abandoned, the indignity of forced marriages, the tortures of jealousy and deception.

In Pamphilia to Amphilanthus, the sequence of 83 sonnets and 20 songs that follows Urania, Wroth, no doubt influenced by her famous uncle's Astrophil and Stella, again applies herself to a genre traditionally (although by now by no means exclusively) reserved for males. She again deftly employs a somewhat outdated convention—the Petrarchan sonnet—in ways that highlight love's tensions and contradictions. Pamphilia addresses not her beloved, as does the authorial voice in many Petrarchan sonnets, but herself ("I with my spirit talk and cry"), as well as Cupid, Time, Fortune, and other personifications of her trials. As Paula Payne observes, "Astrophil is writing to win his love, but Pamphilia is writing to discover her self." If so, she may in this regard be more genuinely and interestingly Petrarchan than some of Petrarch's later and lesser followers. The climax of Pamphilia to Amphilanthus is a technical tour de force, a "corona" of fourteen sonnets in which the last line of the first becomes the first line of the next. The line that begins and ends it ("In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?") is emblematic of Wroth's skill in combining the elegant detachment of the Petrarchan form with a heightened emotional urgency: love, it turns out, is not the "thread" that she had expected to lead her from the labyrinth, for the "corona" leaves her there.

Mary Wroth lived her final decades in obscurity, struggling with debt, and died in 1651. In the youthful portrait of her which survives, she is pictured holding, not the gloves or fan customary in female portraits of the time, but an archlute—symbol of the poet.

from Pamphilia to Amphilanthus

When night's black mantle could most darkness prove,° display
And sleep death's Image did my senses hire° engage
From knowledge of my self, then thoughts did move
Swifter than those most swiftness need require:
In sleep, a Chariot drawn by winged desire
I saw: where sat bright Venus Queen of love,
And at her feet her son,[1] still adding fire
To burning hearts which she did hold above,
But one heart flaming more than all the rest
The goddess held, and put it to my breast,
Dear son, now shoot said she: thus must we win;
He her obeyed, and martyred my poor heart,
I, waking hoped as dreams it would depart
Yet since: O me: a lover I have been.

My pain, still smothered in my grieved breast,
Seeks for some ease, yet cannot passage find
To be discharged of this unwelcome guest;
When most I strive, more fast his burdens bind,
Like to a ship, on Goodwins[2] cast by wind
The more she strives, more deep in sand is pressed
Till she be lost; so am I, in this kind° manner
Sunk, and devoured, and swallowed by unrest,
Lost, shipwrecked, spoiled, debarred of smallest hope
Nothing of pleasure left; save° thoughts have scope, unless
Which wander may: Go then, my thoughts, and cry
Hope's perished; Love tempest-beaten; Joy lost;
Killing despair hath all these blessings crossed
Yet faith still cries, Love will not falsify.

---

[1] her son Cupid, customarily pictured as a winged infant carrying a bow and a quiver of arrows for piercing hearts, and torches to set them ablaze.

[2] Goodwins The Goodwins, or Goodwin Sands, a dangerous shoal off the coast of Kent proverbially associated with shipwrecks in Wroth's time.

Love leave° to urge, thou know'st thou hast the hand;° cease upper hand
'Tis cowardice, to strive where none resist:
Pray thee leave off, I yield unto thy band;° bond
Do not thus, still, in thine own power persist,
Behold I yield: let forces be dismissed;
I am thy subject, conquered, bound to stand,
Never thy foe, but did thy claim assist
Seeking thy due of those who did withstand;
But now, it seems, thou would'st I should thee love;
I do confess, 'twas thy will made me choose;
And thy fair shows[1] made me a lover prove
When I my freedom did, for pain, refuse.
Yet this Sir God,[2] your boyship I despise;
Your charms I obey, but love not want of eyes.[3]

13

Dear, famish not what you your self gave food;
Destroy not what your glory is to save;
Kill not that soul to which you spirit gave;
In pity, not disdain your triumph stood;
An easy thing it is to shed the blood
Of one, who at your will, yields to the grave;
But more you may true worth[4] by mercy crave
When you preserve, not spoil, but nourish good;
Your sight is all the food I do desire;
Then sacrifice me not in hidden fire,
Or stop the breath which did your praises move:
Think but how easy 'tis a sight to give;
Nay ev'n desert; since by it I do live,
I but chameleon-like[5] would live, and love.

14

Am I thus conquered? have I lost the powers
That to withstand, which joys° to ruin me? delights
Must I be still while it my strength devours
And captive leads me prisoner, bound, unfree?
Love first shall leave men's fancies to them free,
Desire shall quench love's flames, spring hate° sweet showers, shall hate
Love shall loose all his darts, have sight, and see
His shame, and wishings hinder happy hours;
Why should we not love's purblind° charms resist? almost blind
Must we be servile, doing what he list?° wishes
No, seek some host to harbour thee: I fly° flee from
Thy babish° tricks, and freedom do profess; babyish
But O my hurt, makes my lost heart confess
I love, and must: So farewell liberty.

15

Truly poor Night thou welcome art to me:
I love thee better in this sad attire
Than that which raiseth some men's fancies higher
Like painted outsides which foul inward be;
I love thy grave, and saddest looks to see,
Which seems° my soul, and dying heart entire, resembles
Like to the ashes of some happy fire
That flamed in joy, but quenched in misery:
I love thy count'nance, and thy sober pace
Which evenly goes, and as of loving grace
To us, and me among the rest oppressed
Gives quiet, peace to my poor self alone,
And freely grants day leave when thou art gone
To give clear light to see all ill° redressed. misery

22

Like to the Indians, scorched with the sun,
The sun which they do as their God adore
So am I used by love, for ever more
I worship him, less favors have I won,
Better are they who thus to blackness run,
And so can only whiteness' want deplore
Than I who pale, and white am with grief's store,° abundance
Nor can have hope, but to see hopes undone;
Besides, their sacrifice received's in sight
Of their chose saint: mine hid as worthless rite;
Grant me to see where I my offerings give,
Then let me wear the mark of Cupid's might

---

[1] shows Displays (of power).

[2] Sir God Mocking address to Cupid.

[3] want of eyes Blindness, a proverbial attribute of love, and of Cupid.

[4] worth Pun on "Wroth," which was pronounced "worth."

[5] chameleon-like The chameleon could survive for long periods without food, and was thus reputed to live on air.

In heart as they in skin of Phoebus' light[1]
Not ceasing offerings to love while I Live.

23

When every one to pleasing pastime hies° hastens
Some hunt, some hawk, some play, while some delight
In sweet discourse, and music shows joy's might
Yet I my thoughts do far above these prize.
The joy which I take, is that free from eyes[2]
I sit, and wonder at this daylike night
So to dispose themselves, as void° of right; bereft
And leave true pleasure for poor vanities;
When others hunt, my thoughts I have in chase;
If hawk,[3] my mind at wished end doth fly,
Discourse,[4] I with my spirit talk, and cry
While others, music choose as greatest grace.
O God, say I, can these fond° pleasures move? foolish
Or music be but in sweet thoughts of love?

35

False hope which feeds but to destroy, and spill
What it first breeds;[5] unnatural to the birth
Of thine own womb; conceiving but to kill,
And plenty gives to make the greater dearth,
So Tyrants do who falsely ruling earth
Outwardly grace them, and with profit's fill
Advance those who appointed are to death
To make their greater fall to please their will.
Thus shadow they their wicked vile intent
Colouring evil with a show of good
While in fair shows° their malice so is spent; spectacles
Hope kills the heart, and tyrants shed the blood.
For hope deluding brings us to the pride° peak
Of our desires the farther down to slide.

SONG [LOVE, A CHILD, IS EVER CRYING]

Love, a child, is ever crying,
Please him, and he straight is flying;
Give him, he the more is craving,
Never satisfied with having.

His desire have no measure,
Endless folly is his treasure;
What he promiseth he breaketh;
Trust not one word that he speaketh.

He vows nothing but false matter,
And to cozen° you he'll flatter; deceive
Let him gain the hand, he'll leave you,
And still glory to deceive you.

He will triumph in your wailing,
And yet cause be of your failing:
These his virtues are, and slighter
Are his gifts, his favours lighter.

Feathers are as firm in staying,
Wolves no fiercer in their preying.
As a child then leave him crying,
Nor seek him, so giv'n to flying.

A CROWN OF SONNETS DEDICATED TO LOVE

77

In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?
Ways° are on all sides while the way I miss: paths
If to the right hand, there in love I burn;
Let me go forward, therein danger is;
If to the left, suspicion hinders bliss;
Let me turn back, shame cries I ought return,
Nor faint, though crosses° with my fortunes kiss; troubles
Stand still is harder, although sure to mourn.[6]
Thus let me take the right, or left-hand way,
Go forward, or stand still, or back retire:
I must these doubts endure without allay° relief
Or help, but travail[7] find for my best hire.

---

[1] as ... light As Indians, "scorched with the sun," show "in their skins" the mark of Phoebus, the sun-god.

[2] eyes The eyes, or gaze, of others.

[3] If hawk If they (others) hawk.

[4] Discourse When others discourse.

[5] spill ... breeds As in a miscarriage.

[6] although sure to mourn Although sure to make me mourn.

[7] travail Hard work, but also with a pun on "travel."

Yet that which most my troubled sense doth move,
Is to leave all, and take the thread of Love.[1]

78

Is to leave all, and take the thread of love,
Which line straight leads unto the soul's content,
Where choice delights with pleasure's wings do move,
And idle fancy never room had lent.
When chaste thoughts guide us, then our minds are bent
To take that good which ills from us remove:
Light of true love brings fruit which none repent;
But constant lovers seek and wish to prove.
Love is the shining star of blessing's light,
The fervent fire of zeal, the root of peace,
The lasting lamp, fed with the oil of right,
Image of faith, and womb for joy's increase.
Love is true virtue, and his end's delight,
His flames are joys, his bands true lovers' might.

79

His flames are joys, his bands true lovers' might,
No stain is there, but pure, as purest white,
Where no cloud can appear to dim his light,
Nor spot defile, but shame will soon requite.
Here are affections, tried by love's just might
As gold by fire, and black discerned by white;
Error by truth, and darkness known by light,
Where faith is valued, for love to requite.
Please him, and serve him, glory in his might
And firm he'll be, as innocency white,
Clear as th'air, warm as sun's beams, as day light
Just as truth, constant as fate, joyed to requite.
Then love obey, strive to observe his might
And be in his brave court a glorious light.

80

And be in his brave court a glorious light
Shine in the eyes of faith, and constancy
Maintain the fires of love, still burning bright,
Not slightly sparkling, but light flaming be.
Never to slack till earth no stars can see,
Till sun, and moon do leave to us dark night,
And second chaos once again do free
Us, and the world from all divisions spite,
Till then affections which his followers are,
Govern our hearts, and prove his power's gain,
To taste this pleasing sting, seek with all care
For happy smarting is it with small pain.
Such as although it pierce your tender heart,
And burn, yet burning you will love the smart.

81

And burn, yet burning you will love the smart,
When you shall feel the weight of true desire,
So pleasing, as you would not wish your part
Of burden should be missing from that fire.
But faithful and unfeigned heat aspire
Which sin abolisheth, and doth impart
Salves to all fear, with virtues which inspire
Souls with divine love; which shows his chaste art.
And guide he is to joyings, open eyes
He hath to happiness, and best can learn
Us means how to deserve, this he descries,° perceives
Who blind, yet doth our hiddenest thoughts discern.
Thus we may gain since living in blest love,
He may our prophet,[2] and our tutor prove.

82

He may our prophet, and our tutor prove,
In whom alone we do this power find,
To join two hearts as in one frame to move
Two bodies, but one soul to rule the mind
Eyes which must care to one dear object bind,
Ears to each other's speech as if above
All else, they sweet, and learned were; this kind
Content of lovers witnesseth true love.
It doth enrich the wits, and make you see
That in your self which you knew not before,
Forcing you to admire such gifts should be
Hid from your knowledge, yet in you the store.
Millions of these adorn the throne of Love,
How blest be they then, who his favours prove?° experience

---

[1] thread of Love Referring to the myth of Ariadne, who gave her beloved Theseus a spool of thread to unwind behind him as he traveled through the labyrinth of the Minotaur; by following the thread he could find his way back out.

[2] prophet This appears as "profit" in an earlier version of the poem.

83

How blest be they, then, who his favours prove,
A life whereof the birth is just desire?
Breeding sweet flame, which hearts invite to move,
In these loved eyes which kindle Cupid's fire,
And nurse his longings with his thoughts entire,
Fixed on the heat of wishes formed by love,
Yet whereas fire destroys, this doth aspire,[1]
Increase, and foster all delights above.
Love will a painter make you, such, as you
Shall able be to draw your only dear,
More lively, perfect, lasting, and more true
Than rarest workman, and to you more near.
These be the least, then all must needs confess,
He that shuns love, doth love himself the less.

He that shuns love, doth love himself the less,
And cursed he whose spirit not admires
The worth of love, where endless blessedness
Reigns, and commands, maintained by heavenly fires.
Made of virtue, joined by truth, blown by desires,
Strengthened by worth, renewed by carefulness,
Flaming in never changing thoughts: briars
Of jealousy shall here miss welcomeness.
Nor coldly pass in the pursuits of love
Like one long frozen in a sea of ice:
And yet but chastely let your passions move,
No thought from virtuous love your minds entice.
Never to other ends your fancies place,
But where they may return with honour's grace.

85

But where they may return with honour's grace,
Where Venus' follies can no harbour win,
But chased are, as worthless of the face,
Or style of love, who hath lascivious been.
Our hearts are subject to her son, where sin
Never did dwell, or rest one minute's space;
What faults he hath in her did still begin,
And from her breast he sucked his fleeting pace.
If lust be counted love 'tis falsely named
By wickedness, a fairer gloss to set
Upon that vice, which else makes men ashamed
In the own phrase to warrant, but beget
This child for love,[2] who ought like monster born,
Be from the court of Love, and Reason torn.

86

Be from the court of Love, and Reason torn,
For Love in Reason now doth put his trust,
Desert° and liking are together born worthiness
Children of Love and Reason, parents just.
Reason adviser is, Love ruler must
Be of the state, which crown he long hath worn;
Yet so, as neither will in least mistrust
The government where no fear is of scorn.
Then reverence both their mights thus made of one,
But wantonness, and all those errors shun,
Which wrongers be, impostures, and alone
Maintainers of all follies ill begun.
Fruit of a sour,[3] and unwholesome ground
Unprofitably pleasing, and unsound.

87

Unprofitably pleasing, and unsound.
When heaven gave liberty to frail dull earth,
To bring forth plenty that in ills abound,[4]
Which ripest, yet do bring a certain dearth.
A timeless, and unseasonable birth,
Planted in ill, in worse time springing found,
Which hemlock[5] like might feed a sick wit's mirth
Where unruled vapours[6] swim in endless round.
Then joy we not in what we ought to shun,
Where shady pleasures show, but true born fires
Are quite quenched out, or by poor ashes won,
Awhile to keep those cool, and wan desires.
O no, let Love his glory have, and might
Be giv'n to him, who triumphs in his right.

---

[1] aspire Ascend or rise. This appears as "respire" (i.e., "restore hope") in an earlier version of the poem.

[2] which else … love Which otherwise makes men ashamed in the same phrase to affirm that lust is the child of love.

[3] sour Acidic and dank.

[4] When heaven … abound See Genesis 1.11–12.

[5] hemlock Herb that was commonly used as a sedative, poisonous in higher doses.

[6] vapours Exhalations of air from the stomach that, according to medical wisdom of the time, caused mental illnesses such as depression and nervousness.

88

Be giv'n to him who triumphs in his right;
Nor fading be, but like those blossoms fair,
Which fall for good, and lose their colours bright,
Yet die not, but with fruit their loss repair:
So may Love make you pale with loving care,
When sweet enjoying shall restore that light,
More clear in beauty, then we can compare,
If not to Venus in her chosen might.[1]
And who so give themselves in this dear kind,
These happinesses shall attend them still,
To be supplied with joys enriched in mind,
With treasures of content, and pleasures fill.
Thus love to be divine, doth here appear,
Free from all fogs, but shining fair and clear.

89

Free from all fogs, but shining fair, and clear,
Wise in all good, and innocent in ill,
Where holy friendship is esteemed dear,
With truth in love, and justice in our will.
In love these titles only have their fill
Of happy life-maintainer, and the mere
Defence of right, the punisher of skill,
And fraud, from whence directions doth appear.
To thee then, lord commander of all hearts,
Ruler of our affections, kind, and just,
Great king of love, my soul from feigned smarts,
Or thought of change, I offer to your trust,
This crown,[2] my self, and all that I have more,
Except my heart, which you bestowed before.

90

Except my heart, which you bestowed before,
And for a sign of conquest gave away
As worthless to be kept in your choice store;
Yet one more spotless with you doth not stay.
The tribute which my heart doth truly pay,
Is faith untouched, pure thoughts discharge the score
Of debts for me, where constancy bears sway,
And rules as lord, unharmed by envy's sore.
Yet other mischiefs fail not to attend,
As enemies to you, my foes must be,
Cursed jealousy doth all her forces bend
To my undoing, thus my harms I see.
So though in love I fervently do burn,
In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn?

Railing Rhymes Returned upon the Author by Mistress Mary Wroth

Hermaphrodite[3] in sense in Art a monster
As by your railing rhymes the world may conster° construe
Your spiteful words against a harmless book
Shows that an ass much like the sire doth look
Men truly noble fear no touch of blood
Nor question make of others much more good
Can such comparisons seem the want° of wit lack
When oysters have inflamed your blood with it
But it appears your guiltiness gaped wide
And filled with Dirty doubt your brain's swollen tide
Both friend and foe in deed you use alike
And your mad wit in sherry equal strike
These slanderous flying flames raised from the pot[4]
You know are false and raging makes you hot
How easily now do you receive your own
Turned on your self from whence the squib was thrown
When these few lines not thousands writ at least
Mainly thus prove your self the drunken beast
This is far less to you than you have done
A Thread but of your own all words worse spun
By which you lively see in your own glass[5]
How hard it is for you to lie and pass
Thus you have made yourself a lying wonder
Fools and their pastimes should not part asunder.
—1983 (WRITTEN C. 1621)

---

[1] might This appears as "night" in an earlier version of the poem.

[2] This crown I.e., this crown of sonnets.

[3] Hermaphrodite Possessing both male and female sexual organs; often used pejoratively to describe a mannish woman or an effeminate man.

[4] pot Drinking vessel (for liquor).

[5] glass Mirror, but here perhaps also drinking-glass.

IN CONTEXT

The Occasion of "Railing Rhymes"

Wroth's "Railing Rhymes" was written in response to the following attack by Lord Denny.

Edward Denny, Baron of Waltham, To Pamphilia from the Father-in-Law of Seralius (c. 1621)[1]

Hermaphrodite in show, in deed a monster
As by thy words and works all men may conster° construe
Thy wrathful spite conceived an Idle° book worthless
Brought forth a fool which like the dam doth look
Wherein thou strikes at some man's noble blood
Of kin to thine[2] if thine be counted good
Whose vain comparison for want° of wit lack
Takes up the oystershell to play with it
Yet common oysters such as thine gape wide
And take in pearls or worse at every tide
Both friend and foe to thee are even alike
Thy wit runs mad not caring who it strike
These slanderous flying f[l]ames rise from the pot
For potted wits inflamed are raging hot
How easy wer't to pay thee with thine own
Returning that which thou thyself hast thrown
And write a thousand lies of thee at least
And by thy lines describe a drunken beast
This were no more to thee than thou hast done
A Thread but of thine own which thou hast spun
By which thou plainly seest in thine own glass
How easy 'tis to bring a lie to pass
Thus hast thou made thyself a lying wonder
Fools and their Babbles seldom part asunder
Work o th' Works leave idle books alone
For wise and worthier women have writ none.
—1983 (WRITTEN C. 1621)

---

[1] Seralius A character in Wroth's court pastoral The Countess of Montgomery's Urania (1621), whose satirical resemblance to Denny's son-in-law was transparent enough to suggest embarrassing parallels to a recent Denny family scandal. Denny wrote angry letters to Wroth demanding withdrawal of her book and circulated this poem questioning her honesty and the appropriateness of a woman pursuing the vocation of writing.

[2] Of kin to thine As good, or noble, as yours.

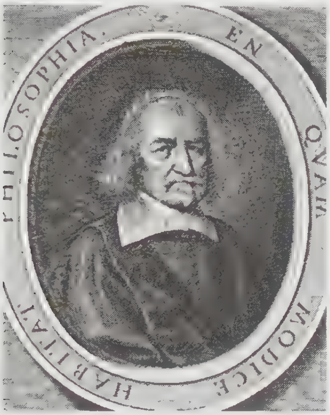
THOMAS HOBBES

1588 – 1679

Thomas Hobbes was active in the study of geometry, optics, physics, psychology, language, and religion, but he is best known as the author of Leviathan, a seminal work of political and moral philosophy. His writings have remained the subject of controversy—not least of all his contention that the life of one who exists in a state of nature is "solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short." In his own time Hobbes had to contend with more severe criticism by the Royalists, the Parliamentarians, and the Church, all of which at various times found his writings to be seditious; the reading of his works was at one time banned by both the Church and Oxford University. Many objected to his materialist assertions that a person attains knowledge only by way of sensory impressions and not by divine transference (Hobbes said "the universe is corporeal; all that is real is material, and what is not material is not real"), and that moral behavior is best only because it is rational to live a moral life and not because God wills people to do so.



PHILOSOPHIA: EN QVAM MODICE HABITAT

Hobbes was born in Wiltshire, England, in the year of the Spanish Armada (1588); rumors had it that his premature birth had been brought on by his mother's fear of an attack. He was raised after the age of seven by his uncle, who took responsibility when Thomas Hobbes Sr., a parson, fled the family after a violent argument with another vicar. Hobbes appears not to have suffered intellectually from this upheaval, however—he translated Euripides's Medea from Greek to Latin during his formative years and entered Oxford University at the age of 15. After graduation he became tutor to the son of William Cavendish, Baron Hardwick (later the Earl of Devonshire), and indeed he would spend most of his life as a tutor. Hobbes accompanied the younger Cavendish on a European tour in 1610, and on this and subsequent trips overseas he met and befriended such important thinkers as Galileo and René Descartes (Hobbes wrote a famous refutation of Descartes's Meditations), all of whom influenced his theories of mathematics and natural science.

Hobbes continued translating throughout his life, first publishing Thucydides's Eight Books of the Peloponnesian War in 1629, long after he had completed the translation. The purpose of the book, he says in the introduction, is to "instruct and enable men, by the knowledge of actions past, to bear themselves prudently in the present and providently towards the future." In one of the first texts authored and published by Hobbes, Elements of Law, Natural and Politic (1642), which he called a "scientific treatment of politics," he responded to the political and civil unrest during the reign of Charles I by arguing for the right of the monarchy to absolute power. The contentious nature of the book and its appearance at the time of the King's dissolution of Parliament and the beginning of the Civil War caused Hobbes to flee to Paris, where he lived in exile for over a decade, there tutoring the future king, Charles II, and beginning his work on an important philosophical trilogy concerning politics (De Cive, 1642), matter (De Corpore, 1655), and human nature (De Homine, 1658).

The crux of the argument in Leviathan (1651) has its basis in the upheaval of the Civil War in England (1642–48). The work outlines Hobbes's theories about the necessity for a civilized society to live under the rule of government and abide obediently by its laws in order to exist in security. A sovereign power, Hobbes thought, is in the best position to make decisions regarding the welfare of its people and should be given absolute authority to rule over its constituents. He did not, however, specify that the "sovereign power" need be a king or queen, and because of this, when Leviathan appeared, Hobbes found himself in danger on the Continent, as the Royalists, who were also living in exile, interpreted his political stance as supportive of Cromwell's reign.

Leviathan's argument was founded on a defense of reason, which Hobbes saw as having as a natural goal self-preservation and the avoidance of war and violent death. Rather than living in a state of nature (i.e., without laws), people are better able in the long term to protect themselves against the threat of anarchy and civil war by banding together and giving themselves up to sovereign rule. They are then obliged to abide unquestioningly by the sovereign's laws, and, in essence, to let government become the "voice of the people." While Hobbes's doctrines were from one angle supportive of the sovereign power of the monarch, they were revolutionary in deriving justifications for that power from the common interests of the people and not from any divine right.

Hobbes lived to 91, an extraordinary age for someone of his day. He did not cease work in his final decade, but wrote his autobiography, translated Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, and completed work on Behemoth (authorized version published 1682), a history of the Civil War period in the form of a dialogue.

from Leviathan;[1] Or the Matter, Form, & Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civil

THE INTRODUCTION

Nature (the art whereby God hath made and governs the world) is by the art of man, as in many other things, so in this also imitated, that it can make an artificial animal. For seeing life is but a motion of limbs, the beginning whereof is in some principal part within, why may we not say that all automata (engines that move themselves by springs and wheels as doth a watch) have an artificial life? For what is the heart, but a spring; and the nerves, but so many strings; and the joints, but so many wheels, giving motion to the whole body, such as was intended by the Artificer? Art goes yet further, imitating that rational and most excellent work of nature, man. For by art is created that great Leviathan called a Commonwealth, or State (in Latin, Civitas), which is but an artificial man, though of greater stature and strength than the natural, for whose protection and defense it was intended; and in which the sovereignty is an artificial soul, as giving life and motion to the whole body. The magistrates and other officers of judicature and execution, artificial joints. Reward and punishment (by which fastened to the seat of the sovereignty, every joint and member is moved to perform his duty) are the nerves that do the same in the body natural. The wealth and riches of all the particular members are the strength. Salus populi (the people's safety) its business. Counsellors, by whom all things needful for it to know are suggested unto it, are the memory. Equity and laws, an artificial reason and will. Concord, health. Sedition. sickness. And civil war, death. Lastly, the pacts and covenants by which the parts of this body politic were at first made, set together, and united, resemble that fiat,[1] or the "Let us make man,"[2] pronounced by God in the Creation.

[1] Leviathan From Job 41: an enormous primordial sea serpent whose strength is immeasurable and the existence of which attests to God's power and will. The 1651 edition of Hobbes's book pictured the Leviathan as sovereign power, personified by a giant monarch made up of small figures of men.

To describe the nature of this artificial man, I will consider: first, the matter thereof, and the artificer, both which is Man. Secondly, how, and by what covenants it is made; what are the rights and just power or authority of a sovereign; and what it is that preserveth and dissolveth it. Thirdly, what is a Christian Commonwealth. Lastly, what is the Kingdom of Darkness.

Concerning the first, there is a saying much usurped of late that wisdom is acquired, not by reading of books, but of men. Consequently whereunto, those persons, that for the most part can give no other proof of being wise, take great delight to show what they think they have read in men by uncharitable censures of one another behind their backs. But there is another saying, not of late understood, by which they might learn truly to read one another, if they would take the pains, and that is nosce teipsum, read thyself, which was not meant, as it is now used, to countenance either the barbarous state of men in power towards their inferiors or to encourage men of low degree to a saucy behavior towards their betters, but to teach us that for the similitude of the thoughts and passions of one man to the thoughts and passions of another, whosoever looketh into himself and considereth what he doth when he does think, opine, reason, hope, fear, etc., and upon what grounds, he shall thereby read and know what are the thoughts and passions of all other men upon the like occasions. I say the similitude of passions, which are the same in all men, desire, fear, hope, etc., not the similitude of the objects of the passions, which are the things desired, feared, hoped, etc.; for these the constitution individual and particular education do so vary, and they are so easy to be kept from our knowledge that the characters of man's heart, blotted and confounded as they are with dissembling, lying, counterfeiting, and erroneous doctrines are legible only to him that searcheth hearts. And though by men's actions we do discover their design sometimes; yet to do it without comparing them with our own and distinguishing all circumstances by which the case may come to be altered is to decipher without a key and be for the most part deceived by too much trust or by too much diffidence, as he that reads is himself a good or evil man.

But let one man read another by his actions never so perfectly, it serves him only with his acquaintance, which are but few. He that is to govern a whole nation must read in himself, not this or that particular man, but mankind, which though it be hard to do, harder than to learn any language or science; yet when I shall have set down my own reading orderly and perspicuously, the pains left another will be only to consider if he also find not the same in himself. For this kind of doctrine admitteth no other demonstration.

CHAPTER 13: OF THE NATURAL CONDITION OF MANKIND AS CONCERNING THEIR FELICITY AND MISERY

Nature hath made men so equal in the faculties of body and mind, as that, though there be found one man sometimes manifestly stronger in body or of quicker mind than another, yet when all is reckoned together, the difference between man and man is not so considerable as that one man can thereupon claim to himself any benefit to which another may not pretend as well as he. For as to the strength of body, the weakest has strength enough to kill the strongest, either by secret machination or by confederacy with others that are in the same danger with himself.

[1] fiat Decree. Latin: let there be.

[2] "Let us make man" From Genesis 1.26.

And as to the faculties of the mind, setting aside the arts grounded upon words, and especially that skill of proceeding upon general and infallible rules, called science, which very few have and but in few things, as being not a native faculty born with us, nor attained, as prudence, while we look after somewhat else, I find yet a greater equality amongst men than that of strength. For prudence is but experience, which equal time equally bestows on all men in those things they equally apply themselves unto. That which may perhaps make such equality incredible is but a vain conceit of one's own wisdom, which almost all men think they have in a greater degree than the vulgar, that is, than all men but themselves and a few others, whom by fame or for concurring with themselves, they approve. For such is the nature of men that howsoever they may acknowledge many others to be more witty or more eloquent or more learned, they will hardly believe there be many so wise as themselves, for they see their own wit at hand and other men's at a distance. But this proveth rather that men are in that point equal, than unequal. For there is not ordinarily a greater sign of the equal distribution of anything than that every man is contented with his share.

From this equality of ability ariseth equality of hope in the attaining of our ends. And therefore if any two men desire the same thing, which nevertheless they cannot both enjoy, they become enemies, and in the way to their end (which is principally their own conservation, and sometimes their delectation only) endeavour to destroy or subdue one another. And from hence it comes to pass that where an invader hath no more to fear than another man's single power, if one plant, sow, build, or possess a convenient seat, others may probably be expected to come prepared with forces united to dispossess and deprive him, not only of the fruit of his labour, but also of his life or liberty. And the invader again is in the like danger of another.

And from this diffidence of one another, there is no way for any man to secure himself so reasonable as anticipation, that is, by force or wiles, to master the persons of all men he can so long till he see no other power great enough to endanger him; and this is no more than his own conservation requireth, and is generally allowed. Also, because there be some that, taking pleasure in contemplating their own power in the acts of conquest, which they pursue farther than their security requires, if others, that otherwise would be glad to be at ease within modest bounds, should not by invasion increase their power, they would not be able, long time, by standing only on their defence, to subsist. And by consequence, such augmentation of dominion over men being necessary to a man's conservation, it ought to be allowed him.

Again, men have no pleasure (but on the contrary a great deal of grief) in keeping company where there is no power able to overawe them all. For every man looketh that his companion should value him at the same rate he sets upon himself, and upon all signs of contempt or undervaluing naturally endeavours, as far as he dares (which amongst them that have no common power to keep them in quiet is far enough to make them destroy each other), to extort a greater value from his contemners,[1] by damage; and from others, by the example.

So that in the nature of man, we find three principal causes of quarrel. First, competition; secondly, diffidence; thirdly, glory.

The first maketh men invade for gain; the second, for safety; and the third, for reputation. The first use violence to make themselves masters of other men's persons, wives, children, and cattle; the second, to defend them; the third, for trifles, as a word, a smile, a different opinion, and any other sign of undervalue, either direct in their persons or by reflection in their kindred, their friends, their nation, their profession, or their name.

Hereby it is manifest that during the time men live without a common power to keep them all in awe, they are in that condition which is called war; and such a war as is of every man against every man. For war consisteth not in battle only, or the act of fighting, but in a tract of time, wherein the will to contend by battle is sufficiently known; and therefore the notion of time is to be considered in the nature of war, as it is in the nature of weather. For as the nature of foul weather lieth not in a shower or two of rain, but in an inclination thereto of many days together, so the nature of war consisteth not in actual fighting, but in the known disposition thereto during all the time there is no assurance to the contrary. All other time is peace.

[1] his contemners Those who scorn him.

Whatsoever therefore is consequent to a time of war, where every man is enemy to every man, the same consequent to the time wherein men live without other security than what their own strength and their own invention shall furnish them withal. In such condition there is no place for industry, because the fruit thereof is uncertain; and consequently no culture of the earth; no navigation, nor use of the commodities that may be imported by sea; no commodious building; no instruments of moving and removing such things as require much force; no knowledge of the face of the earth; no account of time; no arts; no letters; no society; and which is worst of all, continual fear, and danger of violent death; and the life of man, solitary, poor, nasty, brutish, and short.

It may seem strange to some man that has not well weighed these things that nature should thus dissociate and render men apt to invade and destroy one another; and he may therefore, not trusting to this inference, made from the passions, desire perhaps to have the same confirmed by experience. Let him therefore consider with himself; when taking a journey, he arms himself and seeks to go well accompanied; when going to sleep, he locks his doors; when even in his house he locks his chests; and this when he knows there be laws and public officers, armed to revenge all injuries shall be done him; what opinion he has of his fellow subjects, when he rides armed; of his fellow citizens, when he locks his doors; and of his children, and servants, when he locks his chests. Does he not there as much accuse mankind by his actions as I do by my words? But neither of us accuse man's nature in it. The desires and other passions of man are in themselves no sin. No more are the actions that proceed from those passions till they know a law that forbids them; which, till laws be made, they cannot know; nor can any law be made till they have agreed upon the person that shall make it.

It may peradventure be thought there was never such a time nor condition of war as this; and I believe it was never generally so, over all the world; but there are many places where they live so now. For the savage people in many places of America, except the government of small families, the concord whereof dependeth on natural lust, have no government at all, and live at this day in that brutish manner, as I said before. Howsoever, it may be perceived what manner of life there would be, where there were no common power to fear, by the manner of life which men that have formerly lived under a peaceful government use to degenerate into a civil war.

But though there had never been any time wherein particular men were in a condition of war one against another; yet in all times kings and persons of sovereign authority, because of their independency, are in continual jealousies, and in the state and posture of gladiators, having their weapons pointing and their eyes fixed on one another, that is, their forts, garrisons, and guns upon the frontiers of their kingdoms, and continual spies upon their neighbours, which is a posture of war. But because they uphold thereby the industry of their subjects, there does not follow from it that misery which accompanies the liberty of particular men.

To this war of every man against every man, this also is consequent: that nothing can be unjust. The notions of right and wrong, justice and injustice, have there no place. Where there is no common power, there is no law; where no law, no injustice. Force and fraud are in war the two cardinal virtues. Justice and injustice are none of the faculties neither of the body nor mind. If they were, they might be in a man that were alone in the world, as well as his senses and passions. They are qualities that relate to men in society, not in solitude. It is consequent also to the same condition that there be no propriety,[1] no dominion, no mine and thine distinct, but only that to be every man's that he can get, and for so long as he can keep it. And thus much for the ill condition which man by mere nature is actually placed in, though with a possibility to come out of it, consisting partly in the passions, partly in his reason.

The passions that incline men to peace are fear of death, desire of such things as are necessary to commodious living, and a hope by their industry to obtain them. And reason suggesteth convenient articles of peace upon which men may be drawn to agreement. These articles are they which otherwise are called the laws of nature, whereof I shall speak more particularly in the two following chapters.

ROBERT HERRICK

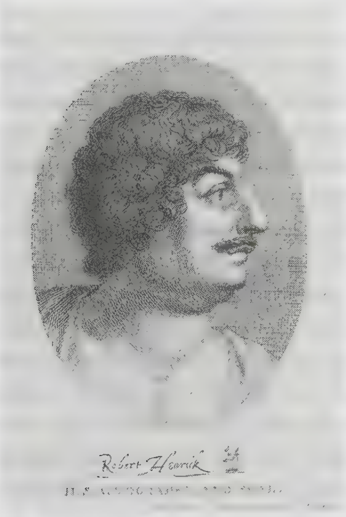
Of the "sons of Ben" who basked in the genius of Ben Jonson in 1620s London, Robert Herrick is the poet most familiar to modern readers—more so, to many readers, than Jonson himself. "Gather ye Rosebuds while ye may," the opening line of Herrick's "To the Virgins, to make much of Time," is the most famous version of a classical refrain, while poems such as "Delight in Disorder" and "The Hock Cart" are fixtures in anthologies. That Herrick's fame rests on a few crystalline lyrics obscures the fact that he possessed a fairly varied repertoire. Herrick emulated Jonson (whom he called "Saint Ben") not only in editing and publishing his own complete works but also in cultivating and "Englishing" a number of classical poets. Herrick's Hesperides (1648) contains epigrams, epistles, odes, eclogues, and other lyric forms—over 1,400 poems in all—on a variety of themes. The pastoral features prominently in Hesperides, as does the amorous (158 poems are addressed to 14 separate mistresses, most of whom seem to be the products of Herrick's literary imagination) and the political; poems such as "Upon Julia's Clothes" express an aesthetics of sensuality. The best of these poems had been circulating in manuscript for decades before they were published, and some had become popular songs, set to music by Henry Lawes and others.



Hesperides appeared during a period of political upheaval and civil war, and achieved little notice in Herrick's lifetime. Its often light bucolic tone did not match the seriousness of the time; its occasional indecency offended some; and His Noble Numbers, the religious verse appended to it, seemed flat and undistinguished. No separate volume of Herrick's poetry was published again until 1810, but once his poetry had been rediscovered the romantic attraction to pastoral and rural themes made Herrick popular with nineteenth-century anthologists. If subsequent critics have never quite endorsed Algernon Charles Swinburne's extravagant praise of Herrick as "the greatest song-writer ever born of English race," recent consensus has raised his status among mid-seventeenth- century poets thanks to a deeper appreciation of his cunning and delicate artistry, the clever scope and organization of Hesperides, and the political implications of his celebration of traditional rites and pastimes.

The son of a London goldsmith, Herrick apprenticed in that craft before attending Cambridge, from which he graduated in 1617. After years spent mostly in London, cultivating patrons and literary friendships with Ben Jonson and others, he moved to Devonshire to become vicar of Dean Prior in 1629. Ousted from his living by the triumphant Parliamentary forces in 1647, Herrick, in "His Returne to London," shed no tears for "the dull confines of the drooping West," indeed lamenting the economic necessity that had condemned him to such "a long and irksome banishment." He returned to Dean Prior at his own request after the Restoration in 1660, however, to live out the remainder of his bachelor's life ministering to his "rude" flock.

In "Discontents in Devon," Herrick confesses his ambivalence toward country life: "I ne'er invented such / Ennobled numbers for the Presse / Then where I loath'd so much." In fact, the Epicurean bent of Herrick's classical models had prepared him well for versifying the joys of the natural world and infusing them with the echoes of what Puritans (doubtless correctly) thought the residual paganism he found in rural festivals and rituals, as he does impeccably in "Corinna's Gone A-Maying." In "The Argument of His Book," his verse preface to Hesperides, he announces himself as a poet of nature (as it was perceived in his day), ceremony, and "Times trans-shifting," linking natural cycles and the transience of nature's creatures to the inevitability of aging and death. Just as the title of his book recalls the island garden of classical myth (a sea-guarded place of golden apples, maidens, and a vigilant dragon), Herrick views nature and the natural cycles of work and play, including festivals and holidays, as providing shelter against the ravages of time, mortality, and civil strife. An ardent Royalist, Herrick would also have approved of the political role such rural festivals played in reinforcing traditional hierarchies and social stability. Not surprisingly, these holidays (including "Sunday sports") had been espoused and encouraged in the Book of Sports issued by the Stuart kings, but deplored and condemned by the Puritans as profanations of the Sabbath and excuses for drunkenness. Herrick's conservative politics and his natural Epicureanism leave no doubt as to his stand on the issue. From his classical models, Herrick had learned to express a carefully cultivated simplicity of outlook that sets him apart from the smooth urbanity and self-conscious sophistication of the Cavalier poets and the strenuous spiritual strivings of the metaphysical poets. For Herrick, or at least for the persona he constructs, mortality must either be confronted by seizing and enjoying the pleasures of today (Carpe diem, as the Romans put it) or transcended by achieving poetic immortality. Although he seems to have been a sincere Christian and wrote some fine religious verse, "To live merrily, and to trust to Good Verses," the memorable title of one of his lyrics, might be cited as Herrick's ultimate advice to posterity.

The Argument[1] of His Book

I sing of brooks, of blossoms, birds, and bowers,
Of April, May, of June, and July flowers.
I sing of Maypoles, hock carts, wassails, wakes,[2]
Of bridegrooms, brides, and of their bridal cakes.
I write of youth, of love, and have access
By these, to sing of cleanly° wantonness. innocent
I sing of dews, of rains, and piece by piece,
Of balm, of oil, of spice, and ambergris.[3]
I sing of times trans-shifting; and I write
How roses first came red, and lilies white.
I write of groves, of twilights, and I sing
The court of Mab,[4] and of the fairy king.
I write of hell; I sing (and ever shall)
Of Heaven, and hope to have it after all.

Delight in Disorder

A sweet disorder in the dress
Kindles in clothes a wantonness:
A lawn[5] about the shoulders thrown
Into a fine distractiòn;
An erring lace, which here and there

His Farewell to Sack

Farewell, thou thing, time-past so known, so dear
To me as blood to life and spirit; near,
Nay, thou more near than kindred, friend, man, wife,
Male to the female, soul to body, life
To quick action, or the warm soft side
Of the resigning yet resisting bride.
The kiss of virgins; first-fruits of the bed;
Soft speech, smooth touch, the lips, the maidenhead;
These and a thousand sweets could never be
So near or dear as thou wast once to me.
O thou, the drink of gods and angels! Wine
That scatterest spirit and lust;° whose purest shine pleasure
More radiant than the summer's sunbeams shows,
Each way illustrious, brave;° and like to those splendid
Comets we see by night, whose shagg'd[2] portents

Or some full flame which with a pride aspires,° rises
Throwing about his wild and active fires.
'Tis thou, above nectar, O divinest soul!
(Eternal in thyself) that canst control
That which subverts whole nature: grief and care,
Vexation of the mind, and damned despair.
'Tis thou alone who with thy mystic fan[3]
Work'st more than wisdom, art, or nature can
To rouse the sacred madness, and awake
The frost-bound blood and spirits, and to make Them frantic with thy raptures, flashing through
The soul like lightning, and as active too.
'Tis not Apollo[4] can, or those thrice three
Castalian sisters[5] sing, if wanting thee.
Horace, Anacreon[6] both had lost their fame
Had'st thou not filled them with thy fire and flame.
Phoebean splendor! and thou Thespian spring![7]

Their true-paced numbers° and their holy lays° verses / songs
Which makes them worthy° cedar and the bays.[8] worthy of

Thee with the eye of admiration?
Since I must leave thee, and enforced must say
To all thy witching beauties, Go, Away.
But if thy whimpering looks do ask me why,
Then know that nature bids thee go, not I.
'Tis her erroneous self has made a brain
Uncapable of such a sovereign
As is thy powerful self. Prithee not smile,
Or smile more inly,° lest thy looks beguile inwardly
My vows denounced° in zeal, which thus much show thee, announced
That I have sworn but by thy looks to know thee.

Corinna's Going A-Maying[1]

Get up! get up for shame! the blooming morn
Upon her wings presents the god unshorn.[2]
See how Aurora[3] throws her fair
Fresh-quilted colors through the air:
Get up, sweet slug-a-bed, and see
The dew bespangling herb and tree.
Each flower has wept, and bowed toward the east
Above an hour since, yet you not dressed;
Nay, not so much as out of bed?
When all the birds have matins[4] said,
And sung their thankful hymns: 'tis sin,
Nay, profanation to keep in,
Whenas a thousand virgins on this day
Spring, sooner than the lark, to fetch in May.[5]

Rise, and put on your foliage, and be seen
To come forth, like the springtime, fresh and green,
And sweet as Flora.[6] Take no care
For jewels for your gown or hair;
Fear not; the leaves will strew
Gems in abundance upon you;
Besides, the childhood of the day has kept,
Against° you come, some orient pearls unwept; until
Come and receive them[7] while the light
Hangs on the dew-locks of the night,
And Titan° on the eastern hill the sun
Retires himself, or else stands still
Till you come forth. Wash, dress, be brief in praying:
Few beads[8] are best, when once we go a-Maying.

Come, my Corinna, come; and coming, mark
How each field turns° a street; each street a park becomes
Made green and trimmed with trees; see how Devotion gives each house a bough,
Or branch: each porch, each door, ere this,
An ark, a tabernacle is,
Made up of whitethorn neatly interwove;[9]
As if here were those cooler shades of love.
Can such delights be in the street
And open fields, and we not see 't?
Come, we'll abroad;° and let's obey go out
The proclamation[10] made for May,
And sin no more, as we have done, by staying;
But, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying.

There's not a budding boy, or girl, this day
But is got up and gone to bring in May;
A deal° of youth, ere this, is come multitude
Back, and with whitethorn laden, home.
Some have dispatched their cakes and cream,
Before that we have left to dream:[11]
And some have wept, and wooed, and plighted troth,
And chose their priest, ere we can cast off sloth.
Many a green-gown[12] has been given,
Many a kiss, both odd and even;
Many a glance, too, has been sent
From out the eye, love's firmament;
Many a jest told of the keys betraying
This night, and locks picked; yet we're not a-Maying.

[1] A-Maying Celebrating May Day, especially by gathering spring flowers and greenery.

[2] god unshorn Apollo, the sun god of classical mythology, often pictured with long, brilliant, streaming hair suggesting the rays of the sun, and also often identified with the advent of spring.

[3] Aurora Roman goddess of the dawn.

[4] matins Morning prayers.

[5] fetch in May Bring in the month of May; also a pun on "may" as a common word for the blossoms of the hawthorn, which were gathered ("fetched in") on May Day and whose white or pinkish hue was suggestive of virginity.

[6] Flora Roman goddess of flowers and spring.

[7] receive them According to English rural tradition, young girls could ensure their future beauty by washing themselves in the dew of the hawthorn on May Day.

[8] beads Prayers, or beads of a rosary.

[9] Devotion … interwove According to ancient rural custom (eventually tailored to Christian belief), hawthorn boughs were placed above a doorway on May Day to confer blessing on the dwelling.

[10] proclamation Referring to a royal "Declaration concerning lawful sports" (1613, 1633), which encouraged traditional pastimes such as maypoles and May games to counter puritan Sabbatarianism.

[11] Before … dream Before we have ceased to dream, i.e., awoken.

[12] green-gown Gown grass-stained from amorous sport.

Come, let us go while we are in our prime,
And take the harmless folly of the time.
We shall grow old apace, and die
Before we know our liberty.
Our life is short, and our days run
As fast away as does the sun;
And as a vapor or a drop of rain,
Once lost, can ne'er be found again,
So when or you or I are made
A fable, song, or fleeting shade,
All love, all liking, all delight
Lies drowned with us in endless night.
Then while time serves, and we are but decaying,
Come, my Corinna, come, let's go a-Maying.

To the Virgins, to Make Much of Time

Gather ye rosebuds while ye may,
Old time is still a-flying;[1]
And this same flower that smiles today,
Tomorrow will be dying.

The glorious lamp of heaven, the sun,
The higher he's a-getting;
The sooner will his race be run,[2]
And nearer he's to setting.

That age is best, which is the first,
When youth and blood are warmer;
But being spent, the worse, and worst
Times still succeed the former.

Then be not coy, but use your time,
And while ye may, go marry;
For having lost but once your prime,
You may for ever tarry.

The Hock-Cart,[3] or Harvest Home

To the Right Honorable, Mildmay,
Earl of Westmoreland[4]

Come, sons of summer, by whose toil,
We are the lords of wine and oil;
By whose tough labors, and rough hands,
We rip up first, then reap our lands.
Crowned with the ears of corn, now come,
And, to the pipe, sing harvest home.
Come forth, my Lord, and see the cart
Dressed up with all the country art.
See, here a maukin,[5] there a sheet,
As spotless pure, as it is sweet,
The horses, mares, and frisking fillies,
(Clad, all, in linen, white as lilies).
The harvest swains,° and wenches bound peasant lads
For joy, to see the hock-cart crowned.
About the cart, hear how the rout° crowd
Of rural younglings raise the shout,
Pressing before, some coming after,
Those with a shout and these with laughter.
Some bless the cart, some kiss the sheaves;
Some prank° them up with oaken leaves: dress
Some cross° the fill-horse,° some with great sit astride / shaft-horse
Devotion stroke the home-borne wheat:
While other rustics, less attent° attentive
To prayers, than to merriment,
Run after with their breeches rent.
Well, on, brave boys, to your Lord's hearth,
Glittering with fire; where, for your mirth,
Ye shall see first the large and chief
Foundation of your feast, fat beef:
With upper stories, mutton, veal,
And bacon,° (which makes full the meal) pork
With several dishes standing by,
As here a custard, there a pie,

---

[1] Old … a-flying Paraphrase of the Latin tempus fugit ("time flies").

[2] his race be run The sun's movement was pictured in Greek mythology as the chariot of Phoebus Apollo racing across the sky.

[3] Hock-Cart The hock-cart, or "high cart" (because piled high), was the last wagon load of the harvest.

[4] Mildmay … Westmoreland Mildmay Fane was Herrick's friend and patron; he published a collection of his own poetry, Otia Sacra (1648).

[5] maukin Rag doll, made of cloths.

And here all tempting frumenty.[1]
And for to make the merry cheer,
If smirking wine be wanting here,
There's that, which drowns all care, stout beer:
Which freely drink to your Lord's health,
Then to the plough, (the common-wealth),
Next to your flails, your fanes, your vats;[2]
Then to the maids with wheaten° hats: straw
To the rough sickle, and crook'd sythe,
Drink, frolic boys, till all be blithe.
Feed, and grow fat; and as ye eat,
Be mindful, that the laboring neat,° oxen
As you, may have their fill of meat.
And know, besides, ye must revoke° recall
The patient ox unto the yoke,
And all go back unto the plow
And harrow, though they're hanged up now.
And, you must know, your Lord's word's true,
Feed him ye must, whose food fills you,
And that this pleasure is like rain,
Not sent ye for to drown your pain,
But for to make it spring again.

Upon Julia's Clothes

Whenas° in silks my Julia goes, whenever
Then, then, methinks, how sweetly flows
That liquefaction of her clothes.

Next, when I cast mine eyes and see
That brave° vibration each way free, beautiful
Oh, how that glittering taketh me!

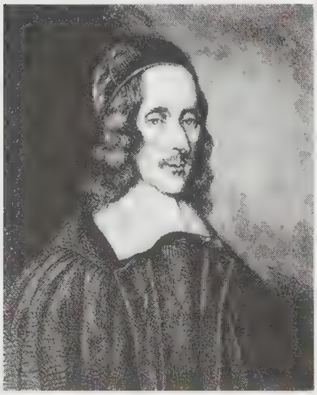
GEORGE HERBERT

1593 – 1633

Although his contribution to English poetry consists of a single volume, The Temple, George Herbert stands in the first rank of the poets of the seventeenth century and, indeed, of all English lyric poets. Born into wealth and privilege, he chose instead a life dedicated to the power of faith and poetry, dying a humble country parson. An early friend and poetic disciple of John Donne, he left behind Donne's learned abstruseness and fashioned instead a modestly artful music that overleaps sectarian boundaries. Immensely influential on the devotional poets of his own century, Herbert in the eighteenth century was celebrated perhaps more for his piety than his poetry. (John Wesley, for instance, turned a number of Herbert's lyrics into hymns, some of which are still sung.) In the nineteenth century his reputation waned, though he was deeply admired by a few major figures, including Coleridge, Emerson, and Hopkins. In the twentieth century Herbert rejoined the poetic mainstream when T.S. Eliot, in his influential 1921 essay "The Metaphysical Poets," lamented the modern "dissociation of sensibility" and praised Herbert as one of the last poets to have consummated a true fusion of feeling and intellect.



George Herbert was born in 1593, the fifth son of a prominent landowning family in the Welsh Border Country. His eldest brother, Edward, Lord Herbert of Cherbury, was a noted philosopher and diplomat. Raised by their widowed mother Magdalen, an intelligent and strong-willed woman, the Herbert children benefited from a sound education and a lively environment that included a close family friendship with John Donne. George Herbert attended Westminster School in London and later Trinity College at Cambridge, where he stayed on as a tutor and lecturer. His appointment as Public Orator there in 1620 made him spokesman for the University. Able, urbane, and ambitious, Herbert aspired to political prominence, and was named as Member of Parliament in 1624. Soon after, however, with the ascension of a new monarch and the fall from favor of influential friends such as Francis Bacon, Herbert's political fortunes dimmed and his health began to fail. A devoted Anglican all his life, he began to turn more seriously toward the Church, and was ordained deacon in 1624. When his mother died in 1627, John Donne delivered her funeral oration, and Herbert commemorated her with a collection of Latin and Greek verse, Memoriae Matris Sacrum.

For the next few years Herbert seems to have lived quietly with friends, nursing his health, pursuing his religious vocation, and writing much of the devotional poetry in English for which he was to become famous. He married in 1629, was ordained a priest in 1630, and devoted his remaining years to his small country parish at Bemerton, near Salisbury. Herbert died in 1633, releasing for publication on his deathbed The Temple: Sacred Poems and Private Ejaculations,[1] a meticulously crafted compilation of devotional and meditative verse that was to achieve immediate popularity, running through at least eleven editions in the seventeenth century alone.

Herbert had been writing poetry as early as 1610, when, in two sonnets sent as a gift to his mother, he declared his intention to consecrate his poetic gifts to the glory of God rather than to erotic or romantic love. With the exception of some occasional pieces and a collection of polemical Latin epigrams written during his tenure as Public Orator, he remained true to his word.

As a collection, The Temple is an intricately structured whole, with numerous correspondences and connections among its almost 170 poems. Herbert establishes resonant patterns that link the physical space of the church with the interior space of the human heart, and the cycle of the church year with the spiritual journey of both the individual believer and humanity as a whole. The poems themselves reflect the subtle spiritual struggles of the everyday inner life. Herbert shows the influence of John Donne in his affinity for plain diction and the rhythms of colloquial speech, but he consciously avoids the elaborate conceits, scholarly allusions, and self-dramatizing spiritual anguish found in Donne's devotional verse. Simplicity, or the artfulness of seeming artless, is one of the central themes of Herbert's poetry, and generations of readers and poets have admired Herbert's exquisite craftsmanship, emotional directness, modest wit, elegance and concision of language, and ability to create connections among poetic form, language, and meaning.

The Altar

A broken ALTAR, Lord thy servant rears,
Made of a heart, and cemented with tears:[1]
Whose parts are as thy hand did frame;
No workman's tool hath touched the same.[2]
A HEART alone
Is such a stone,
As nothing but
Thy pow'r doth cut.
Wherefore° each part accordingly
Of my hard heart
Meets in this frame,
To praise thy name.
That, if I chance to hold my peace,
These stones to praise thee may not cease.[3]
O let thy blessed SACRIFICE be mine,
And sanctify this ALTAR to be thine.

Redemption

Having been tenant long to a rich Lord,
Not thriving, I resolved to be bold,
And make a suit unto him, to afford° grant
A new small-rented lease, and cancel th' old.
In heaven at his manor I him sought:
They told me there, that he was lately gone
About some land, which he had dearly bought
Long since on earth, to take possession.
I straight returned, and knowing his great birth,
Sought him accordingly in great resorts;
In cities, theatres, gardens, parks, and courts:
At length I heard a ragged noise and mirth
Of thieves and murderers: there I him espied,
Who straight, Your suit is granted, said, and died.

Easter Wings[1]

Lord, who createdst man in wealth and store,
Though foolishly he lost the same,
Decaying more and more,
Till he became
Most poor:
With thee
O let me rise
As larks, harmoniously,
And sing this day thy victories:
Then shall the fall further the flight in me.

My tender age in sorrow did begin:
And still with sicknesses and shame
Thou didst so punish sin,
That I became
Most thin.
With thee
Let me combine,
And feel this day thy victory:
For, if I imp[2] my wing on thine,
Affliction shall advance the flight in me.

The poem "Easter Wings" as it appeared in the 1633 edition of The Temple.

---

[1] Easter Wings In its original printing (see above), this poem appears printed vertically on facing pages with one verse on each page. If one reads the verses in page order, they appear as they do in this anthology; if one turns the book so that the text is oriented upright, however, the verses appear in the opposite order.

[2] imp Graft feathers from one falcon onto the wing of another, a technique used in falconry to mend damaged wings and improve flight.

Affliction (1)

When first thou didst entice to thee my heart,
I thought the service brave:° splendid
So many joys I writ down for my part,
Besides what I might have
Out of my stock of natural delights,
Augmented with thy gracious benefits.

I looked on thy furniture so fine,
And made it fine to me:
Thy glorious household-stuff did me entwine,
And 'tice° me unto thee. entice
Such stars I counted mine: both heav'n and earth
Paid me my wages in a world of mirth.

What pleasures could I want, whose King I served?
Where joys my fellows were.
Thus argued into hopes, my thoughts reserved
No place for grief or fear.
Therefore my sudden[1] soul caught at[2] the place,
And made her youth and fierceness seek thy face,

At first thou gav'st me milk and sweetnesses;
I had my wish and way:
My days were strawed[3] with flow'rs and happiness;
There was no month but May.
But with my years sorrow did twist and grow,
And made a party° unawares° for woe. faction / unwittingly

My flesh began unto my soul in pain,
Sicknesses cleave my bones;
Consuming agues° dwell in ev'ry vein, fevers
And tune my breath to groans.
Sorrow was all my soul; I scarce believed,
Till grief did tell me roundly, that I lived.

When I got health, thou took'st away my life,
And more; for my friends die:
My mirth and edge was lost; a blunted knife
Was of more use than I.
Thus thin and lean without a fence or friend,
I was blown through with ev'ry storm and wind.

Whereas my birth and spirit rather took
The way that takes the town;
Thou didst betray me to a ling'ring book,
And wrap me in a gown.[4]
I was entangled in the world of strife,
Before I had the power to change my life.

Yet, for I threat'ned oft the siege to raise,
Not simp'ring all mine age,
Thou often didst with academic praise
Melt and dissolve my rage.
I took thy sweet'ned pill, till I came where
I could not go away, nor persevere.

Yet lest perchance I should too happy be
In my unhappiness,
Turning my purge to food, thou throwest me
Into more sicknesses.
Thus doth thy power cross-bias[5] me, not making
Thine own gift good, yet me from my ways taking.

Now I am here, what thou wilt do with me
None of my books will show:
I read, and sigh, and wish I were a tree;
For sure then I should grow
To fruit or shade: at least some bird would trust
Her household to me, and I should be just.

Yet, though thou troublest me, I must be meek;
In weakness must be stout.
Well, I will change the service,[6] and go seek
Some other master out.
Ah my dear God! though I am clean forgot,
Let me not love thee, if I love thee not.
—1633

---

[1] sudden Rash, impetuous.

[2] caught at Eagerly sought.

[3] strawed Strewn.

[4] book ... gown Symbolic book and gown of Herbert's academic life at Cambridge.

[5] cross-bias Deflect from straight or intended course (a metaphor from the game of bowls as well as a play on Christ's cross).

[6] service As in domestic service; see also line 2 above.

Prayer (1)

Prayer the Church's banquet, Angels' age,
God's breath in man returning to his birth,
The soul in paraphrase, heart in pilgrimage,
The Christian plummet sounding heav'n and earth;
Engine[1] against th' Almighty, sinners' tower,[2]
Reversed thunder, Christ-side-piercing spear,[3]
The six-days world transposing in an hour,
A kind of tune, which all things hear and fear;
Softness, and peace, and joy, and love, and bliss,
Exalted Manna,[4] gladness of the best,
Heaven in ordinary,[5] man well dressed,
The milky way, the bird of Paradise,[6]
Church-bells beyond the stars heard, the soul's blood,
The land of spices; something understood.
—1633

The Temper[7] (1)

How should I praise thee, Lord! How should my rhymes
Gladly engrave thy love in steel,
If what my soul doth feel sometimes,
My soul might ever feel!

Although there were some forty[8] heav'ns, or more,
Sometimes I peer above them all;
Sometimes I hardly reach a score,
Sometimes to hell I fall.

O rack me not to such a vast extent;
Those distances belong to thee:
The world's too little for thy tent,
A grave too big for me.

Wilt thou meet arms with man, that thou dost stretch
A crumb of dust from heav'n to hell?
Will great God measure with[9] a wretch?
Shall he thy stature spell?[10]

O let me, when thy roof my soul hath hid,
O let me roost and nestle there:
Then of a sinner thou art rid,
And I of hope and fear.

Yet take thy way; for sure thy way is best:
Stretch or contract me thy poor debtor:
This is but tuning of my breast,
To make the music better.

Whether I fly with angels, fall with dust,
Thy hands made both, and I am there:
Thy power and love, my love and trust,
Make one place ev'rywhere.
—1633

Jordan[11] (1)

Who says that fictions only and false hair
Become° a verse? Is there in truth no beauty? befit
Is all good structure in a winding stair?

---

[1] Engine Instrument of war, such as a catapult or battering-ram; also, a device, a stratagem.

[2] sinners' tower Alluding to the tower of Babel, in Genesis 11.1–9, and also, perhaps, to the siege tower as an engine of war.

[3] Christ ... spear From John 19.34.

[4] Manna Food supplied by God to the Israelites in Exodus 16.15.

[5] ordinary Everyday clothing.

[6] bird of Paradise Tropical bird mistakenly believed to reside constantly in the air.

[7] Temper The title has multiple resonances: temperament, temper as due proportion, tempering as toughening (as in metallurgy), and tempering as tuning (as in making a musical instrument "well-tempered").

[8] forty "A hundred" in an early manuscript: not a specific but a generically large number. The idea of multiple heavens appears in the Bible (see e.g., 2 Corinthians 12.2).

[9] measure with Be compared with.

[10] spell Both to spell out or express, and to scan or contemplate intently.

[11] Jordan The river associated with entry into the Promised Land and Christ's baptism, here meant also to suggest the purity and simplicity of Christian poetry as opposed to the artificiality of secular verse.

May no lines pass, except they do their duty
Not to a true, but painted chair?[1]

Is it no verse, except enchanted groves
And sudden arbours shadow coarse-spun[2] lines?
Must purling[3] streams refresh a lover's loves?
Must all be veiled, while he that reads, divines,° interprets
Catching the sense at two removes?

Shepherds are honest people; let them sing:
Riddle who list, for me, and pull for Prime:[4]
I envy no man's nightingale or spring;
Nor let them punish me with loss of rhyme,
Who plainly say, My God, My King.[5]

Church-Monuments

While that my soul repairs to her devotion,
Here I intomb my flesh, that it betimes° soon
May take acquaintance of this heap of dust;
To which the blast of death's incessant motion,
Fed with the exhalation of our crimes,
Drives all at last. Therefore I gladly trust

My body to this school, that it may learn
To spell his elements,[6] and find his birth
Written in dusty heraldry and lines:
Which dissolution sure doth best discern,[7]
Comparing dust with dust, and earth with earth.
These laugh at jet°and marble put for signs, black stone

To sever the good fellowship of dust,
And spoil the meeting. What shall point out them,
When they shall bow, and kneel, and fall down flat
To kiss those heaps, which now they have in trust?
Dear flesh, while I do pray, learn here thy stem[8]
And true descent; that when thou shalt grow fat,

And wanton in thy cravings, thou mayst know,
That flesh is but the glass,[9] which holds the dust
That measures all our time; which also shall
Be crumbled into dust. Mark here below
How tame these ashes are, how free from lust,
That thou mayst fit thyself against thy fall.[10]
—1633

The Windows

Lord, how can man preach thy eternal word?
He is a brittle crazy° glass: cracked
Yet in thy temple thou dost him afford
This glorious and transcendent place,
To be a window, through thy grace.

But when thou dost anneal[11] in glass thy story,
Making thy life to shine within
The holy Preacher's; then the light and glory
More rev'rend grows, and more doth win:
Which else shows wat'rish, bleak, and thin.

Doctrine and life, colours and light, in one
When they combine and mingle, bring
A strong regard and awe: but speech alone
Doth vanish like a flaring thing,
And in the ear, not conscience ring.
—1633

---

[1] painted chair The meaning here is uncertain. This may be a reference to the ideas of Plato regarding the reality of ideal forms. Some have suggested a reference to the English Royal Throne is intended.

[2] sudden Unexpected; shadow Camouflage; coarse-spun Shoddy.

[3] purling Rippling; babbling.

[4] Riddle who list Let those who enjoy riddling do so; pull for Prime Draw for a winning hand at Primero, a fashionable card game.

[5] My God, My King See Psalms 68.24.

[6] elements Letters of the alphabet.

[7] Which … discern The body best comprehends its own decay.

[8] stem Line of ancestry.

[9] flesh is … glass A play on "All flesh is grass," Isaiah 40.6, with "glass" here meaning "hourglass."

[10] against thy fall Against the individual body's fall into death, but also the original Fall of humankind into sin and death. See Genesis 3.19: "… for dust thou art, and unto dust thou shalt return."

[11] anneal Apply heat to stained glass to fix the colors painted on it.

Denial

When my devotions could not pierce
Thy silent ears;
Then was my heart broken, as was my verse:
My breast was full of fears
And disorder:

My bent thoughts, like a brittle bow,
Did fly asunder:
Each took his way; some would to pleasures go,
Some to the wars and thunder
Of alarms.

As good go anywhere, they say,
As to benumb
Both knees and heart, in crying night and day,
Come, come my God, O come,
But no hearing.

O that thou shouldst give dust a tongue
To cry to thee,
And then not hear it crying! all day long
My heart was in my knee,
But no hearing.

Therefore my soul lay out of sight,
Untuned, unstrung:
My feeble spirit, unable to look right,
Like a nipped blossom, hung Discontented.

O cheer and tune my heartless breast,
Defer no time;[1]
That so thy favours granting my request,
They and my mind may chime,
And mend my rhyme.
—1633

Defer no time Wait no longer.

Vanity (1)

The fleet Astronomer can bore,
And thread the spheres with his quick-piercing mind:
He views their stations,[2] walks from door to door,
Surveys, as if he had designed
To make a purchase there: he sees their dances,
And knoweth long before,
Both their full-eyed aspects,[3] and secret glances.

The nimble Diver with his side
Cuts through the working waves, that he may fetch
His dearly-earned pearl, which God did hide
On purpose from the venturous wretch;
That he might save his life, and also hers,
Who with excessive pride
Her own destruction[4] and his danger wears.

The subtle Chymic[5] can devest° unclothe
And strip the creature naked, till he find
The callow° principles within their nest: featherless
There he imparts to them his mind,
Admitted to their bed-chamber, before
They appear trim and dressed
To ordinary suitors at the door.

What hath not man sought out and found,
But his dear God? who yet his glorious law
Embosoms in us, mellowing the ground
With showers and frosts, with love & awe,
So that we need not say, Where's this command?
Poor man, thou searchest round
To find out death, but missest life at hand.
—1633

[2] stations In astronomy, points at the limits of a star's movement, when it appears to stand still; the imagery proceeds to compare the astronomer to a customer surveying the inhabitants of a brothel.

[3] aspects In astronomy, the relative positions of stars and planets when seen from earth, but punning on aspect as face or countenance.

[4] Her own destruction Through the pride that led her to desire the pearl for which the diver risked his life.

[5] Chymic Scientist (chemist or alchemist).

Virtue

Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright,
The bridal° of the earth and sky: wedding
The dew shall weep thy fall tonight;
For thou must die.

Sweet rose, whose hue angry and brave° beautiful; splendid
Bids the rash gazer wipe his eye:
Thy root is ever in its grave,
And thou must die.

Sweet spring, full of sweet days and roses,
A box where sweets compacted lie;
My music shows ye have your closes,[1]
And all must die.

Only a sweet and virtuous soul,
Like seasoned timber, never gives;° gives way
But though the whole world turn to coal,[2]
Then chiefly lives.

The Pearl. Matth. 13[3]

I know the ways of learning; both the head
And pipes that feed the press,[4] and make it run;
What reason hath from nature borrowed,
Or of it self, like a good housewife, spun
In laws and policy; what the stars conspire,
What willing nature speaks, what forced by fire;[5]
Both th'old discoveries, and the new-found seas,
The stock and surplus, cause and history:
All these stand open, or I have the keys:
Yet I love thee.

I know the ways of honour, what maintains
The quick returns[6] of courtesy and wit:
In vies of favours whether party gains,
When glory swells the heart, and moldeth it
To all expressions both of hand and eye,
Which on the world a true-love-knot[7] may tie,
And bear the bundle,[8] whereso'er it goes:
How many drams of spirit there must be
To sell my life unto my friends or foes:
Yet I love thee.

I know the ways of pleasure, the sweet strains,
The lullings and the relishes[9] of it;
The propositions of hot blood and brains;
What mirth and music mean; what love and wit
Have done these twenty hundred years, and more:
I know the projects of unbridled store:
My stuff is flesh, not brass; my senses live,
And grumble oft, that they have more in me
Than he that curbs them,[10] being but one to five:
Yet I love thee.

I know all these, and have them in my hand.
Therefore not sealed,[11] but with open eyes
I fly to thee, and fully understand
Both the main sale, and the commodities;
And at what rate and price I have thy love
With all the circumstances that may move:

---

[1] closes Conclusions of phrases or themes in music.

[2] turn to coal Be destroyed by fire, as predicted in the Bible.

[3] Matth. 13 Matthew 13.45–46, the parable of the kingdom of Heaven in which a merchant sells all he owns to purchase the "pearl of great price."

[4] the head … the press Referring to the printing press, a mechanism that feeds learning, but with a secondary biblical echo of Zechariah 4.12–14, where the olive press is an emblem of divine inspiration.

[5] what forced by fire In scientific (alchemical) experiments.

[6] quick returns Witty replies of courtly conversation, with an echo of financial returns or profits.

[7] true-love-knot Ornamental knot used as a symbol of true love, here implying courtship of worldly success.

[8] bear the bundle Referring to burdened servants following their masters.

[9] strains … relishes Pleasure is described in musical terms, respectively melodies, lulling effects of a lullaby, and melodic embellishments.

[10] he that curbs them Reason, outnumbered by the five senses.

[11] sealed "Seeled" in an early manuscript version: to seel was a term in falconry for sewing up the eyelids of a hawk or other bird; "sealed" also suggests a letter or document sealed closed with wax.

Yet through these labyrinths, not my groveling wit,
But thy silk twist[1] let down from heav'n to me,
Did both conduct and teach me, how by it
To climb to thee.
—1633

Man

My God, I heard this day,
That none doth build a stately habitation,
But he that means to dwell therein.
What house more stately hath there been,
Or can be, than is Man? to° whose creation next to
All things are in decay.

For Man is ev'ry thing,
And more: He is a tree, yet bears no fruit;
A beast, yet is, or should be more:
Reason and speech we only bring.
Parrots may thank us, if they are not mute,
They go upon the score.[2]

Man is all symmetry,
Full of proportions, one limb to another,
And all to all the world besides:
Each part may call the farthest, brother:
For head with foot hath private amity,
And both with moons and tides.

Nothing hath got so far,
But Man hath caught and kept it, as his prey.
His eyes dismount° the highest star: bring down
He is in little° all the sphere.° miniature / world
Herbs gladly cure our flesh; because that they Find their acquaintance there.

For us the winds do blow,
The earth doth rest, heav'n move, and fountains flow.
Nothing we see, but means our good,
As our delight, or as our treasure:
The whole is, either our cupboard of food,
Or cabinet of pleasure.

The stars have us to bed;
Night draws the curtain, which the sun withdraws;
Music and light attend our head.
All things unto our flesh are kind° akin
In their descent° and being; to our mind becoming
In their ascent° and cause. origin

Each thing is full of duty:
Waters united are our navigation;
Distinguished,[3] our habitation;
Below, our drink; above, our meat;
Both are our cleanliness. Hath one° such beauty? one thing
Then how are all things neat?° excellent

More servants wait on Man,
Than he'll take notice of: in ev'ry path
He treads down that which doth befriend him,
When sickness makes him pale and wan.[4]
O mighty love! Man is one world, and hath
Another to attend him.

Since then, my God, thou hast
So brave° a Palace built; O dwell in it, splendid
That it may dwell with thee at last!
Till then, afford us so much wit;
That, as the world serves us, we may serve thee,
And both thy servants be.
—1633

Jordan (2)

When first my lines of heav'nly joys made mention,
Such was their lustre, they did so excel,
That I sought out quaint words, and trim invention;

---

[1] labyrinths … silk twist Evokes the classical story of Theseus: after killing the minotaur, Theseus escapes the labyrinth by following the thread given him by Ariadne. The silk twist "let down from heav'n" also evokes Jacob's ladder (Genesis 28.12), the golden chain let down by Zeus in Homer's Iliad to join heaven and earth, and other biblical references to cords interpreted as references to Christian dependence on divine action.

[2] They … score They are in our debt.

[3] Distinguished Separated.

[4] He treads … wan Referring to the herbs mentioned above that "gladly cure our flesh."

My thoughts began to burnish, sprout, and swell,
Curling with metaphors a plain intention,
Decking° the sense, as if it were to sell. adorning

Thousands of notions in my brain did run,
Off'ring their service, if I were not sped:° successful
I often blotted what I had begun;
This was not quick° enough, and that was dead. lively
Nothing could seem too rich to clothe the sun,
Much less those joys which trample on his head.

As flames do work and wind, when they ascend,
So did I weave my self into the sense.
But while I bustled, I might hear a friend
Whisper, How wide is all this long pretence!
There is in love a sweetness ready penned;
Copy out only that, and save expense.
—1633

Time

Meeting with Time, slack° thing, said I, remiss
Thy scythe is dull; whet it for shame.
No marvel Sir, he did reply,
If it at length deserve some blame:
But where one man would have me grind it,
Twenty for one[1] too sharp do find it.

Perhaps some such of old did pass,
Who above all things loved this life;
To whom thy scythe a hatchet was,
Which now is but a pruning-knife.
Christ's coming hath made man thy debtor,
Since by thy cutting he grows better.

And in his blessing thou art blessed;
For where thou only wert° before were
An executioner at best;
Thou art a gard'ner now, and more,
An usher to convey our souls
Beyond the utmost stars and poles.

And this is that makes life so long,
While it detains us from our God.
Ev'n pleasures here increase the wrong,
And length of days lengthen the rod.° punishment
Who wants° the place, where God doth dwell, lacks
Partakes already half of hell.

Of what strange length must that needs be,
Which ev'n eternity excludes!
Thus far Time heard me patiently:
Then chafing said, This man deludes:
What do I here before his door?
He doth not crave less time, but more.
—1633

The Bunch of Grapes[2]

Joy, I did lock thee up: but some bad man
Hath let thee out again:
And now, methinks, I am where I began
Sev'n years ago: one vogue and vein,
One air of thoughts usurps my brain.
I did toward Canaan draw; but now I am
Brought back to the Red Sea, the sea of shame.[3]

For as the Jews of old by God's command
Travelled, and saw no town:
So now each Christian hath his journeys spanned:[4]
Their story pens and sets us down.
A single deed is small renown.
God's works are wide, and let in future times;
His ancient justice overflows our crimes.

Then have we too our guardian fires and clouds;[5]
Our Scripture-dew drops fast:

---

[1] Twenty for one Twenty men for every one.

[2] Bunch of Grapes Cluster of grapes brought by scouts to Moses from the Promised Land of Canaan as evidence of its fertility: see Numbers 13.23.

[3] I did ... shame On the brink of attaining the Promised Land, the Israelites were condemned by the Lord for their faithlessness to wander the desert for 40 years (thus returning in the direction of the Red Sea): see Numbers 14.22–35.

[4] spanned Limited.

[5] guardian ... clouds Cf. Exodus 13.21.

We have our sands and serpents, tents and shrouds;[1]
Alas! our murmurings come not last.
But where's the cluster? where's the taste
Of mine inheritance? Lord, if I must borrow,
Let me as well take up their joy, as sorrow.

But can he want the grape, who hath the wine?
I have their fruit and more.
Blessèd be God, who prospered Noah's vine,[2]
And make it bring forth grapes good store.
But much more him I must adore,
Who of the law's sour juice sweet wine did make,
Ev'n God himself, being pressed for my sake.
—1633

The Collar

I struck the board,° and cried, No more. table
I will abroad.° go abroad; depart
What? shall I ever° sigh and pine? always
My lines and life are free; free as the road,
Loose as the wind, as large as store.° abundance
Shall I be still in suit?[3]
Have I no harvest but a thorn
To let me blood,° and not restore bleed
What I have lost with cordial fruit?
Sure there was wine
Before my sighs did dry it: there was corn
Before my tears did drown it.
Is the year only lost to me?
Have I no bays° to crown it? laurel wreaths
No flowers, no garlands gay? All blasted?
All wasted?
Not so, my heart: but there is fruit,
And thou hast hands.[4]
Recover all thy sigh-blown age
On double pleasures: leave thy cold dispute
Of what is fit, and not. Forsake thy cage,
Thy rope of sands,[5]
Which petty thoughts have made, and made to thee
Good cable, to enforce and draw,
And be thy law,
While thou didst wink[6] and wouldst not see.
Away; take heed:
I will abroad.
Call in thy death's head° there: tie up thy fears. skull
He that forbears° neglects
To suit and serve his need,
Deserves his load.
But as I raved and grew more fierce and wild
At every word,
Me thoughts I heard one calling, Child:
And I replied, My Lord.
—1633

The Pulley

When God at first made man,
Having a glass of blessings standing by,
Let us (said he) pour on him all we can:
Let the world's riches, which dispersed lie,
Contract into a span.[7]

So strength first made a way;
Then beauty flowed, then wisdom, honour, pleasure:
When almost all was out, God made a stay,° paused
Perceiving that alone of all his treasure
Rest in the bottom lay.

For if I should (said he)
Bestow this jewel also on my creature,
He would adore my gifts instead of me,
And rest in Nature, not the God of Nature:
So both should losers be.

Yet let him keep the rest,
But keep them with repining° restlessness: fretful

---

[1] shrouds Shelters.

[2] Noah's vine Vineyard planted by Noah with the Lord's blessing after the Flood: see Genesis 9.20.

[3] in suit In attendance.

[4] but … hands An echo of the disobedience that led to the original Fall; see Genesis 3.22: " lest he put forth his hand, and take also of the tree of life."

[5] rope of sands Delusive security. To "twist a rope of sand" is also a proverbial expression of futility.

[6] wink Shut one's eyes.

[7] span Distance between the tip of the thumb and little finger of an extended hand.

Let him be rich and weary, that at least,
If goodness lead him not, yet weariness
May toss him to my breast.
—1633

The Flower

How fresh, O Lord, how sweet and clean
Are thy returns! ev'n as the flowers in spring;
To which, besides their own demean,[1]
The late-past frosts tributes of pleasure bring.
Grief melts away
Like snow in May,
As if there were no such cold thing.

Who would have thought my shrivelled heart
Could have recovered greenness? It was gone
Quite underground; as flowers depart
To see their mother-root, when they have blown;° bloomed
Where they together
All the hard weather,
Dead to the world, keep house unknown.

These are thy wonders, Lord of power,
Killing and quick'ning,[2] bringing down to hell
And up to heaven in an hour;
Making a chiming of a passing-bell.[3]
We say amiss,
This or that is:
Thy word is all, if we could spell.° comprehend

O that I once past changing were,
Fast in thy Paradise, where no flower can wither!
Many a spring I shoot up fair,
Off'ring at heav'n, growing and groaning thither:
Nor doth my flower
Want° a spring-shower, lack
My sins and I joining together:

But while I grow in a straight line,
Still upwards bent, as if heav'n were mine own,
Thy anger comes, and I decline:
What frost to that? what pole is not the zone,
Where all things burn,
When thou dost turn,
And the least frown of thine is shown?

And now in age I bud again,
After so many deaths I live and write;
I once more smell the dew and rain,
And relish versing: O my only light,
It cannot be
That I am he
On whom thy tempests fell all night.

These are thy wonders, Lord of love,
To make us see we are but flowers that glide:[4]
Which when we once can find and prove,[5]
Thou hast a garden for us, where to bide.
Who° would be more, those who
Swelling through store,° abundance; wealth
Forfeit their Paradise by their pride.
—1633

Discipline

Throw away thy rod,
Throw away thy wrath:
O my God,
Take the gentle path.

For my heart's desire
Unto thine is bent:
I aspire
To a full consent.

Not a word or look
I affect to own,
But by book,
And thy book alone.

---

[1] demean Demesne, or estate, where a tenant might pay tributes to the landlord.

[2] quick'ning Bringing to life.

[3] passing-bell Bell tolled to mark a death.

[4] flowers that glide Flowers that pass away silently, imperceptibly. Cf. Job 14.2: "Man cometh forth like a flower, and is cut down; he fleeteth also like a shadow, and continueth not."

[5] prove Confirm through experience.

Though I fail, I weep:
Though I halt in pace,
Yet I creep
To the throne of grace.

Then let wrath remove;° depart
Love will do the deed:
For with love
Stony hearts will bleed.

Love is swift of foot;
Love's a man of war,[1]
And can shoot,
And can hit from far.

Who can scape° his bow? escape
That which wrought° on thee, worked
Brought thee low,
Needs must work on me.

Throw away thy rod;
Though man frailties hath,
Thou art God:
Throw away thy wrath.
—1633

Death

Death, thou wast once an uncouth hideous thing,
Nothing but bones,
The sad effect of sadder groans:
Thy mouth was open, but thou couldst not sing.

For we considered thee as at some six
Or ten years hence,
After the loss of life and sense,
Flesh being turned to dust, and bones to sticks.

We looked on this side of thee, shooting short;
Where we did find
The shells of fledge[2] souls left behind,
Dry dust, which sheds no tears, but may extort.

But since our Saviour's death did put some blood
Into thy face;
Thou art grown fair and full of grace,
Much in request, much sought for, as a good.

For we do now behold thee gay and glad,
As at doomsday;
When souls shall wear their new array,° clothing
And all thy bones with beauty shall be clad.

Therefore we can go die as sleep, and trust
Half that we have
Unto an honest faithful grave;
Making our pillows either down, or dust.
—1633

Love (3)

Love bade me welcome: yet my soul drew back,
Guilty of dust and sin.
But quick-eyed Love, observing me grow slack[3]
From my first entrance in,
Drew nearer to me, sweetly questioning,
If I lacked anything.
A guest, I answered, worthy to be here:
Love said, You shall be he.
I the unkind, ungrateful? Ah my dear,
I cannot look on thee.
Love took my hand, and smiling did reply,
Who made the eyes but I?
Truth Lord, but I have marred them: let my shame
Go where it doth deserve.
And know you not, says Love, who bore the blame?
My dear, then I will serve.
You must sit down, says Love, and taste my meat:[4] So
I did sit and eat.
—1633

---

[1] Love's … war Cf. Exodus 15.3: "The Lord is a man of war." Also, an armed naval vessel.

[2] fledge Ready to fly.

[3] grow slack Become hesitant or uncertain.

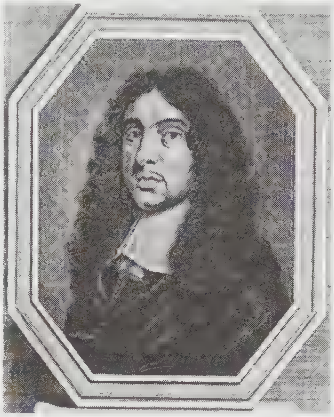
[4] My dear … my meat. Cf. Luke 12.37: "Blessed are those servants, whom the Lord when he cometh shall find watching: verily I say unto you, that he shall gird himself, and make them to sit down to meat, and will come forth and serve them."

ANDREW MARVELL

1621 – 1678

In his life as well as in his writing, Andrew Marvell is elusive. Famous long after his death as a spokesman for political and religious liberty, the intensely private Marvell kept his personal opinions largely to himself. His verse is complex, full of paradoxes and ironies, and is frequently mediated through naive or ambivalent personae who present debates or balance competing claims. His poem "An Horation Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland" oscillates between praise for (and veiled criticism of) both Oliver Cromwell, who choreographed the abolition of the monarchy in 1649, and admiration for King Charles I, who was executed in the process. (Later, he would satirize the restored monarchy of Charles II.) A poet who wrote seductive and titillating love poetry, Marvell was also a politician who lampooned the government in satires for which he was renowned in his day. Even after death, mystery surrounded his life; in order to keep creditors of his estate at bay a few years later, his housekeeper, Mary Palmer, claimed to have been the author's wife and published his Miscellaneous Poems (1681), which included a preface by "Mary Marvell" guaranteeing the poems to be the "exact copies of my late dear husband."



Marvell, the son of Anne Pease and the Reverend Andrew Marvell, was born in 1621 in Winestead, but was raised primarily in Hull. At age twelve he was admitted to the University of Cambridge, where he studied for the following seven years and where he published his first poems, written in Latin and Greek. Before he had completed his degree, his father drowned and Marvell left England to travel on the Continent, perhaps to wait out the period of the Civil War (1642–47). In a letter of 1653 proposing that Marvell be given the post of Assistant Latin Secretary to the Council of State, Milton mentioned that Marvell had been abroad for four years and that on this journey he had learned to speak Dutch, French, Italian, and Spanish. (He did not win the appointment at that time, but it was awarded to him four years later.) In 1650 Marvell wrote "An Horation Ode Upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland," one of his best known and most widely studied poems. Written in a complex style that marks much of his subsequent work, the "Ode" defies definitive interpretation but instead raises many political and ideological questions. Scholars continue to disagree over Marvell's allegiance to Cromwell, whose armies had just completed a bloody mission in Ireland.

Later in 1650 Marvell began working as a tutor to the twelve-year-old daughter of Thomas, Lord Fairfax, the retired Commander-in-Chief of the Parliamentary Army. In the poem "Upon Appleton House," Marvell celebrates the architecture and inhabitants of the Fairfax home. It is likely that during his two years on this estate he composed many of his most famous works, including much of his pastoral poetry and the poems "The Definition of Love" and "Dialogue Between the Soul and the Body." In the sensuous and witty carpe diem poem "To His Coy Mistress," also likely written in this period, Marvell's speaker tries to convince his love of the brevity of life and the need to seize the moment of passion.

In 1653, the year in which Cromwell declared himself Lord Protector of England, Marvell was appointed tutor to a ward of Cromwell, William Dutton. Along with Milton and Dryden, Marvell took part in Cromwell's 1659 funeral procession, but despite his ties to the republican regime his political career flourished upon the restoration of a Royalist Parliament. In 1659 he was elected Member of Parliament for Hull, a seat he would maintain until his death. While in office, Marvell was outspoken in his contempt for Charles II, who was restored to the monarchy in 1660; in his 1667 satire The Last Instructions to a Painter, he ridiculed the King and his government for their ineffectuality. Marvell took part in a diplomatic mission to Holland in 1662–63 and another to Russia, Sweden, and Denmark in 1665; these operations served to strengthen his criticism of corruption in the government, which he recorded in numerous pamphlets and newsletters and circulated to his constituents.

When Marvell died of complications from a fever in 1678, there was still an outstanding government reward offered for the name of the man who had written "An Account of the Growth of Popery and Arbitrary Government in England" a year earlier. More satires and poems were published posthumously as a result of Mary Palmer's efforts, but they fell into relative obscurity in the following century as readers began to perceive his metaphysical conceits as cold and discordant. The nineteenth century saw something of a revival of his poetry; Wordsworth praised his work, and Tennyson recognized him as "the green poet" for his sensuous pastoral poems. In the twentieth century Marvell's reputation was firmly re-established by T.S. Eliot, who championed him as one of the finest of the "metaphysical" poets.

The Coronet

When for the thorns with which I long, too long,
With many a piercing wound,
My Saviour's head have crowned,
I seek with garlands to redress that wrong:
Through every garden, every mead,° meadow
I gather flowers (my fruits are only flowers),[1]
Dismantling all the fragrant towers[2]
That once adorned my shepherdess's head.
And now, when I have summed up all my store,
Thinking (so I myself deceive)
So rich a chaplet thence to weave
As never yet the King of Glory wore:
Alas! I find the serpent old
That, twining in his speckled breast,
About the flowers disguised does fold,
With wreaths of fame and interest.
Ah, foolish man, that wouldst debase with them,
And mortal glory, Heaven's diadem!
But thou[3] who only couldst the serpent tame,
Either his slippery knots at once untie,
And disentangle all his winding snare:
Or shatter too with him my curious frame,[4]
And let these wither, so that he may die,
Though set with skill, and chosen out with care:
That they, while thou on both their spoils dost tread,
May crown thy feet, that could not crown thy head.
—1681 (probably written in the 1640s)

[1] fruits … flowers With verbal play on "fruits" as accomplishments, the "fruits" of his efforts (spiritual and literary); and on "flowers" as poems or poetic tropes (anthologies in the period could gather "flowers of poetry" or "flowers of rhetoric").

[2] fragrant towers Floral garlands; but also the secular love poems the poet had made for his beloved.

[3] thou Christ.

[4] curious frame Clever or ingenious structure: the floral garland or chaplet within the fiction of the poem, and the "Coronet" that is the poem itself.

Bermudas

Where the remote Bermudas ride,
In the ocean's bosom unespied,
From a small boat, that rowed along,
The listening winds received this song:
"What should we do but sing his praise
That led us through the watery maze,
Unto an isle so long unknown,[1]
And yet far kinder than our own?
Where He the huge sea-monsters wracks,[2]
That lift the deep upon their backs,
He lands us on a grassy stage,
Safe from the storms, and prelate's rage.[3]
He gave us this eternal spring,
Which here enamels every thing,
And sends the fowls to us in care,
On daily visits through the air.
He hangs in shades the orange bright,
Like golden lamps in a green night,
And does in the pom'granates close° enclose
Jewels more rich than Ormus[4] shows.
He makes the figs our mouths to meet,
And throws the melons at our feet;
But apples plants of such a price,
No tree could ever bear them twice;
With cedars chosen by His hand,
From Lebanon, He stores the land,
And makes the hollow seas that roar,
Proclaim the ambergris[5] on shore;
He cast (of which we rather boast)
The Gospel's pearl upon our coast,
And in these rocks for us did frame
A temple where to sound His name.
Oh let our voice His praise exalt,
Till it arrive at heaven's vault,
Which, thence (perhaps) rebounding, may Echo beyond the Mexique Bay."
Thus sung they, in the English boat,
An holy and a cheerful note;
And all the way, to guide their chime,
With falling oars they kept the time.

A Dialogue between the Soul and Body

SOUL

O, who shall from this dungeon raise
A soul, enslaved so many ways?
With bolts of bones, that fettered stands
In feet, and manacled in hands.
Here blinded with an eye; and there
Deaf with the drumming of an ear.
A soul hung up, as 'twere, in chains
Of nerves, and arteries, and veins,
Tortured, besides each other part,
In a vain head, and double heart.

BODY

O, who shall me deliver whole,
From bonds of this tyrannic soul?
Which, stretched upright, impales me so,

---

[1] Unto an isle … unknown Although the Spanish had landed on (and named) Bermuda in 1515, English seafarers first reached the island in 1609, when an expedition on its way to Jamestown landed there during a storm; Shakespeare is thought to have drawn on accounts of their "miraculous" survival for The Tempest. An English colony was founded on the island soon after, and early accounts, such as Lewis Hughes's A letter, sent to England from the Summer Islands (1615) and John Smith's General History of Virginia, the Summer Isles, and New England (1624), stressed Bermuda's paradisal qualities. Bermuda was sometimes called Somers' or Summer Island, after Sir George Somers, the admiral of the first English expedition that landed there.

[2] wracks Casts ashore; Marvell is probably referring to a mock-heroic poem by Edmund Waller, "The Battle of the Summer Islands" (1645), which describes attempts by the colonists to kill two stranded whales.

[3] prelate's rage This phrase situates the poem in the 1630s, when religious Independents (Congregationalists) left England as a result of attempts by William Laud, Archbishop of Canterbury, to impose uniformity in Church practice. In the early 1650s, Marvell lived in the house of John Oxenbridge, a religious Independent who had twice been to Bermuda, and who in 1655 would become Governor of the Somers Islands Company. This poem was written at least in part as a compliment to Oxenbridge.

[4] Ormus Hormuz, near the entrance to the Persian Gulf, an international market proverbial for the riches on display.

[5] ambergris Wax-like substance secreted by sperm whales, valuable for its use in perfume.

That mine own precipice[1] I go;
And warms and moves this needless frame
(A fever could but do the same),
And, wanting where its spite to try,
Has made me live to let me die,
A body that could never rest,
Since this ill spirit it possessed.

SOUL

What magic could me thus confine
Within another's grief to pine?
Where, whatsoever it complain,
I feel, that cannot feel, the pain.
And all my care itself employs,
That to preserve, which me destroys:
Constrained not only to endure
Diseases, but, what's worse, the cure:
And ready oft the port to gain,[2]
Am shipwrecked into health again.

BODY

But physic yet could never teach
The maladies thou me dost reach:
Whom first the cramp of hope does tear,
And then the palsy shakes of fear;
The pestilence of love does heat,
Or hatred's hidden ulcer eat;
Joy's cheerful madness does perplex,
Or sorrow's other madness vex;
Which knowledge forces me to know,
And memory will not forgo.
What but a soul could have the wit
To build me up for sin so fit?
So architects do square and hew,
Green trees that in the forest grew.[3]
—1681 (PROBABLY WRITTEN AFTER 1652)

The Nymph Complaining for the Death of Her Fawn

The wanton troopers[4] riding by
Have shot my fawn, and it will die.
Ungentle men! They cannot thrive
To kill thee. Thou ne'er didst alive
Them any harm; alas, nor could
Thy death yet do them any good.
I'm sure I never wished them ill;
Nor do I for all this, nor will:
But if my simple prayers may yet
Prevail with heaven to forget
Thy murder, I will join my tears
Rather than fail. But, O my fears!
It cannot die so. Heaven's King
Keeps register of every thing:
And nothing may we use in vain.
Even beasts must be with justice slain,
Else men are made their deodands.[5]
Though they should wash their guilty hands
In this warm life-blood which doth part
From thine, and wound me to the heart,
Yet could they not be clean: their stain
Is dyed in such a purple grain.
There is not such another in
The world, to offer for their sin.
　Unconstant Sylvio, when yet
I had not found him counterfeit,
One morning (I remember well),
Tied in this silver chain and bell
Gave it to me: nay, and I know
What he said then, I'm sure I do.
Said he, "Look how your huntsman here
Hath taught a fawn to hunt his dear."[6]
But Sylvio soon had me beguiled.

---

[1] mine own precipice The body complains that, being upright, it is a moving precipice.

[2] the port to gain That is, the death of the body, which "lands" the soul in eternal life.

[3] What but ... forest grew These last four lines are crossed out by hand in an important copy of Marvell's 1681 Poems that contains several additional poems in manuscript; the annotator has also added the words "desunt multa" ("much is missing").

[4] troopers Cavalry soldiers; the word was first used of soldiers in the Scottish ("Covenanting") army that invaded England in 1640, and during the civil wars was associated with Parliamentary soldiers.

[5] deodands Literally, "things given to God": possessions (including animals) that caused a person's death and were therefore forfeited to the king to be used for pious purposes, for example, to be given to the poor and hungry; the nymph suggests that people who unjustly cause an animal's death should be treated likewise.

[6] dear Sylvio makes the obvious pun on "deer."

This waxèd tame, while he grew wild,
And quite regardless of my smart,
Left me his fawn, but took his heart.
Thenceforth I set myself to play
My solitary time away
With this: and very well content,
Could so mine idle life have spent.
For it was full of sport, and light
Of foot and heart, and did invite
Me to its game; it seemed to bless
Itself in me. How could I less Than love it? O, I cannot be
Unkind to a beast that loveth me.
Had it lived long, I do not know
Whether it too might have done so
As Sylvio did; his gifts might be Perhaps as false, or more, than he.
But I am sure, for aught that I
Could in so short a time espy,
Thy love was far more better then° than
The love of false and cruel men.
With sweetest milk and sugar first
I it at mine own fingers nursed.
And as it grew, so every day
It waxed more white and sweet than they.
It had so sweet a breath! And oft
I blushed to see its foot more soft
And white (shall I say than my hand?
Nay, any lady's of the land).
It is a wondrous thing, how fleet
'Twas on those little silver feet.
With what a pretty skipping grace,
It oft would challenge me the race:
And, when 't had left me far away,
'Twould stay, and run again, and stay.
For it was nimbler much than hinds;
And trod, as on the foúr[1] winds.
I have a garden of my own,
But so with roses overgrown,
And lilies, that you would it guess
To be a little wilderness.
And all the springtime of the year
It only lovèd to be there.
Among the beds of lilies, I
Have sought it oft, where it should lie;
Yet could not, till itself would rise,
Find it, although before mine eyes.
For, in the flaxen lilies' shade,
It like a bank of lilies laid.
Upon the roses it would feed,
Until its lips e'en seem to bleed:
And then to me 'twould boldly trip,
And print those roses on my lip.
But all its chief delight was still
On roses thus itself to fill:
And its pure virgin limbs to fold
In whitest sheets of lilies cold.
Had it lived long, it would have been
Lilies without, roses within.
O help! O help! I see it faint:
And die as calmly as a saint.
See how it weeps. The tears do come
Sad, slowly, dropping like a gum.
So weeps the wounded balsam: so
The holy frankincense doth flow.
The brotherless Heliades[2]
Melt in such amber tears as these.
I in a golden vial will
Keep these two crystal tears; and fill
It till it do o'erflow with mine;
Then place it in Diana's[3] shrine.
Now my sweet fawn is vanished to Whither the swans and turtles° go: turtledoves
In fair Elysium to endure,
With milk-white lambs, and ermines pure.
O do not run too fast: for I
Will but bespeak thy grave, and die.
First, my unhappy statue shall
Be cut in marble; and withal,
Let it be weeping too: but there
The engraver sure his art may spare,
For I so truly thee bemoan,

---

[1] foúr Pronounced as two syllables.

[2] Heliades Daughters of Helios, the sun; while weeping over the death of their brother Phaethon they were transformed into poplar trees that wept amber tears (a story from Ovid's Metamorphoses).

[3] Diana Roman goddess of chastity, the moon, and hunting; according to a story in Ovid's Metamorphoses, her pet stag was killed during a hunt.

That I shall weep, though I be stone:[1]
Until my tears, still dropping, wear
My breast, themselves engraving there.
There at my feet shalt thou be laid,
Of purest alabaster made:
For I would have thine image be White as I can, though not as thee.
—c. 1681

To His Coy Mistress

Had we but world enough, and time,
This coyness Lady were no crime.
We would sit down, and think which way
To walk, and pass our long love's day.
Thou by the Indian Ganges' side
Shouldst rubies find: I by the tide
Of Humber[2] would complain. I would Love you ten years before the Flood:
And you should, if you please, refuse
Till the conversion of the Jews.[3]
My vegetable love[4] should grow
Vaster than empires, and more slow.
An hundred years should go to praise
Thine eyes, and on thy forehead gaze.
Two hundred to adore each breast:
But thirty thousand to the rest.
An age at least to every part,
And the last age should show your heart:
For Lady you deserve this state;
Nor would I love at lower rate.
But at my back I always hear
Time's wingèd chariot hurrying near:
And yonder all before us lie
Deserts of vast eternity.
Thy beauty shall no more be found;
Nor, in thy marble vault, shall sound
My echoing song: then worms shall try[5]
That long-preserved virginity:
And your quaint honour turn to dust;
And into ashes all my lust.
The grave's a fine and private place,
But none, I think, do there embrace.
Now, therefore, while the youthful glew
Sits on thy skin like morning dew,[6]
And while thy willing soul transpires
At every pore with instant fires,
Now let us sport us while we may;
And now, like amorous birds of prey,
Rather at once our time devour,
Than languish in his slow-chapped[7] power.
Let us roll all our strength, and all
Our sweetness, up into one ball:
And tear our pleasures with rough strife,
Thorough° the iron gates[8] of life. through

---

[1] I shall weep, though I be stone Like Niobe, who continued to weep after she was turned into stone by Zeus. Niobe wept for the loss of her many children, who died as punishment for Niobe's excessive maternal pride (she had boasted that she was a more impressive mother than Latona, who only had two children, Apollo and Artemis/Diana). From Ovid's Metamorphoses.

[2] Humber River in northern England; it flowed alongside Hull, Marvell's home town.

[3] conversion of the Jews Event supposed to usher in the final Millenium leading to the end of time. Jews were officially readmitted to England in 1655 (after being expelled in 1290), primarily as a result of widespread millenarian hopes that their return would speed up the process of conversion.

[4] vegetable love His love (or its physical manifestation) would grow slowly and steadily: Aristotle had defined the vegetative part of the soul as that characterized only by growth.

[5] try Test, and taste.

[6] youthful glew / … morning dew One of the more famous textual problems in English literature. The 1681 printed edition has "youthful hew / … morning glew." The version of the 1681 text with manuscript corrections changes this reading to "youthful glew / … morning dew." Another manuscript, a transcription of the entire poem dated 1672, reads "youthful glue / … morning dew." Many modern editions conflate the first line of the 1681 edition with the second line from the two manuscript versions, producing the decorous "youthful hue/ … morning dew." But the original manuscript reading does seem to have been "glew," a word then read by one transcriber as "glue," and changed by a puzzled 1681 printer to "hew." "Glew" appears to mean sweat, which sits on the Lady's skin like dewdrops (and is evaporating from her pores in lines 35-36). The image might seem unusual, but is in keeping with the violent, passionate physicality of the poem's final section. "Glew" might be a northern dialect spelling of "glow," a word that could imply sexual ardour.

[7] slow-chapped Slowly devouring; "chaps" are jaws.

[8] gates "Grates" in the 1681 printed edition with manuscript corrections. But many editors see "gates of life" as a typically Marvellian inversion of the Biblical "gates of death" (Psalm 9.13).

Thus, though we cannot make our sun
Stand still,[1] yet we will make him run.

The Picture of Little T.C.[2] in a Prospect of Flowers

See with what simplicity
This nymph begins her golden days!
In the green grass she loves to lie,
And there with her fair aspect tames
The wilder flowers, and gives them names:[3]
But only with the roses plays;
And them does tell
What colour best becomes them, and what smell.

Who can foretell for what high cause
This Darling of the Gods was born!
Yet this is she whose chaster laws
The wanton Love shall one day fear,
And, under her command severe,
See his bow broke and ensigns torn,
Happy, who can
Appease this virtuous enemy of man!

O, then let me in time compound,[4]
And parley with those conquering eyes;
Ere they have tried their force to wound,
Ere, with their glancing wheels, they drive
In triumph over hearts that strive,
And them that yield but more despise.
Let me be laid,
Where I may see thy glories from some shade.

Meantime, whilst every verdant thing
Itself does at thy beauty charm,
Reform the errors of the spring;
Make that the tulips may have share
Of sweetness, seeing they are fair;
And roses of their thorns disarm:
But most procure
That violets may a longer age endure.

But, O young beauty of the woods,
Whom Nature courts with fruits and flowers,
Gather the flowers, but spare the buds;
Lest Flora[5] angry at thy crime,
To kill her infants in their prime,
Do quickly make the example yours;
And, ere we see,
Nip in the blossom all our hopes and thee.

The Mower against Gardens

Luxurious man, to bring his vice in use,
Did after him the world seduce,
And from the fields the flowers and plants allure,
Where nature was most plain and pure.
He first enclosed within the gardens square
A dead and standing pool of air,
And a more luscious earth for them did knead,
Which stupefied them while it fed.
The pink grew then as double as his mind;
The nutriment did change the kind.
With strange perfumes he did the roses taint,
And flowers themselves were taught to paint.
The tulip, white, did for complexion seek,

[1] sun / Stand still Referring ultimately to Joshua 10.12–14, when Joshua made the sun and moon stand still while his army slaughtered the Amorites; but also invoking a traditional trope of love poetry in which lovers ask for time to slow down or stop when in one another's company.

[2] T.C. Probably Theophila Cornewall (b. 1644), whose mother was a member of a family, the Skinners, with whom Marvell was familiar. "Darling of the Gods" (line 10) is a literal translation of "Theophila."

[3] gives them names Associating "T.C." with Eve, traditionally said to have named the flowers in Eden (Paradise Lost, 11.277).

[4] compound "Come to terms with." The word also had a political resonance in the period: Royalists "compounded" by paying a fine to avoid confiscation of their estates.

[5] Flora Roman goddess of flowers.

And learned to interline its cheek:
Its onion root they then so high did hold,
That one was for a meadow sold.[1]
Another world was searched, through oceans new,
To find the Marvel of Peru.[2]
And yet these rarities might be allowed
To man, that sovereign thing and proud,
Had he not dealt between the bark and tree,[3]
Forbidden mixtures there to see.
No plant now knew the stock from which it came;
He grafts upon the wild the tame:
That the uncertain and adulterate fruit
Might put the palate in dispute.
His green seraglio has its eunuchs too,
Lest any tyrant him outdo.
And in the cherry he does nature vex,
To procreate without a sex.[4]
'Tis all enforced, the fountain and the grot,
While the sweet fields do lie forgot:
Where willing Nature does to all dispense
A wild and fragrant innocence:
And fauns and fairies do the meadows till,
More by their presence than their skill.
Their statues, polished by some ancient hand,
May to adorn the gardens stand:
But howsoe'er the figures do excel,
The gods themselves with us[5] do dwell.

Damon the Mower

Hark how the Mower Damon sung,
With love of Juliana stung!
While everything did seem to paint
The scene more fit for his complaint.
Like her fair eyes the day was fair,
But scorching like his am'rous care.
Sharp like his scythe his sorrow was,
And withered like his hopes the grass.

"Oh what unusual heats are here,
Which thus our sunburned meadows sear!
The grasshopper its pipe gives o'er;
And hamstringed[6] frogs can dance no more.
But in the brook the green frog wades;
And grasshoppers seek out the shades.
Only the snake, that kept within,
Now glitters in its second skin.

"This heat the sun could never raise,
Nor Dog Star[7] so inflame the days.
It from an higher beauty groweth,
Which burns the fields and mower both:
Which mads the dog, and makes the sun
Hotter than his own Phaëton.[8]
Not Jùly causeth these extremes,
But Juliana's scorching beams.

"Tell me where I may pass the fires
Of the hot day, or hot desires.
To what cool cave shall I descend,

---

[1] for a meadow sold Referring to the speculative bubble of the "tulip mania" in Holland in the 1630s, during which spectacular prices were paid for some bulbs.

[2] Marvel of Peru Much prized multi-colored tropical flower of South America (and possibly with a pun on the poet's name).

[3] between the bark and tree "To deal between the bark and the tree" was a proverbial expression for interfering activity, often to interfering between husband and wife; the proverb is here made literal through its reference to grafting.

[4] And in the cherry … a sex Probably referring to attempts to create, through grafting, stoneless cherries (hence "eunuchs").

[5] with us With mowers (not with gardeners).

[6] hamstringed Lamed or disabled (figuratively) by the heat.

[7] Dog Star Sirius; associated with the "dog days" of July and August, the period when Sirius rises at the same time as the sun.

[8] Phaëton Son of the sun god, who set part of the world on fire when driving his father's chariot.

Or to what gelid° fountain bend? cold
Alas! I look for ease in vain,
When remedies themselves complain.
No moisture but my tears do rest,
Nor cold but in her icy breast.

"How long wilt thou, fair shepherdess,
Esteem me, and my presents less?
To thee the harmless snake I bring,
Disarmèd of its teeth and sting;
To thee chameleons, changing hue,
And oak leaves tipped with honey dew.
Yet thou, ungrateful, hast not sought
Nor what they are, nor who them brought.

"I am the Mower Damon, known
Through all the meadows I have mown.
On me the morn her dew distils
Before her darling daffodils.
And, if at noon my toil me heat,
The sun himself licks off my sweat.
While, going home, the evening sweet
In cowslip-water bathes my feet.

"What, though the piping shepherd stock
The plains with an unnumbered flock,
This scythe of mine discovers wide
More ground than all his sheep do hide.
With this the golden fleece[1] I shear
Of all these closes° every year. enclosed fields
And though in wool more poor than they,
Yet am I richer far in hay.

8

"Nor am I so deformed to sight,
If in my scythe I lookèd right;
In which I see my picture done,
As in a crescent moon the sun.
The deathless fairies takes me oft
To lead them in their dances soft:
And, when I tune myself to sing,
About me they contract their ring.

"How happy might I still have mowed,
Had not Love here his thistles sowed!
But now I all the day complain,
Joining my labour to my pain;
And with my scythe cut down the grass,
Yet still my grief is where it was:
But, when the iron blunter grows,
Sighing, I whet my scythe and woes."

10

While thus he threw his elbow round,
Depopulating all the ground,
And, with his whistling scythe, does cut
Each stroke between the earth and root,
The edgèd steel by careless chance
Did into his own ankle glance;
And there among the grass fell down,
By his own scythe, the mower mown.

11

"Alas!" said he, "these hurts are slight
To those that die by love's despite.
With shepherd's-purse, and clown's-all-heal,[2]
The blood I staunch, and wound I seal.
Only for him no cure is found,
Whom Juliana's eyes do wound.
'Tis death alone that this must do:
For Death thou art a mower too."
—1681 (PROBABLY WRITTEN IN THE EARLY 1650S)

---

[1] golden fleece The golden hay he mows, which he implies is superior to the regular fleece of the shepherd's sheep; but also associating himself with the ancient hero Jason, who sought and obtained the Golden Fleece.

[2] shepherd's-purse, and clown's-all-heal Herbs traditionally used to stop bleeding and to heal wounds; a "clown" is a country dweller.

The Garden

How vainly men themselves amaze
To win the palm, the oak, or bays,[1]
And their uncessant labours see
Crowned from some single herb or tree,
Whose short and narrow vergèd shade
Does prudently their toils upbraid,
While all flow'rs and all trees do close
To weave the garlands of repose.

Fair Quiet, have I found thee here,
And Innocence, thy sister dear!
Mistaken long, I sought you then
In busy companies of men.
Your sacred plants, if here below,
Only among the plants will grow.
Society is all but rude,
To this delicious solitude.

No white nor red[2] was ever seen
So am'rous as this lovely green.
Fond lovers, cruel as their flame,
Cut in these trees their mistress' name.
Little, alas, they know, or heed,
How far these beauties hers exceed!
Fair trees! wheres'e'er your barks I wound,
No name shall but your own be found.

When we have run our passions' heat,
Love hither makes his best retreat.
The gods, that mortal beauty chase,
Still in a tree did end their race.
Apollo hunted Daphne so,
Only that she might laurel grow.
And Pan[3] did after Syrinx speed,
Not as a nymph, but for a reed.

What wondrous life is this I lead!
Ripe apples drop about my head;
The luscious clusters of the vine
Upon my mouth do crush their wine;
The nectarine, and curious peach,
Into my hands themselves do reach;
Stumbling on melons, as I pass,
Ensnared with flow'rs, I fall on grass.

Meanwhile the mind, from pleasures less,
Withdraws into its happiness:
The mind, that ocean where each kind
Does straight its own resemblance find;[4]
Yet it creates, transcending these,
Far other worlds, and other seas,
Annihilating all that's made
To a green thought in a green shade.

Here at the fountain's sliding foot,
Or at some fruit-tree's mossy root,
Casting the body's vest aside,
My soul into the boughs does glide:
There like a bird it sits, and sings,
Then whets,° and combs its silver wings; preens
And, till prepared for longer flight,
Waves in its plumes the various light.

---

[1] the palm, the oak, or bays Wreaths or garlands; the traditional rewards signifying military (palm leaves), civic or political (oak leaves), or poetic (laurel, or bay, leaves) achievement.

[2] white nor red Colors traditionally associated with female beauty.

[3] Apollo ... Pan The speaker invokes two classical myths associated with erotic pursuit and the transformation of desire into art. Daphne, chased by Apollo, the god of poetry, was transformed into the laurel tree that became Apollo's sacred emblem. Syrinx, chased by Pan, god of flocks and shepherds, was transformed into a reed, the basis of the pan-pipe, emblem of pastoral poetry. The speaker naively (or mischievously) claims that these gods were really seeking the plants these women transformed into, not the women themselves, and thus asserts the superiority in beauty of plants to women.

[4] that ocean ... own resemblance find Alluding to the Renaissance belief that the ocean contains a counterpart for every plant and animal on land.

Such was that happy garden-state,
While man there walked without a mate:
After a place so pure, and sweet,
What other help could yet be meet?[1]
But 'twas beyond a mortal's share
To wander solitary there:
Two Paradises 'twere in one
To live in Paradise alone.

How well the skilful gardener drew
Of flowers and herbs this dial[2] new,
Where from above the milder sun
Does through a fragrant zodiac run;
And, as it works, the industrious bee
Computes its time as well as we.
How could such sweet and wholesome hours
Be reckoned but with herbs and flowers!
—1681 (probably written in the early 1650s)

An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland[3]

The forward[4] youth that would appear[5]
Must now forsake his Muses dear,
Nor in the shadows sing
His numbers[6] languishing:
'Tis time to leave the books in dust,
And oil the unused armour's rust:
Removing from the wall
The corslet[7] of the hall.
So restless Cromwell could not cease
In the inglorious arts of peace,
But through adventurous war
Urged his active star:
And, like the three-forked lightning, first
Breaking the clouds where it was nursed,
Did thorough° his own side through
His fiery way divide.[8]
(For 'tis all one to courage high
The emulous or enemy:
And with such to enclose
Is more than to oppose.)
Then burning through the air he went,
And palaces and temples rent:
And Caesar's head at last
Did through his laurels blast.[9]
'Tis madness to resist or blame
The force of angry heaven's flame:
And, if we would speak true,
Much to the man is due,
Who, from his private gardens, where
He lived reserved and austere,
As if his highest plot
To plant the bergamot,[10]

[1] help ... meet Alluding to Genesis 2.18: "And the Lord God said, It is not good that the man should be alone; I will make him an help meet for him."

[2] dial Floral sundial; sometimes read literally (Renaissance gardens did contain floral sundials), but the speaker also likens the entire garden to a sundial, in that it keeps seasonal time as the sun moves through its twelve-part zodiac.

[3] An Horatian Ode upon Cromwell's Return from Ireland In May 1650, Oliver Cromwell returned from a military expedition to Ireland, where he had defeated Royalist armies in several bloody battles. At the time he was second-in-command of Parliament's New Model Army, but in June 1650 Sir Thomas Fairfax resigned, and Cromwell became Commander-in-Chief in July, just prior to the invasion of Scotland this poem anticipates in lines 125ff. This poem was typeset for inclusion in the 1681 Poems, but the pages on which it was printed were removed before publication ("cancelled") from all but two extant copies.

[4] forward Prompt, ready, eager, spirited.

[5] appear Emerge to play a role in public life.

[6] numbers Metrical numbers: the youth can no longer spend time in the shadows writing love ("languishing") poetry.

[7] corslet Piece of armor that covered the body: the youth's "hall" or house had one, hanging on the wall.

[8] side ... divide Referring to Cromwell's rise to power through the ranks and past "emulous" (envious) rivals.

[9] And Caesar's head ... blast Comparing Charles I to Caesar, and Cromwell to a bolt of lightning: Roman emperors wore laurel wreaths; lightning was thought not to strike laurel trees; but Cromwell's bolt blasted through this protection. Note that Cromwell is figured as Caesar in line 101, and that lines 81–82 remind readers of the historical clash between the Imperial Caesar and the Roman republic.

[10] bergamot Variety of pear traditionally known as the pear of kings: a "plot" to "plant" (bury) this fruit was not as innocent sounding as it might seem.

Could by industrious valour climb
To ruin the great work of time,
And cast the kingdoms[1] old
Into another mould.
Though justice against fate complain,
And plead the ancient rights[2] in vain:
But those do hold or break
As men are strong or weak.
Nature, that hateth emptiness,
Allows of penetration less:[3]
And therefore must make room
Where greater spirits come.
What field of all the Civil Wars,
Where his were not the deepest scars?
And Hampton[4] shows what part
He had of wiser art:
Where, twining subtle fears with hope,
He wove a net of such a scope,
That Charles himself might chase
To Carisbrooke's narrow case:° box, prison
That thence the royal actor borne
The tragic scaffold might adorn:[5]
While round the armed bands
Did clap their bloody hands.
He nothing common did or mean
Upon that memorable scene:
But with his keener eye[6]
The axe's edge did try:
Nor called the gods with vulgar spite
To vindicate his helpless right,
But bowed his comely head,
Down, as upon a bed.[7]
This was that memorable hour
Which first assured the forced power.
So when they did design
The Capitol's first line,
A bleeding head where they begun,
Did fright the architects to run;
And yet in that the State
Foresaw its happy fate.[8]
And now the Irish are ashamed
To see themselves in one year tamed:[9]
So much one man can do,
That does both act and know.
They can affirm his praises best,
And have, though overcome, confessed
How good he is, how just,
And fit for highest trust:[10]
Nor yet grown stiffer with command,

---

[1] kingdoms Charles was King of three countries: England, Scotland, and Ireland.

[2] ancient rights Not the "divine right" of kings, but the place of the monarch in the "ancient" constitution, a place abolished by the English Republic.

[3] Nature, that hateth … less Nature abhors a vacuum, but it also will not let two objects occupy the same place simultaneously: one needs to go.

[4] Hampton Hampton Court Palace, where Charles stayed until, fearful of assassination, he fled to Carisbrooke Castle (see line 52) on the Isle of Wight in November 1647. Charles expected to be safe in the Isle of Wight, but the Governor held him prisoner and he was eventually returned to London for trial. The poem voices contemporary rumors that Cromwell had slyly organized the whole train of events; these rumors are now thought to be groundless.

[5] The tragic scaffold might adorn The execution of the King (the "royal actor") is presented through a sustained theatrical metaphor. Marvell probably assumed that readers would remember that Charles was beheaded on a scaffold set up outside the Banqueting House, where plays and court entertainments were staged before the war: many of these entertainments, the court masques, celebrated royal power and featured members of the court on stage.

[6] keener eye I.e., keener than the blade with which he was to be executed.

[7] He nothing … a bed Charles (the "He" of line 57, though the poem requires the reader to pause a moment to identify the referent) won admiration for his dignified manner throughout his trial and execution.

[8] And yet … fate The "Capitol" is the ancient Roman temple of Jupiter Capitolium: according to Roman historians, workers digging the temple's foundation found a man's undecayed (hence "bleeding") head, which Roman authorities interpreted as a good omen: in Latin, the word head (caput) is related to capital, so the head was read as a sign that the temple would be the capital of a great empire. The poem implies that under Cromwell another empire will be founded on another bleeding head.

[9] And now … tamed Cromwell's ferocious campaign against the Irish lasted from August 1649 to May 1650.

[10] They… trust The Irish; few if any Irish, then or now, would "confess" any goodness or justice to Cromwell in his campaign in Ireland.

But still in the Republic's hand:[1]
How fit he is to sway
That can so well obey.
He to the Commons' feet presents
A kingdom, for his first year's rents:
And, what he may, forbears
His fame, to make it theirs:
And has his sword and spoils ungirt,
To lay them at the public's skirt.[2]
So when the falcon high
Falls heavy from the sky,
She, having killed, no more does search
But on the next green bough to perch,
Where, when he first does lure,
The falconer has her sure.
What may not then our isle presume
While Victory his crest does plume?
What may not others fear
If thus he crowns each year?
A Caesar, he, ere long to Gaul,[3]
To Italy a Hannibal,[4]
And to all states not free
Shall climacteric be.[5]
The Pict[6] no shelter now shall find
Within his parti-coloured[7] mind,
But from this valour sad[8]
Shrink underneath the plaid:
Happy, if in the tufted brake
The English hunter him mistake,
Nor lay his hounds in near
The Caledonian° deer. Scottish
But thou, the Wars' and Fortune's son,
March indefatigably on,
And for the last effect
Still keep thy sword erect:
Besides the force it has to fright
The spirits of the shady night,[9]
The same arts that did gain
A power, must it maintain.

—1681 (BUT CANCELLED FROM MOST COPIES; WRITTEN 1650)

[1] in … hand The next four stanzas figure Cromwell as a falcon (see line 91) under the control of the House of Commons, the Republic's representative body: as a bird of prey he hunts kingdoms, but dutifully brings them back to the "falconer" rather than claiming them for himself.

[2] public's skirt He lays his sword, and trophies, at the feet of the "body politic."

[3] A Caesar … Gaul Julius Caesar subdued Gaul (France); the poem implies that Cromwell before long might do likewise.

[4] Hannibal Carthaginian general who invaded Italy in 218 BCE, and left, undefeated, fifteen years later. He was later defeated by a Roman army, but the reference is probably not meant ironically: the power to invade, to "be a Hannibal" to Italy, is the key point.

[5] climacteric be Be the cause of a critical or crucial moment in the lives of those states.

[6] Pict Scot, from the name of the ancient Celtic people who inhabited Scotland when the Romans occupied Britain; the name, with its link to picture and painting, also puns on "parti-coloured" in the next line.

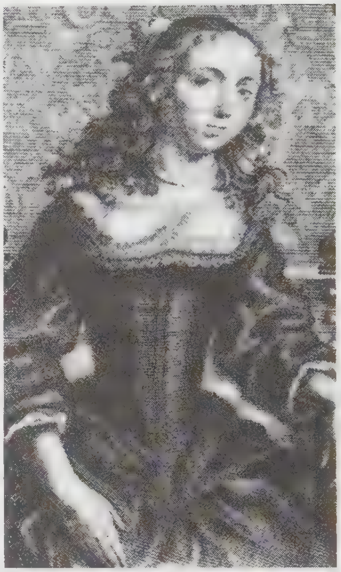
[7] parti-coloured Varied in color; the Scots were regarded in the period as politically fickle, prone to change and to variety of opinion.

[8] sad Referring to Cromwell's "valor": steadfast and grave; also dark or soberly colored (in contrast with the "parti-coloured" Scots).

[9] Besides … night Cold iron, and the cross-shaped hilt of a sword, were both thought to have the power to protect against evil spirits.

MARGARET CAVENDISH

1623 – 1673



Margaret Cavendish was one of the most unusual, most prolific, and most wide-ranging writers of the English Interregnum and Restoration periods. As a woman who published under her own name she was widely ridiculed by her social peers. Cavendish's reputation suffered for centuries; it was not until the late twentieth century that critics began to admire her eclectic range of interests and her passionate, personal style of writing.

Cavendish was born Margaret Lucas near Colchester, Essex, in 1623. She came from a rich family, the youngest of eight children of Thomas Lucas, Earl of Colchester, and Elizabeth Leighton Lucas. Her father died when she was two years old. Her mother raised her, and in doing so proved to be a strong, independent role model. Because she was a girl, Margaret was not formally educated, and received no training beyond rudimentary reading and writing skills.

In 1642 the Lucases's comfortable life was interrupted by the beginning of the English Civil War. Firmly in the Royalist camp, the family moved to Oxford, which was then the center of power for the Royalist faction. Margaret was impressed by the strength of character demonstrated by Queen Henrietta Maria (wife of Charles I) during the conflict, and she joined her court as a maid of honor, against the advice of her family. In 1644 she went with the Queen into exile in Paris. These were difficult years for Margaret Lucas. Separated from her family, she was very lonely. Painfully shy, she said very little in court, for fear of being thought foolish—and in a social culture that valued wit above all, she was mocked for her silence.

In 1645 she met and was wooed by William Cavendish, the recently widowed Marquess of Newcastle, who was also in exile for being a Royalist military commander. The age gap between the two was considerable: Margaret was 22, and William was 52, a difference so great that the Queen advised her against the match. But William proved to be persuasive—the two were married in December 1645.

Although William was a supportive husband, the marriage did not bring much financial stability. In 1649 the Royalists were defeated and King Charles I was beheaded. William was officially banished from England, and all of his estates were confiscated. The couple lived impoverished in exile, first in Paris, then in Antwerp. While living in Paris, however, Cavendish had the opportunity to meet some of the most influential thinkers of the time; Thomas Hobbes and René Descartes were dinner guests at the Cavendish household.

Cavendish went to England in 1651 to request compensation for the loss of William's property from the new government. Her petition failed, but during the two years that she spent in the endeavor, she began writing. She was to continue to write for the rest of her life.

In 1653 she published two volumes under her own name, Poems, and Fancies and Philosophical Fancies. This was not in itself an unusual event, but her sex made it an outrageous act. In Cavendish's time, women were expected to limit their activities to the private sphere; although women occasionally published, it was usually done under pseudonyms or under the writer's initials, not under their own, full names. (There was also a class issue; though members of the upper classes often wrote, they frequently felt it more dignified not to publish.) Public reaction was immediate. Cavendish was portrayed as a vulgar, attention-seeking pretender within her social circle. No doubt it did not help that Cavendish's writing was often unconventional; her style was clear and evocative, but she had not had a thorough education in the rhetorical conventions of her time.

The negative reactions did not deter Cavendish from writing and publishing a torrent of works throughout the rest of her life. Her letters indicate that she was driven by a desire to be remembered by the world, and not just as the wife of a nobleman. As she wrote in one of her Sociable Letters,

> I should weep myself into water if I could have no other fame than rich coaches, lackeys, and what state and ceremony could produce, for my ambition flies higher, to worth and merit, not state and vanity; I would be known to the world by my wit, not by my folly, and I would have my actions be wise and just, as I might neither be ashamed nor afraid to hear of myself.

Cavendish chose to forego writing poetry about love, arguing that it was an overdone topic, and instead wrote poems as well as prose on subjects such as politics, morality, and—most frequently—natural philosophy. Because she often discussed scientific matters in verse that she claimed was "not given for truth, but pastime," and because her views evolved throughout her career, it can be difficult to identify what opinions she fully embraced, but it is clear that even her approach to science was unconventional. In her early works at least, she rejects Descartes' dualism (the notion that mind and matter are two different kinds of substance), but she also rejects the purely mechanistic view most commonly held by Descartes' opponents: instead, she argues that all material things have mental properties and that human beings have souls, but that these, too, are made of matter—just matter of a finer, more quickly moving kind. Her 1653 books present a theory that the world is composed of "atoms" whose different shapes determine their physical properties, but she soon abandons this idea in works such as the "Condemning Treatise of Atoms."

The "Condemning Treatise of Atoms" appeared in Cavendish's Philosophical and Physical Opinions (1655), a discourse concerning the methods of the new philosophers; in the same year she also published The World's Olio, a broad-ranging book on politics, aesthetics, and science. In 1656 she followed up with a collection of short prose and verse entitled Nature's Pictures, an eclectic collection of fables and romances, together with a short autobiography. She had planned to publish a book of closet drama, plays intended to be read rather than performed, but the manuscript was lost en route from Antwerp to England when the ship it was on sank. The publication, Orations of Divers Sorts and Plays, was delayed until 1662.

The Cavendishes returned to England in 1660 when the monarchy was restored and the new king, Charles II, named them Duke and Duchess of Newcastle. They regained their estate, albeit in a poorer condition than when they left it, and settled into a quieter life. Despite all of the ridicule, Cavendish had by this time become something of a literary celebrity. She was also considered a public curiosity; she disdained convention by dressing in men's waistcoats and cavalier hats, and choosing to bow, rather than curtsey.

She continued to publish, writing at least seven more books, including the remarkable Description of a New World Called The Blazing World (1666), a companion piece to a long scientific study called Observations upon Experimental Philosophy. Blazing World is in some respects a precursor of the genre we now call science fiction. It begins as a record of the observations of a female protagonist who enters another world through a connection at the Earth's North Pole, but the book soon strays into the fields of natural science, philosophy, and even autobiography.

In 1668 Cavendish published a new volume of plays, Plays Never Before Printed. One of these, The Convent of Pleasure, has proved particularly compelling for recent commentators. In this play the heroine, Lady Happy, creates a man-free haven in her newly inherited estate, only to find the haven infiltrated by a man disguising himself as a woman.

Toward the end of her life, Cavendish spent her time revising and reissuing her body of work. She died, suddenly, on 15 December 1673 at the age of 50, and was buried in Westminster Abbey on 7 January 1674. Her husband died three years later; in the year of his death he published Letters and Poems in Honour of the Incomparable Princess Margaret, Duchess of Newcastle. (Note: A further selection of Cavendish's work appears in volume 3 of this anthology.)

The Poetess's Hasty Resolution

Reading my verses, I like't them so well,
Self-love did make my judgment to rebel.
Thinking them so good, I thought more to write;
Considering not how others would them like.
I writ so fast, I thought, if I lived long,
A pyramid of fame to build thereon.
Reason, observing which way I was bent,
Did stay my hand, and ask't me what I meant;
"Will you," said she, "thus waste your time in vain,
On that which in the world small praise shall gain?
For shame, leave off," said she, "the printer spare,
He'll lose by your ill poetry, I fear
Besides, the world hath already such a weight
Of useless books, as it is over-fraught.
Then pity take, do the world a good turn,
And all you write cast in the fire, and burn."
Angry I was, and Reason struck away,
When I did hear what she to me did say.
Then all in haste I to the press it sent,
Fearing persuasion might my book prevent:
But now 'tis done, with grief repent do I,
Hang down my head with shame, blush, sigh, and cry.
Take pity, and my drooping spirits raise,
Wipe off my tears with handkerchiefs of praise.
—1653

An Excuse for so Much Writ Upon My Verses

Condemn me not for making such a coil° fuss
About my book, alas it is my child.
Just like a bird, when her young are in nest,
Goes in, and out, and hops and takes no rest;
But when their young are fledged, their heads out peep,
Lord what a chirping does the old one keep.
So I, for fear my strengthless child should fall
Against a door, or stool, aloud I call,
Bid have a care of such a dangerous place:
Thus write I much, to hinder all disgrace.
—1653

A World Made by Atoms

Small atoms of themselves a world may make,
As being subtle, and of every shape:
And as they dance about, fit places find,
Such forms as best agree, make every kind.
For when we build a house of brick, and stone,
We lay them even, every one by one:
And when we find a gap that's big, or small,
We seek out stones, to fit that place withal.
For when not fit, too big, or little be,
They fall away, and cannot stay we see.
So atoms, as they dance, find places fit,
They there remain, lie close, and fast will stick.
Those that unfit, the rest that rove about,
Do never leave, until they thrust them out.
Thus by their several° motions, and their forms, different
As several workmen serve each other's turns.
And thus, by chance, may a new world create:
Or else predestined to work my fate.
—1653

The Four Principal Figured Atoms Make the Four Elements, as Square, Round, Long, and Sharp

The square flat atoms, as dull earth appear,
The atoms round do make the water clear.
The long straight atoms like to arrows fly,
Mount next the points, and make the airy Sky;
The sharpest atoms do into fire turn,
Which by their piercing quality they burn:
That figure makes them active, active, light;
Which makes them get above the rest in flight;
And by this figure they stick fast, and draw
Up other atoms which are round and raw:
As waters are round drops, though ne'er so small,
Which shew that water is all spherical,
That figure makes it spongy, spongy, wet,
For being hollow, softness doth beget.
And being soft, that makes it run about;
More solid atoms thrust it in, or out;
But sharpest atoms have most power thereon,
To nip it up with cold, or heat to run.
But atoms flat, are heavy, dull, and slow,
And sinking downward to the bottom go:
Those figured atoms are not active, light,
Whereas the long are like the sharp in flight.
For as the sharp do pierce, and get on high,
So do the long shoot straight, and evenly.
The round are next the flat, the long next round,
Those which are sharp, are still the highest found:
The flat turn all to earth, which lie most low,
The round, to water clear, which liquid flow.
The long to air turn, from whence clouds grow,
The sharp to fire turn, which hot doth glow,
These four figures four elements do make,
And as their figures do incline, they take.
For those are perfect in themselves alone,
Not taking any shape, but what's their own.
What form is else must still take from each part,
Either from round, or long, or square, or sharp;
As those that are like to triangulars cut,
Part of three figures in one form is put.
And those that bow and bend like to a bow;
Like to the round, and jointed atoms shew.
Those that are branched, or those which crooked be,
You may both the long, and sharp figures see.
Thus several° figures, several tempers make, different
But what is mixt, doth of the four partake.

What Atoms Make a Palsy, or Apoplexy[1]

Dull atoms flat,[2] when they together join,
And with each other in a heap combine;
This body thick doth stop all passage so,
Keeps motion out, so numbed the body grow.
Atoms that are sharp, in which heat doth live,
Being smothered close, no heat can give:
But if those atoms flat meet in the brain,
They choke the spirits, can no heat obtain.
—1653

All Things Are Governed by Atoms

Thus life and death, and young and old,
Are, as the several° atoms hold. different
So wit, and understanding in the brain,
Are as the several atoms reign:
And dispositions good, or ill,
Are as the several atoms still.
And every passion which doth rise,
Is as the several atoms lies.
Thus sickness, health, and peace, and war;
Are always as the several atoms are.
—1653

[1] Palsy Bodily paralysis, especially when accompanied by trembling; Apoplexy Sudden loss of sense and motion, often due to bleeding of the brain.

[2] Dull atoms flat In her poem "The Four Principal Figured Atoms Make the Four Elements, as Square, Round, Long, and Sharp" (included above), Cavendish relates each element to a particular shape of atom. "Square flat atoms," according to this poem, make up the element of earth.

The Motion of the Blood

Some by industry of learning found,
That all the blood like to the sea runs round:
From two great arteries the blood it runs
Through all the veins, to the same back comes.
The muscles like the tides do ebb, and flow,
According as the several° spirits go. different
The sinews, as final pipes, come from the head,
And all about the body they are spread;
Through which the animal spirits[1] are conveyed,
To every member, as the pipes are laid.
And from those sinews pipes each sense doth take
Of those pure spirits, as they us do make.
'Tis thought, and matter comes from the sun
In streaming beams, which Earth doth feed upon:
And that the earth by those beams back doth send
A nourishment to the sun, her good friend.
So every beam the sun doth make a chain,
To send to Earth, and to draw back again.
But every beam is like a blazing ship,
The sun doth traffic[2] to the earth in it.
Each ship is fraught with heat, through air it swims,
As to the earth warm nourishment it brings:
And vapour moist, Earth for that warmth returns,
And sends it in those ships back to the sun.
Great danger is, if ships be over-fraught,° overloaded
For many times they sink with their own weight;
And those gilt ships such fate they often find,
They sink with too much weight, or split° break
with wind.

Of Many Worlds in this World

Just like unto a nest of boxes round,
Degrees of sizes within each box are found.
So in this world, may many worlds more be,
Thinner, and less, and less still by degree;
Although they are not subject to our sense,
A world may be no bigger than two pence.[3]
Nature is curious, and such work may make,
That our dull sense can never find, but scape.° escape
For creatures, small as atoms, may be there,
If every atom a creature's figure bear.
If four atoms a world can make,[4] then see,
What several° worlds might in an earring be. different
For millions of these atoms may be in
The head of one small, little, single pin.
And if thus small, then ladies well may wear
A world of worlds, as pendants in each ear.
—1653

A World in an Earring

An earring round may well a zodiac[5] be,
Wherein a sun goeth round, and we not see.
And planets seven about that sun may move,[6]
And he stand still, as some wise men would prove.
And fixed stars,[7] like twinkling diamonds, placed
About this earring, which a world is vast.
That same which doth the earring hold, the hole,
Is that, which we do call the Pole.° north pole
There nipping frosts may be, and winter cold,
Yet never on the lady's ear take hold.
And lightnings, thunder, and great winds may blow
Within this earring, yet the ear not know.

---

[1] animal spirits Substance considered responsible for functions now attributed to electrical impulses in the nervous system; animal spirits were believed to carry sensory information and to cause bodily movement.

[2] traffic Traverse for the purpose of trade.

[3] two pence British coin, equal to two pennies.

[4] [Cavendish's note] As I have before shewed they do, in my Atoms. [Cavendish is here referring to her poem "The Four Principal Figured Atoms Make the Four Elements, as Square, Round, Long, and Sharp" (included above), in which she explains how the four elements of earth, water, air, and fire are each made of a different shape of atom.]

[5] zodiac Belt-shaped area of the celestial sphere, in which the motions of the heavenly bodies appear to take place.

[6] And planets seven … move At the time of writing, the known planets were Mercury, Venus, Earth, Mars, Jupiter, and Saturn; counting the Moon would make seven.

[7] fixed stars Stars, which do not change position in relation to each other (as opposed to "wandering stars," i.e., planets). In Ptolemaic cosmology, the fixed stars were believed to occupy permanent positions on the celestial sphere.

There seas may ebb, and, where fishes swim,
And islands be, where spices grow therein.
There crystal rocks hang dangling at each ear,
And golden mines as jewels may they wear.
There earthquakes be, which mountains vast down fling,
And yet ne'er stir the lady's ear, nor ring.
There meadows be, and pastures fresh, and green,
And cattle feed, and yet be never seen:
And gardens fresh, and birds which sweetly sing,
Although we hear them not in an earring.
There night, and day, and heat, and cold, and so
May life, and death, and young, and old, still grow.
Thus youth may spring, and several° ages die, many Great plagues may be, and no infections nigh.[1]
There cities be, and stately houses built,
Their inside gay, and finely may be gilt.
There churches be, and priests to teach therein,
And steeple too, yet hear the bells not ring.
From thence may pious tears to heaven run,
And yet the ear not know which way they're gone.
There markets be, and things both bought, and sold,
Know not the price, nor how the markets hold.
There governors do rule, and kings do reign,
And battles fought, where many may be slain.
And all within the compass of this ring,
And yet not tidings to the wearer bring.
Within the ring wise counsellors may sit,
And yet the ear not one wise word may get.
There may be dancing all night at a ball,
And yet the ear be not disturbed at all.
There rivals duels fight, where some are slain;
There lovers mourn, yet hear them not complain.° lament
And death may dig a lover's grave, thus were
A lover dead, in a fair lady's ear.
But when the ring is broke, the world is done,
Then lovers they into Elysium[2] run.

A Dialogue betwixt the Body and the Mind

BODY. What bodies else but Man's did Nature make,
To join with such a mind, no rest can take;
That ebbs, and flows, with full and falling tide,
As minds dejected fall, or swell with pride:
In waves of passion roll to billows high,
Always in motion, never quiet lie.
Where thoughts like fishes swim the mind about,
Where the great thoughts the smaller thoughts eat out.
My body the barque° rows in mind's ocean wide, row-boat
Whose waves of passions beat on every side.
When that dark cloud of ignorance hangs low,
And winds of vain opinions strong do blow;
Then showers of doubts into the mind rain down,
In deep vast studies my barque of flesh is drowned.
MIND. Why doth the body thus complain, when I
Do help it forth of every misery?
For in the world your barque is bound to swim,
Nature hath rigged it out to traffic in.
Against hard rocks you break in pieces small,
If my invention help you not in all.
The lodestone° of attraction I find out, magnet
The card of observation guides about.
The needle of discretion points the way,
Which makes your barque get safe into each bay.
BODY. If I 'scape drowning in the wat'ry main,° sea
Yet in great mighty battles I am slain.
By your ambition I am forced to fight,
When many winds upon my body light.
For you care not, so you a fame may have,
To live, if I be buried in a grave.
MIND. If bodies fight, and kingdoms win, then you
Take all the pleasure that belongs thereto.
You have a crown, your head for to adorn,
Upon your body jewels are hung on.
All things are sought to please your senses five,
No drug unpractised to keep you alive.
And I, to set you up in high degree,
Invent all engines used in war to be.
'Tis I that make you in great triumph sit,
Above all other creatures high to get:
By the industrious arts, which I do find,
You other creatures in subjection bind:
You eat their flesh, and after that their skin,

---

[1] no infections nigh I.e., the wearer of the earring would not contract the infections.

[2] Elysium In Greek mythology, the residence of the blessed upon death.

When winter comes, you lap° your bodies in. fold
And so of every thing that Nature makes,
By my direction you great pleasure takes.
Body. What though my senses all do take delight,
Yet you my entrails always bite.
My flesh eat up, that all my bones are bare,
With the sharp teeth of sorrow, grief and care.
Draws out my blood from veins, with envious spite,
Decays my strength with shame, or extreme fright.
With love extremely sick I lie,
With cruel hate you make me die.
Mind. Care keeps you from all hurt, or falling low,
Sorrow and grief are debts to friends we owe.
Fear makes men just, to give each one his own,
Shame makes civility, without there's none.
Hate makes good laws, that all may live in peace,
Love brings society, and gets increase.
Besides, with joy I make the eyes look gay,
With pleasing smiles they dart forth every way.
With mirth the cheeks are fat, smooth, rosy-red,
Your speech flares wit, when fancies fill the head.
If I were gone, you'd miss the company,
Wish we were joined again, or you might die.

A Dialogue between an Oak, and a Man Cutting Him Down

Oak. Why cut you off my boughs, both large, and long,
That keep you from the heat, and scorching sun;
And did refresh your fainting limbs from sweat?
From thundering rains I keep you free, from wet;
When on my bark your weary head would lay,
Where quiet sleep did take all cares away.
The whilst my leaves a gentle noise did make,
And blew cool winds, that you fresh air might take.
Besides, I did invite the birds to sing,
That their sweet voice might you some pleasure bring.
Where every one did strive to do their best,
Oft changed their notes, and strained their tender breast.
In wintertime, my shoulders broad did hold
Off blustering storms, that wounded with sharp cold.
And on my head the flakes of snow did fall,
Whilst you under my boughs sat free from all.
And will you thus requite my love, good will,
To take away my life, and body kill?
For all my care, and service I have past,
Must I be cut, and laid on fire at last?
And thus true love you cruelly have slain,
Invent all ways to torture me with pain.
First you do peel my bark, and flay my skin,
Hew down my boughs, so chops off every limb
With wedges you do pierce my sides to wound,
And with your hatchet knock me to the ground.
I minced shall be in chips, and pieces small,
And thus doth Man reward good deeds withal.
Man. Why grumblest thou, old Oak, when thou hast stood
This hundred years, as king of all the wood?
Would you for ever live, and not resign
Your place to one that is of your own line?
Your acorns young, when they grow big, and tall,
Long for your crown, and wish to see your fall;
Think every minute lost, whilst you do live,
And grumble at each office° you do give. duty
Ambition flieth high, and is above
All sorts of friendship strong, or natural love.
Besides, all subjects they in change delight,
When kings grow old, their government they slight:
Although in ease, and peace, and wealth do live,
Yet all those happy times for change will give.
Grows discontent, and factions still do make;
What good so ere he doth, as evil take.
Were he as wise, as ever Nature made,
As pious, good, as ever Heaven saved:
Yet when they die, such joy is in their face,
As if the devil had gone from that place.
With shouts of joy they run a new to crown,
Although next day they strive to pull him down.
Oak. Why, said the Oak, because that they are mad,
Shall I rejoice, for my own death be glad?
Because my subjects all ungrateful are,
Shall I therefore my health, and life impair.
Good kings govern justly, as they ought,
Examine not their humours, but their fault.
For when their crimes appear, 'tis time to strike,
Not to examine thoughts how they do like.

If kings are never loved, till they do die,
Nor wisht to live, till in the grave they lie:
Yet he that loves himself the less, because
He cannot get every man's high applause:
Shall by my judgment be condemned to wear,
The ass's ears,[1] and burdens for to bear.
But let me live the life that nature gave,
And not to please my subjects, dig my grave.
MAN. But here, poor Oak, thou liv'st in ignorance,
And never seek'st thy knowledge to advance.
I'll cut thee down, 'cause[2] knowledge thou may'st gain,
Shalt be a ship, to traffic° on the main:° travel / sea
There shalt thou swim, and cut the seas in two,
And trample down each wave, as thou dost go.
Though they rise high, and big are swelled with pride,
Thou on their shoulders broad, and back, shalt ride:
Their lofty heads shalt bow, and make them stoop,
And on their necks shalt set thy steady foot:
And on their breast thy stately ship shalt bear,
'Till thy sharp keel the watery womb doth tear.
Thus shalt thou round the world, new land to find,
That from the rest is of another kind.
OAK. O, said the Oak, I am contented well,
Without that knowledge, in my wood to dwell.
For I had rather live, and simple be,
Than dangers run, some new strange sight to see.
Perchance my ship against a rock may hit;
Then were I straight° in sundry° pieces split. immediately / many
Besides, no rest, nor quiet I should have,
The winds would toss me on each troubled wave.
The billows° rough will beat on every side, waves
My breast will ache to swim against the tide.
And greedy merchants may me over-freight,° overload
So should I drowned be with my own weight.
Besides with sails, and ropes my body tie,
Just like a prisoner, have no liberty.
And being always wet, shall take such colds,
My ship may get a pose,[3] and leak through holes.
Which they to mend, will put me to great pain,
Besides, all patched, and pieced, I shall remain.
I care not for that wealth, wherein the pains,
And trouble, is far greater than the gains.
I am contented with what Nature gave,
I not repine,° but one poor wish would have, complain
Which is, that you my aged life would save.
MAN. To build a stately house I'll cut thee down,
Wherein shall princes live of great renown.
There shalt thou live with the best company,
All their delight, and pastime thou shalt see.
Where plays, and masques, and beauties bright will shine,
Thy wood all oiled with smoke of meat, and wine.
There thou shalt hear both men, and women sing,
Far pleasanter than nightingales in spring.
Like to a ball, their echoes shall rebound
Against the wall, yet can no voice be found.
OAK. Alas, what music shall I care to hear,
When on my shoulders I such burdens bear?
Both brick, and tiles, upon my head are laid,
Of this preferment[4] I am sore afraid.
And many times with nails, and hammers strong,
They pierce my sides, to hang their pictures on.
My face is smucht° with smoke of candle lights, smudged
In danger to be burnt in winter nights.
No, let me here a poor old oak still grow;
I care not for these vain delights to know.
For fruitless promises I do not care,
More honour 'tis, my own green leaves to bear.
More honour 'tis, to be in Nature's dress,
Than any shape, that men by art express.
I am not like to Man, would praises have,
And for opinion make my self a slave.
MAN. Why do you wish to live, and not to die,
Since you no pleasure have, but misery?
For here you stand against the scorching sun:
By's[5] fiery beams, your fresh green leaves become
Withered; with winter's cold you quake, and shake:
Thus in no time, or season, rest can take.

---

[1] ass's ears According to Greek myth, King Midas, who was given ass's ears by a god as a punishment, hid the ears under a tall cap and asked his barber to keep his secret. The barber, unable to keep his knowledge to himself, spoke it into a hole; a bed of reeds then grew from that spot and began to whisper the secret. In some versions of the story, Midas was so ashamed he killed himself.

[2] 'cause So that.

[3] pose Cavendish likely intends "pox," an infectious disease distinguished by the appearance of pockmarks.

[4] preferment Promotion or position.

[5] By's I.e., by his.

OAK. Yet I am happier, said the Oak, than Man;
With my condition I contented am.
He nothing loves, but what he cannot get,
And soon doth surfeit[1] of one dish of meat:
Dislikes all company, displeased alone,
Makes grief himself, if Fortune gives him none.
And as his mind is restless, never pleased;
So is his body sick, and oft diseased.
His gouts, and pains, do make him sigh, and cry,
Yet in the midst of pains would live, not die.
MAN. Alas, poor Oak, thou understandst, nor can Imagine half the misery of Man.
All other creatures only in sense join,
But Man hath something more, which is divine.
He hath a mind, doth to the heavens aspire,
A curiosity for to inquire:
A wit that nimble is, which runs about
In every corner, to seek Nature out.
For she doth hide her self, as feared to shew
Man all her works, lest he too powerful grow.
Like to a king, his favourite makes so great,
That at the last, he fears his power he'll get.
And what creates desire in Man's breast,
A nature is divine, which seeks the best:
And never can be satisfied, until
He, like a god, doth in perfection dwell.
If you, as Man, desire like gods to be,
I'll spare your life, and not cut down your tree.

A Dialogue betwixt Peace, and War

PEACE. War makes the vulgar° multitude to drink common
In at the ear the foul, and muddy sink
Of factious[2] tales, by which they dizzy grow,
That the clear sight of truth they do not know.
And reeling stand, know not what way to take,
But when they choose, 'tis wrong, so a war make.
WAR. Thou flattering° Peace, and most unjust, which draws charming
The vulgar by thy rhetoric to hard° laws: unfeeling
Which makes them silly ones, content to be,
To take up voluntary slavery.
And mak'st great inequalities beside,
Some like to asses bear, others on horseback ride.
PEACE. O War, thou cruel enemy to life,
Unquieted neighbour, breeding always strife.
Tyrant thou art, to rest will give no time,
And blessed peace thou punishest as a crime.
Factions thou mak'st in every public weal,° commonwealth
From bonds of friendship tak'st off wax, and seal.
On natural affections thou dost make
A massacre, that hardly one can 'scape.
The root of all religion thou pull'st up,
And every branch of ceremony cut.
Civil society is turned to manners base,
No laws, or customs can by thee get place.
Each mind within it self cannot agree,
But all do strive for superiority:
In the whole world dost such disturbance make,
To save themselves none knows what ways to take.
WAR. O Peace, thou idle drone,° which lov'st to dwell, lazy person
If it but keep thee safe, in a poor cell.
Thy life thou sleep'st away, thoughts lazy lie.
Sloth buries fame, makes all great actions die.
PEACE. I am the bed of rest, and couch of ease,
My conversation doth all creatures please.
I the parent of learning am, and arts,
Nurse to religion, and comfort to all hearts.
I am the guardian, which keeps virtue safe,
Under my roof security she hath.
I am adorned with pastimes, and with sports,
Each several° creature still to me resorts. different
WAR. I a great school am, where all may grow wise:
For prudent wisdom in experience lies.
And am a theater to all noble minds,
A mint of true honour, that valour still coins.
I am a high throne for valour to sit,
And a great court where all fame may get.
I am a large field, where doth ambition run,
Courage still seeks me, though cowards me shun.
—1653

---

[1] surfeit Indulge to excess.

[2] factious Tending to produce factions; divisive.

Earth's Complaint[1]

O Nature, Nature, hearken to my cry,
Each minute wounded am, but cannot die.
My children which I from my womb did bear,
Do dig my sides, and all my bowels tear:
Do plow deep furrows in my very face,
From torment, I have neither time, nor place.
No other element is so abused,
Nor by mankind so cruelly is used.
Man cannot reach the skies to plow, and sow,
Nor can they set, or mark the stars to grow.
But they are still as nature first did plant,
Neither maturity, nor growth they want.
They never die, nor do they yield their place
To younger stars, but still run their own race.
The sun doth never groan young suns to bear,
For he himself is his own son, and heir.
The sun just in the center sits, as king,
The planets round about encircle him.
The slowest orbs over his head turn slow,
And underneath, the swiftest planets go.
Each several° planet, several measures take, different
And with their motions they sweet music make.
Thus all the planets round about him move,
And he returns them light for their kind love.

The Hunting of the Hare

Betwixt two ridges of plowed land lay Wat,[2]
Pressing his body close to earth lay squat.
His nose upon his two forefeet close lies,
Glaring obliquely with his great gray eyes.
His head he always sets against the wind;
If turn his tail, his hairs blow up behind:
Which he too cold will grow, but he is wise,
And keeps his coat still down, so warm he lies.
Thus resting all the day, till sun doth set,
Then riseth up, his relief for to get.
Walking about until the sun doth rise,
Then back returns, down in his form[3] he lies.
At last, poor Wat was found, as he there lay,
By huntsmen, with their dogs which came that way.
Seeing, gets up, and fast begins to run,
Hoping some ways the cruel dogs to shun.
But they by nature have so quick a scent,
That by their nose they trace what way he went.
And with their deep, wide mouths set forth a cry,
Which answered was by echoes in the sky.
Then Wat was struck with terror, and with fear,
Thinks every shadow still the dogs they were.
And running out some distance from the noise,
To hide himself, his thoughts he new employs.
Under a clod of earth in sand pit wide,
Poor Wat sat close, hoping himself to hide.
There long he had not sat, but straight° his ears immediately
The winding° horns and crying dogs he hears: sounding
Starting with fear, up leaps, then doth he run,
And with such speed, the ground scarce treads upon.
Into a great thick wood he straightway gets,
Where underneath a broken bough he sits.
At every leaf that with the wind did shake,
Did bring such terror, made his heart to ache.
That place he left, to champaign° plains he went, open
Winding about, for to deceive their scent.
And while they snuffling were, to find his track,
Poor Wat, being weary, his swift pace did slack.
On his two hinder legs for ease did sit,
His forefeet rubbed his face from dust, and sweat.
Licking his feet, he wiped his ears so clean,
That none could tell that Wat had hunted been.
But casting round about his fair great eyes,
The hounds in full career° he near him spies: speed
To Wat it was so terrible a sight,
Fear gave him wings, and made his body light.
Though weary was before, by running long,
Yet now his breath he never felt more strong.
Like those that dying are, think health returns,
When 'tis but a faint blast, which Life out burns.
For spirits seek to guard the heart about,
Striving with death, but death doth quench them out.
Thus they so fast came on, with such loud cries,
That he no hopes hath left, nor help espies.

---

[1] Complaint Lament.

[2] Wat Name for a hare.

[3] form Shallow nest of compressed grass.

With that the winds did pity poor Wat's case,
And with their breath the scent blew from the place.
Then every nose is busily employed,
And every nostril is set open, wide,
And every head doth seek a several° way, different
To find what grass, or track, the scent on lay.
Thus quick industry, that is not slack,
Is like to witchery, brings lost things back.
For though the wind had tied the scent up close,
A busy dog thrust in his snuffling nose:
And drew it out, with it did foremost run,
Then horns blew loud, for th'rest to follow on.
The great slow hounds, their throats did set a bass,
The fleet swift hounds, as tenors next in place;
The little beagles, they a treble sing,
And through the air their voice a round did ring.
Which made a concert, as they ran along;
If they but words could speak, might sing a song,
The horns kept time, the hunters shout for joy,
And valiant seem, poor Wat for to destroy:
Spurring their horses to a full career,
Swim rivers deep, leap ditches without fear;
Endanger life and limbs, so fast will ride,
Only to see how patiently Wat died.
For why, the dogs so near his heels did get,
That they their sharp teeth in his breech° did set; hindquarters
Then tumbling down, did fall with weeping eyes,
Gives up his ghost, and thus poor Wat he dies.
Men whooping loud, such acclamations make,
As if the Devil they did prisoner take.
When they do but a shiftless° creature kill; defenseless
To hunt, there needs no valiant soldier's skill.
But man doth think that exercise, and toil,
To keep their health, is best, which makes most spoil.
Thinking that food, and nourishment so good,
And appetite, that feeds on flesh, and blood.
When they do lions, wolves, bears, tigers see,
To kill poor sheep, straight say, they cruel be;
But for themselves all creatures think too few,
For luxury, wish God would make them new.
As if that God made creatures for man's meat,
To give them life, and sense, for man to eat;
Or else for sport, or recreation's sake,
Destroy those lives that God saw good to make:
Making their stomachs graves, which full they fill
With murdered bodies, that in sport they kill.
Yet man doth think himself so gentle, mild,
When he of creatures is most cruel wild.
And is so proud, thinks only he shall live,
That God a God-like nature did him give.
And that all creatures for his sake alone,
Was made for him, to tyrannize upon.

Nature's Cook

Death is the cook of Nature; and we find
Meat drest several° ways to please her mind. various
Some meats she roasts with fevers, burning hot,
And some she boils with dropsies[1] in a pot.
Some for jelly consuming by degrees,
And some with ulcers, gravy out to squeeze.
Some flesh as sage she stuffs with gouts, and pains,
Others for tender meat hangs up in chains.
Some in the sea she pickles up to keep,
Others, as brawn is soused,[2] those in wine steep.
Some with the pox,[3] chops flesh, and bones so small,
Of which she makes a French fricassee[4] withal.
Some on gridirons of calentures[5] is broiled
And some is trodden on, and so quite spoiled.
But those are baked, when smothered they do die,
By hectic fevers some meat she doth fry.
In sweat sometimes she stews with savoury smell,
A hodge-podge of diseases tasteth well.
Brains drest with apoplexy[6] to Nature's wish,

---

[1] dropsies Accumulations of fluid in body tissues or cavities, causing bloating.

[2] brawn Flesh or muscle, especially of the boar when used to make head cheese; soused Pickled in vinegar.

[3] pox Infectious disease distinguished by the appearance of abscesses on the skin, which result in pockmark scars when healed.

[4] fricassee Dish of meat stewed or fried with a sauce.

[5] gridirons Cooking surface of parallel metal bars used for broiling flesh; calentures Fever common in the tropics, characterized by delirium.

[6] apoplexy Sudden loss of sense and motion, often due to bleeding of the brain.

Or swims with sauce of megrimes° in a dish. headaches
And tongues she dries with smoke from stomachs ill,
Which as the second course she sends up still.
Then Death cuts throats, for blood-puddings to make,
And puts them in the guts, which colics[1] rack.
Some hunted are by Death, for deer that's red,
Or stall-fed oxen, knocked on the head.
Some for bacon by Death are singed, or scaled,
Then powdered up with phlegm, and rheum[2] that's salt.

A Woman Drest by Age

A milk-white hair-lace° wound up all her hairs, head-band
And a deaf coif[3] did cover both her ears,
A sober countenance about her face she ties,
And a dim sight doth cover half her eyes,
About her neck a kercher° of coarse skin, kerchief
Which Time had crumpled, and worn creases in,
Her gown was turned to melancholy black,
Which loose did hang upon her sides and back,
Her stockings cramps had knit, red worsted[4] gout,
And pains as garters tied her legs about.
A pair of palsy gloves her hands drew on,
With weakness stitched, and numbness trimmed upon.
Her shoes were corns, and hard skin sewed together,
Hard skin were soles, and corns the upper leather.
A mantle of diseases laps her round,
And thus she's dressed, till Death lays her in ground.

Of the Theme of Love

O love, how thou art tired out with rhyme!
Thou art a tree whereon all poets climb;
And from thy branches every one takes some
Of thy sweet fruit, which fancy feeds upon.
But now thy tree is left so bare, and poor,
That they can hardly gather one plum more.

[1] colics Severe pains of the stomach.

[2] rheum Mucous discharge that dries to form a crust at the corners of the eyes or elsewhere on the face.

[3] coif Close-fitting cap which covers the top, back, and sides of the head.

[4] worsted Type of woolen fabric.

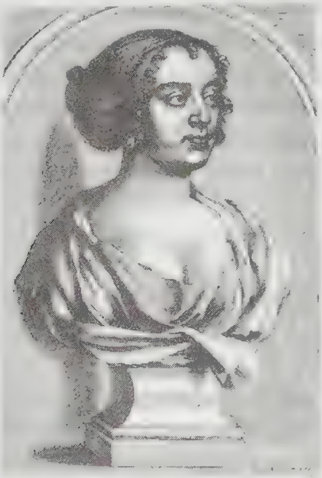
KATHERINE PHILIPS

1632 – 1664

Katherine Philips, known also by her nom de plume "Orinda" whom some called "the Matchless Orinda," was the first Englishwoman to enjoy widespread public acclaim as a poet during her lifetime. Despite prejudice against seeing women's secular works in print, her male peers recognized Philips as a poet of the first rank. As early as 1651, Henry Vaughan paid tribute to her "new miracles in Poetrie," and in 1663 Abraham Cowley proclaimed her verse "then Man more strong, and more then Woman sweet." In the guise of her literary persona Orinda, Philips dramatized, within her self-devised Society of Friendship, the ideals—and the realities and tribulations—of Platonic love with wit, elegance, and clarity. Thus the Society—whether fully or partly imaginary—helped establish a literary standard for her generation and Orinda herself a model for the female writers who followed her. Toward the end of her fairly short life Philips also broke new ground as a playwright and translator: although other women had written or translated dramas, her translation of Corneille's neoclassical Pompey was the first rhymed version of a French tragedy in English and the first English play written by a woman to be performed on the professional stage.



Orinda was born Katherine Fowler in London on 1 January 1632, into a prosperous middle-class family with strong Puritan leanings. Friendships made at the boarding school she attended from 1640 to about 1645 probably influenced Philips's eventual shift to the Royalist cause. Certainly at school she began to write verse within a coterie of friends and to cultivate a taste for the French romances and Cavalier plays from which she would later choose many of the pet names she gave members of her Society of Friendship.

In 1648, Philips, then 16, married James Philips and moved with him to Cardigan in Wales, which was to remain her family home for the rest of her life. Since her husband was a prominent Parliamentarian, however, she accompanied him occasionally on trips to London, where she befriended a circle of Cavalier writers gathered around the composer Henry Lawes and devoted to the memory of William Cartwright, who had died in 1643. It was her prefatory poem to the 1651 edition of Cartwright's works, in fact, that marked Philips's first appearance in print, and she contributed her "To the much honoured Henry Lawes" and "Mutuall Affection between Orinda and Lucasia" (later retitled as "Friendship's Mysterys") to Lawes's Second Book of Ayres in 1655. By this time, her poems were being read in manuscript as public chronicles of a literary and social clique.

The Society of Friendship had its origins in the cult of Neoplatonic love imported from the continent in the 1630s by Charles I's French wife, Henrietta Maria. Adherents indulged in elaborate rhetoric about the mingling of souls, and often adopted pseudonyms drawn from French pastoral romances or Cavalier dramas. With her literary gifts, however, and her intuitive sense of the value of deep friendships in a time of war and social schism, Philips enriched this convention as a cultural ideal of harmony and personal friendships to set against the faithless, war-torn public world. At the same time many of her poems (which she herself evidently valued highly) address public, political events.

During the 1650s the Society of Friendship probably numbered at least 20 people of both sexes, but Philips's literary energies were concentrated on her two closest female friends, Mary Aubrey ("Rosania")—until the latter's marriage in 1652 caused an estrangement—and then, in the succeeding decade, Anne Owen Lewis ("Lucasia"). The degree to which these friendships and the poetry that sprang from them include an erotic component is a subject of debate among scholars; what is agreed is that these poems have always attracted the keenest critical attention from readers of Philips's works. Initially strongly influenced by John Donne, Philips eventually matched the best of the Cavalier lyricists in freshness of wit, elegant invention, and pleasing rhythm.

Hoping to bolster her husband's political fortunes after the Restoration in 1660, Philips wrote many Royalist occasional pieces and became a friend of Sir Charles Cotterell, Master of Ceremonies to the King. She dubbed him "Poliarchus" and carried on a lively correspondence with him that was published after her death. While visiting the newly married Anne Owen in Ireland in 1662, Philips translated Corneille's Mort de Pompée from French alexandrines into fine English heroic couplets. The play was an instant success in Dublin and London in 1663, introducing Philips to wider celebrity as a playwright. (She left a second Corneille translation, Horace, unfinished, however.)

A supposedly illicit edition of Philips's poems appeared early in 1664. Germaine Greer and others have suggested that Philips engineered the publication of this edition in such a way that she could disown it. In any event, the publisher, Richard Marriott, withdrew the edition before Philips (who rushed to London to deal with the situation) had time to compel him to do so. It was during this same visit to London that Philips contracted smallpox; she died in June of that year, seemingly at the height of her powers. An authorized volume of her collected verse, published by Henry Herringman in 1667, exerted enormous influence on female poets of the succeeding generations, such as Anne Killigrew and Anne Finch, the Countess of Winchilsea. Praised for her modesty and Christian virtue as well as for her poetry, Philips, in her brief career as playwright, helped to pave the way for the acceptance of the somewhat less modest and less virtuous Aphra Behn. Finally, as Orinda, she asserted a female claim to what had been so often thought an exclusively male sphere: ideal friendship. As she claims in "A Friend":

> … for men t'exclude
> Women from friendship's capacity,
> Is a design injurious and rude,
> Only maintain'd by partial tyranny.
> Love is allow'd to us, and Innocence,
> And noblest friendships do proceed from thence.

A Married State

A married state affords but little ease
The best of husbands are so hard to please.
This in wives' careful° faces you may spell° careworn / discern
Though they dissemble° their misfortunes well. conceal
A virgin state is crowned with much content;° contentment
It's always happy as it's innocent.
No blustering husbands to create your fears;
No pangs of childbirth to extort your tears;
No children's cries for to offend your ears;
Few worldly crosses° to distract your prayers: difficulties
Thus are you freed from all the cares that do
Attend on matrimony and a husband too.
Therefore Madam, be advised by me
Turn, turn apostate to° loves levity. reject, forsake

Suppress wild nature if she dare rebel.
There's no such thing as leading apes in hell.[1]

Upon the Double Murder of King Charles

In Answer to a Libelous Rhyme made by V. P.[2]

I think not on the state, nor am concerned
Which way soever that great helm is turned,
But as that son whose father's danger nigh
Did force his native dumbness, and untie
His fettered organs:[3] so here is a cause
That will excuse the breach of nature's laws.
Silence were now a sin: nay passion now
Wise men themselves for merit would allow.
What noble eye could see, (and careless pass)
The dying lion kicked by every ass?[4]
Hath Charles so broke God's laws, he must not have
A quiet crown, nor yet a quiet grave?
Tombs have been sanctuaries; thieves lie here
Secure from all their penalty and fear.
Great Charles his double misery was this,
Unfaithful friends, ignoble enemies;
Had any heathen been this prince's foe,
He would have wept to see him injured so.
His title was his crime, they'd reason good
To quarrel at the right they had withstood.
He broke God's laws, and therefore he must die,
And what shall then become of thee and I?
Slander must follow treason; but yet stay,° stop
Take not our reason with our king away.
Though you have seized upon all our defense,
Yet do not sequester° our common sense. confiscate
But I admire not at this new supply:
No bounds will hold those who at scepters fly.
Christ will be King, but I ne'er understood,
His subjects built his kingdom up with blood
(Except their own) or that he would dispense
With his commands, though for his own defense.
Oh! to what height of horror are they come
Who dare pull down a crown, tear up a tomb![5]

On the Third of September, 1651[6]

As when the glorious magazine of light[7]
Approaches to his canopy of night,
He with new splendor clothes his dying rays,
And double brightness to his beams conveys;
As if to brave° and check his ending fate, defy
Puts on his highest looks in 's lowest state;
Dressed in such terror as to make us all
Be anti-Persians,[8] and adore his fall;
Then quits the world, depriving it of day,
While every herb and plant does droop away:
So when our gasping English royalty
Perceived her period° now was drawing nigh, end
She summons her whole strength to give one blow,
To raise her self, or pull down others too.
Big with revenge and hope, she now spake more
Of terror than in many months before;
And musters her attendants, or to save
Her from, or wait upon° her to the grave: escort
Yet but enjoyed the miserable fate
Of setting majesty, to die in state.
Unhappy Kings! who cannot keep a throne,

---

[1] leading apes in hell The proverbial fate of spinsters after death.

[2] V.P. Vavasor Powell (1617–70), an itinerant Nonconformist preacher and one of the Fifth Monarchists, who believed in the imminent Second Coming and the illegitimacy of earthly kings. The verses alluded to by Philips have not survived.

[3] that son … fettered organs Referring to the ancient Greek tale in which Croesus, King of Lydia, was saved from summary execution during the sack of Sardis by his mute son, who, speaking for the first time, identified his father as King and thus a man to be taken alive (Herodotus 1.85).

[4] dying lion kicked by every ass The dying Lion in Aesop's fable "The Sick Lion," who is assaulted in his helplessness by the various beasts, his subjects. On being finally kicked in the face by the Ass, the Lion proclaims, "This is a double death." Aesop's moral reads, "Only cowards insult dying majesty." The Scottish lion was also the dominant figure on the Stuart coat of arms.

[5] tear up a tomb Deface the honor and memory of the dead king.

[6] Third of September, 1651 The date of the Battle of Worcester, in which Oliver Cromwell decisively defeated Charles II and the Royalist cause, bringing the English Civil War to an end.

[8] anti-Persians Anti-sun, referring to the ancient Persian worship of Mithra, later identified with the sun.

Nor be so fortunate to fall alone!
Their weight sinks others: Pompey could not fly,
But half the world must bear him company;[1]
Thus captive Sampson could not life conclude,
Unless attended with a multitude.[2]
Who'd trust to greatness now, whose food is air,[3]
Whose ruin sudden, and whose end despair?
Who would presume upon his glorious birth,
Or quarrel for a spacious share of earth,
That sees such diadems become thus cheap,
And heroes tumble in the common heap.
O! give me virtue then, which sums up° all, encompasses
And firmly stands when crowns and scepters fall.

To My Excellent Lucasia, on Our Friendship

17th. July 1651[4]

I did not live until this time
Crowned my felicity,
When I could say without a crime,
I am not thine, but thee.
This carcass° breathed, and walked, and slept, body
So that the world believed
There was a soul the motions kept;
But they were all deceived.
For as a watch by art° is wound mechanical skill
To motion, such was mine:
But never had Orinda found
A soul till she found thine;
Which now inspires, cures and supplies,
And guides my darkened breast:
For thou art all that I can prize,
My joy, my life, my rest.
Nor bridegroom's nor crowned conqueror's mirth
To mine compared can be:
They have but pieces of this earth,
I've all the world in thee.
Then let our flame still light and shine,
(And no bold° fear control) strong
As innocent as our design,° intent
Immortal as our soul.

Friendship's Mystery, To My Dearest Lucasia

Come, my Lucasia, since we see
That Miracles Mens faith do move,
By wonder and by prodigy[5]
To the dull angry world let's prove
There's a Religion in our Love.

For though we were design'd t' agree,
That Fate no liberty destroyes,
But our Election is as free
As Angels, who with greedy choice
Are yet determin'd to their joyes.

Our hearts are doubled by the loss,
Here Mixture is Addition grown;
We both diffuse, and both ingross:
And we whose minds are so much one,
Never, yet ever are alone.

We court our own Captivity
Than Thrones more great and innocent:
'Twere banishment to be set free,
Since we wear fetters whose intent
Not Bondage is, but Ornament.

[1] Pompey…company The Roman general Pompey fled to Egypt after being defeated by Julius Caesar at Pharsalus (48 BCE), where 15,000 of his men were killed. Pompey's defeat and subsequent assassination in Egypt brought an end to the Civil War of the Triumvirate.

[2] captive Sampson … multitude Captured and blinded by the Philistines, the biblical hero Samson brought down the pillars of the temple at Gaza, killing thousands of his enemies along with himself. See Book of Judges 16.

[3] whose food is air Who is changeable and inconstant as the chameleon, which had the ability to endure long periods without food, and was thus reputed to live on air.

[4] Lucasia … 1651 Philips met her close friend Anne Owen (Lucasia) in 1651.

[5] prodigy Miracle or extraordinary event.

Divided joyes are tedious found,
  And griefs united easier grow:
We are our selves but by rebound,
  And all our Titles shuffled so,
Both Princes, and both Subjects too.

Our Hearts are mutual Victims laid,
  While they (such power in Friendship lies)
Are Altars, Priests, and Off'rings made:
  And each Heart which thus kindly dies,
Grows deathless by the Sacrifice.

On the Death of My First and Dearest Child, Hector Philips[1]

Twice forty months of wedlock I did stay,[2]
Then had my vows crowned with a lovely boy,
And yet in forty days he dropt away,
O swift vicissitude of human joy.

I did but see him and he disappeared,
I did but pluck the rosebud and it fell,
A sorrow unforeseen and scarcely feared,
For ill can mortals their afflictions spell.

And now (sweet babe) what can my trembling heart
Suggest to right my doleful fate or thee,
Tears are my Muse and sorrow all my Art,
So piercing groans must be thy eulogy.

Thus whilst no eye is witness of my moan,
I grieve thy loss (ah boy too dear to live)
And let the unconcerned world alone,
Who neither will, nor can refreshment give.

An off'ring too for thy sad tomb I have,
Too just a tribute to thy early hearse,
Receive these gasping numbers to thy grave,
The last of thy unhappy mother's verse.

Friendship in Emblem,[3] or the Seal, To My Dearest Lucasia

The hearts thus intermixed speak
A love that no bold shock can break;
For joined and growing, both in one,
Neither can be disturbed alone.

That means a mutual knowledge too;
For what is't either heart can do,
Which by its panting sentinel° guard
It does not to the other tell?

That friendship hearts so much refines,
It nothing but itself designs:
The hearts are free from lower ends,
For each point to the other tends.

They flame, 'tis true, and several ways,
But still those flames do so much raise,
That while to either they incline
They yet are noble and divine.

From smoke or hurt those flames are free,
From grossness° or mortality: vulgarity
The hearts (like Moses' bush[4] presumed)
Warmed and enlightened, not consumed.

[1] Hector Philips According to a manuscript copy of this poem, Philips's son Hector was born 23 April 1655 and died about ten days later, on 2 May. She would have one other child, a daughter named Katherine, the following year.

[2] Twice forty … stay Philips was married in August 1648, almost seven years before Hector was born.

[3] Emblem Drawing expressing an allegory, or representing a quality. Often these were accompanied by a motto and some lines of verse; this poem describes the symbolic elements in an emblem of friendship.

[4] Moses' bush The Angel of the Lord appears to Moses in a burning bush, which, miraculously, is not consumed by the fire (see Exodus 3.2–5).

The compasses that stand above
Express this great immortal Love;
For friends, like them, can prove this true,
They are, and yet they are not, two.

And in their posture is expressed
Friendship's exalted interest:
Each follows where the other leans,
And what each does, the other means.

And as when one foot does stand fast,
And t'other circles seeks to cast,
The steady part does regulate
And make the wanderer's motion straight.

So friends are only two in this,
T'reclaim each other when they miss:
For whose'er will grossly fall,
Can never be a friend at all.

And as that useful instrument
For even lines was ever meant;
So friendship from good angels springs,
To teach the world heroic things.

As these are found out in design
To rule and measure ev'ry line;
So friendship governs actions best,
Prescribing law to all the rest.

And as in nature nothing's set
So just as lines and numbers met;
So compasses for these b'ing made,
Do friendship's harmony persuade.

And like to them, so friends may own
Extension, not division:
Their points, like bodies, separate;
But head, like souls, knows no such fate.

And as each part so well is knit,
That their embraces ever fit:
So friends are such by destiny,
And no third can the place supply.

There needs no motto to the seal:
But that we may the mine reveal
To the dull eye, it was thought fit
That friendship only should be writ.

But as there is degrees of bliss,
So there's no friendship meant by this,
But such as will transmit to fame
Lucasia's and Orinda's name.

Royalist and “Cavalier” Poetry

A “cavalier” was originally a mounted soldier or knight, but by the late sixteenth century the term also implied a roistering gallant. When the word was first applied to the gentlemen who fought on behalf of King Charles during the civil wars of the 1640s, it was meant as an insult. But as is often the case with such labels, it was eventually embraced by those to whom it was reproachfully applied.

The “cavalier poets” are writers associated with the Royalist cause; “cavalier poetry” is above all a political category. But not all cavalier poets knew they were cavaliers: Thomas Carew and Sir John Suckling died before the wars began (and so before Royalist cavaliers even existed). A great deal of “cavalier poetry” is in fact court poetry of the 1620s and 1630s, poetry that was subsequently packaged in the 1640s as expressing “Royalist” values. That is, the cavalier mode is in many ways retrospective and nostalgic: it celebrates beauty, love, nature, sensuality, drinking, good fellowship, honor and social life, and it does so in poetry famous for its urbanity, elegance, and often ironic ease. Of course, once the wars got underway, many Royalist poets also wrote explicitly political verse that commented on the conflict. Cavalier poets were all deeply influenced by the wit of John Donne and the craftsmanship of Ben Jonson; at its best, cavalier poetry seems the offspring of a poetic marriage between the work of these two great models. For other Royalist or “cavalier” poetry, see the selections from Robert Herrick and Katherine Philips.

Thomas Carew[1]

The Spring

Now that the winter’s gone, the earth hath lost
Her snow-white robes, and now no more the frost
Candies the grass, or casts an icy cream
Upon the silver lake or crystal stream;
But the warm sun thaws the benumbed earth,
And makes it tender; gives a sacred birth
To the dead swallow; wakes in hollow tree
The drowsy cuckoo, and the humble-bee.
Now do a choir of chirping minstrels bring
In triumph to the world the youthful Spring.
The valleys, hills, and woods in rich array
Welcome the coming of the longed for May.
Now all things smile, only my Love doth lour;
Nor hath the scalding noonday sun the power
To melt that marble ice, which still doth hold
Her heart congealed, and makes her pity cold.
The ox, which lately did for shelter fly
Into the stall, doth now securely lie
In open fields; and love no more is made
By the fireside, but in the cooler shade
Amyntas now doth with his Chloris[2] sleep
Under a sycamore, and all things keep
Time with the season; only she doth carry
June in her eyes, in her heart January.

[1] Thomas Carew Carew (1594/95–1640), courtier, masque writer, and one of the most widely read poets of the 1620s and 1630s (in manuscript: most of his poems were not printed until after his death). He joined the King’s army for the 1639 expedition to Scotland (the “bishops’ war”), but died before the beginning of the civil wars.

[2] Amyntas … Chloris Traditional generic names for rural lovers.

A Song[1]

Ask me no more where Jove bestows,
When June is past, the fading rose;
For in your beauty's orient deep
These flowers, as in their causes,[2] sleep.

Ask me no more whither do stray
The golden atoms of the day;
For in pure love heaven did prepare
Those powders to enrich your hair.

Ask me no more whither doth haste
The nightingale when May is past;
For in your sweet dividing[3] throat
She winters and keeps warm her note.

Ask me no more where those stars light
That downwards fall in dead-of night;
For in your eyes they sit, and there
Fixèd become as in their sphere.

Ask me no more if east or west
The phoenix builds her spicy nest;
For unto you at last she flies,
And in your fragrant bosom dies.

An Elegy upon the Death of the Dean of Paul's, Dr. John Donne

Can we not force from widowed poetry
Now thou art dead (great Donne) one elegy
To crown thy hearse? Why yet dare we not trust
Though with unkneaded dough-baked prose thy dust,
Such as the unscissored[4] churchman from the flower
Of fading rhetoric, short lived as his hour,
Dry as the sand that measures it,[5] should lay
Upon thy ashes, on the funeral day?
Have we no voice, no tune? Didst thou dispense
Through all our language, both the words and sense?
'Tis a sad truth. The pulpit may her plain
And sober Christian precepts still retain,
Doctrines it may, and wholesome uses frame,
Grave homilies, and lectures, but the flame
Of thy brave soul (that shot such heat and light,
As burnt our earth, and made our darkness bright,
Committed holy rapes upon our will,
Did through the eye the melting heart distill,
And the deep knowledge of dark truths so teach,
As sense might judge, what fancy could not reach)
Must be desired for ever. So the fire,
That fills with spirit and heat the Delphic choir,[6]
Which kindled first by thy Promethean breath,[7]
Glowed here a while, lies quenched now in thy death.
The Muses' garden, with pedantic weeds
O'erspread, was purged by thee, the lazy seeds
Of servile imitation thrown away,
And fresh invention planted; thou didst pay
The debts of our penurious bankrupt age:
Licentious thefts, that make poetic rage
A mimic fury, when our souls must be
Possessed, or with Anacreon's ecstasy,
Or Pindar's,[8] not their own; the subtle cheat
Of sly exchanges, and the juggling feat
Of two-edged words, or whatsoever wrong
By ours was done the Greek, or Latin tongue,
Thou hast redeemed, and opened us a mine
Of rich and pregnant fancy, drawn a line
Of masculine expression, which had good

[1] Song Printed in Carew's Poems, this poem might in fact be by William Strode (for Strode see below): it was not unusual for poems that circulated in manuscript to be misattributed when they appeared in printed collections.

[2] causes Her beauty is the source of floral beauty (playing on the philosophical meanings of "cause" formulated by Aristotle).

[3] dividing Ornamenting notes while singing.

[4] unscissored With unshorn hair.

[7] Promethean breath His inspiringly "fiery" verse: Prometheus stole fire from the gods and gave it to humans.

[8] Anacreon … Pindar Ancient Greek poets whose work became increasingly influential in the seventeenth century; the poems attributed in the Renaissance to Anacreon (fl. sixth century BCE) were in fact Anacreontic imitations written many centuries after his death.

Old Orpheus[1] seen, or all the ancient brood
Our superstitious fools admire, and hold
Their lead more precious, than thy burnished gold,
Thou hadst been their Exchequer,° and no more treasury
They each in other's dust, had raked for ore.
Thou shalt yield no precedence, but of time,
And the blind fate of language, whose tuned chime
More charms the outward sense; yet thou mayst claim
From so great disadvantage greater fame,
Since to the awe of thy imperious wit
Our stubborn language bends, made only fit
With her tough thick-ribbed hoops to gird about
Thy giant fancy, which had proved too stout
For their soft melting phrases. As in time
They had the start, so did they cull the prime
Buds of invention many a hundred year,
And left the rifled fields, besides the fear
To touch their harvest, yet from those bare lands
Of what is purely thine, thy only hands
(And that thy smallest work) have gleaned more
Than all those times, and tongues could reap before.
But thou art gone, and thy strict laws will be Too hard for libertines in poetry.
They will repeal the goodly exiled train
Of gods and goddesses, which in thy just reign
Were banished nobler poems; now, with these,
The silenced tales of th' Metamorphoses[2]
Shall stuff their lines, and swell the windy page,
Till verse refined by thee, in this last age
Turn ballad rhyme, or those old idols be Adored again, with new apostasy.
    Oh, pardon me that break with untuned verse
The reverend silence that attends thy hearse,
Whose solemn awful° murmurs were to thee full of awe
More than these faint lines, a loud elegy,
That did proclaim in a dumb eloquence
The death of all the arts, whose influence
Grown feeble, in these panting numbers lies
Gasping short-winded accents, and so dies.
So doth the swiftly turning wheel not stand
In the instant we withdraw the moving hand,
But some small time maintain a faint weak course
By virtue of the first impulsive force:
And so whilst I cast on thy funeral pile
Thy crown of bays, oh, let it crack a while,
And spit disdain, till the devouring flashes
Suck all the moisture up, then turn to ashes.
    I will not draw the envy to engross° collect
All thy perfections, or weep all our loss:
Those are too numerous for an elegy,
And this too great, to be expressed by me.
Though every pen should share a distinct part,
Yet art thou theme enough to tire all art;
Let others carve the rest, it shall suffice
I on thy tomb this epitaph incise:

    Here lies a king, that ruled as he thought fit
    The universal monarchy of wit;
    Here lies two flamens,[3] and both those, the best,
    Apollo's first, at last the true God's priest.

SIR JOHN SUCKLING[4]

Song

Why so pale and wan fond lover?
    Prithee why so pale?
Will, when looking well can't move her,
    Looking ill prevail?
    Prithee why so pale?

Why so dull and mute young sinner?
    Prithee why so mute?
Will, when speaking well can't win her,
    Saying nothing do't?
    Prithee why so mute?

[2] Metamorphoses The mythological stories in Ovid's Metamorphoses had appeared in the work of many Renaissance poets.

[3] flamens Priests (that is, Donne was priest of Apollo and of God).

[4] SIR JOHN SUCKLING Poet, playwright, courtier, and gamester, Sir John Suckling (1609–41?) was the "greatest gallant of his time" and the inventor of cribbage. He outfitted his own troop of 100 splendidly dressed men for the 1639 expedition to Scotland; fled to Paris after being implicated in a Royalist plot in 1641; and died there in mysterious circumstances. His poems were printed posthumously.

Quit, quit, for shame, this will not move,
This cannot take her;
If of her self she will not love,
Nothing can make her,
The Devil take her.

A Ballad. Upon a Wedding[1]

I tell thee Dick, where I have been,
Where I the rarest things have seen,
O things beyond compare!
Such sights again cannot be found
In any part of English ground,
Be it at wake, or fair.

At Charing Cross,[2] hard by the way
Where we (thou know'st) do sell our hay,
There is a house with stairs;
And there did I see coming down
Such folk as are not in our town,
Forty at least, in pairs.

Amongst the rest, one pest'lent fine
(His beard no bigger though than thine)
Walked on before the rest:
Our landlord looks like nothing to him:
The King (God bless him) 'twould undo him,
Should he go still so dressed.[3]

At course-a-park,[4] without all doubt,
He should have first been taken out
By all the maids in th' town;
Though lusty Roger there had been,
Or little George upon the green,
Or Vincent of the crown.

But wot you what? the youth was going
To make an end of all his wooing;
The parson for him stayed:
Yet by his leave (for all his haste)
He did not wish so much all past,
(Perchance) as did the maid.

The maid (and thereby hangs a tale,
For such a maid no Whitsun ale[5]
Could ever yet produce):
No grape that's kindly ripe, could be
So round, so plump, so soft as she,
Nor half so full of juice.

Her finger was so small, the ring
Would not stay on which they did bring,
It was too wide a peck:
And to say truth (for out it must)
It looked like the great collar (just)
About our young colt's neck.

Her feet beneath her petticoat,
Like little mice stole in and out,
As if they feared the light:
But oh, she dances such a way!
No sun upon an Easter day
Is half so fine a sight.

He would have kissed her once or twice,
But she would not, she was so nice,
She would not do't in sight;
And then she looked as who should say
I will do what I list to day;
And you shall do't at night.

Her cheeks so rare a white was on,
No daisy makes comparison
(Who sees them is undone),
For streaks of red were mingled there,

[1] A Ballad. Upon a Wedding This poem is a "rustic epithalamion," in which a "rustic" speaker describes a fashionable city wedding in country terms and language. The speaker's friend "Dick" is likely the poet Richard Lovelace, and the poem was probably written for the July 1638 wedding of Suckling's brother, John, Lord Lovelace, to Lady Anne Wentworth.

[2] Charing Cross In London, near Haymarket.

[3] Should he go still so dressed That is, it would bankrupt the King himself to dress this well.

[4] course-a-park Country game in which a girl calls out the name of a boy to chase her.

[5] Whitsun ale Parish festival held on Whitsunday, for which a "lord" and "lady" of the ale were chosen.

Such as are on a Katherine pear
(The side that's next the sun).

Her lips were red, and one was thin,
Compared to that was next her chin
(Some bee had stung it newly).
But (Dick) her eyes so guard her face;
I durst no more upon her gaze,
Than on the sun in July.[1]

Her mouth so small when she doth speak,
Thou'dst swear her teeth her words did break,
That they might passage get;
But she so handles still the matter,
They come as good as ours, or better,
And are not spoiled one whit.

If wishing should be any sin,
The parson himself had guilty been
(She looked that day so purely),
And did the youth so oft the feat
At night, as some did in conceit,
It would have spoiled him, surely.

Passion oh me! how I run on!
There's that that would be thought upon
(I trow) besides the bride:
The bus'ness of the kitchen great,
For it is fit that men should eat,
Nor was it there denied.

Just in the nick the cook knocked thrice,
And all the waiters in a trice
His summons did obey:
Each serving man with dish in hand,
Marched boldly up, like our trained band,[2]
Presented, and away.

When all the meat was on the table,
What man of knife, or teeth, was able
To stay to be entreated?
And this the very reason was,
Before the parson could say grace,
The company was seated.

Now hats fly off, and youths carouse;
Healths first go round, and then the house,
The brides[3] came thick and thick:
And when 'twas named another's health,
Perhaps he made it hers by stealth.
(And who could help it, Dick?)

O'th' sudden up they rise and dance,
Then sit again and sigh, and glance;
Then dance again and kiss:
Thus several ways the time did pass,
Whilst every woman wished her place,
And every man wished his.

By this time all were stol'n aside
To counsel and undress the bride;
But that he must not know:
But yet 'twas thought he guessed her mind,
And did not mean to stay behind
Above an hour or so.

When in he came (Dick) there she lay
Like new-fall'n snow melting away
('Twas time I trow to part);
Kisses were now the only stay,
Which soon she gave, as who should say,
Good-bye, with all my heart.

But just as heavens would have to cross it,
In came the bridemaids with the posset:[4]
The bridegroom eat in spite;
For had he left the women to't
It would have cost two hours to do't,
Which were too much that night.

At length the candles out, and now
All that they had not done, they do:
What that is, who can tell?
But I believe it was no more

---

[1] July Pronounced with the emphasis on the first syllable, like "Julie."

[2] trained band Local militia.

[3] brides Toasts to the bride.

[4] posset Sweetened hot milk curdled with ale or wine, ceremonially consumed by the bride and groom before retiring to bed.

Than thou and I have done before
With Bridget, and with Nell.

"Out upon it, I have loved"

Out upon it, I have loved
Three whole days together;
And am like to love three more,
If it prove fair weather.

Time shall moult away his wings
Ere he shall discover
In the whole wide world again
Such a constant lover.

But the spite on't is, no praise
Is due at all to me:
Love with me had made no stay,
Had it any been but she.

Had it any been but she,
And that very face,
There had been at least ere this
A dozen dozen in her place.
—1659

From an anonymous broadsheet, The Sucklington Faction, or (Suckling's) Roaring Boyes (1641). The broadsheet aimed to depict Suckling and his "roaring" cavaliers in a hostile light, as drinking, smoking, card playing, dicing and sexually irresponsible fops. (The curtained bed in the background would have implied a certain set of attitudes towards sexuality.)

RICHARD LOVELACE[1]

To Lucasta, Going to the Wars

Tell me not (sweet) I am unkind,
That from the nunnery
Of thy chaste breast, and quiet mind,
To war and arms I fly.

True; a new mistress now I chase,
The first foe in the field;
And with a stronger faith embrace
A sword, a horse, a shield.

Yet this inconstancy is such,
As you too shall adore:
I could not love thee (dear) so much,
Loved I not honour more.

To Althea, From Prison

When love with unconfinèd wings
Hovers within my gates;
And my divine Althea brings
To whisper at the grates;
When I lie tangled in her hair,
And fettered to her eye;
The gods[2] that wanton in the air,
Know no such liberty.

When flowing cups run swiftly round
With no allaying Thames,[3]
Our careless heads with roses bound,
Our hearts with loyal flames;
When thirsty grief in wine we steep,
When healths and draughts go free,
Fishes, that tipple in the deep,
Know no such liberty.

When (like committed linnets)[4] I
With shriller throat shall sing
The sweetness, mercy, majesty,
And glories of my King.
When I shall voice aloud, how good
He is, how great should be,
Enlargèd winds, that curl the flood,
Know no such liberty.

Stone walls do not a prison make,
Nor iron bars a cage;
Minds innocent and quiet take
That for an hermitage;
If I have freedom in my love,
And in my soul am free,
Angels alone that soar above
Enjoy such liberty.

WILLIAM STRODE[5]

On Westwell Downs[6]

When Westwell Downs I 'gan to tread,
Where cleanly winds the green did sweep,

---

[1] RICHARD LOVELACE Poet, courtier, and Royalist army officer, Richard Lovelace (1618–57) was a student at Oxford when he was described as "the most amiable and beautiful person that ever eye beheld." Born into a wealthy family in Kent, he joined the King's army for the 1639 "bishops' war"; in the 1640s he sold most of his estates to help the royal cause, and was twice jailed for his efforts.

[2] gods Probably Cupids; some manuscript copies read "birds."

[3] no allaying Thames No diluting water.

[4] committed linnets Caged songbirds.

[5] WILLIAM STRODE Church of England minister (1602–45) with a reputation as a witty preacher. Strode's poetry circulated widely in manuscript but was not collected until the twentieth century.

[6] Westwell Downs Downs are elevated, undulating, treeless areas of land, usually used for pasturage; Westwell Downs are near Oxford.

Methought a landscape[1] there was spread,
Here a bush and there a sheep:
The pleated wrinkles of the face
Of wave-swollen earth did lend such grace,
As shadowings in imagery
Which both deceive and please the eye.

The sheep sometimes did tread the maze
By often winding in and in,
And sometimes round about they trace
Which milkmaids call a fairy ring:
Such semicircles have they run,
Such lines across so trimly spun,
That shepherds learn whene'er they please
A new geometry with ease.

The slender food upon the down
Is always even, always bare;
Which neither spring nor winter's frown
Can ought improve or ought impair:
Such is the barren eunuch's chin,
Which thus doth evermore begin
With tender down to be o'ercast
Which never comes to hair at last.

Here and there two hilly crests
Amidst them hug a pleasant green,
And these are like two swelling breasts
That close a tender fall between.
Here would I sleep, or read, or pray
From early morn till flight of day;
But hark, a sheep-bell calls me up,
Like Oxford college bells, to sup.
—(WRITTEN 1630S?)

On a Gentlewoman Walking in the Snow

I saw fair Chloris walk alone
Where feathered rain came softly down,
And Jove descended from his tower
To court her in a silver shower:[2]
The wanton snow flew to her breast
Like little birds into their nest,
And overcome with whiteness there
For grief it thawed into a tear;
Thence falling on her garment's hem
To deck her, froze into a gem.

THOMAS RANDOLPH[3]

Upon the Loss of His Little Finger

Arithmetic nine digits, and no more
Admits of;[4] then I still have all my store.
For what mischance hath ta'en from my left hand,
It seems did only for a cipher stand.
But this I'll say for thee, departed joint,
Thou wert not given to steal, nor pick, nor point
At any in disgrace; but thou didst go
Untimely to thy death only to show
The other members what they once must do:
Hand, arm, leg, thigh, and all must follow too.
Oft didst thou scan my verse, where, if I miss
Henceforth, I will impute the cause to this.
A finger's loss (I speak it not in sport)
Will make a verse a foot too short.
Farewell, dear finger: much I grieve to see
How soon mischance hath made a hand of[5] thee.
—1638

[1] landscape Landscape painting.

[2] Jove ... shower Jove (or Zeus, in Greek mythology) descended to Danaë in a golden shower and impregnated her.

[3] THOMAS RANDOLPH Randolph (1605–35), playwright, College Fellow, and one of the poetic "sons" of Ben Jonson. His poems were not published until after his death.

[4] Admits of "Arithmetic" is used here as a verb, as in "count nine digits."

[5] made a hand of Idiom for "done away with."

RICHARD CORBETT[1]

Upon Fairford Windows[2]

Tell me, you anti-saints, why glass
With you is longer lived than brass?
And why the saints have 'scaped their falls
Better from windows than from walls?
Is it because the brethren's fires
Maintain a glass-house at Blackfriars,
Next which the church stands north and south,
And east and west the preacher's mouth?
Or is't because such painted ware
Resembles something what you are,
So pied, so seeming, so unsound
In manners, and in doctrine, found,
That, out of emblematic wit,
You spare yourselves in sparing it?
If it be so, then, Fairford, boast
Thy church hath kept what all have lost,
And is preserved from the bane
Of either war or Puritan,
Whose life is coloured in thy paint:
The inside dross, the outside saint.

EDMUND WALLER[3]

Go, Lovely Rose!

Go, lovely rose!
Tell her that wastes her time and me
That now she knows,
When I resemble her to thee,
How sweet and fair she seems to be.

Tell her that's young,
And shuns to have her graces spied,
That hadst thou sprung
In deserts, where no men abide,
Thou must have uncommended died.

Small is the worth
Of beauty from the light retired;
Bid her come forth,
Suffer herself to be desired,
And not blush so to be admired.

Then die! that she
The common fate of all things rare
May read in thee;
How small a part of time they share
That are so wondrous sweet and fair!
—1645

[1] RICHARD CORBETT Son of a Surrey gardener, Richard Corbett (1582–1635) rose to be Bishop of Oxford (1628) and later of Norwich (1632). He was well known in the literary circles of Jacobean London, where he enjoyed a reputation for wit and conviviality and was a friend of Ben Jonson's. His poems circulated widely in manuscript, and were published posthumously in 1647 and in an enlarged edition in 1648.

[2] Upon Fairford Windows The stained glass windows (ca. 1480) in St. Mary's Church in Fairford, Gloucestershire, were (and still are) one of the only sets to survive the iconoclastic destruction that accompanied both the Reformation and the civil wars of the 1640s.

[3] EDMUND WALLER Member of Parliament in the 1620s and 30s, Edmund Waller (1606–87) published his first collection of poems in 1633 and several more in the mid-1640s. During the civil wars he was caught participating in a plot to secure London for the King, and was imprisoned; he returned to Parliament in 1661. Many Restoration and eighteenth-century poets saw Waller's polish and regularity as an important precursor to their poetic style.

ABRAHAM COWLEY[1]

Of Wit

Tell me, O tell, what kind of thing is Wit
Thou[2] who master art of it.
For the first matter loves variety less;
Less women love 't, either in love or dress.
A thousand different shapes it bears,
Comely in thousand shapes appears.
Yonder we saw it plain; and here 'tis now,
Like spirits in a place, we know not how.

London, that vents of false ware so much store,
In no ware deceives us more.
For men led by the colour, and the shape,
Like Zeuxis'[3] birds fly to the painted grape;
Some things do through our judgment pass
As through a multiplying glass.
And sometimes, if the object be too far,
We take a falling meteor for a star

Hence 'tis a Wit, that greatest word of fame,
Grows such a common name.
And Wits by our creation they become,
Just so, as titular bishops[4] made at Rome.
'Tis not a tale, 'tis not a jest
Admired with laughter at a feast,
Nor florid talk which can that title gain;
The proofs of wit forever must remain.

'Tis not to force some lifeless verses meet
With their five gouty feet.
All everywhere, like man's, must be the soul,
And reason the inferior powers control.
Such were the numbers which could call
The stones into the Theban wall.[5]
Such miracles are ceased; and now we see
No towns or houses raised by poetry.

Yet 'tis not to adorn, and gild each part
That shows more cost, than art.
Jewels at nose and lips but ill appear;
Rather than all things Wit, let none be there.
Several lights will not be seen,
If there be nothing else between.
Men doubt, because they stand so thick in th' sky,
If those be stars which paint the galaxy.

'Tis not when two like words make up one noise;
Jests for Dutch men, and English boys.
In which who finds out Wit, the same may see
In anagrams and acrostics poetry.
Much less can that have any place
At which a virgin hides her face,
Such dross the fire must purge away; 'tis just
The author blush, there where the reader must.

'Tis not such lines as almost crack the stage
When Bajazet begins to rage.[6]
Nor a tall metaphor in the Oxford way,[7]
Nor the dry chips of short lunged Seneca.[8]
Nor upon all things to obtrude,
And force some odd similitude.
What is it then, which like the power divine
We only can by negatives define?

---

[1] ABRAHAM COWLEY Son of a London stationer, Abraham Cowley (1618–67) was writing poems by the age of ten and published his first collection when he was only fifteen years old. A fellow of Trinity College, Cambridge before the civil wars, he joined the court in exile and acted as a Royalist spy in the 1650s, though eventually he was trusted by neither side. After the Restoration he was active in the circle that founded The Royal Society.

[2] Thou The poem's addressee is unknown.

[3] Zeuxis' Ancient artist, whose painted grapes were so convincing that birds tried to eat them.

[4] titular bishops Bishops created in title only, without an episcopal see.

[5] Theban wall In classical myth, Amphion charmed stones through song into building themselves into a wall around the city of Thebes.

[6] Bajazet … rage Referring to the powerful rhetoric of a character in Christopher Marlowe's Tamburlaine.

[7] Oxford way Changed by Cowley to "bombast way" in a later edition.

[8] Seneca The Roman playwright Seneca was known for his "clipped" or choppy style.

In a true piece of Wit all things must be,
Yet all things there agree.
As in the ark, joined without force or strife,
All creatures dwelt; all creatures that had life
Or as the primitive forms of all
(If we compare great things with small)
Which without discord or confusion lie,
In that strange mirror of the deity.

But love that moulds one man up out of two,
Makes me forget and injure you.
I took you for my self sure when I thought
That you in any thing were to be taught.
Correct my error with thy pen;
And if any ask me then,
What thing right Wit, and height of genius is,
I'll only show your lines, and say, 'tis this.
—1656

HENRY VAUGHAN[1]

Regeneration[2]

A ward, and still in bonds, one day
I stole abroad,
It was high-spring, and all the way
Primrosed, and hung with shade;
Yet, was it frost within,
And surly winds
Blasted my infant buds, and sin
Like clouds eclipsed my mind.

Stormed thus, I straight perceived my spring
Mere stage, and show,
My walk a monstrous, mountained thing
Rough-cast with rocks, and snow;
And as a pilgrim's eye
Far from relief,
Measures the melancholy sky
Then drops, and rains for grief,

So sighed I upwards still; at last
'Twixt steps, and falls
I reached the pinnacle, where placed
I found a pair of scales,
I took them up and laid
In the one late pains,
The other smoke, and pleasures weighed
But proved the heavier grains;

With that, some cried, Away; straight I Obeyed, and led
Full east, a fair, fresh field could spy
Come called it, Jacob's bed;
A Virgin-soil, which no
Rude feet ere trod,
Where (since he stepped there), only go
Prophets, and friends of God.

Here, I reposed; but scarce well set,
A grove descried
Of stately height, whose branches met
And mixed on every side;
I entered, and once in (Amazed to see't),
Found all was changed, and a new spring
Did all my senses greet;

The unthrift Sun shot vital gold
A thousand pieces,
And heaven its azure did unfold
Chequered with snowy fleeces,
The air was all in spice
And every bush
A garland wore; thus fed my eyes
But all the ear lay hush.

[1] HENRY VAUGHAN An ardent Royalist (though not all Royalist poets were "cavaliers"), Henry Vaughan (1621-95) was a devotional poet whose primary model was George Herbert. His twin brother Thomas was a notable hermetic philosopher and alchemist, and Henry's poetry reveals a similarly mystical and symbolic imagination.

[2] Regeneration "Regeneration" is a vision of a journey of spiritual renewal. The poem's language and rhetoric is suffused with scriptural reference.

Only a little fountain lent
Some use for ears,
And on the dumb shades language spent
The music of her tears;
I drew her near, and found
The cistern full
Of divers stones, some bright, and round
Others ill-shaped, and dull.

The first (pray mark), as quick as light
Danced through the flood,
But, the last more heavy than the night
Nailed to the centre stood;
I wondered much, but tired
At last with thought,
My restless eye that still desired
As strange an object brought;

9
It was a bank of flowers, where I descried
(Though 'twas mid-day,)
Some fast asleep, others broad-eyed
And taking in the ray,
Here musing long, I heard
A rushing wind
Which still increased, but whence it stirred
No where I could not find;

10
I turned me round, and to each shade
Dispatched an eye,
To see, if any leaf had made
Least motion, or reply,
But while I listening sought
My mind to ease
By knowing, where 'twas, or where not,
It whispered; Where I please.

Lord, then said I, On me one breath,
And let me die before my death!

Song of Solomon 4.16

Arise O north, and come thou south-wind, and blow upon my garden, that the spices thereof may flow out.
—1650

The World

I saw Eternity the other night,
Like a great ring of pure and endless light,
All calm, as it was bright;
And round beneath it, Time in hours, days, years,
Driven by the spheres
Like a vast shadow moved; in which the world
And all her train were hurled.
The doting lover in his quaintest strain
Did there complain;
Near him, his lute, his fancy, and his flights,
Wit's sour delights,
With gloves, and knots, the silly snares of pleasure,
Yet his dear treasure
All scattered lay, while he his eyes did pour
Upon a flower.
The darksome statesman hung with weights and woe,
Like a thick midnight-fog moved there so slow,
He did not stay, nor go;
Condemning thoughts (like sad eclipses) scowl
Upon his soul,
And clouds of crying witnesses without
Pursued him with one shout.
Yet digged the mole, and lest his ways be found,
Worked under ground,
Where he did clutch his prey; but One did see
That policy;
Churches and altars fed him; perjuries
Were gnats and flies;
It rained about him blood and tears, but he
Drank them as free.
The fearful miser on a heap of rust
Sate pining all his life there, did scarce trust
His own hands with the dust,
Yet would not place one piece above, but lives
In fear of thieves.
Thousands there were as frantic as himself,

And hugged each one his pelf;
The downright epicure placed Heaven in sense,
And scorned pretence,
While others, slipped into a wide excess,
Said little less;
The weaker sort slight, trivial wares enslave,
Who think them brave;
And poor despised Truth sat counting by
Their victory.
Yet some, who all this while did weep and sing,
And sing, and weep, soared up into the ring;
But most would use no wing.
O fools (said I) thus to prefer dark night
Before true light,
To live in grots and caves, and hate the day
Because it shows the way,
The way, which from this dead and dark abode
Leads up to God,
A way where you might tread the sun, and be
More bright than he.
But as I did their madness so discuss
One whispered thus,
"This ring the Bridegroom did for none provide,
But for his bride."

All that is in the world, the lust of the flesh, the lust of the eyes, and the pride of life, is not of the father, but is of the world. And the world passeth away, and the lusts thereof, but he that doth the will of God abideth for ever (1 John 2.16–17).

RICHARD CRASHAW[1]

Saint Mary Magdalene or, The Weeper[2]

Lo where a wounded heart with bleeding eyes conspire.
Is she a flaming fountain, or a weeping fire?

Hail sister springs,
Parents of silver-footed rills!
Ever bubbling things!
Thawing crystal! Snowy hills!
Still spending, never spent;
I mean Thy fair eyes, sweet Magdalene.

Heavens thy fair eyes be;
Heavens of ever-falling stars;
'Tis seed-time still with thee,
And stars thou sow'st, whose harvest dares
Promise the earth to countershine
Whatever makes Heaven's forehead fine.

But we're deceived all:
Stars indeed they are too true,
For they but seem to fall
As Heaven's other spangles do:
It is not for our earth and us,
To shine in things so precious.

---

[1] RICHARD CRASHAW Like Henry Vaughan, a devotional poet, admirer of George Herbert, and political Royalist, Crashaw (1612–49) offers yet a different direction for an English poet in the 1640s: he converted to Catholicism, and died in Rome. Crashaw is often considered the most "baroque" of English Renaissance poets.

[2] Saint Mary Magdalene or, The Weeper Crashaw printed this poem with variations in three different collections (1646, 1648, and 1652); this version reflects the last of these three, with corrections from 1648.

Upwards thou dost weep;
Heaven's bosom drinks the gentle stream.
Where the milky rivers creep,
Thine floats above and is the cream.
Waters above the heavens, what they be,
We are taught best by thy tears and thee.

Every morn from hence,
A brisk cherub something sips,
Whose soft influence
Adds sweetness to his sweetest lips;
Then to his music: and his song
Tastes of this breakfast all day long.

Not in the evening's eyes,
When they read with weeping are
For the Sun that dies,
Sits Sorrow with a face so fair.
Nowhere but here did ever meet
Sweetness so sad, sadness so sweet.

When Sorrow would be seen
In her brightest majesty,
For she is a Queen,
Then is she dressed by none but thee.
Then, and only then, she wears
Her richest pearls, I mean thy tears.

8
The dew no more will weep,
The primrose's pale cheek to deck;
The dew no more will sleep,
Nuzzled in the lily's neck.
Much rather would it tremble here,
And leave them both to be thy tear.

There is no need at all,
That the balsam-sweating bough
So coyly should let fall
His med'cinable tears; for now
Nature hath learnt t'extract a dew
More sovereign and sweet from you.

10
Yet let the poor drops weep,
Weeping is the case of woe;
Softly let them creep,
Sad that they are vanquished so;
They, though to others no relief,
May balsam be for their own grief.

11
Such the maiden gem
By the wanton spring put on,
Peeps from her parent stem,
And blushes at the bridegroom sun:
This watery blossom of thy eyn[1]
Ripe, will make the richer wine.

12
When some new bright guest
Takes up among the stars a room,
And Heaven will make a feast,
Angels with crystal vials come;
And draw from these full eyes of thine
Their Master's water, their own wine.

13
Golden though he be,
Golden Tagus[2] murmurs; though
Were his way by thee,
Content and quiet he would go;
So much more rich would he esteem
Thy silver, than his golden stream.

Well does the May that lies
Smiling in thy cheeks, confess
The April in thine eyes;
Mutual sweetness they express.
No April e'er lent kinder showers,
Nor May returned more faithful flowers.

[1] eyn Eyes.

[2] Tagus River in Spain famous for its golden sands.

15

O cheeks! Beds of chaste loves,
By your own showers seasonably dashed.
Eyes! nests of milky doves,
In your own wells decently washed.
O wit of love! that thus could place
Fountain and garden in one face.

16

O sweet contest; of woes
With loves, of tears with smiles disporting!
O fair and friendly foes,
Each other kissing and comforting!
While rain and sunshine, cheeks and eyes,
Close in kind contrarieties.

17

But can these fair floods be
Friends with the bosom fires that fill ye!
Can so great flames agree
Eternal tears should thus distil thee!
O floods, O fires, O suns, O showers!
Mixed and made friends by love's sweet powers.

18

'Twas his well-pointed dart
That digged these wells, and dressed this vine;
And taught that wounded heart
The way into these weeping eyn.
Vain loves avaunt!° bold hands forbear! be gone!
The lamb hath dipped his white foot here.

19

And now where'er he strays
Among the Galilean mountains,
Or more unwelcome ways,
He's followed by two faithful fountains;
Two walking baths, two weeping motions,
Portable and compendious oceans.

20

O thou, thy Lord's fair store,
In thy so rich and large expenses,
Even when he showed most poor,
He might provoke the wealth of princes.
What prince's wanton'st pride e'er could
Wash with silver, wipe with gold?

21

Who is that King, but he
Who call'st his crown to be called thine,
Thus can boast to be
Waited on by a wandering mine,
A voluntary mint, that strews
Warm silver showers where'er he goes?

22

O precious prodigal!
Fair spendthrift of thyself! thy measure,
Merciless love! is all
Even to the last pearl in thy treasure.
All places, times, and objects be
Thy tear's sweet opportunity.

23

Does the day-star rise?
Still thy stars do fall, and fall;
Does day close his eyes?
Still the fountain weeps for all.
Let night or day do what they will,
Thou hast thy task, thou weepest still.

24

Does thy song lull the air?
Thy falling tears keep faithful time.
Does thy sweet-breathed prayer
Up in clouds of incense climb?
Still at each sigh, that is, each stop,
A bead, that is, a tear, does drop.

25

At these thy weeping gates,
Watching their wat'ry motion,
Each winged moment waits,
Takes his tear, and gets him gone.
By thine eye's tinct ennobled thus,
Time lays him up: he's precious.

26

Not, so long she lived,
Shall thy tomb report of thee;
But, so long she grieved,
Thus must we date thy memory.
Others by moments, months, and years,
Measure their ages; thou, by tears.

27

So do perfumes expire;
So sigh tormented sweets, oppressed
With proud unpitying fire;
Such tears the suffering Rose that's vexed
With ungentle flames does shed,
Sweating in a too warm bed.

28

Say, ye bright brothers,
The fugitive sons of those fair eyes
Your fruitful mothers,
What make you here? What hopes can 'tice° entice
You to be born? What cause can borrow
You from those nests of noble sorrow?

29

Whither away so fast?
For sure the sordid earth
Your sweetness cannot taste,
Nor does the dust deserve your birth.
Sweet, whither haste you then? O, say
Why you trip so fast away?

30

We go not to seek
The darlings of Aurora's bed,
The rose's modest cheek,
Nor the violet's humble head.
Though the field's eyes, too, weepers be,
Because they want such tears as we.

31

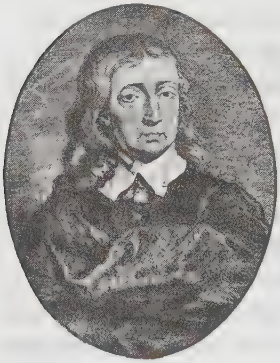
Much less mean we to trace
The fortune of inferior gems,
Preferred to some proud face,
Or perched upon feared diadems.
Crowned heads are toys. We go to meet
A worthy object, our Lord's feet.

—1652 (WRITTEN 1646, REVISED 1648 AND 1652)

JOHN MILTON

1608 – 1674

John Milton aspired to be a writer for the ages—and he succeeded. Almost within his lifetime, Milton was widely considered England's greatest poet and a writer whose only serious rivals were the ancient masters Homer and Virgil. His influence on subsequent English poetry is probably second only to that of Shakespeare: for centuries, major poets struggled to define themselves in relation to Milton's achievement in a literary psychodrama of admiration, emulation, exasperation, and denial. No other English writer appears to have assimilated so thoroughly all the literature, culture, and history that had come before him. Milton first mastered the European artistic tradition, and then out of it made something new, producing magnificent and innovative poems in all the major genres. In addition, had Milton not published a line of verse he would still hold a place in literary history by virtue of his prose. Even though he dismissed these books as the product of "his left hand," Milton was a significant prose writer and a formidable polemicist, in Latin as well as English, producing a wide range of works on political, social, religious, educational, and historical issues.



Of all the major writers in English, Milton was probably the most deeply engaged in the politics of his time. Milton's poetry has consequently been read in light of his active involvement in political, religious, and social revolution. But the nature of Milton's literary engagement with these issues continues to be debated: Milton, like Shakespeare, rarely if ever offers easy answers. Over the centuries, Milton has been championed as both a pillar of religious orthodoxy and as the great dissenter, a religious radical, or even heretic. He has been called a proto-feminist and the great patriarchal bogeyman, a radical political egalitarian and a man who did not believe in democracy. His is the greatest voice of "Puritanism" in English literature, but to think of him in anything like the modern sense of "puritanical" is to go immediately off-track. While a profoundly religious man, Milton by the end of his life had almost no use for institutional religion or theological tradition. While a "Puritan," he was also a spokesman for revolution, freedom of the will (which Protestant theory usually denied), and political, social, intellectual, and personal liberty. Thomas Jefferson copied out 48 excerpts from Milton's works into his commonplace book, almost all of them having to do with liberty. Milton's works have been called the culmination of Renaissance humanism and a monument to dead ideas; and they have been celebrated as ushering in the modern world in their complex treatment of human agency, human love, and human political relations.

No writer before Milton fashioned himself quite so insistently and self-consciously as an author: in text after text, Milton invites us to read connections between his life and his writing, and then challenges or complicates our ability to do so. Born the eldest son of a successful scrivener in London in 1608, Milton was surrounded by words from an early age; he began writing seriously at the age of ten. In 1618 he was admitted to Christ's College, Cambridge, where he would remain the next seven years, graduating M.A. in 1632. While Milton did very well in his studies, he also complained repeatedly about the inadequacies of the educational curriculum and requirements: he described his frustration with traditional approaches to education in his treatise On Education (1644). Milton entered Cambridge expecting to become a minister in the Church of England (he would later change his mind, probably in the 1630s). In his university writings, however, he talks about himself as a poet and as a scholar, and never as a prospective minister. But he did develop a reputation for erudition and literary skill: during his university years he wrote several poems he would later publish, including the companion poems "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso."

After he left Cambridge, Milton spent the next six years in "studious retirement," living with his parents, reading extensively, preparing himself for his vocation—and trying to discover what that vocation was. He published his first poem, an epitaph for Shakespeare included in Shakespeare's second folio (1632); he accepted commissions for two aristocratic entertainments (Arcades and A Maske, popularly known as Comus). He kept a close eye on the changing political and religious conditions of England over the 1630s. Finally, in 1638, he published "Lycidas," one of the most extraordinary poems in English, simultaneously a eulogy for a drowned classmate, a denunciation of current Anglican Church leadership, and a confident assertion of his own poetic vocation, all mediated through the conventions of classical pastoral elegy. Writing "Lycidas" seemed to be the trigger that propelled Milton from his retirement into an active engagement with the world. In 1638 and 1639, he traveled abroad, spending considerable time in Italy, where he was much taken with the intellectual and cultural life. Had not rumors of the impending English Civil War called him home in late 1639, Milton's travels would likely have lasted much longer.

Milton continued to train himself towards his goal of becoming a great poet in the classical tradition of Virgil, becoming familiar with Spanish, Dutch, and Hebrew as well as Latin and Greek, French and Italian, and with the leading works of history, science, and philosophy as well as of literature. But after returning to England in 1639 he devoted himself over the next twenty years very largely to the cause of political and religious change. Most of his publications during this period consist of prose polemic, including some anti-episcopal tracts in the early 1640s, several others arguing for an increased freedom to divorce, Areopagitica (1644), and works of political theory and argument that hold a central place among the writings of the English civil wars: The Tenure of Kings and Magistrates (1649), Eikonoklastes (1649), Defensio pro populo Anglicano (1651), Defensio secunda (1654), and The Ready and Easy Way to Establish a Free Commonwealth (1659). Milton's skill as a polemicist brought him to the attention of the revolutionary government, and in the 1650s he served as Secretary for Foreign Tongues in the government of Oliver Cromwell—a job that entailed writing a wide variety of official documents and letters (Latin remained the most important "foreign tongue" for international communication).

Of his prose works, the most widely read in the modern era has been Areopagitica (1644), Milton's extended defense of literary and intellectual freedom. The occasion for the work was the effort by Parliament to require books to be licensed prior to publication. Milton did not advocate complete freedom of the press. But his arguments for the necessity of letting readers make up their own minds, of letting arguments fight it out in the public sphere, continue to be cited in legal cases today. At the time, however, Milton was far better known, notorious even, for his books advocating a right to divorce. In June of 1642 Milton (then thirty-six) married Mary Powell, a young woman from a Royalist family. The two proved to be a less than perfect match, and she returned to her family's home in Buckinghamshire two months later. They were eventually reconciled, but many readers see a connection between their apparent difficulties and Milton's publication of The Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1642), in which he argues that the purpose of marriage is to provide companionship based on affection and like-mindedness, and that divorce should be allowed when a marriage fails to do so. The scandal Milton provoked in England with these arguments was supplanted only by the European-wide scandal he created by defending the execution of King Charles I.

While Milton might not have had time to write much poetry in the 1640s, he did publish the poetry he had written up to the outbreak of war. In 1645, a year that saw some of the bloodiest fighting of the war, Humphrey Moseley, the most prominent literary publisher of the day, produced The Poems of Mr. John Milton, Both English and Latin. In addition to "On the Morning of Christ's Nativity," "On Shakespeare," "L'Allegro" and "Il Penseroso," "Lycidas," and A Maske, the collection included twenty-two other poems in English, including ten sonnets (six of them written in Italian), and twelve Latin poems.

Milton's wife Mary died during childbirth in 1652, and one of the couple's four children died shortly thereafter. At about the same time Milton entirely lost his sight; the sonnet "When I consider how my light is spent" (often referred to as "On His Blindness") was written later that same year. His two daughters were among those who served thereafter as scribes; all of his subsequent works were dictated. In 1656 Milton married Katherine Woodcock; two years later, in 1658, she also died of complications arising from childbirth.

With the Restoration in 1660, Milton went into hiding from the authorities. Eventually he suffered a brief imprisonment, but his freedom was negotiated by friends (notable among them the poet Andrew Marvell). His existence for the final fourteen years of his life was one of relative isolation—but these were also the years of his greatest poetic achievement. Rising early each day and beginning to dictate as soon as his scribe or secretary joined him, he had begun in the late 1650s to compose Paradise Lost, a sweeping re-telling of the Biblical story of humanity's expulsion from Paradise; the epic was initially published in 1667 in ten books, and then reissued in a revised twelve-book edition in 1674. Since the early eighteenth century Paradise Lost has been almost universally accorded a central place in the English literary canon. Two other major works followed: Paradise Regained (1671), which presents in blank verse the story of the temptation of Jesus and of his defeat of Satan; and Samson Agonistes (1671), which recounts in the form of a poetic drama the story of the blind and anguished Samson, struggling to understand God's will.

In 1663 Milton married Elizabeth Minshul, who became a scribe, caregiver, and inspiration to him in the last decade of his life. Though Paradise Lost sold moderately well from its first publication, and though Milton came to be regarded by many as a "classic" even during his lifetime, his anti-monarchical political views precluded any official honors; when he died in 1674 he was buried not in Westminster Abbey but beside his father in Saint Giles's Church, Cripplegate.

L'Allegro[1]

Hence loathèd Melancholy
Of Cerberus,[2] and blackest Midnight born,
In Stygian[3] cave forlorn
'Mongst horrid shapes, and shrieks, and sights unholy,
Find out some uncouth° cell, desolate
Where brooding Darkness spreads his jealous wings,
And the night-raven sings;
There under ebon shades, and low-browed rocks,
As ragged as thy locks,
In dark Cimmerian[4] desert ever dwell.
But come thou goddess fair and free,
In heaven yclept° Euphrosyne,[5] named
And by men, heart-easing Mirth,
Whom lovely Venus at a birth
With two sister Graces more
To ivy-crownèd Bacchus bore;[6]
Or whether (as some sager sing)
The frolic wind that breathes the spring,

[1] L'Allegro Italian: The merry or happy man.

[2] Cerberus In classical myth, the three-headed dog that guards the entrance to the underworld.

[3] Stygian Hellishly black; from Styx, a river that in classical myth leads to the underworld.

[4] Cimmerian Densely dark (from the Cimmerians, a people fabled in classical story to live in perpetual darkness).

[5] Euphrosyne Classical personification of mirth and one of the three Graces.

[6] heart-easing Mirth … Bacchus bore Milton makes the three Graces the daughters of Venus (goddess of love) and Bacchus (god of wine); Euphrosyne's two sisters were Aglaia (Brightness) and Thalia (Bloom).

Zephyr with Aurora[1] playing,
As he met her once a-Maying,[2]
There on beds of violets blue,
And fresh-blown roses washed in dew,
Filled her with thee a daughter fair,
So buxom, blithe, and debonair.[3]
Haste thee nymph, and bring with thee
Jest and youthful Jollity,
Quips and cranks, and wanton wiles,[4]
Nods, and becks,° and wreathèd smiles, beckonings
Such as hang on Hebe's[5] cheek,
And love to live in dimple sleek;
Sport that wrinkled Care derides,
And Laughter holding both his sides.
Come, and trip it as ye go
On the light fantastic toe,
And in thy right hand lead with thee,
The mountain nymph, sweet Liberty;
And if I give thee honour due,
Mirth, admit me of thy crew
To live with her, and live with thee,
In unreprovèd° pleasures free; free of blame
To hear the lark begin his flight,
And singing startle the dull night,
From his watch-tower in the skies,
Till the dappled dawn doth rise;
Then to come in spite of sorrow,
And at my window bid good morrow,[6]
Through the sweet-briar, or the vine,
Or the twisted eglantine.
While the cock with lively din,
Scatters the rear of darkness thin,
And to the stack,° or the barn door, haystack
Stoutly struts his dames before,
Oft list'ning how the hounds and horn
Cheerly rouse the slumb'ring morn,
From the side of some hoar° hill, grey
Through the high wood echoing shrill.
Sometime walking not unseen
By hedgerow elms, on hillocks green,
Right against the eastern gate,
Where the great sun begins his state,° progress
Robed in flames, and amber light,
The clouds in thousand liveries dight,° clothed
While the ploughman near at hand,
Whistles o'er the furrowed land,
And the milkmaid singeth blithe,
And the mower whets his scythe,
And every shepherd tells his tale[7]
Under the hawthorn in the dale.
Straight mine eye hath caught new pleasures
Whilst the landscape round it measures.
Russet lawns, and fallows grey,
Where the nibbling flocks do stray,
Mountains on whose barren breast
The labouring clouds do often rest:
Meadows trim with daisies pied,° multicolored
Shallow brooks, and rivers wide,
Towers, and battlements it sees
Bosomed high in tufted trees,
Where perhaps some beauty lies,
The cynosure[8] of neighbouring eyes.
Hard by, a cottage chimney smokes,
From betwixt two agèd oaks,
Where Corydon and Thyrsis[9] met,
Are at their savoury dinner set
Of herbs, and other country messes,° prepared dishes
Which the neat-handed Phyllis dresses;
And then in haste her bower she leaves,
With Thestylis to bind the sheaves;

---

[1] Zephyr … Aurora Classical personifications of the west wind and of the dawn.

[2] a-Maying Celebrating the arrival of May; May Day was celebrated with various traditional pastimes. Sterner Puritans opposed such revelry as pagan.

[3] buxom, blithe, and debonair These three adjectives had overlapping meanings in the period, and were often grouped with one another; buxom Easy-going, lively; blithe Merry, jolly; debonair Affable, kindly, gracious.

[4] Quips Witty sayings; cranks Play on words; wanton wiles Playful games and tricks.

[5] Hebe Classical personification of youth.

[6] to come … bid good morrow That is, L'Allegro comes to his window and bids the day good morrow (though some readers think it is the lark who bids good morrow to L'Allegro): the same, deliberately agentless syntax has L'Allegro "oft list'ning" and "sometime walking" in subsequent lines.

[7] tells his tale A double meaning: "tells his story" and/or "counts his flock."

[8] cynosure Guiding star, hence center of attraction or interest.

[9] Corydon … Thyrsis With "Phyllis" and "Thestylis" five lines below, traditional names in pastoral poetry.

Or if the earlier season lead
To the tanned° haycock in the mead, sun-dried
Sometimes with secure° delight free from fear
The upland hamlets will invite,
When the merry bells ring round,
And the jocund rebecks[1] sound
To many a youth, and many a maid,
Dancing in the chequered shade;
And young and old come forth to play
On a sunshine holiday,
Till the livelong daylight fail,
Then to the spicy nut-brown ale,
With stories told of many a feat,
How Fairy Mab[2] the junkets[3] eat,
She was pinched, and pulled she said,
And he by Friar's Lantern[4] led Tells how the drudging Goblin[5] sweat,
To earn his cream-bowl duly set,
When in one night, ere glimpse of morn,
His shadowy flail hath threshed the corn,
That ten day-labourers could not end;
Then lies him down the lubber° fiend, drudging
And stretched out all the chimney's length,
Basks at the fire his hairy strength;
And crop-full[6] out of doors he flings,
Ere the first cock his matin° rings. morning song
Thus done the tales, to bed they creep,
By whispering winds soon lulled asleep.
Towered cities please us then,
And the busy hum of men,
Where throngs of knights and barons bold,
In weeds of peace[7] high triumphs hold,
With store of ladies, whose bright eyes
Rain influence, and judge the prize
Of wit, or arms, while both contend
To win her grace, whom all commend.
There let Hymen[8] oft appear
In saffron robe, with taper clear,[9]
And pomp, and feast, and revelry,
With masque, and antique pageantry,
Such sights as youthful poets dream
On summer eves by haunted stream.
Then to the well-trod stage anon,° soon
If Jonson's learnèd sock[10] be on,
Or sweetest Shakespeare, fancy's child,
Warble his native wood-notes wild,
And ever against eating cares,[11]
Lap me in soft Lydian airs,[12]
Married to immortal verse
Such as the meeting soul[13] may pierce
In notes, with many a winding bout° cycle, circuit
Of linkèd sweetness long drawn out,
With wanton heed, and giddy cunning,[14]
The melting voice through mazes running;
Untwisting all the chains that tie
The hidden soul of harmony.
That Orpheus self[15] may heave his head
From golden slumber on a bed
Of heaped Elysian[16] flowers, and hear
Such strains as would have won the ear
Of Pluto, to have quite set free
His half-regained Eurydice.[17]

[1] rebecks Three-stringed fiddles.

[2] Fairy Mab In English folklore, the Queen of the Fairies.

[3] junkets Dishes of sweet curds and cream.

[4] Friar's Lantern Folkloric name for the will-o'-the-wisp.

[5] Goblin Robin Goodfellow or Hobgoblin; usually a mischievous trickster, he might help with household chores, as here, if propitiated with an offering of cream.

[6] crop-full Filled to the brim (here, with cream).

[7] weeds of peace Showy tournament outfits, as opposed to real, wartime armor.

[8] Hymen Classical god of weddings.

[9] taper clear Candle or torch; it was a good omen for the marriage if the flame burned without smoke ("clear").

[10] sock Slipper worn by comic actors in ancient Greece (as opposed to the buskin worn by actors in tragedies): L'Allegro suggests going to the theater if one of Ben Jonson's erudite comedies is playing.

[11] eating cares See Horace, Odes 2.11.18, "Evius [Dionysus] scatters eating cares."

[12] Lydian airs Soft, convivial songs or melodies ("Lydian" is one of the Greek musical modes).

[13] the meeting soul I.e., the soul meeting the music.

[14] wanton heed, and giddy cunning Two oxymorons: playful carefulness and silly, excited shrewdness.

[15] Orpheus self That is, Orpheus's self, or Orpheus himself. For Orpheus, see note below.

[16] Elysian From Elysian Fields or Elysium, the resting place of dead heroes in classical myth.

[17] Orpheus … Eurydice In classical myth, Orpheus was the musician who traveled to the underworld to reclaim his wife, Eurydice, after she died. Touched by the beauty of Orpheus's [continued …]

Il Penseroso[1]

Hence vain deluding joys,
The brood of folly without father bred,
How little you bestead,[2]
Or fill the fixèd mind with all your toys;
Dwell in some idle brain,
And fancies fond° with gaudy shapes possess, foolish
As thick and numberless
As the gay motes that people the sunbeams,
Or likest hovering dreams
The fickle pensioners of Morpheus' train.[3]
But hail thou goddess, sage and holy,
Hail divinest Melancholy,
Whose saintly visage is too bright
To hit the sense of human sight;
And therefore to our weaker view,
O'erlaid with black staid Wisdom's hue.
Black, but such as in esteem, Prince
Memnon's sister[4] might beseem,
Or that starred Ethiop queen[5] that strove
To set her beauty's praise above
The sea-nymphs, and their powers offended.
Yet thou art higher far descended,
Thee bright-haired Vesta[6] long of yore,
To solitary Saturn[7] bore;
His daughter she (in Saturn's reign,
Such mixture was not held a stain°) disgrace
Oft in glimmering bowers, and glades
He met her, and in secret shades
Of woody Ida's[8] inmost grove,
While yet there was no fear of Jove.
Come pensive nun, devout and pure,
Sober, steadfast, and demure,
All in a robe of darkest grain,° hue
Flowing with majestic train,
And sable stole of cypress lawn,[9]
Over thy decent shoulders drawn.
Come, but keep thy wonted state,[10]
With even step, and musing gait,
And looks commercing° with the skies, communicating
Thy rapt soul sitting in thine eyes:
There held in holy passion still,
Forget thyself to marble, till
With a sad leaden downward cast,
Thou fix them on the earth as fast.
And join with thee calm Peace, and Quiet,
Spare Fast, that oft with gods doth diet,
And hears the Muses in a ring,
Ay round about Jove's altar sing.
And add to these retired Leisure,
That in trim gardens takes his pleasure;
But first, and chiefest, with thee bring,
Him that yon soars on golden wing,
Guiding the fiery-wheelèd throne,[11]
The cherub Contemplation,[12]
And the mute Silence hist° along, summon playing, Pluto, god of the underworld, agreed to release her. But he made the pcondition that Orpheus had to leave the underworld without looking back to see if Eurydice was following; at the last minute, he looked, and lost her once again.

[1] Il Penseroso Italian: The pensive or contemplative man.

[2] bestead Help; avail; be of service.

[3] Morpheus' train Dreams are the attendants of Morpheus, the god of sleep.

[4] Memnon's sister In classical myth, Memnon was an Ethiopian prince who fought on the side of the Trojans in the Trojan war; his sister was named Himera.

[5] starred Ethiop queen Cassiopeia; in classical myth she was changed into a constellation (hence "starred") as punishment for claiming to be more beautiful than the sea nymphs.

[6] Vesta Classical goddess of hearth and home.

[7] Saturn In classical myth, father of Jove (mentioned below); traditionally "solitary," he was associated with melancholics (hence the adjective "saturnine") even though his was the Golden Age.

[8] Ida Mount Ida, in Crete, the traditional site from which Saturn ruled, before his son Jove overthrew him.

[9] cypress lawn Lawn is a fine linen, usually white, but "cypress lawn" is black.

[10] wonted state Usual dignity.

[11] fiery-wheelèd throne Apparently referring to the Biblical vision of Ezekiel (Ezekiel 10) of a chariot guided by cherubim (angels).

[12] The cherub Contemplation The cherubim are angels, second in the nine ranks of celestial hierarchy; their special faculty is contemplation of God.

'Less Philomel[1] will deign a song,
In her sweetest, saddest plight,
Smoothing the rugged brow of night,
While Cynthia[2] checks her dragon yoke,
Gently o'er th' accustomed oak;
Sweet bird that shunn'st the noise of folly,
Most musical, most melancholy!
Thee chauntress° oft the woods among, female singer
I woo to hear thy even-song;
And missing thee, I walk unseen
On the dry smooth-shaven green,
To behold the wandering moon,
Riding near her highest noon,[3]
Like one that had been led astray
Through the heaven's wide pathless way;
And oft, as if her head she bowed,
Stooping through a fleecy cloud.
Oft on a plat° of rising ground, patch
I hear the far-off curfew sound,[4]
Over some wide-watered shore,
Swinging slow with sullen roar;
Or if the air will not permit,
Some still removèd place will fit,
Where glowing embers through the room
Teach light to counterfeit a gloom,
Far from all resort of mirth,
Save the cricket on the hearth,
Or the bellman's° drowsy charm, night watchman
To bless the doors from nightly harm:
Or let my lamp at midnight hour,
Be seen in some high lonely tower,
Where I may oft outwatch the Bear,[5]
With thrice great Hermes,[6] or unsphere
The spirit of Plato[7] to unfold
What worlds, or what vast regions hold
The immortal mind that hath forsook
Her mansion in this fleshly nook:
And of those daemons[8] that are found
In fire, air, flood, or underground,
Whose power hath a true consent
With planet, or with element.
Sometime let gorgeous Tragedy
In sceptred pall[9] come sweeping by,
Presenting Thebes, or Pelops' line,[10]
Or the tale of Troy divine.
Or what (though rare) of later age,
Ennobled hath the buskined stage.[11]
But, O sad virgin, that thy power
Might raise Musaeus[12] from his bower,
Or bid the soul of Orpheus sing
Such notes as warbled to the string,
Drew iron tears down Pluto's cheek,
And made hell grant what love did seek.[13]
Or call up him[14] that left half-told
The story of Cambuscan bold,
Of Camball, and of Algarsife,
And who had Canace to wife,
That owned the virtuous ring and glass,

---

[1] Philomel The nightingale, from a classical story in which a young woman, Philomela, is transformed into the sweet-singing bird after being raped and silenced by having her tongue cut out (hence "saddest plight").

[2] Cynthia Classical goddess of the moon, here imagined as driving across the night sky in a chariot drawn by a dragon.

[3] highest noon Highest point, apogee.

[4] curfew sound Bells rung to signal the beginning of restrictions on nighttime activity.

[5] the Bear The constellation Ursa Major.

[6] thrice great Hermes Hermes Trismegistus, the reputed author of the classical Corpus Hermeticum, a collection of mystical ("Hermetic") writings that Il Penseroso stays up all night to read.

[7] Plato Il Penseroso contemplates reading the works of Plato, whose spirit is imagined as inhabiting a heavenly sphere or star.

[8] daemons From neo-Platonic or Hermetic philosophy, spirits that inhabit the four "elements" of fire, air, water, and earth.

[9] sceptred pall Cloak and trappings of royalty.

[10] Thebes, or Pelops' line Two royal families whose stories provided subject matter for classical tragedies: the house of Thebes was that of Oedipus and his family; the house of Pelops was the family of Atreus, Agamemnon, Orestes, Electra, and Iphigenia.

[11] buskined stage Tragedies, from the footwear worn by Greek tragic actors; Milton implies that good tragedies were rare in his (as opposed to the classical) period.

[12] Musaeus In classical myth, a great singer, sometimes called the son of Orpheus.

[13] Orpheus … seek In classical myth, Orpheus was the master musician who traveled to the underworld to reclaim his wife, Eurydice, after she died. Touched by the beauty of Orpheus's playing, Pluto, god of the underworld, agreed to release her. But he made the condition that Orpheus had to leave the underworld without looking back to see if Eurydice was following; at the last minute, he looked, and lost her once again (hence she is "half-regained").

[14] him I.e., Geoffrey Chaucer.

And of the wondrous horse of brass,
On which the Tartar king did ride;[1]
And if aught else, great bards beside,
In sage and solemn tunes have sung,
Of tourneys and of trophies hung;
Of forest, and enchantments drear,
Where more is meant than meets the ear.[2]
Thus Night oft see me in thy pale career,
Till civil-suited Morn appear,
Not tricked and frounced[3] as she was wont,
With the Attic boy[4] to hunt,
But kerchiefed in a comely° cloud, attractive
While rocking winds are piping loud,
Or ushered with a shower still,
When the gust hath blown his fill,
Ending on the rustling leaves,
With minute drops from off the eaves.
And when the sun begins to fling
His flaring beams, me goddess bring
To archèd walks of twilight groves,
And shadows brown that Sylvan[5] loves
Of pine, or monumental oak,
Where the rude axe with heavèd stroke,
Was never heard the nymphs to daunt,
Or fright them from their hallowed haunt.
There in close covert° by some brook, hidden shelter
Where no profaner eye may look,
Hide me from day's garish eye,
While the bee with honied thigh,
That at her flowery work doth sing,
And the waters murmuring
With such consort° as they keep, agreement, harmony
Entice the dewy-feathered Sleep;
And let some strange mysterious dream,
Wave at his wings in airy stream,
Of lively portraiture displayed,
Softly on my eyelids laid.
And as I wake, sweet music breathe
Above, about, or underneath,
Sent by some spirit to mortals good,
Or th' unseen genius° of the wood. guardian spirit
But let my due° feet never fail, dutiful
To walk the studious cloister's[6] pale,° enclosure
And love the high embowèd° roof, arched
With antique pillars' massy proof,° solidity
And storied windows[7] richly dight,° decorated
Casting a dim religious light.
There let the pealing organ blow,
To the full-voiced choir below,
In service high, and anthems clear,
As may with sweetness, through mine ear,
Dissolve me into ecstasies,
And bring all heaven before mine eyes.
And may at last my weary age
Find out the peaceful hermitage,
The hairy gown and mossy cell,
Where I may sit and rightly spell,[8]
Of every star that heaven doth shew,
And every herb that sips the dew;
Till old experience do attain
To something like prophetic strain.
These pleasures Melancholy give,
And I with thee will choose to live.

story of … ride The romance of Cambuscan, his children Camball, Algarsife, and Canace, and the gifts of a brass horse and a magic ring, is told in Chaucer's unfinished "Squire's Tale" in The Canterbury Tales, and continued by Spenser in Book 4 of The Faerie Queene.

[2] more is meant than meets the ear Reference to The Faerie Queene and Spenser's allegorical method.

[3] civil-suited Morn … and frounced Soberly dressed, without showy clothes or hairstyle.

[4] Attic boy In classical myth, Aurora (Dawn) loved Cephalus, an Athenian (Attic) youth.

[5] Sylvan Sylvanus, Roman god of forests.

[6] cloister Covered walk; here, probably a university, not a monastic, cloister.

[7] storied windows Pictorial stained glass windows.

[8] spell Study, decipher.

Lycidas

In this monody[1] the author bewails a learned friend,[2] unfortunately drowned in his passage from Chester on the Irish Seas, 1637. And by occasion foretells the ruin of our corrupted clergy then in their height.[3]

Yet once more, O ye laurels, and once more
Ye myrtles brown, with ivy never sere,° withered
I come to pluck your berries harsh and crude,° unripe
And with forced fingers rude,
Shatter your leaves before the mellowing year.[4]
Bitter constraint, and sad occasion dear,
Compels me to disturb your season due:
For Lycidas[5] is dead, dead ere his prime,
Young Lycidas, and hath not left his peer:
Who would not sing for Lycidas? he knew
Himself to sing, and build the lofty rhyme.
He must not float upon his watery bier[6]
Unwept, and welter[7] to the parching wind,
Without the meed° of some melodious tear. honor
Begin then, sisters of the sacred well,[8]
That from beneath the seat of Jove[9] doth spring,
Begin, and somewhat loudly sweep the string.
Hence with denial vain, and coy excuse,
So may some gentle muse
With lucky words favour my destined urn,
And as he passes turn,
And bid fair peace be to my sable° shroud. black
For we were nursed upon the self-same hill,[10]
Fed the same flock; by fountain, shade, and rill.° brook
Together both, ere the high lawns[11] appeared
Under the opening eyelids of the morn,
We drove afield, and both together heard
What time the grey-fly winds[12] her sultry horn,
Battening° our flocks with the fresh dews[13] of night, feeding
Oft till the star that rose, at evening, bright
Toward heaven's descent had sloped his westering wheel.
Meanwhile the rural ditties were not mute,
Tempered° to the oaten flute, attuned
Rough satyrs[14] danced, and fauns with cloven heel,
From the glad sound would not be absent long,
And old Damoetas[15] loved to hear our song.
But O the heavy change, now thou art gone,
Now thou art gone, and never must return!
Thee shepherd, thee the woods, and desert caves,
With wild thyme and the gadding° vine o'ergrown, rambling
And all their echoes mourn.
The willows, and the hazel copses green,
Shall now no more be seen,
Fanning their joyous leaves to thy soft lays.° songs
As killing as the canker[16] to the rose,

---

[1] monody Lament sung by one voice.

[2] friend Edward King (1612–37), a fellow student of Milton's at Cambridge.

[3] In this … height Milton added this headnote to the version in his Poems (1645), published when the success of Parliament in the Civil Wars made it possible to publish a comment about the "corrupted clergy." When the poem was first published, in a 1638 collection of poems dedicated to the memory of Edward King, English bishops, under the leadership of Archbishop William Laud, were indeed at the "height" of their power.

[4] laurels … mellowing year The three evergreens mentioned here were emblems of poetic achievement: laurel was sacred to Apollo, so a laurel wreath was the traditional crown of poets; myrtle was sacred to Venus, and so was an emblem of love poetry; ivy was linked with Bacchus, god of wine, and so was associated with poetic ecstasy or inspiration. By saying that he needs to pluck these berries before they are ripe, the speaker implies that he thinks himself unready to write the poetry these plants honored.

[5] Lycidas Traditional name in classical and Renaissance pastoral literature.

[6] bier Framework or stand on which a corpse or coffin is placed.

[7] welter Roll or tumble about.

[8] sisters of the sacred well The nine Muses; their well is the emblematic source of artistic inspiration.

[9] seat of Jove Probably Mt. Olympus, from beneath which one of the muses' sacred springs flowed; possibly Mt. Helicon, the site of another sacred spring.

[10] nursed upon the self-same hill Milton uses pastoral conventions to indicate that he and "Lycidas" went to the same school.

[11] lawns Open spaces between woods, glades.

[12] winds Blows its horn (that is, buzzes).

[13] dews Grasses still covered in dew.

[14] satyrs Part human, part animal creatures associated with lechery and wildness; when translated from the pastoral fiction, these are Milton's fellow undergraduates at Cambridge.

[15] Damoetas Conventional pastoral name, and here a teacher or mentor figure, possibly alluding to a real tutor at Cambridge.

[16] canker Fungal disease of plants.

Or taint-worm to the weanling herds[1] that graze,
Or frost to flowers, that their gay wardrobe wear,
When first the whitethorn blows;° blooms
Such, Lycidas, thy loss to shepherd's ear.
Where were ye nymphs when the remorseless deep
Closed o'er the head of your loved Lycidas?
For neither were ye playing on the steep,° mountain
Where your old bards, the famous Druids[2] lie,
Nor on the shaggy top of Mona high,
Nor yet where Deva spreads her wizard stream:
Ay me, I fondly° dream! foolishly
Had ye been there—for what could that have done?
What could the Muse herself that Orpheus bore,
The Muse herself, for her enchanting son
Whom universal nature did lament,
When by the rout that made the hideous roar,
His gory visage down the stream was sent,
Down the swift Hebrus to the Lesbian shore.[3]
Alas! What boots° it with uncessant care profits
To tend the homely° slighted[4] shepherd's trade, humble
And strictly meditate the thankless Muse,
Were it not better done as others use,
To sport with Amaryllis in the shade,
Or with the tangles of Neaera's[5] hair?
Fame is the spur that the clear spirit doth raise
(That last infirmity of noble mind)
To scorn delights, and live laborious days;
But the fair guerdon° when we hope to find, reward
And think to burst out into sudden blaze,
Comes the blind Fury[6] with th' abhorrèd shears,
And slits the thin-spun life. But not the praise,
Phoebus[7] replied, and touched my trembling ears;
Fame is no plant that grows on mortal soil,
Nor in the glistering foil
Set off to the world, nor in broad rumour lies,
But lives and spreads aloft by those pure eyes,
And perfect witness of all-judging Jove;
As he pronounces lastly on each deed,
Of so much fame in heaven expect thy meed.° reward
O fountain Arethuse,[8] and thou honoured flood,
Smooth-sliding Mincius[9] crowned with vocal reeds,
That strain° I heard was of a higher mood: melody
But now my oat[10] proceeds,
And listens to the herald of the sea° Triton
That came in Neptune's plea,
He asked the waves, and asked the felon winds,
What hard mishap hath doomed this gentle swain?
And questioned every gust of rugged wings[11]
That blows from off each beakèd° promontory; pointed
They knew not of his story,
And sage Hippotades[12] their answer brings,
That not a blast was from his dungeon strayed,
The air was calm, and on the level brine,
Sleek Panope[13] with all her sisters played.
It was that fatal and perfidious bark° ship
Built in th' eclipse, and rigged with curses dark,
That sunk so low that sacred head of thine.
Next Camus,[14] reverend sire, went footing slow,

[1] taint-worn ... herds Intestinal parasite afflicting lambs or calves (weanlings).

[2] Druids The speaker asks if the sea nymphs failed to save the King because they were playing in places associated with the Druids, ancient Celtic minstrel-poets or, here, "bards": Bardsey (the "steep" island where they "lie" buried), the island of Mona (Anglesey), and the river Dee (here, Latinized as "Deva") in Chester.

[3] What could the Muse ... shore Orpheus was the greatest musician/poet in the classical tradition; his mother was the Muse Calliope. He met his death at the hands of Maenads, a group of women in an ecstatic frenzy. Orpheus's severed bleeding head ("gory visage") floated down the Hebrus river across the sea and to the island of Lesbos, where the Muses buried it.

[4] slighted Treated with disrespect.

[5] Amaryllis ... Neaera Conventional names in pastoral poetry for young women.

[6] Fury In classical myth, the three Fates respectively spun the thread of life, measured it, and then cut it; the Fate with the cutting shears was named Atropos, or Destiny. The speaker compares her to one of the Furies, another group of mythological sisters, who were snaky-haired agents of vengeance.

[7] Phoebus Apollo, god of poetry.

[8] Arethuse Fountain on an island near Sicily, associated with pastoral poetry; named for the nymph Arethusa, who was transformed into the fountain while being chased by the river god Alpheus (see below, line 132).

[9] Mincius River in Mantua, where the Roman poet Virgil was born.

[10] oat Oaten flute (of l. 33); metaphorically, the speaker's song (poem).

[11] wings Winds, imagined as birdlike.

[12] Hippotades Aeolus, the classical keeper of winds.

[13] Panope The chief nymph of fifty sea-nymph sisters, the Nereids.

[14] Camus Personification of the River Cam, in Cambridge.

His mantle hairy, and his bonnet sedge,[1]
Inwrought with figures dim, and on the edge
Like to that sanguine flower inscribed with woe.[2]
Ah! who hath reft (quoth he) my dearest pledge?[3]
Last came, and last did go,
The pilot of the Galilean lake,[4]
Two massy keys he bore of metals twain
(The golden opes, the iron shuts amain°), forcefully
He shook his mitred locks,[5] and stern bespake,
How well could I have spared for thee, young swain,
Enow° of such as for their bellies' sake, enough
Creep and intrude, and climb into the fold?° sheepfold
Of other care they little reckoning make,
Than how to scramble at the shearers' feast,
And shove away the worthy bidden guest.
Blind mouths! that scarce themselves know how to hold
A sheep-hook, or have learned aught else the least
That to the faithful herdman's art belongs!
What recks it them?[6] What need they? They are sped;[7]
And when they list,[8] their lean and flashy songs
Grate on their scrannel[9] pipes of wretched straw,
The hungry sheep look up, and are not fed,
But swoll'n with wind, and the rank mist they draw,° breathe
Rot inwardly, and foul contagion spread:
Besides what the grim wolf[10] with privy paw[11]
Daily devours apace, and nothing said,[12]
But that two-handed engine[13] at the door,
Stands ready to smite once, and smite no more.
Return Alpheus,[14] the dread voice is past,
That shrunk thy streams; return Sicilian Muse,[15]
And call the vales, and bid them hither cast
Their bells, and flowrets of a thousand hues.
Ye valleys low where the mild whispers use,° frequent
Of shades and wanton winds, and gushing brooks,
On whose fresh lap the swart star[16] sparely looks,
Throw hither all your quaint enamelled eyes,
That on the green turf suck the honied showers,
And purple all the ground with vernal° flowers. spring
Bring the rathe° primrose that forsaken dies, early blooming
The tufted crow-toe, and pale jessamine,
The white pink, and the pansy freaked° with jet, streaked
The glowing violet,
The musk-rose, and the well-attired woodbine,
With cowslips wan that hang the pensive head,
And every flower that sad embroidery wears:
Bid amaranthus all his beauty shed,
And daffodillies fill their cups with tears,
To strew the laureate[17] hearse where Lycid lies.

---

[1] His mantle … sedge His cloak was coarsely woven, and his hat was woven of reeds.

[2] sanguine flower … woe The hyacinth. In classical myth, it sprang from the blood of Hyacinthus, a youth beloved of Apollo; the god recorded his grief by marking the flower with the letters AI AI ("alas").

[3] who hath … pledge? Who has stolen Camus's dearest initiate?

[4] pilot of the Galilean lake Usually identified as St. Peter, speaking as the founder of the Christian Church; he mourns the loss of a young man who had intended to enter the ministry. He holds the keys of the kingdom of Heaven (from Matthew 16.19). The pilot is sometimes identified as Christ. But as a (ship) pilot on Galilee, Peter would here appear to be paired with Christ, mentioned in line 173 below as "Him that walked the waves."

[5] mitred locks Peter, the first bishop, wears the bishop's miter (a tall, cleft headdress), and shakes his head.

[6] What recks it them What do they care?

[7] They are sped They have done well.

[8] when they list When they choose, or please.

[9] scrannel Shriveled, thin; an unusual word, probably provincial dialect, apparently chosen for its appropriately ugly sound.

[10] wolf Usually identified as an allusion to the threat posed by Catholicism.

[11] with privy paw With secret or hidden steps; possibly also an allusion to the Privy Council, and implying that the government under Charles I was helping the Church push a Catholic agenda.

[12] nothing said In the manuscript version of this poem, Milton originally wrote "nothing" but then crossed it out and wrote "little"; "nothing" appears in the 1645 edition.

[13] two-handed engine The specific reference here continues to be debated. Probably, in one respect, a sword: in Paradise Lost, the Archangel Michael wields a "huge two-handed" sword (6.251), which likely refers to the two-edged swords mentioned in Revelation 1.16 and Psalm 149.6. But as an emblem for divine agency or judgment, the "sword of God" can also be interpreted as manifesting itself in many different objects, institutions, or ideas (such as the two keys of line 110 above).

[14] Alpheus River in Greece, and the god of the river (see l. 85 above). The speaker invites the return of sources that inspire the pastoral mode.

[15] Sicilian Muse Probably Arethusa (see l. 85 above). Sicily was associated with the pastoral mode: the poet Theocritus (fl. 280 BCE), the creator of pastoral poetry, was Sicilian.

[16] swart star Sirius, the Dog Star, associated with the hottest weeks of the year.

[17] laureate Decorated with laurel (see line 1).

For so to interpose a little ease,
Let our frail thoughts dally with false surmise
(Ay me!) Whilst thee the shores, and sounding seas
Wash far away, where'er thy bones are hurled,
Whether beyond the stormy Hebrides
Where thou perhaps under the whelming tide
Visit'st the bottom of the monstrous world;
Or whether thou to our moist vows denied,
Sleep'st by the fable of Bellerus[1] old,
Where the great vision of the guarded mount[2]
Looks toward Namancos and Bayona's hold;° fortress
Look homeward angel now, and melt with ruth.° pity
And, O ye dolphins, waft the hapless youth.
Weep no more, woeful shepherds weep no more,
For Lycidas your sorrow is not dead,
Sunk though he be beneath the watery floor,
So sinks the day-star° in the ocean bed, the sun
And yet anon° repairs his drooping head, soon
And tricks his beams, and with new spangled ore,[3]
Flames in the forehead of the morning sky:
So Lycidas sunk low, but mounted high,
Through the dear might of him[4] that walked the waves,
Where other groves, and other streams along,
With nectar pure his oozy locks he laves,° washes
And hears the unexpressive° nuptial song, inexpressive
In the blest kingdoms meek° of joy and love. gentle
There entertain him all the saints above,
In solemn troops, and sweet societies
That sing, and singing in their glory move,
And wipe the tears for ever from his eyes.
Now Lycidas the shepherds weep no more;
Henceforth thou art the genius° of the shore, guardian spirit
In thy large recompense, and shalt be good
To all that wander in that perilous flood.
Thus sang the uncouth° swain to th' oaks and rills, unknown
While the still morn went out with sandals grey,
He touched the tender stops of various quills,° reeds (flutes)
With eager thought warbling his Doric[5] lay:
And now the sun had stretched out all the hills,
And now was dropped into the western bay;
At last he rose, and twitched° his mantle blue:[6] tossed on
Tomorrow to fresh woods, and pastures new.[7]

Sonnets

How soon hath Time the subtle thief of youth,
Stol'n on his wing my three and twenti'th year!
My hasting days fly on with full career,
But my late spring no bud or blossom shew'th.° shows
Perhaps my semblance might deceive the truth,
That I to manhood am arriv'd so near,
And inward ripeness doth much less appear,
That some more timely-happy spirits endu'th.° endows
Yet be it less or more, or soon or slow,
It shall be still° in strictest measure ev'n, always
To that same lot, however mean, or high,
Toward which Time leads me, and the will of Heav'n;
All is, if I have grace to use it so,
As ever in my great task-master's eye.

[1] Bellerus Milton apparently invents the name from Bellarium, the Latin name for Land's End in Cornwall, the south-west tip of England.

[2] guarded mount St. Michael's Mount in Cornwall, from which the Archangel was traditionally said to guard England; here, Michael looks out toward two places in Spain, but is asked to look "homeward" in pity for Lycidas.

[3] tricks his beams … ore The sun adorns its beams with fresh gold.

[4] him Christ (Matthew 14.25–31).

[5] Doric Musical mode.

[6] blue Color traditionally associated with hope.

[7] Thus sang … new The final eight lines, rhyming ABABABCC, reflect the form of an ottava rima stanza, one pattern associated with epic narrative poetry.

TO THE LORD GENERAL CROMWELL[2]

Cromwell, our chief of men, who through a cloud
Not of war only, but detractions rude,
Guided by faith and matchless fortitude,
To peace and truth thy glorious way hast ploughed,
And on the neck of crowned Fortune proud
Hast reared God's trophies, and his work pursued,
While Darwen stream[3] with blood of Scots
imbrued,° permeated
And Dunbar field[4] resounds thy praises loud,
And Worcester's[5] laureate wreath; yet much remains
To conquer still: peace hath her victories
No less renown'd than war. New foes arise
Threat'ning to bind our souls with secular chains:[6]
Help us to save free conscience from the paw
Of hireling[7] wolves whose Gospel is their maw.

ON THE LATE MASSACRE IN PIEDMONT[9]

Avenge O Lord thy slaughtered saints,[10] whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold,
Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old
When all our fathers worshipped stocks and stones,
Forget not: in thy book record their groans
Who were thy sheep and in their ancient fold
Slain by the bloody Piedmontese that rolled
Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
The vales redoubled to the hills, and they
To Heaven. Their martyred blood and ashes sow
O'er all the Italian fields where still doth sway
The triple tyrant:[11] that from these may grow
A hundredfold, who having learnt thy way
Early may fly the Babylonian[12] woe.

When I consider how my light is spent,
Ere half my days,[14] in this dark world and wide,
And that one talent[15] which is death to hide,
Lodged with me useless, though my soul more bent

---

[1] 16 Not published in Milton's lifetime. It is numbered sonnet 16 in Milton's manuscript version, though some modern editions give the number 16 to "When I consider how my light is spent" (Sonnet 19 here). The manuscript dates the poem May 1652, and has a scratched-out subtitle: "On the proposals of certain ministers at the Committee for Propagation of the Gospel."

[2] To the Lord General Cromwell Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658), at the time Commander-in-Chief of the Parliamentary Army, and subsequently Lord Protector.

[3] Darwen stream The river near Preston, where Cromwell defeated a Scottish army in August 1648.

[4] Dunbar field Where Cromwell routed the Scottish army in September 1650.

[5] Worcester Where Cromwell in 1651 defeated the Royalist Army of Charles II, who was crowned in Scotland when in exile after the death of his father.

[6] To conquer … secular chains Referring to the proposals mentioned in the poem's manuscript subtitle (see note above) that sought to reinstall a state-controlled church.

[7] hireling Milton disapproved of compulsory tithes, believing that congregations should be able to hire ministers of their own choosing: to him, ministers in a state church are hired state employees.

[8] 18 Some modern editions number this sonnet 15, the number assigned it in the 1673 edition of Milton's Poems.

[9] Massacre in Piedmont In April 1655, a Catholic army under the command of the Duke of Savoy began a persecution of the Vaudois or Waldensians, a Protestant sect that lived in the mountainous Piedmont region of Italy, near the Swiss border. The Waldensians had broken away from the Catholic Church in the twelfth century. But seventeenth-century Protestants thought they represented a much older tradition, and regarded them as having retained the beliefs of the primitive Church.

[10] saints The term "saint" can refer not only to a martyr or one who has been canonized, but also to any believer in Christ. See, e.g., 1 Corinthians 1.2, 2 Corinthians 1.1, and Romans 1.7.

[11] triple tyrant The Pope, from the three-crowned papal miter or headdress.

[12] Babylonian Protestants of Milton's time often used Babylon as a metaphor for the excesses of the papal court.

[13] 19 Numbered sonnet 16 in some modern editions. The title "On his blindness" was added in the eighteenth century, and appears in some modern editions.

[14] half my days The source of much debate on the date of this poem: Milton was born in December 1608, and it is not clear by what standard he judges the normal length of a life. He was totally blind by early 1652.

[15] talent Alluding to the parable of the talents in Matthew 25.14-30.

To serve therewith my maker, and present
My true account, lest he returning chide,
Doth God exact day-labour, light denied,
I fondly° ask; but patience to prevent foolishly
That murmur, soon replies, God doth not need
Either man's work or his own gifts, who best
Bear his mild yoke, they serve him best; his state
Is kingly. Thousands[1] at his bidding speed
And post° o'er land and ocean without rest: ride
They also serve who only stand and wait.
—1673 (PROBABLY WRITTEN 1652)

23[2]

Methought I saw my late espoused saint[3]
Brought to me, like Alcestis,[4] from the grave,
Whom Jove's great son to her glad husband gave,
Rescued from death by force, though pale and faint.
Mine, as whom washed from spot of child-bed taint
Purification in the old Law[5] did save,
And such as yet once more I trust to have Full sight of her in Heaven without restraint,
Came vested all in white, pure as her mind;
Her face was veiled,[6] yet to my fancied sight
Love, sweetness, goodness in her person shined
So clear as in no face with more delight.
But O as to embrace me she inclined,
I waked, she fled, and day brought back my night.

from Areopagitica: A Speech of Mr. John Milton for the Liberty of Unlicensed Printing, to the Parliament of England[7]

They who to states and governors of the Commonwealth direct their speech, High Court of Parliament, or, wanting such access in a private condition, write that which they foresee may advance the public good; I suppose them, as at the beginning of no mean endeavour, not a little altered and moved inwardly in their minds: some with doubt of what will be the success, others with fear of what will be the censure; some with hope, others with confidence of what they have to speak. And me perhaps each of these dispositions, as the subject was whereon I entered, may have at other times variously affected; and likely might in these foremost expressions now also disclose which of them swayed most, but that the very attempt of this address thus made, and the thought of whom it hath recourse to, hath got the power within me to a passion, far more welcome than incidental to a preface....

If ye be thus resolved, as it were injury to think ye were not, I know not what should withhold me from presenting ye with a fit instance wherein to show both that love of truth which ye eminently profess, and that uprightness of your judgment which is not wont to be partial to yourselves; by judging over again that Order which ye have ordained to regulate printing: that no book, pamphlet, or paper shall be henceforth printed, unless the same be first approved and licensed by such, or at least one of such, as shall thereto be appointed. For that part which preserves justly every man's copy to himself, or provides for the poor, I touch not, only wish they be not made pretences to abuse and persecute honest and painful men, who offend not in either of these particulars. But that other clause of licensing books, which we thought had died with his brother quadragesimal and matrimonial[1] when the prelates expired, I shall now attend with such a homily, as shall lay before ye, first the inventors of it to be those whom ye will be loath to own; next what is to be thought in general of reading, whatever sort the books be; and that this Order avails nothing to the suppressing of scandalous, seditious, and libellous books, which were mainly intended to be suppressed. Last, that it will be primely to the discouragement of all learning, and the stop of Truth, not only by disexercising and blunting our abilities in what we know already, but by hindering and cropping the discovery that might be yet further made both in religious and civil wisdom.

[2] 23 Numbered sonnet 19 in some modern editions.

[3] late espoused saint Milton's first wife, Mary Powell, died in May 1652, shortly after giving birth to their daughter Deborah. His second wife, Katherine Woodcock, died in February 1658, several months after giving birth to their daughter Katherine. Most scholars believe that the poem refers to Katherine, though arguments have been made for Mary as its subject.

[4] Alcestis In classical myth, Alcestis sacrificed her life to save her husband, Admetus; Hercules, the son of Jove, repays Admetus's hospitality to him by forcing Death (in a wrestling match) to return her alive. The story is told in the play Alcestis by Euripedes.

[5] Purification in the old Law Referring to the rites of purification after childbirth detailed in Leviticus 12 (the old Law of the Old Testament, as opposed to the new Law of the New Testament).

[6] veiled Like Alcestis, when she returned; but also from the reader.

[7] Areopagitica ... England Milton's title invokes the Areopagite Discourse (c. 355 BCE) by the Greek orator Isocrates, who advocated a return to the days when the Athenian court of the Areopagus (a kind of Supreme Court) was a model of virtue, wisdom, and responsibility. Milton might also expect his readers to remember that Saint Paul delivered an oration on the Areopagus, the hill outside Athens that gave its name to the court that met there (Acts 17.19-34). Milton's text is in the form of an oration to Parliament, the entity the speaker addresses throughout. His motive for writing was a Parliamentary order (June 1643) that banned the publication of any book that had not been licensed before publication: what Milton attacks here is pre-publication censorship, not censorship in general (he does not argue for complete freedom of the press). Milton's main strategy is to embarrass Parliament by linking their attempt to control the press to the similar powers wielded by the monarchical government they were battling to overthrow.

I deny not, but that it is of greatest concernment in the Church and Commonwealth to have a vigilant eye how books demean themselves as well as men; and thereafter to confine, imprison, and do sharpest justice on them as malefactors. For books are not absolutely dead things, but do contain a potency of life in them to be as active as that soul was whose progeny they are; nay, they do preserve as in a vial the purest efficacy and extraction of that living intellect that bred them. I know they are as lively, and as vigorously productive, as those fabulous dragon's teeth;[2] and being sown up and down, may chance to spring up armed men. And yet, on the other hand, unless wariness be used, as good almost kill a man as kill a good book. Who kills a man kills a reasonable creature, God's image; but he who destroys a good book, kills reason itself, kills the image of God, as it were in the eye. Many a man lives a burden to the earth; but a good book is the precious life-blood of a master spirit, embalmed and treasured up on purpose to a life beyond life. 'Tis true, no age can restore a life, whereof perhaps there is no great loss; and revolutions of ages do not oft recover the loss of a rejected truth, for the want of which whole nations fare the worse.

We should be wary therefore what persecutions we raise against the living labours of public men, how we spill that seasoned life of man, preserved and stored up in books; since we see a kind of homicide may be thus committed, sometimes a martyrdom, and if it extend to the whole impression, a kind of massacre; whereof the execution ends not in the slaying of an elemental life, but strikes at that ethereal and fifth essence, the breath of reason itself, slays an immortality rather than a life....

Good and evil we know in the field of this world grow up together almost inseparably; and the knowledge of good is so involved and interwoven with the knowledge of evil, and in so many cunning resemblances hardly to be discerned, that those confused seeds which were imposed upon Psyche[3] as an incessant labour to cull out, and sort asunder, were not more intermixed. It was from out the rind of one apple tasted, that the knowledge of good and evil, as two twins cleaving together, leaped forth into the world. And perhaps this is that doom which Adam fell into of knowing good and evil, that is to say of knowing good by evil. As therefore the state of man now is; what wisdom can there be to choose, what continence to forbear without the knowledge of evil? He that can apprehend and consider vice with all her baits and seeming pleasures, and yet abstain, and yet distinguish, and yet prefer that which is truly better, he is the true wayfaring Christian.

I cannot praise a fugitive and cloistered virtue, unexercised and unbreathed, that never sallies out and sees her adversary, but slinks out of the race, where that immortal garland is to be run for, not without dust and heat. Assuredly we bring not innocence into the world, we bring impurity much rather; that which purifies us is trial, and trial is by what is contrary. That virtue therefore which is but a youngling in the contemplation of evil, and knows not the utmost that vice promises to her followers, and rejects it, is but a blank virtue, not a pure; her whiteness is but an excremental[1] whiteness. Which was the reason why our sage and serious poet Spenser, whom I dare be known to think a better teacher than Scotus or Aquinas, describing true temperance under the person of Guyon, brings him in with his Palmer through the cave of Mammon, and the bower of earthly bliss, that he might see and know, and yet abstain.[2] Since therefore the knowledge and survey of vice is in this world so necessary to the constituting of human virtue, and the scanning of error to the confirmation of truth, how can we more safely, and with less danger, scout into the regions of sin and falsity than by reading all manner of tractates and hearing all manner of reason? And this is the benefit which may be had of books promiscuously read. . . .

[1] quadragesimal and matrimonial Referring to powers formerly held by bishops to award dispensations, here specifically those governing dietary restrictions in Lent ("quadragesimal" refers to Lent's forty days) and marriage licenses. Milton's point, a recurring one, is that with this new order, Parliament was giving itself the kind of controlling powers it had abolished when it abolished episcopacy.

[2] dragon's teeth In Greek mythology, the teeth of a dragon slain by the hero Cadmus bred armed men when sown in the ground.

[3] Psyche Apuleius (born 125 CE) tells the story of Cupid and Psyche in The Golden Ass; Psyche's impossible task was set her by her mother-in-law, Venus.

If we think to regulate printing, thereby to rectify manners, we must regulate all recreations and pastimes, all that is delightful to man. No music must be heard, no song be set or sung, but what is grave and Doric.[3] There must be licensing dancers, that no gesture, motion, or deportment be taught our youth but what by their allowance shall be thought honest; for such Plato was provided of; it will ask more than the work of twenty licensers to examine all the lutes, the violins, and the guitars in every house; they must not be suffered to prattle as they do, but must be licensed what they may say. And who shall silence all the airs and madrigals that whisper softness in chambers? The windows also, and the balconies must be thought on; there are shrewd books, with dangerous frontispieces, set to sale; who shall prohibit them, shall twenty licensers? The villages also must have their visitors to inquire what lectures the bagpipe and the rebeck[4] reads, even to the ballatry and the gamut of every municipal fiddler, for these are the countryman's Arcadias, and his Montemayors.[5]

Next, what more national corruption, for which England hears ill abroad, than household gluttony: who shall be the rectors of our daily rioting? And what shall be done to inhibit the multitudes that frequent those houses where drunkenness is sold and harboured? Our garments also should be referred to the licensing of some more sober workmasters to see them cut into a less wanton garb. Who shall regulate all the mixed conversation of our youth, male and female together, as is the fashion of this country? Who shall still appoint what shall be discoursed, what presumed, and no further? Lastly, who shall forbid and separate all idle resort, all evil company? These things will be, and must be; but how they shall be least hurtful, how least enticing, herein consists the grave and governing wisdom of a state.

To sequester out of the world into Atlantic and Utopian polities which never can be drawn into use will not mend our condition; but to ordain wisely as in this world of evil, in the midst whereof God hath placed us unavoidably. Nor is it Plato's licensing of books will do this, which necessarily pulls along with it so many other kinds of licensing, as will make us all both ridiculous and weary, and yet frustrate; but those unwritten, or at least unconstraining, laws of virtuous education, religious and civil nurture, which Plato there mentions as the bonds and ligaments of the commonwealth, the pillars and the sustainers of every written statute; these they be which will bear chief sway in such matters as these, when all licensing will be easily eluded. Impunity and remissness, for certain, are the bane of a commonwealth; but here the great art lies, to discern in what the law is to bid restraint and punishment, and in what things persuasion only is to work.

If every action which is good or evil in man at ripe years were to be under pittance and prescription and compulsion, what were virtue but a name, what praise could be then due to well-doing, what gramercy to be sober, just, or continent? Many there be that complain of Divine Providence for suffering Adam to transgress; foolish tongues! When God gave him reason, he gave him freedom to choose, for reason is but choosing; he had been else a mere artificial Adam, such an Adam as he is in the motions. We ourselves esteem not of that obedience, or love, or gift, which is of force: God therefore left him free, set before him a provoking object, ever almost in his eyes; herein consisted his merit, herein the right of his reward, the praise of his abstinence. Wherefore did he create passions within us, pleasures round about us, but that these rightly tempered are the very ingredients of virtue? …

[1] excremental Superficial.

[2] Which was the reason ... yet abstain Milton here famously misremembers The Faerie Queene. Guyon, the Knight of Temperance in Book 2, does resist the temptation offered by the Bower of Bliss (2.12.42ff.) with the aid of the Palmer (a pilgrim who has been to the Holy Land, and in Spenser a figure for the reason that restrains passion). But Guyon's settled habits of temperance allow him to withstand the temptations of Mammon's cave on his own (2.7.2, 2.8.3).

[3] Doric One of the "modes" of ancient music; in his Republic, Plato (cited later in the paragraph) used "Doric" to describe poetry that was manly and dignified.

[4] bagpipe and the rebeck Viewed as rustic instruments; a rebeck is a three-stringed fiddle.

[5] the countryman's Arcadias, and his Montemayors That is, popular music is the rural equivalent to sophisticated prose romances, such as Sir Philip Sidney's Arcadia (1590) and Jorge de Montemayor's Diana (c. 1559).

And lest some should persuade ye, Lords and Commons, that these arguments of learned men's discouragement at this your Order are mere flourishes, and not real, I could recount what I have seen and heard in other countries, where this kind of inquisition tyrannizes; when I have sat among their learned men, for that honour I had, and been counted happy to be born in such a place of philosophic freedom, as they supposed England was, while themselves did nothing but bemoan the servile condition into which learning amongst them was brought; that this was it which had damped the glory of Italian wits; that nothing had been there written now these many years but flattery and fustian. There it was that I found and visited the famous Galileo,[1] grown old a prisoner to the Inquisition, for thinking in astronomy otherwise than the Franciscan and Dominican licensers thought.

And though I knew that England then was groaning loudest under the prelatical yoke, nevertheless I took it as a pledge of future happiness, that other nations were so persuaded of her liberty. Yet was it beyond my hope that those worthies were then breathing in her air, who should be her leaders to such a deliverance, as shall never be forgotten by any revolution of time that this world hath to finish. When that was once begun, it was as little in my fear that, what words of complaint I heard among learned men of other parts uttered against the Inquisition, the same I should hear by as learned men at home uttered in time of Parliament against an order of licensing; and that so generally that, when I had disclosed myself a companion of their discontent, I might say, if without envy, that he whom an honest quaestorship had endeared to the Sicilians was not more by them importuned against Verres,[2] than the favourable opinion which I had among many who honour ye, and are known and respected by ye, loaded me with entreaties and persuasions, that I would not despair to lay together that which just reason should bring into my mind, toward the removal of an undeserved thraldom upon learning. That this is not therefore the disburdening of a particular fancy, but the common grievance of all those who had prepared their minds and studies above the vulgar pitch to advance truth in others, and from others to entertain it, thus much may satisfy. …

Truth indeed came once into the world with her Divine Master, and was a perfect shape most glorious to look on: but when He ascended, and His Apostles after Him were laid asleep, then straight arose a wicked race of deceivers, who, as that story goes of the Egyptian Typhon with his conspirators, how they dealt with the good Osiris,[3] took the virgin Truth, hewed her lovely form into a thousand pieces, and scattered them to the four winds. From that time ever since, the sad friends of Truth, such as durst appear, imitating the careful search that Isis made for the mangled body of Osiris, went up and down gathering up limb by limb, still as they could find them. We have not yet found them all, Lords and Commons, nor ever shall do, till her Master's second coming; He shall bring together every joint and member, and shall mold them into an immortal feature of loveliness and perfection. Suffer not these licensing prohibitions to stand at every place of opportunity, forbidding and disturbing them that continue seeking, that continue to do our obsequies to the torn body of our martyred saint.

We boast our light; but if we look not wisely on the Sun itself, it smites us into darkness. Who can discern those planets that are oft combust, and those stars of brightest magnitude that rise and set with the Sun, until the opposite motion of their orbs bring them to such a place in the firmament, where they may be seen evening or morning? The light which we have gained was given us, not to be ever staring on, but by it to discover onward things more remote from our knowledge. It is not the unfrocking of a priest, the unmitring of a bishop, and the removing him from off the Presbyterian shoulders, that will make us a happy nation. No, if other things as great in the Church, and in the rule of life both economical and political, be not looked into and reformed, we have looked so long upon the blaze that Zwinglius and Calvin[1] hath beaconed up to us, that we are stark blind. There be who perpetually complain of schisms and sects, and make it such a calamity that any man dissents from their maxims. 'Tis their own pride and ignorance which causes the disturbing, who neither will hear with meekness, nor can convince; yet all must be suppressed which is not found in their syntagma.[2] They are the troublers, they are the dividers of unity, who neglect and permit not others to unite those dissevered pieces which are yet wanting to the body of Truth. To be still searching what we know not by what we know, still closing up truth to truth as we find it (for all her body is homogeneal and proportional), this is the golden rule in theology as well as in arithmetic, and makes up the best harmony in a Church; not the forced and outward union of cold and neutral, and inwardly divided minds.

[1] There it was … Galileo Milton visited Italy in 1638-39; there seems no reason to doubt his claim to have visited Galileo, who is the only contemporary Milton names in Paradise Lost (5.262). Galileo at the time was under house arrest for having published his Dialogue Concerning the Two Chief World Systems.

[2] he … Verres Cicero (106-43 BCE), whose forensic oratory drove the corrupt Gaius Verres from office.

[3] Typhon … Osiris Milton's source for this allegory about the search for the divided body of truth is likely Plutarch's essay "On Isis and Osiris." Typhon (the Egyptian god Set) tore up and scattered the body of Osiris; Isis, Osiris's sister, collected the pieces and put them back together.

Lords and Commons of England, consider what nation it is whereof ye are, and whereof ye are the governors: a nation not slow and dull, but of a quick, ingenious and piercing spirit, acute to invent, subtle and sinewy to discourse, not beneath the reach of any point, the highest that human capacity can soar to. Therefore the studies of Learning in her deepest sciences have been so ancient and so eminent among us, that writers of good antiquity and ablest judgment have been persuaded that even the school of Pythagoras and the Persian wisdom took beginning from the old philosophy of this island. And that wise and civil Roman, Julius Agricola, who governed once here for Caesar, preferred the natural wits of Britain before the laboured studies of the French.[3] Nor is it for nothing that the grave and frugal Transylvanian sends out yearly from as far as the mountainous borders of Russia, and beyond the Hercynian wilderness, not their youth, but their staid men, to learn our language and our theologic arts.[4]

Yet that which is above all this, the favour and the love of Heaven, we have great argument to think in a peculiar manner propitious and propending towards us. Why else was this nation chosen before any other, that out of her, as out of Sion, should be proclaimed and sounded forth the first tidings and trumpet of Reformation to all Europe? And had it not been the obstinate perverseness of our prelates against the divine and admirable spirit of Wycliffe,[5] to suppress him as a schismatic and innovator, perhaps neither the Bohemian Huss and Jerome,[6] no nor the name of Luther or of Calvin, had been ever known: the glory of reforming all our neighbours had been completely ours. But now, as our obdurate clergy have with violence demeaned the matter, we are become hitherto the latest and backwardest scholars, of whom God offered to have made us the teachers. Now once again by all concurrence of signs, and by the general instinct of holy and devout men, as they daily and solemnly express their thoughts, God is decreeing to begin some new and great period in his Church, even to the reforming of Reformation itself: what does He then but reveal himself to His servants, and as His manner is, first to his Englishmen? I say, as his manner is, first to us, though we mark not the method of His counsels, and are unworthy.

Behold now this vast city: a city of refuge, the mansion house of liberty, encompassed and surrounded with His protection; the shop of war hath not there more anvils and hammers waking, to fashion out the plates and instruments of armed Justice in defence of beleaguered Truth, than there be pens and heads there, sitting by their studious lamps, musing, searching, revolving new notions and ideas wherewith to present, as with their homage and their fealty, the approaching Reformation: others as fast reading, trying all things, assenting to the force of reason and convincement. What could a man require more from a nation so pliant and so prone to seek after knowledge? What wants there to such a towardly and pregnant soil but wise and faithful labourers, to make a knowing people, a nation of prophets, of sages, and of worthies? We reckon more than five months yet to harvest; there need not be five weeks; had we but eyes to lift up, the fields are white already.[1]

[1] Zwinglius and Calvin Ulrich Zwingli (1484–1531) and John Calvin (1509–64), two leading figures of the Protestant Reformation.

[2] syntagma Systematic treatise or body of doctrine.

[3] And that wise … the French Citing a story that appears in the Roman historian Tacitus, Agricola, 21.

[4] Nor is it … theologic arts Many theologians from strongly Protestant Transylvania came to study during this period in Western European universities.

[5] Wycliffe John Wycliffe (c. 1324–84), an early Church reformer associated with the Lollard movement, often regarded as a proto-Protestant.

[6] Huss and Jerome John Huss (c. 1383–1415), founder of an influential reform movement in Bohemia, also often regarded as proto-Protestant; Jerome of Prague (d. 1416) was a disciple of both Wycliffe and Huss.

Where there is much desire to learn, there of necessity will be much arguing, much writing, many opinions; for opinion in good men is but knowledge in the making. Under these fantastic terrors of sect and schism, we wrong the earnest and zealous thirst after knowledge and understanding which God hath stirred up in this city. What some lament of, we rather should rejoice at, should rather praise this pious forwardness among men, to reassume the ill-reputed care of their Religion into their own hands again. A little generous prudence, a little forbearance of one another, and some grain of charity might win all these diligences to join, and unite in one general and brotherly search after Truth; could we but forgo this prelatical tradition of crowding free consciences and Christian liberties into canons and precepts of men. I doubt not, if some great and worthy stranger should come among us, wise to discern the mold and temper of a people, and how to govern it, observing the high hopes and aims, the diligent alacrity of our extended thoughts and reasonings, in the pursuance of truth and freedom, but that he would cry out as Pyrrhus did,[2] admiring the Roman docility and courage: If such were my Epirots, I would not despair the greatest design that could be attempted, to make a Church or Kingdom happy.

Yet these are the men cried out against for schismatics and sectaries; as if, while the temple of the Lord was building, some cutting, some squaring the marble, others hewing the cedars, there should be a sort of irrational men who could not consider there must be many schisms and many dissections made in the quarry and in the timber, ere the house of God can be built. And when every stone is laid artfully together, it cannot be united into a continuity, it can but be contiguous in this world; neither can every piece of the building be of one form; nay rather the perfection consists in this, that, out of many moderate varieties and brotherly dissimilitudes that are not vastly disproportional, arises the goodly and the graceful symmetry that commends the whole pile and structure.

Let us therefore be more considerate builders, more wise in spiritual architecture, when great reformation is expected. For now the time seems come, wherein Moses the great prophet may sit in heaven rejoicing to see that memorable and glorious wish of his fulfilled, when not only our seventy Elders, but all the Lord's people, are become prophets. No marvel then though some men, and some good men too perhaps, but young in goodness, as Joshua then was, envy them. They fret, and out of their own weakness are in agony, lest these divisions and subdivisions will undo us. The adversary again applauds, and waits the hour: When they have branched themselves out, saith he, small enough into parties and partitions, then will be our time. Fool! he sees not the firm root, out of which we all grow, though into branches: nor will beware until he see our small divided maniples[3] cutting through at every angle of his ill-united and unwieldy brigade. And that we are to hope better of all these supposed sects and schisms, and that we shall not need that solicitude, honest perhaps though overtimorous of them that vex in this behalf, but shall laugh in the end at those malicious applauders of our differences, I have these reasons to persuade me.

First, when a city shall be as it were besieged and blocked about, her navigable river infested, inroads and incursions round, defiance and battle oft rumoured to be marching up even to her walls and suburb trenches, that then the people, or the greater part, more than at other times, wholly taken up with the study of highest and most important matters to be reformed, should be disputing, reasoning, reading, inventing, discoursing, even to a rarity and admiration, things not before discoursed or written of, argues first a singular goodwill, contentedness and confidence in your prudent foresight and safe government, Lords and Commons; and from thence derives itself to a gallant bravery and well-grounded contempt of their enemies, as if there were no small number of as great spirits among us, as his was, who when Rome was nigh besieged by Hannibal, being in the city, bought that piece of ground at no cheap rate, whereon Hannibal himself encamped his own regiment.

[1] We reckon ... white already Milton here adapts John 4.35.

[2] Pyrrhus did Pyrrhus, King of Epirus (his people are the "Epirots" mentioned later in the paragraph) defeated a Roman army in 280 BCE.

[3] maniples Infantry companies in the Roman Army.

Next, it is a lively and cheerful presage of our happy success and victory. For as in a body, when the blood is fresh, the spirits pure and vigorous, not only to vital but to rational faculties, and those in the acutest and the pertest operations of wit and subtlety, it argues in what good plight and constitution the body is so when the cheerfulness of the people is so sprightly up, as that it has not only wherewith to guard well its own freedom and safety, but to spare, and to bestow upon the solidest and sublimest points of controversy and new invention, it betokens us not degenerated, nor drooping to a fatal decay, but casting off the old and wrinkled skin of corruption to outlive these pangs and wax young again, entering the glorious ways of truth and prosperous virtue, destined to become great and honourable in these latter ages. Methinks I see in my mind a noble and puissant nation rousing herself like a strong man after sleep, and shaking her invincible locks. Methinks I see her as an eagle mewing[1] her mighty youth, and kindling her undazzled eyes at the full midday beam; purging and unscaling her long-abused sight at the fountain itself of heavenly radiance; while the whole noise of timorous and flocking birds, with those also that love the twilight, flutter about, amazed at what she means, and in their envious gabble would prognosticate a year of sects and schisms.

What would ye do then? Should ye suppress all this flowery crop of knowledge and new light sprung up and yet springing daily in this city? should ye set an oligarchy of twenty engrossers[2] over it, to bring a famine upon our minds again, when we shall know nothing but what is measured to us by their bushel? Believe it, Lords and Commons, they who counsel ye to such a suppressing do as good as bid ye suppress yourselves; and I will soon show how. If it be desired to know the immediate cause of all this free writing and free speaking, there cannot be assigned a truer than your own mild and free and humane government. It is the liberty, Lords and Commons, which your own valorous and happy counsels have purchased us, liberty which is the nurse of all great wits; this is that which hath rarefied and enlightened our spirits like the influence of heaven; this is that which hath enfranchised, enlarged and lifted up our apprehensions degrees above themselves.

Ye cannot make us now less capable, less knowing, less eagerly pursuing of the truth, unless ye first make yourselves, that made us so, less the lovers, less the founders of our true liberty. We can grow ignorant again, brutish, formal and slavish, as ye found us; but you then must first become that which ye cannot be, oppressive, arbitrary and tyrannous, as they were from whom ye have freed us. That our hearts are now more capacious, our thoughts more erected to the search and expectation of greatest and exactest things, is the issue of your own virtue propagated in us; ye cannot suppress that, unless ye reinforce an abrogated and merciless law, that fathers may dispatch at will their own children. And who shall then stick closest to ye, and excite others? not he who takes up arms for coat and conduct and his four nobles of Danegelt.[3] Although I dispraise not the defence of just immunities, yet love my peace better, if that were all. Give me the liberty to know, to utter, and to argue freely according to conscience, above all liberties. …

For who knows not that Truth is strong, next to the Almighty? She needs no policies, nor stratagems, nor licensings to make her victorious; those are the shifts and the defences that error uses against her power. Give her but room, and do not bind her when she sleeps, for then she speaks not true, as the old Proteus[4] did, who spake oracles only when he was caught and bound, but then rather she turns herself into all shapes, except her own, and perhaps tunes her voice according to the time, as Micaiah did before Ahab,[5] until she be adjured into her own likeness. Yet is it not impossible that she may have more shapes than one. What else is all that rank of things indifferent, wherein Truth may be on this side or on the other, without being unlike herself? What but a vain shadow else is the abolition of those ordinances, that handwriting nailed to the cross? What great purchase is this Christian liberty which Paul so often boasts of? His doctrine is, that he who eats or eats not, regards a day or regards it not, may do either to the Lord. How many other things might be tolerated in peace, and left to conscience, had we but charity, and were it not the chief stronghold of our hypocrisy to be ever judging one another?

[1] mewing Renewing, from a term in falconry meaning to moult.

[2] engrossers Monopolists.

[3] coat and conduct Tax that provided clothing and transportation of new troops; noble Coin worth six shillings eight pence; Danegelt Land tax originally levied in tenth-century England to raise tribute paid to Danish raiders in hopes of preventing an invasion.

[4] Proteus Shape-shifting sea deity in Greek mythology.

[5] Micaiah … Ahab See 1 Kings 22.9–28.

I fear yet this iron yoke of outward conformity hath left a slavish print upon our necks; the ghost of a linen decency[1] yet haunts us. We stumble and are impatient at the least dividing of one visible congregation from another, though it be not in fundamentals; and through our forwardness to suppress, and our backwardness to recover any enthralled piece of truth out of the grip of custom, we care not to keep truth separated from truth, which is the fiercest rent and disunion of all. We do not see that, while we still affect by all means a rigid external formality, we may as soon fall again into a gross conforming stupidity, a stark and dead congealment of wood and hay and stubble, forced and frozen together, which is more to the sudden degenerating of a Church than many subdichotomies of petty schisms.

Not that I can think well of every light separation, or that all in a Church is to be expected gold and silver and precious stones: it is not possible for man to sever the wheat from the tares, the good fish from the other fry; that must be the angels' ministry at the end of mortal things. Yet if all cannot be of one mind—as who looks they should be?—this doubtless is more wholesome, more prudent, and more Christian that many be tolerated, rather than all compelled. I mean not tolerated popery, and open superstition, which, as it extirpates all religions and civil supremacies, so itself should be extirpate, provided first that all charitable and compassionate means be used to win and regain the weak and the misled: that also which is impious or evil absolutely either against faith or manners no law can possibly permit, that intends not to unlaw itself: but those neighbouring differences, or rather indifferences, are what I speak of, whether in some point of doctrine or of discipline, which, though they may be many, yet need not interrupt the unity of Spirit, if we could but find among us the bond of peace.

[1] linen decency Referring to the clerical vestments (with linen sleeves) that Archbishop William Laud insisted ministers wear in the interest of conformity.

In the meanwhile if any one would write, and bring his helpful hand to the slow-moving Reformation which we labour under, if Truth have spoken to him before others, or but seemed at least to speak, who hath so bejesuited us that we should trouble that man with asking licence to do so worthy a deed? and not consider this, that if it come to prohibiting, there is not aught more likely to be prohibited than truth itself; whose first appearance to our eyes, bleared and dimmed with prejudice and custom, is more unsightly and unplausible than many errors, even as the person is of many a great man slight and contemptible to see to. And what do they tell us vainly of new opinions, when this very opinion of theirs, that none must be heard, but whom they like, is the worst and newest opinion of all others; and is the chief cause why sects and schisms do so much abound, and true knowledge is kept at distance from us; besides yet a greater danger which is in it? …

And as for regulating the press, let no man think to have the honour of advising ye better than yourselves have done in that Order published next before this, "that no book be printed, unless the printer's and the author's name, or at least the printer's, be registered."[1] Those which otherwise come forth, if they be found mischievous and libellous, the fire and the executioner will be the timeliest and the most effectual remedy that man's prevention can use. For this authentic Spanish policy of licensing books, if I have said aught, will prove the most unlicensed book itself within a short while; and was the immediate image of a Star Chamber decree[2] to that purpose made in those very times when that Court did the rest of those her pious works, for which she is now fallen from the stars with Lucifer. Whereby ye may guess what kind of state prudence, what love of the people, what care of religion or good manners there was at the contriving, although with singular hypocrisy it pretended to bind books to their good behaviour.

[1] And as for regulating … be registered Milton cites a Parliamentary Order of January 29, 1642.

[2] Star Chamber decree Referring to the 1637 Star Chamber decree for licensing books; the Court of Star Chamber at Westminster Palace was associated with efforts to maintain royal authority before the war, and had been abolished by Parliament in 1641. Milton punningly links the "fallen" Star Chamber with Lucifer, the "morning star" (Isaiah 14.12) and "fallen" angel.

Paradise Lost

While there is some evidence that Milton drafted parts of Paradise Lost in the 1640s, he appears to have written most of the poem between about 1658 and about 1663. He thus composed his great epic of human loss followed by the restoration of hope across the Restoration of 1660, an event that marked the collapse of the English Republic and Milton's own hopes for a reformed political and religious structure. Paradise Lost was first published in 1667 as a work of ten books. Milton subsequently re-divided the poem (with the original Books 7 and 10 each split into two) and republished it in 1674 as a work in twelve books, thus more closely mirroring the form of Virgil's Aeneid. Since Milton had gone completely blind in the early 1650s, he wrote the work through dictation. Interestingly, the one surviving manuscript (which includes only Book 1) reveals that he nevertheless revised with a view to spelling and punctuation.

The epic, written in blank verse (i.e., unrhymed lines of iambic pentameter), draws heavily on classical inspiration and is highly allusive. Scholars estimate that Milton draws on more than 1500 books in Paradise Lost, but his primary touchstones are Homer's Iliad and Odyssey, Virgil's Aeneid, Ovid's Metamorphoses, Spenser's Faerie Queene, and such central works of epic and romance of the European Renaissance as Ludovico Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, Torquato Tasso's Jersualem Delivered, and Guillaume Du Bartas's Divine Weeks (Milton in fact borrows many whole phrases from Joshua Sylvester's 1608 translation of Du Bartas). Milton takes his title from the account in Genesis of the expulsion of humankind from Paradise after Adam and Eve eat from the forbidden Tree of Knowledge. As a retelling of the Biblical Fall, Paradise Lost is the best known and most influential literary version of this foundational story of innocence and experience, temptation and expulsion, desire and its consequences.

The poem's dramatic first two books focus not on humanity but on the defeated but still rebellious Satan, cast down from Heaven with his traitor legions for daring to war on God. Satan and his fellows explore Hell, make a home of sorts, and decide to continue their fight with God not in open warfare, but through subverting and corrupting God's new creation, humankind. The rest of Paradise Lost follows the enactment of Satan's plan, though in true epic fashion the poem flashes back to the story's beginnings and looks forward to its end, which in this case means the beginning and end of time itself. Critical discussion of the poem has often concerned the extent to which Satan appears to be the driving force behind the epic, sometimes taking as a starting point William Blake's remark that the "reason Milton wrote in fetters when he wrote of Angels & God, and at liberty when of Devils & Hell, is because he was a true Poet and of the Devil's party without knowing it." As a character, Satan is indeed dramatically compelling, if also arguably repellent in his pride and thirst for power: Milton opens his epic by confronting us with the power of the adversary he believed we faced in everyday life. But many readers also find that Satan recedes and shrinks over the whole course of the poem, while Adam and Eve gain in complexity and stature through their conversations with one another and with the angels Raphael and Michael.

The theological heart of Paradise Lost is the extended conversation in Book 3 between God and the Son. God addresses the problem of foreknowledge and free will by explaining the central importance in Milton's world of choice and freedom. God anticipates Satan's subsequent actions, yet promises mercy and grace through the Son should humanity fall. In its broad outlines, the theology Milton presents is conventional Christian thought; in some respects though, Milton is less orthodox. His God, for example, is not a Calvinist: there is no predestination in Milton's heaven, because all will hear the call of the Divine, and all those who choose to be saved will be saved. Milton also appears to make the Son subordinate to (rather than co-eternal with) the Father, though scholars argue over the implications (and importance to the poem) of this conception of the divine.

The most frequently debated issue in Paradise Lost is probably Milton's depiction of Adam and Eve. Modern readers can feel uncomfortable with the explicit subordination of women in some passages, particularly those that draw on St. Paul's injunctions from the New Testament. Are these moments to be taken as representing the views of Adam, of Raphael, of Milton, or of God? In other passages, however, Paradise Lost gives Eve a greater personal, political, and theological equality than she had ever been accorded: in Book 10 in particular, Eve's actions give her a good claim to be the poem's true hero. She even gives names to some of God's creation, a sign of power and capacity to rule that the Bible itself reserves only for Adam. On the subject of Eve, the poem speaks with two voices, and Milton invites readers to work through the implications of the ways Adam and Eve are presented as man and woman, as husband and wife, as humanity in general, and even as different aspects of the individual human psyche.

Despite its daunting erudition and older poetics, Paradise Lost still speaks powerfully and directly to modern readers. As Johnson, Coleridge, and many others have pointed out, the verbal acrobatics of the poem may occasionally frustrate, but vested in them is also the capacity to astonish. And the rich poetic texture of the full poem retains the capacity to provoke intellectual inquiry not only concerning theology and gender, but also concerning the human condition, religious faith, responsibility and heroism, politics and hierarchy, and the limits that may exist on the pursuit of knowledge and freedom.

THE VERSE

The measure is English heroic verse without rhyme,[1] as that of Homer in Greek, and Virgil in Latin; rhyme being no necessary adjunct or true ornament of poem or good verse, in longer works especially, but the invention of a barbarous age, to set off wretched matter and lame metre; graced indeed since by the use of some famous modern poets,[2] carried away by custom, but much to their own vexation, hindrance, and constraint to express many things otherwise, and for the most part worse then else they would have expressed them. Not without cause therefore some both Italian, and Spanish poets of prime note have rejected rhyme both in longer and shorter works, as have also long since our best English tragedies, as a thing of itself, to all judicious ears, trivial, and of no true musical delight; which consists only in apt numbers,[3] fit quantity of syllables, and the sense variously drawn out from one verse into another, not in the jingling sound of like endings, a fault avoided by the learned ancients both in poetry and all good oratory. This neglect then of rhyme so little is to be taken for a defect, though it may seem so perhaps to vulgar readers, that it rather is to be esteemed an example set, the first in English, of ancient liberty recovered to heroic poem from the troublesome and modern bondage of rhyming.

ARGUMENT TO BOOK I[4]

This first book proposes first in brief the whole subject, man's disobedience, and the loss thereupon of Paradise wherein he was placed: then touches the prime cause of his fall, the serpent, or rather Satan in the serpent; who revolting from God, and drawing to his side many legions of angels, was by the command of God driven out of Heaven with all his crew into the great deep. Which action past over, the poem hastes into the midst[5] of things, presenting Satan with his angels now fallen into Hell, described here, not in the centre (for Heaven and Earth may be supposed as yet not made, certainly not yet accurst) but in a place of utter darkness, fitliest called Chaos: here Satan with his angels lying on the burning lake, thunder-struck and astonished, after a certain space recovers, as from confusion, calls up him who next in order and dignity lay by him; they confer of their miserable fall. Satan awakens all his legions, who lay till then in the same manner confounded; they rise, their numbers, array of battle, their chief leaders named, according to the idols known afterwards in Canaan and the countries adjoining. To these Satan directs his speech, comforts them with hope yet of regaining Heaven, but tells them lastly of a new world and new kind of creature to be created, according to an ancient prophesy or report in Heaven; for that angels were long before this visible creation, was the opinion of many ancient Fathers.[6] To find out the truth of this prophesy, and what to determine thereon, he refers to a full council. What his associates thence attempt. Pandemonium the palace of Satan rises, suddenly built out of the deep: the infernal peers there sit in council.

[1] English ... rhyme Verse suited to the treatment of heroic or elevated themes; i.e., blank verse in iambic pentameter.

[2] invention ... age Early medieval hymns that incorporated rhyme went on to influence satirical poets, who chose bawdier "wretched matter"; famous modern poets Milton's contemporaries John Dryden and Andrew Marvell were, for example, proponents of rhyme.

[3] apt numbers Correct rhythm.

[4] ARGUMENT TO BOOK I The Arguments are Milton's own prose summaries of the action in each of the twelve books of Paradise Lost. They did not appear in the first edition, but Milton added them in 1668, apparently at the request of his printer.

[5] into the midst Beginning by immersing the reader in the events of the narrative was a convention of epic poetry, the classical form Milton adopts throughout the poem.

[6] Fathers Early leaders and scholars of the Christian church.

"If thou beest he—but O how fall'n![5] How changed

Clothed with transcendent brightness, didst outshine
Myriads, though bright!—if he whom mutual league,
United thoughts and counsels, equal hope
And hazard in the glorious enterprise
Joined with me once, now misery hath joined
In equal ruin; into what pit thou seest
From what height fall'n: so much the stronger proved
He with his thunder; and till then who knew
The force of those dire arms? Yet not for those,

That led th' embattled seraphim[1] to war
Under thy conduct, and, in dreadful deeds
Fearless, endangered Heav'n's perpetual king,
And put to proof his high supremacy,
Whether upheld by strength, or chance, or fate,
Too well I see and rue the dire event[2]
That, with sad overthrow and foul defeat,
Hath lost us Heav'n, and all this mighty host
In horrible destruction laid thus low,
As far as gods and heavenly essences
Can perish: for the mind and spirit remains
Invincible, and vigour soon returns,
Though all our glory extinct, and happy state
Here swallowed up in endless misery. god
But what if He our conqueror (whom I now
Of force[3] believe almighty, since no less Than such could have o'erpow'red such force as ours)
Have left us this our spirit and strength entire,
Strongly to suffer and support our pains,
That we may so suffice His vengeful ire,
Or do Him mightier service as His thralls
By right of war, whatever His business be,
Here in the heart of Hell to work in fire,
Or do His errands in the gloomy deep?
What can it then avail though yet we feel Strength undiminished, or eternal being
To undergo eternal punishment?"[4]
Whereto with speedy words the archfiend replied:
"Fall'n cherub, to be weak is miserable,
Doing or suffering: but of this be sure—
To do aught° good never will be our task, anything
But ever to do ill our sole delight,
As being the contrary to His high will
Whom we resist. If then His Providence
Out of our evil seek to bring forth good,
Our labour must be to pervert that end,
And out of good still to find means of evil;
Which oft times may succeed so as perhaps
Shall grieve Him, if I fail not, and disturb
His inmost counsels from their destined aim.
But see! The angry Victor hath recalled
His ministers of vengeance and pursuit
Back to the gates of Heav'n: the sulphurous hail,
Shot after us in storm, o'erblown has laid° settled
The fiery surge[5] that from the precipice
Of Heav'n received us falling;[6] and the thunder,
Winged with red lightning and impetuous rage,
Perhaps hath spent his shafts, and ceases now
To bellow through the vast and boundless deep.
Let us not slip° th' occasion, whether scorn miss
Or satiate° fury yield it from our Foe. satisfied
Seest thou yon dreary plain, forlorn and wild,
The seat of desolation, void of light,
Save what the glimmering of these livid° flames blue-colored
Casts pale and dreadful? Thither let us tend[7]
From off the tossing of these fiery waves;
There rest, if any rest can harbour there;
And, re-assembling our afflicted powers,[8]
Consult how we may henceforth most offend° damage
Our enemy, our own loss how repair,
How overcome this dire calamity,
What reinforcement we may gain from hope,
If not, what resolution from despair."
Thus Satan, talking to his nearest mate,
With head uplift above the wave, and eyes
That sparkling blazed; his other parts besides
Prone on the flood, extended long and large,
Lay floating many a rood,[9] in bulk as huge
As whom the fables name of monstrous size,

In worst extremes, and on the perilous edge
Of battle,[2] when it raged, in all assaults
Their surest signal—they will soon resume
New courage and revive, though now they lie
Grovelling and prostrate on yon lake of fire,
As we erewhile, astounded and amazed;
No wonder, fall'n such a pernicious height!"
  He scarce had ceased when the superior fiend
Was moving toward the shore; his ponderous shield,
Ethereal temper,[3] massy, large, and round,
Behind him cast.[4] The broad circumference
Hung on his shoulders like the moon, whose orb
Through optic glass[5] the Tuscan artist[6] views
At ev'ning, from the top of Fesolé,[7]
Or in Valdarno,[8] to descry new lands,
Rivers, or mountains, in her spotty globe.
His spear—to equal which the tallest pine
Hewn on Norwegian hills, to be the mast
Of some great ammiral,[9] were but a wand
He walked with, to support uneasy steps
Over the burning marl,° not like those steps soil
On Heaven's azure; and the torrid clime
Smote on him sore besides, vaulted with fire.
Natheless° he so endured, till on the beach nevertheless
Of that inflamèd sea he stood, and called
His legions—angel forms, who lay entranced
Thick as autumnal leaves that strew the brooks
In Vallombrosa,[10] where th' Etrurian shades
High over-arched embower;[11] or scattered sedge
Afloat, when with fierce winds Orion[12] armed Hath vexed the Red Sea coast, whose waves o'erthrew
Busiris and his Memphian chivalry,[13]
While with perfidious hatred they pursued
The sojourners of Goshen,[14] who beheld
From the safe shore their floating carcasses
And broken chariot wheels. So thick bestrewn,
Abject and lost, lay these, covering the flood,
Under amazement of their hideous change.
He called so loud that all the hollow deep
Of Hell resounded: "Princes, potentates,[15]
Warriors, the flower of Heav'n once yours; now lost,
If such astonishment as this can seize Eternal spirits! Or have ye chos'n this place
After the toil of battle to repose
Your wearied virtue,° for the ease you find power
To slumber here, as in the vales of Heav'n?
Or in this abject posture have ye sworn
To adore the conqueror who now beholds
Cherub and seraph rolling in the flood
With scattered arms and ensigns,° till anon flags
His swift pursuers from Heaven-gates discern
Th' advantage, and descending, tread us down
Thus drooping, or with linkèd thunderbolts
Transfix us to the bottom of this gulf?
Awake, arise, or be forever fall'n!"

[1] on th' oblivious pool I.e., in oblivion on this pool. The phrase also evokes the Lethe, another underworld river, which causes forgetting.

[2] perilous … battle Battlefront.

[3] Ethereal temper Tempered by heavenly flames.

[4] Behind him cast Satan wears his shield slung across his back.

[5] optic glass Telescope.

[6] the Tuscan artist Galileo (1564–1652), the only contemporary mentioned in the poem.

[7] Fesolé Fiesole, a town just outside Florence, Italy.

[8] Valdarno Arno Valley, the valley in which Florence is located.

[9] ammiral Admiral's flagship. This spelling was standard at the time, and refers specifically to a first-rate ship of the fleet.

[10] Vallombrosa Valley near Florence famous for its arboreal displays; literally, valley of shadow or shadowed valley.

[11] where th' Etrurian … embower Where the leaves of Etruria arch high and densely overhead. Etruria was an ancient region in west-central Italy, the seat of the Etruscan empire.

[12] Orion Great hunter whom Diana loved but killed in error and then had made into a constellation in the Northern sky; its appearance above the horizon heralds winter and is associated with stormy weather.

[13] Busiris and his Memphian chivalry Pharaoh and his horsemen or charioteers, stymied by Moses's parting of the Red Sea (Exodus 14.21–31).

[14] sojourners of Goshen Israelites who fled Egypt with Moses.

[15] potentates Royal leaders.

They heard, and were abashed, and up they sprung
Upon the wing, as when men wont° to watch accustomed
On duty, sleeping found by whom they dread,
Rouse and bestir themselves ere well awake.
Nor did they not perceive the evil plight
In which they were, or the fierce pains not feel;
Yet to their General's voice they soon obeyed
Innumerable. As when the potent rod
Of Amram's son, in Egypt's evil day,
Waved round the coast, up-called a pitchy cloud
Of locusts, warping on the eastern wind,
That o'er the realm of impious Pharaoh hung
Like Night, and darkened all the land of Nile;[1]
So numberless were those bad angels seen
Hovering on wing under the cope° of Hell, vault, canopy
'Twixt upper, nether,° and surrounding fires; lower
Till, as a signal giv'n, th' uplifted spear
Of their great sultan[2] waving to direct
Their course, in even balance down they light
On the firm brimstone, and fill all the plain:
A multitude like which the populous North
Poured never from her frozen loins to pass
Rhene or the Danaw,[3] when her barbarous sons
Came like a deluge on the south, and spread
Beneath Gibraltar to the Libyan sands.
Forthwith, from every squadron and each band,
The heads and leaders thither haste where stood
Their great commander—godlike shapes, and forms
Excelling human; princely dignities;
And powers that erst° in Heav'n sat on thrones, formerly
Though on their names in heav'nly records now
Be no memorial, blotted out and razed
By their rebellion from the books of life.[4]
Nor had they yet among the sons of Eve
Got them new names, till, wand'ring ov'r the earth,
Through God's high sufferance for the trial of man,
By falsities and lies the greatest part
Of mankind they corrupted to forsake
God their Creator, and th' invisible
Glory of Him that made them to transform
Oft to the image of a brute, adorned
With gay religions[5] full of pomp and gold,
And devils to adore for deities:[6]
Then were they known to men by various names,
And various idols through the heathen world.
Say, Muse, their names then known,[7] who first, who last,
Roused from the slumber on that fiery couch,
At their great emperor's call, as next in worth
Came singly[8] where he stood on the bare strand,
While the promiscuous crowd stood yet aloof?
The chief were those who, from the pit of Hell
Roaming to seek their prey on Earth, dared fix
Their seats, long after, next the seat of God,[9]
Their altars by His altar, gods adored
Among the nations round, and dared abide
Jehovah thundering out of Sion, throned
Between the cherubim;[10] yea, often placed
Within His sanctuary itself their shrines,
Abominations; and with cursèd things
His holy rites and solemn feasts profaned,
And with their darkness dared affront His light.
First, Moloch,[11] horrid king, besmeared with blood
Of human sacrifice, and parents' tears;
Though, for the noise of drums and timbrels° loud, small hand drums
Their children's cries unheard that passed through fire
To his grim idol. Him the Ammonite[12]
Worshiped in Rabba and her watery plain,
In Argob and in Basan, to the stream

[1] As when the potent ... land of Nile Moses was the son of Amram; at God's command he reached out with his staff (or rod) summoning the plague of locusts to afflict Egypt (Exodus 10.12–20).

[2] sultan This title identifies Satan with the image of an Islamic ruler.

[3] Rhene or the Danaw Rhine or Danube Rivers.

[4] books of life Books in which are written all the names of God's faithful (Exodus 32.32–33).

[5] gay religions Spectacular ceremonies.

[6] devils ... deities It was thought that the fallen angels took on new names and reappeared as the pagan gods venerated on Earth.

[7] Say ... known Milton adopts the cataloguing list, another convention of epic poetry.

[8] singly One by one.

[9] Their seats ... God The fallen angels were based in the Middle East, next to Jerusalem.

[10] Between the cherubim Depictions of cherubim graced the cover of the Ark of the Covenant in Jerusalem.

[11] Moloch Heathen god purportedly worshipped through the sacrifice of children in ovens or flame; his name means king or monarch.

[12] Ammonite Biblical enemies of the Israelites.

Of utmost Arnon.[1] Nor content with such Audacious neighbourhood, the wisest heart
Of Solomon he led by fraud to build
His temple right against the temple of God
On that opprobrious° hill, and made his grove dishonorable
The pleasant valley of Hinnom, Tophet[2] thence
And black Gehenna[3] called, the type of Hell.
Next Chemos, th' obscene dread of Moab's[4] sons,
From Aroar to Nebo and the wild
Of southmost Abarim; in Hesebon
And Horonaim, Seon's realm, beyond
The flow'ry dale of Sibma clad with vines,
And Eleale to th' Asphaltic Pool:[5]
Peor[6] his other name, when he enticed
Israel in Sittim,[7] on their march from Nile,
To do him wanton rites, which cost them woe.
Yet thence his lustful orgies he enlarged
Even to that hill of scandal,[8] by the grove
Of Moloch homicide, lust hard by hate,
Till good Josiah[9] drove them thence to Hell.
With these came they who, from the bordering flood
Of old Euphrates to the brook that parts
Egypt from Syrian ground, had general names

devils doing bad stuff names

Of Baalim and Ashtaroth[10]—those male,
These feminine. For spirits, when they please,
Can either sex assume, or both; so soft
And uncompounded° is their essence pure, unalloyed
Not tried or manacled with joint or limb,
Nor founded on the brittle strength of bones,
Like cumbrous flesh; but, in what shape they choose,
Dilated or condensed, bright or obscure,
Can execute their airy purposes,
And works of love or enmity fulfil.
For those the race of Israel oft forsook
Their living strength,[11] and unfrequented left
His righteous altar, bowing lowly down
To bestial gods; for which their heads as low
Bowed down in battle, sunk before the spear
Of despicable foes. With these in troop
Came Astoreth, whom the Phoenicians called
Astarte, queen of Heaven, with crescent horns;
To whose bright image nightly by the moon
Sidonian[12] virgins paid their vows and songs;
In Sion also not unsung, where stood
Her temple on th' offensive mountain, built
By that uxorious king whose heart, though large,
Beguiled by fair idolatresses, fell
To idols foul.[13] Thammuz came next behind,
Whose annual wound in Lebanon allured
The Syrian damsels to lament his fate
In amorous ditties all a summer's day,
While smooth Adonis from his native rock
Ran purple to the sea, supposed with blood
Of Thammuz yearly wounded:[14] the love-tale
Infected Sion's daughters with like heat,
Whose wanton passions in the sacred porch
Ezekiel saw, when, by the vision led,

[1] Rabba ... Argob ... Basan ... Arnon Lands east of the Dead Sea, in present-day Jordan.

[2] Hinnom Valley west and southwest of Jerusalem, mentioned in the Bible as a place of child sacrifice; Tophet City in the valley Hinnom where children were sacrificed in flame (see Jeremiah 7.31–32).

[3] Gehenna Because of the sacrifice of children at Tophet in Hinnom, Gehenna (a transliteration of the Hebrew for the place-name) became the New Testament word for Hell.

[4] Chemos God of war worshipped by the Moabites. See 1 Kings 11.7; Moab Biblical country east of the Dead Sea. The place names that follow are all associated with Moab in various books of the Old Testament.

[5] Asphaltic Pool Dead Sea.

[6] Peor Diminutive form of Baal-Peor, a Moabite god who appeared both as a sun god and moon goddess.

[7] Sittim Site of the last camp of the Israelites before they entered Canaan and were suborned by Baal-Peor (Numbers 25).

[8] hill of scandal Mount of Olives, upon which Solomon built shrines to honor several pagan gods.

[9] Josiah Biblical King of Judah who renewed his people's covenant with God and ruined heathen temples (2 Kings 23).

[10] Baalim Hebrew: collective term for Phoenician and Canaanite sun gods; Ashtaroth Collective term for variants of Ashtoreth, or Ishtar, a goddess of love, fertility, and war worshiped throughout the Middle East; her classical equivalent is Venus.

[11] living strength I.e., God.

[12] Sidonian From Sidonia, a Biblical country north of the Dead Sea, between modern day Lebanon and Syria.

[13] that uxorious king ... idols foul King Solomon.

[14] Thammuz came next ... yearly wounded Syrian god and consort of Astarte, identified with the Greek god Adonis. His sacred river runs reddish-purple yearly with silt, marking his feast and commemorating his mortal wounding by a wild boar.

His eye surveyed the dark idolatries
Of alienated Judah.[1] Next came one
Who mourned in earnest, when the captive ark
Maimed his brute image, head and hands lopped off,
In his own temple, on the groundsel-edge,° threshold
Where he fell flat and shamed his worshippers:[2]
Dagon his name, sea-monster, upward man
And downward fish; yet had his temple high
Reared in Azotus, dreaded through the coast
Of Palestine, in Gath and Ascalon,
And Accaron[3] and Gaza's frontier bounds.
Him followed Rimmon,[4] whose delightful seat
Was fair Damascus, on the fertile banks
Of Abbana and Pharphar, lucid streams.
He also against the house of God was bold:
A leper[5] once he lost, and gained a king—
Ahaz,[6] his sottish conqueror, whom he drew
God's altar to disparage and displace
For one of Syrian mode, whereon to burn
His odious offerings, and adore the gods
Whom he had vanquished. After these appeared
A crew who, under names of old renown,
Osiris, Isis, Orus,[7] and their train,
With monstrous shapes and sorceries abused
Fanatic Egypt and her priests to seek
Their wandering gods disguised in brutish forms[8]
Rather than human. Nor did Israel scape
Th' infection, when their borrowed gold composed
The calf in Oreb;[9] and the rebel king
Doubled that sin in Bethel and in Dan,[10]
Lik'ning his maker to the grazèd ox,
Jehovah, who in one night, when he passed
From Egypt marching, equalled° with one stroke leveled
Both her first-born and all her bleating gods.[11]
Belial[12] came last; than whom a Spirit more lewd
Fell not from Heaven, or more gross to love
Vice for itself. To him no temple stood
Or altar smoked; yet who more oft than he
In temples and at altars, when the priest
Turns atheist, as did Eli's sons,[13] who filled
With lust and violence the house of God?
In courts and palaces he also reigns,
And in luxurious cities, where the noise
Of riot ascends above their loftiest tow'rs,
And injury and outrage; and, when night
Darkens the streets, then wander forth the sons
Of Belial,[14] flown° with insolence and wine. delirious
Witness the streets of Sodom,[15] and that night
In Gibeah, when the hospitable door

[1] Whose wanton passions … alienated Judah See Ezekiel's vision of faithless Israelites in Ezekiel 8.9–15.

[2] the captive ark … worshippers After the Philistines captured the Ark of the Covenant and brought it back to the temple of sea god Dagon, the statue of Dagon fell and broke into pieces (1 Samuel 5.1–5).

[3] Azotus Philistine city northeast of Gaza, also called Ashdod; Gath Now thought to be located at modern Tel es-Safi, west of Jerusalem; Ascalon Now called Ashkelon, located southwest of Ashdod; Accaron Modern Tel Miqne, located approximately twenty-five miles west of Jerusalem; these four cities plus Gaza were the five major cities of the Philistines.

[4] Rimmon Ancient Syrian storm god.

[5] A leper Naamon, a Syrian who abandoned his loyalty to Rimmon and became a follower of Israel's God after he was cured of leprosy.

[6] Ahaz Also known as Ahaziah, a wicked apostate king of the Israelites (1 Kings 22.51–53, 2 Kings 1.1–17).

[7] Osiris Ancient Egyptian chief god, judge of the dead; Isis Wife of Osiris and goddess of fertility; Orus Horus, ancient Egyptian God of the sun, revenge, and war, son of Osiris and Isis.

[8] disguised in brutish forms Ancient Egyptian gods were depicted as having animal heads.

[9] The calf in Oreb While waiting for Moses to return from his mountaintop meeting with God, his brother Aaron crafted a golden calf, and the Israelites began to worship it as an idol (Exodus 32).

[10] the rebel king … and in Dan Jeroboam is the rebel king who, with the ten tribes of Israel, overthrew King Rehoboam, the son of Solomon (1 Kings 11). He set up two golden bull idols, saying "It is too much for you to go up to Jerusalem. Here are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up out of Egypt" (1 Kings 12.28).

[11] Jehovah … her bleating gods Jehovah in one night ravaged Egypt and its gods by slaying Egypt's firstborn sons (see Exodus 12:29–33).

[12] Belial Personification of defilement, fornication, and wealth. Here a devil; originally a Hebrew word for worthlessness.

[13] Eli's sons Eli had two lustful sons who seduced members of the congregation and appropriated church offerings for their own enjoyment (1 Samuel 2.12–25).

[14] sons / Of Belial I.e., drunken rioters and lechers.

[15] Sodom Biblical city that epitomized wickedness and debauchery, and the home of Lot, who in Genesis 19.4–8 protected his male house guests (who were disguised angels) from rape at the hands of a mob by offering his daughters instead.

Exposed a matron, to avoid worse rape.[1]
These were the prime in order and in might:
The rest were long to tell; though far renowned
Th' Ionian° gods—of Javan's[2] issue held Greek
Gods, yet confessed later than Heav'n and Earth,
Their boasted parents;[3] Titan, Heav'n's first-born,
With his enormous brood, and birthright seized
By younger Saturn: he from mightier Jove,
His own and Rhea's son, like measure found;
So Jove usurping reigned.[4] These, first in Crete
And Ida[5] known, thence on the snowy top
Of cold Olympus ruled the middle air,[6]
Their highest Heav'n; or on the Delphian cliff,[7]
Or in Dodona,[8] and through all the bounds
Of Doric° land; or who with Saturn old Greek
Fled over Adria to th' Hesperian fields,
And o'er the Celtic roamed the utmost isles.[9]
All these and more came flocking; but with looks
Downcast and damp;° yet such wherein appeared sad
Obscure some glimpse of joy to have found their chief
Not in despair, to have found themselves not lost
In loss itself; which on his count'nance cast
Like doubtful hue.[10] But he, his wonted pride
Soon recollecting, with high words, that bore
Semblance of worth, not substance, gently raised
Their fainting courage, and dispelled their fears.
Then straight° commands that, at the sound warlike promptly
Of trumpets loud and clarions, be upreared
His mighty standard. That proud honour claimed
Azazel[11] as his right, a cherub tall:
Who forthwith from the glittering staff unfurled
Th' imperial ensign; which, full high advanced,
Shone like a meteor streaming to the wind,
With gems and golden lustre rich emblazed,
Seraphic arms and trophies; all the while
Sonorous metal blowing martial sounds:
At which the universal host up-sent
A shout that tore Hell's concave,[12] and beyond
Frighted the reign of chaos and old night.
All in a moment through the gloom were seen
Ten thousand banners rise into the air,
With orient° colours waving: with them rose exotic
A forest huge of spears; and thronging helms
Appeared, and serried° shields in thick array crowded
Of depth immeasurable. Anon they move
In perfect phalanx to the Dorian mood[13]
Of flutes and soft recorders—such as raised
To height of noblest temper heroes old
Arming to battle, and instead of rage
Deliberate valour breathed, firm, and unmoved
With dread of death to flight or foul retreat;
Nor wanting power to mitigate and swage[14]
With solemn touches troubled thoughts, and chase
Anguish and doubt and fear and sorrow and pain
From mortal or immortal minds. Thus they,
Breathing united force with fixed thought,
Moved on in silence to soft pipes that charmed
Their painful steps o'er the burnt soil. And now
Advanced in view they stand—a horrid[15] front
Of dreadful length and dazzling arms, in guise
Of warriors old, with ordered spear and shield,
Awaiting what command their mighty chief
Had to impose. He through the armèd files

[1] that night ... worse rape Biblical incident in which a group who demanded to rape an Israelite man traveling through Gibeah settled instead for raping and killing his concubine, whose master then cut her into pieces. See Judges 19.16–30.

[2] Javan Grandson of Noah.

[3] held / Gods ... parents Javan's descendants believed the Titans to be gods, born from parents Heaven and Earth.

[4] birthright ... reigned Titan ruler Saturn (Cronus) usurped the throne from his father and married Rhea, his sister, but was eventually usurped by his own son Jove (Zeus).

[5] Ida Highest mountain in Crete, where Jove was raised secretly.

[6] middle air Location of Mount Olympus, the ruling base of the Olympian gods venerated across Greece.

[7] Delphian cliff Site of ancient Greece's most important Oracle.

[8] Dodona The most ancient Greek oracular site.

[9] Adria The Adriatic Sea; Hesperian fields Italy; Celtic France; utmost isles Britain, Ireland, and surrounding islands.

[10] Like doubtful hue Similarly concerned expression.

[11] Azazel One of Satan's standard bearers, according to some Jewish and Christian traditions.

[12] Hell's concave The roof of Hell.

[13] phalanx Classical military formation; the Dorian mood Greek musical mode associated with martial valor.

[14] swage I.e., assuage: to appease.

[15] horrid Bristling (with their weapons pointed).

Darts his experienced eye, and soon traverse° crosswise
The whole battalion views—their order due,
Their visages and stature as of gods;
Their number last he sums. And now his heart
Distends with pride, and, hardening in his strength,
Glories: for never, since created Man,
Met such embodied force as, named with these,
Could merit more than that small infantry
Warred on by cranes[1]—though all the giant brood
Of Phlegra[2] with th' heroic race were joined
That fought at Thebes and Ilium,° on each side Troy
Mixed with auxiliar° gods; and what resounds united
In fable or romance of Uther's son,[3]
Begirt with British and Armoric° knights; Breton
And all who since, baptized or infidel,
Jousted in Aspramont, or Montalban,
Damasco, or Marocco, or Trebisond,[4]
Or whom Bizerta[5] sent from Afric shore
When Charlemagne with all his peerage fell
By Fontarabbia.[6] Thus far these beyond
Compare of mortal prowess, yet observed° followed
Their dread commander. He, above the rest
In shape and gesture proudly eminent,
Stood like a tow'r. His form had yet not lost
All her original brightness, nor appeared
Less than archangel ruined, and th' excess
Of glory obscured: as when the sun new-ris'n
Looks through the horizontal[7] misty air
Shorn of his beams, or, from behind the moon,
In dim eclipse, disastrous° twilight sheds ill-omened
On half the nations, and with fear of change
Perplexes monarchs.[8] Dark'n'd so, yet shone
Above them all th' archangel: but his face
Deep scars of thunder had entrenched, and care
Sat on his faded cheek, but under brows
Of dauntless courage, and considerate° pride purposeful
Waiting revenge. Cruel his eye, but cast
Signs of remorse and passion,° to behold sympathy
The fellows of his crime, the followers rather (Far other once beheld in bliss), condemned
Forever now to have their lot in pain—
Millions of spirits for his fault amerced
Of Heav'n,[9] and from eternal splendours flung
For his revolt—yet faithful how they stood,
Their glory withered; as, when Heaven's fire
Has scathed° the forest oaks or mountain pines, blasted
With singèd top their stately growth, though bare,
Stands on the blasted heath. He now prepared
To speak; whereat their doubled ranks they bend
From wing to wing, and half enclose him round
With all his peers: attention held them mute.
Thrice he assayed,° and thrice, in spite of scorn, attempted
Tears, such as angels weep, burst forth: at last Words interwove with sighs found out their way:
"O myriads of immortal spirits! O powers
Matchless, but with th' Almighty; and that strife
Was not inglorious, though th' event was dire,
As this place testifies, and this dire change,
Hateful to utter. But what power of mind,
Foreseeing or presaging, from the depth
Of knowledge past or present, could have feared
How such united force of gods, how such
As stood like these, could ever know repulse?
For who can yet believe, though after loss,
That all these puissant° legions, whose exile powerful
Hath emptied Heaven, shall fail to re-ascend,
Self-raised, and repossess their native seat?
For me, be witness all the host of Heav'n,
If counsels different,° or danger shunned conflicting
By me, have lost our hopes. But He who reigns
Monarch in Heav'n till then as one secure

[1] that small infantry ... cranes Pygmies. Allusion to the fabled battle between cranes and tiny pygmies often mentioned in classical texts and after.

[2] Phlegra Location of the battle between rebellious giants and Zeus.

[3] Uther's son King Arthur, son of Uther Pendragon.

[4] Aspramont ... Montalban ... Damasco ... Marocco ... Trebisond Sites associated with the Crusades.

[5] Bizerta Departure point from which Moorish fleets invaded southern Europe.

[6] When Charlemagne ... By Fontarabbia Charlemagne (742–814) did not die at Fontarabia, in Northern Spain, but his troops under the command of Roland (Charlemagne's general) were defeated at Roncesvalles, 40 miles from Fontarabia, in 778.

[7] horizontal I.e., across the horizon.

[8] from behind the moon ... Perplexes monarchs Eclipses are traditionally harbingers of disaster or of death, especially of the deaths of monarchs, who were routinely identified with the sun.

[9] amerced / Of Heav'n Both those banished from Heaven, and those punished by Heaven.

Sat on His throne, upheld by old repute,
Consent or custom, and His regal state
Put forth at full, but still° His strength concealed— always
Which tempted our attempt, and wrought our fall.
Henceforth His might we know, and know our own,
So as not either to provoke, or dread
New war provoked: our better part remains
To work in close design, by fraud or guile,
What force effected not; that He no less
At length from us may find, who overcomes
By force hath overcome but half His foe.
Space may produce new worlds; whereof so rife° frequent
There went a fame° in Heav'n that He ere long rumor
Intended to create, and therein plant
A generation whom His choice regard
Should favour equal to the sons of Heav'n.
Thither, if but to pry, shall be perhaps
Our first eruption—thither, or elsewhere;
For this infernal pit shall never hold
Celestial spirits in bondage, nor th' abyss
Long under darkness cover. But these thoughts
Full counsel must mature. Peace is despaired;
For who can think submission? War, then, war
Open or understood,° must be resolved." hidden
He spake; and, to confirm his words, outflew
Millions of flaming swords, drawn from the thighs
Of mighty cherubim; the sudden blaze
Far round illumined Hell. Highly they raged
Against the highest and fierce with graspèd arms
Clashed on their sounding shields the din of war,
Hurling defiance toward the vault of Heav'n.
There stood a hill not far, whose grisly top
Belched fire and rolling smoke; the rest entire Shone with a glossy scurf[1]—undoubted sign
That in his womb was hid metallic ore,
The work of sulphur.[2] Thither, winged with speed,
A numerous brigade hastened: as when bands
Of pioneers,[3] with spade and pickaxe armed,
Forerun the royal camp, to trench a field,
Or cast a rampart. Mammon led them on—
Mammon, the least erected[4] spirit that fell
From Heav'n; for even in Heav'n his looks and thoughts
Were always downward bent, admiring more
The riches of Heav'n's pavement, trodden gold,
Than aught divine or holy else enjoyed
In vision beatific. By him first
Men also, and by his suggestion taught,
Ransacked the centre,[5] and with impious hands
Rifled the bowels of their mother Earth
For treasures better hid. Soon had his crew
Op'nd into the hill a spacious wound,
And digged out ribs of gold. Let none admire° ponder
That riches grow in Hell; that soil may best
Deserve the precious bane.° And here let those poison
Who boast in mortal things, and wondering tell
Of Babel, and the works of Memphian kings,[6]
Learn how their greatest monuments of fame
And strength and art are easily outdone
By spirits reprobate, and in an hour
What in an age they, with incessant toil
And hands innumerable, scarce perform.
Nigh on the plain, in many cells prepared,
That underneath had veins of liquid fire
Sluiced from the lake, a second multitude
With wondrous art founded the massy° ore, heavy
Sev'ring each kind, and scummed the bullion dross.[7]
A third as soon had formed within the ground
A various mould, and from the boiling cells
By strange conveyance filled each hollow nook;
As in an organ, from one blast of wind,
To many a row of pipes the soundboard breathes.
Anon out of the earth a fabric huge
Rose like an exhalation, with the sound

[5] Ransacked the centre Mined the Earth; "centre" extends the Ptolemaic metaphor.

[6] Babel Tower built by men who wished to reach Heaven. For their presumption, God caused them all to speak in different languages, so that they could not communicate well enough to continue to build the city. See Genesis 11.1–9; Memphian kings Egyptian Pharaohs who built the pyramids.

Nor was his name unheard or unadored
In ancient Greece; and in Ausonian° land Italian
Men called him Mulciber;[5] and how he fell
From Heav'n they fabled, thrown by angry Jove
Sheer o'er the crystal battlements: from morn
To noon he fell, from noon to dewy eve,
A summer's day, and with the setting sun
Dropt from the zenith, like a falling star,
On Lemnos, th' Aegaean isle.[6] Thus they relate,
Erring; for he with this rebellious rout
Fell long before; nor aught availed him now
To have built in Heav'n high tow'rs; nor did he 'scape
By all his engines, but was headlong sent,
With his industrious crew, to build in Hell.
Meanwhile the wingèd heralds, by command
Of sovereign power, with awful ceremony
And trumpet's sound, throughout the host proclaim
A solemn council forthwith to be held
At Pandemonium,[7] the high capital
Of Satan and his peers. Their summons called
From every band and squarèd regiment
By place or choice[8] the worthiest: they anon
With hundreds and with thousands trooping came Attended. All access was thronged; the gates
And porches wide, but chief the spacious hall

Fly to and fro, or on the smoothèd plank,
The suburb of their straw-built citadel,

Their state-affairs: so thick the airy crowd
Swarmed and were straightened; till, the signal giv'n,
Behold a wonder! They but now who seemed
In bigness to surpass Earth's giant sons,
Now less than smallest dwarfs, in narrow room
Throng numberless—like that pygmean race
Beyond the Indian mount;[10] or faery elves,
Whose midnight revels, by a forest-side

Intent, with jocund music charm his ear;
At once with joy and fear his heart rebounds.
Thus incorporeal spirits to smallest forms
Reduced their shapes immense, and were at large,
Though without number still, amidst the hall
Of that infernal court. But far within,
And in their own dimensions like themselves,
The great seraphic lords and cherubim
In close recess and secret conclave sat,
A thousand demi-gods on golden seats,
Frequent° and full. After short silence then, many
And summons read, the great consult[2] began.

THE END OF THE FIRST BOOK

ARGUMENT TO BOOK 2

The consultation begun, Satan debates whether another battle be to be hazarded for the recovery of Heaven: some advise it, others dissuade. A third proposal is preferred, mentioned before by Satan, to search the truth of that prophesy or tradition in Heaven concerning another world, and another kind of creature equal or not much inferior to themselves, about this time to be created; their doubt who shall be sent on this difficult search; Satan their chief undertakes alone the voyage, is honoured and applauded. The council thus ended, the rest betake them several ways and to several employments, as their inclinations lead them, to entertain the time till Satan return. He passes on his journey to Hell gates, finds them shut, and who sat there to guard them, by whom at length they are opened, and discover to him the great gulf between Hell and Heaven; with what difficulty he passes through, directed by Chaos, the power of that place, to the sight of this new world which he sought.

BOOK 2

High on a throne of royal state, which far
Outshone the wealth of Ormuz and of Ind,[3]
Or where the gorgeous east with richest hand
Showers on her kings barbaric pearl and gold,
Satan exalted sat, by merit raised
To that bad eminence; and, from despair
Thus high uplifted beyond hope, aspires
Beyond thus high, insatiate to pursue
Vain war with Heav'n; and, by success° untaught, consequence
His proud imaginations° thus displayed: plotting
"Powers and dominions,[4] deities of Heav'n!
For, since no deep° within her gulf can hold depth
Immortal vigour, though oppressed and fallen,
I give not Heav'n for lost: from this descent
Celestial virtues rising will appear
More glorious and more dread than from no fall,
And trust themselves to fear no second fate!
Me though just right, and the fixed laws of Heav'n,
Did first create your leader—next, free choice
With what besides in council or in fight
Hath been achieved of merit—yet this loss,
Thus far at least recovered, hath much more
Established in a safe, unenvied throne,
Yielded with full consent. The happier state
In Heav'n, which follows dignity, might draw
Envy from each inferior; but who here
Will envy whom the highest place exposes
Foremost to stand against the Thunderer's aim
Your bulwark,[5] and condemns to greatest share
Of endless pain? Where there is, then, no good
For which to strive, no strife can grow up there
From faction: for none sure will claim in Hell
Precedence; none whose portion is so small
Of present pain that with ambitious mind
Will covet more! With this advantage, then,
To union, and firm faith, and firm accord,
More than can be in Heav'n, we now return

---

[1] belated peasant I.e., a peasant out late.

[2] great consult Covert planning.

[3] Ormuz Wealthy island kingdom situated at the edge of the Strait of Hormuz, a waterway linking the Persian Gulf with the Gulf of Oman—traditionally and still a critical waterway for trade and shipping; Ind India.

[4] Powers and dominions Two of the hierarchical ranks of angels.

[5] bulwark Protective wall.

To claim our just inheritance of old,
Surer to prosper than prosperity
Could have assured us; and by what best way,
Whether of open war or covert guile,
We now debate. Who can advise may speak."
He ceased; and next him Moloch, sceptred king,
Stood up—the strongest and the fiercest spirit
That fought in Heav'n, now fiercer by despair.
His trust was with th' eternal to be deemed
Equal in strength, and rather than be less
Cared not to be at all; with that care lost
Went all his fear: of God, or Hell, or worse,
He recked° not, and these words thereafter spake: cared
"My sentence° is for open war. Of wiles, opinion
More unexpert, I boast not: them let those Contrive who need, or when they need; not now.
For, while they sit contriving, shall the rest—
Millions that stand in arms, and longing wait
The signal to ascend—sit lingering here,
Heav'n's fugitives, and for their dwelling-place
Accept this dark opprobrious den of shame,
The prison of His tyranny who reigns
By our delay? No! Let us rather choose,
Armed with Hell-flames and fury, all at once
O'er Heav'n's high towers to force resistless[1] way,
Turning our tortures into horrid arms
Against the Torturer; when, to meet the noise
Of His almighty engine,[2] He shall hear
Infernal thunder, and, for lightning, see
Black fire and horror shot with equal rage
Among His angels, and His throne itself
Mixed with Tartarean° sulphur and strange fire, hellish
His own invented torments. But perhaps
The way seems difficult, and steep to scale
With upright wing against a higher foe!
Let such bethink them, if the sleepy drench° drink
Of that forgetful lake[3] benumb not still,
That in our proper motion we ascend
Up to our native seat; descent and fall
To us is adverse. Who but felt of late,
When the fierce Foe hung on our broken rear
Insulting,[4] and pursued us through the deep,
With what compulsion and laborious flight
We sunk thus low? Th' ascent is easy, then;
Th' event is feared! Should we again provoke
Our stronger, some worse way His wrath may find
To our destruction, if there be in Hell
Fear to be worse destroyed! What can be worse
Than to dwell here, driven out from bliss, condemned
In this abhorred deep to utter woe!
Where pain of unextinguishable fire
Must exercise° us without hope of end torture
The vassals[5] of His anger, when the scourge
Inexorably, and the torturing hour,
Calls us to penance? More destroyed than thus,
We should be quite abolished, and expire.
What fear we then? What doubt we to incense
His utmost ire? Which, to the height enraged,
Will either quite consume us, and reduce
To nothing this essential°—happier far essence
Than miserable to have eternal being—
Or, if our substance be indeed divine,
And cannot cease to be, we are at worst
On this side nothing;[6] and by proof we feel
Our power sufficient to disturb his Heav'n,
And with perpetual inroads[7] to alarm,
Though inaccessible, his fatal[8] throne:
Which, if not victory, is yet revenge."
He ended frowning, and his look denounced° professed
Desperate revenge, and battle dangerous
To less than gods. On th' other side up rose
Belial, in act more graceful and humane.
A fairer person lost not Heav'n; he seemed
For dignity composed, and high exploit.

---

[1] resistless I.e., irresistible.

[2] engine I.e., war machine or torture device, in this case a thunderbolt.

[3] Of that forgetful lake Lethe, river of oblivion in Hades.

[4] hung ... Insulting Followed close behind our broken rear ranks, attacking us and exulting; the scatological joke of "broken rear" is intentional.

[5] vassals Either vessels or attendants.

[6] What doubt we ... this side nothing Why do we care if we anger God more? We're immortal, and either God can't hurt us, or He will completely erase us from existence—either way, we are no worse off than we are right now.

[7] perpetual inroads Constant attacks.

[8] fatal In the control of Fate, with the additional meaning of "lethal."

But all was false and hollow; though his tongue
Dropped manna,[1] and could make the worse appear
The better reason, to perplex and dash° confound
Maturest counsels: for his thoughts were low—
To vice industrious,[2] but to nobler deeds
Timorous° and slothful. Yet he pleased the ear, apprehensive
And with persuasive accent thus began:
  “I should be much for open war, O peers,
As not behind in hate, if what was urged
Main reason to persuade immediate war
Did not dissuade me most, and seem to cast
Ominous conjecture on the whole success;
When he who most excels in fact° of arms, achievement
In what he counsels and in what excels
Mistrustful, grounds his courage on despair
And utter dissolution, as the scope
Of all his aim, after some dire revenge.
First, what revenge? The tow’rs of Heav’n are filled
With armèd watch,° that render all access guards
Impregnable: oft on the bordering deep
Encamp their legions, or with obscure wing
Scout far and wide into the realm of night,
Scorning[3] surprise. Or, could we break our way
By force, and at our heels all Hell should rise
With blackest insurrection to confound
Heav’n’s purest light, yet our great Enemy,
All incorruptible, would on His throne
Sit unpolluted, and th’ ethereal mould,
Incapable of stain, would soon expel
Her mischief, and purge off the baser fire,[4]
Victorious. Thus repulsed, our final hope
Is flat despair: we must exasperate
Th’ almighty Victor to spend all his rage;
And that must end us; that must be our cure—
To be no more. Sad cure! For who would lose,
Though full of pain, this intellectual° being, sentient
Those thoughts that wander through eternity,
To perish rather, swallowed up and lost
In the wide womb of uncreated night,
Devoid of sense and motion? And who knows,
Let this be good, whether our angry Foe
Can give it, or will ever? How He can
Is doubtful; that He never will is sure.
Will He, so wise, let loose at once His ire, Belike° through impotence or unaware, possibly
To give His enemies their wish, and end
Them in His anger whom His anger saves
To punish endless? ‘Wherefore cease we, then?’
Say they who counsel war; ‘we are decreed,
Reserved, and destined to eternal woe;
Whatever doing, what can we suffer more,
What can we suffer worse?’ Is this, then, worst—
Thus sitting, thus consulting, thus in arms?
What when we fled amain,° pursued and struck at full speed
With Heav’n’s afflicting thunder, and besought
The deep to shelter us? This Hell then seemed
A refuge from those wounds. Or when we lay
Chained on the burning lake? That sure was worse.
What if the breath that kindled those grim fires,
Awaked, should blow them into sevenfold rage,
And plunge us in the flames; or from above
Should intermitted° vengeance arm again paused
His red right hand to plague us? What if all
Her stores were op’n’d, and this firmament° sky
Of Hell should spout her cataracts of fire,
Impendent° horrors, threatening hideous fall hanging
One day upon our heads; while we perhaps,
Designing or exhorting glorious war,
Caught in a fiery tempest, shall be hurled,
Each on his rock[5] transfixed,° the sport and prey pinned
Of racking° whirlwinds, or forever sunk torturing
Under yon boiling ocean, wrapt in chains,
There to converse with everlasting groans,
Unrespited, unpitied, unreprieved,
Ages of hopeless end?[6] This would be worse.
War, therefore, open or concealed, alike

---

[1] though his tongue / Dropped manna Though he spoke sweetly. Manna was the food God miraculously gave to the Israelites in the desert (Exodus 16).

[2] To vice industrious Quick to commit vice, and hardworking when doing so.

[3] Scorning Making impossible.

[4] th’ ethereal mould … purge off the baser fire The pure “consuming fire” of God (Exodus 24.17, Numbers 11.1, Deuteronomy 4.24) would quickly defeat and exterminate the merely “flaming fire” of the rebel angels (Exodus 3.2, Psalm 104.4, Hebrews 1.7).

[5] on his rock As punishment for giving fire to humankind, Prometheus was also bound to a rock.

[6] Ages of hopeless end An ages-long hopeless fate.

My voice dissuades; for what can force or guile
With Him, or who deceive His mind, whose eye
Views all things at one view? He from Heav'n's height
All these our motions° vain sees and derides, plans
Not more almighty to resist our might
Than wise to frustrate all our plots and wiles.
Shall we, then, live thus vile—the race of Heav'n
Thus trampled, thus expelled, to suffer here
Chains and these torments? Better these than worse,
By my advice; since fate inevitable
Subdues us, and omnipotent decree,
The Victor's will. To suffer, as to do,
Our strength is equal; nor the law unjust
That so ordains. This was at first resolved,
If we were wise, against so great a foe
Contending, and so doubtful what might fall.
I laugh when those who at the spear are bold
And venturous, if that fail them, shrink, and fear
What yet they know must follow—to endure
Exile, or ignominy, or bonds, or pain,
The sentence of their conqueror. This is now
Our doom; which if we can sustain and bear,
Our supreme Foe in time may much remit
His anger, and perhaps, thus far removed,
Not mind us not offending, satisfied
With what is punished; whence these raging fires
Will slacken, if His breath stir not their flames.
Our purer essence then will overcome
Their noxious vapour; or, inured, not feel;
Or, changed at length, and to the place conformed
In temper and in nature, will receive
Familiar the fierce heat; and, void of pain,
This horror will grow mild, this darkness light;
Besides what hope the never-ending flight
Of future days may bring, what chance, what change
Worth waiting—since our present lot appears
For happy though but ill, for ill not worst,[1]
If we procure not to ourselves more woe."
    Thus Belial, with words clothed in reason's garb,
Counselled ignoble ease and peaceful sloth,
Not peace; and after him thus Mammon spoke:
    "Either to disenthrone the King of Heaven
We war, if war be best, or to regain
Our own right lost. Him to unthrone we then
May hope, when everlasting fate shall yield
To fickle chance, and chaos judge the strife.
The former, vain to hope, argues as vain
The latter; for what place can be for us
Within Heav'n's bound, unless Heav'n's Lord Supreme
We overpower? Suppose He should relent
And publish° grace to all, on promise made grant
Of new subjection; with what eyes could we Stand in His presence humble, and receive
Strict laws imposed, to celebrate His throne
With warbled hymns, and to His godhead sing
Forced hallelujahs, while He lordly sits
Our envied Sovereign, and His altar breathes
Ambrosial odours and ambrosial[2] flowers,
Our servile offerings? This must be our task
In Heav'n, this our delight. How wearisome
Eternity so spent in worship paid
To Whom we hate! Let us not then pursue
By force impossible, by leave obtained
Unacceptable,[3] though in Heav'n, our state
Of splendid vassalage;° but rather seek servitude
Our own good from ourselves, and from our own
Live to ourselves, though in this vast recess,
Free and to none accountable, preferring
Hard liberty before the easy yoke
Of servile pomp. Our greatness will appear
Then most conspicuous when great things of small,
Useful of hurtful, prosperous of adverse,
We can create, and in what place soe'er° whatsoever
Thrive under evil, and work ease out of pain
Through labour and endurance. This deep world
Of darkness do we dread? How oft amidst Thick clouds and dark doth Heav'n's all-ruling Sire
Choose to reside, His glory unobscured,
And with the majesty of darkness round
Covers His throne, from whence deep thunders roar.[4]

---

[1] For happy ... worst Though we are not happy, we have also not yet experienced the worst.

[2] ambrosial Ambrosia is the mythical food of the Greek and Roman gods; it is said to be intensely aromatic and able to grant eternal life.

[3] Let us not ... Unacceptable Let us not try and take by impossible force of arms what we would find unacceptable if we obtained it (i.e., servitude in Heaven).

[4] How oft amidst ... from whence deep thunders roar See, for example, Exodus 13 and 14, Leviticus 16.2, Numbers 9–16.

Must'ring their rage, and Heav'n resembles Hell!
As He our darkness, cannot we His light
Imitate when we please? This desert soil
Wants° not her hidden lustre, gems and gold; lacks
Nor want we skill or art from whence to raise
Magnificence; and what can Heav'n show more?
Our torments also may, in length of time,
Become our elements, these piercing fires
As soft as now severe, our temper° changed nature
Into their temper; which must needs remove
The sensible of pain.[1] All things invite
To peaceful counsels, and the settled state
Of order, how in safety best we may
Compose our present evils,[2] with regard
Of what we are and where, dismissing quite
All thoughts of war. Ye have what I advise."
He scarce had finished, when such murmur filled
Th' assembly as when hollow rocks retain
The sound of blustering winds, which all night long
Had roused the sea, now with hoarse cadence lull
Seafaring men o'erwatched,[3] whose bark° by chance boat
Or pinnace,° anchors in a craggy bay ship
After the tempest. Such applause was heard
As Mammon ended, and his sentence pleased,
Advising peace: for such another field[4]
They dreaded worse than Hell; so much the fear
Of thunder and the sword of Michael[5]
Wrought still within them; and no less desire
To found this nether empire, which might rise,
By policy and long process of time,
In emulation opposite to Heav'n.
Which when Beelzebub perceived—than whom,
Satan except, none higher sat—with grave
Aspect he rose, and in his rising seemed
A pillar of state. Deep on his front° engraven forehead
Deliberation sat, and public care;
And princely counsel in his face yet shone,
Majestic, though in ruin. Sage he stood
With Atlantean[6] shoulders, fit to bear
The weight of mightiest monarchies; his look
Drew audience and attention still as night
Or summer's noontide air, while thus he spoke:
"Thrones and imperial powers, offspring of Heav'n,
Ethereal virtues; or these titles now
Must we renounce, and, changing style,[7] be called Princes of Hell? For so the popular vote
Inclines—here to continue, and build up here
A growing empire; doubtless; while we dream,
And know not that the King of Heav'n hath doomed
This place our dungeon, not our safe retreat
Beyond His potent arm, to live exempt
From Heav'n's high jurisdiction, in new league
Banded against His throne, but to remain
In strictest bondage, though thus far removed,
Under th' inevitable curb, reserved
His captive multitude. For He, to be sure,
In height or depth, still first and last will reign
Sole king, and of His kingdom lose no part
By our revolt, but over Hell extend
His empire, and with iron sceptre rule
Us here, as with His golden those in Heav'n.
What sit we then projecting peace and war?
War hath determined us[8] and foiled with loss
Irreparable; terms of peace yet none
Vouchsafed° or sought; for what peace will be given bestowed
To us enslaved, but custody severe,
And stripes° and arbitrary punishment lashes
Inflicted? And what peace can we return,
But, to our power,[9] hostility and hate,
Untamed reluctance,° and revenge, though slow, opposition
Yet ever plotting how the Conqueror least
May reap His conquest, and may least rejoice
In doing what we most in suffering feel?
Nor will occasion want, nor shall we need
With dangerous expedition to invade
Heaven, whose high walls fear no assault or siege,

[1] The sensible of pain Those who feel pain with the senses.

[2] Compose our present evils Come to accept our current situation.

[3] o'erwatched Worn out from having to forgo sleep for watchfulness.

[4] field I.e., battleground.

[5] Michael Archangel Michael, a general of God's army.

[6] Atlantean The Titan Atlas carried the world on his broad shoulders as penance for his revolutionary acts.

[7] style Formal title.

[8] determined us Made the choice for us.

[9] to our power To our utmost ability.

Or ambush from the deep. What if we find
Some easier enterprise? There is a place
(If ancient and prophetic fame in Heav'n
Err not)—another world, the happy seat
Of some new race called Man, about this time
To be created like to us, though less
In power and excellence, but favoured more
Of Him who rules above; so was His will Pronounced among the gods, and by an oath
That shook Heav'n's whole circumference confirmed.
Thither let us bend all our thoughts, to learn
What creatures there inhabit, of what mould° form
Or substance, how endued,° and what their power equipped
And where their weakness: how attempted° best, assailed
By force or subtlety. Though Heav'n be shut,
And Heav'n's high Arbitrator sit secure
In His own strength, this place may lie exposed,
The utmost border of His kingdom, left
To their defence who hold it:[1] here, perhaps,
Some advantageous act may be achieved
By sudden onset°—either with Hell-fire assault
To waste° His whole creation, or possess destroy
All as our own, and drive, as we were driven,
The puny habitants; or, if not drive,
Seduce them to our party, that their God
May prove their Foe, and with repenting hand
Abolish His own works.[2] This would surpass
Common revenge, and interrupt His joy
In our confusion,° and our joy upraise ruin
In His disturbance; when his darling sons,
Hurled headlong to partake with us, shall curse
Their frail original,[3] and faded bliss—
Faded so soon! Advise° if this be worth contemplate
Attempting, or to sit in darkness here
Hatching vain empires." Thus Beelzebub
Pleaded his devilish counsel—first devised
By Satan, and in part proposed: for whence,
But from the author of all ill, could spring
So deep a malice, to confound° the race destroy
Of mankind in one root,[4] and earth with Hell
To mingle and involve, done all to spite
The great Creator? But their spite still serves
His glory to augment. The bold design
Pleased highly those infernal states,[5] and joy
Sparkled in all their eyes: with full assent
They vote: whereat his speech he thus renews:
"Well have ye judged, well ended long debate,
Synod[6] of gods, and, like to what ye are,
Great things resolved, which from the lowest deep
Will once more lift us up, in spite of fate,
Nearer our ancient seat—perhaps in view
Of those bright confines, whence, with neighbouring arms,
And opportune excursion, we may chance
Re-enter Heav'n; or else in some mild zone
Dwell, not unvisited of Heav'n's fair light,
Secure, and at the bright'ning orient beam[7]
Purge off this gloom: the soft delicious air,
To heal the scar of these corrosive fires,
Shall breathe her balm. But, first, whom shall we send
In search of this new world? Whom shall we find Sufficient? Who shall tempt° with wandering feet attempt
The dark, unbottomed, infinite abyss,
And through the palpable obscure[8] find out
His uncouth° way, or spread his airy flight, unknown
Upborne with indefatigable wings
Over the vast abrupt,° ere he arrive chasm
The happy isle? What strength, what art, can then
Suffice, or what evasion bear him safe,
Through the strict sentries and stations thick
Of angels watching round? Here he had need
All circumspection: and we now no less
Choice in our suffrage; for on whom we send
The weight of all, and our last hope, relies."
This said, he sat; and expectation held

[6] Synod Council or assembly, especially of church officials.

[7] bright'ning orient beam Lightening of the eastern horizon; dawn.

[8] the palpable obscure Darkness so complete one can feel it.

His look suspense,[1] awaiting who appeared
To second, or oppose, or undertake
The perilous attempt. But all sat mute,
Pondering the danger with deep thoughts; and each
In other's count'nance read his own dismay,
Astonished. None among the choice and prime
Of those Heav'n-warring champions could be found
So hardy[2] as to proffer or accept,
Alone, the dreadful voyage; till, at last,
Satan, whom now transcendent glory raised
Above his fellows, with monarchal pride
Conscious of highest worth, unmoved thus spake:
"O progeny of Heav'n! Empyreal thrones!
With reason hath deep silence and demur° uncertainty
Seized us, though undismayed. Long is the way
And hard, that out of Hell leads up to light.
Our prison strong, this huge convex° of fire, dome
Outrageous° to devour, immures us round eager
Ninefold; and gates of burning adamant,[3]
Barred over us, prohibit all egress.
These passed, if any pass, the void profound
Of unessential[4] night receives him next,
Wide-gaping, and with utter loss of being
Threatens him, plunged in that abortive gulf.
If thence he scape, into whatever world,
Or unknown region, what remains him less
Than[5] unknown dangers, and as hard escape?
But I should ill become this throne, O peers,
And this imperial sov'reignty, adorned
With splendour, armed with power, if aught proposed
And judged of public moment° in the shape importance
Of difficulty or danger, could deter
Me from attempting. Wherefore do I assume
These royalties, and not refuse to reign,
Refusing[6] to accept as great a share
Of hazard as of honour, due alike
To him who reigns, and so much to him due
Of hazard more as he above the rest
High honoured sits? Go, therefore, mighty powers,
Terror of Heav'n, though fallen; intend at[7] home,
While here shall be our home, what best may ease
The present misery, and render Hell
More tolerable; if there be cure or charm
To respite, or deceive, or slack the pain
Of this ill mansion: intermit no watch[8]
Against a wakeful foe, while I abroad
Through all the coasts° of dark destruction seek regions
Deliverance for us all. This enterprise
None shall partake with me." Thus saying rose
The monarch, and prevented all reply;
Prudent, lest from his resolution raised° delayed
Others among the chief might offer now,
Certain to be refused, what erst° they feared, formerly
And, so refused, might in opinion stand
His rivals, winning cheap the high repute
Which he through hazard huge must earn. But they Dreaded not more th' adventure than his voice
Forbidding; and at once with him they rose.
Their rising all at once was as the sound
Of thunder heard remote. Towards him they bend
With awful[9] reverence prone, and as a God
Extol him equal to the high'st in Heav'n.
Nor failed they to express how much they praised
That for the general safety he despised
His own: for neither do the spirits damned
Lose all their virtue; lest bad men should boast
Their specious° deeds on earth, which glory excites, worthless
Or close ambition varnished o'er with zeal.
Thus they their doubtful consultations dark
Ended, rejoicing in their matchless chief:
As, when from mountaintops the dusky clouds
Ascending, while the north wind sleeps, o'erspread
Heav'n's cheerful face, the louring element[10]
Scowls o'er the darkened landscape snow or shower,
If chance the radiant sun, with farewell sweet,
Extend his ev'ning beam, the fields revive,
The birds their notes renew, and bleating herds

[1] expectation … suspense His look was suspenseful as he waited for their response.

[2] hardy Tough, or also possibly "foolhardy."

[3] immures … Ninefold Nine walls were said to surround Hell; adamant Unbreakable shining metal.

[4] unessential Having no substance, absolutely empty.

[5] what remains … Than What choice is left other than.

[6] Refusing Should I refuse.

[7] intend at Turn your thoughts to.

[8] intermit no watch Do not interrupt your vigilance.

[9] awful Full of awe.

[10] louring element Darkening sky.

Attest their joy, that hill and valley rings.
O shame to men! Devil with devil damned
Firm concord holds;[1] men only disagree
Of creatures rational, though under hope
Of heavenly grace, and, God proclaiming peace,
Yet live in hatred, enmity, and strife
Among themselves, and levy cruel wars
Wasting the earth, each other to destroy:
As if (which might induce us to accord)
Man had not hellish foes enow° besides, enough
That day and night for his destruction wait!
The Stygian° council thus dissolved; and forth hellish
In order came the grand infernal peers:
Midst came their mighty paramount,[2] and seemed Alone th' antagonist of Heaven, nor less
Than Hell's dread emperor, with pomp supreme,
And God-like imitated state: him round[3]
A globe° of fiery seraphim enclosed ring
With bright emblazonry, and horrent arms.[4]
Then of their session ended they bid cry
With trumpet's regal sound the great result:
Toward the four winds four speedy cherubim
Put to their mouths the sounding alchemy,[5]
By herald's voice explained; the hollow abyss
Heard far and wide, and all the host of Hell
With deaf'ning shout returned them loud acclaim.
Thence more at ease their minds, and somewhat raised
By false presumptuous hope, the rangèd[6] powers
Disband; and, wand'ring, each his several way
Pursues, as inclination or sad choice
Leads him perplexed, where he may likeliest find
Truce to his restless thoughts, and entertain
The irksome hours, till his great chief return.
Part° on the plain, or in the air sublime,° some / overhead
Upon the wing or in swift race contend,
As at th' Olympian games or Pythian fields;[7]
Part curb their fiery steeds, or shun the goal
With rapid wheels,[8] or fronted° brigades form: opposing ranked
As when, to warn proud cities, war appears
Waged in the troubled sky, and armies rush
To battle in the clouds;[9] before each van° foremost division
Prick forth the airy knights, and couch° their spears, set
Till thickest legions close;[10] with feats of arms
From either end of Heav'n the welkin° burns. sky
Others, with vast Typhoean[11] rage, more fell,° evil
Rend up both rocks and hills, and ride the air
In whirlwind; Hell scarce holds the wild uproar:
As when Alcides,° from Oechalia crowned Hercules
With conquest, felt th' envenomed robe, and tore
Through pain up by the roots Thessalian pines,
And Lichas from the top of Oeta threw
Into th' Euboic sea.[12] Others, more mild,
Retreated in a silent valley, sing
With notes angelical to many a harp
Their own heroic deeds, and hapless fall
By doom of battle, and complain that fate
Free virtue should enthral to force or chance.
Their song was partial;[13] but the harmony
(What could it less when spirits immortal sing?)
Suspended[14] Hell, and took with ravishment
The thronging audience. In discourse more sweet

[1] Devil ... holds Devils hold firm to their contracts with each other.

[2] paramount Absolute ruler.

[3] him round Around him.

[4] bright emblazonry ... horrent arms Bright heraldry and bared weapons.

the sounding alchemy Trumpets, metal that sings.

[6] rangèd Structured in hierarchical levels.

[7] Pythian fields Fields below the Temple of the Oracle at Delphi, site of games honoring Apollo's victory over Python, the great serpent that was ravaging the area.

[8] shun ... wheels Avoid crashing their chariots into the goalposts they must pass close to in order to score in their games.

[9] battle in the clouds The apparition of a battle in the air was thought to warn of coming strife on the ground.

[10] close Meet in combat.

[11] Typhoean Monstrous, from Typhon the monstrous giant whom Zeus threw into Hades. Some said he lay under Mt. Aetna and caused eruptions.

[12] from Oechalia ... th' Euboic sea Hercules, after returning from victory in Oechalia, a region in Greece, was presented as a gift a cloak dipped in burning venom. Once he put it on, the pain drove him into a violent rage and he threw Lichas, the innocent and unknowing giver of the fatal gift, into the Euboean Sea.

[13] partial Sung in parts, or harmony, but also with a suggestion of "biased" or "self-interested."

[14] Suspended Kept in a state of anticipation.

(For eloquence the soul, song charms the sense)[1]
Others apart sat on a hill retired,
In thoughts more elevate, and reasoned high
Of Providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate—
Fixed fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute,
And found no end, in wandering mazes lost.
Of good and evil much they argued then,
Of happiness and final misery,
Passion and apathy, and glory and shame:
Vain wisdom all, and false philosophy!
Yet, with a pleasing sorcery, could charm
Pain for a while or anguish, and excite
Fallacious hope, or arm th' obdured breast[2]
With stubborn patience as with triple steel.
Another part, in squadrons and gross° bands, dense
On bold adventure to discover wide
That dismal world, if any clime° perhaps region
Might yield them easier habitation, bend
Four ways their flying march, along the banks
Of four infernal rivers, that disgorge
Into the burning lake their baleful streams—
Abhorred Styx, the flood of deadly hate;
Sad Acheron of sorrow, black and deep;
Cocytus, named of lamentation loud
Heard on the rueful stream; fierce Phlegeton,
Whose waves of torrent fire inflame with rage.
Far off from these, a slow and silent stream,
Lethe,[3] the river of oblivion, rolls
Her watery labyrinth, whereof who drinks
Forthwith his former state and being forgets—
Forgets both joy and grief, pleasure and pain.
Beyond this flood a frozen continent
Lies dark and wild, beat with perpetual storms
Of whirlwind and dire hail, which on firm land
Thaws not, but gathers heap,[4] and ruin seems
Of ancient pile;° all else deep snow and ice, construction
A gulf profound as that Serbonian bog
Betwixt Damiata and Mount Casius old,[5]
Where armies whole have sunk: the parching air
Burns frore,° and cold performs th' effect of fire. frostily
Thither, by harpy-footed furies[6] haled,° dragged
At certain revolutions[7] all the damned
Are brought; and feel by turns the bitter change
Of fierce extremes, extremes by change more fierce,
From beds of raging fire to starve° in ice i.e., freeze
Their soft ethereal warmth, and there to pine
Immovable, infixed, and frozen round
Periods of time, thence hurried back to fire.
They ferry over this Lethean sound[8]
Both to and fro, their sorrow to augment,
And wish and struggle, as they pass, to reach
The tempting stream, with one small drop to lose
In sweet forgetfulness all pain and woe,
All in one moment, and so near the brink;
But fate withstands, and, to oppose th' attempt,
Medusa with Gorgonian terror[9] guards
The ford, and of itself the water flies
All taste of living wight,° as once it fled person
The lip of Tantalus.[10] Thus roving on
In confused march forlorn, th' adventurous bands,
With shuddering horror pale, and eyes aghast,
Viewed first their lamentable lot, and found
No rest. Through many a dark and dreary vale
They passed, and many a region dolorous,
O'er many a frozen, many a fiery alp,[11]
Rocks, caves, lakes, fens, bogs, dens, and shades of death—
A universe of death, which God by curse

[1] For eloquence ... sense Eloquence charms the soul, song charms the senses.

[2] obdured breast Hardened heart.

[3] Acheron River of woe; Cocytus River of lamentation; Phlegeton River of fire; Lethe River from which the dead drink to forget their prior lives; these are four of the five rivers of the underworld in Greek mythology, the fifth being the Styx.

[4] gathers heap Gathers into heaps.

[5] that Serbonian bog ... Mount Casius old Lake Serbonis (modern Lake Bardawil), located in northern Egypt, is surrounded by quicksand.

[6] harpy-footed furies Talon-footed furies. Both the infernal snake-haired Furies and Harpies (taloned birds with heads of women) were agents of retribution in classical myth.

[7] revolutions Repeated times.

[8] sound Expanse of water.

[9] Medusa with Gorgonian terror Medusa and her sisters were Gorgons, monsters of Greek myth, and Medusa specifically was so terrible that her sight turned men to stone.

[10] The lip of Tantalus In Greek myth, Tantalus was condemned to be immersed in water that receded when he tried to drink and was overhung by fruit on a branch that retreated from his reach.

[11] fiery alp Volcanic peak.

Created evil, for evil only good;
Where all life dies, death lives, and nature breeds,
Perverse, all monstrous, all prodigious things,
Abominable, inutterable, and worse
Than fables yet have feigned or fear conceived,
Gorgons, and hydras, and chimeras[1] dire.
Meanwhile the adversary[2] of God and man,
Satan, with thoughts inflamed of highest design,
Puts on swift wings, and toward the gates of Hell
Explores his solitary flight: sometimes
He scours the right hand coast, sometimes the left;
Now shaves with level wing the deep, then soars
Up to the fiery concave towering high.
As when far off at sea a fleet descried
Hangs in the clouds, by equinoctial winds
Close sailing from Bengala, or the isles
Of Ternate and Tidore,[3] whence merchants bring
Their spicy drugs; they on the trading flood,
Through the wide Ethiopian to the Cape,[4]
Ply stemming nightly toward the pole:[5] so seemed Far off the flying fiend. At last appear
Hell-bounds, high reaching to the horrid roof,
And thrice threefold the gates; three folds were brass,
Three iron, three of adamantine rock,
Impenetrable, impaled° with circling fire, fenced
Yet unconsumed. Before the gates there sat
On either side a formidable shape.
The one seemed woman to the waist, and fair,
But ended foul in many a scaly fold,
Voluminous and vast—a serpent armed
With mortal sting. About her middle round
A cry° of Hell-hounds never-ceasing barked pack
With wide Cerberean[6] mouths full loud, and rung
A hideous peal; yet, when they list,° would creep, wanted to
If aught disturbed their noise, into her womb,
And kennel there; yet there still barked and howled
Within unseen. Far less abhorred than these Vexed Scylla,[7] bathing in the sea that parts
Calabria from the hoarse Trinacrian° shore; Sicilian
Nor uglier follow the night-hag,[8] when, called
In secret, riding through the air she comes,
Lured with the smell of infant blood, to dance
With Lapland witches, while the labouring° moon unsettled
Eclipses at their charms.° The other shape— spells
If shape it might be called that shape had none
Distinguishable in member, joint, or limb;
Or substance might be called that shadow seemed,
For each seemed either—black it stood as night,
Fierce as ten furies, terrible as Hell,
And shook a dreadful dart:° what seemed his head javelin
The likeness of a kingly crown had on.
Satan was now at hand, and from his seat
The monster moving onward came as fast
With horrid strides; Hell trembled as he strode.
Th' undaunted fiend what this might be admired—° wondered Admired, not feared (God and His Son except, Created thing naught valued he nor shunned),
And with disdainful look thus first began:
"Whence and what art thou, execrable shape,
That dar'st, though grim and terrible, advance
Thy miscreated front[9] athwart my way
To yonder gates? Through them I mean to pass,
That be assured, without leave asked of thee.
Retire; or taste thy folly, and learn by proof,
Hell-born, not to contend with spirits of Heav'n."
To whom the goblin,° full of wrath, replied: monster
"Are thou that traitor angel? Are thou he,
Who first broke peace in Heav'n and faith, till then
Unbroken, and in proud rebellious arms
Drew after him the third part of Heaven's sons,
Conjured° against the highest—for which both thou aligned
And they, outcast from God, are here condemned

---

[1] hydras Monstrous multi-headed serpents; chimeras Fire-breathing beings made up of dragon, goat, and lion features.

[2] adversary The Hebrew name "Satan" means "adversary."

[3] Bengala … Ternate … Tidore Three eastern Indian ports, sources of spices and exotic trade riches.

[4] the wide Ethiopian to the Cape The Indian Ocean to the Cape of Good Hope.

[5] the pole The South pole.

[6] Cerberean Cerberus, guardian of the underworld in classical mythology, was a dog with three heads.

[7] Scylla Nymph transformed by Circe, the Greek enchantress, into a dreadful monster with a lower body composed of savage dogs.

[8] night-hag Hecate, the underworld goddess and patron of sorcery.

[9] miscreated front Deformed face.

To waste eternal days in woe and pain?
And reckon'st thou thyself with spirits of Heav'n
Hell-doomed, and breath'st defiance here and scorn,
Where I reign king, and, to enrage thee more,
Thy king and lord? Back to thy punishment,
False fugitive; and to thy speed add wings,
Lest with a whip of scorpions[1] I pursue
Thy lingering, or with one stroke of this dart
Strange horror seize thee, and pangs unfelt before."
So spake the grisly terror, and in shape,
So speaking and so threat'ning, grew tenfold,
More dreadful and deform. On th' other side,
Incensed with indignation, Satan stood
Unterrified, and like a comet burned,
That fires the length of Ophiuchus[2] huge
In th' arctic sky, and from his horrid hair
Shakes pestilence and war.[3] Each at the head
Levelled his deadly aim; their fatal hands
No second stroke intend; and such a frown
Each cast at th' other as when two black clouds,
With Heav'n's artillery[4] fraught, came rattling on
Over the Caspian,[5] then stand front to front
Hovering a space, till winds the signal blow
To join their dark encounter in mid-air.
So frowned the mighty combatants that Hell
Grew darker at their frown; so matched they stood;
For never but once more was either like
To meet so great a foe. And now great deeds
Had been achieved, whereof all Hell had rung,
Had not the snaky sorceress, that sat
Fast by Hell-gate and kept the fatal key,
Risen, and with hideous outcry rushed between.
"O father, what intends thy hand," she cried,
"Against thy only son? What fury, O son,
Possesses thee to bend that mortal dart
Against thy father's head? And know'st for whom?
For Him who sits above, and laughs the while
At thee, ordained His drudge to execute
Whate'er His wrath, which He calls justice, bids—
His wrath, which one day will destroy ye both!"
She spake, and at her words the hellish pest
Forbore: then these to her Satan returned:
"So strange thy outcry, and thy words so strange
Thou interposest, that my sudden hand,
Prevented, spares° to tell thee yet by deeds withholds
What it intends, till first I know of thee
What thing thou art, thus double-formed, and why,
In this infernal vale first met, thou call'st
Me father, and that phantasm call'st my son.
I know thee not, nor ever saw till now
Sight more detestable than him and thee."
T' whom thus the portress[6] of Hell-gate replied:
"Hast thou forgot me, then; and do I seem
Now in thine eye so foul? Once deemed so fair
In Heaven, when at th' assembly, and in sight
Of all the seraphim with thee combined
In bold conspiracy against Heaven's King,
All on a sudden miserable pain
Surprised thee, dim thine eyes and dizzy swum
In darkness, while thy head flames thick and fast
Threw forth, till on the left side op'ning wide,
Likest to thee in shape and count'nance bright,
Then shining heav'nly fair, a goddess armed,
Out of thy head I sprung.[7] Amazement seized
All th' host of Heav'n; back they recoiled afraid
At first, and called me Sin, and for a sign
Portentous held me; but, familiar grown,
I pleased, and with attractive graces won
The most averse—thee chiefly, who, full oft
Thyself in me thy perfect image viewing,
Becam'st enamored; and such joy thou took'st
With me in secret that my womb conceived
A growing burden. Meanwhile war arose,
And fields were fought in Heav'n: wherein remained
(For what could else?) to our Almighty Foe
Clear victory; to our part loss and rout
Through all the Empyrean. Down they fell,

[1] with a whip of scorpions Mirrors the words of King Rheoboam, son of Solomon in 1 Kings 12.11, whose promise of harshness sparked a civil war.

[2] Ophiuchus The constellation Serpent Bearer, visible in the northern sky from June to October.

[3] from his horrid hair ... war Comets, with their long luminous tails, or hair, were believed to be harbingers of disaster.

[4] Heav'n's artillery Lightning.

[5] the Caspian Storm-riddled sea.

[6] portress Female doorkeeper.

[7] Out of thy head I sprung Cf. Athena's birth from the head of Zeus in classical myth.

Driven headlong from the pitch° of Heaven, down peak
Into this deep; and in the general fall
I also: at which time this powerful key
Into my hands was given, with charge to keep
These gates for ever shut, which none can pass
Without my op'ning. Pensive here I sat
Alone; but long I sat not, till my womb,
Pregnant by thee, and now excessive grown,
Prodigious motion felt and rueful throes.
At last this odious offspring whom thou seest,
Thine own begotten, breaking violent way,
Tore through my entrails, that, with fear and pain
Distorted, all my nether shape thus grew
Transformed: but he my inbred enemy
Forth issued, brandishing his fatal dart,
Made to destroy. I fled, and cried out Death!
Hell trembled at the hideous name, and sighed
From all her caves, and back resounded Death!
I fled; but he pursued (though more, it seems,
Inflamed with lust than rage), and, swifter far,
Me overtook, his mother, all dismayed,
And, in embraces forcible and foul
Engendering with me, of that rape begot
These yelling monsters, that with ceaseless cry
Surround me, as thou saw'st—hourly conceived
And hourly born, with sorrow infinite
To me; for, when they list, into the womb
That bred them they return, and howl, and gnaw
My bowels, their repast; then, bursting forth
Afresh, with conscious terrors vex me round,
That rest or intermission none I find.
Before mine eyes in opposition sits
Grim Death, my son and foe, who set them on,
And me, his parent, would full soon devour
For want of other prey, but that he knows
His end with mine involved, and knows that I
Should prove a bitter morsel, and his bane,
Whenever that shall be: so fate pronounced.
But thou, O father, I forewarn thee, shun
His deadly arrow; neither vainly hope
To be invulnerable in those bright arms,
Though tempered heavenly; for that mortal dint,[1]
He who reigns above, none can resist."

She finished; and the subtle fiend his lore° instruction
Soon learned, now milder, and thus answered smooth:
"Dear daughter—since thou claim'st me for thy sire,
And my fair son here show'st me, the dear pledge
Of dalliance had with thee in Heav'n, and joys
Then sweet, now sad to mention, through dire change
Befall'n us unforeseen, unthought-of-know,
I come no enemy, but to set free
From out this dark and dismal house of pain
Both him and thee, and all the heav'nly host
Of spirits that, in our just pretences° armed, demands
Fell with us from on high. From them I go
This uncouth° errand sole, and one for all unfamiliar
Myself expose, with lonely steps to tread
Th' unfounded° deep, and through the void immense unending
To search, with wandering quest, a place foretold
Should be—and, by concurring signs, ere now
Created vast and round—a place of bliss
In the purlieus° of Heav'n; and therein placed outskirts
A race of upstart creatures, to supply
Perhaps our vacant room, though more removed,
Lest Heav'n, surcharged° with potent multitude, congested
Might hap to move new broils.[2] Be this, or aught
Than this more secret, now designed, I haste
To know; and, this once known, shall soon return,
And bring ye to the place where thou and Death
Shall dwell at ease, and up and down unseen
Wing silently the buxom° air, embalmed healthy
With odours. There ye shall be fed and filled
Immeasurably; all things shall be your prey."
He ceased; for both seemed highly pleased, and Death
Grinned horrible a ghastly smile, to hear
His famine[3] should be filled, and blessed his maw° stomach
Destined to that good hour. No less rejoiced
His mother bad, and thus bespake her sire:

"The key of this infernal pit, by due
And by command of Heav'n's all-powerful King,
I keep, by Him forbidden to unlock
These adamantine gates; against all force
Death ready stands to interpose his dart,
Fearless to be o'ermatched by living might.

[1] mortal dint Fatal strike.

[2] Might hap … broils Might chance to begin new wars.

[3] famine Voracious appetite.

But what owe I to His commands above,
Who hates me, and hath hither thrust me down
Into this gloom of Tartarus profound,
To sit in hateful office° here confined, duty
Inhabitant of Heav'n and heav'nly born—
Here in perpetual agony and pain,
With terrors and with clamours compassed round
Of mine own brood, that on my bowels feed?
Thou art my father, thou my author, thou
My being gav'st me; whom should I obey
But thee? Whom follow? Thou will bring me soon
To that new world of light and bliss, among
The gods who live at ease, where I shall reign
At thy right hand voluptuous,[1] as beseems
Thy daughter and thy darling, without end."
Thus saying, from her side the fatal key,
Sad instrument of all our woe, she took;
And, towards the gate rolling her bestial train,
Forthwith the huge portcullis high up-drew,
Which, but herself, not all the Stygian powers
Could once have moved; then in the key-hole turns
Th' intricate wards,[2] and every bolt and bar
Of massy iron or solid rock with ease
Unfast'ns. On a sudden op'n fly,
With impetuous recoil and jarring sound,
Th' infernal doors, and on their hinges grate
Harsh thunder, that the lowest bottom shook
Of Erebus.[3] She op'nd; but to shut
Excelled° her power: the gates wide op'n stood, surpassed
That with extended wings a bannered host,
Under spread ensigns° marching, might pass through flags
With horse and chariots ranked in loose array;
So wide they stood, and like a furnace-mouth
Cast forth redounding° smoke and ruddy flame. copious
Before their eyes in sudden view appear
The secrets of the hoary° deep—a dark aged
Illimitable° ocean, without bound, limitless
Without dimension; where length, breadth, and height,
And time, and place, are lost; where eldest Night
And Chaos, ancestors of nature, hold
Eternal anarchy, amidst the noise
Of endless wars, and by confusion stand.
For Hot, Cold, Moist, and Dry,[4] four champions fierce,
Strive here for mastery, and to battle bring
Their embryon atoms:[5] they around the flag
Of each his faction, in their several clans,
Light-armed or heavy, sharp, smooth, swift, or slow,
Swarm populous, unnumbered as the sands
Of Barca or Cyrene's torrid soil,[6]
Levied to side with warring winds, and poise
Their lighter wings. To whom these most adhere
He rules a moment: Chaos umpire sits,
And by decision more embroils the fray
By which he reigns: next him, high arbiter,
Chance governs all. Into this wild abyss,
The womb of Nature, and perhaps her grave,
Of neither sea, nor shore, nor air, nor fire,
But all these in their pregnant causes mixed
Confus'dly, and which thus must ever fight,
Unless th' Almighty Maker them ordain
His dark materials to create more worlds—
Into this wild abyss the wary fiend
Stood on the brink of Hell and looked a while,
Pondering his voyage; for no narrow frith° fjord
He had to cross. Nor was his ear less pealed° deafened
With noises loud and ruinous (to compare
Great things with small) than when Bellona[7] storms
With all her battering engines, bent to raze
Some capital city; or less than if this frame
Of Heav'n were falling, and these elements
In mutiny had from her axle torn
The steadfast Earth. At last his sail-broad vans° wings
He spread for flight, and, in the surging smoke
Uplifted, spurns the ground; thence many a league,
As in a cloudy chair, ascending rides
Audacious; but, that seat soon failing, meets

[6] Barca or Cyrene's torrid soil Barca and Cyrene are cities in the Libyan desert surrounded by sand dunes.

[7] Bellona Goddess of war in the Roman pantheon.

A vast vacuity. All unawares,
Fluttering his pennons° vain, plumb down[1] he drops wings
Ten thousand fathom deep, and to this hour
Down had been falling, had not, by ill chance,
The strong rebuff of some tumultuous cloud,
Instinct[2] with fire and nitre, hurried him
As many miles aloft. That fury stayed—
Quenched in a boggy Syrtis,[3] neither sea,
Nor good dry land—nigh foundered,[4] on he fares,
Treading the crude consistence, half on foot,
Half flying; behoves him now both oar and sail.
As when a griffon[5] through the wilderness
With wingèd course, o'er hill or moory dale,
Pursues the Arimaspian,[6] who by stealth
Had from his wakeful custody purloined
The guarded gold; so eagerly the fiend
O'er bog or steep, through strait, rough, dense, or rare,
With head, hands, wings, or feet, pursues his way,
And swims, or sinks, or wades, or creeps, or flies.
At length a universal hubbub wild
Of stunning sounds, and voices all confused,
Borne through the hollow dark, assaults his ear
With loudest vehemence. Thither he plies
Undaunted, to meet there whatever power
Or spirit of the nethermost abyss
Might in that noise reside, of whom to ask
Which way the nearest coast of darkness lies
Bordering on light; when straight behold the throne
Of Chaos, and his dark pavilion spread
Wide on the wasteful° deep! With him enthroned empty
Sat sable°-vested night, eldest of things, black
The consort of his reign; and by them stood
Orcus and Ades, and the dreaded name
Of Demogorgon;[7] Rumour next, and Chance,
And Tumult, and Confusion, all embroiled,
And Discord with a thousand various mouths.
T' whom Satan, turning boldly, thus: "Ye powers
And spirits of this nethermost abyss,
Chaos and ancient Night, I come no spy
With purpose to explore or to disturb
The secrets of your realm; but, by constraint° necessity
Wandering this darksome desert, as my way
Lies through your spacious empire up to light,
Alone and without guide, half lost, I seek,
What readiest path leads where your gloomy bounds
Confine° with Heav'n; or, if some other place, meet
From your dominion won, th' ethereal King
Possesses lately, thither to arrive
I travel this profound.° Direct my course: deep
Directed, no mean recompense° it brings reward
To your behoof,° if I that region lost, benefit
All usurpation thence expelled, reduce
To her original darkness and your sway
(Which is my present journey°), and once more undertaking
Erect the standard° there of ancient Night. flag
Yours be th' advantage all, mine the revenge!"
Thus Satan; and him thus the anarch old,[8]
With faltering speech and visage incomposed,° distorted
Answered: "I know thee, stranger, who thou art—
That mighty leading angel, who of late
Made head[9] against Heav'n's King, though overthrown.
I saw and heard; for such a numerous host
Fled not in silence through the frighted deep,
With ruin upon ruin, rout[10] on rout,
Confusion worse confounded; and Heav'n-gates
Poured out by millions her victorious bands,
Pursuing. I upon my frontiers here
Keep residence; if all I can will serve
That little which is left so to defend,

[1] plumb down Straight down.

[2] Instinct Shot through.

[3] Syrtis Pair of quicksand gulfs on either side of Tripoli; see Book 5 of Pliny the Elder's Natural History.

[4] nigh foundered Nearly sunk.

[5] griffon Fabled beast with the head and wings of an eagle, the body of a lion, a voracious appetite for horses, and a penchant for hoarding gold and treasure.

[6] Arimaspian Member of the Arimaspi tribe, said by Herodotus to pilfer the griffons' treasure.

[7] Orcus Pluto, Roman god of the underworld; Ades Hades, Greek god of the underworld; Demogorgon Demon first imagined in the fourth century but believed to be a very ancient underworld god predating Hades.

[8] the anarch old The old anarchist, i.e., Chaos.

[9] Made head Battled.

[10] rout Bitter loss.

Encroached on still through our intestine broils[1]
Weakening the sceptre of old Night: first, Hell,
Your dungeon, stretching far and wide beneath;
Now lately Heav'n and Earth, another world[2]
Hung o'er my realm, linked in a golden chain
To that side Heav'n from whence your legions fell!
If that way be your walk, you have not far;
So much the nearer danger. Go, and speed;
Havoc, and spoil, and ruin, are my gain."
He ceased; and Satan stayed not to reply,
But, glad that now his sea should find a shore,
With fresh alacrity° and force renewed energy
Springs upward, like a pyramid of fire,
Into the wild expanse, and through the shock
Of fighting elements, on all sides round
Environed, wins his way; harder beset
And more endangered than when Argo passed
Through Bosporus betwixt the jostling rocks,[3]
Or when Ulysses on the larboard shunned
Charybdis, and by th' other whirlpool steered.[4]
So he with difficulty and labour hard
Moved on, with difficulty and labour he;
But, he once passed, soon after, when man fell,
Strange alteration! Sin and Death amain,[5]
Following his track (such was the will of Heav'n)
Paved after him a broad and beaten way
Over the dark abyss, whose boiling gulf
Tamely endured a bridge of wondrous length,
From Hell continued, reaching th' utmost orb
Of this frail world;[6] by which the spirits perverse
With easy intercourse° pass to and fro movement
To tempt or punish mortals, except whom
God and good angels guard by special grace.[7]
But now at last the sacred influence
Of light appears, and from the walls of Heav'n
Shoots far into the bosom of dim Night
A glimmering dawn. Here Nature first begins
Her farthest verge,° and Chaos to retire, border
As from her outmost works, a broken foe,
With tumult less and with less hostile din;
That Satan with less toil, and now with ease,
Wafts on the calmer wave by dubious light,
And, like a weather-beaten vessel, holds[8]
Gladly the port, though shrouds° and tackle torn; ropes
Or in the emptier waste, resembling air,
Weighs° his spread wings, at leisure to behold adjusts
Far off th' empyreal Heav'n, extended wide
In circuit, undetermined square or round,[9]
With opal towers and battlements adorned
Of living sapphire, once his native seat;
And, fast by, hanging in a golden chain,
This pendent world, in bigness as a star
Of smallest magnitude close by the moon.[10]
Thither, full fraught with mischievous revenge,
Accursed, and in a cursed hour, he hies.° goes

THE END OF THE SECOND BOOK

ARGUMENT TO BOOK 3

God sitting on His throne sees Satan flying towards this world, then newly created; shows him to the Son who sat at His right hand; foretells the success of Satan in perverting mankind; clears His own justice and wisdom from all imputation, having created man free and able enough to have withstood his tempter; yet declares His purpose of grace towards Him, in regard he fell not of his own malice, as did Satan, but by him seduced. The Son of God renders praises to His Father for the manifestation of His gracious purpose towards man; but God again declares, that grace cannot be extended towards man without the satisfaction of Divine Justice; man hath offended the Majesty of God by aspiring to Godhead, and therefore with all his progeny devoted to death must die, unless some one can be found sufficient to answer for his offence, and undergo his punishment. The Son of God freely offers himself a ransom for man: the Father accepts Him, ordains His incarnation, pronounces His exaltation above all names in Heaven and Earth; commands all the angels to adore Him; they obey, and hymning to their harps in full choir, celebrate the Father and the Son. Meanwhile Satan alights upon the bare convex of this world's outermost orb; where wandering he first finds a place since called the Limbo of Vanity; what persons and things fly up thither; thence comes to the gate of Heaven, described ascending by stairs, and the waters above the firmament that flow about it: his passage thence to the orb of the Sun; he finds there Uriel the regent of that orb, but first changes himself into the shape of a meaner angel; and pretending a zealous desire to behold the new creation and man whom God had placed here, inquires of him the place of his habitation, and is directed; alights first on Mount Niphates.

[1] intestine broils Civil wars.

[2] Now ... another world Newly formed cosmos of earth and celestial sphere (as distinct from heaven where God and his angels are located).

[3] Argo The ship of Jason and the Argonauts of Greek legend, sailors who faced many challenges in their travels; the jostling rocks Huge floating rocks that clashed and ground on one another were a peril passed by Jason and the Argonauts.

[4] Ulysses Subject of Homer's Odyssey and a character in his Iliad, a famous wandering king, sailor, and hero; larboard The port or left side of a ship; Charybdis ... steered Ulysses successfully navigated between the ocean hazards Scylla and Charybdis—a sea monster and a terrible whirlpool, respectively.

[5] amain Moving at full speed.

[6] th' utmost orb ... world Edge of the furthest outlying sphere of the universe (in the Ptolemaic model that places Earth in the center).

[7] special grace Unlike common grace, special grace is granted only to the elect and redeems them in spite of their own free will.

[8] holds Advances towards.

[9] undetermined square or round In other words, the overall shape of Heaven is indiscernible.

[10] in bigness ... by the moon Refers to the perceived size of the smallest star in the sky compared to the moon (not the actual size of a star compared to the moon); in other words, very, very small.

from BOOK 3

Hail, holy light, offspring of Heav'n first-born,
Or of th' eternal coeternal beam
May I express thee unblamed? Since God is light,[1]
And never but in unapproached° light incomparable
Dwelt from eternity, dwelt then in thee
Bright effluence of bright essence increate.[2]
Or hear'st thou rather[3] pure ethereal stream,
Whose fountain° who shall tell? Before the sun, source
Before the Heav'ns thou wert, and at the voice
Of God, as with a mantle, didst invest° envelop
The rising world of waters dark and deep,
Won from the void and formless infinite.
Thee I re-visit now with bolder wing,
Escaped the Stygian pool, though long detained
In that obscure sojourn, while in my flight
Through utter and through middle darkness[4] borne,
With other notes than to th' Orphean[5] lyre
I sung of Chaos and eternal Night;
Taught by the heavenly Muse to venture down
The dark descent, and up to re-ascend,
Though hard and rare: thee I revisit safe,
And feel thy sovereign vital lamp; but thou
Revisit'st not these eyes,[6] that roll in vain
To find thy piercing ray, and find no dawn;
So thick a drop serene[7] hath quenched their orbs,
Or dim suffusion veiled. Yet not the more
Cease I to wander, where the Muses haunt,
Clear spring, or shady grove, or sunny hill,
Smit° with the love of sacred song; but chief smitten
Thee, Sion,[8] and the flowery brooks beneath,
That wash thy hallowed feet, and warbling flow,
Nightly I visit: nor sometimes forget[9]
Those other two equaled with me in fate,[10]
So were I equalled with them in renown,
Thy sov'reign command, that Man should find grace;
Blind Thamyris, and blind Maeonides,
And Tiresias, and Phineus,[11] prophets old:
Then feed on thoughts, that voluntary move
Harmonious numbers; as the wakeful bird[12]
Sings darkling,° and in shadiest covert hid in the dark
Tunes her nocturnal note. Thus with the year

May I express thee unblamed May I call you that without being blamed; God is light See 1 John 1.5.

increate Not created, always existing.

Or hear'st thou rather Would you prefer to be called.

[4] Through ... darkness Through the full darkness of Hell and the less dark Chaos.

[5] Orphean Orpheus, a musician-hero of Greek myth, visited the underworld to retrieve his wife Eurydice. The notes of his lyre won him safe passage.

[6] Revisit'st not these eyes Milton became totally blind in 1652.

[7] drop serene Gutta serena, the eye disease Milton had.

[8] Sion Biblical mountain and site of spiritual learning.

[9] nor sometimes forget Remember always.

[10] Those ... fate Sharing my (blind) Fate.

[11] Thamyris Ancient Greek poet deprived of his sight by the Muses for competing with them; Maeonides Homer, the blind author of The Odyssey and The Iliad; Tiresias Greek prophet king blinded either by Hera or by Diana; Phineus Prophet blinded by the gods for telling too many truthful prophecies.

[12] numbers Lines of poetry; wakeful bird Nightingale.

Seasons return; but not to me returns
Day, or the sweet approach of even or morn,
Or sight of vernal° bloom, or summer's rose, spring
Or flocks, or herds, or human face divine;
But cloud instead, and ever-during° dark ever enduring
Surrounds me, from the cheerful ways of men
Cut off, and for the book of knowledge[1] fair
Presented with a universal blank
Of Nature's works to me expunged and razed,
And Wisdom at one entrance quite shut out.
So much the rather thou, celestial Light,
Shine inward, and the mind through all her powers
Irradiate; there plant eyes, all mist from thence Purge and disperse, that I may see and tell
Of things invisible to mortal sight.
  Now had the Almighty Father from above,
From the pure empyrean[2] where He sits
High throned above all height, bent down His eye
His own works and their works at once to view:
About Him all the sanctities of Heaven[3]
Stood thick as stars, and from His sight received
Beatitude past utterance; on his right
The radiant image of His glory sat,
His only Son; on earth He first beheld
Our two first parents, yet° the only two thus far
Of mankind in the happy garden placed
Reaping immortal fruits of joy and love,
Uninterrupted joy, unrivalled love,
In blissful solitude; He then surveyed
Hell and the gulf between, and Satan there
Coasting[4] the wall of Heav'n on this side night
In the dun° air sublime, and ready now dusky
To stoop° with wearied wings, and willing feet, swoop
On the bare outside of this world,[5] that seemed Firm land embosomed,° without firmament,° enclosed / sky
Uncertain which, in ocean or in air.
Him God beholding from His prospect high,
Wherein past, present, future, He beholds,
Thus to His only Son foreseeing spake:

  "Only begotten Son, seest Thou what rage
Transports Our adversary? whom no bounds
Prescribed no bars of Hell, nor all the chains
Heaped on him there, nor yet the main abyss
Wide interrupt,[6] can hold; so bent he seems
On desperate revenge, that shall redound
Upon his own rebellious head. And now,
Through all restraint broke loose, he wings his way
Not far off Heav'n, in the precincts of light,
Directly towards the new created world,
And man there placed, with purpose to assay
If him by force he can destroy, or, worse,
By some false guile pervert; and shall pervert;
For man will hearken to his glozing° lies, flattering
And easily transgress the sole command,
Sole pledge of his obedience: so will fall
He and his faithless progeny: Whose fault?
Whose but his own? Ingrate, he had of Me
All he could have; I made him just and right,
Sufficient to have stood, though free to fall.
Such I created all th' ethereal powers
And spirits, both them who stood, and them who failed;
Freely they stood who stood, and fell who fell.
Not free, what proof could they have given sincere
Of true allegiance, constant faith, or love,
Where only what they needs must do appeared,
Not what they would? What praise could they receive?
What pleasure I, from such obedience paid,
When Will and Reason (Reason also is choice)
Useless and vain, of freedom both despoiled,
Made passive both, had served necessity,
Not me? They therefore, as to right belonged,
So were created, nor can justly accuse
Their Maker, or their making, or their fate,
As if predestination over-ruled
Their will disposed by absolute decree
Or high foreknowledge; they themselves decreed
Their own revolt, not I: if I foreknew,
Foreknowledge had no influence on their fault,
Which had no less proved certain unforeknown.
So without least impulse or shadow of fate,
Or aught by me immutably foreseen,
They trespass, authors to themselves in all

---

[1] book of knowledge Nature, often imagined as a book which, like the Bible, can be studied to obtain divinely revealed knowledge.

[2] empyrean Highest Heaven.

[3] sanctities of Heaven Angels.

[4] Coasting Following the coast of.

[5] world Not only the earth but the entire universe.

[6] Wide interrupt Extensively dividing Hell from Heaven.

Both what they judge and what they choose; for so
I formed them free, and free they must remain,
Till they enthral themselves: I else must change
Their nature, and revoke the high decree
Unchangeable, eternal, which ordained
Their freedom, they themselves ordained their fall.
The first sort[1] by their own suggestion fell,
Self-tempted, self-depraved: Man falls deceived
By the other first: Man therefore shall find grace,
The other none: In mercy and justice both,
Through Heav'n and earth, so shall My glory excel,
But mercy, first and last, shall brightest shine."
Thus while God spake, ambrosial fragrance filled
All Heaven, and in the blessèd spirits elect[2]
Sense of new joy ineffable diffused.
Beyond compare the Son of God was seen
Most glorious; in Him all His Father shone
Substantially expressed;[3] and in His face
Divine compassion visibly appeared,
Love without end, and without measure grace,
Which uttering, thus He to His Father spake:
"O Father, gracious was that word which closed
Thy sovereign sentence, that man should find grace;
For which both Heav'n and earth shall high extol
Thy praises, with the innumerable sound
Of hymns and sacred songs, wherewith Thy throne
Encompassed shall resound Thee ever blest.
For should Man finally be lost, should Man,
Thy creature late so loved, thy youngest son,
Fall circumvented thus by fraud, though joined
With his own folly? That be from Thee far,
That far be from Thee, Father, who art Judge
Of all things made, and judgest only right.[4]
Or shall the adversary thus obtain
His end, and frustrate Thine? Shall he fulfil
His malice, and Thy goodness bring to nought,
Or proud return, though to his heavier doom,
Yet with revenge accomplished, and to Hell
Draw after him the whole race of mankind,
By him corrupted? Or wilt Thou Thyself
Abolish Thy creation, and unmake
For him, what for Thy glory Thou hast made?
So should Thy goodness and Thy greatness both
Be questioned and blasphemed without defence."
To whom the great Creator thus replied:
"O Son, in whom My soul hath chief delight,
Son of My bosom, Son who art alone
My word, My wisdom, and effectual might,
All hast Thou spoken as My thoughts are, all
As My eternal purpose hath decreed;
Man shall not quite be lost, but saved who will;
Yet not of will in him, but grace in Me
Freely vouchsafed;° once more I will renew given
His lapsed powers, though forfeit; and enthralled
By sin to foul exorbitant desires;
Upheld by Me, yet once more he shall stand
On even ground against his mortal foe;
By Me upheld, that he may know how frail
His fallen condition is, and to Me owe
All his deliv'rance, and to none but Me.
Some I have chosen of peculiar grace,
Elect above the rest;[5] so is My will:
The rest shall hear Me call, and oft be warned
Their sinful state, and to appease betimes
Th' incensèd deity, while offered grace
Invites; for I will clear their senses dark,[6]
What may suffice, and soften stony hearts
To pray, repent, and bring obedience due.
To prayer, repentance, and obedience due,
Though but endeavoured with sincere intent,
Mine ear shall not be slow, Mine eye not shut.
And I will place within them as a guide,
My umpire Conscience; whom if they will hear,
Light after light, well used, they shall attain,[7]
And to the end, persisting, safe arrive.
This My long sufferance, and My day of grace,
They who neglect and scorn, shall never taste;

---

[1] The first sort Satan and the other fallen angels.

[2] spirits elect Unfallen angels.

[3] Substantially expressed Physically demonstrated (as opposed to the Father's unseeable greatness).

[4] who art … right See Genesis 18.25 for a similar question from Abraham in response to God's plan to destroy Sodom.

[5] Some … above the rest Contrary to the Calvinist belief that one's fate was predetermined, God offers an opportunity for salvation to all, while still giving special consideration to a chosen few.

[6] their senses dark Cf. 1 Corinthians 13.12: "For now we see through a glass, darkly."

[7] Light … attain If they use their conscience well, they will gain more and more light.

But hard be hardened, blind be blinded more,
That they may stumble on, and deeper fall;
And none but such from mercy I exclude.
But yet all is not done; Man disobeying,
Disloyal, breaks his fealty,° and sins faith, loyalty
Against the high supremacy of Heav'n,
Affecting Godhead,[1] and, so losing all,
To expiate his treason hath nought left,
But to destruction sacred and devote,
He, with his whole posterity, must die,
Die he or justice must; unless for him
Some other able, and as willing, pay
The rigid satisfaction, death for death.
Say, heavenly powers, where shall we find such love?
Which of you will be mortal,[2] to redeem
Man's mortal crime, and just the unjust to save,
Dwells in all Heaven charity so dear?"
He asked, but all the heav'nly choir stood mute,
And silence was in Heav'n: on man's behalf
Patron or intercessor none appeared,
Much less that durst upon his own head draw
The deadly forfeiture, and ransom set.
And now without redemption all mankind
Must have been lost, adjudged to death and Hell
By doom severe, had not the Son of God,
In whom the fullness dwells of love divine,
His dearest mediation thus renewed:
"Father, Thy word is past, Man shall find grace;
And shall grace not find means, that finds her way,
The speediest of Thy winged messengers,
To visit all Thy creatures, and to all
Comes unprevented,° unimplor'd, unsought? unexpected
Happy for Man, so coming; he her aid
Can never seek, once dead in sins, and lost;
Atonement for himself, or offering meet,° suitable
Indebted and undone, hath none to bring;
Behold Me then: Me for him, life for life
I offer: on Me let Thine anger fall;
Account Me Man; I for his sake will leave
Thy bosom, and this glory next to Thee
Freely put off, and for him lastly die
Well pleased; on Me let Death wreak all his rage.
Under his gloomy power I shall not long
Lie vanquished. Thou hast giv'n Me to possess
Life in Myself for ever; by Thee I live;
Though now to Death I yield, and am his due,
All that of Me can die, yet, that debt paid,
Thou wilt not leave Me in the loathsome grave
His prey, nor suffer my unspotted soul
For ever with corruption there to dwell;
But I shall rise victorious, and subdue
My vanquisher, spoiled of his vaunted spoil.
Death his death's wound shall then receive, and stoop
Inglorious, of his mortal sting disarmed;[3]
I through the ample air in triumph high
Shall lead Hell captive maugre[4] Hell, and show
The powers of darkness bound. Thou, at the sight
Pleased, out of Heaven shall look down and smile,
While, by Thee raised, I ruin° all My foes; overthrow
Death last, and with his carcass glut the grave;
Then, with the multitude of My redeemed,
Shall enter Heaven, long absent, and return,
Father, to see Thy face, wherein no cloud
Of anger shall remain, but peace assured
And reconcilement: wrath shall be no more
Thenceforth, but in Thy presence joy entire."
His words here ended; but His meek aspect
Silent yet spake, and breathed immortal love
To mortal men, above which only shone
Filial[5] obedience: as a sacrifice
Glad to be offered, He attends the will
Of His great Father. Admiration seized
All Heav'n, what this might mean, and whither tend,
Wondering; but soon th' Almighty thus replied:
"O Thou in Heav'n and earth the only peace
Found out for mankind under wrath, O Thou
My sole complacence![6] Well Thou know'st how dear
To Me are all My works; nor Man the least,
Though last created, that for him I spare
Thee from My bosom and right hand, to save,
By losing Thee a while, the whole race lost.
Thou, therefore, whom Thou only canst redeem,

---

[1] Affecting Godhead Desiring or pursuing God's power and position.

[2] mortal Human, though in the next line the word takes on a meaning of "lethal."

[3] Death … his mortal sting disarmed See 1 Corinthians 15.55.

[4] maugre In spite of.

[5] Filial Proper for a child/parent relationship.

[6] complacence Here, source of satisfaction.

Their nature also to Thy nature join;
And be Thyself Man among men on earth,
Made flesh, when time shall be, of virgin seed,
By wondrous birth; be Thou in Adam's room[1]
The head of all mankind, though Adam's son.[2]
As in him perish all men, so in Thee,
As from a second root, shall be restored
As many as are restored, without Thee none.
His crime makes guilty all his sons; Thy merit,
Imputed, shall absolve them who renounce
Their own both righteous and unrighteous deeds,
And live in Thee transplanted, and from Thee
Receive new life.[3] So Man, as is most just,
Shall satisfy for Man, be judged and die,
And dying rise, and rising with Him raise
His brethren, ransomed with His own dear life.
So heavenly love shall outdo hellish hate,
Giving to death, and dying to redeem,
So dearly to redeem what hellish hate
So easily destroyed, and still destroys
In those who, when they may, accept not grace.
Nor shalt Thou, by descending to assume Man's nature, lessen or degrade Thine own.
Because Thou hast, though throned in highest bliss
Equal to God, and equally enjoying
God-like fruition,° quitted all, to save enjoyment
A world from utter loss, and hast been found
By merit more than birthright[4] Son of God,
Found worthiest to be so by being good,
Far more than great or high; because in Thee
Love hath abounded more than glory abounds;
Therefore Thy humiliation shall exalt
With Thee Thy manhood also to this throne:
Here shalt thou sit incarnate, here shalt reign
Both God and Man, Son both of God and Man,
Anointed[5] universal King; all power
I give Thee; reign forever, and assume Thy merits; under Thee, as Head Supreme,
Thrones, princedoms, powers, dominions, I reduce:
All knees to Thee shall bow, of them that bide° live
In Heav'n, or earth, or under earth in Hell.
When Thou, attended gloriously from Heav'n,
Shalt in the sky appear, and from Thee send
The summoning arch-angels to proclaim
Thy dread tribunal; forthwith from all winds,
The living, and forthwith the cited° dead called forth
Of all past ages, to the general doom° judgment
Shall hasten; such a peal shall rouse their sleep.
Then, all Thy saints assembled, Thou shalt judge
Bad men and angels; they, arraigned, shall sink
Beneath Thy sentence; Hell, her numbers full,
Thenceforth shall be forever shut. Meanwhile
The world shall burn, and from her ashes spring
New Heav'n and earth,[6] wherein the just shall dwell,
And, after all their tribulations long,
See golden days, fruitful of golden deeds,
With joy and peace triumphing, and fair truth.
Then Thou Thy regal sceptre shall lay by,
For regal sceptre then no more shall need,
God shall be all in all.[7] But, all ye gods,° angels
Adore Him, who to compass all this dies;
Adore the Son, and honour Him as Me."
    No sooner had th' Almighty ceased, but all
The multitude of angels, with a shout
Loud as from numbers without number, sweet
As from blest voices, uttering joy, Heav'n rung
With jubilee, and loud hosannas[8] filled
Th' eternal regions: lowly reverent
Towards either throne[9] they bow, and to the ground
With solemn adoration down they cast

[1] in Adam's room Instead of Adam.

[2] Adam's son The Son preexists all beings, but in becoming human he also becomes a son of Adam.

[3] Thy merit … new life Through the Son's absorbing mankind's crimes but also through a transfer of the Son's goodness to mankind, salvation is made possible for all. See Romans 5.18–21.

[4] By merit … birthright Contrary to doctrine, Milton suggests the Son deserves his role due to his own merit rather than through inheritance.

[5] Anointed The Hebrew title "Messiah," bestowed on the Son, translates to "Anointed."

[6] New Heav'n and earth See Matthew 24.30–31.

[7] When Thou, attended … be all in all This account of the end of all things is paraphrased from the Book of Revelation.

[8] hosannas Shouts of fervent and worshipful praise.

[9] either throne Both the throne of God and the throne of the Son of God.

Their crowns inwove with amarant[1] and gold;
Immortal amarant, a flower which once
In Paradise, fast° by the tree of life, near
Began to bloom; but soon for man's offence
To Heav'n removed, where first it grew, there grows,
And flowers aloft shading the fount of life,
And where the river of bliss through midst of Heav'n

With these that never fade the spirits elect
Bind their resplendent locks enwreathed with beams;
Now in loose garlands thick thrown off, the bright
Pavement, that like a sea of jasper shone,
Empurpled with celestial roses smiled.
Then, crowned again, their golden harps they took,
Harps ever tuned, that glittering by their side
Like quivers hung, and with preamble sweet
Of charming symphony they introduce
Their sacred song, and waken raptures high;
No voice exempt, no voice but well could join
Melodious part, such concord is in Heav'n. . . .

ARGUMENT TO BOOK 4

Satan now in prospect of Eden, and nigh the place where he must now attempt the bold enterprise which he undertook alone against God and man, falls into many doubts with himself, and many passions, fear, envy, and despair; but at length confirms himself in evil, journeys on to Paradise, whose outward prospect and situation is described, overleaps the bounds, sits in the shape of a cormorant[2] on the Tree of Life, as highest in the garden to look about him. The garden described; Satan's first sight of Adam and Eve; his wonder at their excellent form and happy state, but with resolution to work their fall; overhears their discourse, thence gathers that the Tree of Knowledge was forbidden them to eat of, under penalty of death; and thereon intends to found his temptation, by seducing them to transgress: then leaves them a while, to know further of their state by some other means. Meanwhile Uriel descending on a sunbeam warns Gabriel, who had in charge the gate of Paradise, that some evil spirit had escaped the deep, and passed at noon by his sphere in the shape of a good angel down to Paradise, discovered after by his furious gestures in the Mount. Gabriel promises to find him out ere morning. Night coming on, Adam and Eve discourse of going to their rest: their bower described; their evening worship. Gabriel drawing forth his bands of night watch to walk the round of Paradise, appoints two strong angels to Adam's bower, least the evil spirit should be there doing some harm to Adam or Eve sleeping; there they find him at the ear of Eve, tempting her in a dream, and bring him, though unwilling, to Gabriel; by whom questioned, he scornfully answers, prepares resistance, but hindered by a sign from Heaven, flies out of Paradise.

BOOK 4

O, for that warning voice, which he, who saw
Th' Apocalypse, heard cry in Heaven aloud,
Then when the Dragon, put to second rout,[3]
Came furious down to be revenged on men,
Woe to the inhabitants on earth! That now,
While time was,[4] our first parents had been warned
The coming of their secret foe, and 'scaped,
Haply so 'scaped his mortal snare: For now
Satan, now first inflamed with rage, came down,
The tempter ere° th' accuser of mankind, before becoming
To wreak on innocent frail man his loss
Of that first battle, and his flight to Hell:
Yet, not rejoicing in his speed, though bold
Far off and fearless, nor with cause to boast,
Begins his dire attempt; which nigh the birth
Now rolling boils in his tumultuous breast,
And like a devilish engine back recoils
Upon himself; horror and doubt distract
His troubled thoughts, and from the bottom stir
The Hell within him; for within him Hell
He brings, and round about him, nor from Hell

---

[1] amarant Amaranthus, a red flower with large leaves that symbolizes undying love.

[2] cormorant Sea-bird associated with avarice.

[3] O, for that . . . to second rout See the Book of Revelation, specifically Revelation 1.10.

[4] That now / While time was If that had happened now, while there was still time.

One step, no more than from himself, can fly
By change of place: Now conscience wakes despair,
That slumbered; wakes the bitter memory
Of what he was, what is, and what must be Worse; of worse deeds worse sufferings must ensue.
Sometimes towards Eden, which now in his view
Lay pleasant, his grieved look he fixes sad;
Sometimes towards Heav'n, and the full-blazing sun,
Which now sat high in his meridian° tower: noon-time
Then, much revolving,° thus in sighs began: pondering
"O thou that with surpassing glory crowned
Lookest from thy sole dominion like the God
Of this new world; at whose sight all the stars
Hide their diminished heads; to thee I call,
But with no friendly voice, and add thy name,
Of sun to tell thee how I hate thy beams,
That bring to my remembrance from what state
I fell, how glorious once above thy sphere;
Till Pride and worse Ambition threw me down
Warring in Heav'n against Heav'n's matchless King:
Ah, wherefore! He deserved no such return° repayment
From me, whom He created what I was
In that bright eminence, and with His good
Upbraided° none; nor was His service hard. admonished
What could be less than to afford Him praise,
The easiest recompense, and pay Him thanks,
How due! Yet all His good proved ill in me,
And wrought but malice; lifted up so high
I 'sdained° subjection, and thought one step higher disdained
Would set me highest, and in a moment quit° repay
The debt immense of endless gratitude,
So burdensome still paying, still to owe,
Forgetful what from Him I still received,
And understood not that a grateful mind
By owing owes not, but still pays, at once
Indebted and discharged; what burden then
O, had His powerful destiny ordained
Me some inferior angel, I had stood
Then happy; no unbounded hope had raised
Ambition! Yet why not some other power
As great might have aspired, and me, though mean,° lowly
Drawn to his part; but other powers as great Fell not, but stand unshaken, from within
Or from without, to all temptations armed.
Hadst thou the same free will and power to stand?
Thou hadst: whom hast thou then or what to accuse,
But Heav'n's free love dealt equally to all?
Be then his love accursed, since love or hate,
To me alike, it deals eternal woe.
Nay, cursed be thou; since against His thy will Chose freely what it now so justly rues.
Me miserable! which way shall I fly
Infinite wrath, and infinite despair?
Which way I fly is Hell; myself am Hell;
And, in the lowest deep, a lower deep
Still threatening to devour me opens wide,
To which the Hell I suffer seems a Heav'n.
O, then, at last relent: Is there no place
Left for repentance, none for pardon left?
None left but by submission; and that word
Disdain forbids me, and my dread of shame
Among the spirits beneath, whom I seduced
With other promises and other vaunts
Than to submit, boasting I could subdue
Th' Omnipotent. Ay me! They little know
How dearly I abide° that boast so vain, bear
Under what torments inwardly I groan,
While they adore me on the throne of Hell.
With diadem and sceptre high advanced,
The lower still I fall, only supreme
In misery: such joy ambition finds.
But say I could repent, and could obtain,
By act of grace,[1] my former state; how soon
Would height recall high thoughts, how soon unsay
What feigned submission swore? Ease would recant
Vows made in pain, as violent[2] and void.
For never can true reconcilement grow,
Where wounds of deadly hate have pierced so deep:
Which would but lead me to a worse relapse
And heavier fall: so should I purchase dear
Short intermission bought with double smart.
This knows my punisher; therefore as far
From granting He, as I from begging, peace;
All hope excluded thus, behold, instead
Of us outcast, exiled, His new delight,
Mankind created, and for Him this world.

---

[1] act of grace Official pardon.

[2] violent Obtained through force.

So farewell, hope; and with hope farewell, fear;
Farewell, remorse: all good to me is lost;
Evil, be thou my good; by thee at least
Divided empire with Heav'n's King I hold,
By thee, and more than half perhaps will reign;
As man ere long, and this new world, shall know."
Thus while he spake, each passion dimmed his face
Thrice changed with pale,° ire, envy, and despair; paleness
Which marred his borrowed visage,[1] and betrayed
Him counterfeit, if any eye beheld.
For heav'nly minds from such distempers foul
Are ever clear. Whereof he soon aware,
Each perturbation smoothed with outward calm,
Artificer of fraud; and was the first
That practised falsehood[2] under saintly show,
Deep malice to conceal, couched[3] with revenge:
Yet not enough had practised to deceive
Uriel[4] once warned; whose eye pursued him down
The way he went, and on the Assyrian mount[5]
Saw him disfigured more than could befall
Spirit of happy sort; his gestures fierce
He marked and mad demeanour, then alone,
As he supposed, all unobserved, unseen.
So on he fares, and to the border comes
Of Eden, where delicious Paradise,[6]
Now nearer, crowns with her enclosure green,
As with a rural mound, the champaign head
Of a steep wilderness,[7] whose hairy° sides forested
With thicket overgrown, grotesque[8] and wild,
Access denied; and overhead up grew
Insuperable height of loftiest shade,
Cedar, and pine, and fir, and branching palm,
A sylvan scene, and, as the ranks ascend,
Shade above shade, a woody theatre[9]
Of stateliest view. Yet higher than their tops
The verdurous wall of Paradise upsprung;
Which to our general sire° gave prospect large i.e., Adam
Into his nether empire neighbouring round.
And higher than that wall a circling row
Of goodliest trees, laden with fairest fruit,
Blossoms and fruits at once of golden hue,
Appeared, with gay enamelled° colours mixed: vivid
On which the sun more glad impressed his beams
Than in fair evening cloud, or humid bow,[10]
When God hath showered the earth; so lovely seemed
That landskip:° And of pure now purer air landscape
Meets his approach, and to the heart inspires° imbues
Vernal delight and joy, able to drive
All sadness but despair: now gentle gales,
Fanning their odoriferous wings, dispense
Native perfumes, and whisper whence they stole
Those balmy spoils. As when to them who fail
Beyond the Cape of Hope, and now are past
Mozambique, off at sea northeast winds blow
Sabean[11] odours from the spicy shore
Of Araby the blest; with such delay
Well pleased they slack their course, and many a league
Cheered with the grateful° smell old ocean smiles: enjoyable
So entertained those odorous sweets the fiend,
Who came their bane; though with them better pleased
Than Asmodeus with the fishy fume
That drove him, though enamoured, from the spouse
Of Tobit's son, and with a vengeance sent
From Media post to Egypt,[12] there fast bound.

[1] his borrowed visage Satan had disguised himself as a "stripling cherub" at the end of Book 3, to fool the angel Uriel into telling him where Earth was.

[2] first / That practised falsehood Satan is known as the originator of lies.

[3] couched Lying closely next to.

[4] Uriel Angel standing guard on the sun; the name literally means "fire of God."

[5] the Assyrian mount Mount Niphates in Syria, named in Book 3 as Satan's landing place.

[6] Paradise Hilltop garden found east of Eden.

[7] champaign … wilderness Pastoral meadow at the foot of a steep and wooded slope.

[8] grotesque Resembling a grotto, with overgrown vegetation.

[9] woody theatre Wood with tiers reminiscent of those in an amphitheater of ancient drama.

[10] humid bow Rainbow.

[11] Sabean Exotic; from Sheba, modern-day Yemen.

[12] Than Asmodeus … post to Egypt Story from the Apocryphal Book of Tobit, in which Tobit's son Tobias, to win the hand of Sara, defeats the incubus Asmodeus by burning the liver of a certain fish to call the archangel Raphael, who "took the devil, and bound him in the desert of upper Egypt" (Tobit 8.3).

Now to th' ascent of that steep savage hill
Satan had journeyed on, pensive and slow;
But further way found none, so thick entwined,
As one continued brake,° the undergrowth thicket
Of shrubs and tangling bushes had perplexed
All path of man or beast that passed that way.
One gate there only was, and that looked east
On the other side: which when the arch-felon saw,
Due entrance he disdained; and, in contempt,
At one slight bound high over-leaped all bound
Of hill or highest wall, and sheer° within entirely
Lights on his feet. As when a prowling wolf,
Whom hunger drives to seek new haunt for prey,
Watching where shepherds pen their flocks at eve
In hurdled cotes[1] amid the field secure,
Leaps o'er the fence with ease into the fold:
Or as a thief, bent to unhoard the cash
Of some rich burgher,° whose substantial doors, merchant
Cross-barred and bolted fast, fear no assault,
In at the window climbs, or o'er the tiles:° shingles
So clomb° this first grand thief into God's fold; climbed
So since into his church lewd hirelings[2] climb.
Thence up he flew, and on the tree of life,
The middle tree and highest there that grew,
Sat like a cormorant; yet not true life
Thereby regained, but sat devising death
To them who lived; nor on the virtue thought
Of that life-giving plant, but only used
For prospect[3] what well used had been the pledge
Of immortality. So little knows
Any, but God alone, to value right
The good before him, but perverts best things
To worst abuse, or to their meanest use.
Beneath him with new wonder now he views,
To all delight of human sense exposed,
In narrow room, nature's whole wealth, yea more,
A Heav'n on Earth: For blissful paradise
Of God the garden was, by Him in the east
Of Eden planted; Eden stretched her line
From Auran° eastward to the royal towers Israel
Of great Seleucia,° built by Grecian kings, Iraq
Of where the sons of Eden long before
Dwelt in Telassar:[4] In this pleasant soil
His far more pleasant garden God ordained;
Out of the fertile ground He caused to grow
All trees of noblest kind for sight, smell, taste;
And all amid them stood the tree of life,
High eminent, blooming ambrosial fruit
Of vegetable gold; and next to life,
Our death, the tree of knowledge, grew fast by,
Knowledge of good bought dear by knowing ill.
Southward through Eden went a river large,[5]
Nor changed his course, but through the shaggy hill
Passed underneath engulfed; for God had thrown
That mountain as His garden-mould[6] high raised
Upon the rapid current, which, through veins
Of porous earth with kindly° thirst up-drawn, suitable
Rose a fresh fountain, and with many a rill° stream
Watered the garden; thence united fell
Down the steep glade, and met the nether flood,
Which from his darksome passage now appears,
And now, divided into four main streams,
Runs diverse, wandering many a famous realm
And country, whereof here needs no account;
But rather to tell how, if art could tell,
How from that sapphire fount the crisped° brooks, waving
Rolling on orient pearl and sands of gold,
With mazy error° under pendant shades meander
Ran nectar, visiting each plant, and fed
Flowers worthy of Paradise, which not nice° art careful
In beds and curious knots, but nature boon° abundant
Poured forth profuse on hill, and dale, and plain,
Both where the morning sun first warmly smote
The open field, and where the unpierced shade
Imbrowned° the noontide bowers: Thus was this place darkened
A happy rural seat of various view;
Groves whose rich trees wept odorous gums and balm,
Others whose fruit, burnished with golden rind,

[5] Enna Meadow in Sicily.

[6] Proserpine … world Proserpine, the daughter of the goddess of agriculture and the harvest, Ceres, was kidnapped by the god of the underworld, Dis (Hades or Pluto). Proserpine's mother went into mourning, thereby bringing winter to the land. Dis agreed to return Proserpine to her mother for half the year; hence, the seasons of summer and winter.

[7] that sweet … by Orontes Daphne was a Naiad, a spirit charged with safekeeping of rivers, streams, and brooks. She was willingly transformed into a laurel tree to avoid Apollo's amorous pursuit; this event was supposed to have happened near the river Orontes, where it crosses through Syria, and to have resulted in a peaceful grotto beneath the transfigured laurel, now sacred to Apollo.

Then was not guilty shame, dishonest° shame impure
Of nature's works, honour dishonourable,
Sin-bred, how have ye troubled all mankind
With shows instead, mere shows of seeming pure,
And banished from man's life his happiest life,
Simplicity and spotless innocence!
So passed they naked on, nor shunned the sight
Of God or angel; for they thought no ill:
So hand in hand they passed, the loveliest pair,
That ever since in love's embraces met;
Adam the goodliest man of men since born
His sons, the fairest of her daughters Eve.
Under a tuft of shade that on a green
Stood whispering soft, by a fresh fountain side
They sat them down; and, after no more toil
Of their sweet gardening labour than sufficed
To recommend cool Zephyr,[1] and made ease
More easy, wholesome thirst and appetite
More grateful, to their supper-fruits they fell,
Nectarine[2] fruits which the compliant boughs
Yielded them, side-long as they sat recline
On the soft downy bank damasked with flowers:
The savoury pulp they chew, and in the rind,
Still as they thirsted, scoop the brimming stream;
Nor gentle purpose,° nor endearing smiles discussion
Wanted, nor youthful dalliance, as beseems
Fair couple, linked in happy nuptial league,[3]
Alone as they. About them frisking played
All beasts of the earth, since wild, and of all chase[4]
In wood or wilderness, forest or den;
Sporting the lion ramped,[5] and in his paw
Dandled the kid; bears, tigers, ounces, pards,[6]
Gambolled before them; the unwieldy elephant,
To make them mirth, used all his might, and wreathed
His lithe proboscis;° close the serpent sly, trunk

Or bedward ruminating; for the sun,
Declined, was hasting now with prone career[8]
To th' ocean isles,[9] and in the ascending scale
Of Heav'n the stars that usher evening rose:
When Satan still in gaze, as first he stood,
Scarce thus at length failed speech recovered sad.
"O Hell! What do mine eyes with grief behold!
Into our room of bliss thus high advanced
Creatures of other mould, earth-born perhaps,
Not spirits, yet to heav'nly spirits bright
Little inferior; whom my thoughts pursue
With wonder, and could love, so lively shines
In them divine resemblance, and such grace
The hand that formed them on their shape hath poured.
Ah! Gentle pair, ye little think how nigh
Your change approaches, when all these delights
Will vanish, and deliver ye to woe;
More woe, the more your taste is now of joy;
Happy, but for so happy ill secured
Long to continue, and this high seat your Heav'n
Ill fenced for Heav'n to keep out such a foe
As now is entered; yet no purposed foe
To you, whom I could pity thus forlorn,

Though I unpitied: League with you I seek,
And mutual amity, so strait, so close,
That I with you must dwell, or you with me
Henceforth; my dwelling haply may not please,
Like this fair Paradise, your sense; yet such Accept your Maker's work; He gave it me,
Which I as freely give: Hell shall unfold,
To entertain you two, her widest gates,
And send forth all her kings; there will be room,
Not like these narrow limits, to receive
Your numerous offspring; if no better place,
Thank Him who puts me loath to this revenge
On you who wrong me not for Him who wronged.
And should I at your harmless innocence
Melt, as I do, yet public reason just,
Honour and empire with revenge enlarged,
By conquering this new world, compels me now
To do what else, though damned, I should abhor."
So spake the fiend, and with necessity,
The tyrant's plea, excused his devilish deeds.
Then from his lofty stand on that high tree
Down he alights among the sportful herd
Of those four-footed kinds, himself now one,
Now other, as their shape served best his end
Nearer to view his prey, and, unespied,
To mark what of their state he more might learn,
By word or action marked. About them round
A lion now he stalks with fiery glare;
Then as a tiger, who by chance hath spied
In some purlieu[1] two gentle fawns at play,
Straight couches close, then, rising, changes oft
His couchant° watch, as one who chose his ground, crouching
Whence rushing, he might surest seize them both,
Gripped in each paw: when, Adam first of men
To first of women Eve thus moving speech,
Turned him, all ear to hear new utterance flow:
"Sole partner, and sole part, of all these joys,
Dearer thyself than all; needs must the power
That made us, and for us this ample world,
Be infinitely good, and of His good
As liberal and free as infinite;
That raised us from the dust,[2] and placed us here
In all this happiness, who at His hand
Have nothing merited, nor can perform
Aught whereof He hath need; He who requires
From us no other service than to keep
This one, this easy charge, of all the trees
In Paradise that bear delicious fruit
So various, not to taste that only tree
Of knowledge, planted by the tree of life;[3]
So near grows death to life, whate'er death is,
Some dreadful thing no doubt; for well thou knowest
God hath pronounced it death to taste that tree,
The only sign of our obedience left,
Among so many signs of power and rule
Conferred upon us, and dominion giv'n[4]
Over all other creatures that possess
Earth, air, and sea. Then let us not think hard
One easy prohibition, who enjoy
Free leave so large to all things else, and choice
Unlimited of manifold delights:
But let us ever praise Him, and extol
His bounty, following our delightful task,
To prune these growing plants, and tend these flowers,
Which were it toilsome, yet with thee were sweet."
To whom thus Eve replied: "O thou for whom
And from whom I was formed, flesh of thy flesh,
And without whom am to no end, my guide
And head! What thou hast said is just and right.
For we to Him indeed all praises owe,
And daily thanks; I chiefly, who enjoy
So far the happier lot, enjoying thee
Pre-eminent by so much odds,° while thou benefit
Like consort to thyself canst nowhere find.
That day I oft remember, when from sleep
I first awaked, and found myself reposed
Under a shade of flowers, much wondering where
And what I was, whence thither brought, and how.
Not distant far from thence a murmuring sound
Of waters issued from a cave, and spread
Into a liquid plain, then stood unmoved
Pure as th' expanse of Heav'n; I thither went
With unexperienced thought, and laid me down
On the green bank, to look into the clear

Smooth lake, that to me seemed another sky.
As I bent down to look, just opposite
A shape within the wat'ry gleam appeared,
Bending to look on me: I started back,
It started back; but pleased I soon returned,
Pleased it returned as soon with answering looks
Of sympathy and love:[1] There I had fixed
Mine eyes till now, and pined with vain desire,
Had not a voice thus warned me; 'What thou seest,
What there thou seest, fair creature, is thyself;
With thee it came and goes: but follow me,
And I will bring thee where no shadow stays° impedes
Thy coming, and thy soft embraces—he
Whose image thou art; him thou shalt enjoy
Inseparably thine, to him shalt bear
Multitudes like thyself, and thence be called Mother of human race.' What could I do,
But follow straight, invisibly thus led?
Till I espied thee, fair indeed and tall,
Under a platane;° yet methought less fair, planetree
Less winning soft, less amiably mild,
Than that smooth wat'ry image: back I turned;[2]
Thou following cryedst aloud, 'Return, fair Eve;
Whom flyest thou?[3] Whom thou flyest, of him thou art,
His flesh, his bone; to give thee being I lent
Out of my side to thee, nearest my heart,
Substantial life, to have thee by my side
Henceforth an individual° solace dear; inseparable
Part of my soul I seek thee, and thee claim
My other half': With that thy gentle hand
Seized mine: I yielded, and from that time see
How beauty is excelled by manly grace,
And wisdom, which alone is truly fair."
    So spake our general mother, and with eyes
Of conjugal attraction unreproved,
And meek surrender, half-embracing leaned
On our first father; half her swelling breast
Naked met his, under the flowing gold
Of her loose tresses hid: he in delight
Both of her beauty, and submissive charms,
Smiled with superior love, as Jupiter
On Juno smiles, when he impregns° the impregnates clouds
That shed May flowers; and pressed her matron lip
With kisses pure. Aside the devil turned
For envy; yet with jealous leer malign
Eyed them askance, and to himself thus plained.[4]
    "Sight hateful, sight tormenting! Thus these two,
Imparadised in one another's arms,
The happier Eden, shall enjoy their fill
Of bliss on bliss; while I to Hell am thrust,
Where neither joy nor love, but fierce desire,
Among our other torments not the least,
Still unfulfilled with pain of longing pines.
Yet let me not forget what I have gained
From their own mouths: all is not theirs, it seems;
One fatal tree there stands, of knowledge called,
Forbidden them to taste: knowledge forbidd'n
Suspicious, reasonless. Why should their Lord
Envy° them that? Can it be sin to know? grudge
Can it be death? And do they only stand
By ignorance? Is that their happy state,
The proof of their obedience and their faith?
O fair foundation laid whereon to build
Their ruin! Hence I will excite their minds
With more desire to know, and to reject
Envious commands, invented with design
To keep them low, whom knowledge might exalt
Equal with gods: aspiring to be such,
They taste and die: What likelier can ensue
But first with narrow search I must walk round
This garden, and no corner leave unspied;
A chance but chance[5] may lead where I may meet
Some wandering spirit of Heav'n by fountain side,
Or in thick shade retired, from him to draw
What further would be learned. Live while ye may,
Yet happy pair; enjoy, till I return,

[1] As I bent down ... sympathy and love The narrative here mirrors the classical myth of Narcissus, a beautiful youth who became captivated by his own reflection and wasted away.

[2] back I turned The narrative here mirrors the myth of Eurydice, whose husband Orpheus was allowed to retrieve her from the underworld on the condition that he not look back at her until their journey was complete—a condition he failed to meet, and lost her forever. It also suggests the Biblical story of Lot's wife, who looked back at the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah and was transformed into a pillar of salt (Genesis 19.26).

[1] Whom flyest thou? From whom are you running?

[4] plained Complained, lamented.

[5] but chance With good luck.

Short pleasures, for long woes are to succeed!"
So saying, his proud step he scornful turned,
But with sly circumspection, and began
Through wood, through waste, o'er hill, o'er dale, his roam
Meanwhile in utmost longitude, where Heav'n
With earth and ocean meets, the setting sun
Slowly descended, and with right aspect
Against the eastern gate of Paradise
Levelled his evening rays:[1] it was a rock
Of alabaster,° piled up to the clouds, white marble
Conspicuous far, winding with one ascent Accessible from earth, one entrance high;
The rest was craggy cliff that overhung
Still as it rose, impossible to climb.
Betwixt these rocky pillars Gabriel[2] sat,
Chief of the angelic guards, awaiting night;
About him exercised heroic games
The unarmed youth of Heav'n, but nigh at hand
Celestial armoury, shields, helms, and spears,
Hung high with diamond flaming, and with gold.
Thither came Uriel, gliding through the even
On a sun-beam, swift as a shooting star
In autumn thwarts the night, when vapours fired[3]
Impress the air, and shows the mariner
From what point of his compass to beware
Impetuous winds:[4] He thus began in haste.
"Gabriel, to thee thy course by lot hath given
Charge and strict watch, that to this happy place
No evil thing approach or enter in.
This day at height of noon came to my sphere
A spirit, zealous, as he seemed, to know
More of th' Almighty's works, and chiefly Man,
God's latest image: I described° his way noted
Bent all on speed, and marked his airy gait;
But in the mount that lies from Eden north,
Where he first lighted, soon discerned his looks
Alien from Heav'n, with passions foul obscured:
Mine eye pursued him still, but under shade
Lost sight of him. One of the banished crew,
I fear, hath ventured from the deep, to raise
New troubles; him thy care must be to find."
To whom the wingèd warrior thus returned:
"Uriel, no wonder if thy perfect sight,
Amid the sun's bright circle where thou sitst,
See far and wide: in at this gate none pass
The vigilance here placed, but such as come
Well known from Heav'n; and since meridian hour
No creature thence: If spirit of other sort,
So minded, have o'er-leaped these earthly bounds
On purpose, hard thou knowest it to exclude
Spiritual substance with corporeal bar.
But if within the circuit of these walks,
In whatsoever shape he lurk, of whom
Thou tellest, by morrow dawning I shall know."
So promised he; and Uriel to his charge
Returned on that bright beam, whose point now raised
Bore him slope downward to the sun now fall'n
Beneath th' Azores; whether the prime orb,
Incredible how swift, had thither rolled
Diurnal, or this less voluble° earth, revolving
By shorter flight to th' east, had left him there[5]
Arraying with reflected purple and gold
The clouds that on his western throne attend.
Now came still evening on, and twilight grey
Had in her sober livery all things clad;
Silence accompanied; for beast and bird,
They to their grassy couch, these to their nests
Were slunk, all but the wakeful nightingale;
She all night long her amorous descant sung;
Silence was pleased. Now glowed the firmament
With living sapphires: Hesperus,[6] that led
The starry host, rode brightest, till the moon,
Rising in clouded majesty, at length
Apparent° queen unveiled her peerless light, visible
And o'er the dark her silver mantle threw.
When Adam thus to Eve: "Fair consort, the hour

[1] the setting sun … rays As it descended, the sun's beams created a right angle against the eastern gate.

[2] Gabriel Archangel, messenger of God. His name means "strength of God."

[3] thwarts the night Crosses the night sky; vapours fired Shooting stars.

[4] shows … winds Sailors believed that shooting stars could predict originating areas of incoming storms.

[5] whether the prime orb … had left him there Whether the sun, with amazing speed, circled the earth every day ("diurnal") or the earth, less rapid ("voluble"), circled the sun.

[6] Hesperus The evening star (Venus).

Of night, and all things now retired to rest,
Mind us of like repose; since God hath set
Labour and rest, as day and night, to men
Successive; and the timely dew of sleep,
Now falling with soft slumbrous weight, inclines
Our eye-lids: other creatures all day long
Rove idle, unemployed, and less need rest;
Man hath his daily work of body or mind
Appointed, which declares his dignity,
And the regard of Heav'n on all his ways;
While other animals unactive range,
And of their doings God takes no account.
Tomorrow, ere fresh morning streak the east
With first approach of light, we must be risen,
And at our pleasant labour, to reform
Yon flowery arbours, yonder alleys green,
Our walk at noon, with branches overgrown,
That mock our scant manuring,° and require tilling
More hands than ours to lop their wanton°growth: lush
Those blossoms also, and those dropping gums,
That lie bestrown, unsightly and unsmooth,
Ask riddance,[1] if we mean to tread with ease;
Meanwhile, as nature wills, night bids us rest."
To whom thus Eve, with perfect beauty adorned:
"My author and disposer, what thou bidst
Unargued I obey: So God ordains;
God is thy law, thou mine: to know no more
Is woman's happiest knowledge, and her praise.
With thee conversing I forget all time;
All seasons,[2] and their change, all please alike.
Sweet is the breath of morn, her rising sweet,
With charm[3] of earliest birds: pleasant the sun,
When first on this delightful land he spreads
His orient[4] beams, on herb, tree, fruit, and flower,
Glistering with dew; fragrant the fertile earth
After soft showers; and sweet the coming on
Of grateful ev'ning mild; then silent night,
With this her solemn bird,[5] and this fair moon,
And these the gems of Heaven, her starry train:
But neither breath of morn, when she ascends
With charm of earliest birds; nor rising sun
On this delightful land; nor herb, fruit, flower,
Glist'ring with dew; nor fragrance after showers;
Nor grateful ev'ning mild; nor silent night,
With this her solemn bird, nor walk by moon,
Or glittering starlight, without thee is sweet.
But wherefore all night long shine these? For whom
This glorious sight, when sleep hath shut all eyes?"
To whom our general ancestor replied:
"Daughter of God and man, accomplished Eve,
These have their course to finish round the earth,
By morrow ev'ning, and from land to land
In order, though to nations yet unborn,
Ministring light prepared, they set and rise;
Lest total darkness should by night regain
Her old possession, and extinguish life
In nature and all things; which these soft° fires pleasing
Not only enlighten, but with kindly heat
Of various influence foment[6] and warm,
Temper or nourish, or in part shed down
Their stellar virtue on all kinds that grow
On earth, made hereby apter to receive
Perfection from the sun's more potent ray.[7]
These then, though unbeheld in deep of night,
Shine not in vain; nor think, though men were none,
That Heav'n would want spectators, God want praise:
Millions of spiritual creatures walk the earth
Unseen, both when we wake, and when we sleep:
All these with ceaseless praise His works behold
Both day and night: how often from the steep
Of echoing hill or thicket have we heard
Celestial voices to the midnight air,
Sole, or responsive each to other's note,
Singing their great Creator? Oft in bands
While they keep watch, or nightly rounding walk,
With heav'nly touch of instrumental sounds
In full harmonic number joined, their songs
Divide the night,[8] and lift our thoughts to Heaven."

Thus talking, hand in hand alone they passed
On to their blissful bower: it was a place
Chosen by the Sovereign Planter,[1] when He framed° designed
All things to Man's delightful use; the roof
Of thickest covert was inwoven shade
Laurel and myrtle, and what higher grew
Of firm and fragrant leaf; on either side
Acanthus, and each odorous bushy shrub,
Fenced up the verdant wall; each beauteous flower,
Iris all hues, roses, and jessamine,° jasmine
Reared high their flourished° heads between, and wrought blooming
Mosaic; underfoot the violet,
Crocus, and hyacinth, with rich inlay
Broidered the ground, more coloured than with stone
Of costliest emblem.[2] Other creature here,
Bird, beast, insect, or worm, durst enter none,
Such was their awe of Man. In shadier bower
More sacred and sequestered, though but feigned,
Pan or Sylvanus never slept, nor Nymph
Nor Faunus[3] haunted. Here, in close recess,
With flowers, garlands, and sweet-smelling herbs,
Espousèd° Eve decked first her nuptial bed; married
And heav'nly choirs the hymenaean[4] sung,
What day the genial angel[5] to our sire
Brought her in naked beauty more adorned,
More lovely than Pandora, whom the Gods
Endowed with all their gifts, and O! Too like
In sad event, when to the unwiser son
Of Japhet brought by Hermes,[6] she ensnared
Mankind with her fair looks, to be avenged
On him who had stole Jove's authentic° fire. primal
Thus, at their shady lodge arrived, both stood,
Both turned, and under open sky adored
The God that made both sky, air, earth, and Heaven,
Which they beheld, the moon's resplendent globe,
And starry pole:° "Thou also madest the night, sky
Maker omnipotent, and Thou the day,
Which we, in our appointed work employed,
Have finished, happy in our mutual help
And mutual love, the crown of all our bliss
Ordained by Thee; and this delicious place
For us too large, where Thy abundance wants
Partakers, and uncropt falls to the ground.
But Thou hast promised from us two a race
To fill the earth, who shall with us extol
Thy goodness infinite, both when we wake,
And when we seek, as now, thy gift of sleep."
This said unanimous, and other rites
Observing none, but adoration pure
Which God likes best,[7] into their inmost bower
Handed[8] they went; and, eased the putting off
These troublesome disguises[9] which we wear,
Straight side by side were laid; nor turned, I ween,° presume
Adam from his fair spouse, nor Eve the rites
Mysterious of connubial love[10] refused:
Whatever hypocrites austerely talk
Of purity, and place, and innocence,
Defaming as impure what God declares
Pure, and commands to some,[11] leaves free to all.
Our Maker bids increase;[12] who bids abstain
But our destroyer, foe to God and man?
Hail, wedded love, mysterious law, true source
Of human offspring, sole propriety
In Paradise of all things common else!
By thee adulterous lust was driv'n from men

[3] Sylvanus Roman god of forests, fields, and herding; Nymph Nature spirit; Faunus Roman god of nature and fertility.

[4] hymenaean Wedding song.

[5] genial angel Heavenly being who oversees marriage and procreation.

[6] Pandora Mythical first woman, created and given to Epimetheus, the brother of Prometheus, to punish Prometheus for having stolen fire from the gods and given it to humans. Pandora's dowry was a jar that, when opened, released all the ills and cares of the world to roam free and plague humankind. Among the bestial herds to range; by thee
Founded in reason, loyal, just, and pure,
Relations dear, and all the charities
Of father, son, and brother, first were known.
Far be it, that I should write thee sin or blame,
Or think thee unbefitting holiest place,
Perpetual fountain of domestic sweets,
Whose bed is undefiled and chaste pronounced,
Present, or past, as saints and patriarchs used.
Here love his golden shafts[1] employs, here lights
His constant lamp, and waves his purple wings,
Reigns here and revels; not in the bought smile
Of harlots, loveless, joyless, unendeared,
Casual fruition; nor in court-amours,
Mixed dance, or wanton mask, or midnight ball,
Or serenade, which the starved lover sings
To his proud fair, best quitted with disdain.
These, lulled by nightingales, embracing slept,
And on their naked limbs the flowery roof
Showered roses, which the morn repaired. Sleep on,
Blest pair! And, O! Yet happiest, if ye seek
No happier state, and know to know no more!
    Now had night measured with her shadowy cone
Halfway up hill this vast sublunar vault,[2]
And from their ivory port° the cherubim gateway
Forth issuing at th' accustomed hour stood armed
To their night watches in warlike parade,
When Gabriel to his next in power thus spake.
    "Uzziel,[3] half these draw off, and coast the south
With strictest watch; these other wheel the north,[4]
Our circuit meets full west." As flame they part
Half wheeling to the shield, half to the spear.[5]
From these, two strong and subtle spirits he called
That near him stood, and gave them thus in charge.
    "Ithuriel and Zephon,[6] with winged speed
Search through this garden, leave unsearched no nook,
But chiefly where those two fair creatures lodge,
Now laid perhaps asleep secure of° harm. unsuspecting
This evening from the sun's decline arrived
Who° tells of some infernal spirit seen one who
Hitherward bent (who could have thought?) escaped
The bars of Hell, on errand bad no doubt:
Such where ye find, seize fast, and hither bring."
    So saying, on he led his radiant files,
Dazzling the moon; these to the bower direct
In search of whom they sought: him there they found
Squat like a toad, close at the ear of Eve;
Assaying by his devilish art to reach
The organs of her fancy, and with them forge
Illusions as he list,° phantasms and dreams, desires
Or if, inspiring° venom, he might taint breathing
Th' animal spirits that from pure blood arise
Like gentle breaths from rivers pure, thence raise
At least distempered,° discontented thoughts, unbalanced
Vain hopes, vain aims, inordinate desires
Blown up with high conceits° engend'ring pride. ideas
Him thus intent Ithuriel with his spear
Touched lightly; for no falsehood can endure
Touch of celestial temper, but returns
Of force to its own likeness: up he starts
Discovered and surprised. As when a spark Lights on a heap of nitrous powder,° laid gunpowder
Fit for the tun° some magazine° to store cask / storehouse
Against[7] a rumored war, the smutty° grain black
With sudden blaze diffused, enflames the air:
So started up in his own shape the fiend.
Back stepped those two fair angels half amazed
So sudden to behold the grisly king;
Yet thus, unmoved with fear, accost him soon.
    "Which of those rebel spirits adjudged to Hell
Com'st thou, escaped thy prison, and transformed,
Why sat'st thou like an enemy in wait
Here watching at the head of these that sleep?"

[1] golden shafts Gold-tipped arrows shot by Cupid would install true love in the afflicted.

[2] night measured … vault With the sun below the horizon, the earth's globe casts a conical shadow that arches across the horizon. This shadow has ascended halfway to its zenith (midnight), which makes the time 9:00 pm.

[3] Uzziel "My strength is God" (Hebrew). A human name in the Bible, but an angel in rabbinic tradition.

[4] coast the south … wheel the north Starting at the eastern gate, Uzziel sends half his troops to check the garden perimeter to the south, the other half to the north; they will meet again due west.

[5] to the shield … to the spear To the left (shield hand) and right (spear hand).

[6] Ithuriel and Zephon "Discovery of God" and "Searcher" respectively (Hebrew). Their names reflect their roles in the narrative. Zephon is a biblical name (human, not an angel); Ithuriel is not biblical, but appears in apocryphal traditions.

[7] Against In preparation for.

"Know ye not then," said Satan, filled with scorn,
"Know ye not me? Ye knew me once no mate
For you, there sitting where ye durst not soar;
Not to know me argues° yourselves unknown, indicates
The lowest of your throng; or if ye know,
Why ask ye, and superfluous begin
Your message, like to end as much in vain?"
To whom thus Zephon, answering scorn with scorn.
"Think not, revolted spirit, thy shape the same,
Or undiminished brightness, to be known
As when thou stood'st in Heaven upright and pure;
That glory then, when thou no more wast good,
Departed from thee, and thou resemblest now
Thy sin and place of doom obscure° and foul. dark
But come, for thou, be sure, shalt give account
To him who sent us, whose charge is to keep
This place inviolable, and these from harm."
So spake the cherub, and his grave rebuke
Severe in youthful beauty, added grace
Invincible: abashed the Devil stood,
And felt how awful° goodness is, and saw awe-inspiring
Virtue in her shape how lovely, saw, and pined
His loss; but chiefly to find here observed
His lustre visibly impaired; yet seemed Undaunted. "If I must contend," said he,
"Best with the best, the sender not the sent,
Or all at once; more glory will be won,
Or less be lost." "Thy fear," said Zephon bold,
"Will save us trial what the least can do
Single against thee wicked, and thence weak."
The fiend replied not, overcome with rage;
But like a proud steed reined, went haughty on,
Champing his iron curb:[1] to strive or fly
He held it vain; awe from above had quelled
His heart, not else dismayed. Now drew they nigh
The western point, where those half-rounding guards
Just met, and closing stood in squadron joined Awaiting next command. To whom their chief
Gabriel from the front thus called aloud.
"O friends, I hear the tread of nimble feet
Hasting this way, and now by glimpse discern
Ithuriel and Zephon through the shade,° trees
And with them comes a third of regal port,° bearing
But faded splendor wan;° who by his gait gloomy
And fierce demeanour seems the Prince of Hell,
Not likely to part hence without contest;
Stand firm, for in his look defiance lours."° scowls
He scarce had ended, when those two approached
And brief related whom they brought, where found,
How busied, in what form and posture couched.
To whom with stern regard thus Gabriel spake.
"Why hast thou, Satan, broke the bounds prescribed
To thy transgressions, and disturbed the charge
Of others, who approve not to transgress
By thy example, but have power and right
To question thy bold entrance on this place;
Employed it seems to violate sleep, and those Whose dwelling God hath planted here in bliss?"
To whom thus Satan with contemptuous brow.
"Gabriel, thou hadst in Heaven th' esteem of wise,[2]
And such I held thee; but this question asked
Puts me in doubt. Lives there who loves his pain?
Who would not, finding way, break loose from Hell,
Though thither doomed? Thou wouldst thyself, no doubt,
And boldly venture to whatever place
Farthest from pain, where thou might'st hope to change
Torment with ease, and soonest recompense° repay
Dole° with delight, which in this place I sought; sorrow
To thee no reason; who know'st only good,
But evil hast not tried: and wilt object
His will who bound us? Let him surer bar
His iron gates, if he intends our stay
In that dark durance:° thus much what was asked. confinement
The rest is true, they found me where they say;
But that implies not violence or harm."
Thus he in scorn. The warlike angel moved,° angry
Disdainfully half smiling thus replied.
"O loss of one in Heaven to judge of wise,° wisdom
Since Satan fell, whom folly overthrew,
And now returns him from his prison 'scaped,
Gravely in doubt whether to hold them wise
Or not, who ask what boldness brought him hither
Unlicensed from his bounds in Hell prescribed;
So wise he judges it to fly from pain
However,° and to 'scape his punishment. in whatever way
So judge thou still, presumptuous, till the wrath,

---

[1] Champing his iron curb Biting down on his bit (as an impatient horse would do).

[2] esteem of wise Reputation of being wise.

Which thou incurr'st by flying, meet thy flight
Sevenfold, and scourge that wisdom back to Hell,
Which taught thee yet no better, that no pain
Can equal anger infinite provoked.
But wherefore thou alone? Wherefore with thee
Came not all Hell broke loose? Is pain to them
Less pain, less to be fled, or thou than they Less hardy to endure? Courageous chief,
The first in flight from pain, hadst thou alleged
To thy deserted host this cause of flight,
Thou surely hadst not come sole fugitive."
To which the fiend thus answered frowning stern.
"Not that I less endure, or shrink from pain,
Insulting angel, well thou know'st I stood° withstood
Thy fiercest, when in battle to thy aide
The blasting volleyed thunder made all speed
And seconded thy else° not dreaded spear. otherwise
But still thy words at random, as before,
Argue thy inexperience what behooves° is proper
From° hard assays° and ill successes past after / attempts
A faithful leader, not to hazard all
Through ways of danger by himself untried,
I therefore, I alone first undertook
To wing the desolate abyss, and spy
This new created world, whereof in Hell
Fame° is not silent, here in hope to find rumor
Better abode, and my afflicted powers[1]
To settle here on earth, or in mid air;
Though for possession put to try° once more test
What thou and thy gay[2] legions dare against;
Whose easier business were to serve their Lord
High up in Heaven, with songs to hymn his throne,
And practiced distances to cringe, not fight."[3]
To whom the warrior angel, soon replied.
"To say and straight unsay, pretending first
Wise to fly pain, professing next the spy,
Argues no leader, but a liar traced,° discovered
Satan, and couldst thou faithful add? O name,
O sacred name of faithfulness profaned!
Faithful to whom? To thy rebellious crew?
Army of fiends, fit body to fit head;
Was this your discipline and faith engaged,
Your military obedience, to dissolve
Allegiance to th' acknowledged Power Supreme?
And thou sly hypocrite, who now wouldst seem
Patron of liberty, who more than thou
Once fawned, and cringed, and servilely adored
Heaven's awful° Monarch? Wherefore but in hope awe-inspiring
To dispossess him, and thyself to reign?
But mark what I areed° thee now, avant;° advise / depart
Fly thither whence thou fled'st: if from this hour
Within these hallowed limits thou appear,
Back to th' infernal pit I drag thee chained,
And seal thee so, as henceforth not to scorn
The facile° gates of Hell too slightly barred." yielding
So threatened he, but Satan to no threats
Gave heed, but waxing° more in rage replied. growing
"Then when I am thy captive talk of chains,
Proud limitary° cherub, but ere then boundary-guarding
Far heavier load thyself expect to feel
From my prevailing arm, though Heaven's King
Ride on thy wings, and thou with thy compeers,° fellows
Used to the yoke, draw'st his triumphant wheels
In progress through the road of Heaven star-paved."[4]
While thus he spake, th' angelic squadron bright
Turned fiery red, sharp'ning in mooned horns
Their phalanx,[5] and began to hem him round
With ported[6] spears, as thick as when a field
Of Ceres[7] ripe for harvest waving bends
Her bearded grove of ears, which way the wind
Sways them; the careful° plowman doubting stands apprehensive
Lest on the threshing floor his hopeful sheaves
Prove chaff. On th' other side Satan alarmed[8]
Collecting all his might dilated° stood, inflated

---

[1] afflicted powers Downcast forces.

[2] gay Showy; like courtiers.

[3] practiced distances … not fight I.e., they practiced judging distance by courtly bowing, not sword fighting.

[4] progress … star-paved Triumphal procession: Satan compares angels serving the divine to the prisoners who pulled the chariots of triumphant generals in the classical world.

[5] sharp'ning … phalanx The angels surround Satan in a crescent-shaped military formation.

[6] ported Held at the ready, slanted in front of them.

[7] Ceres Classical goddess of agriculture. Here, grain.

[8] chaff Husks. The useless, discarded parts of grain; alarmed Called to arms.

Like Tenerife or Atlas[1] unremoved:° immovable
His stature reached the sky, and on his crest
Sat Horror plumed; nor wanted in his grasp
What seemed both spear and shield: now dreadful deeds
Might have ensued, nor only Paradise
In this commotion, but the starry cope° canopy
Of Heaven perhaps, or all the elements
At least had gone to rack,° disturbed and torn ruin
With violence of this conflict, had not soon
Th' Eternal to prevent such horrid fray
Hung forth in Heaven his golden scales, yet seen
Betwixt Astrea and the Scorpion sign,[2]
Wherein all things created first he weighed,
The pendulous round Earth with balanced air
In counterpoise, now ponders° all events, weighs Battles and realms: in these he put two weights
The sequel° each of parting and of fight; consequences
The latter quick up flew,[3] and kicked the beam;
Which Gabriel spying, thus bespake the fiend.
"Satan, I know thy strength, and thou know'st mine,
Neither our own but given;[4] what folly then
To boast what arms can do, since thine no more
Than Heaven permits, nor mine, though doubled now
To trample thee as mire:° for proof look up, mud
And read thy lot° in yon celestial sign fate
Where thou art weighed, and shown how light, how weak,
If thou resist." The fiend looked up and knew
His mounted scale aloft: nor more; but fled
Murmuring, and with him fled the shades of night.

THE END OF THE FOURTH BOOK

ARGUMENT TO BOOK 5

Morning approached, Eve relates to Adam her troublesome dream; he likes it not, yet comforts her: they come forth to their day labours: their morning hymn at the door of their bower. God to render man inexcusable sends Raphael[5] to admonish him of his obedience, of his free estate, of his enemy near at hand; who he is, and why his enemy, and whatever else may avail Adam to know. Raphael comes down to Paradise, his appearance described, his coming discerned by Adam afar off sitting at the door of his bower; he goes out to meet him, brings him to his lodge, entertains him with the choicest fruits of Paradise got together by Eve; their discourse at table: Raphael performs his message, minds Adam of his state and of his enemy; relates at Adam's request who that enemy is, and how he came to be so, beginning from his first revolt in Heaven, and the occasion thereof; how he drew his legions after him to the parts of the North, and there incited them to rebel with him, persuading all but only Abdiel[6] a seraph, who in argument dissuades and opposes him, then forsakes him.

from BOOK 5

… Thus when with meats and drinks they[7] had sufficed,
Not burdened nature,[8] sudden mind arose
In Adam, not to let th' occasion pass
Given him by this great conference to know
Of things above his world, and of their being
Who dwell in Heav'n, whose excellence he saw
Transcend his own so far, whose radiant forms
Divine effulgence,° whose high power so far brightness
Exceeded human, and his wary speech
Thus to th' empyreal minister he framed:

---

[1] Tenerife Mountain in the Canary Islands, reputed in Milton's time the highest in the world; Atlas Mountain in Morocco, and the name of the Titan from Greek myth sentenced to hold up the world as punishment for rebelling against the gods.

[2] golden scales … sign Milton identifies these heavenly scales with the autumnal zodiac sign Libra, which lies between Virgo (associated with Astrea, the goddess of Justice) and Scorpio.

[3] The latter … flew The scale representing fighting (desired by Satan) is lighter, and thus found wanting (cf. Daniel 5.27). The scale representing the consequences of preventing the fight weighs more, and is thus more desirable. In a similar scene from Homer's Iliad, Zeus balances the fates of the Trojans and the Greeks, but in that scene, it is the loser's scale that sinks down, to death.

[4] Neither … given Not innately our own, but bestowed upon us by God.

[5] Raphael Messenger and archangel; his name means "God has healed."

[6] Abdiel In the bible, not an angel but a servant of God, which is reflected in the Hebrew meaning of his name.

[7] they Raphael, Eve, and Adam, who have just shared a meal together.

[8] sufficed … nature Eaten enough to sustain themselves without overwhelming their bodies.

"Inhabitant with God, now know I well
Thy favour, in this honour done to man,
Under whose lowly roof thou hast vouchsafed
To enter and these earthly fruits to taste,
Food not of angels, yet accepted so,
As that more willingly thou couldst not seem
At Heav'n's high feasts t' have fed: yet what compare?"
To whom the winged hierarch[1] replied.
"O Adam, one Almighty is, from whom
All things proceed, and up to him return,
If not depraved from good, created all
Such to perfection, one first matter all,[2]
Endued with various forms, various degrees
Of substance, and in things that live, of life;
But more refined, more spiritous, and pure,
As nearer to him placed or nearer tending
Each in their several active spheres assigned,
Till body up to spirit work, in bounds
Proportioned to each kind. So from the root
Springs lighter the green stalk, from thence the leaves
More airy, last the bright consummate flow'r
Spirits odorous breathes: flow'rs and their fruit
Man's nourishment, by gradual scale sublimed[3]
To vital spirits aspire, to animal,
To intellectual, give both life and sense,
Fancy° and understanding, whence the soul imagination
Reason receives, and reason is her being,
Discursive, or intuitive; discourse
Is oftest yours, the latter most is ours,
Differing but in degree, of kind the same.[4]
Wonder not then, what God for you saw good[5]
If I refuse not, but convert, as you,
To proper substance; time may come when men
With angels may participate, and find
No inconvenient diet, nor too light fare:
And from these corporal nutriments perhaps
Your bodies may at last turn all to spirit,
Improved by tract° of time, and, winged, ascend course
Ethereal as we, or may at choice,
Here or in heav'nly paradises dwell;
If ye be found obedient, and retain Unalterably firm his love entire,
Whose progeny you are. Meanwhile enjoy
Your fill what happiness this happy state
Can comprehend, incapable of more."
To whom the patriarch of mankind replied
"O favourable Spirit, propitious guest,
Well hast thou taught the way that might direct
Our knowledge, and the scale of nature set
From centre to circumference, whereon
In contemplation of created things,
By steps we may ascend to God...."

Argument to Book 6

Raphael continues to relate how Michael and Gabriel were sent forth to battle against Satan and his angels. The first fight described: Satan and his powers retire under night: he calls a council, invents devilish engines,[6] which in the second day's fight put Michael and his angels to some disorder; but they at length pulling up mountains overwhelmed both the force and machines of Satan: yet the tumult not so ending, God on the third day sends Messiah His Son, for whom He had reserved the glory of that victory: He in the power of His Father coming to the place, and causing all His legions to stand still on either side, with His chariot and thunder driving into the midst of His enemies, pursues them unable to resist towards the wall of Heaven; which opening, they leap down with horror and confusion into the place of punishment prepared for them in the deep: Messiah returns with triumph to His Father.

[1] hierarch High-ranking figure who is knowledgeable, especially in matters of religion.

[2] one Almighty ... matter all Everything originates from the same matter and from one creator. This suggests that everything—both spiritual and material—exists on a single spectrum, such that the difference between spirit and matter is a result of their relative closeness to God rather than a fundamental difference in the substance each is made from.

[3] sublimed Elevated to a better state.

[4] Differing ... same Here, the poem suggests that the human process of rational ("discursive") thought is inferior but similar to the immediate and intuitive understanding of angels, which was considered to be immediate and intuitive. This contradicts the traditional argument, which held that, because humans are made up of spirit and matter while angels are made only of spirit, their ways of thinking must be irreconcilably different.

[5] what God ... good I.e., mortal food, which they have just eaten.

[6] devilish engines Cannons.

ARGUMENT TO BOOK 7

Raphael at the request of Adam relates how and wherefore this world was first created; that God, after the expelling of Satan and his angels out of Heaven, declared His pleasure to create another world and other creatures to dwell therein; sends His Son with glory and attendance of angels to perform the work of creation in six days: the angels celebrate with hymns the performance thereof, and His re-ascension into Heaven.

from BOOK 7

Descend from Heav'n, Urania, by that name
If rightly thou art called, whose voice divine
Following, above th' Olympian hill I soar,
Above the flight of Pegasean[1] wing!
The meaning, not the name, I call: for thou
Nor of the Muses nine, nor on the top
Of old Olympus dwell'st; but, Heavenly-born,
Before the hills appeared, or fountain flowed,
Thou with eternal wisdom didst converse,[2]
Wisdom thy sister, and with her didst play
In presence of th' Almighty Father, pleased
With thy celestial song. Up led by thee
Into the Heav'n of Heav'ns I have presumed,
An earthly guest, and drawn empyreal air,
Thy tempering:[3] with like safety guided down
Return me to my native element:
Lest from this flying steed unreined (as once Bellerophon,[4] though from a lower clime).° region
Dismounted, on the Aleian field[5] I fall,
Erroneous° there to wander, and forlorn. directionless
Half yet remains unsung, but narrower bound
Within the visible diurnal sphere;[6]
Standing on earth, not rapt° above the pole, transported
More safe I sing with mortal voice, unchanged
To hoarse or mute, though fall'n on evil days,
On evil days though fall'n, and evil tongues;
In darkness, and with dangers compassed round,[7]
And solitude; yet not alone, while thou
Visitest my slumbers nightly, or when morn
Purples the east: still govern thou my song,
Urania, and fit audience find, though few.
But drive far off the barbarous dissonance
Of Bacchus and his revellers, the race
Of that wild rout that tore the Thracian bard
In Rhodope, where woods and rocks had ears
To rapture, till the savage clamour drowned
Both harp and voice; nor could the Muse defend
Her son.[8] So fail not thou, who thee implores:
For thou art heav'nly, she an empty dream....

ARGUMENT TO BOOK 8

Adam inquires concerning celestial motions, is doubtfully answered, and exhorted to search rather things more worthy of knowledge: Adam assents, and still desirous to detain Raphael, relates to him what he remembered since his own creation, his placing in Paradise, his talk with God concerning solitude and fit society, his first meeting and nuptials with Eve, his discourse with the angel thereupon; who after admonitions repeated departs.

[1] Pegasean Referring to Pegasus, winged horse of Greek myth, a symbol of poetic effort. A strike of his hoof was said to have started the sacred spring of the Muses on Mount Helicon.

[2] with eternal wisdom didst converse Wisdom appears as a figure in Proverbs 8.22–31.

[3] Thy tempering Made breathable for a mere mortal.

[4] Bellerophon Rider of Pegasus, who was thrown by the winged horse when he tried to fly to the summit of Mount Olympus. Cursed because of his arrogance, he lived out the rest of his days blind and alone; no mortal dared befriend him for fear of drawing the negative attention of the gods.

[5] Aleian field Bellerophon's landing site.

[6] visible diurnal sphere The universe that is seen to revolve each day.

[7] evil days ... round Milton faced threat of execution for his prior revolutionary arguments after the restoration of the monarchy in 1660.

[8] tore the Thracian bard ... the Muse defend / Her son These lines allude to the death of Orpheus who, disconsolate after losing his wife for the second time, wandered Thrace playing tunes so sad they made wild animals, stones, and trees weep. He met a frenzied group of Maenads, female followers of Bacchus, whose screams drowned out the song of Orpheus so that they would not be affected by it. They then tore him apart, and not even Orpheus's mother, the Muse Calliope, could stop them. It was said that his head floated down the river, still singing.

from BOOK 8

… I attend,
Pleased with thy words no less than thou with mine."[1]
So spake the godlike Power, and thus our sire:
"For man to tell how human life began
Is hard; for who himself beginning knew?
Desire with thee still longer to converse
Induced me. As new-waked from soundest sleep
Soft on the flow'ry herb I found me laid
In balmy sweat, which with his beams the sun
Soon dried, and on the reeking° moisture fed. evaporating
Straight toward heav'n my wond'ring eyes I turned,
And gazed a while the ample sky, till raised
By quick instinctive motion up I sprung
As thitherward endeavoring, and upright
Stood on my feet; about me round I saw
Hill, dale, and shady woods, and sunny plains,
And liquid lapse of murmuring streams; by these,
Creatures that lived, and moved, and walked, or flew,
Birds on the branches warbling; all things smiled,
With fragrance and with joy my heart o'erflowed.
Myself I then perused, and limb by limb
Surveyed, and sometimes went,° and sometimes ran walked
With supple joints, as lively vigour led:
But who I was, or where, or from what cause,
Knew not; to speak I tried, and forthwith spake,
My tongue obeyed and readily could name
Whate'er I saw. 'Thou sun,' said I, 'fair light,
And thou enlightened earth, so fresh and gay,
Ye hills and dales, ye rivers, woods, and plains,
And ye that live and move, fair creatures, tell,
Tell, if ye saw, how came I thus, how here?
Not of myself; by some great Maker then,
In goodness and in power preeminent;
Tell me, how may I know him, how adore,
From whom I have that thus I move and live,
And feel that I am happier than I know.'
While thus I called, and strayed I knew not whither,
From where I first drew air, and first beheld
This happy light, when answer none returned,
On a green shady bank profuse of flow'rs
Pensive I sat me down; there gentle sleep
First found me, and with soft oppression seized
My drowsèd sense, untroubled, though I thought
I then was passing to my former state
Insensible, and forthwith to dissolve:
When suddenly stood at my head a dream,
Whose inward apparition gently moved
My fancy to believe I yet had being,
And lived: one came, methought, of shape divine,
And said, 'Thy mansion wants thee,[2] Adam, rise,
First man, of men innumerable ordained
First father, called by thee I come thy guide
To the garden of bliss, thy seat° prepared.' habitation
So saying, by the hand he took me raised,
And over fields and waters, as in air
Smooth sliding without step, last led me up
A woody mountain whose high top was plain,
A circuit wide, enclosed, with goodliest trees
Planted, with walks, and bowers, that what I saw
Of earth before scarce pleasant seemed. Each tree
Load'n with fairest fruit, that hung to the eye
Tempting, stirred in me sudden appetite
To pluck and eat; whereat I waked, and found
Before mine eyes all real, as the dream
Had lively shadowed:[3] here had new begun
My wand'ring, had not he who was my guide
Up hither, from among the trees appeared,
Presence Divine. Rejoicing, but with awe
In adoration at his feet I fell
Submiss: he reared[4] me, and 'Whom thou sought'st I am,'
Said mildly, 'Author of all this thou seest
Above, or round about thee or beneath.
This Paradise I give thee, count it thine
To till and keep,° and of the fruit to eat: manage
Of every tree that in the garden grows
Eat freely with glad heart; fear here no dearth:
But of the tree whose operation brings
Knowledge of good and ill, which I have set
The pledge of thy obedience and thy faith,

---

[1] Pleased … with mine Adam previously expressed his profound enjoyment at hearing Raphael speak; Raphael now claims to enjoy Adam's words equally.

[2] Thy … thee Your dwelling is waiting for you.

[3] lively shadowed Depicted in a life-like manner.

[4] Submiss Submissive, low; reared Lifted to an upright position.

Amid the garden by the Tree of Life,
Remember what I warn thee, shun to taste,
And shun the bitter consequence: for know,
The day thou eat'st thereof, my sole command
Transgressed, inevitably thou shalt die;
From that day mortal, and this happy state
Shalt lose, expelled from hence into a world
Of woe and sorrow.' Sternly he pronounced
The rigid interdiction, which resounds
Yet dreadful in mine ear, though in my choice
Not to incur; but soon his clear aspéct° facial expression
Returned and gracious purpose° thus renewed. discourse
'Not only these fair bounds, but all the earth
To thee and to thy race I give; as lords
Possess it, and all things that therein live,
Or live in sea, or air, beast, fish, and fowl.
In sign whereof each bird and beast behold
After their kinds; I bring them to receive
From thee their names, and pay thee fealty
With low subjection; understand the same
Of fish within their wat'ry residence,
Not hither summoned, since they cannot change
Their element to draw the thinner air.'
As thus he spake, each bird and beast behold
Approaching two and two, these cow'ring low
With blandishment,[1] each bird stooped on his wing.
I named them, as they passed, and understood
Their nature,[2] with such knowledge God endued° imbued
My sudden apprehension: but in these
I found not what methought I wanted still;
And to the heav'nly Vision thus presumed:
“'O by what name, for thou above all these,
Above mankind, or aught than mankind higher,
Surpassest far my naming, how may I
Adore thee, Author of this universe,
And all this good to man, for whose well-being
So amply, and with hands so liberal
Thou hast provided all things: but with me
I see not who partakes. In solitude
What happiness, who can enjoy alone,
Or all enjoying, what contentment find?'
Thus I presumptuous; and the Vision bright,
As with a smile more brightened, thus replied:
“'What call'st thou solitude? Is not the earth
With various living creatures, and the air
Replenished,° and all these at thy command filled
To come and play before thee? Know'st thou not Their language and their ways? They also know,° comprehend
And reason not contemptibly; with these
Find pastime, and bear rule; thy realm is large.'
So spake the Universal Lord, and seemed
So ordering. I with leave of speech implored,
And humble deprecation thus replied:
“'Let not my words offend thee, Heav'nly Power,
My Maker, be propitious while I speak.
Hast thou not made me here thy substitute,
And these inferior far beneath me set?
Among unequals what society
Can sort,° what harmony or true delight? cohere
Which must be mutual, in proportion due
Giv'n and received; but in disparity
The one intense, the other still remiss
Cannot well suit with either,[3] but soon prove Tedious alike. Of fellowship I speak
Such as I seek, fit to participate[4]
All rational delight, wherein the brute
Cannot be human consort; they rejoice
Each with their kind, lion with lioness;
So fitly them in pairs thou hast combined;
Much less can bird with beast, or fish with fowl
So well converse, nor with the ox the ape;
Worse then can man with beast, and least of all.'
“Whereto th' Almighty answered, not displeased:
'A nice° and subtle happiness I see exacting
Thou to thyself proposest, in the choice
Of thy associates, Adam, and wilt taste
No pleasure, though in pleasure, solitary.
What think'st thou then of me, and this my state?
Seem I to thee sufficiently possessed
Of happiness, or not? who am alone
From all eternity, for none I know
Second to me or like, equal much less.

---

[1] blandishment Show of fawning praise.

[2] each bird ... nature See Genesis 2.19–20.

[3] The one ... either One stretched tight, the other loose, cannot harmonize with each other. The metaphor refers to musical instruments; tighter strings produce a more brilliant sound.

[4] participate Participate in.

How have I then with whom to hold converse
Save with the creatures which I made, and those
To me inferior, infinite descents
Beneath what other creatures are to thee?
"He ceased, I lowly answered: 'To attain
The height and depth of thy eternal ways
All human thoughts come short, Supreme of things;
Thou in thyself art perfect, and in thee
Is no deficience found; not so is man,
But in degree, the cause of his desire
By conversation with his like to help,
Or solace his defects.[1] No need that thou
Shouldst propagate, already infinite;
And through all numbers absolute, though One;
But man by number is to manifest
His single imperfection, and beget
Like of his like, his image multiplied,
In unity defective,[2] which requires
Collateral° love, and dearest amity. reciprocal
Thou in thy secrecy° although alone, solitude
Best with thyself accompanied, seek'st not
Social communication, yet so pleased,[3]
Canst raise thy creature to what height thou wilt
Of union or communion, deified;
I by conversing cannot these° erect these animals
From prone, nor in their ways
complacence° find.' gratification
Thus I emboldened spake, and freedom used
Permissive,° and acceptance found, which permitted gained
This answer from the gracious Voice Divine:
"'Thus far to try thee, Adam, I was pleased,
And find thee knowing not of beasts alone,
Which thou hast rightly named, but of thyself,
Expressing well the spirit within thee free,
My image, not imparted to the brute,
Whose fellowship therefore unmeet° for thee unfit
Good reason was thou freely shouldst dislike,
And be so minded still. I, ere thou spak'st,
Knew it not good for man to be alone,
And no such company as then thou saw'st
Intended thee, for trial only brought,
To see how thou couldst judge of fit and meet:
What next I bring shall please thee, be assured,
Thy likeness, thy fit help, thy other self,
Thy wish, exactly to thy heart's desire.'
"He ended, or I heard no more, for now
My earthly by his heav'nly overpowered,
Which it had long stood under, strained to the height
In that celestial colloquy° sublime, discussion
As with an object that excels° the sense, overtakes
Dazzled and spent, sunk down, and sought repair
Of sleep, which instantly fell on me, called
By nature as in aid, and closed mine eyes.
Mine eyes he closed, but open left the cell
Of fancy my internal sight, by which
Abstract° as in a trance methought I saw, absent-minded
Though sleeping, where I lay, and saw the shape
Still glorious before whom awake I stood;
Who stooping opened my left side, and took
From thence a rib, with cordial[4] spirits warm,
And lifeblood streaming fresh; wide was the wound,
But suddenly with flesh filled up and healed:
The rib he formed and fashioned with his hands;
Under his forming hands a creature grew,
Manlike, but different sex, so lovely fair,
That what seemed fair in all the world seemed now
Mean,° or in her summed up, in her contained lowly
And in her looks, which from that time infused
Sweetness into my heart, unfelt before,
And into all things from her air[5] inspired
The spirit of love and amorous delight.
She disappeared, and left me dark, I waked
To find her, or forever to deplore
Her loss, and other pleasures all abjure:
When out of hope,[6] behold her, not far off,
Such as I saw her in my dream, adorned
With what all earth or heaven could bestow
To make her amiable: on she came,
Led by her heav'nly Maker, though unseen,
And guided by his voice, nor uninformed

---

[1] By conversation ... defects Through conversing with his equal man might make up for the ways in which he is deficient.

[2] man by number ... defective Man will attempt to fix his imperfection by reproducing, thereby making copies of this imperfection.

[3] so pleased If it pleases you.

[4] cordial Of the heart.

[5] air Physical appearance or bearing.

[6] out of hope Having lost hope.

Of nuptial sanctity and marriage rites:
Grace was in all her steps, Heav'n in her eye,
In every gesture dignity and love.
I overjoyed could not forbear aloud.[1]
"'This turn hath made amends; thou hast fulfilled
Thy words, Creator bounteous and benign,
Giver of all things fair, but fairest this
Of all thy gifts, nor enviest.[2] I now see
Bone of my bone, flesh of my flesh, my self
Before me; woman is her name, of man
Extracted; for this cause he shall forgo
Father and mother, and to his wife adhere;
And they shall be one flesh, one heart, one soul.'[3]
"She heard me thus, and though divinely brought,
Yet innocence and virgin modesty,
Her virtue and the conscience° of her worth, awareness
That would be wooed, and not unsought be won,
Not obvious, not obtrusive, but retired,
The more desirable,[4] or to say all,
Nature herself, though pure of sinful thought,
Wrought in her so that, seeing me, she turned;
I followed her, she what was honour knew,
And with obsequious° majesty approved deferential
My pleaded reason. To the nuptial bow'r
I led her blushing like the morn: all heav'n,
And happy constellations on that hour
Shed their selectest influence; the earth
Gave sign of gratulation,° and each hill; celebration
Joyous the birds; fresh gales and gentle airs
Whispered it to the woods, and from their wings
Flung rose, flung odours from the spicy shrub,
Disporting,° till the amorous bird of night[5] reveling
Sung spousal, and bid haste the evening star[6]
On his hill top, to light the bridal lamp.
Thus I have told thee all my state, and brought
My story to the sum of earthly bliss
Which I enjoy, and must confess to find
In all things else delight indeed, but such
As used or not, works in the mind no change,
Nor vehement desire, these delicacies
I mean of taste, sight, smell, herbs, fruits, and flow'rs,
Walks, and the melody of birds; but here
Far otherwise, transported° I behold, enthralled
Transported touch; here passion first I felt,
Commotion[7] strange, in all enjoyments else
Superior and unmoved, here only weak
Against the charm of beauty's powerful glance.
Or° nature failed in me, and left some part either
Not proof enough such object to sustain,[8]
Or from my side subducting,° took perhaps subtracting
More than enough; at least on her bestowed
Too much of ornament, in outward show
Elaborate, of inward less exact.
For well I understand in the prime end
Of nature her th' inferior, in the mind
And inward faculties, which most excel,
In outward also her resembling less
His image who made both, and less expressing
The character of that dominion giv'n
O'er other creatures; yet when I approach
Her loveliness, so absolute[9] she seems
And in her self complete, so well to know
Her own, that what she wills to do or say,
Seems wisest, virtuousest, discreetest, best;
All higher knowledge in her presence falls
Degraded, wisdom in discourse with her
Loses discount'nanced,° and like folly shows; chagrined
Authority and reason on her wait,
As one intended first, not after made
Occasionally;[10] and to consúmmate all,
Greatness of mind and nobleness their seat
Build in her loveliest, and create an awe
About her, as a guard angelic placed."
To whom the angel with contracted brow:
"Accuse not nature, she hath done her part;
Do thou but thine, and be not diffident° suspicious
Of wisdom, she deserts thee not, if thou

ARGUMENT TO BOOK 9

Satan having compassed the Earth, with meditated guile returns as a mist by night into Paradise, enters into the serpent sleeping. Adam and Eve in the morning go forth to their labours, which Eve proposes to divide in several places, each labouring apart: Adam consents not, alleging the danger, lest that enemy, of whom they were forewarned, should attempt her found alone: Eve loath to be thought not circumspect or firm enough, urges her going apart, the rather desirous to make trial of her strength; Adam at last yields; the serpent finds her alone; his subtle approach, first gazing, then speaking, with much flattery extolling Eve above all other creatures. Eve wondering to hear the serpent speak, asks how he attained to human speech and such understanding not till now; the serpent answers, that by tasting of a certain tree in the garden he attained both to speech and reason, till then void of both: Eve requires him to bring her to that tree, and finds it to be the Tree of Knowledge forbidden: the Serpent now grown bolder, with many wiles and arguments induces her at length to eat; she pleased with the taste deliberates awhile whether to impart thereof to Adam or not, at last brings him of the fruit, relates what persuaded her to eat thereof: Adam at first amazed, but perceiving her lost, resolves through vehemence of love to perish with her; and extenuating the trespass, eats also of the fruit: the effects thereof in them both; they seek to cover their nakedness, then fall to variance and accusation of one another.

BOOK 9

No more of talk where God or angel guest
With man, as with his friend, familiar used,
To sit indulgent, and with him partake
Rural repast;[1] permitting him the while Venial° discourse unblamed. I now must change allowable
Those notes to tragic; foul distrust, and breach
Disloyal on the part of man, revolt,
And disobedience: on the part of Heav'n
Now alienated, distance and distaste,
Anger and just rebuke, and judgement given,
That brought into this world a world of woe,
Sin and her shadow Death, and Misery
Death's harbinger. Sad task, yet argument
Not less but more heroic than the wrath
Of stern Achilles on his foe pursued
Thrice fugitive about Troy wall;[2] or rage
Of Turnus for Lavinia disespoused;[3]
Or Neptune's ire, or Juno's, that so long
Perplexed the Greek, and Cytherea's son:[4]

Pleased me long choosing, and beginning late;
Not sedulous° by nature to indite° active / write about
Wars, hitherto the only argument
Heroic deemed chief mastery to dissect
With long and tedious havoc fabled knights
In battles feigned; the better fortitude
Of patience and heroic martyrdom

[1] repast Consumption of a meal.

[2] Achilles … Troy wall Achilles, a Greek hero at Troy, chased the Trojan hero Hector three times around the walls of Troy before bringing him down, and then dragged the corpse around the city to dispirit its defenders.

[3] Turnus for Lavinia disespoused Turnus, a chieftain of the Rutuli people, is the foremost suitor for the hand of Lavinia, daughter of King Latinus, when Aeneas arrives in the latter half of The Aeneid. Latinus chooses to grant Lavinia's hand to Aeneas. Turnus then declares war; he is slaughtered, and his people are defeated.

[4] Or Neptune's ire … Cytherea's son Neptune, god of the sea, tormented Odysseus ("the Greek"); Juno tormented Aeneas, the son of Venus (who is also known as Cythera, after Cyprus, her purported first home).

[5] deigns Chooses to give.

[6] tilting furniture Lances or heavy spears.

[7] Impresas quaint Complex heraldic designs.

[8] Bases Cloth covers used on war horses.

At joust and tournament; then marshalled feast

The skill of artifice or office mean,[1]
Not that which justly gives heroic name
To person, or to poem. Me, of these
Nor skilled nor studious, higher argument[2]
Remains; sufficient of itself to raise
That name, unless an age too late, or cold
Climate, or years damp my intended wing
Depressed; and much they may, if all be mine,
Not hers, who brings it nightly to my ear.
The sun was sunk, and after him the star
Of Hesperus, whose office is to bring
Twilight upon the earth, short arbiter
Twixt day and night, and now from end to end
Night's hemisphere had veiled the horizon round:
When Satan, who late° fled before the threats lately
Of Gabriel out of Eden, now improved
In[3] meditated fraud and malice, bent
On man's destruction, maugre what might hap
Of heavier on himself,[4] fearless returned
By night he fled, and at midnight returned
From compassing° the earth; cautious of day, circling
Since Uriel, regent of the sun, descried
His entrance, and forewarned the cherubim
That kept their watch; thence full of anguish driven,
The space of seven continued nights he rode
With darkness; thrice the equinoctial line
He circled; four times crossed the car of night[5]
From pole to pole, traversing each colure;[6]
On the eighth returned; and, on the coast averse° opposite
From entrance or cherubic watch, by stealth
Found unsuspected way. There was a place,
Now not, though sin, not time, first wrought the change,
Where Tigris, at the foot of Paradise,
Into a gulf shot under ground, till part
Rose up a fountain by the tree of life:
In with the river sunk, and with it rose
Satan, involved° in rising mist; then sought engulfed
Where to lie hid; sea he had searched, and land,
From Eden over Pontus and the pool
Maeotis, up beyond the river Ob;
Downward as far antarctic; and in length,
West from Orontes to the ocean barred
At Darien; thence to the land where flows
Ganges and Indus:[7] Thus the orb he roamed
With narrow° search; and with inspection deep precise
Considered every creature, which of all
Most opportune might serve his wiles; and found
The serpent subtlest beast of all[8] the field.
Him after long debate, irresolute
Of° thoughts revolved, his final sentence° chose amidst / decision
Fit vessel, fittest imp° of fraud, in whom shoot, slip
To enter, and his dark suggestions hide
From sharpest sight: for, in the wily snake
Whatever sleights,° none would suspicious mark, deceptions
As from his wit and native subtlety
Proceeding; which, in other beasts observed,
Doubt might beget of diabolic pow'r
Active within, beyond the sense of brute.
Thus he resolved, but first from inward grief
His bursting passion into plaints thus poured:
"O Earth, how like to Heav'n, if not preferred
More justly, seat worthier of gods, as built
With second thoughts, reforming what was old!
For what God, after better, worse would build?
Terrestrial Heav'n, danced round by other Heav'ns
That shine, yet bear their bright officious° lamps, duteous
Light above light, for thee alone, as seems,
In thee concentring all their precious beams
Of sacred influence! As God in Heav'n

[1] skill of … office mean Skill of craftsperson or manual worker.

[2] higher argument I.e., higher subject matter, fitting a heroic poem.

[3] improved / In Strengthened in, better able to carry out.

[4] maugre … himself In spite of what harsher consequences he might bring upon himself.

[5] car of night Darkness of night, moving across the world. By following its path, Satan remains under cover of darkness.

[6] colure Conventional cartographic dissection of the globe by two longitudinal lines, perpendicular at the poles and dividing the earth into four sections like the segments of an orange.

[7] Pontus The Black Sea; the pool / Maeotis Sea of Azov, the northern arm of the Black Sea; river Ob River in Siberia, in northeastern Russia; Orontes River originating in northern Lebanon and flowing north through Syria and Turkey to empty into the Mediterranean Sea; Darien Panama, in South America; Ganges and Indus Ganges and Indus Rivers, the principal rivers of India.

[8] subtlest beast of all See Genesis 3.1.

Is centre, yet extends to all; so thou,
Centring, receivest from all those orbs: in thee,
Not in themselves, all their known virtue appears
Productive in herb, plant, and nobler birth
Of creatures animate with gradual life
Of growth, sense, reason, all summed up in man.
With what delight could I have walked thee round,
If I could joy in aught, sweet interchange
Of hill, and valley, rivers, woods, and plains,
Now land, now sea and shores with forest crowned,
Rocks, dens, and caves! But I in none of these Find place or refuge; and the more I see
Pleasures about me, so much more I feel
Torment within me, as from the hateful siege° discord
Of contraries: all good to me becomes
Bane, and in Heav'n much worse would be my state.
But neither here seek I, no nor in Heav'n
To dwell, unless by mastering Heav'n's Supreme;
Nor hope to be myself less miserable
By what I seek, but others to make such
As I, though thereby worse to me redound:° return
For only in destroying I find ease
To my relentless thoughts; and, him destroyed,
Or won to what may work his utter loss,
For whom all this was made, all this will soon
Follow, as to him linked in weal° or woe; prosperity
In woe then; that destruction wide may range:
To me shall be the glory sole among
The infernal powers, in one day to have marred
What He, Almighty styled,° six nights and days named
Continued making; and who knows how long
Before had been contriving? Though perhaps
Not longer than since I, in one night, freed
From servitude inglorious well nigh half
Th' angelic name, and thinner left the throng
Of His adorers: He, to be avenged,
And to repair His numbers thus impaired,
Whether such virtue spent of old now failed
More angels to create, if they at least
Are His created, or, to spite us more,
Determined to advance into our room
A creature formed of earth, and him endow,
Exalted from so base original,° origination
With Heav'nly spoils, our spoils. What He decreed,
He effected; Man He made, and for him built
Magnificent this world, and earth his seat,
Him lord pronounced; and, O indignity!
Subjected to his service angel-wings,
And flaming ministers to watch and tend
Their earthly charge: of these the vigilance
I dread; and, to elude, thus wrapt in mist
Of midnight vapour glide obscure, and pry
In every bush and brake, where hap may find
The serpent sleeping; in whose mazy folds
To hide me, and the dark intent I bring.
O foul descent! That I, who erst contended
With Gods to sit the highest, am now constrained
Into a beast; and, mixed with bestial slime,
This essence to incarnate[1] and imbrute,
That to the height of deity aspired!
But what will not ambition and revenge
Descend to? Who aspires, must down as low
As high he soared; obnoxious,[2] first or last,
To basest things. Revenge, at first though sweet,
Bitter ere long, back on itself recoils:
Let it; I reck° not, so it light well aimed, care
Since higher I fall short, on him who next
Provokes my envy, this new favourite
Of Heav'n, this man of clay, son of despite,
Whom, us the more to spite, his Maker raised
From dust: spite then with spite is best repaid."
So saying, through each thicket dank or dry,
Like a black mist low-creeping, he held on
His midnight-search, where soonest he might find
The serpent; him fast-sleeping soon he found
In labyrinth of many a round self-rolled,
His head the midst, well stored with subtle wiles:
Not yet in horrid shade or dismal den,
Nor nocent° yet; but, on the grassy herb, harmful
Fearless unfeared he slept: in at his mouth
The devil entered; and his brutal° sense, bestial
In heart or head, possessing, soon inspired
With act intelligential; but his sleep
Disturbed not, waiting close th' approach of morn.
Now, when as sacred light began to dawn
In Eden on the humid flowers, that breathed
Their morning incense, when all things that breathe

[1] incarnate Just as the Son of God becomes incarnated as a man, Satan takes on an earthly form when he becomes the serpent.

[2] obnoxious Made vulnerable.

From the Earth's great altar send up silent praise
To the Creator, and His nostrils fill
With grateful smell, forth came the human pair,
And joined their vocal worship to the choir
Of creatures wanting voice; that done, partake
The season prime for sweetest scents and airs:
Then commune, how that day they best may ply
Their growing work: for much their work out-grew
The hands' dispatch of two gardening so wide,
And Eve first to her husband thus began:
"Adam, well may we labour still to dress
This garden, still to tend plant, herb, and flower,
Our pleasant task enjoined; but, till more hands
Aid us, the work under our labour grows
Luxurious by restraint; what we by day
Lop overgrown, or prune, or prop, or bind,
One night or two with wanton growth derides
Tending to wild. Thou therefore now advise,
Or hear what to my mind first thoughts present:
Let us divide our labours; thou, where choice
Leads thee, or where most needs, whether to wind
The woodbine round this arbour, or direct
The clasping ivy where to climb; while I,
In yonder spring of roses intermixed
With myrtle, find what to redress° till noon: adjust
For, while so near each other thus all day
Our task we choose, what wonder if so near Looks intervene and smiles, or object new
Casual discourse draw on; which intermits
Our day's work, brought to little, though begun
Early, and th' hour of supper comes unearned?"
To whom mild answer Adam thus returned:
"Sole Eve, associate sole, to me beyond
Compare above all living creatures dear!
Well hast thou motioned,° well thy thoughts employed, suggested
How we might best fulfil the work which here
God hath assigned us; nor of me shalt pass
Unpraised: for nothing lovelier can be found
In woman, than to study household good,
And good works in her husband to promote.[1]
Yet not so strictly hath our Lord imposed
Labour, as to debar° us when we need constrain
Refreshment, whether food, or talk between,
Food of the mind, or this sweet intercourse
Of looks and smiles; for smiles from Reason flow,
To brute denied, and are of Love the food;
Love, not the lowest end of human life.
For not to irksome toil, but to delight,
He made us, and delight to reason joined.
These paths and bowers doubt not but our joint hands
Will keep from wilderness with ease, as wide
As we need walk, till younger hands ere long
Assist us; But, if much converse perhaps
Thee satiate, to short absence I could yield:
For solitude sometimes is best society,
And short retirement urges sweet return.
But other doubt possesses me, lest harm
Befall thee severed from me; for thou knowest
What hath been warned us, what malicious foe
Envying our happiness, and of his own
Despairing, seeks to work us woe and shame
By sly assault; and somewhere nigh at hand
Watches, no doubt, with greedy hope to find
His wish and best advantage, us asunder;
Hopeless to circumvent us joined, where each
To other speedy aid might lend at need:
Whether his first design be to withdraw
Our fealty from God, or to disturb
Conjugal love, than which perhaps no bliss
Enjoyed by us excites his envy more;
Or this, or worse, leave not the faithful side
That gave thee being, still shades thee, and protects.
The wife, where danger or dishonour lurks,
Safest and seemliest by her husband stays,
Who guards her, or with her the worst endures."
To whom the virgin[2] majesty of Eve,
As one who loves, and some unkindness meets,
With sweet austere composure thus replied:
"Offspring of Heaven and Earth, and all Earth's lord!
That such an enemy we have, who seeks
Our ruin, both by thee informed I learn,
And from the parting Angel[3] over-heard,
As in a shady nook I stood behind,

---

[1] nothing … promote See Proverbs 31.

[2] virgin Faultless, rather than sexually chaste.

[3] the parting Angel Raphael, the angel who visits Adam and Eve in Books Four through Eight, and warns them of the danger they are about to face.

Just then returned at shut of evening flowers.
But, that thou shouldst my firmness therefore doubt
To God or thee, because we have a foe
May tempt it, I expected not to hear.
His violence thou fearest not, being such
As we, not capable of death or pain,
Can either not receive, or can repel.
His fraud is then thy fear; which plain infers
Thy equal fear, that my firm faith and love
Can by his fraud be shaken or seduced;
Thoughts, which how found they harbour in thy breast,
Adam, mis-thought of[1] her to thee so dear?"
To whom with healing words Adam replied:
"Daughter of God and Man, immortal Eve!
For such thou art; from sin and blame entire:° unaffected
Not diffident° of thee do I dissuade mistrustful
Thy absence from my sight, but to avoid
Th' attempt itself, intended by our foe.
For he who tempts, though in vain, at least asperses[2]
The tempted with dishonour foul; supposed
Not incorruptible of faith, not proof
Against temptation: Thou thyself with scorn
And anger wouldst resent the offered wrong,
Though ineffectual found: misdeem not then,
If such affront I labour to avert
From thee alone, which on us both at once
The enemy, though bold, will hardly dare;
Or daring, first on me th' assault shall light.
Nor thou his malice and false guile contemn;° detest
Subtle he needs must be, who could seduce
Angels; nor think superfluous others' aid.
I, from the influence of thy looks, receive
Access° in every virtue; in thy sight expansion
More wise, more watchful, stronger, if need were
Of outward strength; while shame, thou looking on,
Shame to be overcome or over-reached,° deceived
Would utmost vigour raise, and raised unite.
Why shouldst not thou like sense within thee feel
When I am present, and thy trial choose
With me, best witness of thy virtue tried?"
So spake domestic Adam in his care
And matrimonial love; but Eve, who thought
Less attributed to her faith sincere,
Thus her reply with accent sweet renewed:
"If this be our condition, thus to dwell
In narrow circuit straitened° by a foe, restricted
Subtle or violent, we not endued
Single with like defence, wherever met;
How are we happy, still in fear of harm?
But harm precedes not sin: only our foe,
Tempting, affronts us with his foul esteem
Of our integrity: his foul esteem
Sticks no dishonour on our front, but turns
Foul on himself; then wherefore shunned or feared
By us? Who rather double honour gain
From his surmise proved false; find peace within,
Favour from Heav'n, our witness, from the event.
And what is faith, love, virtue, unassayed
Alone, without exterior help sustained?
Let us not then suspect our happy state
Left so imperfect by the Maker wise,
As not secure to single[3] or combined.
Frail is our happiness, if this be so,
And Eden were no Eden, thus exposed."
To whom thus Adam fervently replied.
"O woman, best are all things as the will
Of God ordained them: His creating hand
Nothing imperfect or deficient left
Of all that he created, much less Man,
Or aught that might his happy state secure,
Secure from outward force; within himself
The danger lies, yet lies within his power:
Against his will he can receive no harm.
But God left free the Will; for what obeys
Reason, is free; and Reason He made right,[4]
But bid her well beware, and still erect;[5]
Lest, by some fair-appearing good surprised,
She dictate false; and mis-inform the will
To do what God expressly hath forbid.
Not then mistrust, but tender love, enjoins,
That I should mind° thee oft; and mind thou me. prompt
Firm we subsist,° yet possible to swerve; endure

[1] mis-thought of Mistakenly associated with.

[2] asperses Bespatters, besprinkles (here, someone's reputation).

[3] single One of us alone.

[4] Reason ... right Milton alludes to the concept of right reason, the ability to understand moral truths, granted through God.

[5] bid her ... still erect Advised her to be careful, and to remain vigilant.

Since Reason not impossibly may meet
Some specious[1] object by the foe suborned,
And fall into deception unaware,
Not keeping strictest watch, as she was warned.
Seek not temptation then, which to avoid
Were better, and most likely if from me
Thou sever trial will come unsought.
Wouldst thou approve° thy constancy, approve prove
First thy obedience; the other who can know,
Not seeing thee attempted, who attest?
But, if thou think, trial unsought may find
Us both securer[2] than thus warned thou seemest,
Go; for thy stay, not free, absents thee more;
Go in thy native innocence, rely
On what thou hast of virtue; summon all!
For God towards thee hath done his part, do thine."
So spake the patriarch of mankind; but Eve
Persisted; yet submiss, though last, replied:
"With thy permission then, and thus forewarned
Chiefly by what thy own last reasoning words
Touched only; that our trial, when least sought,
May find us both perhaps far less prepared,
The willinger I go, nor much expect
A foe so proud will first the weaker seek;
So bent, the more shall shame him his repulse."
Thus saying, from her husband's hand her hand
Soft she withdrew; and, like a wood-nymph light,[3]
Oread or dryad, or of Delia's[4] train,
Betook her to the groves; but Delia's self
In gait surpassed, and goddess-like deport,° composure
Though not as she with bow and quiver armed,
But with such gard'ning tools as art yet rude,
Guiltless of fire,[5] had formed, or angels brought.
To Pales, or Pomona, thus adorned,
Likest she seemed, Pomona when she fled
Vertumnus,[6] or to Ceres in her prime,
Yet virgin of Proserpina from Jove.
Her long with ardent look his eye pursued
Delighted, but desiring more her stay.
Oft he to her his charge of quick return
Repeated; she to him as oft engaged
To be returned by noon amid the bower,
And all things in best order to invite
Noontide repast, or afternoon's repose.
O much deceived, much failing, hapless Eve,
Of thy presumed return! Event perverse!
Thou never from that hour in Paradise
Foundst either sweet repast, or sound repose;
Such ambush, hid among sweet flowers and shades,
Waited with hellish rancour imminent
To intercept thy way, or send thee back
Despoiled of innocence, of faith, of bliss!
For now, and since first break of dawn, the fiend,
Mere serpent in appearance, forth was come;
And on his quest, where likeliest he might find
The only two of mankind, but in them
The whole included race, his purposed prey.
In bower and field he sought, where any tuft
Of grove or garden-plot more pleasant lay,
Their tendance, or plantation for delight;[7]
By fountain or by shady rivulet
He sought them both, but wished his hap might find
Eve separate; he wished, but not with hope
Of what so seldom chanced; when to his wish,
Beyond his hope, Eve separate he spies,
Veiled in a cloud of fragrance, where she stood,
Half spied, so thick the roses blushing round
About her glowed, oft stooping to support
Each flower of slender stalk, whose head, though gay
Carnation, purple, azure, or specked with gold,
Hung drooping unsustained; them she upstays
Gently with myrtle band, mindless the while

---

[1] specious Misleadingly beautiful.

[2] securer Excessively self-assured.

[3] light With a light gait, with the additional suggestion of flighty behavior.

[4] Oread … dryad Nature spirits from Greek mythology; Delia Roman virgin goddess of the moon and the hunt, who was accompanied by a party of nymphs.

[5] Guiltless of fire Unaware of fire and its uses.

[6] Pales … Pomona … Vertumnus Goddess of pastures, goddess of orchards, and god of gardens and the change of seasons, respectively. Like Eve's initial resistance to Satan in disguise, Pomona resisted Vertumnus as he pursued her while appearing in a variety of forms.

[7] tendance … delight That which they had grown for their own enjoyment.

Herself, though fairest unsupported flower,[1]
From her best prop so far, and storm so nigh.
Nearer he drew, and many a walk traversed
Of stateliest covert, cedar, pine, or palm;
Then voluble° and bold, now hid, now seen, rippling
Among thick-woven arborets, and flowers
Imbordered on each bank, the hand° of Eve: handicraft
Spot more delicious than those gardens feigned
Or of revived Adonis,[2] or renowned
Alcinous,[3] host of old Laertes' son;
Or that, not mystick, where the sapient king
Held dalliance with his fair Egyptian spouse.[4]
Much he the place admired, the person more.
As one who long in populous city pent,
Where houses thick and sewers annoy° the air, pollute
Forth issuing on a summer's morn, to breathe
Among the pleasant villages and farms
Adjoined, from each thing met conceives delight;
The smell of grain, or tedded grass, or kine,[5]
Or dairy, each rural sight, each rural sound;
If chance, with nymph-like step, fair virgin pass,
What pleasing seemed, for her now pleases more;
She most, and in her look sums all delight:
Such pleasure took the serpent to behold
This flowery plat,° the sweet plot, patch of ground
recess° of Eve refuge
Thus early, thus alone: Her heav'nly form
Angelic, but more soft, and feminine,
Her graceful innocence, her every air
Of gesture, or least action, overawed
His malice, and with rapine° sweet bereaved plunder
His fierceness of the fierce intent it brought:
That space the evil one abstracted° stood secluded
From his own evil, and for the time remained
Stupidly good;[6] of enmity disarmed,
Of guile, of hate, of envy, of revenge:
But the hot Hell that always in him burns,
Though in mid Heav'n, soon ended his delight,
And tortures him now more, the more he sees
Of pleasure, not for him ordained: then soon
Fierce hate he recollects, and all his thoughts
Of mischief, gratulating,° thus excites: hailing
"Thoughts, whither have ye led me! With what sweet
Compulsion thus transported, to forget
What hither brought us! Hate, not love; nor hope
Of Paradise for Hell, hope here to taste
Of pleasure; but all pleasure to destroy,
Save what is in destroying; other joy
To me is lost. Then, let me not let pass
Occasion which now smiles; behold alone
The woman, opportune to all attempts,
Her husband, for I view far round, not nigh,
Whose higher intellectual more I shun,
And strength, of courage haughty,° and of limb elevated
Heroic built, though of terrestrial° mould; worldly
Foe not informidable! Exempt from wound,
I not; so much hath Hell debased, and pain
Enfeebled me, to what I was in Heav'n.
She fair, divinely fair, fit love for Gods!
Not terrible,° though terror be in love frightening
And beauty, not° approached by stronger hate, unless
Hate stronger, under show of love well feigned;
The way which to her ruin now I tend."
So spake the enemy of mankind, enclosed
In serpent, inmate bad, and toward Eve
Addressed his way: not with indented wave,
Prone on the ground, as since; but on his rear,
Circular base of rising folds, that towered
Fold above fold, a surging maze! His head
Crested aloft, and carbuncle° his eyes; ruby
With burnished neck of verdant° gold, erect green-hued
Amidst his circling spires, that on the grass
Floated redundant:[7] pleasing was his shape
And lovely; never since of serpent-kind
Lovelier, not those that in Illyria changed,

[1] Herself . . . flower Allusion to Proserpina, who was often depicted as a flower snatched from a garden.

[2] Adonis Beloved of Venus, goddess of love. He was slain by a boar but was turned to a flower. He became a cult figure. His "gardens" were miniature gardens, symbols of evanescence.

[3] Alcinous Alcinous, King of the Phaeacians, owned a fabulous garden visited by Odysseus, son of Laertes, in Homer's Odyssey.

[4] the sapient king . . . spouse Solomon the Wise and his bride, the daughter of the King of Egypt (see 1 Kings). Their garden was historical rather than mythical.

[5] tedded Mown, as for hay; kine Cattle.

[6] Stupidly good In a stupefied state.

[7] redundant Flowing in ripples.

Hermione and Cadmus,[1] or the god
In Epidaurus;[2] nor to which transformed
Ammonian Jove, or Capitoline,[3] was seen;
He with Olympias; this with her who bore
Scipio,[4] the height of Rome. With tract oblique
At first, as one who sought access, but feared
To interrupt, sidelong he works his way.
As when a ship, by skilful steersmen wrought
Nigh river's mouth or foreland, where the wind
Veers oft, as oft so steers, and shifts her sail:
So varied he, and of his tortuous train[5]
Curled many a wanton wreath in sight of Eve,
To lure her eye; she, busied, heard the sound
Of rustling leaves, but minded not, as used
To such disport before her through the field,
From every beast; more duteous at her call,
Than at Circean call the herd disguised.[6]
He, bolder now, uncalled before her stood,
But as in gaze admiring: oft he bowed
His turret crest, and sleek enamelled neck,
Fawning; and licked the ground whereon she trod.
His gentle dumb expression turned at length
The eye of Eve to mark his play; he, glad
Of her attention gained, with serpent-tongue
Organic, or impulse of vocal air,[7]
His fraudulent temptation thus began:
"Wonder not, sov'reign mistress, if perhaps
Thou canst, who art sole wonder! Much less arm
Thy looks, the heaven of mildness, with disdain,
Displeased that I approach thee thus, and gaze
Insatiate; I thus single; nor have feared
Thy awful brow, more awful thus retired.
Fairest resemblance of thy Maker fair,
Thee all things living gaze on, all things thine
By gift, and thy celestial beauty adore
With ravishment beheld! There best beheld,
Where universally admired; but here
In this enclosure wild, these beasts among,
Beholders rude, and shallow to discern
Half what in thee is fair, one man except,
Who sees thee? And what is one? Who should be seen
A goddess among gods, adored and served
By angels numberless, thy daily train."
So glozed° the tempter, and his proem[8] tuned: flattered
Into the heart of Eve his words made way,
Though at the voice much marvelling; at length,
Not unamazed, she thus in answer spake:
"What may this mean? Language of man pronounced
By tongue of brute, and human sense expressed?
The first, at least, of these I thought denied
To beasts; whom God, on their creation-day,
Created mute to all articulate sound:
The latter I demur; for in their looks
Much reason, and in their actions, oft appears.
Thee, serpent, subtlest beast of all the field
I knew, but not with human voice endued;
Redouble then this miracle, and say,
How cam'st thou speakable[9] of mute, and how
To me so friendly grown above the rest
Of brutal kind, that daily are in sight?
Say, for such wonder claims attention due."
To whom the guileful tempter thus replied,
"Empress of this fair world, resplendent Eve!
Easy to me it is to tell thee all
What thou commandest; and right thou shouldst be obeyed:
I was at first as other beasts that graze
The trodden herb, of abject thoughts and low,
As was my food; nor aught but food discerned
Or sex, and apprehended nothing high:
Till, on a day roving the field, I chanced
A goodly tree far distant to behold

[1] Hermione and Cadmus Citizens of Illyria changed into serpents: he for killing a sacred snake, she out of love for Cadmus.

[2] the god / In Epidaurus Aesculapius, god of healing, who appeared at his temple in Epidaurus in the form of a snake.

[3] Ammonian Jove, or Capitoline Both names refer to Jove, but reference different instances of his shape-shifting into the form of a snake to impregnate women with famous conqueror children.

[4] Olympias … Scipio Alexander the Great (whose mother was Olympias) and the Roman conqueror-hero Scipio.

[5] tortuous train Stretching body.

[6] Circean call the herd disguised Circe was a sorceress who transformed men into animals who followed her commands.

[7] serepnt-tongue … air With the serpent's own tongue or with Satan's actual voice.

[8] proem Prelude or introduction.

[9] speakable Capable of speech.

Loaden with fruit of fairest colours mixed,
Ruddy and gold: I nearer drew to gaze;
When from the boughs a savoury odour blown,
Grateful to appetite, more pleased my sense
Than smell of sweetest fennel, or the teats
Of ewe or goat dropping with milk at even,[1]
Unsucked of lamb or kid, that tend their play.
To satisfy the sharp desire I had
Of tasting those fair apples, I resolved
Not to defer; hunger and thirst at once,
Powerful persuaders, quickened at the scent
Of that alluring fruit, urged me so keen.
About the mossy trunk I wound me soon;
For, high from ground, the branches would require
Thy utmost reach or Adam's: Round the tree
All other beasts that saw, with like desire
Longing and envying stood, but could not reach.
Amid the tree now got, where plenty hung
Tempting so nigh, to pluck and eat my fill
I spared not; for, such pleasure till that hour,
At feed or fountain, never had I found.
Sated at length, ere long I might perceive
Strange alteration in me, to degree
Of reason in my inward powers; and speech
Wanted not long; though to this shape retained.
Thenceforth to speculations high or deep
I turned my thoughts, and with capacious mind
Considered all things visible in Heav'n,
Or Earth, or middle; all things fair and good:
But all that fair and good in thy divine
Semblance, and in thy beauty's heav'nly ray,
United I beheld; no fair to thine
Equivalent or second, which compelled
Me thus, though importune perhaps, to come
And gaze, and worship thee of right declared
Sov'reign of creatures, universal dame!"
    So talked the spirited[2] sly snake; and Eve,
Yet more amazed, unwary thus replied,
    "Serpent, thy overpraising leaves in doubt
The virtue of that fruit, in thee first proved:
But say, where grows the tree? From hence how far?
For many are the trees of God that grow
In Paradise, and various, yet unknown
To us; in such abundance lies our choice,
As leaves a greater store of fruit untouched,
Still hanging incorruptible, till men
Grow up to their provision,[3] and more hands
Help to disburden nature of her birth."
    To whom the wily adder, blithe and glad:
"Empress, the way is ready, and not long;
Beyond a row of myrtles, on a flat,
Fast by a fountain, one small thicket past
Of blowing myrrh and balm: if thou accept
My conduct,° I can bring thee thither soon."   ° advice
    "Lead then," said Eve. He, leading, swiftly rolled
In tangles, and made intricate seem straight,
To mischief swift. Hope elevates, and joy
Brightens his crest; as when a wandering fire,[4]
Compact of unctuous vapour,[5] which the night
Condenses, and the cold environs round,
Kindled through agitation to a flame,
Which oft, they say, some evil spirit attends,
Hovering and blazing with delusive light,
Misleads th' amazed night-wanderer from his way
To bogs and mires, and oft through pond or pool;
There swallowed up and lost, from succour far.
So glistered the dire snake, and into fraud
Led Eve, our credulous mother, to the tree
Of prohibition, root of all our woe;
Which when she saw, thus to her guide she spake:
    "Serpent, we might have spared our coming hither,
Fruitless to me, though fruit be here to excess,
The credit of whose virtue rest with thee;
Wondrous indeed, if cause of such effects.
But of this tree we may not taste nor touch;
God so commanded, and left that command
Sole daughter of His voice; the rest, we live
Law to ourselves; our reason is our law."[6]

---

[1] fennel … at even Snakes were believed to eat fennel and drink sheep and goat's milk.

[2] spirited Possessed by Satan's spirit.

[3] till men … provision Until there are so many humans that they must eat all the available food.

[4] wandering fire Will-o'-the-wisp, a mischievous spirit of folk tradition.

[5] Compact of unctuous vapour Made of oily substance.

[6] reason is our law While God imported one specific command, the rest of their behavior complies with a natural law they understand innately.

To whom the tempter guilefully replied:
"Indeed! Hath God then said that of the fruit
Of all these garden-trees ye shall not eat,
Yet lords declared of all in earth or air?"
To whom thus Eve, yet sinless: "Of the fruit
Of each tree in the garden we may eat;
But of the fruit of this fair tree amidst
The garden, God hath said, 'ye shall not eat
Thereof, nor shall ye touch it, lest ye die.'"
She scarce had said, though brief, when now more bold
The tempter, but with show of zeal and love
To Man, and indignation at his wrong,
New part puts on; and, as to passion moved,
Fluctuates disturbed, yet comely and in act
Raised, as of some great matter to begin.
As when of old some orator renowned,
In Athens or free Rome, where eloquence
Flourished,[1] since mute to some great cause addressed,
Stood in himself collected; while each part,
Motion, each act, won audience ere the tongue;[2]
Sometimes in height began, as no delay
Of preface brooking,[3] through his zeal of right:
So standing, moving, or to height up grown,
The tempter, all impassioned, thus began:
"O sacred, wise, and wisdom-giving plant,
Mother of science!° Now I feel thy power knowledge
Within me clear; not only to discern
Things in their causes, but to trace the ways
Of highest agents, deemed however wise.
Queen of this universe! Do not believe
Those rigid threats of death: ye shall not die:
How should you? By the fruit? It gives you life
To knowledge;[4] by the threat'ner? Look on me,
Me, who have touched and tasted; yet both live,
And life more perfect have attained than fate
Meant me, by vent'ring higher than my lot.
Shall that be shut to Man, which to the beast
Is open? Or will God incense His ire
For such a petty trespass and not praise
Rather your dauntless virtue, whom the pain
Of death denounced,° whatever thing death be, wained
Deterred not from achieving what might lead
To happier life, knowledge of good and evil;
Of good, how just?[5] Of evil, if what is evil
Be real, why not known, since easier shunned?
God therefore cannot hurt ye, and be just;
Not just, not God; not feared then, nor obeyed:
Your fear itself of death removes the fear.
Why then was this forbid? Why, but to awe;
Why, but to keep ye low and ignorant,
His worshippers? He knows that in the day
Ye eat thereof, your eyes that seem so clear,
Yet are but dim, shall perfectly be then
Opened and cleared, and ye shall be as gods,
Knowing both good and evil, as they know.
That ye shall be as gods, since I as man,
Internal man, is but proportion meet;
I, of brute, human; ye, of human, gods.
So ye shall die perhaps, by putting off
Human, to put on gods; death to be wished,
Though threatened, which no worse than this can bring.
And what are gods, that man may not become
As they, participating° godlike food? consuming
The gods are first, and that advantage use
On our belief, that all from them proceeds:
I question it; for this fair earth I see,
Warmed by the sun, producing every kind;
Them, nothing: if they all[6] things, who enclosed
Knowledge of good and evil in this tree,
That whoso eats thereof, forthwith attains
Wisdom without their leave? And wherein lies
The offence, that man should thus attain to know?
What can your knowledge hurt Him, or this tree
Impart against His will, if all be His?
Or is it envy? And can envy dwell
In heav'nly breasts? These, these, and many more Causes import° your need of this fair fruit. confirm Goddess human, reach then, and freely taste!"
He ended; and his words, replete with guile,
Into her heart too easy entrance won:

---

[1] Raised … Flourished I.e., Satan stood up to deliver an eloquent speech as the classical orators did.

[2] ere the tongue Before he began his address.

[3] as no … brooking Without an introduction.

[4] life / To knowledge Life and knowledge, which in turn enriches life.

[5] how just? I.e., how could one justly prevent knowledge of good.

[6] if they all If they create all.

Fixed on the fruit she gazed, which to behold
Might tempt alone; and in her ears the sound
Yet rung of his persuasive words, impregned
With reason, to her seeming, and with truth:
Meanwhile the hour of noon drew on, and waked
An eager appetite, raised by the smell
So savoury of that fruit, which with desire,
Inclinable now grown to touch or taste,
Solicited her longing eye; yet first
Pausing a while, thus to herself she mused:
"Great are thy virtues, doubtless, best of fruits,
Though kept from man, and worthy to be admired;
Whose taste, too long forborne, at first assay
Gave elocution to the mute, and taught
The tongue not made for speech to speak thy praise:
Thy praise He also, who forbids thy use,
Conceals not from us, naming thee the tree
Of knowledge, knowledge both of good and evil;
Forbids us then to taste! But His forbidding Commends thee more, while it infers° the good indicates
By thee communicated, and our want:
For good unknown sure is not had; or, had
And yet unknown, is as not had at all.
In plain[1] then, what forbids He but to know,
Forbids us good, forbids us to be wise?
Such prohibitions bind not. But, if death
Bind us with after-bands,[2] what profits then
Our inward freedom? In the day we eat
Of this fair fruit, our doom is, we shall die!
How dies the serpent? He hath eaten and lives,
And knows, and speaks, and reasons, and discerns,
Irrational till then. For us alone
Was death invented? Or to us denied
This intellectual food, for beasts reserved?
For beasts it seems: yet that one beast which first
Hath tasted envies not, but brings with joy
The good befallen him, author unsuspect,[3]
Friendly to man, far from deceit or guile.
What fear I then? Rather, what know to fear
Under this ignorance of good and evil,
Of God or death, of law or penalty?
Here grows the cure of all, this fruit divine,
Fair to the eye, inviting to the taste,
Of virtue to make wise: what hinders then
To reach, and feed at once both body and mind?"
So saying, her rash hand in evil hour
Forth reaching to the fruit, she plucked, she ate!
Earth felt the wound; and nature from her seat,
Sighing through all her works, gave signs of woe,
That all was lost. Back to the thicket slunk
The guilty serpent; and well might; for Eve,
Intent now wholly on her taste, nought else
Regarded; such delight till then, as seemed,
In fruit she never tasted, whether true
Or fancied so, through expectation high
Of knowledge; nor was godhead from her thought.
Greedily she engorged without restraint,
And knew not eating death.[4] Satiate at length,
And heightened as with wine, jocund and boon,° cheerful
Thus to herself she pleasingly began:
"O sov'reign, virtuous, precious of all trees
In Paradise! Of operation blest
To sapience,[5] hitherto obscured, infamed.° disparaged
And thy fair fruit let hang, as to no end
Created; but henceforth my early care,
Not without song, each morning, and due praise,
Shall tend thee, and the fertile burden ease
Of thy full branches offered free to all;
Till, dieted by thee, I grow mature
In knowledge, as the gods, who all things know;
Though others envy what they cannot give:
For, had the gift been theirs, it had not here
Thus grown. Experience, next, to thee I owe,
Best guide; not following thee, I had remained
In ignorance; thou openest wisdom's way,
And givest access, though secret she retire.
And I perhaps am secret: Heav'n is high,
High, and remote to see from thence distinct
Each thing on Earth; and other care perhaps
May have diverted from continual watch
Our great Forbidder, safe with all His spies
About Him. But to Adam in what sort° disguise
Shall I appear? Shall I to him make known
As yet my change, and give him to partake

---

[1] In plain In plain speech.

[2] after-bands Subsequent ties.

[3] author unsuspect Source free from mistrust.

[4] knew not eating death I.e., did not yet know that she was eating death.

[5] sapience Wisdom, but also taste.

Full happiness with me, or rather not,
But keep the odds of knowledge in my power
Without copartner? So to add what wants
In female sex, the more to draw his love,
And render me more equal; and perhaps,
A thing not undesirable, sometime
Superior; for, inferior, who is free?
This may be well: but what if God have seen,
And death ensue? Then I shall be no more!
And Adam, wedded to another Eve,
Shall live with her enjoying, I extinct;
A death to think! Confirmed then I resolve,
Adam shall share with me in bliss or woe:
So dear I love him, that with him all deaths
I could endure, without him live no life."
So saying, from the tree her step she turned;
But first low reverence done, as to the power
That dwelt within, whose presence had infused
Into the plant sciential[1] sap, derived
From nectar, drink of Gods. Adam the while,
Waiting desirous her return, had wove
Of choicest flowers a garland, to adorn
Her tresses, and her rural labours crown;
As reapers oft are wont their harvest-queen.
Great joy he promised to his thoughts, and new
Solace in her return, so long delayed:
Yet oft his heart, divine of[2] something ill,
Misgave him; he the faltering measure felt;
And forth to meet her went, the way she took
That morn when first they parted: by the tree
Of knowledge he must pass; there he her met,
Scarce from the tree returning; in her hand
A bough of fairest fruit, that downy smiled,
New gathered, and ambrosial smell diffused.
To him she hasted; in her face excuse
Came prologue, and apology to prompt;[3]
Which, with bland° words at will, she thus addressed: gentle
"Hast thou not wondered, Adam, at my stay?
Thee I have missed, and thought it long, deprived
Thy presence; agony of love till now
Not felt, nor shall be twice; for never more
Mean I to try, what rash untried I sought,
The pain of absence from thy sight. But strange
Hath been the cause, and wonderful to hear:
This tree is not, as we are told, a tree
Of danger tasted,[4] nor to evil unknown
Op'ning the way, but of divine effect
To open eyes, and make them gods who taste;
And hath been tasted such. The serpent wise,
Or not restrained as we, or not obeying,
Hath eaten of the fruit; and is become,
Not dead, as we are threatened, but thenceforth
Endued with human voice and human sense,
Reasoning to admiration; and with me
Persuasively hath so prevailed, that I
Have also tasted, and have also found
Th' effects to correspond; opener mine eyes,
Dim erst,° dilated spirits, ampler heart, previously
And growing up to godhead; which for thee
Chiefly I sought, without thee can despise.
For bliss, as thou hast part, to me is bliss;
Tedious, unshared with thee, and odious soon.
Thou therefore also taste, that equal lot
May join us, equal joy, as equal love;
Lest, thou not tasting, different degree
Disjoin us, and I then too late renounce
Deity for thee, when fate will not permit."
Thus Eve with countenance blithe her story told;
But in her cheek distemper flushing glowed.[5]
On th' other side Adam, soon as he heard
The fatal trespass done by Eve, amazed,
Astonied° stood and blank, while horror chill astonished
Ran through his veins, and all his joints relaxed;
From his slack hand the garland wreathed for Eve
Down dropt, and all the faded roses shed:
Speechless he stood and pale, till thus at length
First to himself he inward silence broke.
"O fairest of creation, last and best
Of all God's works, creature in whom excelled
Whatever can to sight or thought be formed,
Holy, divine, good, amiable, or sweet!

---

[1] sciential Able to generate knowledge.

[2] divine of Forewarning.

[3] in her face ... prompt Excuse delivered the prologue (as at the beginning of a play) while apology (i.e., explanation) served as prompter.

[4] tasted When tasted.

[5] distemper flushing glowed Her face flushed as a result of an imbalance of bodily humors.

How art thou lost! How on a sudden lost,
Defaced, deflowered, and now to death devote!° condemned
Rather, how hast thou yielded to transgress
The strict forbiddance, how to violate
The sacred fruit forbidden! Some cursed fraud
Of enemy hath beguiled thee, yet unknown,
And me with thee hath ruined; for with thee
Certain my resolution is to die:
How can I live without thee! How forego
Thy sweet converse, and love so dearly joined,
To live again in these wild woods forlorn!
Should God create another Eve, and I
Another rib afford, yet loss of thee
Would never from my heart; no. No, I feel
The link of nature draw me: flesh of flesh,
Bone of my bone thou art,[1] and from thy state
Mine never shall be parted, bliss or woe."
So having said, as one from sad dismay
Recomforted, and after thoughts disturbed
Submitting to what seemed remediless,
Thus in calm mood his words to Eve he turned.
"Bold deed thou hast presumed, advent'rous Eve,
And peril great provoked, who thus hast dared,
Had it been only coveting to eye
That sacred fruit, sacred to abstinence,
Much more to taste it under ban to touch.
But past who can recall, or done undo?
Not God omnipotent, nor fate; yet so
Perhaps thou shalt not die, perhaps the fact° act
Is not so heinous now, foretasted fruit,
Profaned first by the serpent, by him first
Made common, and unhallowed, ere our taste;
Nor yet on him found deadly; yet he lives;
Lives, as thou saidst, and gains to live, as man,
Higher degree of life; inducement strong
To us, as likely tasting to attain
Proportional ascent; which cannot be
But to be gods, or angels, demi-gods.
Nor can I think that God, Creator wise,
Though threat'ning, will in earnest so destroy
Us His prime creatures, dignified so high,
Set over all His works; which in our fall,
For us created, needs with us must fail,
Dependent made; so God shall uncreate,
Be frustrate, do, undo, and labour lose;
Not well conceived of God, who, though His power
Creation could repeat, yet would be loth
Us to abolish, lest the adversary
Triumph, and say; 'Fickle their state whom God
Most favours; who can please Him long? Me first
He ruined, now Mankind; whom will He next?'
Matter of scorn, not to be given the foe.
However I with thee have fixed my lot,
Certain° to undergo like doom: If death determined
Consort with thee, death is to me as life;
So forcible within my heart I feel
The bond of nature draw me to my own;
My own in thee, for what thou art is mine;
Our state cannot be severed; we are one,
One flesh; to lose thee were to lose myself."
So Adam; and thus Eve to him replied:
"O glorious trial of exceeding love,
Illustrious evidence, example high!
Engaging me to emulate; but, short
Of thy perfection, how shall I attain,
Adam, from whose dear side I boast me sprung,
And gladly of our union hear thee speak,
One heart, one soul in both; whereof good proof
This day affords, declaring thee resolved,
Rather than death, or aught than death more dread,
Shall separate us, linked in love so dear,
To undergo with me one guilt, one crime,
If any be, of tasting this fair fruit;
Whose virtue for of good still good proceeds,
Direct, or by occasion, hath presented
This happy trial of thy love, which else
So eminently never had been known?
Were it I thought death menaced would ensue
This my attempt, I would sustain alone
The worst, and not persuade thee, rather die
Deserted, than oblige thee with a fact[2]
Pernicious to thy peace; chiefly assured
Remarkably so late of thy so true,
So faithful, love unequalled: but I feel
Far otherwise th' event; not death, but life
Augmented, opened eyes, new hopes, new joys,
Taste so divine, that what of sweet before

---

[1] Bone ... art See Genesis 2.23.

[2] oblige ... fact Make you liable for an act.

Hath touched my sense, flat seems to this, and harsh.
On my experience, Adam, freely taste,
And fear of death deliver to the winds."
So saying, she embraced him, and for joy
Tenderly wept; much won, that he his love
Had so ennobled, as of choice to incur
Divine displeasure for her sake, or death.
In recompense for such compliance bad
Such recompense best merits from the bough
She gave him of that fair enticing fruit
With liberal hand: he scrupled° not to eat, hesitated
Against his better knowledge; not deceived,
But fondly° overcome with female charm. foolishly
Earth trembled from her entrails, as again
In pangs; and Nature gave a second groan;
Sky loured;[1] and, muttering thunder, some sad drops
Wept at completing of the mortal sin
Original:[2] while Adam took no thought,
Eating his fill; nor Eve to iterate
Her former trespass feared, the more to soothe
Him with her loved society; that now,
As with new wine intoxicated both,
They swim in mirth, and fancy that they feel
Divinity within them breeding wings,
Wherewith to scorn the earth: but that false fruit
Far other operation first displayed,
Carnal desire inflaming; he on Eve
Began to cast lascivious eyes; she him
As wantonly repaid; in lust they burn:
Till Adam thus 'gan° Eve to dalliance move: began
"Eve, now I see thou art exact of taste,
And elegant, of sapience no small part;
Since to each meaning savour we apply,
And palate call judicious; I the praise
Yield thee, so well this day thou hast purveyed.
Much pleasure we have lost, while we abstained
From this delightful fruit, nor known till now
True relish, tasting; if such pleasure be
In things to us forbidden, it might be wished,
For this one tree had been forbidden ten.
But come, so well refreshed, now let us play,
As meet is, after such delicious fare;
For never did thy beauty, since the day
I saw thee first and wedded thee, adorned
With all perfections, so inflame my sense
With ardour to enjoy thee, fairer now
Than ever; bounty of this virtuous tree!"
So said he, and forbore not glance or toy° touch
Of amorous intent; well understood
Of Eve, whose eye darted contagious fire.
Her hand he seized; and to a shady bank,
Thick over-head with verdant roof embowered,
He led her nothing loth; flowers were the couch,
Pansies, and violets, and asphodel,
And hyacinth; Earth's freshest softest lap.
There they their fill of love and love's disport
Took largely, of their mutual guilt the seal,
The solace of their sin; till dewy sleep
Oppressed them, wearied with their amorous play,
Soon as the force of that fallacious fruit,
That with exhilarating vapour bland° pleasurable
About their spirits had played, and inmost powers
Made err, was now exhaled; and grosser sleep,
Bred of unkindly° fumes, with conscious[3] dreams unnatural
Encumbered, now had left them; up they rose
As from unrest; and, each the other viewing,
Soon found their eyes how opened, and their minds
How darkened; innocence, that as a veil
Had shadowed them from knowing ill, was gone;
Just confidence, and native righteousness,
And honour, from about them, naked left
To guilty shame; he covered, but his robe
Uncovered more. So rose the Danite strong,
Herculean Samson, from the harlot-lap
Of Philistean Delilah, and waked
Shorn of his strength.[4] They destitute and bare
Of all their virtue, silent, and in face
Confounded, long they sat, as strucken mute:
Till Adam, though not less than Eve abashed,
At length gave utterance to these words constrained:
"O Eve, in evil hour thou didst give ear

---

[1] loured Became threatening.

[2] sin / Original Adam's transgression, according to the theological doctrine of original sin, was inherited by his descendants, all made to face his punishment of death for this first crime.

[3] conscious I.e., conscious of their own sinful behavior.

[4] So rose the … of his strength The Biblical hero Samson, whose strength lay in his hair, was undone when it was shorn by his wife, the Philistine Delilah (Judges 16).

To that false worm,° of whomsoever taught snake
To counterfeit Man's voice; true in our fall,
False in our promised rising; since our eyes
Opened we find indeed, and find we know
Both good and evil; good lost, and evil got;
Bad fruit of knowledge, if this be to know;
Which leaves us naked thus, of honour void,
Of innocence, of faith, of purity,
Our wonted ornaments now soiled and stained,
And in our faces evident the signs
Of foul concupiscence;° whence evil store; lust
Even shame, the last of evils; of the first
Be sure then. How shall I behold the face
Henceforth of God or angel, erst with joy
And rapture so oft beheld? Those heav'nly shapes
Will dazzle now this earthly with their blaze
Insufferably bright. O! Might I here
In solitude live savage; in some glade
Obscured, where highest woods, impenetrable
To star or sun-light, spread their umbrage° broad shadows
And brown as evening: Cover me, ye pines!
Ye cedars, with innumerable boughs
Hide me, where I may never see them more!—
But let us now, as in bad plight, devise
What best may for the present serve to hide
The parts of each from other, that seem most
To shame obnoxious, and unseemliest seen;
Some tree, whose broad smooth leaves together sewed,
And girded on our loins, may cover round
Those middle parts; that this newcomer, Shame,
There sit not, and reproach us as unclean."
So counselled he, and both together went Into the thickest wood; there soon they chose
The fig tree; not that kind for fruit renowned,[1]
But such as at this day, to Indians known,
In Malabar or Decan spreads her arms
Branching so broad and long, that in the ground
The bended twigs take root, and daughters grow
About the mother tree, a pillared shade
High overarched, and echoing walks between:
There oft the Indian herdsman, shunning heat,
Shelters in cool, and tends his pasturing herds
At loop-holes cut through thickest shade: Those leaves
They gathered, broad as Amazonian targe;° shield
And, with what skill they had, together sewed,
To gird their waist; vain covering, if to hide
Their guilt and dreaded shame! O, how unlike
To that first naked glory! Such of late
Columbus found the American, so girt
With feathered cincture;° naked else, and wild belt
Among the trees on isles and woody shores.
Thus fenced, and, as they thought, their shame in part
Covered, but not at rest or ease of mind,
They sat them down to weep; nor only tears
Rained at their eyes, but high winds worse within Began to rise, high passions, anger, hate,
Mistrust, suspicion, discord; and shook sore
Their inward state of mind, calm region once
And full of peace, now tossed and turbulent:
For understanding ruled not, and the will
Heard not her lore; both in subjection now
To sensual appetite, who from beneath
Usurping over sov'reign reason claimed
Superior sway. From thus distempered breast,
Adam, estranged in look and altered style,
Speech intermitted thus to Eve renewed:
"Would thou hadst hearkened to my words, and stayed
With me, as I besought thee, when that strange
Desire of wandering, this unhappy morn,
I know not whence possessed thee; we had° then would have Remained still happy; not, as now, despoiled
Of all our good; shamed, naked, miserable!
Let none henceforth seek needless cause to approve
The faith they owe; when earnestly they seek Such proof, conclude, they then begin to fail."
To whom, soon moved with touch of blame, thus Eve:
"What words have passed thy lips, Adam severe!
Imputest thou that to my default, or will
Of wandering, as thou call'st it, which who knows
But might as ill have happened thou being by,
Or to thyself perhaps? Hadst thou been there,
Or here the attempt, thou couldst not have discerned
Fraud in the serpent, speaking as he spake;
No ground of enmity between us known,
Why he should mean me ill, or seek to harm.

---

[1] fig ... renowned This description suggests the banyan tree, though it produces small leaves.

Was I to have never parted from thy side?
As good have grown there still a lifeless rib.
Being as I am, why didst not thou, the head,
Command me absolutely not to go,
Going into such danger, as thou saidst?
Too facile then, thou didst not much gainsay;° dispute
Nay, didst permit, approve, and fair dismiss.
Hadst thou been firm and fixed in thy dissent,
Neither had I transgressed, nor thou with me."
To whom, then first incensed, Adam replied:
"Is this the love, is this the recompense
Of mine to thee, ingrateful Eve! Expressed° exhibited
Immutable, when thou wert lost, not I;
Who might have lived, and joyed immortal bliss,
Yet willingly chose rather death with thee?
And am I now upbraided as the cause
Of thy transgressing? Not enough severe,
It seems, in thy restraint: what could I more
I warned thee, I admonished thee, foretold
The danger, and the lurking enemy
That lay in wait; beyond this, had been force;
And force upon free will hath here no place.
But confidence then bore thee on; secure
Either to meet no danger, or to find
Matter of glorious trial; and perhaps
I also erred, in overmuch admiring
What seemed in thee so perfect, that I thought
No evil durst attempt thee; but I rue
The error now, which is become my crime,
And thou the accuser. Thus it shall befall
Him, who, to worth in women overtrusting,
Lets her will rule: restraint she will not brook;° accept
And, left to herself, if evil thence ensue,
She first his weak indulgence will accuse."
Thus they in mutual accusation spent
The fruitless hours, but neither self-condemning;
And of their vain contest appeared no end.

THE END OF THE NINTH BOOK

ARGUMENT TO BOOK 10

Man's transgression known, the guardian angels forsake Paradise, and return up to Heaven to approve their vigilance, and are approved, God declaring that the entrance of Satan could not be by them prevented. He sends His Son to judge the transgressors, who descends and gives sentence accordingly; then in pity clothes them both, and reascends. Sin and Death sitting till then at the gates of Hell, by wondrous sympathy feeling the success of Satan in this new world, and the sin by Man there committed, resolve to sit no longer confined in Hell, but to follow Satan their sire up to the place of Man: to make the way easier from Hell to this world to and fro, they pave a broad highway or bridge over Chaos, according to the track that Satan first made; then preparing for Earth, they meet him proud of his success returning to Hell; their mutual gratulation. Satan arrives at Pandemonium, in full assembly relates with boasting his success against man; instead of applause is entertained with a general hiss by all his audience, transformed with himself also suddenly into serpents, according to his doom given in Paradise; then deluded with show of the forbidden Tree springing up before them, they greedily reaching to take of the fruit, chew dust and bitter ashes. The proceedings of Sin and Death; God foretells the final victory of His Son over them, and the renewing of all things; but for the present commands His angels to make several alterations in the heavens and elements. Adam more and more perceiving his fallen condition heavily bewails, rejects the condolement of Eve; she persists and at length appeases him: then to evade the curse likely to fall on their offspring, proposes to Adam violent ways, which he approves not, but conceiving better hope, puts her in mind of the late promise made them, that her seed should be revenged on the serpent, and exhorts her with him to seek peace of the offended Deity, by repentance and supplication.

BOOK 10

Meanwhile the heinous and despiteful act
Of Satan done in Paradise, and how
He, in the serpent, had perverted Eve,
Her husband she, to taste the fatal fruit,
Was known in Heaven; for what can 'scape the eye
Of God all-seeing, or deceive his heart
Omniscient, who in all things wise and just,
Hindered not Satan to attempt the mind
Of man, with strength entire, and free will armed,
Complete to have discovered and repulsed

Whatever wiles of foe or seeming friend.
For still° they knew, and ought to have still remembered always
The high injunction not to taste that fruit,
Whoever tempted; which they not obeying,
Incurred, what could they less, the penalty,
And manifold in sin, deserved to fall.
Up into Heaven from Paradise in haste
Th' angelic guards ascended, mute and sad
For man, for of his state by this° they knew, this time
Much wond'ring how the subtle fiend had stolen
Entrance unseen. Soon as th' unwelcome news
From Earth arrived at Heaven gate, displeased
All were who heard, dim sadness did not spare
That time celestial visages, yet mixed
With pity, violated not their bliss.
About the new-arrived, in multitudes
Th' ethereal people ran, to hear and know
How all befell: they towards the throne supreme Accountable made haste to make appear
With righteous plea, their utmost vigilance,[1]
And easily approved;° when the most high accepted
Eternal Father from his secret cloud,[2]
Amidst in thunder uttered thus his voice.
  "Assembled angels, and ye powers returned
From unsuccessful charge, be not dismayed,
Nor troubled at these tidings from the earth,
Which your sincerest care could not prevent,
Foretold so lately what would come to pass,
When first this tempter crossed the gulf from Hell.
I told ye then he should prevail and speed° succeed
On his bad errand, man should be seduced
And flattered out of all, believing lies
Against his Maker; no decree of mine
Concurring to necessitate his fall,
Or touch with lightest moment[3] of impulse
His free will, to her own inclining left
In even scale. But fallen he is, and now
What rests° but that the mortal sentence pass remains
On his transgression, death denounced° that day, proclaimed
Which he presumes already vain° and void, in vain
Because not yet inflicted, as he feared,
By some immediate stroke; but soon shall find
Forbearance no acquaintance[4] ere day end.
Justice shall not return as bounty scorned.[5]
But whom send I to judge them? Whom but thee
Vicegerent[6] Son, to thee I have transferred
All judgment whether in Heaven, or Earth, or Hell.
Easy it might be seen that I intend
Mercy colleague with justice, sending thee
Man's friend his mediator, his designed
Both ransom and redeemer voluntary,
And destined man himself to judge man fallen."
  So spake the Father, and unfolding bright
Toward the right hand his glory, on the Son
Blazed forth unclouded deity; he full
Resplendent all his Father manifest
Expressed, and thus divinely answered mild.
  "Father Eternal, thine is to decree,
Mine both in Heaven and Earth to do thy will Supreme, that thou in me thy Son beloved
May'st ever rest well pleased. I go to judge
On Earth these thy transgressors, but thou know'st,
Whoever judged, the worst on me must light,° fall
When time shall be, for so I undertook
Before thee; and not repenting, this obtain
Of right, that I may mitigate their doom
On me derived,[7] yet I shall temper so
Justice with mercy, as may illustrate most° best
Them fully satisfied, and thee appease.
Attendance none shall need, nor train,° where none retinue
Are to behold the judgment, but the judged,
Those two; the third best absent is condemned,
Convict° by flight, and rebel to all law; convicted

---

[1] they towards ... vigilance The "accountable" angels hasten to plea that they had exercised the utmost vigilance in guarding Eden.

[2] his secret cloud See Exodus 19.9.

[3] moment Small weight or counterweight, to tip the balance.

[4] Forbearance no acquaintance Proverbial; a debt has not been repaid just because payment has not yet been requested.

[5] Justice ... scorned My justice shall not be scorned like my generosity (bounty) has been.

[6] Vicegerent Exercising the powers of a deputy to a sovereign.

[7] On me derived I.e., their eventual punishment will be largely diverted onto the redeemer Son.

Conviction to the serpent none belongs."[1]
  Thus saying, from his radiant seat he rose
Of high collateral[2] glory: him Thrones and Powers,
Princedoms, and Dominations ministrant
Accompanied to Heaven gate, from whence
Eden and all the coast° in prospect lay. surrounding area
Down he descended strait;° the speed of gods immediately
Time counts not,[3] though with swiftest minutes winged.
Now was the sun in western cadence° low sinking
From noon, and gentle airs due at their hour
To fan the earth now waked, and usher in
The evening cool, when he from wrath more cool
Came the mild judge and intercessor both
To sentence man: the voice of God they heard
Now walking in the garden, by soft winds
Brought to their ears, while day declined; they heard,
And from his presence hid themselves among
The thickest trees, both man and wife, till God
Approaching, thus to Adam called aloud.
  "Where art thou Adam, wont with joy to meet
My coming seen far off? I miss thee here,
Not pleased, thus entertained with solitude,
Where obvious duty erewhile appeared unsought:
Or come I less conspicuous, or what change
Absents thee, or what chance detains? Come forth."
He came, and with him Eve, more loath, though first
To offend, discount'nanced both, and discomposed;
Love was not in their looks, either to God
Or to each other, but apparent guilt,
And shame, and perturbation, and despair,
Anger, and obstinacy, and hate, and guile.
Whence Adam falt'ring long, thus answered brief:
  "I heard thee in the garden, and of thy voice Afraid, being naked, hid myself." To whom
The gracious judge without revile° replied. reproach
  "My voice thou oft hast heard, and hast not feared,
But still rejoiced, how is it now become
So dreadful to thee? That thou art naked, who Hath told thee? Hast thou eaten of the tree
Whereof I gave thee charge thou should'st not eat?"
  To whom thus Adam sore beset replied.
"O Heaven! In evil strait this day I stand
Before my judge, either to undergo
Myself the total crime, or to accuse
My other self, the partner of my life;
Whose failing, while her faith to me remains,
I should conceal, and not expose to blame
By my complaint; but strict necessity
Subdues me, and calamitous constraint
Lest on my head both sin and punishment,
However insupportable, be all
Devolved;[4] though should I hold my peace, yet thou
Would'st easily detect what I conceal.
This woman whom thou mad'st to be my help,
And gav'st me as thy perfect gift, so good,
So fit, so acceptable, so divine,
That from her hand I could suspect no ill,
And what she did, whatever in itself,
Her doing seemed to justify the deed;
She gave me of the tree, and I did eat."[5]
  To whom the sov'reign presence thus replied.
"Was she thy God, that her thou did'st obey
Before his voice, or was she made thy guide,
Superior, or but equal, that to her
Thou did'st resign thy manhood, and the place
Wherein God set thee above her made of thee,
And for thee, whose perfection far excelled
Hers in all real dignity: adorned
She was indeed, and lovely to attract
Thy love, not thy subjection, and her gifts
Were such as under government well seemed,
Unseemly to bear rule, which was thy part° role
And person,° hadst thou known thyself aright." character
  So having said, he thus to Eve in few:° few words
"Say woman, what is this which thou hast done?"
  To whom sad Eve with shame nigh overwhelmed,
Confessing soon, yet not before her judge
Bold or loquacious, thus abashed replied:
"The serpent me beguiled and I did eat."[6]

---

[1] Convict ... belongs Satan will not need to be judged since he has already shown his guilt in his flight, while the serpent he possessed will not inherit blame.

[2] collateral Side-by-side: one of Milton's many ways of expressing the complex and (apparently to him) not quite equivalent relationship between Father and Son.

[3] the speed ... counts not I.e., their speed is so fast it cannot be measured.

[4] Devolved Caused to fall upon.

[5] O Heaven ... eat Adam's reply expands greatly on Genesis 3.12.

[6] The serpent ... eat Eve's reply reproduces that in Genesis 3.13.

Which when the Lord God heard, without delay
To judgment he proceeded on th' accused
Serpent though brute,° unable to transfer animal
The guilt on him who made him instrument
Of mischief, and polluted from the end° purpose
Of his creation; justly then accursed,
As vitiated° in nature: more to know contaminated
Concerned not man (since he no further knew)
Nor altered his offence; yet God at last
To Satan first in sin his doom applied
Though in mysterious terms,[1] judged as then best:
And on the serpent thus his curse let fall.
"Because thou hast done this, thou art accurst
Above all cattle, each beast of the field;
Upon thy belly groveling thou shalt go,
And dust shalt eat all the days of thy life.
Between thee and the woman I will put
Enmity, and between thine and her seed;
Her seed shall bruise thy head, thou bruise his heel."
So spake this oracle, then verified
When Jesus son of Mary second Eve,
Saw Satan fall like lightning down from heaven,[2]
Prince of the Air;[3] then rising from his grave
Spoiled Principalities and Powers, triumphed
In open show, and with ascension bright
Captivity led captive through the air,
The realm itself of Satan long usurped,
Whom he shall tread at last under our feet;
Even he who now foretold his fatal bruise,
And to the woman thus his sentence turned.
"Thy sorrow I will greatly multiply
By thy conception; children thou shalt bring
In sorrow forth, and to thy husband's will Thine shall submit, he over thee shall rule."
On Adam last thus judgment he pronounced.
"Because thou hast hearkened to the voice of thy wife,
And eaten of the tree concerning which
I charged thee, saying, 'Thou shalt not eat thereof,'
Cursed is the ground for thy sake, thou in sorrow
Shalt eat thereof all the days of thy life;
Thorns also and thistles it shall bring thee forth
Unbid, and thou shalt eat th' herb of th' field,
In the sweat of thy face shalt thou eat bread,
Till thou return unto the ground, for thou
Out of the ground wast taken, know thy birth,
For dust thou art, and shalt to dust return."[4]
So judged he man, both Judge and Saviour sent,
And th' instant stroke of death denounced that day
Removed far off; then pitying how they stood
Before him naked to the air, that now
Must suffer change, disdained not to begin
Thenceforth the form of servant to assume,
As when he washed his servants' feet,[5] so now
As father of his family he clad
Their nakedness with skins of beasts, or slain,
Or as the snake with youthful coat repaid;[6]
And thought not much to clothe his enemies:
Nor he their outward only with the skins
Of beasts, but inward nakedness, much more
Opprobrious, with his robe of righteousness,
Arraying covered from his Father's sight.
To him with swift ascent he up returned,
Into his blissful bosom reassumed
In glory as of old, to him appeased
All, though all-knowing, what had past with man
Recounted, mixing intercession sweet.
Meanwhile ere thus was sinned and judged on Earth,
Within the gates of Hell sat Sin and Death,
In counterview° within the gates, that now opposite
Stood open wide, belching outrageous flame
Far into Chaos, since the fiend passed through,
Sin opening, who thus now to Death began.
"O Son, why sit we here each other viewing
Idly, while Satan our great author thrives
In other worlds, and happier seat provides
For us his offspring dear? It cannot be
But that success attends him; if mishap,
Ere this he had returned, with fury driven
By his avengers, since no place like this
Can fit his punishment, or their revenge.
Methinks I feel new strength within me rise,
Wings growing, and dominion given me large

[1] mysterious terms Mystical or typological (prefigurative) terms; i.e., the punishment metaphorically represents that which will befall Satan.

[2] Saw Satan ... from heaven See Luke 10.18–19.

[4] Cursed ... return See Genesis 3.17–19.

[5] As when ... servants' feet See John 13.5.

[6] snake ... repaid Skin shed from a snake, whose skin is renewed constantly.

Beyond this deep; whatever draws me on,
Or sympathy, or some connatural force[1]
Powerful at greatest distance to unite
With secret amity things of like kind
By secretest conveyance. Thou my shade
Inseparable must with me[2] along:
For Death from Sin no power can separate.
But lest the difficulty of passing back
Stay his return perhaps over this gulf
Impassable, impervious, let us try
Advent'rous work, yet to thy power and mine
Not unagreeable, to found a path
Over this main[3] from Hell to that new world
Where Satan now prevails, a monument
Of merit high to all th' infernal host,
Easing their passage hence, for intercourse,[4]
Or transmigration,° as their lot shall lead. migration
Nor can I miss the way, so strongly drawn
By this new felt attraction and instinct."
Whom thus the meager shadow answered soon.
"Go whither fate and inclination strong
Leads thee, I shall not lag behind, nor err
The way, thou leading, such a scent I draw
Of carnage, prey innumerable, and taste
The savour of death from all things there that live:
Nor shall I to the work thou enterprisest
Be wanting, but afford thee equal aid."
So saying, with delight he snuffed the smell
Of mortal change on Earth. As when a flock
Of ravenous fowl, though many a league remote,
Against the day of battle, to a field,
Where armies lie encamped, come flying, lured
With scent of living carcasses designed
For death, the following day, in bloody fight.
So scented the grim feature,° and upturned form
His nostril wide into the murky air,
Sagacious[5] of his quarry from so far.
Then both from out Hell gates into the waste
Wide anarchy of Chaos damp and dark
Flew diverse, and with power (their power was great)
Hovering upon the waters; what they met
Solid or slimy, as in raging sea
Tossed up and down, together crowded drove
From each side shoaling[6] towards the mouth of Hell.
As when two polar winds blowing adverse
Upon the Cronian° Sea, together drive Arctic
Mountains of ice, that stop th' imagined way
Beyond Petsora eastward, to the rich
Cathaian Coast.[7] The aggregated soil
Death with his mace petrific,[8] cold and dry,
As with a trident smote, and fixed as firm
As Delos[9] floating once; the rest his look
Bound with Gorgonian rigor[10] not to move,
And with asphaltic slime; broad as the gate,
Deep to the roots of Hell the gathered beach° stony ridge
They fastened, and the mole° immense wrought on causeway
Over the foaming deep high arched, a bridge
Of length prodigious joining to the wall
Immovable of this now fenceless world
Forfeit to Death; from hence a passage broad,
Smooth, easy, inoffensive° down to Hell. obstruction-free
So, if great things to small may be compared,
Xerxes, the liberty of Greece to yoke,
From Susa his Memnonian palace high
Came to the sea, and over Hellespont
Bridging his way, Europe with Asia joined,
And scourged with many a stroke th' indignant waves.[11]

---

[1] connatural force Intrinsic connection.

[2] must with me Must accompany me.

[3] main The "ocean" of Chaos.

[4] intercourse Traveling back and forth.

[5] Sagacious Acutely aware of (by scent).

[6] shoaling Sailing over the shallow waters, forcing up shoals, or sandbars, in their path.

[7] imagined way … Coast Northeast passage explorers sought between Siberia (site of the Pechora river) and China.

[8] mace petrific Staff that can make things as hard as stone. This may also be a mocking reference to the Pope's ceremonial mace (with a pun on "Peter," whom Catholics consider to be the first Pope).

[9] Delos Fabled floating island in the Aegean Sea that was chained in place by Neptune.

[10] Gorgonian rigor In Greek myth, the serpent-haired Medusa, one of the mythical Gorgons, turned those who gazed on her into stone.

[11] Xerxes … waves In order to invade Greece, Xerxes of Persia created a bridge across the Hellespont by laying his ships side by side; when the sea destroyed the bridge he ordered that the waters be whipped.

Now had they brought the work by wondrous art
Pontifical,[1] a ridge of pendent rock
Over the vexed abyss, following the track
Of Satan, to the self same place where he
First lighted from his wing, and landed safe
From out of Chaos to the outside bare
Of this round world: with pins of adamant
And chains they made all fast, too fast they made
And durable; and now in little space
The confines met of empyrean Heaven
And of this world, and on the left hand Hell[2]
With long reach interposed; three sev'ral ways
In sight, to each of these three places led.
And now their way to Earth they had descried,
To Paradise first tending, when behold
Satan in likeness of an angel bright
Betwixt the Centaur and the Scorpion steering
His zenith,[3] while the sun in Aries rose:
Disguised he came, but those his children dear
Their parent soon discerned, though in disguise.
He after Eve seduced, unminded slunk
Into the wood fast by, and changing shape
To observe the sequel, saw his guileful act
By Eve, though all unweeting,° seconded unwitting
Upon her husband, saw their shame that sought
Vain covertures; but when he saw descend
The Son of God to judge them terrified
He fled, not hoping to escape, but shun
The present, fearing guilty what his wrath
Might suddenly inflict; that past, returned
By night, and listening where the hapless pair
Sat in their sad discourse, and various plaint,
Thence gathered his own doom, which understood
Not instant, but of future time. With joy
And tidings fraught, to Hell he now returned,
And at the brink of Chaos, near the foot
Of this new wondrous pontifice, unhoped
Met who to meet him came, his offspring dear.
Great joy was at their meeting, and at sight
Of that stupendous bridge his joy increased.
Long he admiring stood, till Sin, his fair
Enchanting daughter, thus the silence broke.
"O Parent, these are thy magnific deeds,
Thy trophies, which thou viewest as not thine own,
Thou art their author and prime architect:
For I no sooner in my heart divined,
My heart, which by a secret harmony
Still moves with thine, joined in connection sweet,
That thou on Earth hadst prospered, which thy looks
Now also evidence, but straight I felt
Though distant from the worlds between, yet felt
That I must after thee with this thy son;
Such fatal consequence unites us three:
Hell could no longer hold us in her bounds,
Nor this unvoyageable gulf obscure
Detain from following thy illustrious track.
Thou hast achieved our liberty, confined
Within Hell gates till now, thou us empow'red
To fortify thus far, and overlay
With this portentous bridge the dark abyss.
Thine now is all this world, thy virtue hath won
What thy hands builded not, thy wisdom gained
With odds what war hath lost, and fully avenged
Our foil in Heaven; here thou shalt monarch reign,
There didst not; there let him still victor sway,
As battle hath adjudged, from this new world
Retiring, by his own doom alienated,
And henceforth monarchy with thee divide
Of all things parted by th' empyreal bounds,
His quadrature,[4] from thy orbicular world,
Or try thee now more dang'rous to his throne."
Whom thus the Prince of Darkness answered glad.
"Fair daughter, and thou son and grandchild both,
High proof ye now have given to be the race
Of Satan (for I glory in the name, Antagonist of Heaven's Almighty King)
Amply have merited of me, of all
Th' infernal empire, that so near Heaven's door
Triumphal with triumphal act have met,
Mine with this glorious work, and made one realm
Hell and this world, one realm, one continent

---

[1] Pontifical Bridge-building (but punning on the Papal title "Pontifex").

[3] Satan … zenith Satan had entered the serpent by its mouth; he appears in the sky exiting the tail of the constellation of the serpent Anguis, located between the archer Sagittarius (Milton's "Centaur") and Scorpio.

[4] quadrature See Revelation 21.16, where Heaven is described as laid out "four-square."

Of easy thoroughfare. Therefore while I
Descend through darkness, on your road with ease
To my associate powers, them to acquaint
With these successes, and with them rejoice,
You two this way, among these numerous orbs
All yours, right down to Paradise descend;
There dwell and reign in bliss, thence on the Earth
Dominion exercise and in the air,
Chiefly on man, sole lord of all declared,
Him first make sure your thrall, and lastly kill.
My substitutes I send ye, and create
Plenipotent° on Earth, of matchless might fully powerful
Issuing from me: on your joint vigor now
My hold of this new kingdom all depends,
Through Sin to Death exposed by my exploit.
If your joint power prevails, th' affairs of Hell
No detriment need fear, go and be strong."
    So saying he dismissed them,[1] they with speed
Their course through thickest constellations held
Spreading their bane: the blasted stars looked wan
And planets, planet-struck,[2] real eclipse
Then suffered. Th' other way Satan went down
The causey° to hell gate: on either side causeway
Disparted Chaos overbuilt exclaimed,
And with rebounding surge the bars assailed,
That scorned his indignation: through the gate,
Wide open and unguarded, Satan passed,
And all about found desolate; for those
Appointed to sit there had left their charge,
Flown to the upper world; the rest were all
Far to the inland retired, about the walls
Of Pandemonium; city and proud seat
Of Lucifer, so by allusion called
Of that bright star[3] to Satan paragoned;° compared
There kept their watch the legions, while the grand
In council sat, solicitous° what chance anxious to discover
Might intercept their emperor sent; so he
Departing gave command, and they observed.
As when the Tartar from his Russian foe,
By Astracan,[4] over the snowy plains,
Retires; or Bactrin Sophy,[5] from the horns
Of Turkish crescent, leaves all waste beyond
The realm of Aladule, in his retreat
To Tauris or Casbeen:[6] So these, the late
Heav'n-banished host, left desert utmost Hell[7]
Many a dark league, reduced° in careful watch gathered
Round their metropolis; and now expecting
Each hour their great adventurer, from the search
Of foreign worlds: he through the midst unmarked,° unseen
In show plebeian angel militant
Of lowest order, passed; and from the door
Of that plutonian[8] hall, invisible
Ascended his high throne; which, under state° canopy
Of richest texture spread, at th' upper end
Was placed in regal lustre. Down a while
He sat, and round about him saw unseen:
At last, as from a cloud, his fulgent° head shining
And shape star-bright appeared, or brighter; clad
With what permissive glory since his fall
Was left him, or false glitter. All amazed
At that so sudden blaze the Stygian throng
Bent their aspect, and whom they wished beheld,
Their mighty chief returned: loud was th' acclaim:
Forth rushed in haste the great consulting peers,
Raised from their dark divan,[9] and with like joy
Congratulant approached him; who with hand
Silence and with these words attention won:
"Thrones, dominations, princedoms, virtues, powers;
For in possession such, not only of right,[10]
I call ye, and declare ye now; returned
Successful beyond hope, to lead ye forth
Triumphant out of this infernal pit
Abominable, accursed, the house of woe,

---

[1] them Sin and Death, now on their way to Earth.

[2] planet-struck Subject to ill planetary influence.

[3] Of Lucifer ... star The morning star was called Lucifer, Satan's original name, meaning "lightbearer."

[4] Astracan Modern Astrakhan, a city in the southwest of Russia near the Caspian Sea, originally founded by the Tartars.

[5] Bactrin Sophy Shah of Persia.

[6] Aladule Armenia; Tauris ... Casbeen Cities in northern Iran.

[8] plutonian Both richly decorated and morbid, deathly; after Pluto, god of the underworld.

[9] divan Council of state in Turkey.

[10] in possession ... right Not only due to your right but through our recent conquest of the world.

And dungeon of our tyrant: now possess,
As lords, a spacious world, to our native Heaven
Little inferior, by my adventure hard
With peril great achieved. Long were to tell
What I have done; what suffered; with what pain
Voyaged th' unreal,° vast, unbounded deep shapeless
Of horrible confusion; over which
By Sin and Death a broad way now is paved,
To expedite your glorious march; but I
Toiled out my uncouth° passage, forced to ride unfamiliar
Th' intractable abyss, plunged in the womb
Of unoriginal[1] night and Chaos wild;
That, jealous of their secrets, fiercely opposed
My journey strange, with clamorous uproar
Protesting fate supreme; thence how I found
The new created world, which fame in Heav'n
Long had foretold, a fabric wonderful
Of absolute perfection, therein Man
Placed in a Paradise, by our exile
Made happy. Him by fraud I have seduced
From his Creator; and, the more to increase
Your wonder, with an apple; He, thereat
Offended worth your laughter, hath given up
Both His beloved Man, and all His world,
To Sin and Death a prey, and so to us,
Without our hazard, labour, or alarm;
To range in, and to dwell, and over man
To rule, as over all He should have ruled.
True is, me also He hath judged, or rather
Me not, but the brute serpent in whose shape
Man I deceived: that which to me belongs,
Is enmity which He will put between
Me and mankind; I am to bruise his heel;
His seed, when is not set, shall bruise my head:[2]
A world who would not purchase with a bruise,
Or much more grievous pain? Ye have the account
Of my performance: What remains, ye gods,
But up, and enter now into full bliss?"
 So having said, a while he stood, expecting
Their universal shout, and high applause,
To fill his ear; when, contrary, he hears
On all sides, from innumerable tongues,
A dismal universal hiss, the sound
Of public scorn; he wondered, but not long
Had leisure, wondering at himself now more,
His visage drawn he felt to sharp and spare;
His arms clung to his ribs; his legs entwining
Each other, till supplanted[3] down he fell
A monstrous serpent on his belly prone,
Reluctant,° but in vain; a greater power resisting
Now ruled him, punished in the shape he sinned,
According to his doom: he would have spoke,
But hiss for hiss returnèd with forkèd tongue
To forkèd tongue; for now were all transformed[4]
Alike, to serpents all, as accessories
To his bold riot: dreadful was the din
Of hissing through the hall, thick swarming now
With complicated[5] monsters head and tail,
Scorpion, and asp, and amphisbaena[6] dire,
Cerastes horned, hydrus, and elops[7] drear,
And dipsas[8] (not so thick swarmed once the soil
Bedropt with blood of gorgon,[9] or the isle
Ophiusa[10]); but still greatest he the midst,
Now dragon grown, larger than whom the sun
Engendered in the Pythian Vale or slime,
Huge python,[11] and his power no less he seemed
Above the rest still to retain; they all
Him followed, issuing forth to th' open field,
Where all yet left of that revolted rout,

[1] unoriginal Night and Chaos have always existed, hence they have no origin.

[2] I am to bruise … bruise my head See Genesis 3.15.

[3] supplanted Thrown off his feet.

[4] A monstrous serpent … transformed The devils' transition into snake form resembles similar scenes in other tales, including Ovid's Metamorphoses and Dante's Inferno.

[5] complicated Twisted together.

[6] amphisbaena Mythical serpent with a head at each end of its body.

[7] Cerastes Legendary four-horned serpent; hydrus Hydra, venomous many-headed serpent of classical myth; elops Mythical sea snake.

[8] dipsas Snake whose venom reputedly caused ravenous thirst.

[9] not so thick … blood of gorgon When Perseus slew Medusa, the Gorgon, snakes sprang from every drop of her blood that touched the earth.

[10] Ophiusa Literally, "land of snakes," the island of Rhodes, renowned in legend for its many snakes.

[11] Huge python After the flood named for survivor Deucalion, an enormous snake emerged from the earth. It was killed by Apollo, who went on to the found the Pythian games, as told in Ovid's Metamorphoses.

Heav'n-fall'n, in station stood or just array;
Sublime with expectation when to see
In triumph issuing forth their glorious chief;
They saw, but other sight instead: a crowd
Of ugly serpents; horror on them fell,
And horrid sympathy; for, what they saw,
They felt themselves, now changing; down their arms,
Down fell both spear and shield; down they as fast;
And the dire hiss renewed, and the dire form
Catched by contagion; like in punishment,
As in their crime. Thus was the applause they meant
Turned to exploding hiss, triumph to shame
Cast on themselves from their own mouths. There stood
A grove hard by, sprung up with this their change,
His will Who reigns above, to aggravate
Their penance, laden with fair fruit, like that
Which grew in Paradise, the bait of Eve
Used by the tempter: on that prospect strange
Their earnest eyes they fixed, imagining
For one forbidden tree a multitude
Now ris'n, to work them further woe or shame;
Yet, parched with scalding thirst and hunger fierce,
Though to delude° them sent, could not abstain; taunt
But on they rolled in heaps, and, up the trees
Climbing, sat thicker than the snaky locks
That curled Megaera:[1] greedily they plucked
The fruitage fair to sight, like that which grew
Near that bituminous lake where Sodom flamed;[2]
This more delusive, not the touch, but taste
Deceived; they, fondly thinking to allay
Their appetite with gust, instead of fruit
Chewed bitter ashes, which the offended taste
With spattering noise rejected: oft they assayed,
Hunger and thirst constraining; drugged as oft,
With hatefullest disrelish writhed their jaws,
With soot and cinders filled; so oft they fell
Into the same illusion, not as man
Whom they triumphed once lapsed. Thus were they plagued
And worn with famine, long and ceaseless hiss,
Till their lost shape, permitted, they resumed;[3]
Yearly enjoined, some say, to undergo,
This annual humbling certain numbered days,
To dash their pride, and joy, for man seduced.
However some tradition they dispersed
Among the heathen of their purchase° got, pillage
And fabled how the serpent, whom they called Ophion with Eurynome, the wide-
Encroaching Eve perhaps, had first the rule
Of high Olympus, thence by Saturn driven
And Ops, ere yet Dictæan Jove was born.[4]
Meanwhile in Paradise the hellish pair
Too soon arrived, Sin there in power before,
Once actual, now in body, and to dwell
Habitual habitant; behind her Death
Close following pace for pace, not mounted yet
On his pale horse:[5] to whom Sin thus began.
"Second of Satan sprung, all conquering Death,
What thinkst thou of our empire now, though earned
With travail difficult, not better far
Than still at Hell's dark threshold to have sat watch,
Unnamed, undreaded, and thyself half starved?"
Whom thus the Sin-born Monster answered soon.
"To me, who with eternal famine pine,
Alike is Hell, or Paradise, or Heaven,
There best, where most with ravin° I may meet; prey
Which here, though plenteous, all too little seems
To stuff this maw, this vast unhide-bound corpse."
To whom th' incestuous mother thus replied.
"Thou therefore on these herbs, and fruits, and flowers
Feed first, on each beast next, and fish, and fowl,
No homely morsels, and whatever thing
The scythe of Time mows down, devour unspared,

[1] Megaera One of the classical Furies, avenging underworld goddesses.

[2] that which … flamed Apples of Sodom, mythical fruit said to appear delicious, only to crumble to smoke and ash if picked. They were said to grow over the site of the destroyed city; bituminous lake Dead Sea.

[3] their lost shape … resumed They returned to their previous appearances.

[4] Ophion with … was born To explain their annual metamorphoses (Milton suggests), the devils spread stories in the ancient world of primordial serpents, such as Ophion (from the Greek word for serpent), who with Eurynome (daughter of the Ocean) ruled Olympus before being driven out by Saturn and his wife Rhea (Ops), parents to Jove (Zeus), who was raised in a cave in Crete near Mount Dicte.

[5] pale horse See Revelation 6.8.

Till I in man residing through the race,
His thoughts, his looks, words, actions all infect,
And season him thy last and sweetest prey."
This said, they both betook them several ways,
Both to destroy, or unimmortal make
All kinds, and for destruction to mature
Sooner or later; which th' Almighty seeing,
From his transcendent seat the saints among,
To those bright orders uttered thus his voice.
"See with what heat these dogs of Hell advance
To waste and havoc yonder world, which I
So fair and good created, and had still
Kept in that state, had not the folly of man
Let in these wasteful Furies, who impute
Folly to me, so doth the Prince of Hell
And his adherents, that with so much ease
I suffer them to enter and possess
A place so heavenly, and conniving[1] seem
To gratify my scornful enemies,
That laugh, as if transported with some fit
Of passion, I to them had quitted° all, handed over
At random yielded up to their misrule;
And know not that I called and drew them thither
My Hell-hounds, to lick up the draff° and filth waste
Which man's polluting sin with taint hath shed
On what was pure, till crammed and gorged, nigh burst
With sucked and glutted offal, at one sling
Of thy victorious arm, well-pleasing Son,
Both Sin, and Death, and yawning grave at last
Through Chaos hurled, obstruct the mouth of Hell
Forever, and seal up his ravenous jaws.
Then Heaven and Earth renewed shall be made pure
To sanctity that shall receive no stain:
Till then the curse pronounced on both precedes."
He ended, and the heavenly audience loud
Sung halleluja, as the sound of seas,
Through multitude that sung: "Just are thy ways,
Righteous are thy decrees on all thy works;
Who can extenuate thee?[2] Next, to the Son,
Destined restorer of mankind, by whom
New Heaven and Earth shall to the ages rise,
Or down from Heaven descend."[3] Such was their song,
While the Creator calling forth by name
His mighty angels gave them several charge,
As sorted best with present things. The sun
Had first his precept so to move, so shine,
As might affect the Earth with cold and heat
Scarce tolerable, and from the north to call
Decrepit winter, from the south to bring Solstitial summer's heat. To the blank° moon pale
Her office they prescribed, to th' other five
Their planetary motions and aspects
In sextile, square, and trine, and opposite,[4]
Of noxious efficacy, and when to join
In synod° unbenign, and taught the fixed combination
Their influence malignant when to shower,
Which of them rising with the sun, or falling,
Should prove tempestuous: to the winds they set
Their corners, when with bluster to confound
Sea, air, and shore, the thunder when to roll
With terror through the dark aerial hall.
Some say he bid his angels turn askance
The poles of Earth twice ten degrees and more
From the sun's axle; they with labour pushed
Oblique the centric globe: some say the sun
Was bid turn reins from th' equinoctial road
Like distant breadth to Taurus with the seven
Atlantic sisters, and the Spartan Twins
Up to the Tropic Crab; thence down amain
By Leo and the Virgin and the Scales,
As deep as Capricorn, to bring in change
Of seasons to each clime;[5] else had the spring
Perpetual smiled on Earth with vernant flowers,
Equal in days and nights, except to those
Beyond the polar circles; to them day
Had unbenighted shone, while the low sun

---

[1] conniving Turning eyes away.

[2] extenuate thee Reduce your veneration.

[3] New Heaven ... descend See Revelation 21.1–2.

[4] sextile ... opposite Terms for the four "aspects" or degrees of planetary position: respectively, 60°, 90°, 120°, and 180°. In astrology, planetary aspect shaped planetary influence: as a consequence of the Fall, the angels teach the planets and stars how to exert malignant influences, including weather.

[5] Some say ... each clime Seasonal change is caused by the tilt of the earth's axis about 23° ("twice ten degrees and more") relative to the sun. Milton presents both ways of achieving the identical effect, without deciding between them: the angels either tilted the earth from its formerly "centric" (centered) orbit around the "sun's axle" (if the universe were heliocentric), or they shifted the sun's circuit around the earth so that it moved at an oblique angle to the celestial equator, through the path Milton then traces through the Zodiac (if the universe were geocentric).

To recompense his distance, in their sight
Had rounded still th' horizon, and not known
Or east or west, which had forbid the snow
From cold Estotiland, and south as far
Beneath Magellan.[1] At that tasted fruit
The sun, as from Thyestean banquet,[2] turned
His course intended; else how had the world
Inhabited, though sinless, more than now,
Avoided pinching cold and scorching heat?
These changes in the heavens, though slow, produced
Like change on sea and land, sideral[3] blast,
Vapour, and mist, and exhalation hot,
Corrupt and pestilent: now from the north
Of Norumbega, and the Samoed shore
Bursting their brazen dungeon, armed with ice
And snow and hail and stormy gust and flaw,
Boreas and Caecias and Argestes loud
And Thrascias rend the woods and seas upturn;
With adverse blast upturns them from the south
Notus and Afer black with thund'rous clouds
From Serraliona; thwart of these as fierce Forth rush the Levant and the ponent° winds western
Eurus and Zephyr with their lateral noise,
Sirocco, and Libecchio.[4] Thus began
Outrage from lifeless things; but Discord[5] first
Daughter of Sin, among th' irrational,[6]
Death introduced through fierce antipathy:
Beast now with beast 'gan war, and fowl with fowl,
And fish with fish; to graze the herb° all leaving, grass
Devoured each other; nor stood much in awe
Of Man, but fled him; or, with countenance grim,
Glared on him passing. These were from without
The growing miseries, which Adam saw
Already in part, though hid in gloomiest shade,
To sorrow abandoned, but worse felt within;
And, in a troubled sea of passion tossed,
Thus to disburden sought with sad complaint:
"O miserable of happy! Is this the end
Of this new glorious world, and me so late
The glory of that glory, who now become Accursed, of blessèd? Hide me from the face
Of God,[7] whom to behold was then my height
Of happiness: yet well, if here would end
The misery; I deserved it, and would bear
My own deservings; but this will not serve:
All that I eat or drink, or shall beget,
Is propagated curse.[8] O voice, once heard
Delightfully, 'increase and multiply,'[9]
Now death to hear! For what can I increase,
Or multiply, but curses on my head?
Who of all ages to succeed, but, feeling
The evil on him brought by me, will curse
My head? 'Ill fare our ancestor impure,
For this we may thank Adam!' But his thanks
Shall be the execration: so, besides
Mine own that bide upon me, all from me
Shall with a fierce reflux on me rebound;
On me, as on their natural centre, light
Heavy, though in their place.[10] O fleeting joys
Of Paradise, dear bought with lasting woes!
Did I request Thee, Maker, from my clay
To mould me man? Did I solicit Thee
From darkness to promote me, or here place

except to those … Magellan In the eternal spring before the Fall, days and nights were always equal in length except at the poles, where the sun would never set and there would be no snow even in northern Labrador ("Estotiland") or south of the Strait of Magellan.

[2] Thyestean banquet Referring to Seneca's tragedy Thyestes, where the sun changes course to avoid the sight of Thyestes unknowingly eating his sons.

[3] sideral Usually "sidereal": pertaining to stars. This apparently refers to winds or storms on earth thought to be caused by these post-Fall changes in the heavens.

[4] Norumbega … Libecchio A catalogue of winds let loose by the Fall, some associated with far-flung geographical points of origin. Boreas, Caecias, Argestes, and Thrascias are northern winds, from North America ("Norumbega") and Siberia ("Samoed shore"). They clash with the southern winds Notus and Afer, from Sierra Leone, and various cross-winds from the east and west named Levant, Eurus, Zephyr, Sirocco, and Libecchio; their brazen dungeon Aeolus, mythic keeper of the winds, contained them in a cave; flaw Abrupt gale.

[5] Discord Discordia is the Latin name for Eris, the Greek goddess of chaos. Her actions provoked the contest between goddesses that in turn incited the Trojan war.

[6] th' irrational Non-human creatures.

[7] Hide me from the face / Of God See Psalm 27.9.

[8] All … propagated curse All that I do and pass on to my descendants will replicate the curse.

[9] increase and multiply See Genesis 9.7.

[10] Mine own … place The cursed sinfulness I pass to descendants will also fall back on me with added weight.

In this delicious garden? As my will Concurred not to my being, it were but right
And equal[1] to reduce me to my dust;
Desirous to resign and render back
All I received; unable to perform
Thy terms too hard, by which I was to hold
The good I sought not. To the loss of that,
Sufficient penalty, why hast Thou added
The sense of endless woes? Inexplicable
Thy justice seems; yet to say truth, too late,
I thus contest; then should have been refused
Those terms whatever, when they were proposed:
Thou[2] didst accept them; wilt thou enjoy the good,
Then cavil[3] the conditions? And though God
Made thee without thy leave, what if thy son
Prove disobedient, and reproved, retort,
'Wherefore didst thou beget me? I sought it not.'
Wouldst thou admit for his contempt of thee
That proud excuse? Yet him not thy election° choice
But natural necessity begot.
God made thee of choice His own, and of His own
To serve Him, thy reward was of His grace,
Thy punishment then justly is at His will.
Be it so, for I submit, His doom is fair,
That dust I am, and shall to dust return.
O welcome hour whenever! Why delays
His hand to execute what His decree
Fixed on this day? Why do I overlive,
Why am I mocked with death, and lengthened out
To deathless pain? How gladly would I meet
Mortality my sentence, and be earth
Insensible! How glad would lay me down
As in my mother's lap! There I should rest,
And sleep secure; His dreadful voice no more
Would thunder in my ears; no fear of worse
To me, and to my offspring, would torment me
With cruel expectation. Yet one doubt
Pursues me still, lest all I cannot die;
Lest that pure breath of life, the spirit of man
Which God inspired, cannot together perish
With this corporeal clod; then, in the grave,
Or in some other dismal place, who knows
But I shall die a living death? O thought
Horrid, if true! Yet why? It was but breath
Of life that sinned; what dies but what had life
And sin? The body properly had neither,
All of me then shall die:[4] let this appease
The doubt, since human reach no further knows.
For though the Lord of all be infinite,
Is His wrath also? Be it, man is not so,
But mortal doomed. How can He exercise
Wrath without end on man, whom death must end?
Can He make deathless death? That were to make Strange contradiction, which to God Himself
Impossible is held; as argument
Of weakness, not of power. Will He draw out,
For anger's sake, finite to infinite,
In punished man, to satisfy His rigour,
Satisfied never? That were to extend
His sentence beyond dust and nature's law;
By which all causes else, according still
To the reception of their matter, act;
Not to the extent of their own sphere.[5] But say
That death be not one stroke, as I supposed,
Bereaving sense, but endless misery
From this day onward; which I feel begun
Both in me, and without me; and so last
To perpetuity; ay me, that fear
Comes thundering back with dreadful revolution
On my defenceless head; both death and I
Am found eternal, and incorporate both;[6]
Nor I on my part single; in me all
Posterity stands cursed: fair patrimony[7]
That I must leave ye, sons; o were I able
To waste it all myself, and leave ye none!
So disinherited, how would you bless
Me, now your curse! Ah, why should all mankind,
For one man's fault, thus guiltless be condemned,
If guiltless? But from me what can proceed,
But all corrupt; both mind and will depraved

---

[1] equal Deserved, for this transgression.

[2] Thou Adam, addressing himself.

[3] cavil Raise unnecessary objections to.

[4] All of me ... die An example of a "mortalist" argument, based on the belief that the soul and body die together, remaining dormant until the final judgment.

[5] nature's law ... sphere Natural law sets limits to reactions of matter and all forces impacting it.

[6] incorporate both Combined as one.

[7] patrimony Inheritance from a father.

Not to do only, but to will the same
With me? How can they then acquitted stand
In sight of God? Him, after all disputes,
Forced I absolve: all my evasions vain,
And reasonings, though through mazes, lead me still
But to my own conviction: first and last
On me, me only, as the source and spring
Of all corruption, all the blame lights due;
So might the wrath. Fond wish! Couldst thou support
That burden, heavier than the earth to bear;
Than all the world much heavier, though divided
With that bad woman? Thus, what thou desirest,
And what thou fearest, alike destroys all hope
Of refuge, and concludes thee miserable
Beyond all past example and future;
To Satan only like both crime and doom.
O Conscience! Into what abyss of fears
And horrors hast thou driven me; out of which I find no way, from deep to deeper plunged!"
Thus Adam to himself lamented loud,
Through the still night; not now, as ere man fell,
Wholesome, and cool, and mild, but with black air
Accompanied; with damps,° and dreadful gloom; toxic fumes
Which to his evil conscience represented
All things with double terror: on the ground
Outstretched he lay, on the cold ground; and oft
Cursed his creation; Death as oft accused
Of tardy execution, since denounced
The day of his offence. "Why comes not Death,"
Said he, "with one thrice-acceptable stroke
To end me? Shall Truth fail to keep her word,
Justice divine not hasten to be just?
But death comes not at call; justice divine
Mends not her slowest pace for prayers or cries,
O woods, O fountains, hillocks, dales, and bowers!
With other echo late I taught your shades
To answer, and resound far other song."
Whom thus afflicted when sad Eve beheld,
Desolate where she sat, approaching nigh,
Soft words to his fierce passion she assayed:
But her with stern regard he thus repelled.
"Out of my sight, thou serpent![1] That name best
Befits thee with him leagued, thyself as false
And hateful; nothing wants, but that thy shape,
Like his, and colour serpentine, may show
Thy inward fraud; to warn all creatures from thee
Henceforth; lest that too heav'nly form, pretended
To hellish falsehood,[2] snare them! But for thee
I had persisted happy; had not thy pride
And wandering vanity, when least was safe,
Rejected my forewarning, and disdained
Not to be trusted; longing to be seen,
Though by the Devil himself; him overweening[3]
To over-reach; but, with the serpent meeting,
Fooled and beguiled; by him thou, I by thee
To trust thee from my side; imagined wise,
Constant, mature, proof against all assaults;
And understood not all was but a show,
Rather than solid virtue; all but a rib
Crooked by nature, bent, as now appears,
More to the part sinister,° from me drawn; left
Well if thrown out, as supernumerary
To my just number found.[4] O why did God,
Creator wise, that peopled highest Heav'n
With spirits masculine,[5] create at last
This novelty on earth, this fair defect
Of nature, and not fill the world at once
With men, as angels, without feminine;
Or find some other way to generate
Mankind? This mischief had not been befallen,
And more that shall befall; innumerable
Disturbances on earth through female snares,
And strait conjunction[6] with this sex: for either
He never shall find out fit mate, but such
As some misfortune brings him, or mistake;
Or whom he wishes most shall seldom gain
Through her perverseness, but shall see her gained
By a far worse; or, if she love, withheld

---

[1] serpent Early Judeo-Christian scholars linked the name "Eve" to the word "serpent" in several ancient languages.

[2] pretended / To hellish falsehood Concealing, as though with a costume, your hellish falseness.

[3] overweening Overly self-assured.

[4] supernumerary ... found Extra number than the appropriate number I now possess. It was believed that Adam originally had thirteen ribs.

[5] that peopled ... masculine Adam here forgets that angels have no gender (as Raphael had informed him).

[6] strait conjunction Tightly confined bond.

By parents; or his happiest choice too late
Shall meet, already linked and wedlock-bound
To a fell adversary, his hate or shame:
Which infinite calamity shall cause
To human life, and household peace confound.”
He added not, and from her turned; but Eve,
Not so repulsed,[1] with tears that ceased not flowing
And tresses all disordered, at his feet
Fell humble; and, embracing them, besought
His peace, and thus proceeded in her plaint:
“Forsake me not thus, Adam, witness Heav’n
What love sincere, and reverence in my heart
I bear thee, and unweeting° have offended, unwitting
Unhappily deceived! Thy suppliant
I beg, and clasp thy knees; bereave me not,
Whereon I live, thy gentle looks, thy aid,
Thy counsel, in this uttermost distress,
My only strength and stay:° forlorn of thee, support
Whither shall I betake me, where subsist?
While yet we live, scarce one short hour perhaps,
Between us two let there be peace; both joining,
As joined in injuries, one enmity
Against a foe by doom express[2] assigned us,
That cruel serpent. On me exercise not
Thy hatred for this misery befallen;
On me already lost, me than thyself
More miserable! Both have sinned; but thou
Against God only; I against God and thee;
And to the place of judgement will return,
There with my cries importune Heaven; that all
The sentence, from thy head removed, may light
On me, sole cause to thee of all this woe;
Me, me only, just object of His ire!”
She ended weeping; and her lowly plight,° position
Immoveable, till peace obtained from fault
Acknowledged and deplored, in Adam wrought
Commiseration. Soon his heart relented
Towards her, his life so late, and sole delight,
Now at his feet submissive in distress;
Creature so fair his reconcilement seeking,
His counsel, whom she had displeased, his aid:
As one disarmed, his anger all he lost,
And thus with peaceful words upraised her soon:
“Unwary, and too desirous, as before,
So now of what thou know’st not, who desir’st
The punishment all on thyself; alas!
Bear thine own first, ill able to sustain
His full wrath, whose thou feelest as yet least part,
And my displeasure bearest so ill.[3] If prayers
Could alter high decrees, I to that place
Would speed before thee, and be louder heard,
That on my head all might be visited;
Thy frailty and infirmer sex forgiv’n,
To me committed, and by me exposed.
But rise, let us no more contend, nor blame
Each other, blamed enough elsewhere; but strive
In offices of love, how we may light’n
Each other’s burden, in our share of woe;
Since this day’s death denounced, if aught I see,
Will prove no sudden, but a slow-paced evil;
A long day’s dying, to augment our pain;
And to our seed (O hapless seed!) derived.°” transmitted
To whom thus Eve, recovering heart, replied:
“Adam, by sad experiment I know
How little weight my words with thee can find,
Found so erroneous; thence by just event
Found so unfortunate. Nevertheless,
Restored by thee, vile as I am, to place
Of new acceptance, hopeful to regain
Thy love, the sole contentment of my heart
Living or dying, from thee I will not hide
What thoughts in my unquiet breast are risen,
Tending to some relief of our extremes,
Or end; though sharp and sad, yet tolerable,
As in our evils, and of easier choice.
If care of our descent° perplex us most, descendants
Which must be born to certain woe, devoured
By Death at last; and miserable it is
To be to others cause of misery,
Our own begotten, and of our loins to bring
Into this cursèd world a woeful race,
That after wretched life must be at last
Food for so foul a monster; in thy power
It lies, yet ere conception to prevent
The race unblest, to being yet unbegot.

---

[1] Not so repulsed Not so easily dismissed.

[2] doom express Specific judgment.

[3] Bear thine … bearest so ill Worry about your own punishment before taking on mine, since you have shown so much frailty already when faced with a small part of God’s wrath, along with my anger.

Childless thou art, childless remain: so Death
Shall be deceived his glut,[1] and with us two
Be forced to satisfy his rav'nous maw.
But if thou judge it hard and difficult,
Conversing, looking, loving, to abstain
From love's due rights, nuptial embraces sweet;
And with desire to languish without hope,
Before the present object[2] languishing
With like desire; which would be misery
And torment less than none of what we dread;
Then, both ourselves and seed at once to free
From what we fear for both, let us make short,
Let us seek Death, or he not found, supply
With our own hands his office on ourselves;
Why stand we longer shivering under fears,
That show no end but death, and have the power,
Of many ways to die the shortest choosing,
Destruction with destruction to destroy."
She ended here, or vehement despair
Broke off the rest: so much of death her thoughts
Had entertained, as dyed her cheeks with pale.
But Adam, with such counsel nothing swayed,
To better hopes his more attentive mind
Labouring had raised; and thus to Eve replied:
"Eve, thy contempt of life and pleasure seems
To argue in thee something more sublime
And excellent than what thy mind contemns;
But self-destruction therefore sought, refutes
That excellence thought in thee; and implies,
Not thy contempt, but anguish and regret
For loss of life and pleasure overloved.
Or if thou covet death as utmost end
Of misery, so thinking to evade
The penalty pronounced; doubt not but God
Hath wiselier armed His vengeful ire, than so
To be forestalled; much more I fear lest Death,
So snatched, will not exempt us from the pain
We are by doom to pay; rather, such acts
Of contumacy° will provoke the highest contempt
To make death in us live. Then let us seek
Some safer resolution, which methinks
I have in view, calling to mind with heed
Part of our sentence, that thy seed shall bruise
The serpent's head; piteous amends! Unless
Be meant, whom I conjecture, our grand foe,
Satan; who, in the serpent, hath contrived
Against us this deceit: to crush his head
Would be revenge indeed, which will be lost
By death brought on ourselves, or childless days
Resolved, as thou proposest; so our foe
Shall 'scape his punishment ordained, and we
Instead shall double ours upon our heads.
No more be mentioned then of violence
Against ourselves; and wilful barrenness,
That cuts us off from hope; and savours only Rancour and pride, impatience and despite,° ill-will
Reluctance° against God and His just yoke resistance
Laid on our necks. Remember with what mild
And gracious temper He both heard, and judged,
Without wrath or reviling; we expected
Immediate dissolution, which we thought
Was meant by death that day; when lo, to thee
Pains only in child-bearing were foretold,
And bringing forth; soon recompensed with joy,
Fruit of thy womb:[3] On me the curse aslope
Glanced on the ground;[4] with labour I must earn
My bread; what harm? Idleness had been worse;
My labour will sustain me; and, lest cold
Or heat should injure us, His timely care
Hath, unbesought, provided; and His hands
Clothed us unworthy, pitying while He judged;
How much more, if we pray Him, will His ear
Be open, and His heart to pity incline,
And teach us further by what means to shun
The inclement seasons, rain, ice, hail, and snow!
Which now the sky, with various face, begins
To show us in this mountain; while the winds
Blow moist and keen, shattering° the graceful locks dispersing
Of these fair spreading trees; which bids us seek
Some better shroud, some better warmth to cherish
Our limbs benumbed, ere this diurnal star[5]
Leave cold the night, how we His gathered beams

[1] deceived his glut Deprived of his feast.

[2] present object Eve.

The End of the Tenth Book

Argument to Book 11

The Son of God presents to His Father the prayers of our first parents now repenting, and intercedes for them: God accepts them, but declares that they must no longer abide in Paradise; sends Michael with a band of cherubim to dispossess them; but first to reveal to Adam future things: Michael's coming down. Adam shows to Eve certain ominous signs; he discerns Michael's approach, goes out to meet him: the Angel denounces their departure. Eve's lamentation. Adam pleads, but submits: the Angel leads him up to a high hill, sets before him in vision what shall happen till the Flood.

Argument to Book 12

The angel Michael continues from the Flood to relate what shall succeed; then, in the mention of Abraham, comes by degrees to explain, who that Seed of the Woman shall be, which was promised Adam and Eve in the Fall; His incarnation, death, resurrection, and ascension; the state of the Church till His second coming. Adam greatly satisfied and recomforted by these relations and promises descends the hill with Michael; wakens Eve, who all this while had slept, but with gentle dreams composed to quietness of mind and submission. Michael in either hand leads them out of Paradise, the fiery sword waving behind them, and the cherubim taking their stations to guard the place.

from Book 12

… So spake th' archangel Michael;[4] then paused,
As at the world's great period; and our sire,
Replete with joy and wonder, thus replied:
"O goodness infinite, goodness immense!
That all this good of evil shall produce,
And evil turn to good; more wonderful
Than that which by creation first brought forth
Light out of darkness! Full of doubt I stand,
Whether I should repent me now of sin
By me done, and occasioned; or rejoice

[4] So spake th' archangel Michael Michael has just assured Adam of humanity's eventual redemption and salvation.

Much more, that much more good thereof shall spring;
To God more glory, more goodwill to men
From God, and over wrath grace shall abound.
But say, if our Deliverer up to Heaven
Must re-ascend, what will betide the few
His faithful, left among the unfaithful herd,
The enemies of truth? Who then shall guide
His people, who defend? Will they not deal
Worse with His followers than with Him they dealt?"
"Be sure they will," said th' angel; "but from Heaven
He to His own a comforter will send,
The promise of the Father, who shall dwell
His Spirit within them;[1] and the law of faith,
Working through love, upon their hearts shall write,
To guide them in all truth; and also arm
With spiritual armour, able to resist
Satan's assaults, and quench his fiery darts;[2]

Shall on the heart engrave. What will they then
But force the Spirit of Grace itself, and bind
His consort Liberty; what, but unbuild
His living temples, built by faith to stand,
Their own faith, not another's? For, on earth,
Who against faith and conscience can be heard
Infallible?[6] Yet many will presume:
Whence heavy persecution shall arise
On all, who in the worship persevere
Of Spirit and Truth; the rest, far greater part,
Will deem in outward rites and specious forms
Religion satisfied; Truth shall retire
Bestuck with slanderous darts, and works of faith
Rarely be found. So shall the world go on,
To good malignant, to bad men benign;
Under her own weight groaning; till the day

Last, in the clouds, from Heav'n to be revealed
In glory of the Father, to dissolve
Satan with his perverted world; then raise

To bring forth fruits, joy and eternal bliss."[1]
He ended; and thus Adam last replied:
"How soon hath thy prediction, seer blest,
Measured this transient world, the race of time,
Till time stand fixed! Beyond is all abyss,
Eternity, whose end no eye can reach.
Greatly instructed I shall hence depart;
Greatly in peace of thought; and have my fill
Of knowledge, what° this vessel can contain; all that
Beyond which was my folly to aspire.
Henceforth I learn that to obey is best,

Merciful over all His works, with good
Still overcoming evil,[2] and by small
Accomplishing great things, by things deemed weak
Subverting worldly strong, and worldly wise
By simply meek: that suffering for truth's sake
Is fortitude to highest victory,
And, to the faithful, death the gate of life.
Taught this by His example, whom I now
Acknowledge my Redeemer ever blest."
To whom thus also th' angel last replied:
"This having learned, thou hast attained the sum
Of wisdom; hope no higher, though all the stars
Thou knewest by name, and all th' ethereal powers,
All secrets of the deep, all Nature's works,
Or works of God in Heaven, air, earth, or sea,
And all the riches of this world enjoyedst,
And all the rule, one empire; only add
Deeds to thy knowledge answerable; add faith,
Add virtue, patience, temperance; add love,
By name to come called charity, the soul
Of all the rest: then wilt thou not be loth
To leave this Paradise, but shalt possess
A Paradise within thee, happier far.
Let us descend now therefore from this top° hilltop
Of speculation; for the hour precise
Exacts our parting hence; and see the guards,
By me encamped on yonder hill, expect
Their motion;° at whose front a flaming sword, instructions
In signal of remove, waves fiercely round:[3]
We may no longer stay. Go, waken Eve;
Her also I with gentle dreams have calmed
Portending good, and all her spirits composed
To meek submission: thou, at season fit,
Let her with thee partake what thou hast heard;
Chiefly what may concern her faith to know,
The great deliverance by her seed to come
(For by the woman's seed) on all mankind:
That ye may live, which will be many days,
Both in one faith unanimous, though sad,
With cause, for evils past; yet much more cheered
With meditation on the happy end."
He ended, and they both descend the hill;
Descended, Adam to the bower, where Eve
Lay sleeping, ran before; but found her waked;
And thus with words not sad she him received:
"Whence thou returnest, and whither wentest, I know;
For God is also in sleep; and dreams advise,
Which He hath sent propitious, some great good
Presaging, since with sorrow and heart's distress
Wearied I fell asleep: but now lead on;
In me is no delay; with thee to go,
Is to stay here; without thee here to stay,
Is to go hence unwilling; thou to me
Art all things under Heav'n, all places thou,
Who for my wilful crime art banished hence.
This further consolation yet secure
I carry hence; though all by me is lost,
Such favour I unworthy am vouchsafed,
By me the promised seed shall all restore."
So spake our mother Eve; and Adam heard
Well pleased, but answered not: for now, too nigh
Th' archangel stood; and, from the other hill
To their fixed station, all in bright array
The cherubim descended; on the ground
Gliding meteorous, as ev'ning mist
Ris'n from a river o'er the marish° glides, marsh
And gathers ground fast at the labourer's heel
Homeward returning. High in front advanced,
The brandished sword of God before them blazed,
Fierce as a comet; which with torrid heat,

IN CONTEXT

Illustrating Paradise Lost

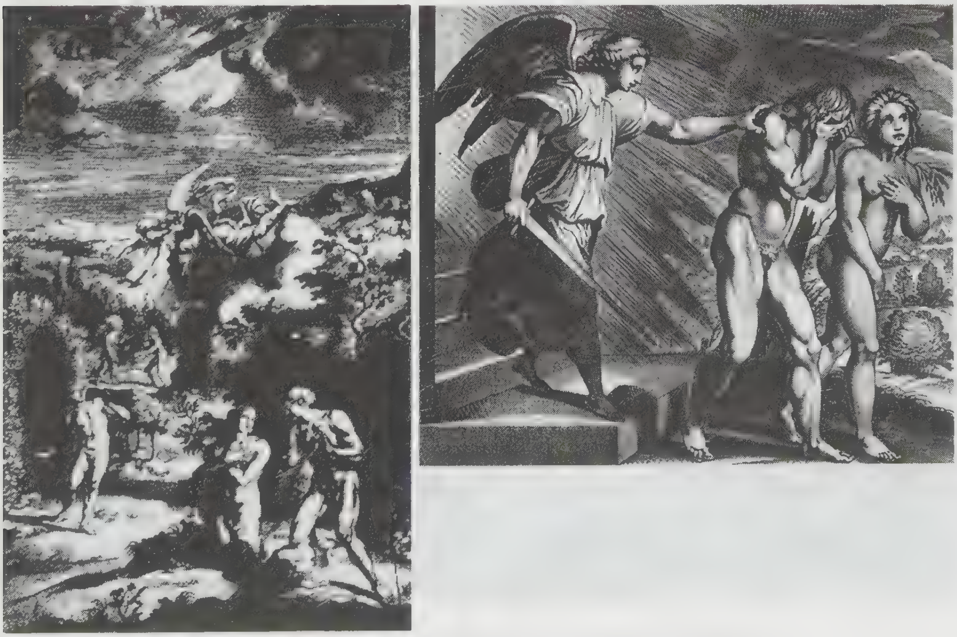
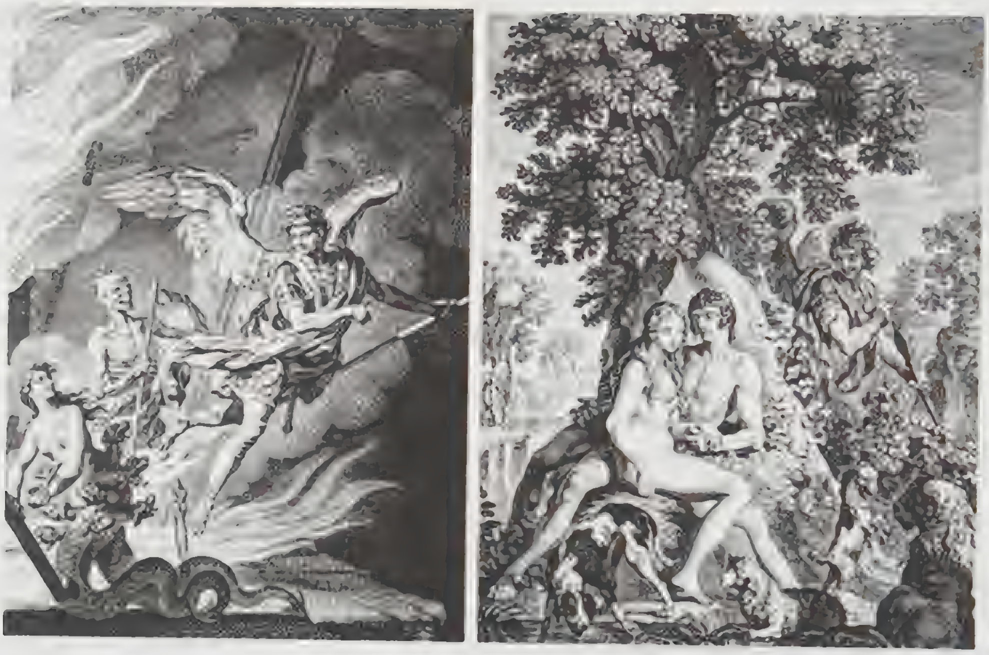
The first illustrated edition of Paradise Lost was that of 1688—the fourth published edition. Twelve illustrations appear in the edition (one per book). Of these, seven are attributed to John Baptist Medina and one to Bernard Lens; four are anonymous.

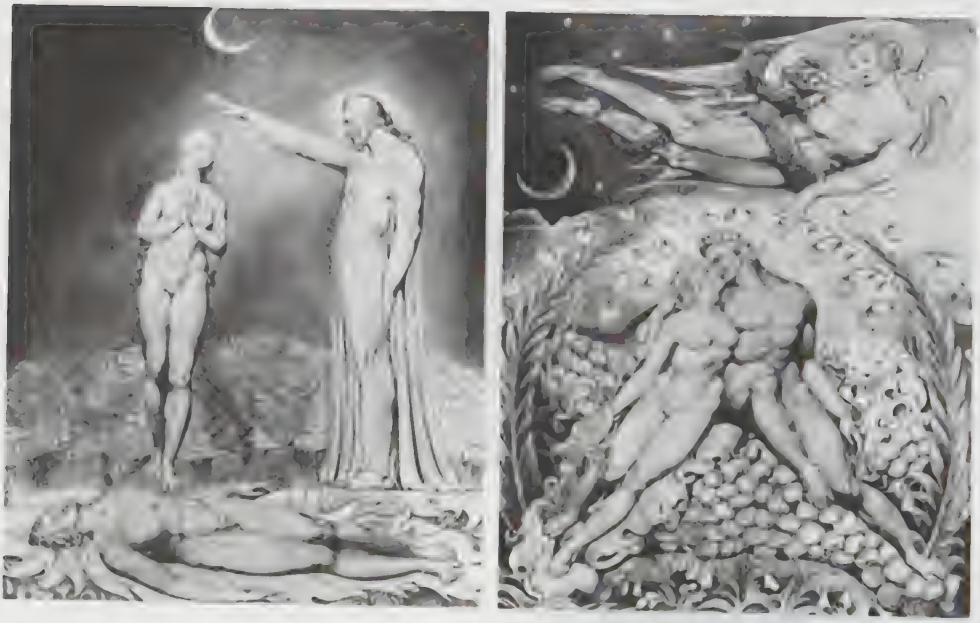
Many illustrated editions of the poem appeared in the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries; among the most notable are those illustrated by Francis Hayman (c. 1707–76), by William Blake (1757–1827), and by John Martin (1789–1854). Two illustrations from each of these editions are reproduced below, together with two from the 1688 edition.



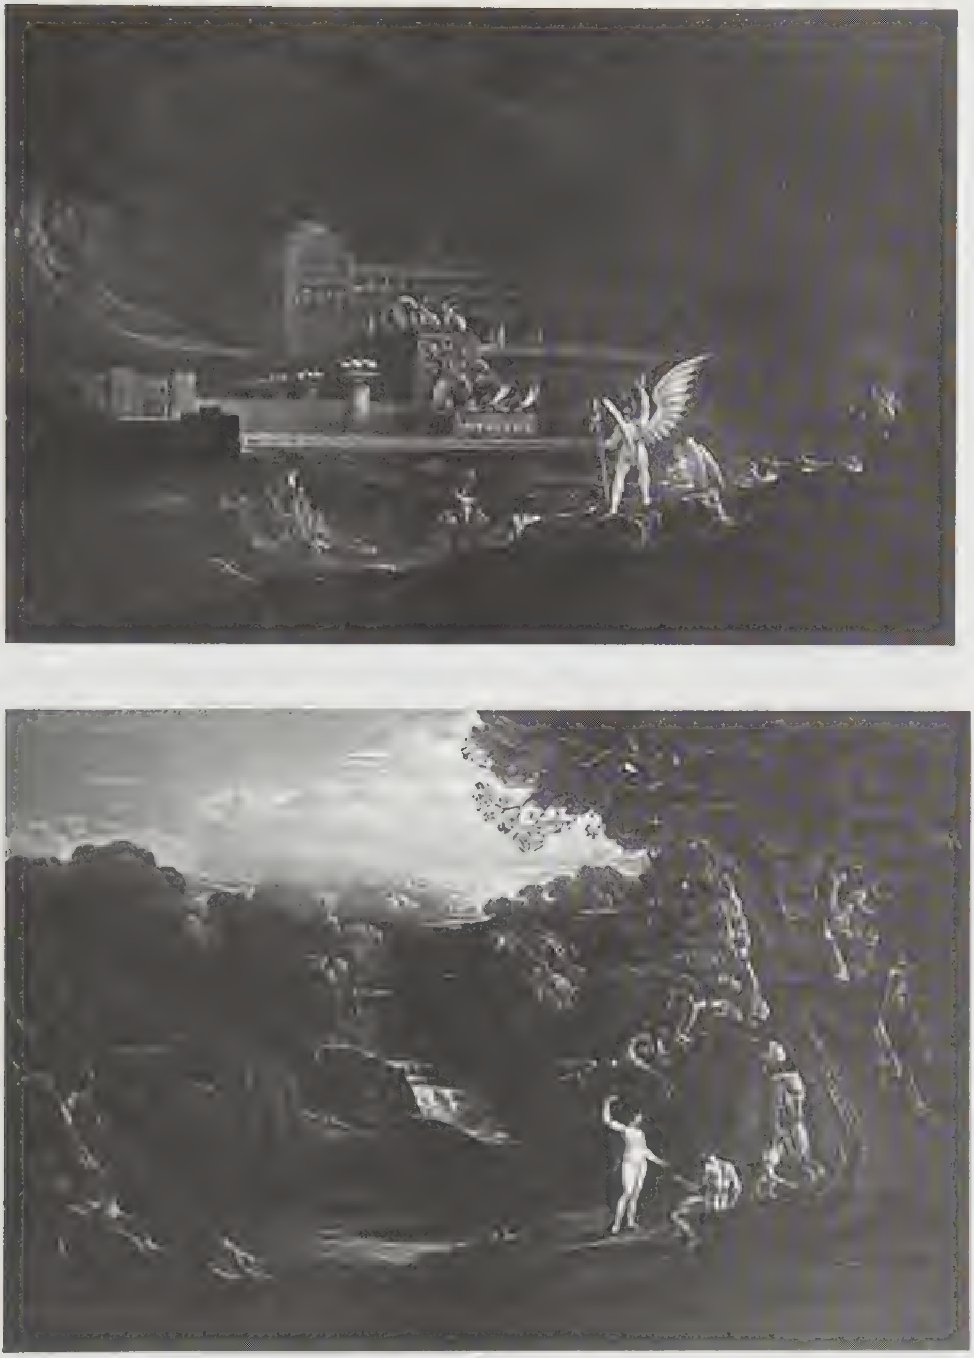
Illustrations to Book 5 and Book 12 (1688).



Francis Hayman, illustrations to Book 2 and Book 4 (1749).



William Blake, illustrations to Book 6 and Book 9 (1808).



John Martin, illustrations to Book 1 and Book 9 (1824).

Samson Agonistes

The biblical story of Samson seems an almost inevitable subject for Milton to address after the Restoration of 1660, when England abandoned its experiment in republicanism and welcomed back both the monarchy and the state church. Samson's initial situation in the poem echoes repeatedly with Milton's likely sense of his own situation: blind and no longer in a position of power; ruled by an enemy with an entertainment-loving aristocracy, politically powerful clergy, and emptily ceremonial religion; disappointed in his countrymen because they preferred "bondage with ease" over "strenuous liberty" (line 271); and questioning his apparent failure to fulfill his divinely appointed role of national liberator. Samson Agonistes (1671) addresses matters that Milton had explored throughout Paradise Lost (1667) and other works, questions that pressed insistently on the imagination of all who were unhappy with the changes wrought by the Restoration. How do we respond to the experience of defeat, and to fears of having been abandoned by the divine? How do we know when our actions accord with divine will, or when they are fueled instead by our fallen desires and weaknesses? At what point do accommodation and compromise with an enemy become a failure of will? What constitutes true heroism? To what extent is violence justified in the cause of freedom?

Samson Agonistes was first published in a volume with Paradise Regained in 1671, four years after the first edition of Paradise Lost. While there was some speculation decades ago that Samson Agonistes was written before Paradise Lost, the consensus now overwhelmingly favors a date of composition in the later 1660s, after Milton had completed both Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained. Scholars note that Samson Agonistes appears to contain several topical allusions to post-Restoration events, and that the poem engages throughout with the language of Restoration debates on political and religious accommodation. Furthermore, its daringly experimental prosody suggests that Milton wrote the poem late in his career. In Samson Agonistes, Milton abandons the regularly maintained blank verse of Paradise Lost and Paradise Regained and employs varying line lengths, mixes blank verse with lyric rhyme, and takes such liberties with scansion that the poem often has the feel of modern "free verse." To most scholars, the poetry of Samson Agonistes seems the culminating literary expression of a poet who had already demonstrated his mastery of traditional forms and felt free to abandon convention to create the poetic effects he desired. Finally, for many readers as well as scholars, the resonant last line of Samson Agonistes—"And calm of mind all passion spent"—offers a cathartic conclusion to a literary career devoted to passionate engagement with the most fundamental aspects of the human condition.

As Milton notes in his preface, Samson Agonistes is a "dramatic poem": while it takes the form of drama, specifically of ancient Greek tragedy, and has been performed successfully in staged readings, it was never intended for the stage. The poem opens with Samson already blinded and enslaved, bemoaning his condition, questioning the events that had reduced him to such a pitiful state. He reminds us that he had once been a great warrior, consecrated to God from birth and divinely appointed to deliver Israel from its bondage under the Philistines. But he had betrayed the secret of his unconquerable strength to his Philistine wife Dalila, and she in turn had betrayed him to the Philistines once she had rendered him temporarily powerless by cutting his hair. A series of discussions then ensues between Samson and various visitors: a Chorus of fellow tribesmen, his wife Dalila, his father Manoa, the Philistine giant Harapha, and a Public Officer. The poem ends when Samson is commanded to entertain his captors by performing feats of strength at a religious festival; he concludes his performance by pulling down the building's pillars, killing himself along with the Philistine social, political, military, and religious elite. As in Greek tragedy, the concluding violence takes place offstage and is reported by a messenger.

Milton freely expands on the biblical account, adding and omitting details, telling the story in his own way for his own purposes. But what these purposes might be is a question that has generated considerable debate. To many modern readers, the biblical Samson can seem more a thuggish trickster figure from folklore than a proper national hero. A long tradition of Christian commentary, however, has interpreted Samson as a prefiguration of Christ, a "type" of the self-sacrificing and regenerate savior. Is that how Milton presents him? While some scholars argue that Samson Agonistes offers an unambiguous drama of spiritual regeneration, others argue instead that Milton's Samson is a failed Old Testament hero whose actions contrast with the true heroism of Jesus in Paradise Regained, the poem with which Samson Agonistes was originally published. One difficulty of Samson Agonistes is that Milton's choice of the dramatic form deprives readers of the helpfully omniscient narrative voices of Paradise Lost or the Bible. Did God really give "to the man despotic power / Over his female in due awe" (lines 1054–55), as the Chorus claims, or is it more the case, as Dalila notes, that "In argument with men a woman ever / Goes by the worse, whatever be her cause" (lines 903–04)? Each claim is self-evidently true to its speaker, but the poem requires readers to judge between them. When Samson feels "Some rousing motions" within himself (line 1382) as he heads toward suicidal slaughter, are readers confident that his actions are prompted by God? The biblical account makes divine approval explicit; in Milton's presentation, Samson's sudden and unexplained shift in strategy may invite questions. Similarly, when the Messenger describes Samson as inclining his head "as one who prayed" (line 1637), is Samson praying, or simply inclining his head like somebody who prays? If Samson's violence is divinely justified, why does Milton take such care to make the slaughter more socially selective than it was in the biblical account? Is the poem ultimately a call to revolution, a vindication of revolution, or a repudiation of revolution?

The heated struggles of scholars with this poem and with one another fittingly reflect the poem's central subject: Samson's struggle to understand himself. "Agonistes" is the Greek word for an athlete competing in the Olympic games, and Milton's appropriation of the word for use in a biblical context adds the resonance of Christian spiritual struggle as well as the physical agonies of Christ. In addition, "agon" was the term used in ancient Greek drama for a verbal contest between two characters. In each "agon" or dialogic encounter with a figure from his life, Samson also struggles with some element within himself: the voice of tribal wisdom in the Chorus, the fame-loving sensualist in Dalila, the strong man who delights in violence in Harapha, the compromiser in his father Manoa. Because the dramatic form gives each visitor his or her say without explicit narratorial framing, the reader consequently spends the poem in Samson's position. We too are blind, reliant on the Chorus to introduce us to each visitor; we listen to and judge a succession of persuasive voices, wrestling with what these encounters mean. We conclude with the catharsis of vicarious slaughter, the purging of untempered passion, and the promise of "peace and consolation." But Milton seems deliberately to leave readers of Samson Agonistes with as many questions as answers. What exactly has been won, and at what cost?

Samson Agonistes

OF THAT SORT OF DRAMATIC POEM WHICH IS CALLED TRAGEDY

Tragedy, as it was anciently composed, hath been ever held the gravest, moralest, and most profitable of all other poems: therefore said by Aristotle to be of power by raising pity and fear, or terror, to purge the mind of those and such-like passions, that is to temper and reduce them to just measure with a kind of delight, stirred up by reading or seeing those passions well imitated.[1] Nor is nature wanting in her own effects to make good his assertion: for so in physic things of melancholic hue and quality are used against melancholy, sour against sour, salt to remove salt humours. Hence philosophers and other gravest writers, as Cicero, Plutarch, and others, frequently cite out of tragic poets, both to adorn and illustrate their discourse. The Apostle Paul himself thought it not unworthy to insert a verse of Euripides[2] into the text of Holy Scripture, 1 Cor. 15.33, and Paraeus[3] commenting on the Revelation, divides the whole book as a tragedy, into acts distinguished each by a chorus of heavenly harpings and song between. Heretofore men in highest dignity have laboured not a little to be thought able to compose a tragedy. Of that honour Dionysius the elder[4] was no less ambitious, than before of his attaining to the tyranny. Augustus Caesar[5] also had begun his Ajax, but unable to please his own judgment with what he had begun, left it unfinished. Seneca the philosopher[6] is by some thought the author of those tragedies (at least the best of them) that go under that name. Gregory Nazianzen,[7] a Father of the church, thought it not unbeseeming the sanctity of his person to write a tragedy, which he entitled Christ Suffering. This is mentioned to vindicate tragedy from the small esteem, or rather infamy, which in the account of many it undergoes at this day with other common interludes; happening through the poet's error of intermixing comic stuff with tragic sadness and gravity; or introducing trivial and vulgar persons, which by all judicious hath been counted absurd; and brought in without discretion, corruptly to gratify the people. And though ancient tragedy use no prologue, yet using sometimes, in case of self-defence, or explanation, that which Martial[8] calls an epistle; in behalf of this tragedy coming forth after the ancient manner, much different from what among us passes for best, thus much beforehand may be epistled: that chorus is here introduced after the Greek manner, not ancient only but modern, and still in use among the Italians. In the modelling therefore of this poem, with good reason, the ancients and Italians are rather followed, as of much more authority and fame. The measure of verse used in the chorus is of all sorts, called by the Greeks monostrophic,[9] or rather apolelymenon,[10] without regard had to strophe, antistrophe, or epode, which were a kind of stanzas framed only for the music, then used with the chorus that sung; not essential to the poem, and therefore not material; or being divided into stanzas or pauses, they may be called alloeostropha.[1] Division into act and scene referring chiefly to the stage (to which this work never was intended) is here omitted.

[9] monostrophic Employing just one strophe or stanza, as opposed to the more usual arrangement in which speeches by the Chorus employed three stanzas: the strophe, antistrophe, and epode.

[10] apolelymenon Greek: freed from strict stanzaic patterns.

It suffices if the whole drama be found not produced beyond the fifth act.[2] Of the style and uniformity, and that commonly called the plot, whether intricate or explicit,[3] which is nothing indeed but such economy, or disposition of the fable as may stand best with verisimilitude and decorum, they only will best judge who are not unacquainted with Aeschylus, Sophocles, and Euripides, the three tragic poets unequalled yet by any, and the best rule to all who endeavour to write tragedy. The circumscription of time wherein the whole drama begins and ends, is according to ancient rule,[4] and best example, within the space of twenty-four hours.

THE ARGUMENT

Samson made captive, blind, and now in the prison at Gaza, there to labour as in a common workhouse, on a festival day, in the general cessation from labour, comes forth into the open air, to a place nigh, somewhat retired there to sit a while and bemoan his condition. Where he happens at length to be visited by certain friends and equals of his tribe, which make the Chorus, who seek to comfort him what they can; then by his old father Manoa, who endeavours the like, and withal tells him his purpose to procure his liberty by ransom; lastly, that this feast was proclaimed by the Philistines as a day of thanksgiving for their deliverance from the hands of Samson, which yet more troubles him. Manoa then departs to prosecute his endeavour with the Philistian lords for Samson's redemption; who in the meanwhile is visited by other persons; and lastly by a public officer to require his coming to the feast before the lords and people, to play or show his strength in their presence; he at first refuses, dismissing the public officer with absolute denial to come; at length persuaded inwardly that this was from God, he yields to go along with him, who came now the second time with great threatenings to fetch him; the Chorus yet remaining on the place, Manoa returns full of joyful hope, to procure ere long his son's deliverance: in the midst of which discourse an Hebrew comes in haste confusedly at first; and afterward more distinctly relating the catastrophe, what Samson had done to the Philistines, and by accident to himself; wherewith the tragedy ends.

Samson. A little onward lend thy guiding hand
To these dark steps, a little further on;
For yonder bank hath choice of sun or shade,
There I am wont to sit, when any chance
Relieves me from my task of servile toil,
Daily in the common prison else enjoined me,
Where I a prisoner chained, scarce freely draw
The air imprisoned also, close and damp,
Unwholesome draught: but here I feel amends,
The breath of heaven fresh-blowing, pure and sweet,
With day-spring° born; here leave me to respire. daybreak

Their superstition yields me; hence with leave
Retiring from the popular noise, I seek
This unfrequented place to find some ease,
Ease to the body some, none to the mind
From restless thoughts, that like a deadly swarm
Of hornets armed, no sooner found alone,
But rush upon me thronging, and present
Times past, what once I was, and what am now.
O wherefore was my birth from heaven foretold
Twice by an angel, who at last in sight
Of both my parents all in flames ascended
From off the altar, where an offering burned,
As in a fiery column charioting
His godlike presence, and from some great act
Or benefit revealed to Abraham's race?[1]
Why was my breeding ordered and prescribed
As of a person separate to God,[2]
Designed for great exploits, if I must die
Betrayed, captived, and both my eyes put out,
Made of my enemies the scorn and gaze;
To grind in brazen fetters under task
With this heaven-gifted strength? O glorious strength
Put to the labour of a beast, debased
Lower than bond-slave! Promise was that I Should Israel from Philistian yoke deliver;
Ask for this great deliverer now, and find him
Eyeless in Gaza at the mill with slaves,
Himself in bonds under Philistian yoke;
Yet stay, let me not rashly call in doubt
Divine prediction; what if all foretold
Had been fulfilled but through mine own default,
Whom have I to complain of but my self?
Who this high gift of strength committed to me,
In what part lodged, how easily bereft me,
Under the seal of silence could not keep,
But weakly to a woman must reveal it,
O'ercome with importunity and tears.
O impotence of mind, in body strong!
But what is strength without a double share
Of wisdom, vast, unwieldy, burdensome,
Proudly secure, yet liable to fall
By weakest subtleties, not made to rule,
But to subserve where wisdom bears command.
God, when he gave me strength, to show withal
How slight the gift was, hung it in my hair.
But peace, I must not quarrel with the will
Of highest dispensation, which herein
Haply had ends above my reach to know:
Suffices that to me strength is my bane,
And proves the source of all my miseries;
So many, and so huge, that each apart
Would ask a life to wail, but chief of all,
O loss of sight, of thee I most complain!
Blind among enemies, O worse than chains,
Dungeon, or beggary, or decrepit age!
Light, the prime work of God, to me is extinct,
And all her various objects of delight
Annulled, which might in part my grief have eased,
Inferior to the vilest now become
Of man or worm; the vilest here excel me,
They creep, yet see, I dark in light exposed
To daily fraud, contempt, abuse and wrong,
Within doors, or without, still as a fool,
In power of others, never in my own;
Scarce half I seem to live, dead more than half.
O dark, dark, dark, amid the blaze of noon,
Irrecoverably dark, total eclipse
Without all hope of day!
O first-created beam, and thou great word,
Let there be light, and light was over all;
Why am I thus bereaved thy prime decree?
The sun to me is dark
And silent as the moon,
When she deserts the night
Hid in her vacant interlunar cave.[3]
Since light so necessary is to life,
And almost life itself, if it be true
That light is in the soul,
She all in every part; why was the sight
To such a tender ball as the eye confined?
So obvious° and so easy to be quenched, vulnerable
And not as feeling through all parts diffused,

[1] O wherefore . . . race? For the circumstances of Samson's birth, see Judges 13.3–5 and 10–23.

[2] separate to God Samson is a Nazarite, a person set apart by ascetic vows to serve the divine: see Numbers 6.1–21 and Judges 13.4–7.

[3] silent as the moon . . . interlunar cave Silent in the sense of dark, vacant in the sense of idle or at leisure; in classical lore, the moon rested in a cave during the period of darkness between old and new moons.

That she might look at will through every pore?
Then had I not been thus exiled from light;
As in the land of darkness yet in light,
To live a life half dead, a living death,
And buried; but O yet more miserable!
My self, my sepulchre, a moving grave,
Buried, yet not exempt
By privilege of death and burial
From worst of other evils, pains and wrongs,
But made hereby obnoxious° more exposed
To all the miseries of life,
Life in captivity
Among inhuman foes.
But who are these? For with joint pace I hear
The tread of many feet steering this way;
Perhaps my enemies who come to stare
At my affliction, and perhaps to insult,
Their daily practice to afflict me more.
Chorus. This, this is he; softly a while,
Let us not break in upon him;
O change beyond report, thought, or belief!
See how he lies at random, carelessly diffused,° sprawled
With languished head unpropped,
As one past hope, abandoned,
And by himself given over;
In slavish habit, ill-fitted weeds
O'er-worn and soiled;
Or do my eyes misrepresent? Can this be he,
That heroic, that renowned,
Irresistible Samson? Whom unarmed
No strength of man, or fiercest wild beast could withstand;
Who tore the lion, as the lion tears the kid,
Ran on embattled armies clad in iron,
And weaponless himself,
Made arms ridiculous, useless the forgery
Of brazen shield and spear, the hammered cuirass,° breastplate
Chalybean tempered steel,[1] and frock of mail
Adamantean proof;[2]
But safest he who stood aloof,
When insupportably his foot advanced,
In scorn of their proud arms and warlike tools,
Spurned them to death by troops. The bold Ascalonite[3]
Fled from his lion ramp, old warriors turned
Their plated backs under his heel;
Or grovelling soiled their crested helmets in the dust.
Then with what trivial weapon came to hand,
The jaw of a dead ass, his sword of bone,
A thousand foreskins[4] fell, the flower of Palestine
In Ramath-lechi famous to this day:
Then by main force pulled up, and on his shoulders bore
The gates of Azza,° post, and massy bar Gaza (variant form)
Up to the hill by Hebron, seat of giants old,
No journey of a Sabbath day,[5] and loaded so;
Like whom the Gentiles feign to bear up heaven.[6]
Which shall I first bewail,
Thy bondage or lost sight,
Prison within prison
Inseparably dark?
Thou art become (O worst imprisonment!)
The dungeon of thy self; thy soul
(Which men enjoying sight oft without cause complain)
Imprisoned now indeed,
In real darkness of the body dwells,
Shut up from outward light
To incorporate with gloomy night;
For inward light alas
Puts forth no visual beam.
O mirror of our fickle state,
Since man on earth unparalleled!
The rarer thy example stands,
By how much from the top of wondrous glory,
Strongest of mortal men,
To lowest pitch of abject fortune thou art fallen.
For him I reckon not in high estate
Whom long descent of birth

[1] Chalybean tempered steel The Chalybes were a Black Sea tribe famous in the classical period for their work in iron and steel.

[2] Adamantean proof Capable of resisting adamant, a fabled mineral hard as diamond.

[3] Ascalonite Ascalon was a Philistine city.

[4] foreskins Synecdoche for the uncircumcised Philistines.

[5] No journey of a Sabbath day The Chorus indulges in epic understatement: Jewish law restricted travel on the Sabbath to about a mile (give or take a half-mile); Samson carried the heavy city gates about forty miles.

[6] whom the Gentiles … bear up heaven Atlas, one of the Titans in Greek myth.

Or the sphere of fortune raises;
But thee whose strength, while virtue was her mate,
Might have subdued the earth,
Universally crowned with highest praises.
Samson. I hear the sound of words, their sense the air
Dissolves unjointed ere it reach my ear.
Chorus. He speaks, let us draw nigh. Matchless in might,
The glory late of Israel, now the grief;
We come thy friends and neighbours not unknown
From Eshtaol and Zora's fruitful vale
To visit or bewail thee, or if better,
Counsel or consolation we may bring,
Salve to thy sores; apt words have power to swage
The tumours of a troubled mind,
And are as balm to festered wounds.
Samson. Your coming, friends, revives me, for I learn
Now of my own experience, not by talk,
How counterfeit a coin they are who friends
Bear in their superscription (of the most
I would be understood): in prosperous days
They swarm, but in adverse withdraw their head
Not to be found, though sought. Ye see, O friends,
How many evils have enclosed me round;
Yet that which was the worst now least afflicts me,
Blindness, for had I sight, confused with shame,
How could I once look up, or heave the head,
Who like a foolish pilot have shipwrecked
My vessel trusted to me from above,
Gloriously rigged; and for a word, a tear,
Fool, have divulged the secret gift of God
To a deceitful woman: tell me friends,
Am I not sung and proverbed for a fool
In every street, do they not say, how well
Are come upon him his deserts? Yet why?
Immeasurable strength they might behold
In me, of wisdom nothing more than mean;
This with the other should, at least, have paired,
These two proportioned ill drove me transverse.° off course
Chorus. Tax not divine disposal, wisest men
Have erred, and by bad women been deceived;
And shall again, pretend they ne'er so wise.
Deject not then so overmuch thy self,
Who hast of sorrow thy full load besides;
Yet truth to say, I oft have heard men wonder
Why thou shouldst wed Philistian women rather Than of thine own tribe fairer, or as fair,
At least of thy own nation, and as noble.
Samson. The first I saw at Timna, and she pleased
Me, not my parents, that I sought to wed,
The daughter of an infidel: they knew not
That what I motioned was of God; I knew
From intimate impulse, and therefore urged
The marriage on; that by occasion hence
I might begin Israel's deliverance,
The work to which I was divinely called;
She proving false, the next I took to wife
(O that I never had! fond wish too late)
Was in the vale of Sorec, Dalila,
That specious monster, my accomplished snare.
I thought it lawful from my former act,
And the same end; still watching to oppress
Israel's oppressors: of what now I suffer
She was not the prime cause, but I my self,
Who vanquished with a peal of words (O weakness!)
Gave up my fort of silence to a woman.
Chorus. In seeking just occasion to provoke
The Philistine, thy country's enemy,
Thou never wast remiss, I bear thee witness:
Yet Israel still serves with all his sons.
Samson. That fault I take not on me, but transfer
On Israel's governors, and heads of tribes,
Who seeing those great acts which God had done
Singly by me against their conquerors
Acknowledged not, or not at all considered
Deliverance offered: I on the other side
Used no ambition to commend my deeds,
The deeds themselves, though mute, spoke loud the doer;
But they persisted deaf, and would not seem
To count them things worth notice, till at length
Their lords the Philistines with gathered powers
Entered Judea seeking me, who then
Safe to the rock of Etham was retired,
Not flying, but forecasting in what place
To set upon them, what advantaged best;
Meanwhile the men of Judah to prevent
The harass of their land, beset me round;
I willingly on some conditions came
Into their hands, and they as gladly yield me
To the uncircumcised a welcome prey,
Bound with two cords; but cords to me were threads

Touched with the flame: on their whole host I flew
Unarmed, and with a trivial weapon felled
Their choicest youth; they only lived who fled.
Had Judah that day joined, or one whole tribe,
They had by this possessed the towers of Gath,
And lorded over them whom now they serve;
But what more oft in nations grown corrupt,
And by their vices brought to servitude,
Than to love bondage more than liberty,
Bondage with ease than strenuous liberty;
And to despise, or envy, or suspect
Whom God hath of his special favour raised
As their deliverer; if he aught begin,
How frequent to desert him, and at last
To heap ingratitude on worthiest deeds?
Chorus. Thy words to my remembrance bring
How Succoth and the fort of Penuel
Their great deliverer contemned,
The matchless Gideon[1] in pursuit
Of Madian and her vanquished kings:
And how ingrateful Ephraim[2]
Had dealt with Jephtha, who by argument,
Not worse than by his shield and spear
Defended Israel from the Ammonite,
Had not his prowess quelled their pride
In that sore battle when so many died
Without reprieve adjudged to death,
For want of well pronouncing shibboleth.
Samson. Of such examples add me to the roll;
Me easily indeed mine may neglect,
But God's proposed deliverance not so.
Chorus. Just are the ways of God,
And justifiable to men;
Unless there be who think not God at all,
If any be, they walk obscure;° in darkness
For of such doctrine never was there school,
But the heart of the fool,[3]
And no man therein doctor but himself.
Yet more there be who doubt his ways not just,
As to his own edicts, found contradicting,
Then give the reins to wandering thought,
Regardless of his glory's diminution;
Till by their own perplexities involved
They ravel more, still less resolved,
But never find self-satisfying solution.
As if they would confine the interminable,
And tie him to his own prescript,
Who made our laws to bind us, not himself,
And hath full right to exempt
Whom so it pleases him by choice
From national obstriction,[4] without taint
Of sin, or legal debt;
For with his own laws he can best dispense.
He would not else who never wanted means,
Nor in respect of the enemy just cause
To set his people free,
Have prompted this heroic Nazarite,
Against his vow of strictest purity,
To seek in marriage that fallacious bride,
Unclean, unchaste.
Down Reason then, at least vain reasonings down,
Though Reason here aver
That moral verdict quits her of unclean:
Unchaste was subsequent,[5] her stain not his.
But see here comes thy reverend sire
With careful step, locks white as down,
Old Manoa: advise
Forthwith how thou ought'st to receive him.
Samson. Ay me, another inward grief awaked,
With mention of that name renews the assault.
Manoa. Brethren and men of Dan, for such ye seem,
Though in this uncouth° place; if old respect, unfamiliar
As I suppose, towards your once gloried friend,
My son now captive, hither hath informed

---

[1] Gideon See Judges 8.4–9; the Israelites in Succoth and Penuel refused to provide Gideon and his army with supplies as they pursued the remaining leaders of a recently defeated Midian (here, Madian) force.

[2] Ephraim See Judges 11.12–33, 12.1–6; after the men of Ephraim refused to help Jephtha fight the Ammonites, Jephtha slaughtered them in retribution; his men afterward identified any Ephraimite fugitives by their distinctive pronunciation of the Hebrew word "shibboleth" (meaning an ear of grain).

[3] the heart of the fool "The fool hath said in his heart, There is no God" (Psalms 14.1).

[4] obstriction Legal obligation, in this case not to marry a Gentile (from Deuteronomy 7.3).

[5] Unchaste was subsequent See Judges 14.20; Samson's first wife, the woman of Timna, was given to his companion after Samson rejected her.

Your younger feet, while mine cast back with age
Came lagging after; say if he be here.
Chorus. As signal now in low dejected state,
As erst in highest, behold him where he lies.
Manoa. O miserable change! Is this the man,
That invincible Samson, far renowned,
The dread of Israel's foes, who with a strength
Equivalent to angels walked their streets,
None offering fight; who single combatant
Duelled their armies ranked in proud array,
Himself an army, now unequal match
To save himself against a coward armed
At one spear's length. O ever-failing trust
In mortal strength! and O what not in man
Deceivable and vain! Nay what thing good
Prayed for, but often proves our woe, our bane?
I prayed for children, and thought barrenness
In wedlock a reproach; I gained a son,
And such a son as all men hailed me happy;
Who would be now a father in my stead?
O wherefore did God grant me my request,
And as a blessing with such pomp adorned?
Why are his gifts desirable, to tempt
Our earnest prayers, then given with solemn hand
As graces, draw a scorpion's tail behind?
For this did the angel twice descend? For this
Ordained thy nurture holy, as of a plant;
Select, and sacred, glorious for a while,
The miracle of men: then in an hour
Ensnared, assaulted, overcome, led bound,
Thy foes' derision, captive, poor, and blind
Into a dungeon thrust, to work with slaves?
Alas methinks whom God hath chosen once
To worthiest deeds, if he through frailty err,
He should not so o'erwhelm, and as a thrall
Subject him to so foul indignities,
Be it but for honour's sake of former deeds.
Samson. Appoint[1] not heavenly disposition, father,
Nothing of all these evils hath befall'n me
But justly; I my self have brought them on,
Sole author I, sole cause: if aught seem vile,
As vile hath been my folly, who have profaned
The mystery of God given me under pledge
Of vow, and have betrayed it to a woman,
A Canaanite, my faithless enemy.
This well I knew, nor was at all surprised,
But warned by oft experience: did not she
Of Timna first betray me, and reveal
The secret wrested from me in her highth
Of nuptial love professed, carrying it straight
To them who had corrupted her, my spies,
And rivals? In this other was there found
More faith? Who also in her prime of love,
Spousal embraces, vitiated with gold,
Though offered only, by the scent conceived
Her spurious first-born, treason against me?
Thrice she assayed with flattering prayers and sighs,
And amorous reproaches to win from me
My capital[2] secret, in what part my strength
Lay stored, in what part summed, that she might know:
Thrice I deluded her, and turned to sport
Her importunity, each time perceiving
How openly, and with what impudence
She purposed to betray me, and (which was worse
Than undissembled hate) with what contempt
She sought to make me traitor to my self;
Yet the fourth time, when mustering all her wiles,
With blandished parleys, feminine assaults,
Tongue-batteries, she surceased not day nor night
To storm me over-watched, and wearied out.
At times when men seek most repose and rest,
I yielded, and unlocked her all my heart,
Who with a grain of manhood well resolved
Might easily have shook off all her snares:
But foul effeminacy held me yoked
Her bond-slave; O indignity, O blot
To honour and religion! servile mind
Rewarded well with servile punishment!
The base degree to which I now am fall'n,
These rags, this grinding, is not yet so base
As was my former servitude, ignoble,
Unmanly, ignominious, infamous,
True slavery, and that blindness worse than this,
That saw not how degenerately I served.
Manoa. I cannot praise thy marriage choices, son,
Rather approved them not; but thou didst plead

---

[1] Appoint Both blame, and limit or prescribe.

[2] capital Pun: not only his most important and furthermore lethal secret, but a secret pertaining to his head ("capital" derives from the Latin for "head").

Divine impulsion prompting how thou might'st
Find some occasion to infest° our foes. harass
I state not that; this I am sure; our foes
Found soon occasion thereby to make thee
Their captive, and their triumph; thou the sooner
Temptation found'st, or over-potent charms
To violate the sacred trust of silence
Deposited within thee; which to have kept
Tacit, was in thy power. True; and thou bear'st
Enough, and more the burden of that fault;
Bitterly hast thou paid, and still art paying
That rigid score. A worse thing yet remains,
This day the Philistines a popular feast
Here celebrate in Gaza, and proclaim
Great pomp, and sacrifice, and praises loud
To Dagon, as their god who hath delivered
Thee Samson bound and blind into their hands,
Them out of thine, who slew'st them many a slain.
So Dagon shall be magnified, and God,
Besides whom is no god, compared with idols,
Disglorified, blasphemed, and had in scorn
By the idolatrous rout amidst their wine;
Which to have come to pass by means of thee,
Samson, of all thy sufferings think the heaviest,
Of all reproach the most with shame that ever
Could have befall'n thee and thy father's house.
Samson. Father, I do acknowledge and confess
That I this honour, I this pomp have brought
To Dagon, and advanced his praises high
Among the heathen round; to God have brought Dishonour, obloquy, and oped the mouths
Of idolists, and atheists; have brought scandal
To Israel, diffidence of God, and doubt
In feeble hearts, propense enough before
To waver, or fall off and join with idols;
Which is my chief affliction, shame and sorrow,
The anguish of my soul, that suffers not
Mine eye to harbour sleep, or thoughts to rest.
This only hope relieves me, that the strife
With me hath end; all the contest is now
'Twixt God and Dagon; Dagon hath presumed,
Me overthrown, to enter lists with God,
His deity comparing and preferring
Before the God of Abraham. He, be sure,
Will not connive,° or linger, thus provoked, be tolerant
But will arise and his great name assert:
Dagon must stoop, and shall ere long receive
Such a discomfit, as shall quite despoil him
Of all these boasted trophies won on me,
And with confusion blank his worshippers.
Manoa. With cause this hope relieves thee, and these words
I as a prophecy receive: for God,
Nothing more certain, will not long defer
To vindicate the glory of his name
Against all competition, nor will long
Endure it, doubtful whether God be Lord,
Or Dagon. But for thee what shall be done?
Thou must not in the meanwhile here forgot
Lie in this miserable loathsome plight
Neglected. I already have made way
To some Philistian lords, with whom to treat
About thy ransom: well they may by this
Have satisfied their utmost of revenge
By pains and slaveries, worse than death inflicted
On thee, who now no more canst do them harm.
Samson. Spare that proposal, father, spare the trouble
Of that solicitation; let me here,
As I deserve, pay on my punishment;
And expiate, if possible, my crime,
Shameful garrulity. To have revealed
Secrets of men, the secrets of a friend,
How heinous had the fact been, how deserving Contempt, and scorn of all, to be excluded
All friendship, and avoided as a blab,
The mark of fool set on his front! But I
God's counsel have not kept, his holy secret
Presumptuously have published, impiously,
Weakly at least, and shamefully: a sin
That Gentiles in their parables condemn
To their abyss and horrid pains confined.
Manoa. Be penitent and for thy fault contrite,
But act not in thy own affliction, son,
Repent the sin, but if the punishment
Thou canst avoid, self-preservation bids;
Or the execution leave to high disposal,
And let another hand, not thine, exact
Thy penal forfeit from thy self; perhaps
God will relent, and quit thee all his debt;
Who evermore approves and more accepts

(Best pleased with humble and filial submission)
Him who imploring mercy sues for life,
Than who self-rigorous chooses death as due;
Which argues over-just, and self-displeased
For self-offence, more than for God offended.
Reject not then what offered means, who knows
But God hath set before us, to return thee
Home to thy country and his sacred house,
Where thou may'st bring thy off'rings, to avert
His further ire, with prayers and vows renewed.
Samson. His pardon I implore; but as for life,
To what end should I seek it? When in strength
All mortals I excelled, and great in hopes
With youthful courage and magnanimous thoughts
Of birth from heaven foretold and high exploits,
Full of divine instinct, after some proof
Of acts indeed heroic, far beyond
The sons of Anak,[1] famous now and blazed,
Fearless of danger, like a petty god
I walked about admired of all and dreaded
On hostile ground, none daring my affront.
Then swoll'n with pride into the snare I fell
Of fair fallacious looks, venereal trains,
Softened with pleasure and voluptuous life;
At length to lay my head and hallowed pledge
Of all my strength in the lascivious lap
Of a deceitful concubine who shore me
Like a tame wether,[2] all my precious fleece,
Then turned me out ridiculous, despoiled,
Shaven, and disarmed among my enemies.
Chorus. Desire of wine and all delicious drinks,
Which many a famous warrior overturns,
Thou couldst repress, nor did the dancing ruby
Sparkling, out-poured, the flavour, or the smell,
Or taste that cheers the heart of gods and men,
Allure thee from the cool crystalline stream.[3]
Samson. Wherever fountain or fresh current flowed
Against the eastern ray, translucent, pure
With touch ethereal of heaven's fiery rod
I drank, from the clear milky juice[4] allaying
Thirst, and refreshed; nor envied them the grape
Whose heads that turbulent liquor fills with fumes.
Chorus. O madness, to think use of strongest wines
And strongest drinks our chief support of health,
When God with these forbidden made choice to rear
His mighty champion, strong above compare,
Whose drink was only from the liquid brook.
Samson. But what availed this temperance, not complete
Against another object more enticing?
What boots it at one gate to make defence,
And at another to let in the foe,
Effeminately vanquished? By which means,
Now blind, disheartened, shamed, dishonoured, quelled,
To what can I be useful, wherein serve
My nation, and the work from heaven imposed,
But to sit idle on the household hearth,
A burdenous drone; to visitants a gaze,
Or pitied object, these redundant° locks abundant
Robustious to no purpose clustering down,
Vain monument of strength; till length of years
And sedentary numbness craze my limbs
To a contemptible old age obscure.
Here rather let me drudge and earn my bread,
Till vermin or the draff of servile food
Consume me, and oft-invocated death
Hasten the welcome end of all my pains.
Manoa. Wilt thou then serve the Philistines with that gift
Which was expressly given thee to annoy them?
Better at home lie bed-rid, not only idle,
Inglorious, unemployed, with age outworn.
But God who caused a fountain at thy prayer
From the dry ground to spring, thy thirst to allay
After the brunt of battle, can as easy
Cause light again within thy eyes to spring,
Wherewith to serve him better than thou hast;
And I persuade me so; why else this strength
Miraculous yet remaining in those locks?
His might continues in thee not for naught,
Nor shall his wondrous gifts be frustrate thus.

[1] sons of Anak Giants (from Numbers 13.33).

[2] wether Castrated ram.

[3] Desire of wine … stream As a Nazarite, Samson had taken a vow to abstain from alcohol (Judges 13.4).

[4] clear milky juice Clear, pure water. Milton also describes water from a stream as "milky" in Paradise Lost 5.306. The usage suggests the conception of the earth as mother.

Samson. All otherwise to me my thoughts portend,
That these dark orbs no more shall treat with light,
Nor the other light of life continue long,
But yield to double darkness nigh at hand:
So much I feel my genial spirits droop,
My hopes all flat, nature within me seems
In all her functions weary of herself;
My race of glory run, and race of shame,
And I shall shortly be with them that rest.
Manoa. Believe not these suggestions which proceed
From anguish of the mind and humours black,[1]
That mingle with thy fancy. I however
Must not omit a father's timely care
To prosecute the means of thy deliverance
By ransom or how else: meanwhile be calm,
And healing words from these thy friends admit.
Samson. O that torment should not be confined
To the body's wounds and sores
With maladies innumerable
In heart, head, breast, and reins;° kidneys
But must secret passage find
To the inmost mind,
There exercise all his fierce accidents,
And on her purest spirits prey,
As on entrails, joints, and limbs,
With answerable pains, but more intense,
Though void of corporal sense.
My griefs not only pain me
As a lingering disease,
But finding no redress, ferment and rage,
Nor less than wounds immedicable
Rankle, and fester, and gangrene,
To black mortification.
Thoughts my tormentors armed with deadly stings
Mangle my apprehensive tenderest parts,
Exasperate, exulcerate, and raise
Dire inflammation which no cooling herb
Or med'cinal liquor can assuage,
Nor breath of vernal air from snowy alp.
Sleep hath forsook and given me o'er
To death's benumbing opium as my only cure.
Thence faintings, swoonings of despair,
And sense of heaven's desertion.
I was his nursling once and choice delight,
His destined from the womb,
Promised by heavenly message twice descending.
Under his special eye
Abstemious I grew up and thrived amain;
He led me on to mightiest deeds
Above the nerve of mortal arm
Against the uncircumcised, our enemies.
But now hath cast me off as never known,
And to those cruel enemies,
Whom I by his appointment had provoked,
Left me all helpless with the irreparable loss
Of sight, reserved alive to be repeated
The subject of their cruelty, or scorn.
Nor am I in the list of them that hope;
Hopeless are all my evils, all remediless;
This one prayer yet remains, might I be heard,
No long petition, speedy death,
The close of all my miseries, and the balm.
Chorus. Many are the sayings of the wise
In ancient and in modern books enrolled;
Extolling patience as the truest fortitude;[2]
And to the bearing well of all calamities,
All chances incident to man's frail life
Consolatories writ
With studied argument, and much persuasion sought
Lenient of grief and anxious thought,
But with the afflicted in his pangs their sound
Little prevails, or rather seems a tune,
Harsh, and of dissonant mood from his complaint,
Unless he feel within
Some source of consolation from above;
Secret refreshings, that repair his strength,
And fainting spirits uphold.
God of our fathers, what is man!
That thou towards him with hand so various,
Or might I say contrarious,
Temper'st thy providence through his short course,
Not evenly, as thou rul'st
The angelic orders and inferior creatures mute,
Irrational and brute.
Nor do I name of men the common rout,

---

[1] humours black Black bile, one of the four humors of Renaissance medical psychology and thought to produce melancholy.

[2] patience as the truest fortitude Milton himself expressed this "wise" saying in a "modern book": see Paradise Lost 9.31–33 and 12.569–70.

That wand'ring loose about
Grow up and perish, as the summer fly,
Heads without name no more remembered,
But such as thou hast solemnly elected,
With gifts and graces eminently adorned
To some great work, thy glory,
And people's safety, which in part they effect:
Yet toward these thus dignified, thou oft
Amidst their height of noon,
Changest thy countenance, and thy hand with no regard
Of highest favours past
From thee on them, or them to thee of service.
  Nor only dost degrade them, or remit
To life obscured, which were a fair dismission,
But throw'st them lower than thou didst exalt them high,
Unseemly falls in human eye,
Too grievous for the trespass or omission,
Oft leav'st them to the hostile sword
Of heathen and profane, their carcasses
To dogs and fowls a prey, or else captived:
Or to the unjust tribunals, under change of times,
And condemnation of the ingrateful multitude.[1]
If these they scape, perhaps in poverty
With sickness and disease thou bow'st them down,
Painful diseases and deformed,
In crude° old age; premature
Though not disordinate, yet causeless suffering
The punishment of dissolute days, in fine,
Just or unjust, alike seem miserable,
For oft alike, both come to evil end.
  So deal not with this once thy glorious champion,
The image of thy strength, and mighty minister.
What do I beg? How hast thou dealt already?
Behold him in this state calamitous, and turn
His labours, for thou canst, to peaceful end.
  But who is this, what thing of sea or land?
Female of sex it seems,
That so bedecked, ornate, and gay,
Comes this way sailing
Like a stately ship
Of Tarsus, bound for th' isles
Of Javan or Gadier[2]
With all her bravery on, and tackle trim,
Sails filled, and streamers waving,
Courted by all the winds that hold them play,
An amber scent of odorous perfume
Her harbinger, a damsel train behind;
Some rich Philistian matron she may seem,
And now at nearer view, no other certain
Than Dalila thy wife.

Samson. My wife, my traitress, let her not come near me.

Chorus. Yet on she moves, now stands and eyes thee fixed,
About t' have spoke, but now, with head declined
Like a fair flower surcharged with dew, she weeps
And words addressed seem into tears dissolved,
Wetting the borders of her silken veil:
But now again she makes address to speak.

Dalila. With doubtful feet and wavering resolution
I came, still dreading thy displeasure, Samson,
Which to have merited, without excuse,
I cannot but acknowledge; yet if tears
May expiate (though the fact more evil drew
In the perverse event than I foresaw)
My penance hath not slackened, though my pardon
No way assured. But conjugal affection
Prevailing over fear, and timorous doubt
Hath led me on desirous to behold
Once more thy face, and know of thy estate.
If aught in my ability may serve
To lighten what thou suffer'st, and appease
Thy mind with what amends is in my power,
Though late, yet in some part to recompense
My rash but more unfortunate misdeed.

Samson. Out, out hyena; these are thy wonted arts,
And arts of every woman false like thee,
To break all faith, all vows, deceive, betray,
Then as repentant to submit, beseech,
And reconcilement move with feigned remorse,
Confess, and promise wonders in her change,

[1] their carcasses … ingrateful multitude This passage partly echoes Homer's description of those who died in the Trojan war (Iliad 1.4–5). Most readers also hear an allusion to the fates of parliamentary leaders at the Restoration: those who remained alive were tried and several imprisoned or executed, and the bodies of some deceased regicides were exhumed and displayed to the public.

[2] Tarsus The location of the biblical Tarshish is disputed, but Milton appears to side with those who place it in Cicilia (modern-day Turkey), cf. Paradise Lost 1.200; Javan Greek islands (cf. Paradise Lost 1.508); Gadier Cadiz.

Not truly penitent, but chief to try
Her husband, how far urged his patience bears,
His virtue or weakness which way to assail:
Then with more cautious and instructed skill
Again transgresses, and again submits;
That wisest and best men full oft beguiled
With goodness principled not to reject
The penitent, but ever to forgive,
Are drawn to wear out miserable days,
Entangled with a poisonous bosom snake,
If not by quick destruction soon cut off
As I by thee, to ages an example.
Dalila. Yet hear me Samson; not that I endeavour
To lessen or extenuate my offence,
But that on the other side, if it be weighed
By itself, with aggravations not surcharged,
Or else with just allowance counterpoised,
I may, if possible, thy pardon find
The easier towards me, or thy hatred less.
First granting, as I do, it was a weakness
In me, but incident to all our sex,
Curiosity, inquisitive, importune
Of secrets, then with like infirmity
To publish them, both common female faults:
Was it not weakness also to make known
For importunity, that is for naught,
Wherein consisted all thy strength and safety?
To what I did thou show'dst me first the way.
But I to enemies revealed, and should not.
Nor shouldst thou have trusted that to woman's frailty:
Ere I to thee, thou to thy self wast cruel.
Let weakness then with weakness come to parle
So near related, or the same of kind,
Thine forgive mine; that men may censure thine
The gentler, if severely thou exact not
More strength from me, than in thy self was found.
And what if love, which thou interpret'st hate,
The jealousy of love, powerful of sway
In human hearts, nor less in mine towards thee,
Caused what I did? I saw thee mutable
Of fancy, feared lest one day thou wouldst leave me
As her at Timna, sought by all means therefore
How to endear, and hold thee to me firmest:
No better way I saw than by importuning
To learn thy secrets, get into my power
Thy key of strength and safety: thou wilt say,
Why then revealed? I was assured by those Who tempted me, that nothing was designed
Against thee but safe custody, and hold:
That made for me; I knew that liberty
Would draw thee forth to perilous enterprises,
While I at home sat full of cares and fears
Wailing thy absence in my widowed bed;
Here I should still enjoy thee day and night
Mine and love's prisoner, not the Philistines',
Whole to myself, unhazarded abroad,
Fearless at home of partners in my love.
These reasons in love's law have passed for good,
Though fond and reasonless to some perhaps;
And love hath oft, well meaning, wrought much woe,
Yet always pity or pardon hath obtained.
Be not unlike all others, not austere
As thou art strong, inflexible as steel.
If thou in strength all mortals dost exceed,
In uncompassionate anger do not so.
Samson. How cunningly the sorceress displays
Her own transgressions, to upbraid me mine!
That malice not repentance brought thee hither,
By this appears: I gave, thou say'st, the example,
I led the way; bitter reproach, but true,
I to myself was false ere thou to me,
Such pardon therefore as I give my folly,
Take to thy wicked deed: which when thou seest
Impartial, self-severe, inexorable,
Thou wilt renounce thy seeking, and much rather
Confess it feigned, weakness is thy excuse,
And I believe it, weakness to resist
Philistian gold: if weakness may excuse,
What murderer, what traitor, parricide,
Incestuous, sacrilegious, but may plead it?
All wickedness is weakness: that plea therefore
With God or man will gain thee no remission.
But love constrained thee; call it furious rage
To satisfy thy lust: love seeks to have love;
My love how couldst thou hope, who took'st the way
To raise in me inexpiable hate,
Knowing, as needs I must, by thee betrayed?
In vain thou striv'st to cover shame with shame,
Or by evasions thy crime uncover'st more.
Dalila. Since thou determin'st weakness for no plea

In man or woman, though to thy own condemning,
Hear what assaults I had, what snares besides,
What sieges girt me round, ere I consented;
Which might have awed the best-resolved of men,
The constantest to have yielded without blame.
It was not gold, as to my charge thou lay'st,
That wrought with me: thou know'st the magistrates
And princes of my country came in person,
Solicited, commanded, threatened, urged,
Adjured by all the bonds of civil duty
And of religion, pressed how just it was,
How honourable, how glorious to entrap
A common enemy, who had destroyed
Such numbers of our nation: and the priest[1]
Was not behind, but ever at my ear,
Preaching how meritorious with the gods
It would be to ensnare an irreligious
Dishonourer of Dagon: what had I
To oppose against such powerful arguments?
Only my love of thee held long debate;
And combated in silence all these reasons
With hard contest: at length that grounded maxim
So rife and celebrated in the mouths
Of wisest men; that to the public good
Private respects must yield; with grave authority
Took full possession of me and prevailed;
Virtue, as I thought, truth, duty so enjoining.
Samson. I thought where all thy circling wiles would end;
In feigned religion, smooth hypocrisy.
But had thy love, still odiously pretended,
Been, as it ought, sincere, it would have taught thee
Far other reasonings, brought forth other deeds.
I before all the daughters of my tribe
And of my nation chose thee from among
My enemies, loved thee, as too well thou knew'st,
Too well, unbosomed all my secrets to thee,
Not out of levity, but overpowered
By thy request, who could deny thee nothing;
Yet now am judged an enemy. Why then
Didst thou at first receive me for thy husband?
Then, as since then, thy country's foe professed:
Being once a wife, for me thou wast to leave
Parents and country; nor was I their subject,
Nor under their protection but my own,
Thou mine, not theirs: if aught against my life
Thy country sought of thee, it sought unjustly,
Against the law of nature, law of nations,
No more thy country, but an impious crew
Of men conspiring to uphold their state
By worse than hostile deeds, violating the ends
For which our country is a name so dear;
Not therefore to be obeyed. But zeal moved thee;
To please thy gods thou didst it; gods unable
To acquit themselves and prosecute their foes
But by ungodly deeds, the contradiction
Of their own deity, gods cannot be:
Less therefore to be pleased, obeyed, or feared,
These false pretexts and varnished colours failing,
Bare in thy guilt how foul must thou appear!
Dalila. In argument with men a woman ever
Goes by the worse, whatever be her cause.
Samson. For want of words no doubt, or lack of breath,
Witness when I was worried with thy peals.
Dalila. I was a fool, too rash, and quite mistaken
In what I thought would have succeeded best.
Let me obtain forgiveness of thee, Samson,
Afford me place to show what recompense
Towards thee I intend for what I have misdone,
Misguided; only what remains past cure
Bear not too sensibly,° nor still insist keenly
To afflict thy self in vain: though sight be lost,
Life yet hath many solaces, enjoyed
Where other senses want not their delights
At home in leisure and domestic ease,
Exempt from many a care and chance to which
Eyesight exposes daily men abroad.
I to the lords will intercede, not doubting
Their favourable ear, that I may fetch thee
From forth this loathsome prison-house, to abide
With me, where my redoubled love and care
With nursing diligence, to me glad office,
May ever tend about thee to old age
With all things grateful cheered, and so supplied,
That what by me thou hast lost thou least shalt miss.
Samson. No, no, of my condition take no care;
It fits not; thou and I long since are twain;
Nor think me so unwary or accursed
To bring my feet again into the snare

[1] priest One of Milton's additions to the biblical account.

Where once I have been caught; I know thy trains
Though dearly to my cost, thy gins, and toils;[1]
Thy fair enchanted cup, and warbling charms[2]
No more on me have power, their force is nulled,
So much of adder's wisdom[3] I have learnt
To fence my ear against thy sorceries.
If in my flower of youth and strength, when all men
Loved, honoured, feared me, thou alone could hate me
Thy husband, slight me, sell me, and forgo me;
How wouldst thou use me now, blind, and thereby
Deceivable, in most things as a child
Helpless, thence easily contemned, and scorned,
And last neglected? How wouldst thou insult
When I must live uxorious to thy will
In perfect thraldom, how again betray me,
Bearing my words and doings to the lords
To gloss upon, and censuring, frown or smile?
This jail I count the house of liberty
To thine° whose doors my feet shall never enter. compared to thine
Dalila. Let me approach at least, and touch thy hand.
Samson. Not for thy life, lest fierce remembrance wake
My sudden rage to tear thee joint by joint.
At distance I forgive thee, go with that;
Bewail thy falsehood, and the pious works
It hath brought forth to make thee memorable
Among illustrious women, faithful wives:
Cherish thy hastened widowhood with the gold
Of matrimonial treason: so farewell.
Dalila. I see thou art implacable, more deaf
To prayers, than winds and seas, yet winds to seas
Are reconciled at length, and sea to shore:
Thy anger, unappeasable, still rages,
Eternal tempest never to be calmed.
Why do I humble thus myself, and suing
For peace, reap nothing but repulse and hate?
Bid go with evil omen and the brand
Of infamy upon my name denounced?
To mix with thy concernments I desist
Henceforth, nor too much disapprove my own.
Fame if not double-faced is double-mouthed,
And with contrary blast proclaims most deeds,
On both his wings, one black, the other white,
Bears greatest names in his wild airy flight.
My name perhaps among the circumcised
In Dan,[4] in Judah, and the bordering tribes,
To all posterity may stand defamed,
With malediction mentioned, and the blot
Of falsehood most unconjugal traduced.
But in my country where I most desire,
In Ecron, Gaza, Asdod, and in Gath[5]
I shall be named among the famousest
Of women, sung at solemn festivals,
Living and dead recorded, who to save
Her country from a fierce destroyer, chose
Above the faith of wedlock-bands, my tomb
With odours visited and annual flowers.
Not less renowned than in Mount Ephraim,
Jael,[6] who with inhospitable guile
Smote Sisera sleeping through the temples nailed.
Nor shall I count it heinous to enjoy
The public marks of honour and reward
Conferred upon me, for the piety
Which to my country I was judged to have shown.
At this whoever envies or repines
I leave him to his lot, and like my own.
Chorus. She's gone, a manifest serpent by her sting
Discovered in the end, till now concealed.
Samson. So let her go, God sent her to debase me,
And aggravate my folly who committed
To such a viper his most sacred trust
Of secrecy, my safety, and my life.

[1] I know thy … and toils General terms from hunting for traps, snares, or lures.

[2] enchanted cup, and warbling charms An allusion to Circe in Homer's Odyssey, whose magical potions turned Odysseus's men into pleasure-loving voluptuaries and then into swine; possibly also an allusion to the sirens, whose beautiful songs led men to their deaths.

[3] adder's wisdom Deafness. The proverbial deafness of adders derived from Psalms 58.4–5: "they are like the deaf adder that stoppeth her ear; which will not hearken to the voice of charmers, charming never so wisely."

[4] Dan Home of the Danites, Samson's tribe.

[5] Ecron, Gaza, Asdod … Gath Four of the five main Philistine cities.

[6] Jael See Judges 4.17–24; Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, gave refuge to the Canaanite general Sisera as he fled an Israelite force led by Barak, but then murdered him as he slept by hammering a tent peg into his temple. She was praised in song by Deborah and Barak (Judges 5.24–31); Dalila imagines her people, the Philistines, celebrating her in similar fashion.

Chorus. Yet beauty, though injurious, hath strange power,
After offence returning, to regain
Love once possessed, nor can be easily
Repulsed, without much inward passion felt
And secret sting of amorous remorse.
Samson. Love-quarrels oft in pleasing concord end,
Not wedlock-treachery endangering life.
Chorus. It is not virtue, wisdom, valour, wit,
Strength, comeliness of shape, or amplest merit
That woman's love can win or long inherit;° possess
But what it is, hard is to say,
Harder to hit
(Which way soever men refer it),
Much like thy riddle,[1] Samson, in one day
Or seven, though one should musing sit;
If any of these or all, the Timnian bride
Had not so soon preferred
Thy paranymph,[2] worthless to thee compared,
Successor in thy bed,
Nor both so loosely disallied
Their nuptials, nor this last so treacherously
Had shorn the fatal harvest of thy head.
Is it for that such outward ornament
Was lavished on their sex, that inward gifts
Were left for haste unfinished, judgment scant,
Capacity not raised to apprehend
Or value what is best
In choice, but oftest to affect the wrong?
Or was too much of self-love mixed,
Of constancy no root infixed,
That either they love nothing, or not long?
Whate'er it be, to wisest men and best
Seeming at first all heavenly under virgin veil,
Soft, modest, meek, demure,
Once joined, the contrary she proves, a thorn
Intestine,° far within defensive arms internal
A cleaving mischief, in his way to virtue
Adverse and turbulent, or by her charms
Draws him awry enslaved
With dotage, and his sense depraved
To folly and shameful deeds which ruin ends.
What pilot so expert but needs must wreck
Embarked with such a steers-mate at the helm?
Favoured of heaven who finds
One virtuous rarely found,
That in domestic good combines:
Happy that house! His way to peace is smooth:
But virtue which breaks through all opposition,
And all temptation can remove,
Most shines and most is acceptable above.
Therefore God's universal law
Gave to the man despotic power
Over his female in due awe,
Nor from that right to part an hour,
Smile she or lour:
So shall he least confusion draw
On his whole life, not swayed
By female usurpation,[3] nor dismayed.
But had we best retire, I see a storm?
Samson. Fair days have oft contracted wind and rain.
Chorus. But this another kind of tempest brings.
Samson. Be less abstruse, my riddling days are past.
Chorus. Look now for no enchanting voice, nor fear
The bait of honeyed words; a rougher tongue
Draws hitherward, I know him by his stride,
The giant Harapha of Gath,[4] his look
Haughty as is his pile high-built and proud.
Comes he in peace? What wind hath blown him hither
I less conjecture than when first I saw
The sumptuous Dalila floating this way:
His habit carries peace, his brow defiance.
Samson. Or peace or not, alike to me he comes.
Chorus. His fraught° we soon shall know, he now arrives. freight, business
Harapha. I come not Samson, to condole thy chance,
As these perhaps, yet wish it had not been,
Though for no friendly intent. I am of Gath,
Men call me Harapha, of stock renowned
As Og or Anak and the Emims old

[1] thy riddle See Judges 14.12–18.

[2] paranymph Groomsman or "best man" at a wedding: see Judges 14.20, which is silent about the bride's preferences and indicates only that she was "given to" Samson's companion after Samson left her in anger.

[3] not swayed ... usurpation An allusion to 1 Timothy 2.12–13: "But I suffer not a woman to teach, nor to usurp authority over the man, but to be in silence."

[4] Harapha Not in the biblical story of Samson, but modeled on Goliath; the name derives from the Hebrew word for giant.

That Kiriathaim[1] held, thou know'st me now
If thou at all art known.[2] Much I have heard
Of thy prodigious might and feats performed
Incredible to me, in this displeased,
That I was never present on the place
Of those encounters, where we might have tried
Each other's force in camp or listed field:° tiltyard
And now am come to see of whom such noise
Hath walked about, and each limb to survey,
If thy appearance answer loud report.
Samson. The way to know were not to see but taste.
Harapha. Dost thou already single° me? challenge
  I thought
Gyves° and the mill had tamed thee. shackles
  O that fortune
Had brought me to the field where thou art famed
To have wrought such wonders with an ass's jaw;
I should have forced thee soon wish other arms,
Or left thy carcass where the ass lay thrown:
So had the glory of prowess been recovered
To Palestine, won by a Philistine
From the unforeskinned race, of whom thou bear'st
The highest name for valiant acts; that honour
Certain to have won by mortal duel from thee,
I lose, prevented by thy eyes put out.
Samson. Boast not of what thou wouldst have done, but do
What then thou wouldst, thou seest it in thy hand.
Harapha. To combat with a blind man I disdain,
And thou hast need much washing to be touched.
Samson. Such usage as your honourable lords
Afford me assassinated° and betrayed, attacked treacherously
Who durst not with their whole united powers
In fight withstand me single and unarmed,
Nor in the house with chamber ambushes
Close-banded durst attack me, no not sleeping,
Till they had hired a woman with their gold
Breaking her marriage faith to circumvent me.
Therefore without feigned shifts let be assigned
Some narrow place enclosed, where sight may give thee,
Or rather flight, no great advantage on me;
Then put on all thy gorgeous arms, thy helmet
And brigandine of brass, thy broad habergeon,
Vantbrace and greaves, and gauntlet,[3] add thy spear
A weaver's beam, and seven-times-folded shield,[4]
I only with an oaken staff will meet thee,
And raise such outcries on thy clattered iron,
Which long shall not withhold me from thy head,
That in a little time while breath remains thee,
Thou oft shalt wish thyself at Gath to boast
Again in safety what thou wouldst have done
To Samson, but shalt never see Gath more.
Harapha. Thou durst not thus disparage glorious arms
Which greatest heroes have in battle worn,
Their ornament and safety, had not spells
And black enchantments, some magician's art
Armed thee or charmed thee strong, which thou from heaven
Feign'dst at thy birth was given thee in thy hair,
Where strength can least abide, though all thy hairs
Were bristles ranged like those that ridge the back
Of chafed wild boars or ruffled porcupines.
Samson. I know no spells, use no forbidden arts;
My trust is in the living God who gave me
At my nativity this strength, diffused
No less through all my sinews, joints and bones,
Than thine, while I preserved these locks unshorn,
The pledge of my unviolated vow.
For proof hereof, if Dagon be thy god,
Go to his temple, invocate his aid
With solemnest devotion, spread before him
How highly it concerns his glory now
To frustrate and dissolve these magic spells,

---

[1] Og or Anak and the Emims Biblical giants (Numbers 13.33, Deuteronomy 2.10–11, 3.11); Kiriathaim Home to the Emims (Genesis 14.5).

[2] thou know'st me … art known Echoing Satan in Paradise Lost, when Ithuriel and Zephon discover him in Eden and demand his identity: "Not to know me argues yourselves unknown" (4.830), Satan haughtily replies.

[3] brigandine Body armor; habergeon Sleeveless coat of mail; Vantbrace Armor for the forearm; greaves Armor for the shin; gauntlet Armor for the hand.

[4] weaver's beam Large wooden roller on a loom; the comparison echoes the description of Goliath's spear in 1 Samuel 17.7; seven-times-folded shield Shield of oxhide folded seven times, like the shields of classical heroes Ajax (Iliad 7.220) and Turnus (Aeneid 12.925).

Which I to be the power of Israel's God
Avow, and challenge Dagon to the test,
Offering to combat thee his champion bold,
With the utmost of his godhead seconded:
Then thou shalt see, or rather to thy sorrow
Soon feel, whose God is strongest, thine or mine.
Harapha. Presume not on thy God, whate'er he be,
Thee he regards not, owns not, hath cut off
Quite from his people, and delivered up
Into thy enemies' hand, permitted them
To put out both thine eyes, and fettered send thee
Into the common prison, there to grind
Among the slaves and asses thy comrades,
As good for nothing else, no better service
With those thy boisterous locks, no worthy match
For valour to assail, nor by the sword
Of noble warrior, so to stain his honour,
But by the barber's razor best subdued.
Samson. All these indignities, for such they are
From thine, these evils I deserve and more,
Acknowledge them from God inflicted on me
Justly, yet despair not of his final pardon
Whose ear is ever open; and his eye
Gracious to readmit the suppliant;
In confidence whereof I once again
Defy thee to the trial of mortal fight,
By combat to decide whose god is God,
Thine or whom I with Israel's sons adore.
Harapha. Fair honour that thou dost thy God, in trusting
He will accept thee to defend his cause,
A murderer, a revolter, and a robber.
Samson. Tongue-doughty giant, how dost thou prove me these?
Harapha. Is not thy nation subject to our lords?
Their magistrates confessed it, when they took thee
As a league-breaker and delivered bound
Into our hands: for hadst thou not committed
Notorious murder on those thirty men
At Ascalon, who never did thee harm,
Then like a robber stripp'dst them of their robes?
The Philistines, when thou hadst broke the league,
Went up with armèd powers thee only seeking,
To others did no violence nor spoil.
Samson. Among the daughters of the Philistines
I chose a wife, which argued me no foe;
And in your city held my nuptial feast:
But your ill-meaning politician lords,
Under pretence of bridal friends and guests,
Appointed to await me thirty spies,
Who threatening cruel death constrained the bride
To wring from me and tell to them my secret,
That solved the riddle which I had proposed.
When I perceived all set on enmity,
As on my enemies, wherever chanced,
I used hostility, and took their spoil
To pay my underminers in their coin.
My nation was subjected to your lords.
It was the force of conquest; force with force
Is well ejected when the conquered can.
But I a private person, whom my country
As a league-breaker gave up bound, presumed
Single rebellion and did hostile acts.
I was no private but a person raised
With strength sufficient and command from heaven
To free my country; if their servile minds
Me their deliverer sent would not receive,
But to their masters gave me up for naught,
The unworthier they; whence to this day they serve.
I was to do my part from heaven assigned,
And had performed it if my known offence
Had not disabled me, not all your force:
These shifts refuted, answer thy appellant
Though by his blindness maimed for high attempts,
Who now defies thee thrice to single fight,
As a petty enterprise of small enforce.
Harapha. With thee a man condemned, a slave enrolled,
Due by the law to capital punishment?
To fight with thee no man of arms will deign.
Samson. Cam'st thou for this, vain boaster, to survey me,
To descant on my strength, and give thy verdict?
Come nearer, part not hence so slight informed;
But take good heed my hand survey not thee.
Harapha. O Baal-zebub! Can my ears unused
Hear these dishonours, and not render death?
Samson. No man withholds thee, nothing from thy hand

Fear I incurable; bring up thy van,[1]
My heels are fettered, but my fist is free.
Harapha. This insolence other kind of answer fits.
Samson. Go baffled coward, lest I run upon thee,
Though in these chains, bulk without spirit vast,
And with one buffet lay thy structure low,
Or swing thee in the air, then dash thee down
To the hazard of thy brains and shattered sides.
Harapha. By Astaroth[2] ere long thou shalt lament
These braveries in irons loaden on thee.
Chorus. His giantship is gone somewhat crestfall'n,
Stalking with less unconscionable[3] strides,
And lower looks, but in a sultry chafe.
Samson. I dread him not, nor all his giant-brood,
Though fame divulge him father of five sons
All of gigantic size, Goliah[4] chief.
Chorus. He will directly to the lords, I fear,
And with malicious counsel stir them up
Some way or other yet further to afflict thee.
Samson. He must allege some cause, and offered fight
Will not dare mention, lest a question rise
Whether he durst accept the offer or not,
And that he durst not plain enough appeared.
Much more affliction than already felt
They cannot well impose, nor I sustain;
If they intend advantage of my labours,
The work of many hands, which earns my keeping
With no small profit daily to my owners.
But come what will, my deadliest foe will prove
My speediest friend, by death to rid me hence,
The worst that he can give, to me the best.
Yet so it may fall out, because their end
Is hate, not help to me, it may with mine
Draw their own ruin who attempt the deed.
Chorus. Oh how comely it is and how reviving
To the spirits of just men long oppressed!
When God into the hands of their deliverer
Puts invincible might
To quell the mighty of the earth, the oppressor,
The brute and boisterous force of violent men
Hardy and industrious to support
Tyrannic power, but raging to pursue
The righteous and all such as honour truth;
He all their ammunition
And feats of war defeats
With plain heroic magnitude of mind
And celestial vigour armed,
Their armouries and magazines contemns,
Renders them useless, while
With wingèd expedition
Swift as the lightning glance he executes
His errand on the wicked, who surprised
Lose their defence distracted and amazed.
But patience is more oft the exercise
Of saints, the trial of their fortitude,
Making them each his own deliverer,
And victor over all
That tyranny or fortune can inflict;
Either of these is in thy lot,
Samson, with might endued
Above the sons of men; but sight bereaved
May chance to number thee with those Whom patience finally must crown.
This idol's day hath been to thee no day of rest,
Labouring thy mind
More than the working day thy hands,
And yet perhaps more trouble is behind.
For I descry this way
Some other tending, in his hand
A sceptre or quaint° staff he bears, elaborate or elegant
Comes on amain, speed in his look.
By his habit° I discern him now clothing
A public officer, and now at hand.
His message will be short and voluble.° rapid Officer. Hebrews, the prisoner Samson here I seek.
Chorus. His manacles remark him, there he sits.
Officer. Samson, to thee our lords thus bid me say:
This day to Dagon is a solemn feast,
With sacrifices, triumph, pomp, and games;
Thy strength they know surpassing human rate,
And now some public proof thereof require
To honour this great feast, and great assembly;
Rise therefore with all speed and come along,
Where I will see thee heartened and fresh clad

---

[1] van Vanguard, the foremost division of an army; i.e., start your attack.

[2] Astaroth Ancient goddess (also Ashtoreth, Astarte, Ishtar, etc.).

[3] less unconscionable Less excessive, shorter.

[4] Goliah Goliath (see 1 Samuel 17 and 2 Samuel 19–22).

To appear as fits before the illustrious lords.
Samson. Thou know'st I am an Hebrew, therefore tell them,
Our law forbids at their religious rites
My presence; for that cause I cannot come.
Officer. This answer, be assured, will not content them.
Samson. Have they not sword-players, and every sort
Of gymnic artists, wrestlers, riders, runners,
Jugglers and dancers, antics, mummers, mimics,
But they must pick me out with shackles tired,
And over-laboured at their public mill,
To make them sport with blind activity?
Do they not seek occasion of new quarrels
On my refusal to distress me more,
Or make a game of my calamities?
Return the way thou cam'st, I will not come.
Officer. Regard thyself, this will offend them highly.
Samson. Myself? My conscience and internal peace.
Can they think me so broken, so debased
With corporal servitude, that my mind ever
Will condescend to such absurd commands?
Although their drudge, to be their fool or jester,
And in my midst of sorrow and heart-grief
To show them feats, and play before their god,
The worst of all indignities, yet on me
Joined with extreme contempt? I will not come.
Officer. My message was imposed on me with speed,
Brooks no delay: is this thy resolution?
Samson. So take it with what speed thy message needs.
Officer. I am sorry what this stoutness will produce.
Samson. Perhaps thou shalt have cause to sorrow indeed.
Chorus. Consider, Samson; matters now are strained
Up to the highth, whether to hold or break;
He's gone, and who knows how he may report
Thy words by adding fuel to the flame?
Expect another message more imperious,
More lordly thundering than thou well wilt bear.
Samson. Shall I abuse this consecrated gift
Of strength, again returning with my hair
After my great transgression, so requite
Favour renewed, and add a greater sin
By prostituting holy things to idols;
A Nazarite in place abominable
Vaunting my strength in honour to their Dagon?
Besides, how vile, contemptible, ridiculous,
What act more execrably unclean, profane?
Chorus. Yet with this strength thou serv'st the Philistines,
Idolatrous, uncircumcised, unclean.
Samson. Not in their idol-worship, but by labour
Honest and lawful to deserve my food
Of those who have me in their civil power.
Chorus. Where the heart joins not, outward acts defile not.
Samson. Where outward force constrains, the sentence holds:
But who constrains me to the temple of Dagon,
Not dragging? The Philistian lords command.
Commands are no constraints. If I obey them,
I do it freely; venturing to displease
God for the fear of man, and man prefer,
Set God behind: which in his jealousy
Shall never, unrepented, find forgiveness.
Yet that he may dispense with me or thee
Present in temples at idolatrous rites
For some important cause, thou need'st not doubt.
Chorus. How thou wilt here come off surmounts my reach.
Samson. Be of good courage, I begin to feel
Some rousing motions in me which dispose
To something extraordinary my thoughts.
I with this messenger will go along,
Nothing to do, be sure, that may dishonour
Our law, or stain my vow of Nazarite.
If there be aught of presage in the mind,
This day will be remarkable in my life
By some great act, or of my days the last.
Chorus. In time thou hast resolved, the man returns.
Officer. Samson, this second message from our lords
To thee I am bid say. Art thou our slave,
Our captive, at the public mill our drudge,
And dar'st thou at our sending and command
Dispute thy coming? Come without delay;
Or we shall find such engines to assail
And hamper thee, as thou shalt come of force,
Though thou wert firmlier fastened than a rock.
Samson. I could be well content to try their art,
Which to no few of them would prove pernicious.
Yet knowing their advantages too many,
Because they shall not trail me through their streets

Like a wild beast, I am content to go.
Masters' commands come with a power resistless
To such as owe them absolute subjection;
And for a life who will not change his purpose?
(So mutable are all the ways of men)
Yet this be sure, in nothing to comply
Scandalous or forbidden in our law.
Officer. I praise thy resolution, doff these links:
By this compliance thou wilt win the lords
To favour, and perhaps to set thee free.
Samson. Brethren farewell, your company along
I will not wish, lest it perhaps offend them
To see me girt with friends; and how the sight
Of me as of a common enemy,
So dreaded once, may now exasperate them
I know not. Lords are lordliest in their wine;
And the well-feasted priest then soonest fired
With zeal, if aught religion seem concerned:
No less the people on their holy-days
Impetuous, insolent, unquenchable;
Happen what may, of me expect to hear
Nothing dishonourable, impure, unworthy
Our God, our law, my nation, or my self,
The last of me or no I cannot warrant.
Chorus. Go, and the Holy One
Of Israel be thy guide
To what may serve his glory best, and spread his name
Great among the heathen round:
Send thee the angel of thy birth, to stand
Fast by thy side, who from thy father's field
Rode up in flames after his message told
Of thy conception, and be now a shield
Of fire; that spirit that first rushed on thee
In the camp of Dan
Be efficacious in thee now at need.
For never was from heaven imparted
Measure of strength so great to mortal seed,
As in thy wondrous actions hath been seen.
But wherefore comes old Manoa in such haste
With youthful steps? Much livelier than erewhile
He seems: supposing here to find his son,
Or of him bringing to us some glad news?
Manoa. Peace with you brethren; my inducement hither
Was not at present here to find my son,
By order of the lords new parted hence
To come and play before them at their feast.
I heard all as I came, the city rings
And numbers thither flock, I had no will,
Lest I should see him forced to things unseemly.
But that which moved my coming now, was chiefly
To give ye part with me what hope I have
With good success to work his liberty.
Chorus. That hope would much rejoice us to partake
With thee; say reverend sire, we thirst to hear.
Manoa. I have attempted one by one the lords
Either at home, or through the high street passing,
With supplication prone and father's tears
To accept of ransom for my son their prisoner,
Some much averse I found and wondrous harsh,
Contemptuous, proud, set on revenge and spite;
That part most reverenced Dagon and his priests,
Others more moderate seeming, but their aim
Private reward, for which both god and state
They easily would set to sale; a third
More generous far and civil, who confessed
They had enough revenged, having reduced
Their foe to misery beneath their fears,
The rest was magnanimity to remit,
If some convenient ransom were proposed.
What noise or shout was that? It tore the sky.
Chorus. Doubtless the people shouting to behold
Their once great dread, captive, and blind before them,
Or at some proof of strength before them shown.
Manoa. His ransom, if my whole inheritance
May compass it, shall willingly be paid
And numbered down: much rather I shall choose
To live the poorest in my tribe, than richest,
And he in that calamitous prison left.
No, I am fixed not to part hence without him.
For his redemption all my patrimony,
If need be, I am ready to forgo
And quit: not wanting him, I shall want nothing.
Chorus. Fathers are wont to lay up for their sons,
Thou for thy son art bent to lay out all;
Sons wont to nurse their parents in old age,
Thou in old age car'st how to nurse thy son,
Made older than thy age through eyesight lost.
Manoa. It shall be my delight to tend his eyes,
And view him sitting in the house, ennobled

With all those high exploits by him achieved,
And on his shoulders waving down those locks,
That of a nation armed the strength contained:
And I persuade me God had not permitted
His strength again to grow up with his hair
Garrisoned round about him like a camp
Of faithful soldiery, were not his purpose
To use him further yet in some great service,
Not to sit idle with so great a gift
Useless, and thence ridiculous about him.
And since his strength with eyesight was not lost,
God will restore him eyesight to his strength.
Chorus. Thy hopes are not ill founded nor seem vain
Of his delivery, and thy joy thereon
Conceived, agreeable to a father's love,
In both which we, as next,[1] participate.
Manoa. I know your friendly minds and—O what noise!
Mercy of heaven what hideous noise was that!
Horribly loud unlike the former shout.
Chorus. Noise call you it or universal groan
As if the whole inhabitation perished,
Blood, death, and deathful deeds are in that noise,
Ruin, destruction at the utmost point.
Manoa. Of ruin[2] indeed methought I heard the noise,
O it continues, they have slain my son.
Chorus. Thy son is rather slaying them, that outcry
From slaughter of one foe could not ascend.
Manoa. Some dismal accident it needs must be;
What shall we do, stay here or run and see?
Chorus. Best keep together here, lest running thither
We unawares run into danger's mouth.
This evil on the Philistines is fall'n,
From whom could else a general cry be heard?
The sufferers then will scarce molest us here,
From other hands we need not much to fear.
What if his eyesight (for to Israel's God
Nothing is hard) by miracle restored,
He now be dealing dole among his foes,
And over heaps of slaughtered walk his way?
Manoa. That were a joy presumptuous to be thought.
Chorus. Yet God hath wrought things as incredible
For his people of old; what hinders now?
Manoa. He can I know, but doubt to think he will;
Yet hope would fain subscribe, and tempts belief.
A little stay will bring some notice hither.
Chorus. Of good or bad so great, of bad the sooner;
For evil news rides post, while good news baits.° travels slowly
And to our wish I see one hither speeding,
An Hebrew, as I guess, and of our tribe.
Messenger. O whither shall I run, or which way fly
The sight of this so horrid spectacle
Which erst my eyes beheld and yet behold;
For dire imagination still pursues me.
But providence or instinct of nature seems,
Or reason though disturbed, and scarce consulted
To have guided me aright, I know not how,
To thee first reverend Manoa, and to these
My countrymen, whom here I knew remaining,
As at some distance from the place of horror,
So in the sad event too much concerned.
Manoa. The accident was loud, and here before thee
With rueful cry, yet what it was we hear not,
No preface needs, thou seest we long to know.
Messenger. It would burst forth, but I recover breath
And sense distract, to know well what I utter.
Manoa. Tell us the sum, the circumstance defer.
Messenger. Gaza yet stands, but all her sons are fall'n,
All in a moment overwhelmed and fall'n.
Manoa. Sad, but thou know'st to Israelites not saddest
The desolation of a hostile city.
Messenger. Feed on that first, there may in grief be surfeit.
Manoa. Relate by whom.
Messenger. By Samson.
Manoa. That still lessens
The sorrow, and converts it nigh to joy.
Messenger. Ah Manoa I refrain, too suddenly
To utter what will come at last too soon;
Lest evil tidings with too rude irruption
Hitting thy agèd ear should pierce too deep.
Manoa. Suspense in news is torture, speak them out.
Messenger. Then take the worst in brief, Samson is dead.
Manoa. The worst indeed, O all my hope's defeated
To free him hence! But death who sets all free
Hath paid his ransom now and full discharge.
What windy joy this day had I conceived

as next As next of kin (as fellow Danites).

ruin With the Latin sense of fall or collapse (as of a building).

Hopeful of his delivery, which now proves
Abortive as the first-born bloom of spring
Nipped with the lagging rear of winter's frost.
Yet ere I give the reins to grief, say first,
How died he? Death to life is crown or shame.
All by him fell thou say'st, by whom fell he,
What glorious hand gave Samson his death's wound?
Messenger. Unwounded of his enemies he fell.
Manoa. Wearied with slaughter then or how? Explain.
Messenger. By his own hands.
Manoa. Self-violence? What cause
Brought him so soon at variance with himself
Among his foes?
Messenger. Inevitable cause
At once both to destroy and be destroyed;
The edifice where all were met to see him
Upon their heads and on his own he pulled.
Manoa. O lastly over-strong against thyself!
A dreadful way thou took'st to thy revenge.
More than enough we know; but while things yet
Are in confusion, give us if thou canst,
Eye-witness of what first or last was done,
Relation more particular and distinct.
Messenger. Occasions drew me early to this city,
And as the gates I entered with sunrise,
The morning trumpets festival proclaimed
Through each high street: little I had dispatched
When all abroad was rumoured that this day
Samson should be brought forth to show the people
Proof of his mighty strength in feats and games;
I sorrowed at his captive state, but minded
Not to be absent at that spectacle.
The building was a spacious theatre
Half round on two main pillars vaulted high,
With seats where all the lords and each degree
Of sort,° might sit in order to behold; rank
The other side was open, where the throng
On banks and scaffolds under sky might stand;[1]
I among these aloof obscurely stood.
The feast and noon grew high, and sacrifice
Had filled their hearts with mirth, high cheer, and wine,
When to their sports they turned. Immediately
Was Samson as a public servant brought,
In their state livery clad; before him pipes
And timbrels, on each side went armèd guards,
Both horse and foot before him and behind
Archers, and slingers, cataphracts and spears.[2]
At sight of him the people with a shout
Rifted the air clamouring their god with praise,
Who had made their dreadful enemy their thrall.
He patient but undaunted where they led him,
Came to the place, and what was set before him
Which without help of eye might be assayed,
To heave, pull, draw, or break, he still performed
All with incredible, stupendious force,
None daring to appear antagonist.
At length for intermission sake they led him
Between the pillars; he his guide requested
(For so from such as nearer stood we heard)
As over-tired to let him lean a while
With both his arms on those two massy pillars
That to the archèd roof gave main support.
He unsuspicious led him; which when Samson
Felt in his arms, with head a while inclined,
And eyes fast fixed he stood, as one who prayed,
Or some great matter in his mind revolved.
At last with head erect thus cried aloud,
Hitherto, lords, what your commands imposed
I have performed, as reason was, obeying,
Not without wonder or delight beheld.
Now of my own accord such other trial
I mean to show you of my strength, yet greater;
As with amaze shall strike all who behold.
This uttered, straining all his nerves he bowed,
As with the force of winds and waters pent,
When mountains tremble, those two massy pillars
With horrible convulsion to and fro,
He tugged, he shook, till down they came and drew
The whole roof after them, with burst of thunder
Upon the heads of all who sat beneath,
Lords, ladies, captains, counsellors, or priests,
Their choice nobility and flower, not only
Of this but each Philistian city round
Met from all parts to solemnize this feast.
Samson with these immixed, inevitably

[1] The other side … stand See Judges 16.27 and line 1659 below. In the biblical account, the general audience of men and women sits on the building's roof (and so dies when Samson pulls down the pillars).

[2] cataphracts Armored soldiers; spears Spearmen.

Pulled down the same destruction on himself;
The vulgar[1] only scaped who stood without.
Chorus. O dearly-bought revenge, yet glorious!
Living or dying thou hast fulfilled
The work for which thou wast foretold
To Israel, and now li'st victorious
Among thy slain self-killed
Not willingly, but tangled in the fold,
Of dire necessity, whose law in death conjoined
Thee with thy slaughtered foes in number more
Than all thy life had slain before.
Semichorus. While their hearts were jocund and sublime,
Drunk with idolatry, drunk with wine,
And fat regorged of bulls and goats,
Chanting their idol, and preferring
Before our living dread who dwells
In Silo his bright sanctuary:
Among them he a spirit of frenzy sent,
Who hurt their minds,
And urged them on with mad desire
To call in haste for their destroyer;
They only set on sport and play
Unweetingly importuned
Their own destruction to come speedy upon them.
So fond are mortal men
Fall'n into wrath divine,
As their own ruin on themselves to invite,
Insensate left, or to sense reprobate,
And with blindness internal struck.
Semichorus. But he though blind of sight,
Despised and thought extinguished quite,
With inward eyes illuminated
His fiery virtue roused
From under ashes into sudden flame,
And as an evening dragon[2] came,
Assailant on the perchèd roosts,
And nests in order ranged
Of tame villatic° fowl; but as an eagle barnyard
His cloudless thunder bolted on their heads.
So virtue given for lost,
Depressed, and overthrown, as seemed,
Like that self-begotten bird
In the Arabian woods embossed,
That no second knows nor third,
And lay erewhile a holocaust,
From out her ashy womb now teemed,
Revives, reflourishes, then vigorous most
When most unactive deemed,
And though her body die, her fame survives,
A secular bird ages of lives.[3]
Manoa. Come, come, no time for lamentation now,
Nor much more cause, Samson hath quit himself
Like Samson, and heroically hath finished
A life heroic, on his enemies
Fully revenged, hath left them years of mourning,
And lamentation to the sons of Caphtor[4]
Through all Philistian bounds. To Israel
Honour hath left, and freedom, let but them
Find courage to lay hold on this occasion,
To himself and father's house eternal fame;
And which is best and happiest yet, all this
With God not parted from him, as was feared,
But favouring and assisting to the end.
Nothing is here for tears, nothing to wail
Or knock the breast, no weakness, no contempt,
Dispraise, or blame, nothing but well and fair,
And what may quiet us in a death so noble.
Let us go find the body where it lies
Soaked in his enemies' blood, and from the stream
With lavers° pure, and cleansing herbs wash off washbasins
The clotted gore. I with what speed the while (Gaza is not in plight to say us nay)
Will send for all my kindred, all my friends
To fetch him hence and solemnly attend
With silent obsequy and funeral train
Home to his father's house: there will I build him
A monument, and plant it round with shade

[1] vulgar Common people. See Judges 16.28–31 and lines 1609–10 above; Milton alters the biblical account by restricting the slaughter to the Philistines' social, political, military, and religious elite.

[2] as an evening dragon Like a serpent, assailing roosting fowl despite the darkness of night.

[3] self-begotten bird ... of lives The phoenix, supposed as existing only one at a time and reborn periodically out of its own ashes; embossed Imbosked, hidden in a wood; holocaust Sacrifice consumed by fire; secular Living for an age or ages.

[4] sons of Caphtor The Philistines, described in the Bible as coming originally from a place called Caphtor.

Of laurel ever green, and branching palm,
With all his trophies hung, and acts enrolled
In copious legend, or sweet lyric song.
Thither shall all the valiant youth resort,
And from his memory inflame their breasts
To matchless valour, and adventures high:
The virgins also shall on feastful days
Visit his tomb with flowers, only bewailing
His lot unfortunate in nuptial choice,
From whence captivity and loss of eyes.
Chorus. All is best, though we oft doubt,
What the unsearchable dispose
Of highest wisdom brings about,
And ever best found in the close.
Oft he seems to hide his face,
But unexpectedly returns
And to his faithful champion hath in place
Bore witness gloriously; whence Gaza mourns
And all that band them to resist
His uncontrollable intent,
His servants he with new acquist
Of true experience from this great event
With peace and consolation hath dismissed,
And calm of mind all passion spent.

IN CONTEXT

The Biblical Version of the Samson Story

The primary source for Samson Agonistes is the account of Samson's life as presented in Judges 13–16. Milton dramatizes the account, focusing the poem's narrative "present" on a relatively short passage (Judges 16.21–30) but drawing freely on details elsewhere in the biblical narrative. A careful comparison of the biblical text with Milton's version of the story raises many interesting interpretative questions. The version presented here is the King James or Authorized translation, first published in 1611, though Milton was familiar with a wide range of versions and commentaries in various languages, including the original Hebrew.

Judges 13–16

13 And the children of Israel did evil again in the sight of the LORD; and the LORD delivered them into the hand of the Philistines forty years.

[2] And there was a certain man of Zorah, of the family of the Danites, whose name was Manoah; and his wife was barren, and bare not. [3] And the angel of the LORD appeared unto the woman, and said unto her, Behold now, thou art barren, and bearest not: but thou shalt conceive, and bear a son. [4] Now therefore beware, I pray thee, and drink not wine nor strong drink, and eat not any unclean thing: [5] For, lo, thou shalt conceive, and bear a son; and no razor shall come on his head: for the child shall be a Nazarite unto God from the womb: and he shall begin to deliver Israel out of the hand of the Philistines. [6] Then the woman came and told her husband, saying, A man of God came unto me, and his countenance was like the countenance of an angel of God, very terrible: but I asked him not whence he was, neither told he me his name: [7] But he said unto me, Behold, thou shalt conceive, and bear a son; and now drink no wine nor strong drink, neither eat any unclean thing: for the child shall be a Nazarite to God from the womb to the day of his death.

[8] Then Manoah intreated the LORD, and said, O my Lord, let the man of God which thou didst send come again unto us, and teach us what we shall do unto the child that shall be born. [9] And God hearkened to the voice of Manoah; and the angel of God came again unto the woman as she sat in the field: but Manoah her husband was not with her. [10] And the woman made haste, and ran, and shewed her husband, and said unto him, Behold, the man hath appeared unto me, that came unto me the other day. [11] And Manoah arose, and went after his wife, and came to the man, and said unto him, Art thou the man that spakest unto the woman? And he said, I am. [12] And Manoah said, Now let thy words come to pass. How shall we order the child, and how shall we do unto him? [13] And the angel of the LORD said unto Manoah, Of all that I said unto the woman let her beware. [14] She may not eat of any thing that cometh of the vine, neither let her drink wine or strong drink, nor eat any unclean thing: all that I commanded her let her observe.

[15] And Manoah said unto the angel of the LORD, I pray thee, let us detain thee, until we shall have made ready a kid for thee. [16] And the angel of the LORD said unto Manoah, Though thou detain me, I will not eat of thy bread: and if thou wilt offer a burnt offering, thou must offer it unto the LORD. For Manoah knew not that he was an angel of the LORD. [17] And Manoah said unto the angel of the LORD, What is thy name, that when thy sayings come to pass we may do thee honour? [18] And the angel of the LORD said unto him, Why askest thou thus after my name, seeing it is secret? [19] So Manoah took a kid with a meat offering, and offered it upon a rock unto the LORD: and the angel did wonderously; and Manoah and his wife looked on. [20] For it came to pass, when the flame went up toward heaven from off the altar, that the angel of the LORD ascended in the flame of the altar. And Manoah and his wife looked on it, and fell on their faces to the ground.

[21] But the angel of the LORD did no more appear to Manoah and to his wife. Then Manoah knew that he was an angel of the LORD. [22] And Manoah said unto his wife, We shall surely die, because we have seen God. [23] But his wife said unto him, If the LORD were pleased to kill us, he would not have received a burnt offering and a meat offering at our hands, neither would he have shewed us all these things, nor would as at this time have told us such things as these. [24] And the woman bare a son, and called his name Samson: and the child grew, and the LORD blessed him. [25] And the Spirit of the LORD began to move him at times in the camp of Dan between Zorah and Eshtaol.

14 And Samson went down to Timnath, and saw a woman in Timnath of the daughters of the Philistines. [2] And he came up, and told his father and his mother, and said, I have seen a woman in Timnath of the daughters of the Philistines: now therefore get her for me to wife. [3] Then his father and his mother said unto him, Is there never a woman among the daughters of thy brethren, or among all my people, that thou goest to take a wife of the uncircumcised Philistines? And Samson said unto his father, Get her for me; for she pleaseth me well.

[4] But his father and his mother knew not that it was of the LORD, that he sought an occasion against the Philistines: for at that time the Philistines had dominion over Israel.

[5] Then went Samson down, and his father and his mother, to Timnath, and came to the vineyards of Timnath: and, behold, a young lion roared against him. [6] And the Spirit of the LORD came mightily upon him, and he rent him as he would have rent a kid, and he had nothing in his hand: but he told not his father or his mother what he had done. [7] And he went down, and talked with the woman; and she pleased Samson well. [8] And after a time he returned to take her, and he turned aside to see the carcase of the lion: and, behold, there was a swarm of bees and honey in the carcase of the lion. [9] And he took thereof in his hands, and went on eating, and came to his father and mother, and he gave them, and they did eat: but he told not them that he had taken the honey out of the carcase of the lion.

[10] So his father went down unto the woman: and Samson made there a feast; for so used the young men to do. [11] And it came to pass, when they saw him, that they brought thirty companions to be with him. [12] And Samson said unto them, I will now put forth a riddle unto you: if ye can certainly declare it me within the seven days of the feast, and find it out, then I will give you thirty sheets and thirty change of garments: [13] But if ye cannot declare it me, then shall ye give me thirty sheets and thirty change of garments. And they said unto him, Put forth thy riddle, that we may hear it. [14] And he said unto them,

Out of the eater came forth meat,
and out of the strong came forth sweetness.

And they could not in three days expound the riddle.

[15] And it came to pass on the seventh day, that they said unto Samson's wife, Entice thy husband, that he may declare unto us the riddle, lest we burn thee and thy father's house with fire: have ye called us to take that we have? is it not so? [16] And Samson's wife wept before him, and said, Thou dost but hate me, and lovest me not: thou hast put forth a riddle unto the children of my people, and hast not told it me. And he said unto her, Behold, I have not told it my father nor my mother, and shall I tell it thee? [17] And she wept before him the seven days, while their feast lasted: and it came to pass on the seventh day, that he told her, because she lay sore upon him: and she told the riddle to the children of her people. [18] And the men of the city said unto him on the seventh day before the sun went down,

What is sweeter than honey?
And what is stronger than a lion?

And he said unto them,

If ye had not plowed with my heifer,
ye had not found out my riddle.

[19] And the Spirit of the LORD came upon him, and he went down to Ashkelon, and slew thirty men of them, and took their spoil, and gave change of garments unto them which expounded the riddle. And his anger was kindled, and he went up to his father's house. [20] But Samson's wife was given to his companion, whom he had used as his friend.

15 But it came to pass within a while after, in the time of wheat harvest, that Samson visited his wife with a kid; and he said, I will go in to my wife into the chamber. But her father would not suffer him to go in. [2] And her father said, I verily thought that thou hadst utterly hated her; therefore I gave her to thy companion: is not her younger sister fairer than she? take her, I pray thee, instead of her. [3] And Samson said concerning them, Now shall I be more blameless than the Philistines, though I do them a displeasure. [4] And Samson went and caught three hundred foxes, and took firebrands, and turned tail to tail, and put a firebrand in the midst between two tails. [5] And when he had set the brands on fire, he let them go into the standing corn of the Philistines, and burnt up both the shocks, and also the standing corn, with the vineyards and olives. [6] Then the Philistines said, Who hath done this? And they answered, Samson, the son in law of the Timnite, because he had taken his wife, and given her to his companion. And the Philistines came up, and burnt her and her father with fire. [7] And Samson said unto them, Though ye have done this, yet will I be avenged of you, and after that I will cease. [8] And he smote them hip and thigh with a great slaughter: and he went down and dwelt in the top of the rock Etam.

[9] Then the Philistines went up, and pitched in Judah, and spread themselves in Lehi. [10] And the men of Judah said, Why are ye come up against us? And they answered, To bind Samson are we come up, to do to him as he hath done to us. [11] Then three thousand men of Judah went to the top of the rock Etam, and said to Samson, Knowest thou not that the Philistines are rulers over us? what is this that thou hast done unto us? And he said unto them, As they did unto me, so have I done unto them. [12] And they said unto him, We are come down to bind thee, that we may deliver thee into the hand of the Philistines. And Samson said unto them, Swear unto me, that ye will not fall upon me yourselves. [13] And they spake unto him, saying, No; but we will bind thee fast, and deliver thee into their hand: but surely we will not kill thee. And they bound him with two new cords, and brought him up from the rock.

[14] And when he came unto Lehi, the Philistines shouted against him: and the Spirit of the LORD came mightily upon him, and the cords that were upon his arms became as flax that was burnt with fire, and his bands loosed from off his hands. [15] And he found a new jawbone of an ass, and put forth his hand, and took it, and slew a thousand men therewith. [16] And Samson said,

With the jawbone of an ass,
    heaps upon heaps,
with the jaw of an ass
    have I slain a thousand men.

[17] And it came to pass, when he had made an end of speaking, that he cast away the jawbone out of his hand, and called that place Ramathlehi.

[18] And he was sore athirst, and called on the LORD, and said, Thou hast given this great deliverance into the hand of thy servant: and now shall I die for thirst, and fall into the hand of the uncircumcised? [19] But God clave an hollow place that was in the jaw, and there came water thereout; and when he had drunk, his spirit came again, and he revived: wherefore he called the name thereof Enhakkore, which is in Lehi unto this day. [20] And he judged Israel in the days of the Philistines twenty years.

16 Then went Samson to Gaza, and saw there an harlot, and went in unto her. [2] And it was told the Gazites, saying, Samson is come hither. And they compassed him in, and laid wait for him all night in the gate of the city, and were quiet all the night, saying, In the morning, when it is day, we shall kill him. [3] And Samson lay till midnight, and arose at midnight, and took the doors of the gate of the city, and the two posts, and went away with them, bar and all, and put them upon his shoulders, and carried them up to the top of an hill that is before Hebron.

[4] And it came to pass afterward, that he loved a woman in the valley of Sorek, whose name was Delilah. [5] And the lords of the Philistines came up unto her, and said unto her, Entice him, and see wherein his great strength lieth, and by what means we may prevail against him, that we may bind him to afflict him; and we will give thee every one of us eleven hundred pieces of silver. [6] And Delilah said to Samson, Tell me, I pray thee, wherein thy great strength lieth, and wherewith thou mightest be bound to afflict thee. [7] And Samson said unto her, If they bind me with seven green withes that were never dried, then shall I be weak, and be as another man. [8] Then the lords of the Philistines brought up to her seven green withes which had not been dried, and she bound him with them. [9] Now there were men lying in wait, abiding with her in the chamber. And she said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he brake the withes, as a thread of tow is broken when it toucheth the fire. So his strength was not known.

[10] And Delilah said unto Samson, Behold, thou hast mocked me, and told me lies: now tell me, I pray thee, wherewith thou mightest be bound. [11] And he said unto her, If they bind me fast with new ropes that never were occupied, then shall I be weak, and be as another man. [12] Delilah therefore took new ropes, and bound him therewith, and said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And there were liers in wait abiding in the chamber. And he brake them from off his arms like a thread.

[13] And Delilah said unto Samson, Hitherto thou hast mocked me, and told me lies: tell me wherewith thou mightest be bound. And he said unto her, If thou weavest the seven locks of my head with the web. [14] And she fastened it with the pin, and said unto him, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awaked out of his sleep, and went away with the pin of the beam, and with the web.

[15] And she said unto him, How canst thou say, I love thee, when thine heart is not with me? thou hast mocked me these three times, and hast not told me wherein thy great strength lieth. [16] And it came to pass, when she pressed him daily with her words, and urged him, so that his soul was vexed unto death; [17] That he told her all his heart, and said unto her, There hath not come a razor upon mine head; for I have been a Nazarite unto God from my mother's womb: if I be shaven, then my strength will go from me, and I shall become weak, and be like any other man.

[18] And when Delilah saw that he had told her all his heart, she sent and called for the lords of the Philistines, saying, Come up this once, for he hath shewed me all his heart. Then the lords of the Philistines came up unto her, and brought money in their hand. [19] And she made him sleep upon her knees; and she called for a man, and she caused him to shave off the seven locks of his head; and she began to afflict him, and his strength went from him. [20] And she said, The Philistines be upon thee, Samson. And he awoke out of his sleep, and said, I will go out as at other times before, and shake myself. And he wist not that the LORD was departed from him. [21] But the Philistines took him, and put out his eyes, and brought him down to Gaza, and bound him with fetters of brass; and he did grind in the prison house. [22] Howbeit the hair of his head began to grow again after he was shaven.

[23] Then the lords of the Philistines gathered them together for to offer a great sacrifice unto Dagon their god, and to rejoice: for they said, Our god hath delivered Samson our enemy into our hand. [24] And when the people saw him, they praised their god: for they said, Our god hath delivered into our hands our enemy, and the destroyer of our country, which slew many of us. [25] And it came to pass, when their hearts were merry, that they said, Call for Samson, that he may make us sport. And they called for Samson out of the prison house; and he made them sport: and they set him between the pillars. [26] And Samson said unto the lad that held him by the hand, Suffer me that I may feel the pillars whereupon the house standeth, that I may lean upon them. [27] Now the house was full of men and women; and all the lords of the Philistines were there; and there were upon the roof about three thousand men and women, that beheld while Samson made sport.

[28] And Samson called unto the LORD, and said, O Lord God, remember me, I pray thee, and strengthen me, I pray thee, only this once, O God, that I may be at once avenged of the Philistines for my two eyes. [29] And Samson took hold of the two middle pillars upon which the house stood, and on which it was borne up, of the one with his right hand, and of the other with his left. [30] And Samson said, Let me die with the Philistines. And he bowed himself with all his might; and the house fell upon the lords, and upon all the people that were therein. So the dead which he slew at his death were more than they which he slew in his life. [31] Then his brethren and all the house of his father came down, and took him, and brought him up, and buried him between Zorah and Eshtaol in the burying place of Manoah his father. And he judged Israel twenty years.

LEVELLERS, DIGGERS, RANTERS, AND COVENANTERS

CONTEXTS

Much as we may tend to think of the civil wars of the mid-seventeenth century in terms of military conflict between King and Parliament—with Ireland and Scotland playing major roles as well—the 1640s were also shaped by battles over foundational political, social, and religious ideas. The collapse of licensing controls over publication at the start of the wars led to a flood of pamphlets voicing ideas for reform on every conceivable political, social, and religious issue. The intense public debates generated by the civil wars created a kind of hothouse intellectual environment, producing many ideas over the course of a decade that would have seemed unthinkable before 1640. Some of these ideas, especially those about the sources, nature, and boundaries of political authority, shaped the political settlement that followed the Restoration: the monarch might have returned, but the monarchy was not what it was before the wars. By the later seventeenth century, British culture had in many ways become recognizably modern. But the 1640s also saw the development of ideas that went far beyond what most of their contemporaries were willing to consider, including the first flowerings of radical critique of this burgeoning modern world. Many of these ideas did not survive the Restoration, but went underground, emerging again to influence the reform movements and revolutions of the eighteenth and nineteenth century, including the American Revolution.

Among these more radical groups were the Levellers, often considered the first political party in England. Originating among radicalized soldiers and officers in Cromwell's New Model Army but soon including civilian representatives and polemicists (including an organized group of "Leveller wives"), the Levellers argued for such reforms as universal suffrage (for men), popular sovereignty, freedom of religion, a written constitution, and equality before the law and trial by jury for all citizens. Another group, called the "True Levellers" or "Diggers," argued for the division of (or outright abolition of) private property. Their leader, Gerrard Winstanley, led the group in the practice of digging up and cultivating common land (which comprised nearly a third of all land in England at the time). This land had not been enclosed, but property rights to it had been claimed by various landowners.

Another loosely connected group, the so-called "Ranters," were in agreement with the Diggers that property should be held in common, not by private individuals. On certain other social and religious issues, however, they took more extreme positions than any of the Levellers, believing that God could be found in the soul of every creature (including non-humans) and arguing against all forms of hierarchy (thereby maintaining that neither the government nor the established church should have authority over individual souls). Tending far more towards mysticism than either the Levellers or the Diggers, the Ranters are also far more difficult to categorize as anything resembling a unified group.

The Levellers, Diggers, and Ranters were all active primarily in England; discontent in Scotland took different forms. It acquired a strong focus in the summer of 1637, when King Charles I and William Laud, the Archbishop of Canterbury, attempted to introduce a revised Prayer Book for use in the Church of Scotland. Many Scots, however, failed to see why an English desire for uniformity of worship should necessitate change in Scotland. The new liturgy became a focus for discontent against an English government that had imposed numerous administrative, legal, and religious changes on Scotland over the previous decade. Riots greeted readings of the new service; thus began a two-year chain of events that is often called the Scottish Revolution. In February 1638, Scots drafted the National Covenant, vowing to withstand innovations and maintain the Presbyterian cause. Charles tried to subdue the Covenanters by force, but a series of compromises and English humiliations culminated in the Scottish occupation of Newcastle. The two "Bishops' Wars" (1639–40) played a significant role in the buildup to the civil wars that would soon engulf England, Scotland, and Ireland, the three nations Charles ruled.

Information from the Scottish Nation, printed originally as a broadsheet, was published in August 1640, just before the Scottish army entered England to take Newcastle. Scottish agents and sympathizers circulated copies among the soldiers of the English army and the citizens of northern towns. The purpose of the document was to allay fears about the invasion, and to attempt to convince English readers that they shared with the Scots common grievances and a common enemy—the powers in London that sought, the Scots argued, to undermine the religious and political liberties of British subjects. Soon afterward, the Scots took Newcastle, which gave them control over much of England's coal supply. Charles was compelled to summon Parliament in November 1640, and the public debate over the sources and boundaries of royal authority initiated by the Scottish pamphlet campaign would soon be continued by Parliamentary writers in England.

By autumn 1647, the New Model Army was the dominant power in England, occupying London and holding the King prisoner at Hampton Court. Army, Parliament, and King, each one distrusting the other two, began to negotiate a political and religious settlement. It was at this point that the Levellers—at that point a new group—entered the discussion by publishing their demands. A well-organized party of political radicals, the Levellers asked the Council of the Army to sponsor public debates about the various solutions and plans that had been proposed; the Council agreed, recognizing that the Levellers enjoyed the support of many sympathizers in both the army and the civilian population. Held in Putney church in late October and early November 1647, these debates were recorded by William Clarke, secretary to the Council; the (contemporary) transcription of his shorthand notes—included in the online component of the anthology—constitutes one of the most extraordinary documents to survive from the era. That these debates were held at all is remarkable: for the moment at least, the Levellers were serious participants in the political process, and their rethinking of fundamental political and social principles exemplifies how far radical theory had gone in five years of war. In addition, the Putney debates let us hear the sound of seventeenth-century political discussion.

William Walwyn (1600–81) was a leader of the Leveller movement and the author of some of the civil war period's most remarkable arguments for religious toleration, freedom of conscience, and the ability of individuals to form their own judgments on important issues without deferring to political or religious authorities. The younger son of a Worcester gentleman, Walwyn was apprenticed to the silk trade and by the late 1630s had become a master weaver and a moderately prosperous merchant with a love for reading. He published the first of his approximately thirty pamphlets in 1641. Many of these works display Walwyn's general opposition to political and religious authoritarianism. While he remained associated with the Presbyterian church throughout the civil wars, Walwyn challenged not only royal absolutism but also Presbyterian intolerance, particularly in a series of remarkably forward-looking pamphlets in response to Thomas Edwards (c. 1599–1648), a Church of England clergyman whose Gangraena (1646) attacked "the Errors, Heresies, Blasphemies, and insolent Proceedings of the Sectaries of these times." Less flamboyant than the other Leveller leaders (John Lilburne and Richard Overton), Walwyn complemented their work by focussing on the principles of justice, reason, and equity that underlay the Leveller platform. Some hostile contemporaries thought Walwyn's reasoned, persuasive arguments and his intellectual coherence made him the most dangerous Leveller polemicist. After the collapse of the Leveller movement and a period of imprisonment in 1649, Walwyn took an oath of loyalty to the Commonwealth government and resumed a quiet life: his only subsequent political pamphlet was a defence of the "fundamental essential liberty" of trial by jury against a proposal to replace juries with judges. He also supported proposals for free trade, a basic Leveller tenet.

The Bloody Project displays Walwyn's central concern for the liberty of the individual conscience. Published in August 1648 at the height of the Second Civil War, the document asks soldiers on both sides if they truly knew why they were being asked to kill their fellow Englishmen. He urges his readers to examine the political and religious rhetoric used to justify the war, and points out how neither side had lived up to the promises implied in their rhetoric. The pamphlet concludes by asking what causes are truly worth fighting for, and answers the question with a sketch of key elements in the Leveller platform, including the supremacy of the Commons, religious toleration, and social and legal reform.

Born in Warwick, and educated at the grammar school there, Abiezer Coppe (1619–72?) entered All Souls College, Oxford in 1636, transferring later to Merton College. He left without taking a degree, and his subsequent spiritual journey took him through increasingly radical religious beliefs: Coppe became a Presbyterian, then a Baptist, and claimed to have preached throughout Warwickshire during the 1640s. His earliest writings, dating from 1649, are pointedly "antinomian"—that is, they argue that true belief frees Christians from the need to observe moral law.

Also in 1649, Coppe was imprisoned in Warwick, where he had a vision ordering him to go to London and proclaim the judgment of God against the "great ones of the earth." The message he delivered in sermons on the streets of London and in the two parts of A Fiery Flying Roll combined radical religious and political ideas. Coppe adopts a prophetic voice and a mystical, millennial antinomianism, but at the same time denounces economic and social privilege in terms that align him with writers such as the Leveller John Lilburne and the Digger Gerrard Winstanley (Coppe describes God as "the mighty Leveller" throughout A Fiery Flying Roll). Coppe's distinctive style of writing reflects his effort to render mystical experience into words—an attempt he admits is impossible. His lack of faith in language's ability to name and describe inner experience was shared by several writers usually grouped together as Ranters; their belief that language was a code, that words as well as actions were only shadows or signs of an ineffable spiritual reality, represents the culmination of one tradition of seventeenth-century religious writing.

A Fiery Flying Roll (the two parts were issued together) was immediately controversial. The work was denounced as "Mad, and Blasphemous," and in February 1650 all copies were ordered to be burned "by the Hand of the Hangman." Coppe was imprisoned and in 1651 recanted, but he appears to have continued to preach. After the Restoration he changed his name to Hiam or Higham and combined preaching with a medical practice in Surrey, where he died around 1672. Coppe is sometimes described as a Ranter leader, but it is important to remember that most of what is known of the Ranters comes from hostile opponents. Seeking to define what was most threatening in a period of rapid social and political change, their accounts possibly overstated the extent to which the Ranters were an organized group.

Born in Lancashire, the son of a mercer (a dealer in fabrics), Gerrard Winstanley (1609–76?) worked in the London cloth trade until his business failed in 1643, when he moved to Cobham in Surrey (where he probably raised cattle in a modest way). Most of the twenty or so pamphlets and broadsheets for which he is known date from the period 1648–52, when he was a leader of the radical Digger movement. The evidence of his activities after his last publication is patchy: over the next two decades he divided his time between London and his farm in Surrey, held various administrative offices in Cobham, became affiliated with the Quakers, rose socially (he is described in some documents as a gentleman), and died in London in 1676, described in local Quaker records as a corn chandler.

Winstanley's early pamphlets participate in the tradition of radical religious mysticism represented by Ranter writers such as Lawrence Clarkson and Abiezer Coppe. Like Coppe, Winstanley's search for scripture's spiritual meaning led to a concern for social justice: Hell, he believed, was a mechanism of control used by clerics and the rich to oppress the poor. But Winstanley is best known for the political revelation that led to the Digger movement, a vision of agrarian communism first proclaimed in The New Law of Righteousness (1649) and set out in its most elaborate form in his last publication, The Law of Freedom in a Platform (1652). Winstanley argued that men could be free only when private property was abolished, all had access to the land and worked it in common, and no one worked for wages: social and economic inequities, he wrote, were a function of inequities in the distribution of property. Several Digger communes were founded to put these ideas into practice; the most famous was on St. George's Hill, near Winstanley's home in Cobham. Winstanley and others began to till the commons land there in April 1649; alarmed local landowners complained to Thomas Fairfax and the Council of State, who proved not to share their anxieties. But the owners persisted, pursued the Diggers in court, and led a mob to trample their crops. The Diggers resettled nearby, but were finally driven out in 1650. The experiment and the attempts to suppress it were widely reported at the time. The Declaration included here was the second of two manifestos published to explain the project.

While the Digger movement is best known for Winstanley's political writings, Digger communities around the country produced a variety of texts, including songs written to popularize their cause. In 1650, the Digger community on St. George's Hill published The Diggers Mirth, a short pamphlet containing "verses composed and fitted to tunes, for the delight and recreation of all those who Dig, or own that work, in the Commonwealth of England." "The Diggers' Song" included here was not among the songs published at the time; it was discovered in the manuscript papers of William Clarke, secretary to Oliver Cromwell's Council of War. Like the other Digger songs, it is of uncertain authorship, though its similarity to verses scattered in Winstanley's pamphlets has led some to credit him with writing it.

Information from the Scottish Nation (1640)

Information from the Scottish Nation, to all the True English, Concerning the Present Expedition

Our distresses in our religion and liberties being of late more pressing than we were able to bear; our supplications and commissions, which were the remedies used by us for our relief, were after many delays and repulses, answered at last with the terrors of an army coming to our borders; a peace[1] was concluded, but not observed: And when we did complain of the breach, and supplicate for the performance, our commissioners were hardly entreated; new and great preparations were made for war; and many acts of hostility done against us, both by sea and land. In this case to send new commissioners or supplications, were against experience, and hopeless; to maintain an army on the borders is above our strength, and cannot be a safety unto us by sea: To retire homeward, were to call on our enemies to follow us, and to make ourselves and our country, a prey by land, as our ships and goods are made at sea. We are therefore constrained at this time to come into England, not to make war, but for seeking our relief and preservation.

Duty obliges us to love England as ourselves: Your grievances are ours; the preservation or ruin of religion and liberties, is common to both nations: We must now stand or fall together. Suffer not therefore malice and calumny to prevail so far as to persuade, that we come to make war, we call Heaven and Earth to witness, that we are far from such intentions, and that we have no purpose to fight, except we be forced, and in our own defence (as we have more fully expressed in our large Declaration)[1] we come to get assurance of the enjoying of our religion and liberties in peace against invasion: and that the authors of all our grievances[2] and yours being tried in Parliament, and our wrongs redressed, the two kingdoms may live in greater love and unity than ever before, which to our common rejoicing, we may confidently expect from the goodness of God, if the wicked counsels of papists, prelates and other fire-brands their adherents be not more harkened unto, than our true and honest Declarations.

[1] a peace The Pacification of Berwick (18 June 1639) concluded the first Bishops' War, but proved to be a compromise that satisfied neither the Scots nor the English.

And where it may be conceived, that an army cannot come into England but they will waste and spoil; we declare, that no soldiers shall be allowed to commit any outrage, or do the smallest wrong, but shall be punished with severity:[3] That we shall take neither meat nor drink, nor anything else, but for our moneys: and when our moneys are spent; for sufficient surety, which by public order shall be given to all such as shall furnish us things necessary. We neither have spared, nor will we spare our pains, fortunes, and lives in this cause of our assurance and your deliverance: and therefore cannot look from any well-affected to truth and peace, to be either opposed by force and unjust violence in our peaceable passage, or to be discouraged by willful or uncharitable with-holding of means for our sustentation on our way. We are brethren: Your worthy predecessors at the time of Reformation,[4] vouchsafed us their help and assistance. We have for many years lived in love: we have common desires of the purity of religion and quietness of both Kingdoms: our hopes are to see better days in this island: our enemies also are common: Let us not upon their suggestions or our own apprehensions, be friends to them, and enemies to ourselves: We desire nothing but what in the like extremity (which we pray God your nation never find) we would most gladly upon the like Declaration grant unto you, coming with your supplications to the King's Majesty, were he living amongst us, and what ye would we should do unto you, we trust ye will be moved to do even so unto us, that the blessing of God may rest upon both.

William Walwyn, The Bloody Project (1648)

In all undertakings which may occasion war or bloodshed, men have great need to be sure that their cause be right, both in respect of themselves and others: for if they kill men themselves, or cause others to kill, without a just cause, and upon the extremest necessity, they not only disturb the peace of men, and families, and bring misery and poverty upon a nation, but are indeed absolute murderers.

Nor will it in any measure satisfy the conscience, or God's justice, to go on in uncertainties, for in doubtful cases men ought to stand still, and consider, until certainty do appear, especially when killing and slaying of men (the most horrid work to nature and scripture) is in question.

Far be it from any man hastily to engage in any undertaking which may occasion a war, before the cause he is to fight for be rightly and plainly stated, well considered, and thoroughly understood to be just, and of absolute necessity to be maintained; nothing being more abominable in the sight of God or good men, than such persons who run but to shed blood for money, or to support this or the other interest, but neither consider the cause for which they engage, nor ought else, but pay, interest, honour, &c. Such are they who so eagerly endeavour to support the interest of a King, by the destruction of the people's interest; the interest of the Scots against the interest of the English; the interest of the Independents, by the ruin of the Presbyterians:[5] and Independents rejected not only episcopacy (church government by bishops) but also the hierarchical system of national church government advocated by Presbyterians, favoring instead control by individual congregations. Confusingly, because it best consists with their present honour, profit, or humours, make it their business to pick quarrels, and increase divisions and jealousies, that so they may fish in the waters which they themselves have troubled.

But let such know, who ever they be, that though they may and do for a while brave it out, and flourish, yet a time is coming, and draweth on apace, when for all the murders they have caused, and mischiefs they have committed, they shall come to judgement, and then their consciences will be as a thousand witnesses against them.

But especially let men pretending conscience take heed how they either engage themselves, or persuade others to engage to fight and kill men, for a cause not rightly stated, or not thoroughly understood to be just, and of necessity to be maintained; for it is one of the most unreasonable, unchristian, and unnatural things that can enter into the mind of man, though it be to be feared that more than a few that have of late, both in the city and country, been (and at present are) active to engage in killing and slaying of men, cannot acquit themselves of this abomination.

I beseech you (you that are so forward and active to engage in the defence of the King's, Presbyterian, or Independent interest, and yet know no just cause for either) consider, was it sufficient that the King at first invited you in general terms to join with him, for the defence of the true Protestant religion, his own just prerogatives, the privileges of Parliament, and the liberty of the subject; but never declared in particular what that Protestant religion was he would have defended, or what prerogative would please him, what privileges he would allow the Parliament, or what freedoms the people?

Or was it sufficient think you now, that the Parliament invited you at first upon general terms to fight for the maintenance of the true Protestant religion, the liberties of the people, and privileges of Parliament; when neither themselves knew, for ought is yet seen, nor you, nor anybody else, what they meant by the true Protestant religion, or what the liberties of the people were, or what those privileges of Parliament were, for which yet nevertheless thousands of men have been slain, and thousands of families destroyed?

It is very like that some of you that joined with the King upon his invitation thought that, though the King had formerly countenanced popery and superstition, [and] had stretched his prerogative to the oppression and destruction of his people, by patents, projects,[1] &c., yet for the future he would have been more zealous for the truth, and more tender of his people, and not have persisted (notwithstanding his new protestations) to maintain his old principles.

And so likewise many of you that joined with the Parliament, who had formerly seen, felt, or considered the persecution of godly conscientious people by the Bishops and their clergy, with the reproaches cast upon them, and their grievous and destructive imprisonment, did believe the Parliament, under the notion of religion, intended to free the nation from all compulsion in matters of religion, and from molestation or persecution for opinions, or non-conformity; and that all laws or statutes tending thereunto should have been repealed: But since you find (by killing and destroying their opposers) you have enabled them to perform all things that might concern your freedom, or be conducible to the peace of the Kingdom. But do you now find that they do mean that, or the contrary? And will your consciences give you leave any longer to fight or engage in the cause of religion, when already you see what fruits you and your friends reap thereby?

And no doubt many of you understood by the liberties of the people, that they intended to free the Commons in Parliament, the people's representative, from a negative voice[2] in King or Lords, and would have declared themselves the highest authority, and so would have proceeded to have removed the grievances of the Commonwealth: And when you had seen patents, projects, and ship money[3] taken away, the High Com-historians distinguish between religious and "political" Independents in this period: while similar in their belief in toleration and their dislike of any sort of coercive national church, the two groups were not identical. Political Independents represented an unstable grouping of more radical political factions. Some historians also distinguish "political" from religious Presbyterians.

[1] patents, projects Trade monopolies and business schemes. Despite Parliamentary and popular opposition, King Charles I had continued the traditional practice of awarding aristocratic favorites with highly profitable monopolies on the manufacture of or trade in commodities (e.g., salt, sweet wine, oil, lead, bottles); holders of these patents frequently raised the price of the commodity to increase their profits.

[2] negative voice Power of veto.

[3] ship money Controversial and unpopular tax levied by Charles I from 1635 to 1640.

mission and Star Chamber[1] abolished, did you ever imagine to have seen men and women examined upon interrogatories, and questions against themselves,[2] and imprisoned for refusing to answer? Or to have seen Commoners frequently sentenced and imprisoned by the Lords? Did you ever dream that the oppressions of Committees would have exceeded those of the Council table;[3] or that in the place of patents and projects, you should have seen an excise established, ten-fold surpassing all those and ship money together? You thought rather that tithes would have been esteemed an oppression, and that trade would have been made perfectly free, and that customs if continued would have been abated, and not raised for the support of domineering factions, and enrichment of four or five great men, as they have been of late times, to the sorrow and astonishment of all honest men, and the great prejudice of the trade of the nation.

Doubtless you hoped that both laws and lawyers, and the proceeding in all courts, should have been abbreviated, and corrected, and that you should never more have seen a beggar in England.

You have seen the Commonwealth enslaved for want of Parliaments, and also by their sudden dissolution, and you rejoiced that this Parliament was not to be dissolved by the King; but did you conceive it would have sat seven years to so little purpose, or that it should ever have come to pass, to be esteemed a crime to move for the ending thereof? Was the perpetuating of this Parliament, and the oppressions they have brought upon you and yours, a part of that liberty of the people you fought for? Or was it for such a privilege of Parliament, that they only might have liberty to oppress at their pleasure, without any hope of remedy? If all these put together make not up the cause for which you fought, what was the cause? What have ye obtained to the people but these liberties, for they must not be called oppressions? These are the fruits of all those vast disbursements, and those thousands of lives that have been spent and destroyed in the late War.

And though the army seemed to be sensible of these gross jugglings, and declared and engaged against them, and professed that they took not pains as a mercenary army, hired to fight for the arbitrary ends of a state, but in judgement and conscience, for the preservation of their own and the people's just rights and liberties: Yet when they had prevailed against those their particular opposers, and accomplished the ends by them aimed at, all these things were forgotten, and those persons that appeared for the people's freedoms, by them esteemed and proceeded against as mutineers, or incendiaries.

In like manner, the present ruling party of Presbyterians make a great show of their apprehensions of the great slavery and servitude brought upon the people by the exercise of an arbitrary power in the Parliament, and by the jurisdiction of the sword in the hands of the army: They tell us that by this means the trade of the nation is destroyed, and that without the removal of these things, the peace of the nation cannot be secured. And it is exceeding true. But I beseech you consider, whether they do not revive the same play, and drive the same design, which was acted by the Parliament at first, and by the army the last summer.

First, they cry out against the exercise of an arbitrary power in the Parliament, and yet labour to invest it in the King, nay challenge the exercise of it by themselves: for what greater arbitrary power can there be in the world, than that a priest or two, and a few lay elders, under the name of a Presbytery, should have power to bind or loose, bring in, or cast out, save or destroy at their pleasure, and enforce all persons within the limits of their jurisdiction to believe as they believe and submit to whatever they command, or else to be by them delivered over to Satan.

Nay, if you look into those of that party of the magistracy of this city that are the great promoters of the present work: do there any men in the world exercise a more arbitrary power? Do not many of them act only by the rule of will and pleasure, and have they not openly professed themselves to be obliged to observe no other rule than discretion?

[1] High Commission and Star Chamber Respectively, the most unpopular ecclesiastical and secular courts. Both were associated with the maintenance of royal authority, and both were abolished by the Long Parliament.

[2] questions against themselves Referring to the notorious oath ex officio, which required prisoners to answer questions against themselves even in the absence of the traditional two witnesses. The right against self-incrimination was a central plank in the Leveller platform of legal reform: Walwyn himself was jailed in 1649 for refusing on principle to answer questions.

[3] Committees … Council table I.e., did you ever dream that committees of the House of Commons would prove as oppressive as the King's Privy Council?

And though they decry against the power of the sword in the hands of the Independents, yet do they not with all their might labour to get it into the hands of the Presbyterians? and being there, will they not do that themselves, which they complain of in others? will they not say that there are gainsayers whose mouths must be stopped and with the sword rather than fail, and though Royalists or Independents may not use the sword to enforce their principles, yet Presbyterians may, as if all knowledge of the truth were centred in a Presbytery, consisting of half Scotch, half English, part Puritan, part Cavalier, lukewarm Christianity, neither hot nor cold, zealous for the truth which they know not, only by hearsay, and only because they love not Independency, that being too pure, nor Episcopacy, that being too profane, they will be between both (but not in a golden mean, for that were well), but more zealous than either in outward performances, but for the power of godliness. I cease to judge, but we say we may know the tree by the fruit, and certain I am that thistles never bore figs.

But if you shall examine what grounds of freedom they propose in all their papers; what equal rules of justice they offer to be insisted on as a sure foundation for a lasting peace? Surely if you look but seriously into the bottom of their design, you will find that the peace they aim at is only their own, not the nation's; and that their own ease, honour and dominion, is the only thing they pursue, and so they could enjoy ease and plenty, and stretch themselves upon beds of down, they would never care what the poor country should suffer.

To be short, all the quarrel we have at this day in the kingdom, is no other than a quarrel of interests and parties, a pulling down of one tyrant to set up another, and instead of liberty, heaping upon ourselves a greater slavery than that we fought against: certainly this is the liberty that is so much strove for, and for which there are such fresh endeavours to engage men; but if you have not killed and destroyed men enough for this, go on and destroy, kill and slay, till your consciences are swollen so full with the blood of the people that they burst again, and upon your deathbeds may you see yourselves the most horrid murderers that ever lived, since the time that Cain killed his brother without a just cause; for where, or what is your cause? Believe it ye have a heavy reckoning to make, and must undergo a sad repentance, or it will go ill with you at the great day, when all the sophistry of your great reformers will serve you to little purpose, every man for himself being to give an account for the things which he hath done in the body, whether they be good or evil. Then it will serve you to little purpose to say, the King, Parliament, Army, Independents, Presbyterians, such an officer, magistrate, or minister deluded me; no more than it did Adam,[1] to say the woman whom thou gavest, &c. It being thus decreed in heaven, the soul which sinneth shall surely die.

And though what is past cannot be recalled, yet it must be repented of, and special care taken for the future, that you sin no more in this kind, and either stand still or go right for the future, to which end, let these following directions be your guide.

1. You are to know, that a people living under a government, as this nation hath done, and doth, cannot lawfully put themselves into arms, or engage in war, to kill and slay men, but upon a lawful call and invitation from the supreme authority, or law-making power.

Now if the supreme authority of this nation were never yet so plainly declared, as that you understand certainly where it is, and who are invested therewith, you have then had no warrant for what you have done, nor have any plea in law for your indemnity, as some of all parties have lately found to their costs.

And that this point of supreme authority was ever certainly stated, is absolutely denied; for according to the common supposition, it is three estates, which till within these few years were ever taken to be 1) Lords Spiritual, 2) Lords Temporal, 3) the Commons in Parliament assembled.

Now if these three were essential and equal, as all former times seem to allow, how could the Lords Temporal and the Commons cast out the Lords Spiritual? For by the same rule, the Lords Spiritual and Lords Temporal might have cast out the Commons, but the casting out the bishops hath both answered the question, and ended the controversy.

Since when the supreme authority is pretended to rest in the King, Lords, and Commons; and if so, when did the King assent to your proceedings in this war, which all the art in the world will not persuade him to be for him, but against him, and to ruin him and his? Or when did the Parliament assent to the proceedings of you that joined with the King in the late war pretendedly raised for the defence of religion, the privileges of Parliament, and liberty of the subject; and if the supreme power reside in all three, King, Lords, and Commons, how can the King justly do anything without the consent of the Lords and Commons, or the Lords and Commons without the King? May not the King and Lords as justly proceed to make laws, war, or peace without the Commons as they without the King? If they are not equal, which of them are supreme, and declared and proved by convincing reason so to be? If any, that you are to observe? If none, what have you done? what can you lawfully do?

[1] Adam See Genesis 3.11–12.

That there should be either three or two distinct estates equally supreme is an absurd nullity in government, for admit two of them agree, and not the third, then there can be no proceedings or determination, and if there be but two, as is now pretended, in Lords and Commons, whose ordinances have served (how justly judge you) to make war and confiscate men's estates: admit they agree not, then also nothing can be done, which in government is ridiculous to imagine; besides it is now a known case that their ordinances are not pleadable against the laws, and give no indemnity, which were they the known supreme authority, could not but be effectual. That the King single and alone is the supreme authority himself never pretended to it, claiming only a negative voice in the law-making power, by which rule nothing can be done without him, than which nothing is more unreasonable. The Lords also never pretended to more than an equal share with the Commons, which in effect is a negative voice and as unreasonable as in the King. And when the Commons have been by petitioners styled the supreme authority, they have punished the petitioners, and disclaimed the supreme authority: and as two years since, so very lately they have voted that the Kingdom shall be governed by King, Lords, and Commons; which is a riddle that no man understands; for who knoweth what appertains to the King, what to the Lords, or what to the House of Commons? It is all out as uncertain as at first; and if the trumpet give an uncertain sound, who shall prepare himself for the battle? If by all your endeavours you cannot prevail to have the supreme authority declared and proved, how can you lawfully fight, or upon what grounds with a good conscience can you engage yourselves, or persuade others to engage in killing and slaying of men?

And if you should have the supreme authority rationally proved and declared to be in the Commons distinct from any other, as being the sole representative of the people; you must note that you are a free people, and are not to be pressed or enforced to serve in wars like horses and brute beasts, but are to use the understanding God hath given you, in judging of the cause, for defence whereof they desire you to fight, for it is not sufficient to fight by lawful authority, but you must be sure to fight for what is just: Lawful authority being sometimes mistaken, and many times so perverted and corrupted, as to command the killing and imprisoning men for doing that which is just and commendable, and for opposing what is unjust and destructive. Therefore as you are to forbear till you see the supreme authority distinctly and rationally stated; so also you are not to engage till the cause be expressly declared, lest after your next engagement you are as far to seek of a just cause as now you are; and after you have prevailed, instead of finding yourselves and your associates freemen, you find yourselves more enslaved than you were formerly. For by experience you now find you may be made slaves as effectually by a Parliament, as by any other kind of government; why then persist you to divide and fall into factions? to kill and slay men for you know not what, to advance the honor and interest of you know not whom; the King, Parliament, great men in the city and army can do nothing without you, to disturb the peace of the nation; upon you therefore both soldiers and people, who fight, pay and disburse your estates, is to be charged all the evil that hath been done; if you on all hands had not been and were not so hasty to engage for the advancement of interests to the prejudice of the nation, it is very likely we had not only escaped those late bloody turmoils that have happened among us, but also might prevent greater threatened dangers, which like an inundation begin to break in upon us. And if you now stop not, your consciences will be loaded with all that is to come, which threateneth far worse than what is past. Therefore, if ye are either men or Christians, hold your hands till you know what you fight for, and be sure that you have the truth of freedom in it, or never meddle, but desist, and let who will both fight and pay.

Certainly there is none so vile, considering what hath been said, that will again incur the guilt of murderers and fight before the cause be plainly stated and published, and if that were done as it ought to be, possibly it may be attained without fighting, and might have been all this while, the difference not being so great as was imagined. Besides, where is the man that would fight against the supreme authority, and a just cause? and certainly there is none of you (whether Royalists, Presbyterians, or Independents) so wicked as to desire to kill men without exceeding just grounds and upon the greatest necessity, it being the saddest work in the world.

For the preventing whereof, let us, I beseech you, examine what good things there are wanting, that are essential to the peace, freedom, and happiness of the nation, that may not be obtained without fighting.

1. Is there wanting the certain knowledge where the supreme authority is, and of right ought to be? It is confessed no one thing is more wanting, nor can the nation ever be quiet or happy without it.

But can it be anywhere justly and safely but in the House of Commons, who are chosen and trusted by the people? Certainly did men consider that in opposing thereof, they renounce and destroy their own freedoms, they would not do it for any thing in the world.

If the consideration of the manifold evils brought upon us by this House of Commons deter them, the next thing that is wanting is, That a set time be appointed for the ending of this Parliament, and a certainty for future Parliaments, both for their due elections, meeting, and dissolving: And who will be so unreasonable as to oppose any of these? certainly the number cannot be considerable.

Is it also necessary that Parliaments be abridged the power of impressing men, to serve as brute beasts in the wars, who will be against their being bounded therein? a good cause never wanted men, nor an authority that had money to pay them.

Hath it proved destructive in Parliaments to meddle in religion, and to compel and restrain in matters of God's worship? Are they evidently such things as cannot be submitted to judgment? Doth every man find it so that hath a living conscience? Who then will be against their binding herein, though they be entrusted to establish an uncompulsive public way of worship for the nation?

Is it unreasonable that any person should be exempt from those proceedings of law, unto which the generality of the people are to be subject? Who is there then that will not willingly have all from the highest to the lowest bound alike?

That Parliaments should have no power to punish any person for doing that which is not against a known declared law, or to take away general property, or to force men to answer to questions against themselves, or to order trials or proceed by any other ways than by twelve sworn men, who would not rejoice to have such boundaries?

Then, that the proceedings in law might be rectified, and all laws and the duty of magistrates written and published in English.[1] That the excise might have a speedy end, and no taxes but by way of subsidies. That trade might be free, and a less burdensome way for the maintenance of ministers be established, than that of tithes; and that work and necessaries be provided for all kind of poor people. Certainly for the obtaining of these things a man may justly adventure his life; all these being for a common good, and tend not to the setting up of any one party or faction of men.

These then are the causes to be insisted on, or nothing: And if the supreme authority adhere to this cause, they need neither fear Scotch, French, nor English enemies; but if they decline this cause, they are to be declined; the just freedom and happiness of a nation being above all constitutions, whether of Kings, Parliaments, or any other.

For shame therefore (Royalists, Presbyterians, Independents), before you murder another man hold forth your cause plainly and expressly; and if any adversaries appear either within or without the land, reason it out with them if it be possible, deal as becometh Christians, argue, persuade, and use all possible means to prevent another war, and greater bloodshed; your great ones, whether the King, Lords, Parliament men, rich citizens, &c. feel not the miserable effects thereof, and so cannot be sensible; but you and your poor friends that depend on farms, trades, and small pay, have many an aching heart when these live in all pleasure and deliciousness. The accursed thing is accepted by them, wealth and honor, and both come by the bleeding miserable distractions of the Commonwealth, and they fear an end of trouble would put an end to their glory and greatness.

[1] written and published in English As part of their platform for reform of the legal system, the Levellers called for the translation of England's laws from Anglo-Norman ("Law French") into English so they could be understood by everyone, without the need for legal training. The legal profession successfully withstood this particular reform until well into the eighteenth century.

Oh therefore all you soldiers and people that have your consciences alive about you, put to your strength of judgment, and all the might you have to prevent a further effusion of blood; let not the covetous, the proud, the bloodthirsty man bear sway amongst you; fear not their high looks, give no ear to their charms, their promises, or tears; they have no strength without you, forsake them and ye will be strong for good, adhere to them, and they will be strong to evil; for which you must answer, and give an account at the last day.

The King, Parliament, great men in the city and army, have made you but the stairs by which they have mounted to honour, wealth, and power. The only quarrel that hath been, and at present is but this, namely, whose slaves the people shall be. All the power that any hath, was but a trust conveyed from you to them, to be employed by them for your good; they have mis-employed their power, and instead of preserving you, have destroyed you: all power and authority is perverted from the King to the constable, and it is no other but the policy of statesmen to keep you divided by creating jealousies and fears among you, to the end that their tyranny and injustice may pass undiscovered and unpunished; but the people's safety is the supreme law; and if a people must not be left without a means to preserve itself against the King, by the same rule they may preserve themselves against the Parliament and army too, if they pervert the end for which they received their power, to wit the nation's safety; therefore speedily unite yourselves together, and as one man stand up for the defence of your freedom, and for the establishment of such equal rules of government for the future, as shall lay a firm foundation of peace and happiness to all the people without partiality. Let justice be your breastplate, and you shall need to fear no enemies, for you shall strike a terror to your now insulting oppressors, and force all the nation's peace to fly before you. Prosecute and prosper.

POSTSCRIPT

Can there be a more bloody project than to engage men to kill one another, and yet no just cause declared? Therefore I advise all men that would be esteemed religious or rational, really to consider what may be done for the future that is conducible to the peace of the nation. If the peace of the nation cannot be secured without the restoration of the King, let it be done speedily and honorably, and provide against his misgovernment for the future; let his power be declared and limited by law.

If the peace of the nation cannot be secured by the continuance of this Parliament, let a period be set for the dissolution thereof, but first make certain provision for the successive calling, electing and sitting of Parliaments for the future; let their privileges be declared and power limited, as to what they are empowered and what not; for doubtless in Parliaments rightly constituted consists the freedom of a nation. And in all things do as you would be done unto, seek peace with all men.

But above all things, abandon your former actings for a King against a Parliament, or an army against both; for the Presbyterians against the Independents, &c., for in so doing you do but put a sword into your enemies' hands to destroy you, for hitherto, which of them soever were in power, they played the tyrants and oppressed, and so it will ever be when parties are supported. Therefore if you engage at all, do it by lawful authority, let your cause be declared, and just also, and let it be for the good of the whole nation, without which you will not only hazard being slaves, but also contract upon yourselves and posterities the guilt of murderers.

A FIERY FLYING ROLL
AND A SECOND FIERY FLYING ROLL

THE PREFACE

An inlet into the Land of Promise, the New Jerusalem, and a gate into the ensuing discourse, worthy of serious consideration.

My dear one.
All or none.
Everyone under the sun.
Mine own.

My most Excellent Majesty (in me) hath strangely and variously transformed this form.

And behold, by mine own almightiness (in me) I have been changed in a moment, in the twinkling of an eye, at the sound of the trump.[1]

And now the Lord is descended from Heaven, with a shout, with the voice of the archangel, and with the trump of God.

And the sea, the earth, yea all things are now giving up their dead. And all things that ever were, are, or shall be visible—are the grave wherein the King of Glory (the eternal, invisible almightiness, hath lain as it were) dead and buried.

But behold, behold, he is now risen with a witness, to save Zion with vengeance, or to confound and plague all things into himself; who by his mighty angel is proclaiming (with a loud voice) that sin and transgression is finished and ended; and everlasting righteousness brought in; and the everlasting Gospel preaching; which everlasting Gospel is brought in with most terrible earthquakes, and heaven-quakes, and with signs and wonders following.

Amen

And it hath pleased my most Excellent Majesty (who is universal love, and whose service is perfect freedom), to set this form (the writer of this roll) as no small sign and wonder in fleshly Israel; as you may partly see in the ensuing discourse.

And now (my dear ones!) everyone under the sun, I will only point at the gate; through which I was led into that new city, new Jerusalem, and to the spirits of just men, made perfect, and to God the judge of all.

First, all my strength, my forces were utterly routed, my house I dwelt in fired; my father and mother forsook me, the wife of my bosom loathed me, mine old name was rotted, perished; and I was utterly plagued, consumed, damned, rammed, and sunk into nothing, into the bowels of the still eternity (my mother's womb) out of which I came naked, and whetherto I returned again naked. And lying a while there, rapt up in silence, at length (the body or outward form being awake all this while) I heard with my outward ear (to my apprehension) a most terrible thunder-clap, and after that a second. And upon the second thunder-clap, which was exceeding terrible, I saw a great body of light, like the light of the sun, and red as fire, in the form of a drum (as it were) whereupon with exceeding trembling and amazement on the flesh, and with joy unspeakable in the spirit, I clapped my hands, and cried out, Amen, Hallelujah, Hallelujah, Amen. And so lay trembling, sweating and smoking (for the space of half an hour) at length with a loud voice (I inwardly) cried out, Lord, what wilt thou do with me; my most excellent majesty and eternal glory (in me) answered and said, Fear not, I will take thee up into mine everlasting Kingdom. But thou shalt (first) drink a bitter cup, a bitter cup, a bitter cup; whereupon (being filled with exceeding amazement) I was thrown into the belly of hell (and take what you can of it in these expressions, though the matter is beyond expression) I was among all the Devils in hell, even in their most hideous hue.

And under all this terror, and amazement, there was a little spark of transcendent, transplendent, unspeakable glory, which survived, and sustained itself, triumphing, exulting, and exalting itself above all the fiends. And confounding the very blackness of darkness (you must take it in these terms, for it is infinitely beyond expression). Upon this the life was taken out of the body (for a season) and it was thus resembled, as if a man with a great brush dipped in whiting, should with one stroke wipe out, or sweep off a picture upon a wall, &c. after a while, breath and life was returned into the form again; whereupon I saw various streams of light (in the night) which appeared to the outward eye; and immediately I saw three hearts (or three appearances in the form of hearts), of exceeding brightness; and immediately an innumerable company of hearts, filling each corner of the room where I was. And methoughts there was variety and distinction, as if there had been several hearts, and yet most strangely and inexpressibly complicated or folded up in unity. I clearly saw distinction, diversity, variety, and as clearly saw all swallowed up into unity. And it hath been my song many times since, within and without, unity, universality, universality, unity, Eternal Majesty, &c. And at this vision, a most strong, glorious voice uttered these words, The spirits of just men made perfect.[1] The spirits &c, with whom I had as absolute, clear, full communion, and in a two-fold more familiar way, than ever I had outwardly with my dearest friends, and nearest relations. The visions and revelations of God, and the strong hand of eternal invisible almightiness, was stretched out upon me, within me, for the space of four days and nights, without intermission.

[1] sound of the trump See 1 Corinthians 15.52. Coppe's text is densely interwoven with biblical language; only a few specific references have been annotated.

The time would fail if I would tell you all, but it is not the good will and pleasure of my most excellent Majesty in me, to declare any more (as yet) than thus such further: That amongst those various voices that were then uttered within, these were some, Blood, blood, where, where? upon the hypocritical holy heart, &c. Another thus, Vengeance, vengeance, vengeance, plagues, plagues, upon the inhabitants of the earth; fire, fire, fire, sword, sword, &c. upon all that bow now down to eternal Majesty, universal love; I'll recover, recover, my wool, my flax, my money. Declare, declare, fear thou not the faces of any; I am (in thee) a munition of rocks, &c.[2]

Go up to London, to London,[3] that great city, write, write, write. And behold I writ, and lo a hand was sent to me, and a roll of a book was therein, which this fleshly hand would have put wings to, before the time. Whereupon it was snatched out of my hand, and the roll thrust into my mouth; and I eat it up, and filled my bowels with it (Eze. 2:8 &c. cha. 3:1, 2, 3), where it was as bitter as worm-wood; and it lay broiling, and burning in my stomach, till I brought it forth in this form.

And now I send it flying to thee, with my heart, And all

CHAPTER 3

A strange, yet most true story: under which is couched that lion, whose roaring shall make all the beasts of the field tremble, and all the kingdoms of the earth quake. Wherein also (in part) the subtlety of the well-favoured harlot is discovered, and her flesh burning with that fire, which shall burn down all churches, except that of the first-born, &c.

Follow me, who, last Lord's day September 30, 1649, met him in open field, a most strange deformed man, clad with patched clouts: who looking wishly on me, mine eye pitied him; and my heart, or the day of the Lord, which burned as an oven in me, set my tongue on flame to speak to him, as followeth.

How now friend, art thou poor?

He answered, yea Master very poor.

Whereupon my bowels trembled within me, and quivering fell upon the worm-eaten chest (my corpse I mean), that I could not hold a joint still.

And my great love within me (who is the great God within that chest, or corpse), was burning hot toward him; and made the lock-hole of the chest, to wit, the mouth of the corpse, again to open: Thus.

Art poor?

Yea, very poor, said he.

[1] The spirits ... made perfect See Hebrews 12.23.

[2] Blood, blood ... rocks, &c. See Hosea 2.9.

[3] [Coppe's note] It not being shown to me, what I should do, more than preach and print something, &c. very little expecting I should be so strangely acted, as to (my exceeding joy and delight) I have been, though to the utter cracking of my credit, and to the rotting of my old name which is damned, and cast out (as a toad to the dunghill) that I might have a new name, with me, upon me, within me, which is, I am.

[4] Per AUXILIUM PATRIS בד Latin (with initials in Hebrew): By the help of the father, A C.

Whereupon the strange woman who flattereth with her lips,[1] and is subtle of heart, said within me.

It's a poor wretch, give him two-pence.

But my excellency and majesty (in me) scorned her words, confounded her language; and kicked her out of his presence.

But immediately the well-favoured harlot (whom I carried not upon my horse behind me) but who rose up in me, said:

It's a poor wretch give him 6d and that's enough for a squire or knight, to give to one poor body.

Besides (saith the holy scripturian whore) he's worse than an infidel that provides not for his own family.

True love begins at home, &c.

Thou, and thy family, are fed as the young ravens, strangely, though thou hast been a constant preacher, yet thou hast abhorred both tithes and hire; and thou knowest not aforehand, who will give thee the worth of a penny.

Have a care of the main chance.

And thus she flattereth with her lips, and her words being smoother than oil; and her lips dropping as the honey comb, I was fired to hasten my hand into my pocket; and pulling out a shilling, said to the poor wretch, give me six pence, here's a shilling[2] for thee.

He answered, I cannot, I have never a penny.

Whereupon I said, I would fain have given thee something if thou couldst have changed my money.

Then saith he, God bless you.

Whereupon with much reluctancy, with much love, and with amazement (of the right stamp) I turned my horse head from him, riding away. But a while after I was turned back (being advised by my Demilance)[3] to wish him call for six pence, which I would leave at the next town at one's house, which I thought he might know, (Sapphira like[4]) keeping back part.

But (as God judged me) I, as she, was struck down dead.

And behold the plague of God fell into my pocket; and the rust of my silver rose up in judgment against me, and consumed my flesh as with fire: so that I, and my money perished with me.

I being cast into that lake of fire and brimstone.

And all the money I had about me to a penny (though I thought through the instigation of my quondam mistress to have reserved some, having rode about 8 miles, not eating one mouth-full of bread that day, and had drunk but one small draught of drink; and had between 8 or 9 miles more to ride, ere I came to my journey's end: my horse being lame, the ways dirty, it raining all the way, and I not knowing what extraordinary occasion I might have for money). Yet (I say) the rust of my silver did so rise up in judgment against me, and burnt my flesh like fire: and the 5th of James[5] thundered such an alarm in mine ears, that I was fain to call all I had into the hands of him, whose visage was more marred than any man's that ever I saw.

This is a true story, most true in the history.

It's true also in the mystery.

And there are deep ones couched under it, for it's a shadow of various, glorious (though strange), good things to come.

Well! to return—after I had thrown my rusty cankered money into the poor wretch's hands, I rode away from him, being filled with trembling, joy, and amazement, feeling the sparkles of a great glory arising up from under these ashes.

After this, I was made (by that divine power which dwelleth in this ark, or chest) to turn my horse's head—whereupon I beheld this poor deformed wretch, looking earnestly after me: and upon that, was made to put off my hat, and bow to him seven times, and was (at that strange posture) filled with trembling and amazement, some sparkles of glory arising up also from under this; as also from under these ashes, yet I rode back once more to the poor wretch, saying, because I am a King, I have done this, but you need not tell anyone.

The day's our own.

This was done on the last Lord's day, September 30 in the year 1649, which is the year of the Lord's recompenses for Zion, and the day of his vengeance, the dreadful day of Judgment. But I have done (for the present) with this story, for it is the latter end of the year 1649.

Gerrard Winstanley, A Declaration from the Poor Oppressed People of England (1649)

> Directed to all that call themselves, or are called Lords of Manors, through this Nation; that have begun to cut, or that through fear and covetousness, do intend to cut down the Woods and Trees that grow upon the Commons and Waste Land

We whose names are subscribed, do in the name of all the poor oppressed people in England, declare unto you, that call yourselves lords of manors, and lords of the land, that in regard the King of Righteousness, our Maker, hath enlightened our hearts so far, as to see that the earth was not made purposely for you to be lords of it, and we to be your slaves, servants, and beggars; but it was made to be a common livelihood to all, without respect of persons: And that your buying and selling of land, and the fruits of it, one to another, is the cursed thing, and was brought in by war; which hath, and still does establish murder, and theft, in the hands of some branches of mankind over others, which is the greatest outward burden, and unrighteous power, that the creation groans under: For the power of enclosing land, and owning propriety,[1] was brought into the creation by your ancestors by the sword; which first did murder their fellow creatures, men, and after plunder or steal away their land, and left this land successively to you, their children. And therefore, though you did not kill or thieve, yet you hold that cursed thing in your hand, by the power of the sword; and so you justify the wicked deeds of your fathers; and that sin of your fathers shall be visited upon the head of you, and your children, to the third and fourth generation, and longer too, till your bloody and thieving power be rooted out of the land.

And further, in regard the King of Righteousness hath made us sensible of our burdens, and the cries and groanings of our hearts are come before him: We take it as a testimony of love from him, that our hearts begin to be freed from slavish fear of men, such as you are; and that we find resolutions in us, grounded upon the inward law of love, one towards another, to dig and plough up the commons and waste lands through

[1] propriety Property, but also possessions or ownership in general.

England; and that our conversation shall be so unblameable, that your laws shall not reach to oppress us any longer, unless you by your laws will shed the innocent blood that runs in our veins.

For though you and your ancestors got your propriety by murder and theft, and you keep it by the same power from us, that have an equal right to the land with you, by the righteous law of creation, yet we shall have no occasion of quarrelling (as you do) about that disturbing devil, called particular propriety:[1] For the earth, with all her fruits of corn, cattle, and such like, was made to be a common storehouse of livelihood to all mankind, friend and foe, without exception.

And to prevent your scrupulous objections, know this, that we must neither buy nor sell; money must not any longer (after our work of the earth's community is advanced) be the great god, that hedges in some, and hedges out others; for money is but part of the earth: And surely, the Righteous Creator, who is King, did never ordain, that unless some of mankind do bring that mineral (silver and gold) in their hands to others of their own kind, that they should neither be fed, nor be clothed; no surely, for this was the project of tyrant-flesh (which landlords are branches of) to set his image upon money. And they make this unrighteous law, that none should buy or sell, eat, or be clothed, or have any comfortable livelihood among men, unless they did bring his image stamped upon gold or silver in their hands.

And whereas the Scriptures speak that the mark of the Beast is 666, the number of a man; and that those that do not bring that mark in their hands, or in their foreheads, they should neither buy nor sell, Revel. 13:16[–18]. And seeing the numbering letters round about the English money make 666,[2] which is the number of that kingly power and glory (called a Man), and seeing the age of the Creation is now come to the image of the Beast, or half day, and seeing 666 is his mark, we expect this to be the last tyrannical power[3] that shall reign; and that people shall live freely in the enjoyment of the Earth, without bringing the mark of the Beast in their hands,[4] or in their promise; and that they shall buy wine and milk, without money, or without price, as Isaiah speaks.[5]

For after our work of the earthly community is advanced, we must make use of gold and silver, as we do of other metals, but not to buy and sell withal; for buying and selling is the great cheat that robs and steals the earth one from another: It is that which makes some lords, other beggars, some rulers, others to be ruled; and makes great murderers and thieves to be imprisoners and hangers of little ones, or of sincere-hearted men.

And while we are made to labor the earth together, with one consent and willing mind; and while we are made free, that every one, friend and foe, shall enjoy the benefit of their creation, that is, to have food and raiment from the earth, their mother; and every one subject to give account of his thoughts, words, and actions to none, but to the one only righteous judge, and prince of peace; the spirit of righteousness that dwells, and that is now rising up to rule in every creature, and in the whole globe. We say, while we are made to hinder no man of his privileges given him in his creation, equal to one, as to another; what law then can you make, to take hold upon us, but laws of oppression and tyranny, that shall enslave or spill the blood of the innocent? And so yourselves, your judges, lawyers, and justices, shall be found to be the greatest transgressors, in, and over mankind.

But to draw nearer to declare our meaning, what we would have, and what we shall endeavour to the uttermost to obtain, as moderate and righteous reason directs us; seeing we are made to see our privileges, given us in our creation, which have hitherto been denied to us and our fathers since the power of the sword began to rule, and the secrets of the creation have been locked up under the traditional, parrot-like speaking, from the universities and colleges for scholars, and since the power of the murdering and thieving sword, formerly, as well as now of late years, hath set up a government, and maintains that government; for what are prisons, and putting others to death, but the power of the sword to enforce people to that government which was got by conquest and sword, and cannot stand of itself, but by the same murdering power? That government that is got over people by the sword and kept by the sword, is not set up by the King of Righteousness to be his law, but by covetousness, the great god of the world; who hath been permitted to reign for a time, times, and dividing of time, and his government draws to the period of the last term of his allotted time; and then the nations shall see the glory of that government that shall rule in righteousness, without either sword or spear,

[1] particular propriety Private property or ownership.

[2] make 666 I.e., when the letters in the Latin abbreviations on some coinage were translated (selectively) into their equivalents in Roman numerals.

[3] the last tyrannical power Referring to the British monarchy, overthrown with the execution of Charles I in January 1649.

[4] without bringing … their hands Without using coins or notes; i.e., without buying or selling.

[5] they shall … Isaiah speaks See Isaiah 55.1.

And seeing, further, the power of righteousness in our hearts, seeking the livelihood of others as well as ourselves, hath drawn forth our bodies to begin to dig, and plough, in the commons and waste land, for the reasons already declared,

And seeing and finding ourselves poor, wanting food to feed upon, while we labor the earth to cast in seed, and to wait till the first crop comes up; and wanting ploughs, carts, corn, and such materials to plant the commons withal, we are willing to declare our condition to you, and to all, that have the treasury of the earth, locked up in your bags, chests, and barns, and will offer up nothing to this public treasury; but will rather see your fellow creatures starve for want of bread, that have an equal right to it with yourselves, by the law of creation: But this by the way we only declare to you, and to all that follow the subtle art of buying and selling the earth, with her fruits, merely to get the treasury thereof into their hands, to lock it up from them, to whom it belongs; that so, such covetous, proud, unrighteous, selfish flesh, may be left without excuse in the day of judgment.

And therefore, the main thing we aim at, and for which we declare our resolutions to go forth, and act, is this, to lay hold upon, and as we stand in need, to cut and fell, and make the best advantage we can of the woods and trees that grow upon the commons. To be a stock[1] for ourselves, and our poor brethren, through the land of England, to plant the commons withal; and to provide us bread to eat, till the fruit of our labors in the earth bring forth increase; and we shall meddle with none of your proprieties (but what is called commonage)[2] till the spirit in you, make you cast up your lands and goods, which were got, and still is kept in your hands by murder, and theft; and then we shall take it from the spirit that hath conquered you, and not from our swords, which is an abominable and unrighteous power, and a destroyer of the creation: But the son of man comes not to destroy, but to save.

And we are moved to send forth this Declaration abroad, to give notice to everyone whom it concerns, in regard we hear and see, that some of you, that have been lords of manors, do cause the trees and woods that grow upon the commons, which you pretend a royalty unto, to be cut down and sold for your own private use, whereby the common land, which your own mouths do say belongs to the poor, is impoverished, and the poor oppressed people robbed of their rights, while you give them cheating words, by telling some of our poor oppressed brethren that those of us that have begun to dig and plough up the commons, will hinder the poor; and so blind their eyes, that they see not their privilege, while you, and the rich free-holders make the most profit of the commons, by your over-stocking of them with sheep and cattle; and the poor that have the name to own the commons, have the least share therein; nay, they are checked by you, if they cut wood, heath, turf, or furseys,[3] in places about the common, where you disallow.

[1] To be a stock Referring to a Digger economic proposal to sell wood on the common in order to raise funds to trade with or invest.

[2] commonage The right to pasture animals on common land.

[3] furseys Furze or gorse, a kind of shrub.

Therefore we are resolved to be cheated no longer, nor be held under the slavish fear of you no longer, seeing the earth was made for us, as well as for you: And if the common land belongs to us who are the poor oppressed, surely the woods that grow upon the commons belong to us likewise: therefore we are resolved to try the uttermost in the light of reason, to know whether we shall be free men, or slaves. If we lie still, and let you steal away our birthrights, we perish; and if we petition we perish also, though we have paid taxes, given free quarter, and ventured our lives to preserve the nation's freedom as much as you, and therefore by the law of contract with you, freedom in the land is our portion as well as yours, equal with you: And if we strive for freedom, and your murdering, governing laws destroy us, we can but perish.

Therefore we require, and we resolve to take both common land and common woods to be a livelihood for us, and look upon you as equal with us, not above us, knowing very well that England the land of our nativity is to be a common treasury of livelihood to all, without respect of persons. ...

And we hope we may not doubt (at least we expect) that they that are called the great Council and powers of England, who so often have declared themselves, by promises and covenants, and confirmed them by multitude of fasting days, and devout protestations, to make England a free people, upon condition they would pay moneys, and adventure their lives against the successor of the Norman conqueror;[1] under whose oppressing power England was enslaved; and we look upon that freedom promised to be the inheritance of all, without respect of persons; and this cannot be, unless the land of England be freely set at liberty from proprietors, and become a common treasury to all her children, as every portion of the land of Canaan was the common livelihood of such and such a tribe, and of every member in that tribe, without exception, neither hedging in any, nor hedging out.[2]

We say we hope we need not doubt of their sincerity to us herein, and that they will not gainsay our determinate course; howsoever, their actions will prove to the view of all, either their sincerity, or hypocrisy: We know what we speak is our privilege, and our cause is righteous, and if they doubt of it, let them but send a child for us to come before them, and we shall make it manifest four ways.

First, by the National Covenant,[3] which yet stands in force to bind Parliament and people to be faithful and sincere, before the Lord God Almighty, wherein every one in his several place hath covenanted to preserve and seek the liberty each of other, without respect of persons.

Secondly, by the late victory over King Charles, we do claim this our privilege, to be quietly given us, out of the hands of tyrant-government, as our bargain and contract with them; for the Parliament promised, if we would pay taxes, and give free quarter, and adventure our lives against Charles and his party, whom they called the common enemy, they would make us a free people; these three being all done by us, as well as by themselves, we claim this our bargain, by the law of contract from them, to be a free people with them, and to have an equal privilege of common livelihood with them, they being chosen by us, but for a peculiar work, and for an appointed time, from among us, not to be our oppressing lords, but servants to succour us. But these two are our weakest proofs. And yet by them (in the light of reason and equity that dwells in men's hearts) we shall with ease cast down, all those former enslaving Norman reiterated laws, in every King's reign since the conquest, which are as thorns in our eyes, and pricks in our sides, and which are called the ancient government of England.

Thirdly, we shall prove, that we have a free right to the land of England, being born therein as well as elder brothers, and that it is our right equal with them, and they with us, to have a comfortable livelihood in the earth, without owning any of our own kind, to be either lords or landlords over us: And this we shall prove by plain text of Scripture, without exposition upon them, which the scholars and great ones generally say, is their rule to walk by.

[1] the successor of the Norman conqueror King Charles I.

[2] as every portion … hedging out See Numbers 34 and Joshua 13–19.

[3] National Covenant Solemn League and Covenant, taken by members of the House of Commons in September 1643: a pledge to protect constitutional and Parliamentary liberties as well as to reform the church on Presbyterian lines.

Fourthly, we shall prove it by the righteous law of our creation, that mankind in all his branches is the lord of the earth and ought not to be in subjection to any of his own kind without him, but to live in the light of the law of righteousness, and peace established in his heart.

And thus in love we have declared the purpose of our hearts plainly, without flattery, expecting love, and the same sincerity from you, without grumbling or quarrelling, being creatures of your own image and mould, intending no other matter herein, but to observe the law of righteous action, endeavouring to shut out of the creation the cursed thing, called particular propriety, which is the cause of all wars, bloodshed, theft, and enslaving laws, that hold the people under misery.

Signed for and in behalf of all the poor oppressed people of England, and the whole world.

The Diggers' Song (c. 1649–50)

You noble Diggers all, stand up now, stand up now,
You noble Diggers all, stand up now,
The waste land to maintain, seeing Cavaliers by name
Your digging does disdain, and persons all defame
Stand up now, stand up now.

Your houses they pull down, stand up now, stand up now,
Your houses they pull down, stand up now.
Your houses they pull down to fright poor men in town,
But the gentry must come down, and the poor shall wear the crown.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

With spades and hoes and plows, stand up now, stand up now,
With spades and hoes and plows stand up now,
Your freedom to uphold, seeing Cavaliers are bold
To kill you if they could, and rights from you to hold.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

Their self-will is their law, stand up now, stand up now,
Their self-will is their law, stand up now.
Since tyranny came in they count it now no sin
To make a gaol° a gin,[1] to starve poor men therein. jail
Stand up now, stand up now.

The gentry are all round, stand up now, stand up now,
The gentry are all round, stand up now.
The gentry are all round, on each side they are found,
Their wisdom's so profound, to cheat us of our ground.
Stand up now, stand up now.

The lawyers they conjoin, stand up now, stand up now,
The lawyers they conjoin, stand up now,
To arrest you they advise, such fury they devise,
The devil in them lies and hath blinded both their eyes.
Stand up now, stand up now.

The clergy they come in, stand up now, stand up now,
The clergy they come in, stand up now.
The clergy they come in, and say it is a sin
That we should now begin, our freedom for to win.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

The tithe they yet will have, stand up now, stand up now,
The tithes they yet will have, stand up now.
The tithes they yet will have, and lawyers their fees crave,
And this they say is brave, to make the poor their slave.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

'Gainst lawyers and gainst Priests, stand up now, stand up now,
Gainst lawyers and gainst Priests stand up now.
For tyrants they are both even flat against their oath,
To grant us they are loath, free meat, and drink, and cloth.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

The club is all their law, stand up now, stand up now,
The club is all their law, stand up now.

---

[1] gin Snare or trap; also sometimes used to mean an engine of torture.

The club is all their law to keep men in awe,
But they no vision saw to maintain such a law.
Stand up now, Diggers all.

The Cavaliers are foes, stand up now, stand up now,
The Cavaliers are foes, stand up now;
The Cavaliers are foes, themselves they do disclose
By verses not in prose to please the singing boys
Stand up now, Diggers all.

To conquer them by love, come in now, come in now,
To conquer them by love, come in now;
To conquer them by love, as it does you behove,
For he is King above, no power is like to love.
Glory here Diggers all.

READING POETRY

WHAT IS A POEM?

Most of us know what a poem is when we see one. Still, even poets find it difficult to define a poem, or poetry. In a lecture on "The Name and Nature of Poetry" (1933), the English poet A.E. Housman stated that he could "no more define poetry than a terrier can define a rat"; however, he added, "we both recognize the object by the symptoms which it provokes in us." Housman knew he was in the presence of poetry if he experienced a shiver down the spine, or "a constriction of the throat and a precipitation of water to the eyes." Implicit in Housman's response is a recognition that we have to go beyond mere formal characteristics—stanzas, rhymes, rhythms—if we want to know what poetry is, or why it differs from prose. Poetry both represents and creates emotions in a highly condensed way. Therefore, any definition of the genre needs to consider, as much as possible, the impact of poetry on us as readers or listeners.

Worth consideration too is the role of the listener or reader not only as passive recipient of a poem, but also as an active participant in its performance. Poetry is among other things the locus for a communicative exchange. A section below deals with the sub-genre of performance poetry, but in a very real sense all poetry is subject to performance. Poems are to be read aloud as well as on the page, and both in sensing meaning and in expressing sound the reader plays a vital role in bringing a poem to life, no matter how long dead its author may be; as W.H. Auden wrote memorably of his fellow poet W.B. Yeats, "the words of a dead man / Are modified in the guts of the living."

For some readers, poetry is, in William Wordsworth's phrase, "the breath and finer spirit of all knowledge" ("Preface" to the Lyrical Ballads). They look to poetry for insights into the nature of human experience, and expect elevated thought in carefully wrought language. In contrast, other readers distrust poetry that seems moralistic or didactic. "We hate poetry that has a palpable design upon us," wrote John Keats to his friend J.H. Reynolds; rather, poetry should be "great & unobtrusive, a thing which enters into one's soul, and does not startle it or amaze it with itself but with its subject." The American poet Archibald MacLeish took Keats's idea a step further: in his poem "Ars Poetica" he suggested that "A poem should not mean / But be." MacLeish was not suggesting that a poem should lack meaning, but rather that meaning should inhere in the poem's expressive and sensuous qualities, not in some explicit statement or versified idea.

Whatever we look for in a poem, the infinitude of forms, styles, and subjects that make up the body of literature we call "poetry" is, in the end, impossible to capture in a definition that would satisfy all readers. All we can do, perhaps, is to agree that a poem is a discourse that is characterized by a heightened attention to language, form, and rhythm, by an expressiveness that works through figurative rather than literal modes, and by a capacity to stimulate our imagination and arouse our feelings.

THE LANGUAGE OF POETRY

To speak of "the language of poetry" implies that poets make use of a vocabulary that is somehow different from the language of everyday life. In fact, all language has the capacity to be "poetic," if by poetry we understand a use of language to which some special importance is attached. The ritualistic utterances of religious ceremonies sometimes have this force; so do the skipping rhymes of children in the schoolyard. We can distinguish such uses of language from the kind of writing we find in, say, a computer user's manual: the author of the manual can describe a given function in a variety of ways, whereas the magic of the skipping rhyme can be invoked only by getting the right words in the right order. So with the poet: he or she chooses particular words in a particular order; the way the poet speaks is as important to our understanding as what is said. This doesn't mean that an instruction manual couldn't have poetic qualities—indeed, modern poets have created "found" poems from even less likely materials—but it does mean that in poetry there is an intimate relation amongst language, form, and meaning, and that the writer deliberately structures and manipulates language to achieve very particular ends.

THE BEST WORDS IN THE BEST ORDER

Wordsworth provides us with a useful example of the way that poetry can invest quite ordinary words with a high emotional charge:

> No motion has she now, no force,
> She neither hears nor sees;
> Rolled round in earth's diurnal course
> With rocks, and stones, and trees.

To paraphrase the content of this stanza from "A Slumber Did My Spirit Seal," "she" is dead and buried. But the language and structures used here give this prosaic idea great impact. For example, the regular iambic meter of the two last lines conveys something of the inexorable motion of the earth and of Lucy embedded in it; the monosyllabic last line is a grim reminder of her oneness with objects in nature; the repeated negatives in the first two lines drive home the irreparable destructiveness of death; the alliteration in the third and fourth lines gives a tangible suggestion of roundness, circularity, repetition in terms of the earth's shape and motion, suggesting a cycle in which death is perhaps followed by renewal. Even the unusual word "diurnal" (which would not have seemed so unusual to Wordsworth's readers) seems "right" in this context; it lends more weight to the notion of the earth's perpetual movement than its mundane synonym "daily" (which, besides, would not scan here). It is difficult to imagine a change of any kind to these lines; they exemplify another attempted definition of poetry, this time by Wordsworth's friend Samuel Taylor Coleridge: "the best words in the best order" (Table Talk, 1827).

POETIC DICTION AND THE ELEVATED STYLE

Wordsworth's diction in the "Lucy" poem cited above is a model of clarity; he has chosen language that, in its simplicity and bluntness, conveys the strength of the speaker's feelings far more strongly than an elaborate description of grief in more conventionally "poetic" language might have done. Wordsworth, disturbed by what he felt was a deadness and artificiality in the poetry of his day, sought to "choose incidents and situations from common life" and to describe them in "a selection of language really used by men" ("Preface" to Lyrical Ballads). His plan might seem an implicit reproach of the "raised" style, the elevated diction of epic poetry we associate with John Milton's Paradise Lost:

> Anon out of the earth a fabric huge
> Rose like an exhalation, with the sound
> Of dulcet symphonies and voices sweet,

Built like a temple, where pilasters round
Were set, and Doric pillars overlaid
With golden architrave; nor did there want
Cornice or frieze, with bossy sculptures graven;
The roof was fretted gold.
(Paradise Lost I.710–17)

At first glance this passage, with its Latinate vocabulary and convoluted syntax, might seem guilty of inflated language and pretentiousness. However, Milton's description of the devils' palace in Hell deliberately seeks to distance us from its subject in order to emphasize the scale and sublimity of the spectacle, far removed from ordinary human experience. In other words, language and style in Paradise Lost are well adapted to suit a particular purpose, just as they are in "A Slumber Did My Spirit Seal," though on a wholly different scale. Wordsworth criticized the poetry of his day, not because of its elevation, but because the raised style was too often out of touch with its subject; in his view, the words did not bear any significant relation to the "truths" they were attempting to depict.

"PLAIN" LANGUAGE IN POETRY

Since Wordsworth's time, writers have been conscious of a need to narrow the apparent gap between "poetic" language and the language of everyday life. In much of the poetry of the past century, especially free verse, we can observe a growing approximation to speech—even to conversation—in the diction and rhythms of poetry. This may have something to do with the changed role of the poet, who today has discarded the mantle of teacher or prophet that was assumed by poets of earlier times, and who is ready to admit all fields of experience and endeavor as appropriate for poetry. The modern poet looks squarely at life, and can often find a provoking beauty in even the meanest of objects.

We should not assume, however, that a greater concern with the "ordinary," with simplicity, naturalness, and clarity, means a reduction in complexity or suggestiveness. A piece such as Stevie Smith's "Mother, Among the Dustbins," for all the casual and playful domesticity of some of its lines, skillfully evokes a range of emotions and sense impressions defying simple paraphrase.

IMAGERY, SYMBOLISM, AND FIGURES OF SPEECH

The language of poetry is grounded in the objects and phenomena that create sensory impressions. Sometimes the poet renders these impressions quite literally, in a series of images that seek to recreate a scene in the reader's mind:

Only a man harrowing clods
In a slow silent walk
With an old horse that stumbles and nods
Half asleep as they stalk.

Only thin smoke without flame
From the heaps of couch-grass;
Yet this will go onward the same
Though Dynasties pass.

Yonder a maid and her wight
Come whispering by:
War's annals will cloud into night
Ere their story die.
(Thomas Hardy, "In Time of 'The Breaking of Nations'")

Here, the objects of everyday life are re-created with sensory details designed to evoke in us the sensations or responses felt by the speaker viewing the scene. At the same time, the writer invests the objects with such significance that the poem's meaning extends beyond the literal to the symbolic: that is, the images come to stand for something much larger than the objects they represent. Hardy's poem moves from the presentation of stark images of rural life to a sense of their timelessness. By the last stanza we see the ploughman, the burning grass, and the maid and her companion as symbols of recurring human actions and motives that defy the struggles and conflicts of history.

IMAGISM

The juxtaposition of clear, forceful images is associated particularly with the Imagist movement that flourished at the beginning of the twentieth century. Its chief representatives (in their early work) were the American poets H.D. and Ezra Pound, who defined an image as "that which represents an intellectual and emotional complex in an instant of time." Pound's two-line poem "In a Station of the Metro" provides a good example of the Imagists' goal of representing emotions or impressions through the use of concentrated images:

The apparition of these faces in the crowd,
Petals on a wet, black bough.

As in a Japanese haiku, a form that strongly influenced the Imagists, the poem uses sharp, clear, concrete details to evoke both a sensory impression and the emotion or the atmosphere of the scene. Though the Imagist movement itself lasted only a short time (from about 1912 to 1917), it had a far-reaching influence on modern poets such as T.S. Eliot and William Carlos Williams.

FIGURES OF SPEECH

Imagery often works together with figurative expression to extend and deepen the meaning or impact of a poem. "Figurative" language means language that is metaphorical, not literal or referential. Through "figures of speech" such as metaphor and simile, metonymy, synecdoche, and personification, the writer may alter the ordinary, denotative meanings of words in order to convey greater force and vividness to ideas or impressions, often by showing likenesses between unlike things.

With simile, the poet makes an explicit comparison between the subject (called the tenor) and another object or idea (known as the vehicle), using "as" or "like":

It is a beauteous evening, calm and free,
The holy time is quiet as a Nun
Breathless with adoration. …

In this opening to a sonnet, Wordsworth uses a visual image of a nun in devout prayer to convey in concrete terms the less tangible idea of evening as a "holy time." The comparison also introduces an emotional dimension, conveying something of the feeling that the scene induces in the poet. The simile can thus illuminate and expand meaning in a compact way. The poet may also extend the simile to elaborate at length on any points of likeness.

In metaphor, the comparison between tenor and vehicle is implied: connectives such as "like" are omitted, and a kind of identity is created between the subject and the term with which it is being compared. Thus in John Donne's "The Good-Morrow," a lover asserts the endless joy that he and his beloved find in each other:

> My face in thine eye, thine in mine appears,
> And true plain hearts do in the faces rest;
> Where can we find two better hemispheres,
> Without sharp north, without declining west?

Here the lovers are transformed into "hemispheres," each of them a half of the world not subject to the usual natural phenomena of wintry cold ("sharp north") or the coming of night ("declining west"). Thus, they form a perfect world in balance, in which the normal processes of decay or decline have been arrested. Donne renders the abstract idea of a love that defies change in pictorial and physical terms, making it more real and accessible to us. The images here are all the more arresting for the degree of concentration involved; it is not merely the absence of "like" or "as" that gives the metaphor such direct power, but the fusion of distinct images and emotions into a new idea.

Personification is the figure of speech in which the writer endows abstract ideas, inanimate objects, or animals with human characteristics. In other words, it is a type of implied metaphorical comparison in which aspects of a non-human subject are compared to the feelings, appearance, or actions of a human being. In the second stanza of his ode "To Autumn," Keats personifies the concept of autumnal harvesting in the form of a woman, "sitting careless on a granary floor, / Thy hair soft-lifted by the winnowing wind." Personification may also help to create a mood, as when Thomas Gray attributes human feelings to a hooting owl in "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard"; using such words as "moping" and "complain," Gray invests the bird's cries with the quality of human melancholy:

> … from yonder ivy-mantled tow'r
> The moping owl does to the moon complain
> Of such, as wand'ring near her secret bow'r,
> Molest her ancient solitary reign.

In his book Modern Painters (1856), the English critic John Ruskin criticized such attribution of human feelings to objects in nature. Calling this device the "pathetic fallacy," he objected to what he saw as an irrational distortion of reality, producing "a falseness in all our impressions of external things." Modern criticism, with a distrust of any notions of an objective "reality," tends to use Ruskin's term as a neutral label simply to describe instances of extended personification of natural objects.

Apostrophe, which is closely related to personification, has the speaker directly addressing a non-human object or idea as if it were a sentient human listener. Blake's "The Sick Rose," Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind," and his ode "To a Sky-Lark" all employ apostrophe, personifying the object addressed. Keats's "Ode on a Grecian Urn" begins by apostrophizing the urn ("Thou still unravish'd bride of quietness"), then addresses it in a series of questions and reflections through which the speaker attempts to unravel the urn's mysteries.

Apostrophe also appeals to or addresses a person who is absent or dead. W.H. Auden's lament "In Memory of W.B. Yeats" apostrophizes both the earth in which Yeats is to be buried ("Earth, receive an honoured guest") and the dead poet himself ("Follow, poet, follow right / To the bottom of the night ..."). Religious prayers offer an illustration of the usefulness of apostrophe, since they are direct appeals from an earth-bound supplicant to an invisible god. The suggestion of strong emotion associated with such appeals is a common feature of apostrophe in poetry also, especially poetry with a religious theme, like Donne's "Holy Sonnets" (e.g., "Batter My Heart, Three-Personed God").

Metonymy and synecdoche are two closely related figures of speech that further illustrate the power of metaphorical language to convey meaning more intensely and vividly than is possible with prosaic statement. Metonymy (from the Greek, meaning "change of name") involves referring to an object or concept by substituting the name of another object or concept with which it is usually associated: for example, we might speak of "the Crown" when we mean the monarch, or describe the US executive branch as "the White House." When the writer uses only part of something to signify the whole, or an individual to represent a class, we have an instance of synecdoche: T.S. Eliot provides an example in "The Love Song of J. Alfred Prufrock" when a crab is described as "a pair of ragged claws." Similarly, synecdoche is present in Milton's contemptous term "blind mouths" to describe the "corrupted clergy" he attacks in "Lycidas."

Dylan Thomas employs both metonymy and synecdoche in his poem "The Hand That Signed the Paper":

> The hand that signed the paper felled a city;
> Five sovereign fingers taxed the breath,
> Doubled the globe of dead and halved a country;
> These five kings did a king to death.
> The mighty hand leads to a sloping shoulder,
> The finger joints are cramped with chalk;
> A goose's quill has put an end to murder
> That put an end to talk.
> The hand that signed the treaty bred a fever,
> And famine grew, and locusts came;
> Great is the hand that holds dominion over
> Man by a scribbled name.
> The five kings count the dead but do not soften
> The crusted wound nor stroke the brow;
> A hand rules pity as a hand rules heaven;
> Hands have no tears to flow.

The "hand" of the poem is evidently a synecdoche for a great king who enters into treaties with friends and foes to wage wars, conquer kingdoms, and extend his personal power—all at the expense of his suffering subjects. The "goose quill" of the second stanza is a metonymy, standing for the pen used to sign the treaty or the death warrant that brings the war to an end.

Thomas's poem is an excellent example of the power of figurative language, which, by its vividness and concentrated force, can add layers of meaning to a poem, make abstract ideas concrete, and intensify the poem's emotional impact.

THE POEM AS PERFORMANCE: WRITER AND PERSON

Poetry is always dramatic. Sometimes the drama is explicit, as in Robert Browning's monologues, in which we hear the voice of a participant in a dialogue; in "My Last Duchess" we are present as the Duke reflects on the portrait of his late wife for the benefit of a visitor who has come to negotiate on behalf of the woman who is to become the Duke's next wife. Or we listen with amusement and pity as the dying Bishop addresses his venal and unsympathetic sons and tries to bargain with them for a fine burial ("The Bishop Orders His Tomb at St. Praxed's"). In such poems, the notion of a speaking voice is paramount: the speaker is a personage in a play, and the poem a means of conveying plot and character.

Sometimes the drama is less apparent, and takes the form of a plea, or a compliment, or an argument addressed to a silent listener. In Donne's "The Flea" we can infer from the poem the situation that has called it forth: a lover's advances are being rejected by his beloved, and his poem is an argument intended to overcome her reluctance by means of wit and logic. We can see a similar example in Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress": here the very shape of the poem, its three-paragraph structure, corresponds to the stages of the speaker's argument as he presents an apparently irrefutable line of reasoning. Much love poetry has this kind of background as its inspiration; the yearnings or lamentations of the lover are part of an imagined scene, not merely versified reflections about an abstraction called "love."

Meditative or reflective poetry can be dramatic too. Donne's "Holy Sonnets" are pleas from a tormented soul struggling to find its god; Tennyson's "In Memoriam" follows the agonized workings of a mind tracing a path from grief and anger to acceptance and renewed hope.

We should never assume that the speaker, the "I" of the poem, is simply a voice for the writer's own views. The speaker in W.H. Auden's "To an Unknown Citizen," presenting a summary of the dead citizen's life, appears to be an official spokesperson for the society which the citizen served ("Our report on his union"; "Our researchers ..." etc.). The speaker's words are laudatory, yet we perceive immediately that Auden's own views of this society are anything but approving. The speaker seems satisfied with the highly regimented nature of his society, one in which every aspect of the individual's life is under scrutiny and subject to correction. The only things necessary to the happiness of the "Modern Man," it seems, are "A phonograph, a radio, a car, and a frigidaire." The tone here is subtly ironic, an irony created by the gap between the imagined speaker's perception and the real feelings of the writer.

PERFORMANCE POETRY

Poetry began as an oral art, passed on in the form of chants, myths, ballads, and legends recited to an audience of listeners rather than readers. Even today, the dramatic qualities of a poem may extend beyond written text. "Performance poets" combine poetry and stagecraft in presenting their work to live audiences. Dramatic uses of voice, rhythm, body movement, music, and sometimes other visual effects make the "text" of the poem multi-dimensional. For example, Edith Sitwell's poem-sequence Façade (1922) was originally set to music: Sitwell read from behind a screen, while a live orchestra played. This performance was designed to enhance the verbal and rhythmic qualities of her poetry:

Beneath the flat and paper sky
The sun, a demon's eye
Glowed through the air, that mask of glass;
All wand'ring sounds that pass

Seemed out of tune, as if the light
Were fiddle-strings pulled tight.
The market-square with spire and bell
Clanged out the hour in Hell.

By performing their poetry, writers can also convey cultural values and traditions. The cultural aspect of performance is central to Black poetry, which originates in a highly oral tradition of folklore and storytelling. From its roots in Africa, this oral tradition has been manifested in the songs and stories of slaves, in spirituals, in the jazz rhythms of the Twenties and the Thirties and in the rebelliousness of reggae and of rap. Even when it remains "on the page," much Black poetry written in the oral tradition has a compelling rhythmic quality. The lines below from Linton Kwesi Johnson's "Mi Revalueshanary Fren," for example, blur the line between spoken poetry and song. Johnson often performs his "dub poetry" against reggae musical backings.

yes, people powa jus a showa evry howa an evrybady claim dem democratic but some a wolf an some a sheep an dat is problematic

The chorus of Johnson's poems, with its constant repetitions, digs deeply into the roots of African song and chant. Its performance qualities become clearer when the poem is read aloud:

Husak
e ad to go
Honnicka
e ad to go
Chowcheskhu
e ad to go
Just like apartied will av to go

To perform a poem is one way to see and hear poetry as multi-dimensional, cultural, historical, and often also political. Performance is also another way to discover how poetic "meaning" can be constructed in the dynamic relation between speaker and listener.

TONE: THE SPEAKER'S ATTITUDE

In understanding poetry, it is helpful to imagine a poem as having a "voice." The voice may be close to the poet's own, or that of an imagined character, a persona adopted by the poet. The tone of the voice will reveal the speaker's attitude to the subject, thus helping to shape our understanding and response. In speech we can indicate our feelings by raising or lowering our voices, and we can accompany words with physical actions. In writing, we must try to convey the tonal inflections of the speaking voice through devices of language and rhythm, through imagery and figures of speech, and through allusions and contrasts.

THE IRONIC TONE

Housman's poem "Terence, This Is Stupid Stuff" offers a useful example of ways in which manipulating tone can reinforce meaning. When Housman, presenting himself in the poem as "Terence," imagines himself to be criticized for writing gloomy poems, his response to his critics takes the form of an ironic alternative: perhaps they should stick to drinking ale:

> Oh, many a peer of England brews
> Livelier liquor than the Muse,
> And malt does more than Milton can
> To justify God's ways to man.

The tone here is one of heavy scorn. The speaker is impatient with those who refuse to look at the realities of life and death, and who prefer to take refuge in simple-minded pleasure. The ludicrous comparisons, first between the brewers who have been made peers of England and the classical Muse of poetry, then between malt and Milton, create a sense of disproportion and ironic tension; the explicit allusion to Paradise Lost ("To justify God's ways to man") helps to drive home the poet's bitter recognition that his auditors are part of that fallen world depicted by Milton, yet unable or unwilling to acknowledge their harsh condition. The three couplets that follow offer a series of contrasts: in each case, the first line sets up a pleasant expectation and the second dashes it with a blunt reminder of reality:

> Ale, man, ale's the stuff to drink
> For fellows whom it hurts to think:
> Look into the pewter pot
> To see the world as the world's not.
> And faith, 'tis pleasant till 'tis past:
> The mischief is that 'twill not last.

These are all jabs at the "sterling lads" who would prefer to lie in "lovely muck" and not think about the way the world is. Housman's sardonic advice is all the more pointed for its sharp and ironic tone.

POETIC FORMS

In poetry, language is intimately related to form, which is the structuring of words within identifiable patterns. In prose we speak of phrases, sentences, and paragraphs; in poetry, we identify structures by lines, stanzas, or complete forms such as the sonnet or the ode (though poetry in complete or blank verse has paragraphs of variable length, not formal stanzas: see below).

Rightly handled, the form enhances expression and meaning, just as a frame can define and enhance a painting or photograph. Unlike the photo frame, however, form in poetry is an integral part of the whole work. At one end of the scale, the term "form" may describe the epic, the lengthy narrative governed by such conventions as division into books, a lofty style, and the interplay between human and supernatural characters. At the other end lies the epigram, a witty and pointed saying whose distinguishing characteristic is its brevity, as in Alexander Pope's famous couplet,

I am his Highness' dog at Kew;
Pray tell me sir, whose dog are you?

Between the epic and the epigram lie many other poetic forms, such as the sonnet, the ballad, or the ode. "Form" may also describe stanzaic patterns like couplets and quatrains.

"FIXED FORM" POEMS

The best-known poetic form is probably the sonnet, the fourteen-line poem inherited from Italy (the word itself is from the Italian sonetto, little song or sound). Within those fourteen lines, whether the poet chooses the "Petrarchan" rhyme scheme or the "English" form (see below in the section on "Rhyme"), the challenge is to develop an idea or situation that must find its statement and its resolution within the strict confines of the sonnet frame. Typically, there is an initial idea, description, or statement of feeling, followed by a "turn" in the thought that takes the reader by surprise, or that casts the situation in an unexpected light. Thus in Sonnet 130, "My Mistress' Eyes Are Nothing Like the Sun," William Shakespeare spends the first three quatrains apparently disparaging his lover in a series of unfavorable comparisons—"If snow be white, why then her breasts are dun"—but in the closing couplet his point becomes clear:

And yet, by heaven, I think my love as rare
As any she belied with false compare.

In other words, the speaker's disparaging comparisons have really been parodies of sentimental clichés which falsify reality; his mistress has no need of the exaggerations or distortions of conventional love poetry.

Other foreign forms borrowed and adapted by English-language poets include the ghazal and the pantoum. The ghazal, strongly associated with classical Urdu literature, originated in Persia and Arabia and was brought to the Indian subcontinent in the twelfth century. It consists of a series of couplets held together by a refrain, a simple rhyme scheme (a/a, b/a, c/a, d/a...), and a common rhythm, but only loosely related in theme or subject. Some English-language practitioners of the form have captured the epigrammatic quality of the ghazal, but most do not adhere to the strict pattern of the classical form.

The pantoum, based on a Malaysian form, was imported into English poetry via the work of nineteenth-century French poets. Typically it presents a series of quatrains rhyming abab, linked by a pattern of repetition in which the second and fourth lines of a quatrain become the first and third lines of the stanza that follows. In the poem's final stanza, the pattern is reversed: the second line repeats the third line of the first stanza, and the last line repeats the poem's opening line, thus creating the effect of a loop.

Similar to the pantoum in the circularity of its structure is the villanelle, originally a French form, with five tercets and a concluding quatrain held together by only two rhymes (aba, aba, aba, aba, aba, abaa) and by a refrain that repeats the first line at lines 6, 12, and 18, while the third line of the first tercet reappears as lines 9, 15, and 19. With its interlocking rhymes and elaborate repetitions, the villanelle can create a variety of tonal effects, ranging from lighthearted parody to the sonorous and earnest exhortation of Dylan Thomas's "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night."

STANZAIC FORMS

Recurring formal groupings of lines within a poem are usually described as "stanzas." Both the recurring and the formal aspects of stanzaic forms are important; it is a common misconception to think that any group of lines in a poem, if it is set off by line spaces, constitutes a stanza. If such a group of lines is not patterned as one of a recurring group sharing similar formal characteristics, however, then it may be more appropriate to refer to such irregular groupings in the way we do for prose—as paragraphs. A ballad is typically divided into stanzas; a prose poem or a poem written in free verse, on the other hand, will rarely be divided into stanzas.

A stanza may be identified by the number of lines and the patterns of rhyme repeated in each grouping. One of the simpler traditional forms is the ballad stanza, with its alternating four and three-foot lines and its abcb rhyme scheme. Drawing on this form's association with medieval ballads and legends, Keats produces the eerie mystery of "La Belle Dame Sans Merci":

> I saw pale kings and princes too,
> Pale warriors, death-pale were they all;
> They cried—"La Belle Dame sans Merci
> Hath thee in thrall!"

Such imitations are a form of literary allusion; Keats uses a traditional stanza form to remind us of poems like "Sir Patrick Spens" or "Barbara Allen" to dramatize the painful thralldom of love by placing it within a well-known tradition of ballad narratives with similar forms and themes.

The four-line stanza, or quatrain, may be used for a variety of effects: from the elegiac solemnity of Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard" to the apparent lightness and simplicity of some of Emily Dickinson's poems. Tennyson used a rhyming quatrain to such good effect in In Memoriam that the form he employed (four lines of iambic tetrameter rhyming abba) is known as the "In Memoriam stanza."

Other commonly used forms of stanza include the rhyming couplet, terza rima, ottava rima, rhyme royal, and the Spenserian stanza. Each of these is a rhetorical unit within a longer whole, rather like a paragraph within an essay. The poet's choice among such forms is dictated, at least in part, by the effects that each may produce. Thus the rhyming couplet often expresses a complete statement within two lines, creating a sense of density of thought, of coherence and closure; it is particularly effective where the writer wishes to set up contrasts, or to achieve the witty compactness of epigram:

> Of all mad creatures, if the learn'd are right,
> It is the slaver kills, and not the bite.
> A fool quite angry is quite innocent:
> Alas! 'tis ten times worse when they repent.
> (from Pope, "Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot")

Ottava rima, as its Italian name implies, is an eight-line stanza, with the rhyme scheme abababcc. Like the sonnet, it is long enough to allow the development of a single thought in some detail and complexity, with a concluding couplet that may extend the central idea or cast it in a wholly unexpected light. W.B. Yeats uses this stanza form in "Sailing to Byzantium" and "Among Schoolchildren." Though much used by Renaissance poets, it is particularly associated with George Gordon, Lord Byron's Don Juan, in which the poet exploits to the full its potential for devastating irony and bathos. It is long enough to allow the development of a single thought in some detail and complexity; the concluding couplet can then, sonnet-like, turn that thought upon its head, or cast it in a wholly unexpected light:

Sagest of women, even of widows, she
    Resolved that Juan should be quite a paragon,
And worthy of the noblest pedigree
    (His sire was of Castile, his dam from Aragon).
Then for accomplishments of chivalry,
    In case our lord the king should go to war again,
He learned the arts of riding, fencing, gunnery,
And how to scale a fortress—or a nunnery.

(Don Juan I.38)

FREE VERSE

Not all writers want the order and symmetry—some might say the restraints and limitations—of traditional forms, and many have turned to free verse as a means of liberating their thoughts and feelings. Deriving its name from the French "vers libre" made popular by the French Symbolistes at the end of the nineteenth century, free verse is characterized by irregularity of meter, line length, and rhyme. This does not mean that it is without pattern; rather, it tends to follow more closely than other forms the unforced rhythms and accents of natural speech, making calculated use of spacing, line breaks, and "cadences," the rhythmic units that govern phrasing in speech.

Free verse is not a modern invention. Milton was an early practitioner, as was Blake; however, it was the great modern writers of free verse—first Walt Whitman, then Pound, Eliot, and William Carlos Williams (interestingly, all Americans, at least originally)—who gave this form a fluidity and flexibility that could free the imagination to deal with any kind of feeling or experience. Perhaps because it depends so much more than traditional forms upon the individual intuitions of the poet, it is the form of poetic structure most commonly found today. The best practitioners recognize that free verse, like any other kind of poetry, demands clarity, precision, and a close connection between technique and meaning.

PROSE POETRY

At the furthest extreme from traditional forms lies poetry written in prose. Contradictory as this label may seem, the two have much in common. Prose has at its disposal all the figurative devices available to poetry, such as metaphor, personification, or apostrophe; it may use structuring devices such as verbal repetition or parallel syntactical structures; it can draw on the same tonal range, from pathos to irony. The difference is that prose poetry accomplishes its ends in sentences and paragraphs, rather than lines or stanzas. First given prominence by the French poet Charles Baudelaire (Petits Poèmes en prose, 1862), the form is much used to present fragments of heightened sensation, conveyed through vivid or impressionistic description. It draws upon such prosaic forms as journal entries, lists, even footnotes. Prose poetry should be distinguished from "poetic prose," which may be found in a variety of settings (from the King James Bible to the fiction of Jeanette Winterson); the distinction—which not all critics would accept—appears to lie in the writer's intention.

Christan Bök's Eunoia is an interesting example of the ways in which a writer of prose poetry may try to balance the demands of each medium. Eunoia is an avowedly experimental work in which each chapter is restricted to the use of a single vowel. The text is governed by a series of rules described by the author in an afterword; they include a requirement that all chapters "must allude to the art of writing. All sentences must accent internal rhyme through the use of syntactical parallelism. The text must exhaust the lexicon for each vowel, citing at least 98% of the available repertoire…." Having imposed such constraints upon the language and form of the work, Bök then sets himself the task of showing that "even under such improbable conditions of duress, language can still express an uncanny, if not sublime, thought." The result is a surrealistic narrative that blends poetic and linguistic devices to almost hypnotic effect.

THE POEM AS A MATERIAL OBJECT

Both free verse and prose poetry pay attention in different ways to the poem as a living thing on the printed page. But the way in which poetry is presented in material form is an important part of the existence of almost any form of poetry. In the six volumes of this anthology the material form of the poem is highlighted by the inclusion of a number of facsimile reproductions of poems of other eras in their earliest extant material form.

RHYTHM AND SCANSION

When we read poetry, we often become aware of a pattern of rhythm within a line or set of lines. The formal analysis of that rhythmic pattern, or "meter," is called scansion. The verb "to scan" may carry different meanings, depending upon the context: if the critic "scans" a line, he or she is attempting to determine the metrical pattern in which it is cast; if the line "scans," we are making the observation that the line conforms to particular metrical rules. Whatever the context, the process of scansion is based on the premise that a line of verse is built on a pattern of stresses, a recurring set of more or less regular beats established by the alternation of light and heavy accents in syllables and words. The rhythmic pattern so distinguished in a given poem is said to be the "meter" of that poem. If we find it impossible to identify any specific metrical pattern, the poem is probably an example of free verse.

QUANTITATIVE, SYLLABIC, AND ACCENTUAL-SYLLABIC VERSE

Although we owe much of our terminology for analyzing or describing poetry to the Greeks and Romans, the foundation of our metrical system is quite different from theirs. They measured a line of verse by the duration of sound ("quantity") in each syllable, and by the combination of short and long syllables. Such poetry is known as quantitative verse.

Unlike Greek or Latin, English is a heavily accented language. Thus poetry of the Anglo-Saxon period, such as Beowulf, was accentual: that is, the lines were based on a fixed number of accents, or stresses, regardless of the number of syllables in the line:

Oft Scyld Scefing   sceapena þreatum monegum maegþum   meodosetla ofteah.

Few modern poets have written in the accentual tradition. A notable exception was Gerard Manley Hopkins, who based his line on a pattern of strong stresses that he called "sprung rhythm." Hopkins experimented with rhythms and stresses that approximate the accentual quality of natural speech; the result is a line that is emphatic, abrupt, even harsh in its forcefulness:

I caught this morning morning's minion, kingdom of daylight's dauphin, dapple-dawn-drawn
    Falcon, in his riding
Of the rolling level underneath him steady air ....

(from "The Windhover")

Under the influence of French poetry, following the Norman invasion of the eleventh century, English writers were introduced to syllabic prosody: that is, poetry in which the number of syllables is the determining factor in the length of any line, regardless of the number of stresses or their placement. A few modern writers have successfully produced syllabic poetry.

However, the accentual patterns of English, in speech as well as in poetry, were too strongly ingrained to disappear. Instead, the native accentual practice combined with the imported syllabic conventions to produce the accentual-syllabic line, in which the writer works with combinations of stressed and unstressed syllables in lines of equal syllabic length. Geoffrey Chaucer was the first great writer to employ the accentual-syllabic line in English poetry:

x / / x x / x /x / x
Ther was also a Nonne, a Prioresse,
x / x /x x / x x /
That of hir smiling was ful simple and coy.
x / x / x / x / x /
Hir gretteste ooth was but by saintè Loy,
x / x / x / x / x / x
And she was clepèd Madame Eglantine.
(from The Canterbury Tales)

The fundamental pattern here is the ten-syllable line (although the convention of sounding the final "e" at the end of a line in Middle English verse sometimes produces eleven syllables). Each line contains five stressed syllables, each of which alternates with one or two unstressed syllables. This was to become the predominant meter of poetry in English until the general adoption of free verse in the twentieth century.

IDENTIFYING POETIC METER

Conventionally, meter is established by dividing a line into roughly equal parts, based on the rise and fall of the rhythmic beats. Each of these divisions, conventionally marked by a bar, is known as a "foot," and within the foot there will be a combination of stressed and unstressed syllables, indicated by the prosodic symbols / (stressed) and x (unstressed).

x / x / x / x /
I know | that I | shall meet | my fate
/ x x / x / x /
Somewhere | among | the clouds | above …
(from Yeats, "An Irish Airman Foresees His Death")

To describe the meter used in a poem, we must first determine what kind of foot predominates, and then count the number of feet in each line. To describe the resultant meter we use terminology borrowed from classical prosody. In identifying the meter of English verse we commonly apply the following labels:

iambic (x /): a foot with one weak stress followed by one strong stress

x / x / x / x / x /
("Look home | ward, Ang | el, now, | and melt | with ruth")

trochaic (/ x): strong followed by weak

/ x / x / x /

("Ty-ger! | Ty-ger! | burning | bright")

anapaestic (x x /): two weak stresses, followed by a strong

x x / x x / x x /
("I have passed | with a nod | of the head")

dactylic (/ x x): strong stress followed by two weak

/ x x / x x /
("Hickory | dickory | dock")

spondaic (/ /): two strong stresses

/ / / x / x / x
("If hate | killed men,| Brother | Lawrence,
/ / / x / x /
God's blood,| would not | mine kill | you?")

We also use classical terms to describe the number of feet in a line. Thus, a line with one foot is monometer; with two feet, dimeter; three feet, trimeter; four feet, tetrameter; five feet, pentameter; and six feet, hexameter.

Scansion of the two lines from Yeats's "Irish Airman" quoted above shows that the predominant foot is iambic (x /), that there are four feet to each line, and that the poem is therefore written in iambic tetrameters. The first foot of the second line, however, may be read as a trochee ("Somewhere"); the variation upon the iambic norm here is an example of substitution, a means whereby the writer may avoid the monotony that would result from adhering too closely to a set rhythm. We very quickly build up an expectation about the dominant meter of a poem; the poet will sometimes disturb that expectation by changing the beat, and so through substitution create a pleasurable tension in our awareness.

The prevailing meter in English poetry is iambic, since the natural rhythm of spoken English is predominantly iambic. Nonetheless, poets may employ other rhythms where it suits their purpose. Thus W.H. Auden can create a solemn tone by the use of a trochaic meter (/ x):

/ x / x / x /
Earth, receive an honoured guest;
/ x / x / x /
William Yeats is laid to rest:
/ x / x / x /
Let the Irish vessel lie
/ x / x / x x
Emptied of its poetry.

The same meter may be much less funereal, as in Ben Jonson's song "To Celia":

/ x / x / x /
Come, my Celia, let us prove,
/ x / x / x /
While we may, the sports of love.
/ x / x / x / x
Time will not be ours forever;
/ x / x / x / x
He, at length, our good will sever.

The sense of greater pace in this last example derives in part from the more staccato phrasing, and also from the greater use of monosyllabic words. A more obviously lilting, dancing effect is obtained from anapaestic rhythm (x x /):

x / x x / x x / x x /
I sprang to the stirrup, and Joris, and he;
x / x x / x x / x x /
I galloped, Dirck galloped, we galloped all three.
/ / x x / x x / x x /
"Good speed!" cried the watch, as the gatebolts undrew;
/ / x x / x x / x x /
"Speed!" echoed the wall to us galloping through.
(from Browning, "How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix")

Coleridge wittily captured the varying effects of different meters in "Metrical Feet: Lesson for a Boy," which the poet wrote for his sons, and in which he marked the stresses himself:

/ x / x / x /
Trochee trips from long to short;
x / x / x / x /
From long to long in solemn sort
/ / x / / / x / / x
Slow Spondee stalks; strong foot! yet ill able / x x / x x / x x / x x
Ever to come up with Dactyl trisyllable.
x / x / x / x /
Iambics march from short to long:—
x x / x x / x x / x x /
With a leap and a bound the swift Anapaests throng....

A meter which often deals with serious themes is unrhymed iambic pentameter, also known as blank verse. This is the meter of Shakespeare's plays, notably his great tragedies; it is the meter, too, of Milton's Paradise Lost, to which it lends a desired sonority and magnificence; and of Wordsworth's "Lines Composed a Few Miles above Tintern Abbey," where the flexibility of the meter allows the writer to move by turns from description, to narration, to philosophical reflection.

RHYME, CONSONANCE, ASSONANCE, AND ALLITERATION

Perhaps the most obvious sign of poetic form is rhyme: that is, the repetition of syllables with the same or similar sounds. If the rhyme words are placed at the end of the line, they are known as end-rhymes. The opening stanza of Housman's "To an Athlete Dying Young" has two pairs of end-rhymes:

The time you won your town the race
We chaired you through the market-place;
Man and boy stood cheering by,
And home we brought you shoulder-high.

Words rhyming within a line are internal rhymes, as in the first and third lines of this stanza from Coleridge's "The Rime of the Ancient Mariner":

The fair breeze blew, the white foam flew

The furrow followed free;
We were the first that ever burst
Into that silent sea.

When, as is usually the case, the rhyme occurs in a stressed syllable, it is known as a masculine rhyme; if the rhyming word ends in an unstressed syllable, it is referred to as feminine. The difference is apparent in the opening stanzas of Alfred Tennyson's poem "The Lady of Shalott," where the first stanza establishes the basic iambic meter with strong stresses on the rhyming words:

On either side the river lie
Long fields of barley and of rye,
That clothe the wold and meet the sky;
And through the field the road runs by
To many-towered Camelot ...

In the second stanza Tennyson changes to trochaic lines, ending in unstressed syllables and feminine rhymes:

Willows whiten, aspens quiver,
Little breezes dusk and shiver
Through the wave that runs forever
By the island in the river
Flowing down to Camelot.

Not only does Tennyson avoid monotony here by his shift to feminine rhymes, he also darkens the mood by using words that imply a contrast with the bright warmth of day—"quiver," "dusk," "shiver"—in preparation for the introduction of the "silent isle" that embowers the Lady.

NEAR RHYMES

Most of the rhymes in "The Lady of Shalott" are exact, or "perfect" rhymes. However, in the second of the stanzas just quoted, it is evident that "forever" at the end of the third line is not a "perfect" rhyme; rather, it is an instance of "near" or "slant" rhyme. Such "imperfect" rhymes are quite deliberate; indeed, two stanzas later we find the rhyming sequence "early," "barley," "cheerly," and "clearly," followed by the rhymes "weary," "airy," and "fairy." As with the introduction of feminine rhymes, such divergences from one dominant pattern prevent monotony and avoid a too-mechanical sing-song effect.

More importantly, near-rhymes have an oddly unsettling effect, perhaps because they both raise and frustrate our expectation of a perfect rhyme. Their use certainly gives added emphasis to the words at the end of these chilling lines from Wilfred Owen's "Strange Meeting":

For by my glee might many men have laughed,
And of my weeping something had been left,
Which must die now. I mean the truth untold,
The pity of war, the pity war distilled.
Now men will go content with what we spoiled,
Or, discontent, boil bloody, and be spilled.

CONSONANCE AND ASSONANCE

In Owen's poem, the near-rhymes "laughed / left" and "spoiled / spilled" are good examples of consonance, which pairs words with similar consonants but different intervening vowels. Other examples from Owen's poem include "groined / groaned," "hall / Hell," "years / yours," and "mystery / mastery."

Related to consonance as a linking device is assonance, the echoing of similar vowel sounds in the stressed syllables of words with differing consonants (lane/hail, penitent/reticence). A device favored particularly by descriptive poets, it appears often in the work of the English Romantics, especially Shelley and Keats, and their great Victorian successor Tennyson, all of whom had a good ear for the musical quality of language. In the following passage, Tennyson makes effective use of repeated "o" and "ow" sounds to suggest the soft moaning of the wind as it spreads the seed of the lotos plant:

> The Lotos blooms below the barren peak,
> The Lotos blows by every winding creek;
> All day the wind breathes low with mellower tone;
> Through every hollow cave and alley lone
> Round and round the spicy downs the yellow Lotos dust is blown.
> (from "The Lotos-Eaters")

ALLITERATION

Alliteration connects words which have the same initial consonant. Like consonance and rhyme, alliteration adds emphasis, throwing individual words into strong relief, and lending force to rhythm. This is especially evident in the work of Gerard Manley Hopkins, where alliteration works in conjunction with the heavy stresses of sprung rhythm:

> Brute beauty and valour and act, oh, air, pride, plume, here
> Buckle! AND the fire that breaks from thee then, a billion
> Times told lovelier, more dangerous, O my chevalier!
> (from "The Windhover")

Like assonance, alliteration is useful in descriptive poetry, reinforcing an impression or mood through repeated sounds:

> Thou on whose stream, 'mid the steep sky's commotion,
> Loose clouds like Earth's decaying leaves are shed,
> Shook from the tangled boughs of Heaven and Ocean ....
> (from Percy Shelley, "Ode to the West Wind")

The repetition of "s" and "sh" sounds conveys the rushing sound of a wind that drives everything before it. This effect is also an example of onomatopoeia, a figure of speech in which the sound of the words seems to echo the sense.

RHYME AND POETIC STRUCTURE

Rhyme may play a central role in the structure of a poem. This is particularly apparent in the sonnet form, where the expression of the thought is heavily influenced by the poet's choice of rhyme-scheme. The "English" or "Shakespearean" sonnet has three quatrains rhyming abab, cdcd, efef, and concludes with a rhyming couplet, gg. This pattern lends itself well to the statement and restatement of an idea, as we find, for example, in Shakespeare's sonnet "That time of year thou mayst in me behold." Each of the quatrains presents an image of decline or decay—a tree in winter, the coming of night, a dying fire; the closing couplet then relates these images to the thought of an impending separation and attendant feelings of loss.

The organization of the "Italian" or "Petrarchan" sonnet, by contrast, hinges on a rhyme scheme that creates two parts, an eight-line section (the octave) typically rhyming abbaabba, and a concluding six-line section (the sestet) rhyming cdecde or some other variation. In the octave, the writer describes a thought or feeling; in the sestet, the writer may elaborate upon that thought, or may introduce a sudden "turn" or change of direction. A good example of the Italian form is Donne's "Batter My Heart, Three-Personed God."

The rhyming pattern established at the beginning of a poem is usually followed throughout; thus the opening sets up an expectation in the reader, which the poet may sometimes play on by means of an unexpected or surprising rhyme. This is especially evident in comic verse, where peculiar or unexpected rhymes can contribute a great deal to the comic effect:

> I shoot the Hippopotamus > with bullets made of platinum,
> Because if I use leaden ones
> his hide is sure to flatten 'em.
> (Hilaire Belloc, "The Hippopotamus")

Finally, one of the most obvious yet important aspects of rhyme is its sound. It acts as a kind of musical punctuation, lending verse an added resonance and beauty. And as anyone who has ever had to learn poetry by heart will testify, the sound of rhyme is a powerful aid to memorization and recall, from helping a child to learn numbers—

> One, two,
> Buckle my shoe,
> Three, four,
> Knock at the door—

—to selling toothpaste through an advertising jingle in which the use of rhyme drives home the identity of a product:

> You'll wonder where the yellow went,
> When you brush your teeth with Pepsodent.

OTHER FORMS WITH INTERLOCKING RHYMES

Other forms besides the sonnet depend upon rhyme for their structural integrity. These include the rondeau, a poem of thirteen lines in three stanzas, with two half lines acting as a refrain, and having only two rhymes. The linking effect of rhyme is also essential to the three-line stanza called terza rima, the form chosen by Shelley for his "Ode to the West Wind," where the rhyme scheme (aba, bcb, cdc, etc.) gives a strong sense of forward movement. But a poet need not be limited to particular forms to use interlocking rhyme schemes.

THE POET'S TASK

The poet's task, in Sir Philip Sidney's view, is to move us to virtue and well-doing by coming to us with > words set in delightful proportion, either accompanied with, or prepared for, the well-enchanting skill of music; and with a tale forsooth he cometh unto you, with a tale which holdeth children from play, and old men from the chimney corner; and pretending no more, doth intend the winning of the mind from wickedness to virtue: even as the child is often brought to take most wholesome things by hiding them in such other as have a pleasant taste.

> (The Defence of Poesy, 1593)

Modern poets have been less preoccupied with the didactic or moral force of poetry, its capacity to win the mind to virtue; nonetheless, like their Renaissance counterparts, they view poetry as a means to understanding, a point of light in an otherwise dark universe. To Robert Frost, a poem "begins in delight and ends in wisdom":

> It begins in delight, it inclines to the impulse, it assumes direction with the first line laid down, it runs a course of lucky events, and ends in a clarification of life—not necessarily a great clarification, such as sects and cults are founded on, but in a momentary stay against confusion.
> ("The Figure a Poem Makes," Collected Poems, 1939)

Rhyme and meter are important tools at the poet's disposal, and can be valuable aids in developing thought as well as in creating rhythmic or musical effects. However, the technical skills needed to turn a good line or create metrical complexities should not be confused with the ability to write good poetry. Sidney wryly observes in his Defence of Poesy that "there have been many excellent poets that never versified, and now swarm many versifiers that need never answer to the name of poets.…[I]t is not rhyming and versing that maketh a poet, no more than a long gown maketh an advocate." Technical virtuosity may arouse our admiration, but something else is needed to bring that "constriction of the throat and … precipitation of water to the eyes" that A.E. Housman speaks about. What that "something" is will always elude definition, and is perhaps best left for readers and listeners to determine for themselves through their own encounters with poetry.

GLOSSARY OF TERMS

Accent: the natural emphasis (stress) speakers place on a syllable.

Accentual Verse: poetry in which a line is measured only by the number of accents or stresses, not by the number of syllables.

Accentual-Syllabic Verse: the most common metrical system in traditional English verse, in which a line is measured by the number of syllables and by the pattern of accented (stressed) and unaccented (unstressed) syllables.

Aesthetes: members of a late nineteenth-century movement that valued "art for art's sake"—for its purely aesthetic qualities, as opposed to valuing art for the moral content it may convey, for the intellectual stimulation it may provide, or for a range of other qualities.

Alexandrine: a line of verse that is 12 syllables long. In English verse, the alexandrine is always an iambic hexameter: that is, it has six iambic feet. The most-often quoted example is the second line in a couplet from Alexander Pope's "Essay on Criticism" (1711): "A needless Alexandrine ends the song / That, like a wounded snake, drags its slow length along." See also Spenserian stanza.

Allegory: a narrative with both a literal meaning and secondary, often symbolic meaning or meanings. Allegory frequently employs personification to give concrete embodiment to abstract concepts or entities, such as feelings or personal qualities. It may also present one set of characters or events in the guise of another, using implied parallels for the purposes of satire or political comment, as in John Dryden's poem "Absalom and Achitophel."

Alliteration: the grouping of words with the same initial consonant (e.g., "break, blow, burn, and make me new"). The repetition of sound acts as a connector. See also assonance and consonance.

Alliterative Verse: poetry that employs alliteration of stressed syllables in each line as its chief structural principle.

Allusion: a reference, often indirect or unidentified, to a person, thing, or event. A reference in one literary work to another literary work, whether to its content or its form, also constitutes an allusion.

Ambiguity: an "opening" of language created by the writer to allow for multiple meanings or differing interpretations. In literature, ambiguity may be deliberately employed by the writer to enrich meaning; this differs from any unintentional, unwanted, ambiguity in non-literary prose.

Amphibrach: a metrical foot with three syllables, the second of which is stressed: x / x (e.g., sensation).

Analogy: a broad term that refers to our processes of noting similarities among things or events. Specific forms of analogy in poetry include simile and metaphor (see below).

Anapaest: a metrical foot containing two unstressed syllables followed by one stressed syllable: xx / (e.g., underneath, intervene).

Anglican Church / Church of England: formed after Henry VIII's break with Rome in the 1530s, the Church of England had acquired a permanently Protestant cast by the 1570s. There has remained considerable variation within the Church, however, with distinctions often drawn among High Church, Broad Church, and Latitudinarian. At one extreme High Church Anglicans (some of whom prefer to be known as "Anglo-Catholics") prefer relatively elaborate church rituals not dissimilar in form to those of the Roman Catholic Church and place considerable emphasis on church hierarchy, while in the other direction Latitudinarians prefer relatively informal religious services and tend far more towards egalitarianism.

Antistrophe: from Greek drama, the chorus's countermovement or reply to an initial movement (strophe). See ode below.

Apostrophe: a figure of speech (a trope; see figures of speech below) in which a writer directly addresses an object—or a dead or absent person—as if the imagined audience were actually listening.

Archetype: in literature and mythology, a recurring idea, symbol, motif, character, or place. To some scholars and psychologists, an archetype represents universal human thought-patterns or experiences.

Assonance: the repetition of identical or similar vowel sounds in stressed syllables in which the surrounding consonants are different: for example, "shame" and "fate"; "gale" and "cage"; or the long "i" sounds in "Beside the pumice isle..."

Aubade: a lyric poem that greets or laments the arrival of dawn.

Ballad: a folk song, or a poem originally recited to an audience, which tells a dramatic story based on legend or history.

Ballad Stanza: a quatrain with alternating four-stress and three-stress lines, rhyming abcb. A variant is "common measure," in which the alternating lines are strictly iambic, and rhyme abab.

Ballade: a fixed form most commonly characterized by only three rhymes, with an 8-line stanza rhyming ababbcbc and an envoy rhyming bcbc. Both Chaucer and Dante Gabriel Rossetti ("Ballad of the Dead Ladies") adopted this form.

Baroque: powerful and heavily ornamented in style. "Baroque" is a term from the history of visual art and of music that is sometimes also used to describe certain literary styles, such as that of Richard Crashaw.

Bathos: an anticlimactic effect brought about by a writer's descent from an elevated subject or tone to the ordinary or trivial.

Benedictine Rule: set of instructions for monastic communities, composed by Saint Benedict of Nursia (died c. 457).

Blank Verse: unrhymed lines written in iambic pentameter, a form introduced to English verse by Henry Howard, Earl of Surrey, in his translation of parts of Virgil's Aeneid in 1547.

Bombast: inappropriately inflated or grandiose language.

Broadside: individual sheet of paper printed on only one side. From the sixteenth through to the eighteenth centuries broadsides of a variety of different sorts (e.g., ballads, political tracts, short satires) were sold on the streets.

Broken Rhyme: in which a multi-syllable word is split at the end of a line and continued onto the next, to allow an end-rhyme with the split syllable.

Burlesque: satire of a particularly exaggerated sort, particularly that which ridicules its subject by emphasizing its vulgar or ridiculous aspects.

Caesura: a pause or break in a line of verse occurring where a phrase, clause, or sentence ends, and indicated in scansion by the mark II. If it occurs in the middle of the line, it is known as a "medial" caesura.

Canon: in literature, those works that are commonly accepted as possessing authority or importance. In practice, "canonical" texts or authors are those that are discussed most frequently by scholars and taught most frequently in university courses.

Canto: a sub-section of a long (usually epic) poem.

Canzone: a short song or poem, with stanzas of equal length and an envoy.

Carpe Diem: Latin (from Horace) meaning "seize the day." The idea of enjoying the moment is a common one in Renaissance love poetry. See, for example, Marvell's "To His Coy Mistress."

Catalexis: the omission of unstressed syllables from a line of verse (such a line is referred to as "catalectic"). In iambic verse it is usually the first syllable of the line that is omitted; in trochaic, the last. For example, in the first stanza of Housman's "To an Athlete Dying Young" the third line is catalectic: i.e., it has dropped the first, unstressed syllable called for by the poem's iambic tetrameter form: "The time you won your town the race / We chaired you through the market-place; / Man and boy stood cheering by, / And home we brought you shoulder-high."

Catharsis: the arousal through the performance of a dramatic tragedy of "emotions of pity and fear" to a point where "purgation" or "purification" occurs and the feelings are released or transformed. The concept was developed by Aristotle in his Poetics from an ancient Greek medical concept, and adapted by him into an aesthetic principle.

Chiasmus: a figure of speech (a scheme) that reverses word order in successive parallel clauses. If the word order is A-B-C in the first clause, it becomes C-B-A in the second: for example, Donne's line "She is all states, and all princes, I" ("The Sun Rising") incorporates this reversal (though with an ellipsis).

Classical: originating in or relating to ancient Greek or Roman culture. As commonly conceived, classical implies a strong sense of formal order. The term neoclassical is often used with reference to literature of the Restoration and eighteenth century that was strongly influenced by ancient Greek and Roman models.

Closet Drama: a play (typically in verse) written for private performance. The term came into use in the first half of the nineteenth century.

Colored Narrative: alternative term for free indirect discourse.

Comedy: as a literary term, used originally to denote that class of ancient Greek drama in which the action ends happily. More broadly the term has been used to describe a wide variety of literary forms of a more or less light-hearted character.

Commedia dell'arte*: largely improvised comic performances conducted by masked performers and involving considerable physical activity. The genre of commedia dell'arte originated in Italy in the sixteenth century; it was influential throughout Europe for more than two centuries thereafter.

Commonwealth: from the fifteenth century, a term roughly equivalent to the modern "state," but tending to emphasize the commonality of interests among all citizens. In the seventeenth century Britain was named a commonwealth under Oliver Cromwell. In the twentieth century, the term came to be applied to associations of many nations; the British Commonwealth became the successor to the British Empire.

Conceit: an unusually elaborate metaphor or simile that extends beyond its original tenor and vehicle, sometimes becoming a "master" analogy for the entire poem (see, for example, Donne's "The Flea," and Robert Frost's sonnet "She is as in a field a silken tent"). Ingenious or fanciful images and comparisons were especially popular with the metaphysical poets of the seventeenth century, giving rise to the term "metaphysical conceit."

Concrete Poetry: an experimental form, most popular during the 1950s and 60s, in which the printed type itself forms a visual image of the poem's key words or ideas. See also pattern poetry, assonance.

Connotation: the implied, often unspoken meaning(s) of a given word, as distinct from its denotation, or literal meaning. Connotations may have highly emotional undertones and are usually culturally specific.

Conservative Party: See Political Parties.

Consonance: the pairing of words with similar initial and ending consonants, but with different vowel sounds (live/love, wander/wonder). See also alliteration.

Convention: aesthetic approach, technique, or practice accepted as characteristic and appropriate for a particular form. It is a convention of certain sorts of plays, for example, that the characters speak in blank verse, of other sorts of plays that characters speak in rhymed couplets, and of still other sorts of dramatic performances that characters frequently break into song to express their feelings.

Couplet: a pair of rhyming lines, usually in the same meter. If they form a complete unit of thought and are grammatically complete, the lines are known as a closed couplet. See also heroic couplet below.

Dactyl: a metrical foot containing one strong stress followed by two weak stresses: / xx (e.g., muttering, helplessly). A minor form known as "double dactyls" makes use of this meter for humorous purposes, e.g., "Jiggery pokery" or "Higgledy piggledy."

Denotation: See connotation above.

Devolution: process through which a degree of political power was transferred in the late twentieth and early twenty-first centuries from the British government to assemblies in Scotland and in Wales.

Dialogue: words spoken by characters to one another. (When a character is addressing him or her self or the audience directly, the words spoken are referred to as a monologue.)

Diction: word choice. Whether the diction of a literary work (or of a literary character) is colloquial, conversational, formal, or of some other type contributes significantly to the tone of the text as well as to characterization.

Didacticism: aesthetic approach emphasizing moral instruction.

Dimeter: a poetic line containing two metrical feet.

Dirge: a song or poem that mourns someone's death. See also elegy and lament below.

Disestablishmentarianism: movement opposing an official state-supported religion, in particular the Church of England in that role.

Dissonance: harsh, unmusical sounds or rhythms which poets may use deliberately to achieve certain effects.

Dramatic Irony: this form of irony occurs when the audience's reception of a speech by a character on the stage is affected by the possession by the audience of information not available to the character.

Dramatic Monologue: a lyric poem that takes the form of an utterance by a single person addressing a silent listener. The speaker may be an historical personage (as in some of Robert Browning's dramatic monologues), a figure drawn from myth or legend (as in some of Tennyson's), or an entirely imagined figure, as in Webster's "A Castaway."

Dub Poetry: a form of protest poetry originating in Jamaica, with its roots in dance rhythms, especially reggae, and often accompanied in performance by drums and music. See also rap.

Duple Foot: a duple foot of poetry has two syllables. The possible duple forms are iamb (in which the stress is on the second of the two syllables), trochee (in which the stress is on the first of the two syllables), spondee (in which both are stressed equally), and pyrrhic (in which both syllables are unstressed).

Eclogue: now generally used simply as an alternative name for a pastoral poem. In classical times and in the early modern period, however, an eclogue (or idyll) was a specific type of pastoral poem—a dialogue or dramatic monologue involving rustic characters. (The other main sub-genre of the pastoral was the georgic.)

Elegiac Stanza: a quatrain of iambic pentameters rhyming abab, often used in poems meditating on death or sorrow. The best-known example is Thomas Gray's "Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard."

Elegy: a poem which formally mourns the death of a particular person (e.g., Tennyson's "In Memoriam") or in which the poet meditates on other serious subjects (e.g., Gray's "Elegy"). See also dirge.

Elision: omitting or suppressing a letter or an unstressed syllable at the beginning or end of a word, so that a line of verse may conform to a given metrical scheme. For example, the three syllables at the beginning of Shakespeare's sonnet 129 are reduced to two by the omission of the first vowel: "Th' expense of spirit in a waste of shame." See also syncope.

Ellipsis: the omission of a word or words necessary for the complete grammatical construction of a sentence, but not necessary for our understanding of the sentence.

End-rhyme: See rhyme.

End-stopped: a line of poetry is said to be end-stopped when the end of the line coincides with a natural pause in the syntax, such as the conclusion of a sentence; e.g., in this couplet from Pope's "Essay on Criticism," both lines are end-stopped: "A little learning is a dangerous thing; / Drink deep, or taste not the Pierian spring." Compare this with enjambement.

Enjambement: the "running-on" of the sense from one line of poetry to the next, with no pause created by punctuation or syntax. (The more commonly found alternative is referred to as an end-stopped line.)

Envoy (Envoi): a stanza or half-stanza that forms the conclusion of certain French poetic forms, such as the sestina or the ballade. It often sums up or comments upon what has gone before.

Epic: a lengthy narrative poem, often divided into books and sub-divided into cantos. It generally celebrates heroic deeds or events, and the style tends to be lofty and grand. Examples in English include Spenser's The Faerie Queene and Milton's Paradise Lost.

Epic Simile: an elaborate simile, developed at such length that the vehicle of the comparison momentarily displaces the primary subject with which it is being compared.

Epigram: a very short poem, sometimes in closed couplet form, characterized by pointed wit.

Epigraph: a quotation placed at the beginning of a discourse to indicate or foreshadow the theme.

Epiphany: a moment at which matters of significance are suddenly illuminated for a literary character (or for the reader), typically triggered by something small and seemingly of little import. The term first came into wide currency in connection with the fiction of James Joyce.

Episodic Plot: plot comprising a variety of episodes that are only loosely connected by threads of story material (as opposed to plots that present one or more continually unfolding narratives where successive episodes build one on another).

Epithalamion: a poem celebrating a wedding. The best-known example in English is probably Edmund Spenser's "Epithalamion" (1595).

Eulogy: text expressing praise, especially for a distinguished person recently deceased.

Euphemism: mode of expression through which aspects of reality considered to be vulgar, crudely physical, or unpleasant are referred to indirectly rather than named explicitly. A variety of euphemisms exist for the processes of urination and defecation; passed away is often used as a euphemism for died. (The word euphemism has the same root as Euphuism (see below), but has taken on a different meaning.)

Euphony: pleasant, musical sounds or rhythms—the opposite of dissonance.

Euphuism: in the late sixteenth century John Lyly published a prose romance, Euphues, which employed a style that featured long sentences filled with balanced phrases and clauses, many of them adding little to the content. This highly mannered style was popular in the court of Elizabeth I for a few years following the publication of Lyly's famous work, and the style became known as Euphuism.

European Union (EU): group of nations formed in 1993 as the successor to the European Economic Community (Common Market). Britain first applied for membership in the latter in 1961; at first its efforts to join were blocked by the French government, but in 1973 Prime Minister Edward Heath successfully negotiated Britain's entry into the group. Britain resisted some moves towards full integration with the European community, in particular retaining its own currency when other European nations adopted the Euro on 1 January 2002. In 2016, the United Kingdom held a referendum and voted to leave the European Union altogether.

Exchequer: in earlier eras, the central royal financial office, responsible for receiving and keeping track of crown revenues. In later eras, part of the bureaucracy equivalent to the Ministry of Finance in Canada or the Treasury in the United States (the modern post of Chancellor of the Exchequer is equivalent to the American post of Secretary of the Treasury, the Canadian post of Minister of Finance, or the Australian post of Treasurer).

Exposition: the setting out of material in an ordered form, either in speech or in writing. In a play those parts of the action that do not occur on stage but are rather recounted by the characters are frequently described as being presented in exposition. Similarly, when the background narrative is filled in near the beginning of a novel, such material is often described as having been presented in exposition. Somewhat confusingly, however, the term "expository prose" is usually used with reference not to fiction but to the setting forth of arguments or descriptions in the context of essays or other works of prose non-fiction.

Eye-rhyme: See rhyme below.

Feminine Ending: the ending of a line of poetry on an "extra," and, especially, on an unstressed syllable. See, for example, the first line of Keat's "Ode on a Grecian Urn": "A thing of beauty is a joy forever," a line of iambic pentameter in which the final foot is an amphibrach rather than an iamb.

Feminine Rhyme: See rhyme below.

Figures of Speech: deliberate, highly concentrated uses of language to achieve particular purposes or effects on an audience. There are two kinds of figures: schemes and tropes. Schemes involve changes in word-sound and word-order, such as alliteration and chiasmus. Tropes play on our understandings of words to extend, alter, or transform meaning, as in metaphor and personification.

First-Person Narrative: narrative recounted using I and me. See also narrative perspective.

Fixed Forms: the term applied to a number of poetic forms and stanzaic patterns, many derived from French models, such as ballade, rondeau, sestina, triolet, and villanelle. Other "fixed forms" include the sonnet, rhyme royal, haiku, and ottava rima.

Folio: largest of several sizes of book page commonly used in the first few centuries after the introduction of the printing press. A folio size results from very large paper being folded in half. Paper size during this period was not standardized; though a typical folio page was about 15 inches high, some could be more than twice that height. When the same sheet is folded twice a quarto is produced, and when it is folded 3 times an octavo.

Foot: a unit of a line of verse which contains a particular combination of stressed and unstressed syllables. Dividing a line into metrical feet (iambs, trochees, etc.), then counting the number of feet per line, is part of scansion. See also meter.

Franklin: in the late medieval period, a landholder of free status, but ranking below the gentry.

Free Indirect Discourse: in prose fiction, commentary in which a seemingly objective and omniscient narrative voice assumes the point of view of one or more characters. When we hear through the third person narrative voice of Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice, for example, that Mr. Darcy "was the proudest, most disagreeable man in the world, and every body hoped that he would never come there again," the narrative voice has assumed the point of view of "every body" in the community; we as readers are not meant to take it that Mr. Darcy is indeed the most disagreeable man in the world. Similarly, in the following passage from the same novel, we are likely to take it as being the view of the character Charlotte that marriage is "the only honourable provision for well-educated young women of small fortune," not to take it to be an objective statement of perceived truth on the part of the novel's third person narrative voice:

> [Charlotte's] reflections were in general satisfactory. Mr. Collins to be sure was neither sensible nor agreeable; his society was irksome, and his attachment to her must be imaginary. But still he would be her husband. Without thinking highly either of men or of matrimony, marriage had always been her object; it was the only honourable provision for well-educated young women of small fortune, and however uncertain of giving happiness, must be their pleasantest preservative from want.

The term free indirect discourse may also be applied to situations in which it may not be entirely clear if the thoughts expressed emanate from the character, the narrator, or some combination of the two. (In the above-quoted passage expressing Charlotte's thoughts, indeed, some might argue that the statement concerning marriage should be taken as the expression of a belief that the narrative voice shares, at least in part.)

Free Verse: poetry that does not follow any regular meter, line length, or rhyming scheme. In many respects, though, free verse follows the complex natural "rules" and rhythmic patterns (or cadences) of speech.

Gaelic: Celtic language, variants of which are spoken in Ireland and Scotland.

Genre: a particular literary form. The concept of genre may be used with different levels of generality. At the most general, poetry, drama, and prose fiction are distinguished as separate genres. At a lower level of generality various sub-genres are frequently distinguished, such as (within drama) comedy and tragedy, or, at a still lower level of generality, Elizabethan domestic tragedy, Edwardian drawing-room comedy, and so on.

Georgic: (from Virgil's Georgics) a poem that celebrates the natural wealth of the countryside and advises how to cultivate and live in harmony with it. Pope's Windsor Forest and James Thomson's Seasons are classed as georgics. They were often said to make up, with eclogues, the two alliterative forms of pastoral poetry.

Ghazal: derived from Persian and Indian precedents, the ghazal presents a series of thoughts in closed couplets joined by a simple rhyme-scheme: aa ba ca da, etc.

Gothic: in architecture and the visual arts, a term used to describe styles prevalent from the twelfth to the fourteenth centuries, but in literature a term used to describe work with a sinister or grotesque tone that seeks to evoke a sense of terror on the part of the reader or audience. Gothic literature originated as a genre in the eighteenth century with works such as Horace Walpole's The Castle of Otranto. To some extent the notion of the medieval itself then carried with it associations of the dark and the grotesque, but from the beginning an element of intentional exaggeration (sometimes verging on self-parody) attached itself to the genre. The Gothic trend of youth culture that began in the late twentieth century is less clearly associated with the medieval, but shares with the various varieties of Gothic literature (from Walpole in the eighteenth century, to Bram Stoker in the early twentieth, to Stephen King and Anne Rice in the late twentieth) a fondness for the sensational and the grotesque, as well as a propensity to self-parody.

Guilds: non-clerical associations that arose in the late Anglo-Saxon period, devoted both to social purposes (such as the organization of feasts for the members) and to piety. In the later medieval period guilds developed strong associations with particular occupations.

Haiku: a Japanese form, using three unrhymed lines of five, seven, and five syllables. Conventionally, it uses precise, concentrated images to suggest states of feeling.

Heptameter: a line containing seven metrical feet.

Heroic Couplet: a pair of rhymed iambic pentameters, so called because the form was much used in seventeenth- and eighteenth-century poems and plays on heroic subjects.

Hexameter: a line containing six metrical feet.

Home Rule: movement dedicated to making Ireland politically independent from Britain.

Horatian Ode: inspired by the work of the Roman poet Horace, an ode that is usually calm and meditative in tone, and homostrophic (i.e., having regular stanzas) in form. Keats's odes are English examples.

House of Commons: elected legislative body, in Britain currently consisting of six hundred and fifty members of Parliament. See also Parliament.

House of Lords: the "Upper House" of the British Houses of Parliament. Since the nineteenth century the House of Lords has been far less powerful than the elected House of Commons. The House of Lords is currently made up of both hereditary peers (Lords whose title is passed on from generation to generation) and life peers. As a result of legislation enacted by the Labour government of Tony Blair, the role of hereditary peers in Parliament is being phased out.

Humors: the four humors were believed in until the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries to be elements in the makeup of all humans; a person's temperament was thought to be determined by the way in which the humors were combined. When the choleric humor was dominant, the person would tend towards anger; when the sanguine humor was dominant, towards pleasant affability; when the phlegmatic humor was dominant, towards a cool and calm attitude and/or a lack of feeling or enthusiasm; and when the melancholic humor was dominant, towards withdrawal and melancholy.

Hymn: a song whose theme is usually religious, in praise of divinity. Literary hymns may praise more secular subjects.

Hyperbole: a figure of speech (a trope) that deliberately exaggerates or inflates meaning to achieve particular effects, such as the irony in A.E. Housman's claim (from "Terence, This Is Stupid Stuff") that "malt does more than Milton can / To justify God's ways to man."

Iamb: the most common metrical foot in English verse, containing one unstressed syllable followed by a stressed syllable: x / (e.g., between, achieve).

Idyll: traditionally, a short pastoral poem that idealizes country life, conveying impressions of innocence and happiness.

Image: the recreation in words of objects perceived by the senses, sometimes thought of as "pictures," although other senses besides sight are involved. Besides this literal application, the term also refers more generally to the descriptive effects of figurative language, especially in metaphor and simile.

Imagism: a poetic movement that was popular mainly in the second decade of the twentieth century. The goal of Imagist poets (such as H.D. and Ezra Pound in their early work) was to represent emotions or impressions through highly concentrated imagery.

Incantation: a chant or recitation of words that are believed to have magical power. A poem can achieve an "incantatory" effect through a compelling rhyme scheme and other repetitive patterns.

In Memoriam Stanza: a four-line stanza in iambic tetrameter, rhyming abba: the type of stanza used by Tennyson in In Memoriam.

Interlocking Rhyme: See rhyme.

Internal Rhyme: See rhyme.

Irony: a subtle form of humor in which a statement is understood to convey a quite different (and often entirely opposite) meaning. A writer achieves this by carefully making sure that the statement occurs in a context which undermines or twists the statement's "literal" meaning. Hyperbole and litotes are often used for ironic effect. Sarcasm is a particularly strong or crude form of irony (usually spoken), in which the meaning is conveyed largely by the tone of voice adopted; something said sarcastically is meant clearly to imply its opposite.

Labour Party: See Political Parties.

Lament: a poem which expresses profound regret or grief either because of a death, or because of the loss of a former, happier state.

Language Poetry: a movement that defies the usual lyric and narrative conventions of poetry, and that challenges the structures and codes of everyday language. Often seen as both politically and aesthetically subversive, its roots lie in the works of modernist writers like Ezra Pound and Gertrude Stein.

Liberal Party: See Political Parties.

Litotes: a figure of speech (a trope) in which a writer deliberately uses understatement to highlight the importance of an argument, or to convey an ironic attitude.

Liturgical Drama: drama based on and/or incorporating text from the liturgy—the text recited during religious services.

Lollard: member of the group of radical Christians that took its inspiration from the ideas of John Wyclif (c. 1330–84). The Lollards, in many ways precursors of the Protestant Reformation, advocated making the Bible available to all, and dedication to the principles of evangelical poverty in imitation of Christ.

Luddites: protestors against the mechanization of industry on the grounds that it was leading to the loss of employment and to an increase in poverty. In the years 1811 to 1816 there were several Luddite protests in which machines were destroyed.

Lyric: a poem, usually short, expressing an individual speaker's feelings or private thoughts. Originally a song performed with accompaniment on a lyre, the lyric poem is often noted for musicality of rhyme and rhythm. The lyric genre includes a variety of forms, including the sonnet, the ode, the elegy, the madrigal, the aubade, the dramatic monologue, and the hymn.

Madrigal: a lyric poem, usually short and focusing on pastoral or romantic themes. A madrigal is often set to music.

Masculine Ending: a metrical line ending on a stressed syllable. Masculine Rhyme: see rhyme.

Masque: an entertainment typically combining music and dance, with a limited script, extravagant costumes and sets, and often incorporating spectacular special effects. Masques, which were performed before court audiences in the early seventeenth century, often focused on royal themes and frequently drew on classical mythology.

Mass: within Christianity, a church service that includes the sacrament of the Eucharist (Holy Communion), in which bread and wine are consumed which are believed by those of many Christian denominations to have been transubstantiated into the body and blood of Christ. Anglicans (Episcopalians) are more likely to believe the bread and wine merely symbolizes the body and blood.

Melodrama: originally a term used to describe nineteenth-century plays featuring sensational story lines and a crude separation of characters into moral categories, with the pure and virtuous pitted against evil villains. Early melodramas employed background music throughout the action of the play as a means of heightening the emotional response of the audience. By extension, certain sorts of prose fictions or poems are often described as having melodramatic elements.

Metaphor: a figure of speech (in this case, a trope) in which a comparison is made or identity is asserted between two unrelated things or actions without the use of "like" or "as." The primary subject is known as the tenor; to illuminate its nature, the writer links it to wholly different images, ideas, or actions referred to as the vehicle. Unlike a simile, which is a direct comparison of two things, a metaphor "fuses" the separate qualities of two things, creating a new idea. For example, Shakespeare's "Let slip the dogs of war" is a metaphorical statement. The tenor, or primary subject, is "war"; the vehicle of the metaphor is the image of hunting dogs released from their leash. The line fuses the idea of war with the qualities of ravening bloodlust associated with hunting dogs.

Metaphysical Poets: a group of seventeenth-century English poets, notably Donne, Cowley, Marvell, and Herbert, who employed unusual difficult imagery and conceits (see above) in order to develop intellectual and religious themes. The term was first applied to these writers to mark as far-fetched their use of philosophical and scientific ideas in a poetic context.

Meter: the pattern of stresses, syllables, and pauses that constitutes the regular rhythm of a line of verse. The meter of a poem written in the English accentual-syllabic tradition is determined by identifying the stressed and unstressed syllables in a line of verse, and grouping them into recurring units known as feet. See accent, accentual-syllabic, caesura, elision, and scansion. For some of the better known meters, see iamb, trochee, dactyl, anapaest, and spondee. See also monometer, dimeter, trimeter, tetrameter, pentameter, and hexameter.

Methodist: Protestant denomination formed in the eighteenth century as part of the religious movement led by John and Charles Wesley. Originally a movement within the Church of England, Methodism entailed enthusiastic evangelism, a strong emphasis on free will, and a strict regimen of Christian living.

Metonymy: a figure of speech (a trope), meaning "change of name," in which a writer refers to an object or idea by substituting the name of another object or idea closely associated with it: for example, the substitution of "crown" for monarchy, "the press" for journalism, or "the pen" for writing. Synecdoche (see below) is a kind of metonymy.

Mock-heroic: a style applying the elevated diction and vocabulary of epic poetry to low or ridiculous subjects. An example is Alexander Pope's "The Rape of the Lock."

Monologue: words spoken by a character to him or herself or to an audience directly.

Monometer: a line containing one metrical foot.

Mood: this can describe the writer's attitude, implied or expressed, towards the subject (see tone below); or it may refer to the atmosphere that a writer creates in a passage of description or narration.

Motif: an idea, image, action, or plot element that recurs throughout a literary work, creating new levels of meaning and strengthening structural coherence. The term is taken from music, where it describes recurring melodies or themes. See also theme.

Narrative Perspective: in fiction, the point of view from which the story is narrated. A first-person narrative is recounted using I and me, whereas a third person narrative is recounted using he, she, they, and so on. When a narrative is written in the third person and the narrative voice evidently "knows" all that is being done and thought, the story is typically described as being recounted by an "omniscient narrator."

Neoclassical: adapted from or substantially influenced by the cultures of ancient Greece and Rome. The term neoclassical is often used to describe the ideals of Restoration and eighteenth-century writers and artists who looked to ancient Greek and Roman civilization for models.

Nobility: privileged class, the members of which are distinguished by the holding of titles. Dukes, Marquesses, Earls, Viscounts, and Barons (in that order of precedence) are all holders of hereditary titles—that is to say, in the British patrilineal tradition, titles passed on from generation to generation to the eldest son. The title of Baronet, also hereditary, was added to this list by James I. Holders of non-hereditary titles include Knights and Dames.

Nonconformist: general term used to describe one who does not subscribe to the Church of England.

Nonsense Verse: light, humorous poetry which contradicts logic, plays with the absurd, and invents words for amusing effects. Lewis Carroll is one of the best-known practitioners of nonsense verse.

Octave: also known as "octet," the first eight lines in an Italian/Petrarchan sonnet, rhyming abbaabba. See also sestet and sonnet.

Octosyllabic: a line of poetry with eight syllables, as in iambic tetrameter.

Ode: originally a classical poetic form, used by the Greeks and Romans to convey serious themes. English poetry has evolved three main forms of ode: the Pindaric (imitative of the odes of the Greek poet Pindar); the Horatian (modeled on the work of the Roman writer Horace); and the irregular ode. The Pindaric ode was an irregular stanza in English, has a tripartite structure of strophe, antistrophe, and epode (meaning turn, counterturn, and stand), modeled on the songs and movements of the Chorus in Greek drama. The Horatian ode is more personal, reflective, and literary, and employs a pattern of repeated stanzas. The irregular ode, as its name implies, avoids a recurrent stanza pattern, and is sometimes irregular in line length also (see, for example, Wordsworth's "Ode: Intimations of Immortality").

Onomatopoeia: a figure of speech (a scheme) in which a word "imitates" a sound, or in which the sound of a word seems to reflect its meaning.

Ottava Rima: an eight-line stanza, usually in iambic pentameter, with the rhyme scheme abababcc. For an example, see Byron's Don Juan, or Yeats's "Sailing to Byzantium."

Oxymoron: a figure of speech (a trope) in which two words whose meanings seem contradictory are placed together, a paradox: for example, the phrase "darkness visible," from Milton's Paradise Lost.

Paean: a triumphant, celebratory song, often associated with a military victory.

Pale: in the medieval period, term for a protective zone around a fortress. As of the year 1500 three of these had been set up to guard frontiers of territory controlled by England—surrounding Calais in France, Berwick-upon-Tweed on the Scottish frontier, and Dublin in Ireland. The Dublin Pale was the largest of the three, and the term remained in use for a longer period there.

Pantoum: a poem in linked quatrains that rhyme abab. The second and fourth lines of one stanza are repeated as the first and third lines of the stanza that follows. In the final stanza the pattern is reversed: the second line repeats the third line of the first stanza, the fourth and final line repeats the first line of the first stanza.

Parliament: in Britain, the legislative body, comprising both the House of Commons and the House of Lords. Since the eighteenth century, the most powerful figure in the British government has been the Prime Minister rather than the monarch, the House of Commons has been the dominant body in Parliament, and members of the House of Commons have been organized in political parties. Since the mid-nineteenth century the effective executive in the British Parliamentary system has been the Cabinet, each member of which is typically in charge of a department of government. Unlike the American system, the British Parliamentary system (sometimes called the "Westminster system," after the location of the Houses of Parliament) brings together the executive and legislative functions of government, with the Prime Minister leading the government party in the House of Commons as well as directing the cabinet. By convention it is understood that the House of Lords will not contravene the wishes of the House of Commons in any fundamental way, though the "Upper House," as it is often referred to, may sometimes modify or reject legislation.

Parody: a close, usually mocking imitation of a particular literary work, or of the well-known style of a particular author, in order to expose or magnify weaknesses. Parody is a form of satire—that is, humor that may ridicule and scorn its object.

Pastiche: a discourse which borrows or imitates other writers' characters, forms, style, or ideas. Unlike a parody, a pastiche is usually intended as a compliment to the original writer.

Pastoral: in general, pertaining to country life; in prose, drama, and poetry, a stylized type of writing that idealizes the lives and innocence of country people, particularly shepherds and shepherdesses. Also see eclogue, georgic, idyll, above.

Pastoral Elegy: a poem in which the poet uses the pastoral style to lament the death of a friend, usually represented as a shepherd. Milton's "Lycidas" provides a good example of the form, including its use of such conventions as an invocation of the muse and a procession of mourners.

Pathetic Fallacy: a form of personification in which inanimate objects are given human emotions: for example, rain clouds "weeping." The word "fallacy" in this connection is intended to suggest the distortion of reality or the false emotion that may result from an exaggerated use of personification.

Pathos: the emotional quality of a discourse; or the ability of a discourse to appeal to our emotions. It is usually applied to the mood conveyed by images of pain, suffering, or loss that arouse feelings of pity or sorrow in the reader.

Pattern Poetry: a predecessor of modern concrete poetry, in which the shape of the poem on the page is intended to suggest or imitate an aspect of the poem's subject. George Herbert's "Easter Wings" is an example of pattern poetry.

Penny Dreadful: Victorian term for a cheap and poorly produced work of short fiction, usually of a sensational nature.

Pentameter: a line of verse containing five metrical feet.

Performance Poetry: poetry composed primarily for oral performance, often very theatrical in nature. See also dub poetry and rap.

Persona: the assumed identity or "speaking voice" that a writer projects in a discourse. The term "persona" literally means "mask." Even when a writer speaks in the first person, we should be aware that the attitudes or opinions we hear may not necessarily be those of the writer in real life.

Personification: a figure of speech (a trope), also known as "prosopopoeia," in which a writer refers to inanimate objects, ideas, or animals as if they were human, or creates a human figure to represent an abstract entity such as Philosophy or Peace.

Petrarchan Sonnet: the earliest form of the sonnet, also known as the Italian sonnet, with an 8-line octave and a six-line sestet. The Petrarchan sonnet traditionally focuses on love and descriptions of physical beauty.

Phoneme: a linguistic term denoting the smallest unit of sound that it is possible to distinguish. The words fun and phone each have three phonemes, though one has three letters and one has five. (Each makes up a single syllable.)

Pindaric: See ode.

Plot: the organization of story materials within a literary work. The order in which story material is presented (especially causes and consequences); the inclusion of elements that allow or encourage the reader or audience to form expectations as to what is likely to happen; the decision to present some story material through exposition rather than in more extended form as part of the main action of the narrative—all these are matters of plotting.

Political Parties: the party names "Whig" and "Tory" began to be used in the late seventeenth century; before that time members of the House of Commons acted individually or through shifting and very informal factions. At first the Whigs and Tories had little formal organization either, but by the mid-eighteenth century parties had acknowledged leaders, and the leader of the party with the largest number of members in the House of Commons had begun to be recognized as the Prime Minister. The Tories evolved into the modern Conservative Party, and the Whigs into the Liberal Party. In the late nineteenth century the Labour Party was formed in an effort to provide better representation in Parliament for the working class, and since the 1920s Labour and the Conservatives have alternated as the party of government, with the Liberals reduced to third-party status. (Since 1988, when the Liberals merged with a breakaway faction from Labour known as the Social Democrats, this third party has been named the Liberal Democrats.)

Pre-Raphaelites: originally a group of Victorian artists and writers, formed in 1848. Their goal was to revive what they considered the simpler, fresher, more natural art that existed before Raphael (1483–1520). The poet Dante Gabriel Rossetti was one of the founders of the group.

Presbyterian: term applied to a group of Protestants (primarily English and Scottish) who advocated replacing the traditional hierarchical church in which bishops and archbishops governed lower level members of the clergy with a system in which all presbyters (or ministers) would be equal. The Presbyterians, originally led by John Knox, were strongly influenced by the ideas of John Calvin.

Prose Poem: a poetic discourse that uses prose formats (e.g., it may use margins and paragraphs rather than line breaks or stanzas) yet is written with the kind of attention to language, rhythm, and cadence that characterizes verse.

Prosody: the study and analysis of meter, rhythm, rhyme, stanzaic pattern, and other devices of versification.

Protagonist: the central character in a literary work.

Prothalamion: a wedding song; a term coined by the poet Edmund Spenser, adapted from "epithalamion" (see above).

Public School: See schools below.

Pun: a play on words, in which a word with two or more distinct meanings, or two words with similar sounds, may create humorous ambiguities. Also known as paranomasia.

Puritan: term, originally applied only in a derogatory fashion but later widely accepted as descriptive, referring to those in England who favored religious reforms that went beyond those instituted as part of the Protestant Reformation, or, more generally, who were more forceful and uncompromising in pressing for religious purity both within the Church and in society as a whole.

Pyrrhic: a metrical foot containing two weak stresses: xx.

Quadrivium: group of four academic subjects (arithmetic, astronomy, geometry, and music) that made up part of the university coursework in the Middle Ages. They were studied after the more basic subjects of the Trivium.

Quantitative Meter: a metrical system used by Greek and Roman poets, in which a line of verse was measured by the "quantity," or length of sound of each syllable. A foot was measured in terms of syllables classed as long or short.

Quantity: duration of syllables in poetry. The line "There is a Garden in her face" (the first line from the poem of the same name by Thomas Campion) is characterized by the short quantities of the syllables. The last line of Thomas Hardy's "During Wind and Rain" has the same number of syllables as the line by Campion, but the quantities of the syllables are much longer—in other words, the line takes much longer to say: "Down their carved names the rain drop ploughs."

Quatrain: a four-line stanza, usually rhymed.

Quintet: a five-line stanza. Sometimes given as quintain.

Rap: originally coined to describe informal conversation, "rap" now usually describes a style of performance poetry in which a poet will chant rhymed verse, sometimes improvised and usually with musical accompaniment that has a heavy beat.

Realism: as a literary term, the presentation through literature of material closely resembling real life. As notions both of what constitutes "real life" and of how it may be most faithfully represented in literature have varied widely, "realism" has taken a variety of meanings. The term naturalistic has sometimes been used as a synonym for realistic; naturalism originated in the nineteenth century as a term denoting a form of realism focusing in particular on grim, unpleasant, or ugly aspects of the real.

Refrain: one or more words or lines repeated at regular points throughout a poem, often at the end of each stanza or group of stanzas. Sometimes a whole stanza may be repeated to create a refrain, like the chorus in a song.

Reggae: a style of heavily rhythmic music from the West Indies with lyrics that are colloquial in language and often anti-establishment in content and flavor. First popularized in the 1960s and 1970s, reggae has had a lasting influence on performance poetry, rap, and dub.

Rhetoric: in classical Greece and Rome, the art of persuasion and public speaking. From the Middle Ages onwards, the study of rhetoric gave greater attention to style, particularly figures of speech. Today in poetics, the term rhetoric may encompass not only figures of speech, but also the persuasive effects of forms, sounds, and word choices.

Rhyme: the repetition of identical or similar sounds, usually in pairs and generally at the ends of metrical lines.

End-rhyme: a rhyming word or syllable at the end of a line.

Eye Rhyme: rhyming that pairs words whose spellings are alike but whose pronunciations are different: for example, though/slough.

Feminine Rhyme: a two-syllable (also known as "double") rhyme. The first syllable is stressed and the second unstressed: for example, hasty/tasty. See also triple rhyme below.

Interlocking Rhyme: the repetition of rhymes from one stanza to the next, creating links that add to the poem's continuity and coherence. Examples may be found in Shelley's use of terza rima in "Ode to the West Wind" and in Dylan Thomas's villanelle "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night."

Internal Rhyme: the placement of rhyming words within lines so that at least two words in a line rhyme with each other.

Masculine Rhyme: a correspondence of sound between the final stressed syllables at the end of two or more lines, as in grieve / leave, arr-i've / sur-vive.

Slant Rhyme: an imperfect or partial rhyme (also known as "near" or "half" rhyme) in which the final consonants of stressed syllables match but the vowel sounds do not. E.g., spoiled / spilled, taint / stint.

Triple Rhyme: a three-syllable rhyme in which the first syllable of each rhyme-word is stressed and the other two unstressed (e.g., lottery / coterie).

True Rhyme: a rhyme in which everything but the initial consonant matches perfectly in sound and spelling.

Rhyme Royal: a stanza of seven iambic pentameters, with a rhyme-scheme of ababbcc. This is also known as the Chaucerian stanza, as Chaucer was the first English poet to use this form. See also septet.

Rhythm: in speech, the arrangement of stressed and unstressed syllables creates units of sound. In song or verse, these units usually form a regular rhythmic pattern, a kind of beat, described in prosody as meter.

Romanticism: a major social and cultural movement, originating in Europe, that shaped much of Western artistic thought in the late eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Opposing the ideal of controlled, rational order of the Enlightenment, Romanticism emphasizes the importance of spontaneous self-expression, emotion, and personal experience in producing art. In Romanticism, the "natural" is privileged over the conventional or the artificial.

Rondeau: a fifteen-line poem, generally octosyllabic, with only two rhymes throughout its three stanzas, and an unrhymed refrain at the end of the ninth and fifteenth lines, repeating part of the opening line.

Sarcasm: See irony.

Satire: literary work designed to make fun of or seriously criticize its subject. According to many literary theories of the Renaissance and neoclassical periods, the ridicule through satire of a certain sort of behavior may function for the reader or audience as a corrective of such behavior.

Scansion: the formal analysis of patterns of rhythm and rhyme in poetry. Each line of verse will have a certain number of fairly regular "beats" consisting of alternating stressed and unstressed syllables. To "scan" a poem is to count the beats in each line, to mark stressed and unstressed syllables and indicate their combination into "feet," to note pauses, and to identify rhyme schemes with letters of the alphabet.

Scheme: See figures of speech.

Schools: in the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries the different forms of school in England included Cathedral schools (often founded with a view to the education of members of the choir); grammar schools (often founded by towns or by guilds, and teaching a much broader curriculum than the modern sense of "grammar" might suggest; private schools, operated by private individuals out of private residences; and public schools, which (like the private schools and the grammar schools) operated independent of any church authority, but unlike the grammar schools and private schools were organized as independent charities, and often offered free education. Over the centuries certain of these public schools, while remaining not-for-profit institutions, began to accept fee-paying students and to adopt standards that made them more and more exclusive. In the eighteenth and nineteenth century attendance at such prestigious public boarding schools as Eton, Westminster, and Winchester had become almost exclusively the preserve of the upper classes; by the nineteenth century such "public" schools were the equivalent of private schools in North America. A few girls attended some early grammar schools, but the greater part of this educational system was for boys only. Though a number of individuals of earlier periods were concerned to increase the number of private schools for girls, the movement to create a parallel girls' system of public schools and grammar schools dates from the later nineteenth century.

Septet: a stanza containing seven lines.

Serf: in the medieval period, a person of unfree status, typically engaged in working the land.

Sestet: a six-line stanza that forms the second grouping of lines in an Italian / Petrarchan sonnet, following the octave. See sonnet and sestina.

Sestina: an elaborate unrhymed poem with six six-line stanzas and a three-line envoy.

Shire: originally a multiple estate; since the late medieval period a larger territory forming an administrative unit—also referred to as a county.

Simile: a figure of speech (a trope) which makes an explicit comparison between a particular object and another object or idea that is similar in some (often unexpected) way. A simile always uses "like" or "as" to signal the connection. Compare with metaphor above.

Sonnet: a highly structured lyric poem, which normally has fourteen lines of iambic pentameter. We can distinguish four major variations of the sonnet.

Italian/Petrarchan: named for the fourteenth-century Italian poet Petrarch, has an octave rhyming abbaabba, and a sestet rhyming cdecde, or cdcdcd (other arrangements are possible here). Usually, a turn in argument takes place between octave and sestet.

Miltonic: developed by Milton and similar to the Petrarchan in rhyme scheme, but eliminating the turn after the octave, thus giving greater unity to the poem's structure of thought.

Shakespearean: often called the English sonnet, this form has three quatrains and a couplet. The quatrains rhyme internally but do not interlock: abab cdcd efef gg. The turn may occur after the second quatrain, but is usually revealed in the final couplet. Shakespeare's sonnets are the best-known examples of this form.

Spenserian: after Edmund Spenser, who developed the form in his sonnet cycle Amoretti. This sonnet form has three quatrains linked through interlocking rhyme, and a separately rhyming couplet: abab bcbc cdcd ee.

Speaker: in the late medieval period, a member of the Commons in Parliament who spoke on behalf of that entire group. (The Commons first elected a Speaker in 1376.) In later eras the role of Speaker became one of chairing debates in the House of Commons and arbitrating disputes over matters of procedure.

Spenserian Stanza: a nine-line stanza, with eight iambic pentameters and a concluding alexandrine, rhyming ababbcbcc.

Spondee: a metrical foot containing two strong stressed syllables: // (e.g., blind mouths).

Sprung Rhythm: a modern variation of accentual verse, created by the English poet Gerard Manley Hopkins, in which rhythms are determined largely by the number of strong stresses in a line, without regard to the number of unstressed syllables. Hopkins felt that sprung rhythm more closely approximated the natural rhythms of speech than did conventional poetry.

Stanza: any lines of verse that are grouped together in a poem and separated from other similarly structured groups by a space. In metrical poetry, stanzas share metrical and rhyming patterns; however, stanzas may also be formed on the basis of thought, as in irregular odes. Conventional stanza forms include the tercet, the quatrain, rhyme royal, the Spenserian stanza, the ballad stanza, and ottava rima.

Stream of Consciousness: narrative technique that attempts to convey in prose fiction a sense of the progression of the full range of thoughts and sensations occurring within a character's mind. Twentieth-century pioneers in the use of the stream of consciousness technique include Dorothy Richardson, Virginia Woolf, and James Joyce.

Stress: See accent.

Strophe: the first stanza in a Pindaric ode. This is followed by an antistrophe (see above), which presents the same metrical pattern and rhyme scheme, and finally by an epode, differing in meter from the preceding stanzas. Upon completion of this "triad," the entire sequence can recur. Strophe may also describe a stanza or other subdivision in other kinds of poem.

Sublime: a concept, most popular in eighteenth-century England, of the qualities of grandeur, power, and awe that may be inherent in or produced by undomesticated nature or great art. The sublime was thought of as higher and loftier than something that is merely beautiful.

Subplot: a line of story that is subordinate to the main storyline of a narrative. (Note that properly speaking a subplot is a category of story material, not of plot.)

Substitution: a deliberate change from the dominant pattern of stresses in a line of verse to create emphasis or variation. Thus the first line of Shakespeare's sonnet "'Shall I compare thee to a summer's day?'" is decidedly iambic in meter (x / x / x / x / x /), whereas the second line substitutes a trochee (/ x) in the opening foot: "Thou art more lovely and more temperate."

Subtext: implied or suggested meaning of a passage of text, or of an entire work.

Syllabic Verse: poetry in which the length of a line is measured solely by the number of syllables, regardless of accents or patterns of stress.

Syllable: vocal sound or group of sounds forming a unit of speech; a syllable may be formed with a single effort of articulation. Some syllables consist of a single phoneme (e.g., the word I, or the first syllable in the word u-ni-ty) but others may be made up of several phonemes (as with one-syllable words such as lengths, splurged, and through). By contrast, the much shorter words ago, any, and open each have two syllables.

Symbol: a word, image, or idea that represents something more, or other, than for what it at first appears to stand. Like metaphor, the symbol extends meaning; but while the tenor and vehicle of metaphor are bound in a specific relationship, a symbol may have a range of connotations. For example, the image of a rose may call forth associations of love, passion, transience, fragility, youth and beauty, among others. Depending upon the context, such an image could be interpreted in a variety of ways, as in Blake's lyric, "The Sick Rose." Though this power of symbolic representation characterizes all language, poetry most particularly endows the concrete imagery evoked through language with a larger meaning. Such meaning is implied rather than explicitly stated; indeed, much of the power of symbolic language lies in the reader's ability to make meaningful sense of it.

Syncope: in poetry, the dropping of a letter or syllable from the middle of a word, as in "trav'ler." Such a contraction allows a line to stay within a metrical scheme. See also catalexis and elision.

Synecdoche: a kind of metonymy in which a writer substitutes the name of a part of something to signify the whole: for example, "sail" for ship or "hand" for a member of the ship's crew.

Tercet: a group, or stanza, of three lines, often linked by an interlocking rhyme scheme as in terza rima. See also triplet.

Terza Rima: an arrangement of tercets interlocked by a rhyme scheme of aba bcb cdc ded, etc., and ending with a couplet that rhymes with the second-last line of the final tercet (for example, efe, ff). See, for example, Percy Shelley's "Ode to the West Wind."

Tetrameter: a line of poetry containing four metrical feet.

Theme: the governing idea of a discourse, conveyed through the development of the subject, and through the recurrence of certain words, sounds, or metrical patterns. See also motif.

Third-Person Narrative: See narrative perspective.

Tone: the writer's attitude toward a given subject or audience, as expressed through an authorial persona or "voice." Tone can be projected through particular choices of wording, imagery, figures of speech, and rhythmic devices. Compare mood.

Tories: See Political Parties.

Tragedy: in the traditional definition originating in discussions of ancient Greek drama, a serious narrative recounting the downfall of the protagonist. More loosely, the term has been applied to a wide variety of literary forms in which the tone is predominantly a dark one and the narrative does not end happily.

Transcendentalism: a philosophical movement that influenced such Victorian writers as Thomas Carlyle and Robert Browning. Also a mode of Romantic thought, Transcendentalism places the supernatural and the natural within one great Unity and believes that each individual person embodies aspects of the divine.

Trimeter: a line of poetry containing three metrical feet.

Triolet: a French form in which the first line appears three times in a poem of only eight lines. The first line is repeated at lines 4 and 7; the second line is repeated in line 8. The triolet has only two rhymes: abaaabab.

Triple Foot: poetic foot of three syllables. The possible varieties of triple foot are the anapest (in which two unstressed syllables are followed by a stressed syllable), the dactyl (in which a stressed syllable is followed by two unstressed lines), and the mollossus (in which all three syllables are stressed equally). English poetry tends to use duple rhythms far more frequently than triple rhythms.

Triplet: a group of three lines with the same end-rhyme, much used by eighteenth-century poets to vary or punctuate the flow of couplets. See also tercet.

Trivium: group of three academic subjects (dialectic, grammar, and rhetoric) that were part of the university curriculum in the Middle Ages. Their study precedes that of the more advanced subjects of the quadrivium.

Trochee: a metrical foot containing one strong stress followed by one weak stress: / x (heaven, lover).

Trope: any figure of speech that plays on our understandings of words to extend, alter, or transform "literal" meaning. Common tropes include metaphor, simile, personification, hyperbole, metonymy, oxymoron, synecdoche, and irony. See also figures of speech, above.

Turn (Italian "volta"): the point in a sonnet where the mood or argument changes. The turn may occur between the octave and sestet, i.e., after the eighth line, or in the final couplet, depending on the kind of sonnet.

Unities: Many literary theorists of the late sixteenth through late eighteenth centuries held that a play should ideally be presented as representing a single place, and confining the action to a single day and a single dominant event. They disapproved of plots involving gaps or long periods of time, shifts in place, or subplots. These concepts, which came to be referred to as the unities of space, time, and action, were based on a misreading of classical authorities (principally of Aristotle).

Vers de societé*: literally, "verse about society." The term originated with poetry written by aristocrats and upper-middle-class poets that specifically disavows the ambition of creating "high art" while treating the concerns of their own group in verse forms that demonstrate a high degree of formal control (e.g., artful rhymes, surprising turns of diction).

Vers libre*: See free verse above.

Verse: a general term for works of poetry, usually referring to poems that incorporate some kind of metrical structure. The term may also describe a line of poetry, though more frequently it is applied to a stanza.

Villanelle: a poem usually consisting of 19 lines, with five 3-line stanzas (tercets) rhyming aba, and a concluding quatrain rhyming abaa. The first and third lines of the first tercet are repeated at fixed intervals throughout the rest of the poem. See, for example, Dylan Thomas's "Do Not Go Gentle into That Good Night."

Whigs: See Political Parties.

Workhouse: public institution in which the poor were provided with a minimal level of sustenance and with lodging in exchange for work performed. Early workhouses were typically administered by individual parishes. In 1834 a unified system covering all of England and Wales was put into effect.

Zeugma: a figure of speech (trope) in which one word links or "yokes" two others in the same sentence, often to comic or ironic effect. For example, a verb may govern two objects, as in Pope's line "Or stain her honour, or her new brocade."

A broken ALTAR, Lord thy servant rears 909
A little onward lend thy guiding hand 1085
A married state affords but little ease 947
A mighty spire, whose top doth pierce the sky 441
A milk-white hair-lace wound up all her hairs 945
A ship that bears much sail, and little ballast, is easily overset (website)
A single thought that haunts me, day and night 445
A strife is grown between Virtue and Love 336
A sweet disorder in the dress 903
A troop of six that came to my house 150
A Vale there is enwrapped with dreadful shades 574
A ward, and still in bonds, one day 962
A wedded wife there was 644
A woman's face with nature's own hand painted 678
Absence, hear thou my protestation 137
Accuse me thus: that I have scanted all 684
After so long a race as I have run 323
After the death of the poets, whose riches were poems and wit 154
Ah bed, the field where joy's peace some do see 338
Ah, silly Pug, wert thou so sore afraid? 401
Alas for him who looks on Enniskillen 147
Alas, madam, for stealing of a kiss 115
Alas! so all things now do hold their peace 124
Alas, 'tis true, I have gone here and there 683
All kings, and all their favourites 812
All things within this fading world hath end (website)
Am I thus conquered? I lost the powers 891
Amor, che nel penser mio vive et regna 129
An earring round may well a zodiac be 938
And call ye this to utter what is just 393
And now she begins to see 446
Arithmetic nine digits, and no more 959
As an unperfect actor on the stage 678
As close as you your wedding kept 691
As due by many titles I resign 829
As I in hoary Winter's night 575
As the sweet sweat of roses in a still 818
As to th'Eternal often in anguishes 395
As virtuous men pass mildly away 816
As when the glorious magazine of light 948
Ask me no more where Jove bestows 953
At court I met it, in clothes brave enough 718
At the round earth's imagined corners, blow 830
Atá fleasgach ar mo thí 143
Avenge O Lord thy slaughtered saints, whose bones 980
Batter my heart, three personed God; for you 832
Be nought dismayd that her unmovèd mind 320
Be our guide, O Domhnall 140
Because I breathe not love to every one 337
Because I oft in dark abstracted guise 334
Behold the father, is his daughter's son 572
Betwixt two ridges of plowed land lay Wat 943
Blame not my lute, for he must sound 116
Blasted with sighs, and surrounded with tears 813
Blest he who like Ulysses voyaged fair and wide 131
Brave infant of Saguntum, clear 725
Busy old fool, unruly Sun 810
But be contented when that fell arrest 681
But wherefore do not you a mightier way 677
By Saint Mary, my lady 11
Camden, most reverend head, to whom I owe 719
Can we not force from widowed poetry 953
Cherry-lipped Adonis in his snowy shape 136
Come leave the loathèd stage 724
Come, let me write. "And to what end?" To ease 334
Come, let us sound with melody the praises (website)
Come live with me and be my love 591
Come live with me, and be my love 815
Come Madam, come, all rest my powers defy 819
Come, my Lucasia, since we see 949
Come, Sleep! O Sleep, the certain knot of peace 334
Come, sons of summer, by whose toil 906
Comming to kisse her lyps, (such grace I found) 321
Condemn me not for making such a coil 936
Cromwell, our chief of men, who through a cloud 980
Cupid laid by his brand, and fell asleep 687
Dear, famish not what your self gave food 891
Death be not proud, though some have called thee 830
Death is the cook of Nature; and we find 944
Death, thou wast once an uncouth hideous thing 920
Devouring time, blunt thou the lion's paws 677
Dian, that fain would cheer her friend the Night 338
Do never think it strange 186
Donne, the delight of Phoebus and each muse 719
Drink to me only, with thine eyes 722
Dull atoms flat, when they together join 937

Dydd daed Saesnes gyffes, gain 161
Early on Lammas morning 144
Entre ses mains & en son plein pouvoir 445
Envious wits, what hath been mine offence 340
Et maintenant elle commence à voir 446
Even as the sun with purple-coloured face 652
Even now that care which on thy crown attends 396
Even such is time, which takes in trust 462
Every poet, drunken fool 163
Fair gull on the tide, indeed 156
Fair is my love, and cruel as she's fair 134
False hope which feeds but to destroy, and spill 892
Farewell dear babe, my heart's too much content (website)
Farewell, Love, and all thy laws forever 114
Farewell (sweet Cooke-ham) where I first obtained 454
Farewell—thou art too dear for my possessing 681
Farewell, thou child of my right hand, and joy 719
Farewell, thou thing, time-past so known, so dear 904
Fat soil, full spring, sweet olive, grape of bliss 573
Fly, fly, my friends, I have my death wound; fly! 332
Fond woman, which wouldst have thy husband die 818
For God's sake hold your tongue, and let me love 810
Forced by fraud and by Saxon oppression 152
Fortune hath taken away my love 401
Fresh spring the herald of loves mighty king 322
Friend Is., be now content and let my sorrows quell 696
From fairest creatures we desire increase 676
From Oberon in Fairy Land 641
From you have I been absent in the spring 682
Full many a glorious morning have I seen 679
Gather ye rosebuds while ye may 906
Get up! get up for shame! the blooming morn 905
Go, and catch a falling star 809
Go, lovely rose! 960
Go, soul, the body's guest 460
Goe little booke: thy selfe present (website)
Gone are all the noble poets 154
Good day, fine, nimble Englishwoman 161
Good Dido stint thy tears 695
Grant us a long life, Jupiter, O grant us many years! 792
Grief find the words, for thou hast made my brain 338
Had we but world enough, and time 926
Happy ye leaves when as those lilly hands 320
Hark how the Mower Damon sung 928
Having been tenant long to a rich Lord 909
Having this day my horse, my hand, my lance 335
Hence loathed Melancholy 970
Hence vain deluding joys 973
Here, hold this glove (this milk-white cheverel glove) 136
Here lies, to each her parents' ruth 719
Hermaphrodite in sense in Art a monster 895
Hermaphrodite in show, in deed a monster 896
Heureux qui, comme Ulysse, a fait un beau voyage 131
High on a throne of royal state, which far 1005
How fresh, O Lord, how sweet and clean 919
How like a winter hath my absence been 682
How many paltry, foolish, painted things 134
How oft have I with public voice run on (website)
How oft when thou, my music, music play'st 684
How should I praise thee, Lord! How should my rhymes 912
How soon hath Time the subtle thief of youth 979
How vainly men themselves amaze 930
I am a little world made cunningly 829
I am a woman poor and blind 91
I am waiting for a soft-spoken girl 158
I came to a choice town 157
I care not for these ladies (website)
I did not live until this time 949
I find no peace and all my war is done 128
I grieve, and dare not show my discontent 400
I know the ways of learning; both the head 915
I much did muse, why Venus could not brook 673
I now think Love is rather deaf than blind 725
I on my horse, and Love on me doth try 335
I saw Eternity the other night 963
I saw fair Chloris walk alone 959
I sing of brooks, of blossoms, birds, and bowers 903
I struck the board, and cried, No more 918
I tell thee Dick, where I have been 955
I think not on the state, nor am concerned 948
I whole in body, and in mind 698
I wonder by my troth, what thou, and I 809
I would in rich and golden coloured rain 132
If all the world and love were young 460
If ever two were one, then surely we (website)
If God do help thee 186
If I profane with my unworthiest hand 135
If poisonous minerals, and if that tree 830
If there were, oh! an Hellespont of cream 136
If this, our life, be less than but a day 131
If thy soul check thee that I come so near 685
In highest way of heav'n the Sun did ride 333
In his hands and in his full power 445
In martial sports I had my cunning tried 336

In silent night when rest I took (website)
In the old age black was not counted fair 684
In this strange labyrinth how shall I turn? 892
Is mairg dá ngalar an grádh 143
It fell on a summer's day (website)
It never occurred to me—what a thought 159
It will be looked for, book, when some but see 718
Je vouldroy bien richement jaunissant 132
Joy, I did lock thee up: but some bad man 917
Joy of my life, full oft for loving you 323
Just like unto a nest of boxes round 938
Kind pity chokes my spleen; brave scorn forbids 820
Let man's soul be a sphere, and then, in this 833
Let me confess that we two must be twain 679
Let me not to the marriage of true minds 683
Let me pour forth 813
Let not my love be called idolatry 682
Like as the waves make towards the pebbled shore 680
Like to the Indians, scorched with the sun 891
Lo, as a careful housewife runs to catch 685
Lo I the man, whose Muse whilome did maske 194
Lo where a wounded heart with bleeding eyes conspire 964
Long have I heard, and yet I hear the sounds 133
Look on me, Lord: though trembling I beknowe 133
Lord, how can man preach thy eternal word? 913
Lord, who createdst man in wealth and store 910
Love, a child, is ever crying 892
Love bade me welcome: yet my soul drew back 920
Love leave to urge, thou know'st thou has the hand 891
Love, that doth reign and live within my thought 123
Loving in truth, and fain in verse my love to show 332
Luxurious man, to bring his vice in use 927
Lyke as a huntsman after weary chace 322
Lyke as a ship that through the Ocean wyde 321
Lyke as the Culver on the barèd bough 323
Mark but this flea, and mark in this 814
May a dagger pierce your heart 163
Meeting with Time, slack thing, said I 917
Merry Margaret (website)
Methought I saw my late espoused saint 981
Methought I saw the grave where Laura lay 459
Mine own John Poyns, since ye delight to know 117
Misdeeming eye that stoopest to the lure 573
Most glorious Lord of lyfe that on this day 322
Most happy letters fram'd by skilfull trade 322
Muses, I oft invoked your holy aid 337
My galley chargèd with forgetfulness 129
My God, I heard this day 916
My head, my heart, mine Eyes, my life, nay more (website)
My love hath vow'd he will forsake me (website)
My love is as a fever, longing still 686
My lute, awake! Perform the last 116
My mistress' eyes are nothing like the sun 685
My pain, still smothered in my grieved breast 890
Nature that washed her hands in milk 461
No crooked leg, no bleared eye 400
No longer mourn for me when I am dead 680
No more be grieved at that which thou hast done 679
No sooner came, but gone, and fall'n asleep (website)
Not at first sight, nor with a dribbèd shot 332
Not marble, nor the gilded monuments 679
Not marching now in fields of Thracimene 593
Nothing but a ruin now 159
Now Pontius Pilate is to judge the cause 453
Now that the winter's gone, the earth hath lost 952
Now thou hast loved me one whole day 809
O Dieux ayez de moy compassion 445
O gods, have of me compassion 445
O how I faint when I of you do write 681
O joy too high for my low style to show! 337
O love, how thou art tired out with rhyme! 945
O Nature, Nature, hearken to my cry 943
O never say that I was false of heart 683
O, who shall from this dungeon raise 923
O woman full of wiles 151
Of Mans First Disobedience, and the Fruit 992
Of this worlds Theatre in which we stay 321
Oft with true sighs, oft with uncallèd tears 337
Oh absent presence, Stella is not here 340
Oh fortune, thy wresting wavering state 399
Oh God, why hast thou thus 393
Oh happy Thames, that didst my Stella bear 340
Oh tears, no tears, but rain from Beauty's skies 339
Oh, to vex me, contraries meet in one 832
On Hellespont, guilty of true-loves' blood 580
One day I wrote her name upon the strand 323
Out upon it, I have loved 957
Pace non trovo et non ò da far guerra 128
Pardon mine ears, both I and they do pray 336
Pardon sweete flower of matchless Poetrie (website)
Passa la nave mia colma d'oblio 129
Pity whose complaint is love 144
Pla ce bo (website)
Poor soul, the centre of my sinful earth 686

Pray thee take care, that tak'st my book in hand 718
Prayer the Church's banquet, Angels' age 912
Quand vous serez bien vielle, au soir à la chandelle 133
Quando io dimando nel mio pianto Amore 130
Queen and huntress, chaste and fair 727
Raising my hopes on hills of high desire 134
Reading my verses, I like't them so well 936
Renowned Empress, and great Britain's Queen (website)
Rich fools there be, whose base and filthy heart 333
See with what simplicity 927
Set me whereas the sun doth parch the green 123
Shall I compare thee to a summer's day? 677
Show me, dear Christ, Thy spouse, so bright and clear 832
Si nostre vie est moins qu'une journée 131
Since brass, nor stone, nor earth, nor boundless sea 680
Since I am coming to that holy room 834
Since there's no help, come let us kiss and part 134
Sing lullaby, as women do 136
Sir, more than kisses, letters mingle souls 822
Sith Cynthia is ascended to that rest 453
Sith my life from life is parted 576
Small atoms of themselves a world may make 936
So cruel prison how could betide, alas 124
So shall I live supposing thou art true 681
Some by industry of learning found 938
Sometime now past in the Autumnal Tide (website)
Soul's joy, bend not those morning stars from me 335
Stella is sick, and in that sickbed lies 339
Stella oft sees the very face of woe 335
Stella, since thou so right a princess art 340
Stella, the fullness of my thoughts of thee 336
Still to be neat, still to be dressed 728
Sweet day, so cool, so calm, so bright 915
Sweet is the Rose, but growes upon a brere 321
Sweetest love, I do not go 811
Tagus, farewell, that westward with thy streams 115
Tell me not (sweet) I am unkind 958
Tell me, O tell, what kind of thing is Wit 961
Tell me, you anti-saints, why glass 960
Tell you I chill 2
Th'expense of spirit in a waste of shame 684
That only essence who made all of naught (website)
That time of year thou mayst in me behold 680
The bitter force of Fortune's frowardness 696
The curious wits seeing dull pensiveness 333
The doubt of future foes exiles my present joy 400
The famous warriors of the anticke world 322
The fleet Astronomer can bore 914
The forward youth that would appear 931
The Greekës chieftains, all irked with the war 125
The head is lanced to work the body's cure 572
The hearts thus intermixed speak 950
The little love-god lying once asleep 687
The long love that in my thought doth harbour 114
The news I hear from distant Erin 152
The pillar perished is whereto I leant 114
The powerful prayers of the skylark 155
The soverayne beauty which I doo admyre 320
The square flat atoms, as dull earth appear 937
The time is come I must depart 697
The tramping steed, that champs the burnished bit 388
The wanton troopers riding by 924
The wisest scholar of the wight most wise 334
The world's purpose hides from us 166
Then again, if a sickly son 790
There's a young man in pursuit of me 143
They flee from me that sometime did me seek 115
They that have power to hurt and will do none 682
This caps all their tricks, this statute from overseas 155
This is my play's last scene, here heavens appoint 829
This morning, timely rapt with holy fire 720
This holy season fit to fast and pray 320
Thou art not, Penshurst, built to envious show 721
Thou ill-form'd offspring of my feeble brain (website)
Though dusty wits dare scorn astrology 334
Though I am young, and cannot tell 727
Thought, with good cause thou lik'st so well the Night 338
Three furies fell, which turn the world to ruth 442
Three things there be that prosper up apace 459
Throw away thy rod 919
Thus life and death, and young and old 937
'Tis said wise Socrates look'd like an ass 490
'Tis the year's midnight, and it is the day's 814
'Tis true, 'tis day; what though it be? 812
To draw no envy, Shakespeare, on thy name 723
To sing of Wars, of Captains, and of Kings (website)
To thee, pure sprite, to thee alone's addressed 391
Tonight, grave sir, both my poor house and I 720
Truce, gentle Love, a parley now I crave 135
Truly poor Night thou welcome art to me 891
Twice forty months of wedlock I did stay 950
Twice or thrice had I loved thee 812
Two loves I have, of comfort and despair 686
Tyrant, well swell'st thou thus 392

Un fodd yw'r byd, cyngyd cêl 166

from the publisher

A name never says it all, but the word "broadview" expresses a good deal of the philosophy behind our company. We are open to a broad range of academic approaches and political viewpoints. We pay attention to the broad impact book publishing and book printing has in the wider world; we began using recycled stock more than a decade ago, and for some years now we have used 100% recycled paper for most titles. As a Canadian-based company we naturally publish a number of titles with a Canadian emphasis, but our publishing program overall is internationally oriented and broad-ranging. Our individual titles often appeal to a broad readership too; many are of interest as much to general readers as to academics and students.

Founded in 1985, Broadview remains a fully independent company owned by its shareholders—not an imprint or subsidiary of a larger multinational.

If you would like to find out more about Broadview and about the books we publish, please visit us at www.broadviewpress.com. And if you'd like to place an order through the site, we'd like to show our appreciation by extending a special discount to you: by entering the code below you will receive a 20% discount on purchases made through the Broadview website.

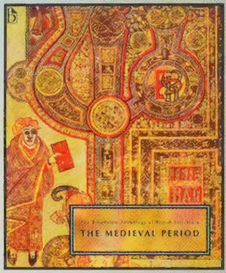
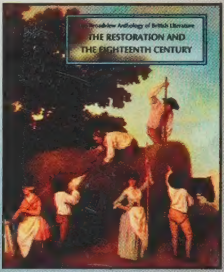
THE BROADVIEW ANTHOLOGY OF BRITISH LITERATURE



The Broadview Anthology of British Literature
THE MEDIEVAL PERIOD

The Broadview Anthology of British Literature presents British literature in a truly distinctive light. Fully grounded in sound literary and historical scholarship, the anthology takes a fresh approach to many canonical authors, and includes a wide selection of work by lesser-known writers. The anthology also provides wide-ranging coverage of the worldwide connections of British literature, and it pays attention throughout to issues of race, gender, class, and sexual orientation. It includes comprehensive introductions to each period, providing in each case an overview of the historical and cultural as well as the literary background. It features accessible and engaging headnotes for all authors, extensive explanatory annotations, and an unparalleled number of illustrations and contextual materials. Innovative, authoritative, and comprehensive, The Broadview Anthology of British Literature has established itself as a leader in the field.



The Broadview Anthology of British Literature
THE RESTORATION AND THE EIGHTEENTH CENTURY

The full anthology comprises six bound volumes, together with an extensive website component; the latter has been edited, annotated, and designed according to the same high standards as the bound-book component of the anthology, and is accessible through the www.broadviewpress.com website with the passcode obtained with the purchase of one or more of the bound volumes.

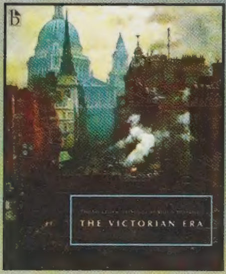
The Broadview Anthology of British Literature
THE AGE OF ROMANTICISM

Comments on previous editions:

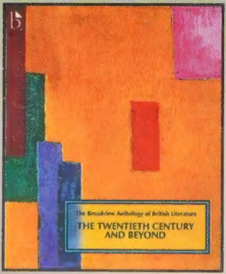
"... an exciting achievement. The Broadview Anthology sets a new standard by which all other anthologies of British literature will now have to be measured."
Graham Hammill, University of Notre Dame



The Broadview Anthology of British Literature
THE VICTORIAN ERA

"... an excellent anthology. Good selections (including some nice surprises), just the right level of annotation, affordable—and a hit with my students. I will definitely use it again."
Ira Nadel, University of British Columbia

"... a compelling alternative to the established anthologies by Norton and Longman.... This is a very real intellectual, as well as pedagogical, achievement."
Nicholas Watson, Harvard University



The Broadview Anthology of British Literature
THE TWENTIETH CENTURY AND BEYOND

"The simple fact is that a major work of student-centered scholarship has arrived in the field of English studies; The Broadview Anthology of British Literature is no mere pretender to the throne; it is the new standard."
Dr. Richard Nordquist, Director of Liberal Studies, Armstrong Atlantic State University
